In later years many attempts were made to prove to Faraday the reality of psychic phenomena, but he was too obstinate. "They who say these things are not competent witnesses of facts," he wrote in 1865. To an invitation to attend the first séance of the Davenport brothers he returned the answer, "If spirit communications, not utterly worthless, should happen to start into activity, I will trust the spirits to find out for themselves how they can move my attention. I am tired of them."

Faraday was a member of the Sandemanians, an obscure religious sect holding rigid biblical views. When Sir William Crookes inquired of Faraday how he reconciled science with religion, he received the reply that he kept his science and religion strictly apart.

At the time of the Home-Lyon trial (see D. D. Home), a Professor Tyndall, in a letter in Pall Mall Gazette (May 5, 1868), wrote that, years before, Faraday had accepted an invitation to examine Home's phenomena, but his conditions were not met and the investigation fell through. When the original correspondence on the subject between Faraday and Sir Emerson Tennant was published, it appeared that one of Faraday's conditions was, "If the effects are miracles, or the work of spirits, does he (Home) admit the utterly contemptible character, both of them and their results, up to the present time, in respect either of yielding information or instruction or supplying any force or action of the least value to mankind?" Robert Bell, the intermediary for the proposed séance, found Faraday's letter so preposterous that, without consulting Home, he declined his intervention. Home, when he learned about it, was duly indignant.

Professor Tyndall—as an arch skeptic—commended Faraday's attitude, but those interested in psychical research assumed the contrary position. "The letter," writes Frank Podmore in Modern Spiritualism (1902), "was, of course, altogether unworthy of Faraday's high character and scientific eminence, and was no doubt the outcome of a moment of transient irritation. The position taken was quite indefensible. To enter upon a judicial inquiry by treating the subject-matter as a chose jugée was surely a parody of scientific methods."

Faraday died August 25, 1867. In a series of séances between 1888 and 1910 in Spring Hall, Kansas, the presiding spirit claimed to be Faraday, and his communications were published in four books by A. Aber: Rending of the Veil, Beyond the Veil, The Guiding Star, and The Dawn of Another Life. A second set of communications reportedly from Faraday were received by an anonymous medium who called herself (or himself) the "Mystic Helper." The messages were received sporadically beginning in 1874 and were finally published in 1924.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Mystic Helper, The. The Evolution of the Universe, or, Creation According to Science. Los Angeles: Cosmos Publishing, 1924.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Farajou Data Base

Iranian research center and scientific data bank for conducting research on psychology, parapsychology, hypnotism, yoga, zen, meditation, and natural treatments. It sponsored translations into Farsi (a Persian language of Iran) of works in these areas from around the world and provided other countries with articles on science practices and tribal customs of the Middle East. Last known address: P. O. Box 13185-1354, Tehran, Iran.

Farias, Ruben, Jr. (1954–)

Ruben Farias, Jr., is possibly the most famous of the contemporary Brazilian Spiritualist healers. He was born on February 14, 1954 in San Paulo, Brazil. As a young man he trained as an engineer and graduated in 1980 as a telecommunications engineer from IME (Military Institute of Engineering). Then in the 1990s, he emerged as the most recent person in whom the spirit entity Dr. Adolpho Fritz has manifested. Dr. Fritz first appeared in the middle of the twentieth century as the spirit guide of José Pedro de Fritas, who became known as José Arigó, the Brazilian psychic surgeon. Arigó apparently performed operations with an unsterilized pocket knife, though it was understood that Fritz was doing the real work on the patient's astral body. Following Arigó's untimely death in an automobile accident in 1971, Dr. Fritz began to manifest through several other healers, the most famous being Edson Queiroz who worked in Recife, in northern Brazil. Like Arigó, he met an untimely death in 1991.

Fritz reportedly began to possess Farias as early as 1986, but became most active after Queiroz's death. Since that time, Farias has seen a reported 500,000 patients and been the subject of a book and a television documentary. He has also accumulated a number of testimonies of healing from patients who reside outside of Brazil. He goes into trance to begin his healing work and Dr. Fritz takes over as a secondary personality. Like Arigó, he will actually open the body of patients with a knife, and they apparently feel no pain. Also, like Arigó, he has faced charges by the authorities that he is practicing medicine without a license, but has withstood efforts to close his work to date.

Farias made his first visit to the United States in 2000. This visit followed his acquittal in a 1999 court case in which he was charged with practicing witchcraft and being a charlatan.

Sources:

Dr. Fritz. http://alternative-health-4u.com/drfritz/. June 11, 2000.

Maki, Masao. In Search of Brazil's Quantum Surgeon: The Dr. Fritz Phenomenon. Redwood, N.Y.: Cadence Books, 1998.

Farr, Florence (1860–1917)

Florence Farr, actress, author, and leading member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn(HOGD), was born on July 7, 1860, at Bickley, Kent, England. Her father, a physician specializing in hygiene, had worked closely with Florence Nightingale, and named his youngest daughter after her. In her 13th year she was sent to Cheltenham Ladies' College in Gloucestershire. In 1877 she entered Queen's College, the first institution of higher learning for women in England. She left in 1880 without completing her course of study. She would try teaching, but soon left it for an acting career. In 1884 she married actor Edward Emery, though they would be separated in 1889 and finally divorced in 1895.

Farr was initiated into the Golden Dawn in 1890. She progressed quickly and two years later was named Praemonstrator. She demonstrated her accomplishments in her first books, A Short Enquiry into the Hermetic Art (1894) and Egyptian Magic (1896). Within the order she met Annie Horniman, a well-to-do member who financed her movement into producing dramas. During 1894 she produced a series of successful plays in London including one by George Bernard Shaw, with whom she was having an affair. In 1899, she was the general manager for the production of The Countess Cathleen, a drama written by fellow order member William Butler Yeats.

In 1896 she began the Sphere group, a magical working group that included the Inner Order adepts. The following year Samuel L. MacGregor Mathers, the international leader of the order, named her the order's "Chief in Anglia." Among her duties that year would be the initiation of a young magician named Aleister Crowley. However, her leadership also meant that she would be in the center of the storm that hit the order in 1900 when many of the British members protested the autocratic authority that Mathers was attempting to exercise from his office in Paris. The controversy led to Mathers' expulsion and to the emergence of Farr as the Moderator of the Isis-Urania Temple in London. A short time later, however, a second controversy arose as members began to question the activity of Farr's Sphere group.

Farr tired of the constant bickering and in 1902 resigned from the HOGD and continued her involvement in occult matters through the Theosophical Society. However, for the next decade she would concentrate her time on her career in the theater. She also authored a number of books and articles.

In 1912 Farr retired from the stage and accepted the invitation to move to Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) as the principal of the first girls' school to operate among the minority Hindu Tamil population. She worked at the school until weakened by the breast cancer from which she died in April 29, 1917.

Sources:

Farr, Florence. The Dancing Faun. London: Elkin Mathews and John Lane, 1894.

———. Egyptian Magic: Occult Mysteries in Ancient Egypt by S. S.D.D. 1896. Reprint, Wellingborough, UK: Aquarian Press, 1982.

———. Modern Woman: Her Intentions. London: Frank Palmer, 1910.

———. The Music of Speech. London: Elkin Mathews, 1909.

———. The Way of Wisdom: Being an Investigation of the Meanings of the Letters of the Hebrew Alphabet Considered as a Remnant of Chaldean Wisdom. London: J. M. Watkins, 1900.

Greer, Mary K. Women of the Golden Dawn: Rebels and Priestesses. Rochester, Vt.: Park Street Books, 1995.

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Farrar, Janet (1950–)

Janet Farrar, author and Wiccan priestess, was born Janet Owen on June 24, 1950, in London, England. She was raised in the Church of England, and after high school worked as a model and receptionist. Her uneventful life changed in 1970 when, after being attracted to witchcraft, she was initiated into the London coven headed by Maxine and Alexander Sanders. During her training she met Stewart Farrar (1916–2000), and though he was more than 30 years her senior, they formed a working relationship as priest and priestess. In the Wiccan faith, as developed by Gerald B. Gardner and expounded by Sanders, women play a dominant role, with the priestess taking the lead in the annual cycle of esbats and sabbat rituals.

In spite of Sanders' charisma, all was not well within the coven and early in 1971 the Sanderses were to separate. In December of 1970, Owen and Farrar left and formed their own coven. Their relationship grew closer and in 1974 they were handfasted (marriage in the Wiccan world) and officially married the next year. Meanwhile, Farrar, who had worked as a journalist, left his job and launched a successful career as an author.

In 1976 the Farrars relinquished leadership of their London coven and moved to Ireland, settling in County Wexford. Responding to letters from Stewart's earlier book, What Witches Do (1971), the two began work on what became a more detailed look at the annual cycle of Wiccan festivals, Eight Sabbats for Witches (1981). This book became the first of a set of collaborative works including The Witches' Way (1984), Life and Times of a Modern Witch (1987), The Witches' Goddess (1987), and The Witches' God (1989).

In 1988, the Farrars moved back to London where by now they had become celebrities within the growing international Wiccan community. They continued to write and also were popular speakers at Wiccan events for which they made several trips to North America. Stewart Farrar died in 2000, but Janet continues as a major Wiccan leader, one of the few with a direct experience of the founding generation.

Sources:

Farrar, Janet, and Stewart Farrar. Eight Sabbats for Witches. London: Robert Hale, 1981.

———. Life and Times of a Modern Witch. London: Piatkus, 1987.

———. The Witches' Way. London: Robert Hale, 1984.

Farrar, Stewart. What Witches Do. London: Peter Davies, 1971.

Farrar, Stewart (1916–2000)

Stewart Farrar, international leader of the contemporary Wiccan community, was born on June 28, 1916, in Highams Park, Walthamstow, Essex, now a London suburb. His family were Christian Scientists, but as a young man he left the faith and spent much of his life as an agnostic. He attended University College in London as a journalism major, graduating in 1937. With war approaching, in 1939 he joined the army and became a gunnery instructor. He rose to the rank of major by the time of his return to civilian life in 1946.

After the war, Farrar spent the next quarter of a century was spent pursuing his journalism career. Attracted to Marxism, in 1953 he became a reporter for the Communist Party's Daily Worker, but quickly became dissatisfied with both the party and the newspaper. He subsequently worked as a scriptwriter for Associated British-Pathe, a movie production company, and gradually transformed into a freelance author. His first novel, The Snake on 99, was released in 1958.

In 1969 he took a position as a feature writer for The Reveille, a weekly periodical. The job changed his life, as it led to his meeting Alexander Sanders, a charismatic teacher who had developed a variant of a new religion, Wicca or witchcraft, as originally proposed by Gerald B. Gardner. Dissatisfied with the agnosticism that had dominated his life, he found himself attracted to the new faith and in 1970 was initiated. Assisting his conversion was the research required for his next book, What Witches Do, a basic volume describing Alexandrian Wicca. Despite its repeating many elements of Sanders' fictional biography concerning his own Wiccan accomplishments, the book attracted many to the Craft.

Once in the coven, Farrar met Janet Owen (1950–), another new initiate, and after eight months of training they left Sanders and formed their own coven. They functioned as priest and priestess for several years and were finally handfasted (married) in 1974. Two years later they moved to Ireland, Farrar having returned to his work as a freelance author. Through the mid- and late 1970s he wrote a series of occult novels but in the 1980s turned his attention to a series of books on Witchcraft that he and Janet coauthored. The first, Eight Sabbats for Witches (1981), was the first published detailed discussion of the annual cycle of Wiccan celebrations. They followed with The Witches' Way (1984) and the Life and Times of a Modern Witch (1987). A pair of volumes, The Witches' Goddess (1987) and The Witches' God (1989) detailed the many expressions around the world of the primary deities of the polytheistic Wiccan religion.

By the time their books appeared, Wicca was a growing religion in both Europe and North America, and as pioneering figures, the Farrars became international celebrities in wide demand as speakers at Wiccan events. In 1988 they moved back to London, and collaborated on several books with Gavin Bone. Stewart Farrar died on February 7, 2000.

Sources:

Farrar, Janet, and Stewart Farrar. Eight Sabbats for Witches. London: Robert Hale, 1981.

———. Life and Times of a Modern Witch. London: Piatkus, 1987.

———. The Witches' Way. London: Robert Hale, 1984.

Farrar, Stewart. What Witches Do. London: Peter Davies, 1971.

Fascination

The term generally signifies the charming or enchanting of another by the eyes or the looks; to hold or keep in subjection by charms, by powers of pleasing. It is derived from the Latin fascinare (enchant). A belief in the power of fascination appears to have been prevalent in most ages and countries. In ancient Greece and Rome there is the example of Theocritus's wish that an old woman might be with him to avert this danger by spitting, and the complaint of Menalcas (in Virgil) that some evil eye had fascinated his lambs.

The Romans, with their usual passion for increasing the host of heaven, deified this power of evil, and enrolled a god, "Fascinus" among their objects of worship. Although he was a numen (presiding spirit), the celebration of his rites was entrusted to the vestal virgins, and his phallic attribute was suspended around the necks of children and from the triumphal chariots.

Lucretius, in Of Natural Witchcraft for Love, states:

"But as there is fascination and witchcraft by malicious and angry eyes unto displeasure, so are there witching aspects tending contrariwise to love, or, at the least, to the procuring of good will and liking. For if the fascination or witchcraft be brought to pass or provoked by the desire, by the wishing or coveting any beautiful shape or favour, the venom is strained through the eyes, though it be from afar, and the imagination of a beautiful form resteth in the heart of the lover, and kindleth the fire where it is afflicted. And because the most delicate, sweet and tender blood of the beloved doth there wander, his countenance is there represented, shining in his own blood, and cannot there be quiet, and is so haled from thence, that the blood of him that is wounded, reboundeth, and slippeth into the wounder."

Vairus, prior of the Benedictine Convent of Ste. Sophia in Benevento, published a treatise, De Fascino, in 1589. In it he first points to whole nations that have been reported to possess the power of fascination. The idolatrous "Biarbi" and "Hamaxobii," on the authority of Olaus Magnus, are represented as "most deeply versed in the art of fascinating men, so that by witchcraft of the eyes, or words, or of aught else [a very useful latitude of expression] they so compel men that they are no longer free, nor of sane understanding, and often are reduced to extreme emaciation, and perish by a wasting disease."

He then proceeds to similar marvels concerning animals:

"Wolves, if they see a man first, deprive him of all power of speech; a fact yet earlier from Theocritus. The shadow of the hyaena produces the same effect upon a dog; and this sagacious wild beast is so well acquainted with its own virtue, that whenever it finds dog or man sleeping, its first care is to stretch its length by the side of the slumberer, and thus ascertain his comparative magnitude with its own. If itself be larger of the two, then it is able to afflict its prey with madness, and it fearlessly begins to nibble his hands or paws (whichever they may be) to prevent resistance; if it be smaller, it quietly runs away."

In the tenth chapter of the First Book of Vairus the author inquires, "An aliqui se fascinare possint?" a question that is decided in the affirmative by the example of the Basilisk of Narcissus, and of one less known, though equally unfortunate, Eutelis. In the twelfth chapter Vairus states that the more wicked a person is, the better he is adapted to exercise evil fascination. This book offers two cautions: "Let no servant ever hire himself to a squinting master, and let jewellers be cautious to whose hands, or rather eyes, they intrust their choicest wares."

Additionally, Vairus stresses that all those individuals who are immoderately praised, especially behind their backs, persons of fair complexion and of handsome face or figure, particularly children, are most exposed to fascination. This notion probably arose from such children attracting more attention from strangers than others less indebted to nature. It was an impression of his own personal beauty that induced Polyphemus to put into practice the spitting charm that Cotattaris had taught him.

In The Second Book of Varius, after disputing against "natural" fascination, which he treats as visionary, Vairus concludes that all fascination is an evil power, attained by tacit or open compact with the devil.

A second writer on this matter is John Lazarus Gutierrez, a Spanish physician who may be believed to be equally well qualified for the consideration of mystery. His Opusculum de Fascino appeared in 1653. Of his own experience he does not say much, but in his Dubium he cites an account of a servant who could bring down a falcon from her highest flight by steadily looking at her. He also cites two other wonders: the first of a man in Guadalazara who was in the habit of breaking mirrors into minute fragments solely by looking at them; the second, of another in Ocana, who killed horses and even children by the contagion of his eyes.

From Jerome Cardan, Gutierrez extracted the following symptoms by which a physician determined that his patient was fascinated: loss of color; heavy and melancholy eyes, either overflowing with tears or unnaturally dry; frequent sighs and lowness of spirits; watchfulness; bad dreams; and falling away of flesh. The patient was also diagnosed as fascinated if a coral or jacinth worn by him lost its color, or if a ring made from the hoof of an ass, when put on his finger, grew too big for him after a few days. According to the same writer, the Persians used to determine the sort of fascination under which the patient labored by binding a clean linen cloth around his head, letting it dry there, and analyzing any spots that arose on it.

But the most curious fact stated by Gutierrez is that the Spanish children in his time wore amulets against fascination, somewhat resembling those in use among the Romans. The son of Gutierrez himself wore one of these; it was a cross of jet, (agavache) and it was believed that it would split if regarded by evil eyes, thus transferring venom from the child to itself. The amulet worn by the Gutierrez boy did split one day while a person was steadfastly looking at him; in justice to Gutierrez it must be added that he attributed the occurrence to some accidental cause. He expressed his conviction that the same thing would have happened under any other circumstances. Throughout his volume, indeed, Gutierrez uses all his reasoning to explode the superstition.

A third similar work is that of John Christian Frommann, a physician of Saxe-Coburg, who published his Tractatus de Fascinatione in 1675. Frommann quotes Theocritus, who claimed that children in unwashed baby linen were easily subject to fascination, as was any beauty who employed two lady's maids to dress her hair; moreover, all those who lay in bed very late in the morning, especially if they wore nightcaps; all who broke their fast on cheese or peas; and all children who, having been once weaned, were brought back to the breast would, even against their will, be gifted with the power of fascinating both men and beasts.

In order to ascertain whether a child was fascinated, three oak apples could be dropped into a basin of water under its cradle, the person who dropped them observing the strictest silence. If the apples floated the child was free, if they sank it was affected. In another test a slice of bread was cut with a knife marked with three crosses, and both the bread and the knife were left on the child's pillow for a night; if marks of rust appeared in the morning, the child was fascinated. Some also believed that if on licking a child's forehead with the tongue a salt taste was perceived, it was proof of fascination.

Protection Against Fascination

The following remedies against fascination rest upon the authority either of Vairus or Frommann, or both, and several may be traced to Pliny: an invocation of Nemesis; the root of the Satyrios orchis; the skin of a hyena's forehead; the kernel of the fruit of a palm tree; Alyssum (madwort) hung up anywhere in the house; the stone Catochites; spitting on the right shoe before it was put on; hyssop; lilies; fumigations; sprinklings; necklaces of jacinth, sapphire, or carbuncle; washings in river water, provided silence be kept; licking a child's forehead, first upward, next across, and lastly up again, and then spitting behind its back; sweeping the child's face with the bough of a pine tree; laying the child on the ground, covered with a linen cloth, and then sprinkling it with earth in the form of a cross; laying turf from a boy's grave under a boy's pillow, from a girl's under a girl's; silently placing near a child the clothes in which it was baptized; if, as is sometimes the case, a child appears to derive no benefit from washing, taking three scrapings from the plaster of each of the four walls of its bedroom, and sprinkling them on its linen; three "lavements" of three spoonfuls of milk; giving in a drink the ashes of a rope with which a man has been hanged; drawing water silently, and throwing a lighted candle into it in the name of the Holy Trinity, then washing the patient's legs in this water, and throwing the remainder behind his or her back in the form of a cross; hanging up the key of the house over the child's cradle; laying on the child crumbs of bread, a lock with the bolt shut, a looking-glass, or some coral washed in the font in which it was baptized; and hanging round the child's neck fennel seeds, or bread and cheese.

Vairus states that huntsmen, as a protection against fascination, used to split an oak plant and pass themselves and their dogs between it. As amulets against love fascination, he recommends a sprinkling with the dust in which a mule had rolled itself; a bone which may be found in the right side of a toad; or the liver of a chameleon.

Some instances of more recent belief in fascination than those referred to above may be found collected in John Brand's Popular Antiquities (1849). Such belief was prevalent among the inhabitants of the western islands of Scotland, who used nuts called Molluca beans as amulets against fascination. James Dallaway, in his Constantinople Ancient and Modern (1797), remarks that "Nothing can exceed the superstition of the Turks respecting the evil eye of an enemy or infidel. Passages from the Koran are painted on the outside of the houses, globes of glass are suspended from the ceiling, and a part of the superfluous comparison of their horses is designed to attract attention and divert a sinister influence."

Martin Antoine Del Rio wrote a short notice of fascination, which he divided into "Poetica seu Vulgaris," that resulting from obscure physical causes, which he treated as fabulous; "Philosophica," which he considered to be contagion; and "Magica," to which he heartily assented.

The Evil Eye

A belief in the destructive power of human vision was once widespread, and the power was called "casting the evil eye" or "overlooking." Individuals with eyes of a different color from others in their community, or with such defects as a squint or cataracts were suspected of causing harm by overlooking. People believed this could affect animals, individuals, or objects and result in illness, poverty, injury, death, or other evils. During the great witch-hunting manias, hundreds of individuals were burned after being accused of causing injury through casting the evil eye.

The evil was believed to be averted by countercharms, amulets, or ritual actions. Making an image of the person believed to be overlooking and sticking pins into it was one way of removing the evil eye. Another method was to go out at night and collect nine toads, which had to be tied together with string and buried in a hole. As the toads languished, so the person casting the evil eye would pine away and die. An ancient remedy was to make gestures having a sexual connotation. It is possible that the veil worn by the bride in European marriage was originally a protection against the malice of the evil eye.

Mesmerism

The term fascination has also been used in reference to the more hypnotic aspect of the practice of mesmerism or animal magnetism in order to induce a trance. The operator gazes steadily into the subject's eyes for five or ten minutes. It is possible, however, that trance is induced more by the subject's concentration upon the eyes of the operator than by any mysterious power from the operator's eyes, since trance can be induced by having the subject stare fixedly at a bright object. Fascination is also evident among animals and reptiles, as in the often quoted instance of a snake fascinating a bird.

Psychic Force and Vision

Psychical researchers have often claimed that there is a psychic force exerted by human vision, and some psychics are believed to have influenced objects at a distance by gazing at them. Various instruments have been devised to demonstrate this claimed psychic force, exerted by willpower, by proximity of the hands, or by vision (see biometer of Baraduc; De Tromelin cylinder; sthenometer). One of the most interesting instruments of this kind was developed by British physician Charles Russ, described by him in an article in the British medical journal the Lancet (July 3, 1931) as "an instrument which is set in motion by vision."

Sources:

Brand, John. Popular Antiquities. 1849. Reprint, London: J. R. Smith, 1870.

Dallway, James. Constantinople Ancient and Modern. N.p., 1797.

Fascinum

An artificial male phallus reportedly used in witchcraft ceremonies. Evidence of the artificiality of claimed copulation with the devil is the frequent reference to the coldness of the phallus. Centuries before the great witchcraft manias of Europe, the fascinum was used in ancient religious rituals, such as those connected with worship of the god Priapus; such phalli were also known in ancient Egypt. Probably the earliest known is that of the fertility god Min at Koptos, around 5500 B.C.E.

Sources:

Knight, Richard Payne. A Discourse on the Worship of Priapus. 1786. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J: University Books, 1974.

Fata Morgana

A mirage often seen in the Strait of Messina, Sicily, once attributed to the fairies. It took its name from the Italian form of Morgan le Fay, sister of King Arthur in Arthurian legend.

FATE (Magazine)

Preeminent American journal devoted to articles and true stories of the strange and unknown. It was originally launched by Raymond A. Palmer and Curtis Fuller in the spring of 1948. Previously both had worked for Ziff-Davis, a Chicago-based publishing company that was in the process of moving to New York. Palmer and Fuller decided to stay in the Midwest. Palmer had concluded from his prior publishing experience that there was a market for a magazine offering true stories of mysterious occurrences. The first issue featured the story of Kenneth Arnold's UFO sightings and FATE regularly thereafter carried UFO stories.

In 1955, after Palmer had moved to Amherst, Wisconsin, and started a second magazine, Mystic, Fuller bought his share of the publication and became sole owner. He published and edited the magazine until 1966, when Mary Margaret Fuller became the editor. She was succeeded by Jerome Clark in 1988. FATE emerged as a unique publication. On the one hand it promoted, through its very existence, all areas of inquiry on matters psychic, occult, and Fortean. It also became known for its large advertisement section covering a wide range of occult and other curious publications and services representative of the contemporary scene. At the same time, FATE took the lead in exposing hoaxes and printing articles presenting evidence of mundane explanations of supposed mysterious phenomena.

In 1989 Fuller relinquished FATE to its present owner, Carl L. Weschcke. Address: P.O. Box 64383, St. Paul, MN 55164-0383. FATE Magazine is also online at http://www.llewellyn.com/fate/ where back issues are also available.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2. of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

———. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

FATE Magazine. http://www.llewellyn.com/fate/. March 8, 2000.

Father Divine See Divine, Father Major Jealous

Father's House

The Father's House was a small organization that served for many years as a dissemination point for the teachings of the Universal Link, the original international organization spreading the New Age movement. It was founded by Ralph F. Raymond (d.1984) in the mid-1960s as the Universal Link Heart Center in Los Angeles. In 1968 Raymond made a tour of Universal Link centers in Europe and upon his return settled in San Jose, California. Under his religious name, Brother Francis, he published a booklet of his travels, now an important chronicle of the beginning of the New Age. He also began to issue the Father's House Journal, in which he reprinted selections, primarily channeled material, from many of the early New Age groups such as the Findhorn Foundation in Scotland. Raymond believed in the coming Aquarian Age and saw himself as one facilitator assisting people into its reality. The Father's House ceased to exist soon after his death.

Sources:

Brother Francis [Ralph F. Raymond]. The Universal Link Concept. Los Angeles: Universal Link Heart Center, 1968.

Fatima

In 1916 and 1917, Fatima, a small town in central Portugal, was the site of a set of apparitions of the Virgin Mary that have become among the most heralded in the history of the Roman Catholic Church. The apparitions appeared to three shepherd children—Lucia Dos Santos (age nine), Francisco Marto (age eight), and Jacinta Marto (age six). None of the three had had schooling enough to have learned to read and write. Their adventure began one spring day when out on a hillside with the sheep, they each shared a vision of a young man who described himself as the Angel of Peace. He visited them on two subsequent occasions and the last time shared with them the Eucharist, which Roman Catholics believe to be the body and blood of Jesus.

After the angel's visits, nothing more occurred for almost a year. Then on May 13, 1917, a brilliant flash of light caught their attention and a beautiful young Lady, described as dressed in white and shining with light, appeared before them. The Lady said that she had come from heaven and wanted the children to come to their present location on the 13th of every month for the next five months. In October she would reveal her name and purpose. She also posed a question to the children, "Do you wish to offer yourselves to God in order to accept all the sufferings he wishes to send you, in reparation for sin and for the conversion of sinners?" They answered in the affirmative.

Once the story got out as to what the children claimed to see, they were questioned and ridiculed; even the local priest was hostile to the children. Only the father of Francisco and Jacinta believed. The children kept their appointment on June 13, along with some 60 spectators. When the apparition occurred, only the children saw the Lady. There was a brief message to pray the Rosary and return in July, and that Lucia would be used to spread devotion to Mary's Immaculate Heart. As the Lady departed, the people witnessed the bending of a branch of the tree near the place where she supposedly stood, as if under a weight, and then the movement of the uppermost branches as if her clothes were sweeping over them.

On July 13, the crowd numbered 5,000. The Lady made two important statements. First, she noted that on October 13, the last of the planned appearances, she would work a miracle. As occurred at La Salette, she also imparted a secret message to the three children. When word of what had occurred circulated, representatives of the Freethought community began a campaign to discredit the children. In fact, the magistrate at Fatima, himself a Freethinker, imprisoned the children so they could not go to the place of the apparition on August 13. However, 18,000 people did go. They reported that at noon they saw a cloud form suddenly around the tree that remained briefly and then dissolved away. They interpreted what they saw as the Virgin having come as she promised. The children were released two days later and Mary appeared privately to them on August 19.

On September 13 some 30,000 people, including for the first time a group of priests, witnessed the apparition. Around noon, according to reports, the sky darkened, a globe of light appeared in the east and descended to the tree, and small white flakes, some described them as petals, began to fall, but dissolved before hitting the ground. After speaking to the children briefly, the Lady again said that she would perform a miracle on October 13 and departed. The people saw the globe of light depart to the east.

In spite of rain, a crowd numbered between 70,000 and 100,000 crowded the place of the apparitions on October 13. Included was the editor of Lisbon's leading Freethought newspaper. The skies were cloudy, but Mary appeared as promised to the children. She called for a chapel to be built on the spot in her honor. As she finished her message, the children saw a ray of light go from her in the direction of the sun. Lucia cried out to the people, "Look at the sun!" As they turned their heads, the clouds parted and a large brilliant silver disk appeared and began to twirl around, shooting out lights in different colors. The phenomenon of the dancing sun lasted for almost a half hour and was seen by people up to 30 miles away. Meanwhile, the children saw St. Joseph appear and Jesus arrive to bless the people.

The twirling disk came to a stop and then seemed to plunge toward Earth, bringing with it a great deal of heat. As it neared the crowd, it suddenly stopped and shot upward. The people who had been soaked by the rain earlier found that their clothes were suddenly dry. The next day newspapers all over the country carried reports of the event.

The apparitions at Fatima joined those at Lourdes as the most spectacular occurrences relative to the reported modern appearances of the Virgin Mary. The Catholics who witnessed it were transformed into devout practitioners of their faith and firm believers that the Virgin Mary had indeed appeared. Fatima has since become one of the most important shrines in Roman Catholicism. Pope Paul VI put his stamp of authority on it by mentioning it during Vatican II and with a papal visit and meeting with Lucia on the 50th anniversary of the apparitions in 1957. In 1982, Pope John Paul II also visited Fatima, and two years later in Rome again consecrated Russia to the Immaculate Heart. Pope John Paul's faith in the Fatima revelations appears to be partially tied to the assassination attempt that occurred on May 13, 1981 (the anniversary of the first apparition). Just as the gunman pulled the trigger, he bent over to bless someone carrying a picture of the Virgin. Had he not bent over, the bullets would have hit him squarely in the head.

Two of the children, Francisco and Jacinta, died shortly after the apparitions, in 1919 and 1920 respectively, the Lady having predicted that she would return not long after the apparitions and take them to heaven. In 1921 Lucia was sent to a school in Porto, Portugal, run by the Sisters of St. Dorothe, and she entered holy orders four years later. She devoted the next decade to promoting the devotion to the Immaculate Heart and then in 1934 retired to a Carmelite monastery, for the rest of her life. Once there, between 1935 and 1941, at the suggestion of ecclesiastical superiors, she wrote four manuscripts detailing what she could remember of her life.

The secrets of Fatima revealed to the children on July 13, 1917, became a topic of interest throughout the Roman Catholic world. All three parts of the secret were revealed as of 2000. The first was a vision of hell and the consequences if people did not cease their offensive acts. The second concerned the promotion of devotion to the Immaculate Heart. The third part of the secret was written down and placed in the hands of the Bishop of Leiria, Portugal. Rather than assume the responsibility of knowing the "secrets of heaven," the bishop decided to send it to the Vatican. In 2000, Pope John Paul II revealed the content of the third secret. The third secret dealt with an assassination attempt on "bishop in white" by an atheist system against the Catholic Church and Christians in the twentieth century. This was considered to be the assassination attempt of Pope John Paul II in 1981.

The miraculous occurrences at Fatima on October 13, 1917, have also been evaluated in light of the post-World War II UFO phenomenon, and many ufologists view it as a classic appearance of a UFO. They note that the "sun" that danced in the sky at Fatima bears a remarkable likeness to UFOs. The white substance that fell resembles what has come to be known as angel's hair, a phenomenon accompanying a number of UFO reports. Roman Catholic authors, more interested in the religious and miraculous aspects of Fatima, have as a whole refrained from even commenting on such speculations.

The church, after careful study, has given its approval of the devotion to Mary as related to the Fatima events, and devotion to Fatima has spread worldwide. A large church has been built close to the site of the apparitions to accommodate the many pilgrims. While a matter of devotion to Catholics, it remains an enigmatic occurrence to non-Catholics.

Also like Lourdes, a Hollywood movie was made of the Fatima story though it did not enjoy the popular critical acclaim of The Song of Bernadette. The Miracle of Fatima (1952) starred Susan Whitney and Gilbert Roland.

Sources:

[Abóbora], Sister Lucia. Fatima in Lucia's Own Words. Cambridge, Mass.: Ravengate Press, 1976.

Alonso, Joaquin Maria. The Secret of Fatima: Fact and Legend. Cambridge: Ravengate Press, 1979.

Fox, Robert J. Rediscovering Fatima. Huntington, Ind: Our Sunday Visitor, 1982.

McClure, Kevin. The Evidence for Visions of the Virgin Mary. Wellingborough, UK: Aquarian Press, 1983.

McGlynn, Thomas. Vision of Fatima. Boston: Little Brown and Co., 1948.

Fat of the Sorcerers

It was believed at one time that the devil made use of human fat for his sorceries. Witches rubbed themselves with an ointment made from this fat in order to go to the Sabbat, a gathering of members of their witchcraft group. Other ingredients of the witch unguent were said to be blood of the lapwing and bat, soot, aconite, and deadly nightshade. Francesco-Maria Guazzo, author of Compendium Maleficarum (1608) states that the witch unguent was made from a thick stew of boiled children, preferably unbaptized. This was a fantastic allegation made earlier by Sylvester Prierias, in 1521. It was claimed that this ointment gave witches the power of transvection, flying through the air.

Faust

A legendary occult magician of the sixteenth century, famous in literature. There is some evidence that such a person existed. Trithemius mentioned him in a letter written in 1507, in which he referred to him as a fool and a mountebank who pretended he could restore the writings of the ancients if they were wiped out of human memory, and blasphemed concerning the miracles of Christ. In 1513 Konrad Mudt, a canon of the German Church, also alluded to Faust in a letter as a charlatan.

In 1543 Johann Gast, a Protestant pastor of Basel, apparently knew Faust, and considered a horse and dog belonging to the magician to have been familiar spirits.

Johan Weyer, who opposed the excesses of witch-hunters, mentioned Faust in a work of his as a drunkard who had studied magic at Cracow. He also mentioned that in the end Satan strangled Faust after his house had been shaken by a terrific din.

From other evidence it seems likely that Faust was a wandering magician or necromancer whose picturesque character won him notoriety. No doubt the historic Faust was confused in legend with Johan Fust, the pioneer of early printing, whose multiplication of books must have been ascribed to magic. By the end of the century in which Faust flourished, he had become the model of the medieval magician, and his name was forever linked with those of Virgil, Roger Bacon, Pope Silvester II, and others.

The origins of the Faust legend are ancient. The essentials underlying the story are the pact with Satan, and the supposed vicious character of purely human learning. The idea of the pact with Satan belongs to both Jewish and Christian magico-religious belief, but is probably more truly Kabalistic. The belief can scarcely be traced further back, unless it resides in the idea that a sacrificed person takes the place of the deity to which he gives up his life.

The Faust tale soon spread over Europe and the story of Faust and his pact with the devil was celebrated in broadside ballads. The first dramatic representation of the story was Christopher Marlowe's Tragicall History of Dr. Faustus. The dramatist G. E. Lessing wrote a Faust play during the German literary revival of the eighteenth century, but it remained for Goethe to grant Faust some degree of immortality through the creation of one of the great psychological dramas of all time. Goethe differed from his predecessors in his treatment of the story in that he gave a different character to the pact between Faust and Mephistopheles, whose nature is totally at variance with the devils of the old Faust books. Goethe took the idea of Faust's final salvation from Lessing. It may be said that although in some respects Goethe adopted the letter of the old legend he did not adopt its spirit. Probably the story of Faust has given to thousands their only idea of medieval magic, and this idea has lost nothing in the hands of Goethe, who cast about the subject a much greater halo of mystery than it contained.

Sources:

Bates, Paul A., ed. Faust: Sources, Works, Criticism. New York: Harcourt, Brace, and World, 1968.

Grim, William E. The Faust Legend in Music and Literature. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1988.

Palmer, Philip M., and Robert P. More. Sources of the Faust Tradition from Simon Magus to Lessing. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1936. Reprint, New York: Haskell House, 1965.

Fawcett, Colonel Percy Harrison (1867–1925?)

British Army officer Percy Harrison Fawcett, who disappeared in the jungles of South America in 1925, set off a psychic search that lasted over a quarter of a century. Born in 1867, Fawcett had joined the army as a young man and rose among the ranks. He mastered cartography and after World War I (1914–18) decided to leave the army and focus his remaining years on some of his youthful passions. He had earlier carried out some of the pioneering surveys of the Amazon delta. He had a keen interest in Spiritualism and the occult, and inspired by the discovery of Machi Picchu in the Peruvian Andes, he had become fascinated with the idea of hidden civilizations in the vast Amazonian lands. Fawcett had discovered a mid-eighteenth-century manuscript whose author claimed to have found a vast city in the upper Amazon, and in 1920 he initially tried, unsuccessfully, to find it. He returned in 1925 for what was to be a two-year expedition. On May 29, 1925, he was at a camp he had used on the previous trip. His presence at the camp would be the last confirmed data on him. An expedition that attempted to find him in 1928 concluded that he had probably been killed by hostile natives.

His wife refused to give up on him. A psychic search for Fawcett began in 1930 when a medium in California claimed to be in contact with some Native Americans in New Mexico, who in turn claimed to be in contact with some Amazonians with whom Fawcett was residing. Mrs. Fawcett subsequently announced that she was in direct telepathic contact with her husband. In spite of a variety of reported sightings of him by various people in Brazil, he did not reappear and in 1932 his wife said that she had lost her telepathic contact. Not to be discouraged, Estelle Roberts, a prominent Spiritualist medium, claimed to have received several messages from Fawcett. A medium from New Zealand was the next to emerge. She claimed to have been in contact for the past two years, that Fawcett had found the lost city, but had unfortunately perished trying to get back to civilization.

Through the World War II years (1939–45), reports concerning Fawcett, none confirmed, continued. In 1951 the medium Nell Montague reported that she saw Fawcett being killed by natives after being questioned by Ralph Paget, a friend of the Fawcett family. Finally, in 1955, the notable medium Geraldine Cummins got into the act when she published her book, The Fate of Colonel Fawcett. The book is an interesting collection of metaphysical teachings from Fawcett, now believed to be in the spirit world, and an account of Fawcett's death. Fawcett's widow did not accept the book, and Cummins admitted it was not among her best productions.

Fawcett's ultimate fate is still unknown and is likely to remain so unless some identifiable remains are found by accident as the Amazon continues to be explored.

Sources:

Chambers, Paul. Paranormal People. London: Blandford, 1998. Cummins, Geraldine. The Fate of Colonel Fawcett. London: Aquarius Press, 1955.

Fay, Annie Eva (ca. 1855–1927)

Famous American medium who demonstrated on the theatrical stage, where she produced phenomena quite similar to that of the Davenport brothers. Born as Anna Eva Heathman in Southington, Ohio, she was driven from home by her stepmother. She gave her first exhibition in an old schoolhouse in Ohio. Her first husband, Henry Cummings Melville Fay, had been denounced as a fraud by Spiritualists, and his appearance on the stage with Annie Fay immediately threw doubt on the authenticity of Annie's performance, billed as "The Indescribable Phenomenon."

Her public performances in London in 1874 at the Crystal Palace aroused the interest of researcher Sir William Crookes, who was then finishing a series of tests on the mediumship of Florence Cook. The phenomena involved the movement of objects and playing of musical instruments in the dark. Annie Fay was tested by Crookes at his house in London in February 1875. Crookes had Fay hold two electrodes in an electrical circuit connected with a galvanometer in an adjoining room, which indicated any variation in the medium's grip. Under these circumstances, a heavy musical box was moved across the room, opened, wound up, started, and stopped again. A handbell was rung, and a hand holding it was thrust through a curtained doorway into the laboratory, where the bell dropped in full view. Crookes's locked bureau was opened, odd things were placed on it, and all the drawers were opened. Crookes was convinced that his electrical control was not broken. An account of the experiment was published in the Medium (March 12, 1875).

An exposure of the Fay stage séances was published in the New York Daily Graphic (April 12, 1876), based on material supplied by Washington Irving Bishop, who had been a member of the Fay troupe and was later dismissed. Bishop demonstrated the methods by which Fay worked her marvelous feats, which required some difficult but very natural physical exertions. Later both Fay and Bishop were satirized under the names "Evalina Gray" and "W. S. Bischoff" in the 1877 novel The Spiritualists and the Detectives by private detective Allan Pinkerton. The exposures did little to slow Fay, who continued to travel as a performer working on the border between stage magic and Spiritualism.

Annie Fay's son John Truesdale Fay (born in Ohio in 1877) traveled with his mother's show and was suspected of assisting with "manifestations" while hidden under Annie's dress. In 1881 Annie married David H. Pingree, who promoted her performances, which included a stage clairvoyant act called "Somnolency," now known to have been an ingenious trick.

Some confusion has been caused by the fact that Annie's son John married Anna Norman in 1898 and taught his wife the same stage clairvoyance act, which they performed together as "The Fays." Earlier, another American stage performer using the name "Annie Fay" had copied the "Indescribable Phenomenon" act.

In her later years, Annie Fay made money answering letters by mail, in addition to continuing her stage appearances. In 1913 she was honored by the famous conjurer's association The Magic Circle in London, which elected her first honorary lady associate. She continued to draw large crowds for her stage shows until an accident in 1924 in Milwaukee, after which she retired.

The great Houdini claimed that she told him how she had tricked Crookes during his experiments in London by holding a handle with one hand and gripping the other with the bare flesh under her knee, thus enabling her to produce raps and play musical instruments. Fay died May 20, 1927.

Sources:

Christoper, Milbourne. Mediums, Mystics and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.

Fay, Mrs. H. B. (ca. 1885)

American materialization medium of the nineteenth century, described by Florence Marryat in her book There is No Death (1891). According to Marryat, some 30 or 40 different forms materialized at a séance, ranging from babies and children to adults, male and female. These materializations included Marryat's late brother Frederick, drowned at sea. The figures came from the séance cabinet into the room.

E. A. Brackett of Boston records interesting séances with Fay in his book Materialized Apparitions (1886). He claims that as many as 40 to 60 forms of all ages appeared during a single séance, often changing into other forms in full view of the sitters. For two years, Brackett himself regularly witnessed the materialization of his wife's niece, who had died young. At one sitting, the Spiritualist Alfred Russel Wallace also recognized the niece.

Sources:

Marryat, Florence. There is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell Co., 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Fay, William M. (1839– ?)

Nineteenth-century medium who took part in stage demonstrations by the Davenport brothers, which were claimed to be caused by spirit agency. He was born in Darmstadt, Germany, and emigrated to the United States at age 11. Fay claimed that he initially experienced physical mediumship while residing with his widowed mother in Buffalo, New York, and that the phenomena led to his association with the Davenports. He took part in their performances, which involved rapid release from rope tying.

An exposure of Fay as fraudulent, published in the Toronto Globe during 1864, was later proved unfounded, since he was not in America at the time and had been confused with H. Melville Fay, husband of the claimed medium Annie Eva Fay.

Sources:

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

"Feda"

Gladys Osborne Leonard's control. "Feda" was said to have been married to an ancestor of the medium in India and to have died about 1800 at age 13.

Federation of Spiritual Churches and Associations

Federation of Spiritual Churches and Associations, a fellowship of otherwise autonomous Spiritualist congregations and mediums, was founded in 1944. The federation views itself as an expression of unity within Spiritualism and draws its member churches from among both independent Spiritualist congregations and those chartered by the various Spiritualist associations. It also has a number of individual mediums and lay Spiritualists as members. The federation attempts to motivate members to service and action based on Spiritualist principles, and does not offer ordination for ministers/mediums or charters for churches itself. The federation does recognize Spiritualist leaders whom may be designated missionaries at large.

The federation members affirm a belief in God as Wisdom, Love, Life, and Truth, the Oneness of life; the indwelling Christ Spirit as Unconditioned Love; and the ideal moral manifestation of Jesus. They also believe in the primacy of mental states that will become manifest in the lives of individuals. It is further believed that Nature is an expression of God and that life should be lived in accordance with Nature's laws, both physical and spiritual. The unique Spiritualist distinctives are also affirmed, namely the continuance of personal identity after death and the possibility of communication with the dead. They also believe in and practice healing and prophecy. Healing, prophecy, and communication are seen as valid applications of Nature's law.

Membership in the federation is open to all who accept its basic principles. It may be contacted c/o the FSCA Secretary, Rev. Karen Durski, 4258 S. 26th St., Milwaukee, WI 53221. It has an Internet site at http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/1885/. Through its member organizations, the federation offers a full range of programs across the United States.

Sources:

Federation of Spiritual Churches and Associations. http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/1885/. March 23, 2000.

Feedback

Term used in parapsychology to indicate information relating to a subject's performance that may be relayed by the experimenter or indicated by apparatus and can be immediate or (in a test series) delayed.

Feilding, (Francis) (Henry) Everard (1867–1936)

A barrister and pioneer psychical researcher, Feilding attended Oxford and received a degree in law. His interest in psychic phenomena was sparked by a visit to Lourdes in 1892 and deepened by the death of his sister three years later. The evidence for survival of death presented by his Catholic faith proved insufficient in the face of his personal loss.

Feilding became an early member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) in London and served as its secretary from 1903 to 1920. He investigated the phenomena of Florence Cook, the famous materialization medium also investigated by Sir William Crookes. Feilding also reported on the phenomena of the Italian medium Eusapia Palladino with whom he sat in Naples in 1908. His reports on the sittings with Palladino were among the most important of the various articles he contributed to both the Proceedings and the Journal of the SPR.

In 1919 Feilding married the Polish medium Stanislawa Tomczyk. He gradually withdrew as an active member of the SPR but followed with interest the investigations of Rudi and Willi Schneider and Mina Crandon (Margery). He died February 8, 1936.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Feilding, F. E. Sittings with Eusapia Palladino and Other Studies. New York: University Books, 1963.

Feilding, F. E., W. W. Baggally, and Hereward Carrington. "Report on a Series of Sittings with Eusapia Palladino." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 23, no. 59 (1909); 25, no. 62 (1911).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fellowship for Readers of the URANTIA Book

The Fellowship for Readers of The URANTIA Book was founded in 1955 as the URANTIA Brotherhood, an association of students of The URANTIA Book, a 2,097-page collection of material that had been received from numerous celestial beings through the process now known as channeling. The channel for The URANTIA Book has never been revealed by the leaders of the movement in spite of various speculations as to his/her identity. The founding of the brotherhood was occasioned by the initial publication of The URANTIA Book and the opening of the URANTIA Foundation (the organization that owns the copyrights and publishes The URANTIA Book), both of which also occurred in 1955.

For many years the brotherhood and the foundation shared space in the movement's Chicago headquarters. The brotherhood organized study groups and local societies across North America, and experienced a period of growth through the 1980s as the New Age Movement placed renewed emphasis on channeled material. However, in the late 1980s a variety of policy differences arose between the foundation and the brotherhood, and in 1989, the brotherhood moved to become an independent organization. The URANTIA Foundation withdrew from the brotherhood the right to use the name "URANTIA" and the associated trademarks. At that time the brotherhood officially changed its name to Fifth Epochal Fellowship. Seventeen of the 21 societies formerly associated with the brotherhood voted to remain affiliated with the new fellowship, which continued to publish its newsletter and hold its annual meeting as it previously had. It also published a copy of The URANTIA Book through its own Uversa Press. In the late 1990s, the fellowship assumed its present name.

The split between the foundation and the fellowship was bitter and the foundation moved against the fellowship in order to protect its copyrights and trademarks. At the same time, there were those in both organizations who sought to reconcile the differences. At a meeting in Chicago on October 3, 1997, the leaders of both groups reached an agreement putting aside a number of their differences and outlining future cooperative action. For the fellowship, the most substantive element of the agreement was the foundation's release of the fellowship and Uversa Press from legal problems due to their publication of The URANTIA Book. At the same time, the fellowship agreed not to sell its stock of copies, but to give them away to libraries, prisoners, or people otherwise unable to afford a copy. The initial agreement by no means solved all of the problems between the two organizations, but they formed a joint committee to address continuing concerns in the new millennium.

The fellowship may be contacted at 529 Wrightwood Ave., Chicago, IL 60614. It publishes two periodicals, The Study Group Herald and the Mighty Messenger. The current president is Janet Farrington Graham. It has some 1,200 members.

Sources:

The URANTIA Book. Chicago: Uversa Press, n.d.

Fellowship of Isis

An international, neopagan religious organization founded in 1976 by author and painter Olivia Robertson to revive worship and communion with the feminine principle of the deity in the form of the goddess Isis and to promote knowledge of the world's matriarchal religions.

The fellowship is organized on a democratic basis and there are no vows of secrecy (though member groups may have their own secrets). It professes religious toleration and members are free to maintain other religious allegiances. Communication between members is maintained through literature and correspondence and through local sister centers and groups, in addition to the main center in Ireland.

The quarterly magazine Isian News includes news, lists of members, temples, shrines, and centers, as well as articles on rites, festivals, and formation and hallowing of temples. Other publications include a festival calendar and books on rites and mysteries of the Goddess. The loosely organized fellowship has centers in 93 countries with membership numbered in the thousands. The Fellowship of Isis may be contacted at Clonegal Castle, Enniscorthy, Eire, Southern Ireland. Website: http://www.fellowshipofisis.com/.

Sources:

Durdin-Robertson. The Goddesses of Chaldea, Syria and Egypt. Enniscorthy, Eire: Cesara Publications, 1975.

Fellowship of Isis Homepage. http://www.fellowshipofisis.com/. March 8, 2000.

Robertson, Olivia. The Call of Isis. Enniscorthy, Eire: Cesara Publications, 1975.

———. The College of Isis Manual. Enniscorthy, Eire: Cesara Publications, n.d.

———. Handbook of the Fellowship of Isis. Enniscorthy, Eire: Cesara Publications, n.d.

Robertson, Olivia, and Lord Strathloch. The Fellowship of Isis Directory for 1980. Enniscorthy, Eire: Cesara Publications, 1979.

Fellowship of Ma-Ion

Secret magic order founded by "Frater Achad" (Charles Stansfeld Jones), a close associate and magical child of magician Aleister Crowley. The order was based on interpretations of the Kabalistic Tree of Life and The Book of the Law, the thelemic magic text channeled by Crowley. The Book of the Law announces the new aeon of Horus, the Egyptian deity referred to by Crowley as "the Crowned and Conquering Child." Jones announced the coming of the Ma-Ion or Aeon of Maat, the Egyptian goddess of truth and justice. The Ma-Ion was to succeed the Aeon of Horus, an idea that proved unacceptable to most thelemic magicians. The fellowship as such no longer exists, but its impetus has been carried on by contemporary Maatian magic groups such as the Ordo Adeptorum Invisiblum.

Sources:

Achad, Frater. Anatomy of the Body of God. Chicago: Collegium ad Spiritum Sanctum, 1925.

———. Liber 31. San Francisco: Level Press, 1974.

———. XXXI Hymns to the Star Goddess. Chicago: Will Ransom, 1923. Reprint, Kenilworth, Ill.: Ordo Adeptorum Invisiblum, 1983.

Skia, Persona. O.A.I. Manifesto: Origin, History, Organization. Kenilworth, Ill.: Ordo Adeptorum Invisiblum, 1982.

Fellowship of the Inner Light

The Fellowship of the Inner Light is a channeling group founded in 1972 in Atlanta, Georgia, by the followers of Paul Solomon, a trance channel believed by his followers to be like Edgar Cayce. Solomon first began to channel from what was termed the "Source" in February 1972. Further sessions produced a variety of information for the treatment of diseases, accurate prophecies, and a complete system for the development of "Inner Light Consciousness." The fellowship was organized to disseminate the teachings concerning the Inner Light Consciousness and to provide a vehicle for Solomon's continued work.

In 1974 headquarters were shifted to Virginia Beach, Virginia, where Cayce had lived the last years of his life and where the Association for Research and Enlightenment continued the study of the Cayce transcripts. Here the fellowship became associated with the Heritage Store and Heritage Publications. Heritage Store was formed in 1969 to make the remedies suggested by the Cayce readings available to the general public. The store began to make Solomon's material available to its customers both in the immediate area and around the country. Through the 1980s, the fellowship also operated Carmel-in-the-Valley, a 13-acre retreat center near New market, Virginia, though in recent years all of the fellowship activities have been centered in Virginia Beach.

Solomon's channeled material parallels that of Cayce at many points. The source of his information is believed to be the Universal Mind and the Akashic records. All of human thought is believed to be recorded on the Akashic records, or the universal ethers, and hence remains available for someone like Solomon to draw on. The fellowship discourages contact with the spirits of the dead.

According to Solomon's teachings, humans are children of God trapped in material bodies, first manifest on ancient Atlantis. By spiritual growth and bodily cleansing, the trapped soul can stop the cycle of reincarnations and become one with God. Reincarnations allow time for the growth of the soul.

Current address unavailable.

Sources:

A Healing Consciousness. Virginia Beach, Va.: Master's Press, 1978.

Spiritual Unfoldment and Psychic Development through Inner Light Consciousness. Atlanta: Fellowship of the Inner Light, n.d.

Fellowship of Universal Guidance

The Fellowship of Universal Guidance, a metaphysical group that operated in the greater Los Angeles area, was among the early groups to align itself with the New Age movement. The fellowship was founded by Wayne A. Guthrie and Bella Karish in 1960. Both channelled entities who were viewed as great sources of light. After operating in Los Angeles for several decades, the fellowship moved to suburban Glendale. Among the people associated with the fellowship in the 1960s was David Spangler. As a young student, Spangler learned to channel under the guidance of the fellowship and was still associated with them when the entity "John" began to speak through him. Spangler carried an understanding of the New Age developed in relationship to Guthrie and Karish with him to Findhorn in 1970. He stayed at Findhorn for several years and eventually became one of the major spokespeople for the New Age movement in the United States.

No contact has been made with the fellowship in recent years and it is assumed that it has disbanded.

Sources:

Wisdom Workshop Lessons. 12 vols. Los Angeles: Fellowship of Universal Guidance, n.d.

Fendeurs

A supposed French Rosicrucian society that flourished in the mid-seventeenth century. It appears to have been formed in the twelfth century as a league to combat severe forest laws in France. The fendeurs were hewers, and their organization was similar to that of the Italian Carbonari or charcoal burners.

Feng-shui

The Taoist art and science of creating balanced and harmonious surroundings, sometimes associated with geomancy, has been practiced for centuries in China. Feng-shui has been used by the Chinese to build homes and business offices, design cities and villages, and construct tombs for the dead. In recent years Westerners have begun to study and practice feng-shui.

Practitioners of feng-shui claim that the layout and arrangement of a home greatly influences the lives of all its occupants. The alignment of furniture, color schemes, and accessories all play a part in creating an environment that both relaxes and invigorates those who live there. Simply moving a few objects or repainting a room can have a significant impact. On the other hand, misfortunes such as poor health, financial problems, marital or relationship troubles, and infertility can be attributed to a house in which feng-shui principles have been ignored.

Feng-shui is also concerned with the location of a building because its position in an area may be adversely affected by the surroundings unless appropriate countermeasures are taken to deflect negative energy.

Brief History

The Chinese developed feng-shui principles about four thousand years ago. The ancient Chinese recognized how the elements, particularly wind (feng) and water (shui), impacted life: gently flowing winds meant good harvests, stagnant water led to disease; buildings facing the north bore the brunt of dust storms that blew from Mongolia, while southern facing homes maximized the warmth of the sun. Likewise they realized how living harmoniously with surroundings made life easier: villages built among the hills were both protected from the elements and easier to defend from attackers. Legends says that the actual practice of feng-shui began with the shaman-kings who led the early Chinese tribes and understood the powers of wind and water, the changes in earth and sky, and the cycle of the seasons.

Over the centuries and throughout successive dynasties feng-shui organized and eventually was recognized as a professional skill during the Han dynasty (207 B.C.–220 B.C.E.). It was known then as K'an-yu. During the prosperous T'ang dynasty (618–907 B.C.E.) the Taoist arts flourished and K'an-yu, which involved understanding the earth's energy, expanded to encompass the sciences of architecture, astronomy, geography, numerology, and surveying. Various schools of thought in K'an-yu also developed during this dynasty.

After Kublai Khan invaded the central plains of China and established the Yuan dynasty (1279–1368 B.C.E.), Taoists were restricted from openly practicing their sciences and K'an-yu suffered a decline. The practice underwent a resurgence during the Ming dynasty (1368–1644 B.C.E.). The feng-shui that is practiced today is most similar to that practiced during the Ch'ing dynasty (1644–1912 B.C.E.).

Chi

Chi is the key component of feng-shui. It is roughly translated as the invisible energy that circulates through the earth and sky. Chi travels best when it imitates nature by flowing in gentle curves, rather than along straight lines, where it can move too quickly, or against sharp edges, where it can be blocked, and cause sha, or bad chi.

The Eight Directions

The eight directions of the compass (north, east, south, west, northeast, northwest, southeast, southwest) and the center, known together as the Nine Palaces, are basic components of feng-shui. Each direction is associated with a different kind of chi energy. Knowing the characteristics of these directions and their spheres of influence allows the creation of good feng-shui. It also used in making adjustments needed to correct bad feng-shui.

The Five Elements

Each of the eight directions and the center is linked to at least one of what is known as the Five Elements: water, wood, fire, earth, and metal. The Chinese are able to group all things into one of these five categories. Contact with the elements is a major part of feng-shui and the interactive nature of these elements is used in enhancing positive energies and reducing negative energies.

Each of the Five Elements is related to the other in a cycle of creation and destruction. When the elements are used to enhance one another, they follow the creation cycle. For instance in the creative cycle, metal in the earth nourishes water in the ground. Water sustains vegetation that creates wood. Wood feeds fire. Fire produces ashes, forming the earth. The cycle is completed when the earth forms ore, which becomes metal. Conversely, in the destructive cycle, fire melts metal; metal cuts wood; tree roots, or wood, choke the earth; earth muddies water; water extinguishes fire.

In practicing feng-shui, one of the most effective ways to create positive energy or remedy bad energy is to make good use of the five elements. Feng-shui is easily adjusted by mixing, separating and arranging the five elements at suitable compass points within the home. The elements interact in either a creative or destructive cycle and their presentation affects the balance of the environment.

Color and Numbers

Color is yet another important aspect of balance in feng-shui. Color has an effect on the look and feel of a room, but colors also have associations linked to them. For example, to the Chinese red is a lucky color, associated with life, happiness, and warmth. Green and blue are associated with new beginnings, growth and family life.

Numbers also have meaning and some are more favorable than others. Nine is considered the luckiest, partially due to apparent mystical qualities: when 9 is multiplied by an single-digit number, the sum of the two digits of the product is 9. The number 4 is considered bad-luck because its Chinese pronunciation, "si," sounds similar to the word for death. As with the elements, color and numbers are also associated with the eight compass points.

Sources:

Eitel, E. J. Feng-shui: The Rudiments of Natural Science in China. Bristol, England: Pentacle Books, 1979.

Lagatree, Kirsten M. Feng-shui: Arranging Your Home to Change Your Life. New York: Villard Books, 1996.

Rossbach, Sarah. Feng-shui: The Chinese Art of Placement. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1983.

Skinner, Stephen. The Living Earth Manual of Feng-shui: Chinese Geomancy. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1982.

Too, Lillian. Essential Feng-shui: A Step-by-Step Guide to Enhancing Your Relationships, Health, and Prosperity. Ballantine Books, Inc., 1999.

Wong, Eva. Feng-Shui: The Ancient Wisdom of Harmonious Living for Modern Times. Boston: Shambhala Publications, Inc. 1996.

Fennel

A common herb (Foeniculum vulgare) credited in folklore with mysterious and vivifying properties. According to Pliny, serpents eat fennel to shed the skin and thus renew youth and vision. In humans it has been said to improve the eyesight, increase the milk of nursing mothers, and reduce corpulence. In ancient times fennel leaves were used to crown victors in games, and fennel was also used in the rites of Adonis.

Feola, Jose M(aria) (1926–)

Argentine radiobiologist and parapsychologist. Feola was born May 30, 1926, in Buenos Aires and served in Argentine army research in the 1940s, earning the rank of lieutenant. Feola was a radiobiological researcher at the Argentine Atomic Energy Commission in Buenos Aires (1956–64) before moving to the United States in 1965 as a researcher at Donner Laboratory, University of California, Berkeley (1965–69). He was awarded a fellowship from the National Academy of Sciences and International Atomic Energy Agency for 1959–61.

He subsequently became an instructor in radiobiology at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis (1970–73), and an instructor in parapsychology at the University of Minnesota extension division (1972–75), before accepting a position as an assistant professor of clinical medicine at the University of Kentucky in 1975. Feola became a naturalized citizen in 1974.

His interest in parapsychology developed early in his professional career. Before his move to the United States he served as director of the Argentine Institute for Parapsychology (1957–64). He subsequently joined the American Society for Psychical Research, the Parapsychological Association, the California Society for Psychical Studies (president, 1968–70), and the Minnesota Society for Parapsychological Research (president, 1971–73).

His writings include PK, Mind Over Matter (1975), the column "Parapsychology Today" in Gnostica, beginning in 1974, and various articles in scientific journals and in Psychic magazine.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Feraferia

An early neopagan group that pioneered the development of goddess worship in southern California. It was founded by Frederick M. Adams in 1967. Adams, who had studied Greek and Celtic folklore, as well as the works of C. G. Jung, had a mystical experience in 1956 when he was suddenly seized by a realization of "the sacred feminine principle." In 1957 he devoted himself to establishing a "nature celebration" group known as the Fellowship of Hesperides. He also met and was deeply influenced by the poet Robert Graves and Graves's book The White Goddess. In 1959 Adams started a multifamily commune in the Sierra Madre, with seasonal festivals at a goddess temple. The temple and commune became the predecessors of Feraferia, an organization which can be contacted at 12318 Shady Ln., Nevada City, CA 95959. Website: http://finewest.com/feraferia/.

Sources:

Feraferia. http://finewest.com/feraferia/. March 14, 2000.

Ferguson, Rev. Jesse Babcock (d. 1870)

Noted American minister in the antebellum South whose early studies of animal magnetism beginning in 1842 led him to Spiritualism. He initially experimented by hypnotizing his wife. In 1853 he had his first experience with a rapping medium in Ohio, and soon afterward both his wife and daughter developed psychic powers, wrote and spoke automatically, and saw visions. Ferguson recounted these events in his book Spirit Communion: A Record of Communications from the Spirit Spheres (1854). They later became the subject of a second volume, Supramundane Facts in the Life of the Rev. J. B. Ferguson, by T. L. Nichols (1865).

In 1864 he traveled to England as part of the entourage of the Davenport brothers. The tone of the press toward him was courteous and respectful. He even accompanied the Davenports to France, but because he could not speak French he soon returned to London. Robert Cooper describes him in his Spiritual Experiences (1867) as "a giant in intellect, a child in simplicity and an angel in goodness and one of Nature's noblemen."

Sources:

Ferguson, Jesse Babcock. Spirit Communion: A Record of Communications from the Spirit Spheres. Nashville, 1854.

Nichols, T. L. Supramundane Facts in the Life of the Rev. J. B. Ferguson. London, 1865.

Ferguson, Marilyn (1938–)

New Age publisher, editor, and author. Ferguson was born April 5, 1938, in Grand Junction, Colorado, and is known for her best-selling book The Aquarian Conspiracy: Personal and So- cial Transformation in the 1980s (1980), touted as "the New Age watershed classic." In 1973 she wrote The Brain Revolution, and her study for the book led her to found a newsletter, the Brain/Mind Bulletin in 1975. Her interest in human potential expanded through the rest of the decade and into the New Age movement. She came to believe that society was undergoing a profound paradigm shift, a change in the basic metaphor used to explain life. She documented the rationale for her new belief in The Aquarian Conspiracy (1980), in which she uses a conspiracy metaphor to postulate a consciousness revolution as distinct from a political, economic, or religious revolution. Through this quiet revolution an informal network of enlightened individuals is creating radical change in modern culture, based on a greatly enlarged concept of human potential.

Sources:

Ferguson, Marilyn. The Aquarian Conspiracy: Personal and Social Transformation in the 1980s. Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1980.

———. The Frontiers of Mind Research. New York: Taplinger, 1973.

Ferguson, Marilyn, and Michael Ferguson. Champagne Living on a Beer Budget. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1968.

Taylor, Peggy. "Life at the Leading Edge: A New Age Interview with Marilyn Ferguson." New Age 8, no. 1 (August 1982): 30–35, 52–53.

Fern

Many occult beliefs have adhered to the common fern. In ancient times the fern was thought not to have seed. Later on, people thought that the seed was invisible, and if a man could find this invisible seed, it would confer the power of invisibility upon him. The fern was also believed to flower at midnight on St. John's Eve, one of the more magical days of the year in medieval Europe. Legend said that anyone who gained possession of the flower would be protected from all evil influences and would obtain a revelation of hidden treasure.

Fernández, José S(alvador) (1893–1967)

A civil engineer and for many years the president of Colegio Argentino de Estudios Psiquicos (Argentine College of Psychic Studies). Fernández was born February 16, 1893, in Buenos Aires and studied at Buenos Aires University. His wife was a clairvoyant, and through the 1930s Fernández championed the cause of both Spiritualism and parapsychology in Argentina. He was the first Argentinian to adopt the quantitative methodology as advocated by J. B. Rhine, and made early statistical studies of clairvoyance and precognition. He also founded the ATMAN Spiritualist Circle in 1933 and attended meetings of the Psyke Circle to sit with mediums and clairvoyants. He helped revive psychical studies after World War II and served successively as the president of the Sociedad Argentina de Parapsicologia (1948–53), the Instituto Argentino de Parapsicologia (1953–55), and the Argentino de Estudios Psiquicos (1957–67).

Fernández was a member of the Sociedad Constancia and was assistant editor of the psychic journal Constancia. He contributed many articles on parapsychology to journals in Argentina, Brazil, Portugal, Mexico, and Great Britain. He died March 14, 1967.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Fernández, José S. Application of the Statistical Method to the Study of Cryptesthetic Phenomena. N.p., 1942.

———. Clairvoyance and Probability. N.p., 1941.

———. Experimental Parapsychology. N.p., 1953.

———. A Mathematical Preface to the Study of ESP. N.p., 1949.

———. Parapsychology and the Existence of the Soul. N.p., 1959.

———. Philosophical and Scientific Bases for Survival and Reincarnation. N.p., 1957.

———. The Photoelectric Cell and Perception of the Spiritual World. N.p., 1932.

Ferrarius (or Efferariaus or Eufarius) (ca. 1200)

Italian alchemist, believed to have been an abbot or monk of Ferrara. His works on alchemy include De Lapide Philosophorum (The Philosophers' Stone) and Thesaurus Philosophiae, which is included in the collection Theatrum Chemicum (1659).

Fetch

According to Irish and British belief, the spirit double or apparition of a living person, also known as the wraith. It resembles in every particular the individual whose death it is supposed to foretell, but is generally of a shadowy or ghostly appearance. The fetch may be seen by more than one person at the same time and, like the wraith of England and Scotland, may even appear to the person it represents. There is a belief, too, that if the fetch is seen in the morning, it indicates long life for the person, but if seen at night, a speedy death may be expected.

The fetch enters largely into the folktales of Ireland, and it is hardly surprising that so many tales have been woven around it, for there is something gruesome in the idea of being haunted by one's own double (an idea that has frequently been explored by more sophisticated writers than the inventors of folk tales).

Patrick Kennedy, in his Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celt (1866), referring to the Irish fetch, quotes the tale of The Doctor's Fetch, based on authentic sources:

"In one of our Irish cities, and in a room where the mild moonbeams were resting on the carpet and on a table near the window, Mrs. B., wife of a doctor in good practice and general esteem, looking towards the window from her pillow, was startled by the appearance of her husband standing near the table just mentioned, and seeming to look with attention on the book which was lying open on it. Now, the living and breathing man was by her side apparently asleep, and, greatly as she was surprised and affected, she had sufficient command of herself to remain without moving, lest she should expose him to the terror which she herself at the moment experienced. After gazing on the apparition for a few seconds, she bent her eyes upon her husband to ascertain if his looks were turned in the direction of the window, but his eyes were closed. She turned round again, although now dreading the sight of what she believed to be her husband's fetch, but it was no longer there. She remained sleepless throughout the remainder of the night, but still bravely refrained from disturbing her partner.

"Next morning, Mr. B., seeing signs of disquiet on his wife's countenance while at breakfast, made some affectionate inquiries, but she concealed her trouble, and at his ordinary hour he sallied forth to make his calls. Meeting Dr. C., in the street, and falling into conversation with him, he asked his opinion on the subject of fetches. 'I think,' was the answer, 'and so I am sure do you, that they are mere illusions produced by a disturbed stomach acting upon the excited brain of a highly imaginative or superstitious person.' 'Then,' said Mr. B., 'I am highly imaginative or superstitious, for I distinctly saw my own outward man last night standing at the table in the bedroom, and clearly distinguishable in the moonlight. I am afraid my wife saw it too, but I have been afraid to speak to her on the subject.'

"About the same hour on the ensuing night the poor lady was again roused, but by a more painful circumstance. She felt her husband moving convulsively, and immediately afterwards he cried to her in low, interrupted accents, 'Ellen, my dear, I am suffocating; send for Dr. C.' She sprang up, huddled on some clothes, and ran to his house. He came with all speed, but his efforts for his friend were useless. He had burst a large blood-vessel in the lungs, and was soon beyond human aid. In her lamentations the bereaved wife frequently cried out, 'Oh! the fetch, the fetch!' and at a later period told the doctor of the appearance the night before her husband's death."

Sources:

Kennedy, Patrick. Legendary Fictions of the Irish Celt. 1866. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1968.

Fetishism

A term formerly used to discuss various aspects of African religions, especially the use of objects believed to be inhabited by spirit beings. It was a term that grew out of an inadequate understanding of traditional African religious faith and was abandoned in the late twentieth century.

Sources:

Durkheim, Emile. The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life. New York: Collier, 1961.

Fey

A term with various meanings: cowardly, doomed, or gifted with second sight. The most common definition is possessing second sight, in which sense the term is more widely used in Scotland. The word seems to mean "fated" (i.e., possessing some special occult destiny), which indicates either the doom of early death or the faculty of second sight.

Fiction, English Occult

The literary form of English-language occult fiction emerged from the folklore of supernatural beings and heroic events and was made possible by the secular understanding of the ancient mythology of gods, devils, and heroes. During the Elizabethan Age, penny balladsheets and prose chapbooks told of sorcerers, ghosts, monsters, and warning signs in the heavens against the sins of the day. A favorite story was that of the sorcerer Dr. Faustus and his pact with the devil. The great witchcraft persecutions from the Middle Ages on provided archetypal themes of terror, wonder, and the eternal play of good and evil.

Themes of magic and enchantment from earlier Arthurian legends were developed in Malory's Morte d'Arthur. There were also magic elements in some of Chaucer's stories: "The Franklin's Tale," "The Squire's Tale," and "The Wife of Bath's Tale." Dragons and enchantment occur in Spenser's Faerie Queene. Supernatural elements were common in drama from Elizabethan times on, as amply illustrated by the ghost in Hamlet, the witches in Macbeth, and Marlowe's Tragicall History of Dr. Faustus.

Early collections of ghost stories include Ludwig Lavater's De Spectris (1570), translated in 1572 as Of Ghostes and Spirites Walking by Nyght and of Strange Noyses, Crackes, and Sundry Forewarnynges and Thomas Nashe's The Terrors of the Night, or, a Discourse of Apparitions (1594). An influential work was Joseph Glanvil's Saducismus Triumphatus, or, Full and Plain Evidence Concerning Witches and Apparitions (1681), which includes the famous poltergeist story of the Drummer of Tedworth.

It was in the eighteenth century that occult fiction came into its own in the creation of the Gothic novel genre. Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto, first published in 1764, was subtitled "A Gothic Story." Walpole was obsessed with the Gothic. In 1747 he leased the Strawberry Hill estate near Twickenham, where he spent a decade building what he called "a little Gothic castle." He lived in a dream world of revival Gothic architecture and mock medievalism. Other country gentlemen followed Walpole in remodeling their estates with mock castles, follies, and grottoes. Some even employed old men to live as hermits in artificially constructed caverns—a kind of Gothic Disneyland.

Walpole's novel launched a thousand imitations and variations. After Otranto came Clara Reeve's The Old English Baron: A Gothic Story in 1778, Ann Radcliffe's The Mysteries of Udolpho (1794), and Matthew Gregory Lewis's successful sensation The Monk (1794). Such "horrid mysteries" became the mainstay of the rapidly developing circulating libraries that were replacing the old-time ballad and chapbook peddlers in every large town and city in England.

Stock ingredients of the Gothic novel were such plot elements as pure young virgins and chivalrous heroes embroiled with scoundrels of Continental origin (usually Italians), base monks, cruel Inquisitors, and ruthless bandits. They struggled in a fantasy medieval world of gloomy castles, ruined abbeys, dismal dungeons, bloodstained daggers, skulls, sliding panels, secret rooms, magic books, and animated portraits, all in a twilight setting of dark forests, pale moonlight, and nameless terrors lurking behind rocks. Walpole wrote Otranto as a reaction against realism in literature. He initiated a literary form of fantasy fiction, combining mystery, romance, supernaturalism, and sentimentality in a setting of mock medievalism.

The success of the Gothic novel among the upper and middle classes in England soon led to their merchandising at a more popular level, in abridged and pirated versions in cheap paper-covered pamphlets. These forerunners of today's paperback books sold at sixpence or a shilling each and were known as "bluebooks" (from the blue paper covers) or "shilling shockers."

Shilling shockers went out of fashion around the opening of the nineteenth century, largely through sheer exhaustion of their stereotyped characters and plots. Meanwhile the Gothic impulse had also passed into serious literature in the romantic movement, which in Britain included poets like Shelley, Byron, Wordsworth, and Coleridge and novelists like Sir Walter Scott. For example, in Scott's The Monastery, a mysterious sylph rises from a fountain; astrology is introduced into Guy Mannering, The Fortunes of Nigel and Quentin Durward; a ghost story is told in Redgauntlet; and ghosts figure in Woodstock. In The Bride of Lammermoor, Scott deals with the Scottish belief in prophecy, and in Waverley a Highland chief is awestruck by a peculiar omen.

Perhaps the most influential expression of the Gothic impulse in English literature was formed at that strange opium-soaked literary house party of Shelley, Byron, Mary Wollstonecraft (later Shelley's wife), Claire Clairmont (Mary's stepsister), and J. W. Polidori, at the Villa Diodati, Geneva, in the summer of 1816. Byron had been reading a book of ghost stories by Jean Baptiste Eyriès titled Fantasmagoriana (1812) and proposed, "We will each write a ghost story." Byron himself drafted a fragment that Polidori later expanded into The Vampyre; Polidori produced a trifle about a skull-headed lady who was punished for peeping through a keyhole, but Wollstonecraft began her masterpiece published in 1818 as Frankenstein or the Modern Prometheus. Frankenstein relied less upon Gothic ruins than emotions of wonder and terror generated by the mysterious powers of nature and science, and so led the Gothic novel into a science-fiction genre. Meanwhile folklore themes of monsters and vampires became new stereotypes of the Gothic impulse. In the twentieth century these gave birth to hundreds of horror stories and sensationalist movies.

Another offshoot of the Gothic imagination during the nineteenth century was the mystery novel of such writers as Wilkie Collins. In The Woman in White (1860) and The Moonstone (1868), a Gothic architectural setting was metamorphosed into a Gothic atmosphere of strange hidden mysteries, motives, crime, and sensational suspense. Out of this was born the romance of large country mansions, culminating at the end of the nineteenth century in such Gothic novels as Daphne du Maurier's Rebecca. The country house detective thriller of writers like Agatha Christie also has roots in the Gothic story as developed by writers like Wilkie Collins and Edgar Allan Poe.

In "The Fall of the House of Usher," "The Pit and the Pendulum," and "Premature Burial," all published in the 1840s, Poe reverted to a classic Gothic format expressed in the short story rather than the full-length novel.

Three Irish writers made a notable contribution to the Gothic novel with supernatural elements: Charles Robert Maturin (1782–1824), Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu (1814–1873), and Bram Stoker (1847–1912). In Maturin's novel Melmoth the Wanderer (1820) there is strong emphasis on episodes of terror, but the complex plot structure hinges upon the classic theme of a pact with the devil. Le Fanu wrote several short stories on supernatural themes, "Green Tea" being one of the most outstanding, but his Gothic masterpiece was undoubtedly the longer story "Carmilla," in which he developed the vampire theme. It is a story of a female vampire, with a strong suggestion of lesbian love, set in a dreamlike landscape in an old castle in Styria, a region in Austria. "Carmilla," first published in 1871, was read by another Irishman, Bram Stoker, when he was a young part-time drama critic in Dublin. It was to stay in his mind for 25 years before he wove the vampire theme into his own masterpiece, Dracula, first published 1897. Stoker's novel has since had a lasting influence on stories, plays, and movies all over the world.

Other nineteenth-century British writers of notable occult fiction include James Hogg (1770–1835), Frederick Marryat (1792–1848), Bulwer Lytton (1803–1873), Charles Dickens (1812–1870), William Morris (1836–1896), and Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–1894). Hogg, known as "the Ettrick Shepherd," was a peasant poet and protégé of Sir Walter Scott. Hogg's The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner (1824) is a strange and powerful story of diabolical split personality. Frederick Marryat's Snarleyyow, or the Dog Fiend (1836) contains an episode dealing with a werewolf, often reprinted as a self-contained story; The Phantom Ship (1839) is based on the Flying Dutchman legend.

Lytton published some classic supernatural stories, including the thrilling "The Haunted and the Haunters" (1859), originally titled "The House and the Brain." His book Zanoni (1842) is concerned with a secret occult society; The Coming Race (1871) portrays an underground race.

Dickens wrote a number of short stories on supernatural themes, such as "A Child's Dream of a Star" (1850), "The Haunted House" (1849), "No. 1 Branch Line: The Signalman" (1866), Nurse's Stories (1860), and of course the immortal "A Christmas Carol" (1843).

Morris, a founder of the pre-Raphaelite art movement, translated Scandinavian sagas and also published such fantasy stories as "The Wood Beyond the World" (1894), "The Well at the World's End" (1896), and "The Water of the Wondrous Isles" (1897).

Stevenson, a brilliant stylist, published some excellent stories of the supernatural, including the renowned "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" (1888). Less well known but equally brilliant are his short stories "Thrawn Janet," "Will o' the Mill," and "Markheim." In the latter story, Stevenson touches a deeper metaphysical note.

The popular novelist H. Rider Haggard (1856–1925) was celebrated for his great adventure stories like King Solomon's Mines, but there are themes of fantasy and reincarnation in his stories She (1886) and Ayesha (1905).

Another great nineteenth-century writer was the playwright Oscar Wilde (1854–1900), who also wrote a whimsical ghost story, The Canterville Ghost (1887), and the terrifying Gothic story The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890).

The ghost short story flourished during the nineteenth century, encouraged by numerous magazines and Christmas supplements. The journal All the Year Round, founded by Dickens, published a number of stories of the supernatural.

At a more popular level, writers like G. W. M. Reynolds (with Wagner, the Wehr-Wolf and The Necromancer) and Thomas Preskett Prest (with Varney the Vampire, or The Feast of Blood) had replaced the old sentimental Gothic romances with extravagantly written full-length shockers.

Other writers of the period included Mrs. J. H. Riddell (with Weird Stories, 1884, and The Banshee's Warning, 1894), and Margaret Oliphant (A Beleagered City, 1880, and Stories of the Seen and Unseen, 1889). On a lighter note, F. Anstey (1856–1934) created his own characteristic genre of humorous fantasy with Vice-Versa (1882), The Tinted Venus (1885), and The Brass Bottle (1900). Another innovative writer was E. Nesbit (1858–1924) with her fairy-tale fantasies for children: The Phoenix and the Carpet (1904) and The Enchanted Castle (1908). She also published three adult fantasy collections: Something Wrong (1893), Grim Tales (1893), and Fear (1910).

American Gothic

American writers who made important contributions to the English language supernatural story include Washington Irving (1783–1859), F. Marion Crawford (1854–1909), Ambrose Bierce (1842–ca. 1914), Henry James (1843–1916), and Lafcadio Hearn (1850–1904).

Irving was persuaded by his friend Sir Walter Scott to publish The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. (1819–20), which included "Rip Van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow." Other favorite Irving tales include "The Spectre Bridegroom" (1819) and "The Devil and Tom Walker" (1824).

Crawford was justly celebrated for his uncanny and horrific short stories such as "The Upper Berth," "For the Blood Is the Life," and "The Screaming Skull" from the late nineteenth century, collected posthumously in Wandering Ghosts (1911). His first novel, Mr. Isaacs (1882), was based upon a real-life wonder worker in India; The Witch of Prague (1891) was concerned with the misuse of hypnotism.

Bierce was famous for his psychological explorations in short story format: "The Death of Halpin Frayser," "The Realm of the Unreal," and "The Middle Toe of the Right Foot." His collections include Can Such Things Be? (1893) and In the Midst of Life (1898).

The great novelist Henry James wrote a classic ghost story in The Turn of the Screw (1898). A posthumously published collection is The Ghostly Tales of Henry James (1948).

Hearn published several strange and macabre stories, many of which were collected in Fantastics (1914).

Into the Twentieth Century

Writers who bridged the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries included Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (1859–1930), Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936), H. G. Wells (1866–1946), and May Sinclair (1865?–1946).

Many of Conan Doyle's earliest short stories had supernatural themes before he turned his attention to the deductive logic of the great Sherlock Holmes. But after World War I, Conan Doyle became a champion of Spiritualism and his novel The Land of Mist (1925) fictionalizes an investigation into the subject. An early novel The Parasite (1894), deals with a psychic vampire. Some of Doyle's short stories on occult themes were collected in Tales of Twilight and the Unseen and included in The Conan Doyle Stories (1929).

Kipling wrote several impressive short stories of the eerie and supernatural, including "The Mark of the Beast" (1890), "The House Surgeon" (1909), "The Brushwood Boy" (1898), and "They" (1904). These are contained in his various collections.

Wells was a prolific writer of short stories, many of which were on occult and fantasy themes, including "The Red Room," "A Moth," "The Apple," "Under the Knife," "Skelmersdale in Fairyland," "The Door in the Wall," and "A Dream of Armageddon." These are contained in such collections as The Stolen Bacillus (1895), The Red Room (1896), The Plattner Story and Others (1897), and Thirty Strange Stories (1897). Six early collections were reissued in one volume as Famous Short Stories of H. G. Wells in 1938.

Sinclair began writing novels in 1895 and later became interested in Spiritualism. A collection of her short stories on occult themes, Uncanny Stories (1923), contains "Where Their Fire is Not Quenched," a brilliant evocation of the afterlife.

Among minor writers of occult fiction from the nineteenth to twentieth centuries, Richard Middleton (1882–1911) was responsible for the humorous story "The Ghost Ship" (1912) and the more serious "On the Brighton Road" in the same volume. W. W. Jacobs (1863–1943), famous for his humorous "Night Watchman" stories, also wrote the classic story "The Monkey's Paw," which was dramatized. M. P. Shiel (1865–1947) wrote horror and fantasy tales, including Prince Zaleski (1895), Shapes in the Fire (1896), and the posthumously published collections Best Short Stories of M. P. Shiel (1948) and Xelucha and Others (1975).

Twentieth-Century Fiction

Important writers of occult stories during the twentieth century include M. R. James (1862–1936), Arthur Machen (1863–1947), E. F. Benson (1867–1940), Algernon Blackwood (1869–1951), Walter de la Mare (1873–1956), Lord Dunsany (1878–1957), and Charles Williams (1886–1945).

The scholarly M. R. James, provost of Eton, wrote ghost stories for the amusement of his friends. The stories were later published in the collections Ghost Stories of an Antiquary (1904), More Ghost Stories of an Antiquary (1911), A Thin Ghost (1919), and A Warning to the Curious (1925). These classics of the genre are some of the most powerful and disturbing ghost stories in the English language. A later volume, The Collected Ghost Stories (1931), includes most of them.

The stories of Arthur Machen are haunted by fear of natural forces and the horror of evil from an ancient world. One of his best stories is "The Terror" (1917), in which the world of nature rebels against man's destructiveness in war, but his many shorter stories of horror and the supernatural are also masterpieces. These include "The Great God Pan," "The White People," and "The Shining Pyramid." These were reprinted in the collection Tales of Horror and the Supernatural (1949).

Benson is justly regarded as a master of the supernatural short story. "The Room in the Tower" and "Mrs. Amworth" are classic vampire stories; other well-written horror tales include "Caterpillars," "Negotium Perambulans," and "And No Bird Sings." These were published in the collections The Room in the Tower (1912), Visible and Invisible (1923), Spook Stories (1928), and More Spook Stories (1934). A representative selection was published as The Horror Horn (1974).

Blackwood specialized in occult fiction that drew upon his own psychic sensitivity. John Silence (1908) is based on the casebook of an occult detective. Some of Blackwood's best stories are "The Wendigo" (about a demon of lonely places), "Ancient Sorceries" (about cats and their witches), "The Man Whom the Trees Loved" (about the absorption of a man into nature), and "The Transfer" (on psychic vampirism), but he also wrote many other stories with psychic and ghostly themes. These are included in such collections as Tongues of Fire (1924), The Lost Valley (1910), Pan's Garden (1912), Incredible Adventures (1914), and Day and Night Stories (1917). His own selection, Strange Stories was published 1929, but a later comprehensive collection is Tales of Terror and Darkness (1977).

De la Mare was a famous poet of great sensitivity who also published several beautifully written short stories of the supernatural, including "All Hallows," "The Recluse," and "The Looking-Glass." Collections of his short stories include: The Riddle (1923) and On the Edge (1930). A later collection is Ghost Stories (1956).

Williams was a sensitive writer of fantasy stories. "War in Heaven" (1930) and "The Place of the Lion" (1931) deal with demonic themes. Other stories include "Descent Into Hell" (1937), "Witchcraft" (1941), and "All Hallow's Eve" (1945).

The Irish writer Lord Dunsany was an acclaimed master of fantasy fiction. His books include Time and the Gods (1906), The Sword of Welleran (1908), A Dreamer's Tales (1910), The Book of Wonder (1912), The Last Book of Wonder (1916), The King of Elfland's Daughter (1924), and The Blessing of Pan (1927).

Another creator of fantasy worlds was J. R. R. Tolkien (1892–1973) with his famous The Lord of the Rings trilogy: The Fellowship of the Ring (1954), The Two Towers (1955), and The Return of the King (1955). These books involve a fictitious mythology reminiscent of Arthurian romance and generated a worldwide cult following.

There is a strong element of fantasy mythology in some of the short stories of the American writer H. P. Lovecraft (1890–1937), who appears to have been strongly influenced by Machen and Lord Dunsany. Lovecraft's style is uneven and mannered, but his stories of ancient evil, monsters, and horror have secured a cult following. Many of his stories were originally published in magazines like Weird Tales; others were collected and published posthumously through the initiative of fantasy writer August Derleth. Representative collections are The Dunwich Horror and Others (1963) and Dagon and Other Macabre Tales (1965).

One important British writer of fantasy and horror fiction much neglected in his lifetime was William Hope Hodgson (1877–1918). His terrifying short stories of the sea include "From the Tideless Sea" (1906), "The Thing in the Weeds" (1912) and "The Voice in the Night" (1907). These are included in the collection Men of the Deep Waters (1914). His full-length stories The House on the Borderland (1908) and The Night Land (1912) are full of terrifying fantasy.

L. P. Hartley (1895–1972) was an established novelist who also wrote some macabre supernatural short stories, notably "A Visitor From Down Under" (1927). His first collection was Night Fears (1924); his Collected Short Stories was published in 1968.

Another writer of ghostly short stories was Oliver Onions (1873–1961); his best-known story is "The Beckoning Fair One." Collections of his stories include Widdershins (1911) and Ghosts in Daylight (1924); there is also a Collected Ghost Stories (1935).

Practicing occultists who have also written fiction include Violet M. Firth (best known under her public name, Dion Fortune; 1890–1946) and the famous Aleister Crowley (1875–1947). Fortune was a member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn occult society and also founded her own Fraternity of the Inner Light. She fictionalized some of her own psychic experiences in The Secrets of Dr. Tavener (1926). Her other occult fiction includes The Demon Lover (1927), The Winged Bull (1935), The Goat-Foot God (1936), The Sea Priestess (1938), and Moon Magic (1956).

Crowley, the most outstanding magician of the twentieth century, was also a member of the Golden Dawn before he founded his own society, the A∴A∴, and became the Outer Head of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO). In addition to his treatises on the practice of occultism, Crowley published two volumes of occult fiction: Moonchild (1929) and The Stratagem (1929). These were inferior to some of his other prose and his brilliant poetry.

One of the most prolific writers on the subject of black magic and occultism was Dennis Wheatley (1897–1977). His most popular books were The Devil Rides Out (1935), Strange Conflict (1941), To the Devil a Daughter (1953), The Satanist (1960), and They Used Dark Forces (1964). As well as these and other novels on occult themes, he edited the Dennis Wheatley Library of the Occult, a series of reprints of significant occult books by other writers.

Although the demise of many short story magazines during the period following World War II restricted the market for short stories on occult subjects, the popularity of the horror movie generated a new outlet.

Richard Matheson published many macabre short stories before becoming a prominent scriptwriter of horror films. Some of his most well-known stories include I Am Legend (1954), about vampires, and A Stir of Echoes (1958), dealing with psychic invasion of the mind. As a movie scriptwriter, Matheson adapted some of the works of Edgar Allen Poe, such as the story "The Pit and the Pendulum" and the poem "The Raven," as well as also his own novel Hell House (1971).

Robert Bloch, who wrote Psycho (1959), filmed by Alfred Hitchcock, also published many novels on occult themes, as well as scripting his own radio and movie stories. His film credits include The House That Dripped Blood (1970) and Asylum (1972).

The explosion of mass interest in occultism during the 1960s and 1970s slackened during the 1980s, perhaps through literary overkill of a basically elusive phenomenon, but has generated a romantic popular interest in fictional occultism, reflected in blockbuster novels of the occult adapted into movies. Typical of this trend are Ira Levin's sensational witchcraft stories Rosemary's Baby (1967) and The Stepford Wives (1972), which became successful movies.

Stephen King became the leading novelist of horror and the occult in America by the end of the 1970s. Beginning with Carrie (1974) about a teenager with paranormal powers, Salem's Lot (1975), a vampire story, and The Shining (1977), about an evil entity in a deserted hotel, King has produced a shelf of worldwide best-sellers, many of which have been made into movies.

Meanwhile, the Dracula theme has continued to proliferate all over the world in scores of books and movies. All this is a long way from the leisured sentimental Gothic tales of the eighteenth century and the cultured frisson of the Victorian and Edwardian ghost story. If the fantasy has become more imaginative, merging with the newer genre of science fiction, the thrills of the movie horror film have become more sensational. The vampire theme is the most successful single subgenre of contemporary Gothic fiction, with more than 650 vampire movies having been made during the twentieth century. As of 1994 more than 50 new vampire novels were being published annually.

Sources:

Ashley, Mike. Who's Who in Horror and Fantasy Fiction. London: Elm Tree Books, 1977.

Barclay, Glen St. John. Anatomy of Horror: The Masters of Occult Fiction. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1978.

Birkhead, Edith. The Tale of Terror: A Study of the Gothic Romance. London: Constable, 1921.

McNutt, Dan J. The Eighteenth-Century Gothic Novel: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism and Selected Texts. New York: Garland Publishing, 1975.

Messent, Peter B., ed. Literature of the Occult. Englewood Cliffs, N.J: Prentice-Hall, 1971.

Scarborough, Dorothy. The Supernatural in Modern English Fiction. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1917.

Sieger, James R. Ghost Stories Index. Denver: Opar Press, 1973.

Siemon, Fred. Ghost Story Index: An Author-Title Index to More than 2,200 Stories of Ghosts, Horrors, and the Macabre Appearing in 190 Books and Anthologies. San Jose, Calif.: Library Research Associates, 1967.

Sullivan, Jack, ed. The Penguin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural. New York: Viking Press, 1986.

Summers, Montague. A Gothic Bibliography. London: Fortune Press, 1940.

———. The Gothic Quest: A History of the Gothic Novel. London: Fortune Press, 1938.

Watt, William W. Shilling Shockers of the Gothic School: A Study of Chapbook Gothic Romances. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1932.

Fields Within Fields (Journal)

Former quarterly journal for "ongoing creative thinking about solutions to mankind's problems from the viewpoint of the human being as a complex of intellectual, material and spiritual resources in interplay of multiple systems."

Fifth Epochal Fellowship

The Fifth Epochal Fellowship continues the work of the URANTIA Brotherhood. It was originally founded in 1955 by students of The URANTIA Book, a large volume of channeled material published that same year. The brotherhood operated for many years as an association to nurture people who had been attracted to the Urantia teachings, and several of its members had published helpful study tools. However, in 1989, the brotherhood had a disagreement with the URANTIA Foundation, which owned the trademarks of the name URANTIA and the publishing rights to The URANTIA Book. The foundation withdrew the right of the brotherhood to use the name or the symbols associated with the book. The brotherhood reorganized, changing its name to the Fifth Epochal Fellowship, and continued much as before. The fellowship publishes a newsletter, the Fifth Epochal Fellowship Bulletin, and may be contacted at 529 W. Wrightwood, Chicago, IL 60614-1794.

Sources:

Bedell, Clyde. Concordex to the URANTIA Book. Leguna Hills, Calif.: The Author, 1980.

Faw, Duane L., comp. The Paramony. Malibu, Calif.: The Author, 1986.

The URANTIA Book. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1955.

Figuier, Louis (Guillaume) (1819–1894)

French chemist and writer on occult subjects. He was born at Montpellier, France, in 1819, where his uncle Pierre Figuier was professor of chemistry at the School of Pharmacy. Louis, having taken his doctorate in medicine and having completed his postgraduate study in chemistry at the laboratory of Balard in Paris, was made professor of chemistry at the same school in his hometown. In 1853 he exchanged this post for a similar one in the School of Pharmacy of Paris. Many honorary degrees in science and medicine were conferred upon him by various faculties during his career.

In 1857 he left teaching and devoted himself to writing, specializing in the popularizing of science, mainly physiology and medical chemistry. He published many notable works and was equally distinguished for his prodigious output and literary quality. Those works having a bearing on occult matters include Le Lendemain de la mort, ou La Vie future selon la science (1872, dealing with the transmigration of souls), L' Alchimie et les Alchimistes (1860), Histoire du merveilleux dans les temps modernes (1860–74), and Les Bonheurs d' outre tombe (1892). In 1889 he published a volume of dramas and comedies, La Science au Thèatre. Figuier's four-volume Histoire du merveilleux was a well-documented study of the Jansenist convulsionaires, the religious revival of the Cevennes, the divining rod, animal magnetism, table turning, mediums, and spirits. He died in Paris in 1894.

Sources:

Figuier, Louis. The Day After Death, or, Our Future Life, According to Science. London: R. Bentley, 1874.

Fillmore, Charles Sherlock (1854–1948)

Charles S. Fillmore, cofounder of the Unity School of Christianity, the largest of the New Thought metaphysical groups in North America, was born August 22, 1854, in St. Cloud, Minnesota. He had little formal schooling in his childhood years and was largely self-educated. Reading widely during his youth, he was fascinated by the few books he could find on Spiritualism, Eastern religions, and the occult. He moved about the West during his young adult years and eventually settled in Colorado in 1881, where he went into business with the brother-in-law of Nona Brooks, an early Divine Science leader in the state. While there, he married Mary Caroline Page, who, as Myrtle Fillmore, would work as Charles's partner in the development of the Unity School.

In 1884 the Fillmores moved to Kansas City. Two years later, E. B. Weeks, the student and representative of an independent Christian Science college in Chicago, came to Kansas City to lecture. Myrtle Fillmore attended the lectures and, taking their teachings to heart, was over the next year healed of the tuberculosis that had hobbled her young life. She gradually convinced Charles of the truth of the teachings, and thereafter Charles became an enthusiastic supporter of Christian Science. He began a magazine, Modern Thought, which went through several name changes over the next few years. It survives today as Unity.

In the meantime, the Fillmores became aware of the work of Emma Curtis Hopkins and gradually became convinced that she was the best of the many Christian Science and mind cure lecturers they had heard. They traveled to Chicago to study with her and in 1891 were ordained by her. Their magazine, which had been open to all of the varied interests of Charles, finally focused on the healing principles as taught by Hopkins. As suggested by Myrtle, Charles began the Society of Silent Help to tie together the readers of the magazine who could not travel to Kansas City. In 1891, while in Chicago, the two also decided upon a name for their work, Unity, and soon all of their activities were combined under that heading. The growth of the work allowed the launching in 1909 of a second magazine, Weekly Unity, as well as Charles's first book, Christian Healing, written from the notes of his healing classes in Kansas City.

By the end of World War I, Unity had become a large movement with a national following. A vegetarian restaurant opened, and Fillmore became one of the early radio preachers, beginning broadcasts on WOQ in 1922. In 1924 Unity purchased its own radio station. That same year Fillmore began one of the most important Unity projects, Unity Daily Word, now Daily Word, a day-by-day devotional booklet and the organization's most popular publication over the years.

During the 1930s Fillmore wrote a number of the books for which he is widely remembered today. They include The Twelve Powers of Man (1930), which explores some of humanity's psychic potentials; Metaphysical Bible Dictionary (1931), a guide to metaphysical Bible interpretation; Prosperity (1934), the Fillmores' answer to the Depression; and Jesus Christ Heals (1931). In 1933 Myrtle died, and Charles married Cora G. Dedrick. He retired from the pulpit of Unity Church and began a period of lecturing and traveling until his death on July 5, 1948, at the age of 93.

Sources:

D'Andrade, Hugh. Charles Fillmore: Herald of the New Age. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.

Fillmore, Charles S. Christian Healing: Science of Being. Kansas City, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1909.

———. Jesus Christ Heals. Kansas City, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1931.

———. Metaphysical Bible Dictionary. Kansas City, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1931.

———. Prosperity. Kansas City, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1936.

———. The Twelve Powers of Man. Lee's Summit, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1930, 1955.

Fillmore, Mary Caroline "Myrtle" Page (1845–1931)

Myrtle Fillmore, cofounder of the Unity School of Christianity, was born Mary Caroline Page on August 6, 1845, in Pagetown, Ohio. She was raised in a devout Methodist family and given the best education available for females in her day. She attended Oberlin College and upon graduation moved to Clinton, Missouri, to become a schoolteacher.

In the 1870s she moved to Dennison, Texas, where she met her future husband, Charles Fillmore. They were married in 1881 and settled in Colorado, where Charles had previously moved. They moved to Kansas City in 1884, but Myrtle's life entered a downward spiral. She had tuberculosis, at the time an incurable wasting disease. However, in 1886 she attended some lectures given by an independent Christian Science teacher, E. B. Weeks of Chicago. Charles attended reluctantly, but Myrtle's life was changed by what she heard. She began to apply the teachings and over the next year was cured of her illness. Her recovery captured Charles's imagination and enthusiasm. While Myrtle was sharing with others the teachings to which she attributed her healing, Charles was studying. In 1889 he began a magazine that presented Christian Science in the context of his various interests in the occult and Eastern religions.

Soon after founding the magazine, Myrtle and Charles met Emma Curtis Hopkins, the independent Christian Science teacher, and became her students. Under her tutelage, they focused their work in healing. In 1891 they were ordained by Hopkins and decided to organize their work under the general name Unity. By this time the Fillmores had three children, Lowell (1882), Rickert (1884), and Royal (1889). Myrtle founded the Unity Sunday School and in 1893 launched and for over thirty years edited Wee Wisdom, a children's magazine published for almost a century by the movement. She took the lead in the formation of the Society of Silent Help, today known as Silent Unity, the movement's prayer ministry. In 1903 she cofounded with Charles the Unity School of Christianity, the central organization of the movement. She lived to celebrate her fiftieth wedding anniversary and passed away on October 3, 1931.

Sources:

Fillmore, Myrtle. How to Let God Help You. Lee's Summit, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1956.

———. The Letters of Myrtle Fillmore. Kansas City, Mo.: Unity School of Christianity, 1936.

Witherspoon, Thomas E. Myrtle Fillmore, Mother of Unity. Unity Village, Mo.: Unity Books, 1977.

Findhorn Community

Early New Age center in northern Scotland. The New Age movement began with the linking (networking) of a number of theosophical/metaphysical centers across the United Kingdom in the 1960s. All of these communities were in sympathy with the theosophical ancient wisdom tradition but were also involved in channeling, either channeling spiritual energy to the world or channeling messages from various spiritual entities, or both. Eileen and Peter Caddy and a friend, Dorothy McLean, had settled at a small trailer court near the village of Findhorn outside Inverness, Scotland, during a period of financial lack. Through 1963 and 1964 they survived in part by gardening. During this period Eileen Caddy regularly channeled messages from what were believed to be nature spirits, or devas, and when their advice was followed the garden blossomed abundantly.

In 1965 Peter Caddy attended a meeting of other spiritual group leaders organized by George Trevelyan, later the founder of the Wrekin Trust. The visit with Trevelyan became a catalyst for the formal organization of the Findhorn Community, which was to become an object of pilgrimage. Its fame was generated by the extraordinary results of the garden, which was producing growth out of season and spectacularly large vegetables, in spite of the harsh climate. The garden became the visible focus of the paranormal and miraculous claims that grew up around the small but growing community. Caddy's channeled messages were published in a small volume, God Spoke to Me, and McLean, who had begun to channel, also published her messages.

The Findhorn Trust was created in 1971 and the Findhorn Foundation incorporated in 1972. In the 1970s an American student of the Alice Bailey literature, David Spangler, joined the community and developed its education program. Spangler's 1976 book, Revelation: the Birth of a New Age, became the early manifesto of both Findhorn and the New Age movement. Drawing on channeled messages received by himself and others at Findhorn, he declared that a New Age was beginning. It was already evident in the vast scientific advances and technological improvements that so separated twentieth-century humanity from previous generations. According to Spangler, in the last half of the twentieth century, in part owing to astrological realignments, new cosmic spiritual energies were available that could bring humanity into contact with the masters of the Great White Brotherhood and initiate a new era of light and love, the New Age.

Spangler returned to the United States, as did McLean, and initiated the movement in North America. As the movement became known through the 1970s, Findhorn was seen as a major source of inspiration and a popular site to visit. The community grew to include around 250 resident members. In 1975 the nearby Clung Hotel was purchased to accommodate conferences and other activities. Peter Caddy moved to the United States in 1982, and although Eileen Caddy remained at Findhorn, leadership was increasingly passed to the community as a whole. Members have developed a diversified program of educational activities for the burgeoning New Age community and the general public. Peter Caddy died February 18, 1994.

Address: The Park, Forres, Moray IV36 0TZ Scotland.

Sources:

Caddy, Eileen. The Dawn of Change. Forres, Scotland: Findhorn Publications, 1979.

Findhorn Community. Faces of Findhorn. Forres, Scotland: Findhorn Publications, 1980.

Hawken, Pauul. The Magic of Findhorn. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Findlay, J. Arthur (1883–1964)

Prominent British Spiritualist who wrote extensively on finance, economics, and psychic subjects. He was a justice of the peace for the counties of Essex, England, and Ayrshire, Scotland, and in 1913 received the Order of the British Empire for his organizational work for the Red Cross during World War I. In 1920 he was a founder and vice president of the Glasgow Society for Psychical Research and took a leading part in the Church of Scotland's inquiry into psychic phenomena in 1923. He was chairman of Psychic News, a leading British Spiritualist periodical, and was well known as a speaker, lecturer, and researcher. For five years he made a special study of the direct voice phenomena of the medium John C. Sloan. His book An Investigation of Psychic Phenomena (1924), which was followed by On the Edge of the Etheric (1931) and The Rock of Truth (1933), explains how the direct voice is produced and discusses the subject and teachings obtained by this mediumship.

On the Edge of the Etheric ran into 30 printings within the first year of publication. Findlay argues for the claims of Spiritualism on the basis of the growing extension of physics. He proposes that the universe is a gigantic scale of vibrations of which the physical is in but a small range. As mind constitutes the highest range of vibrations, so individual consciousness consists of the interaction of mind vibrations with physical vibrations. When we discard our physical bodies, says Findlay, our minds interact with etheric vibrations through the etheric double. The book presents teachings based on data recorded at direct voice séances describing the etheric world, upon the philosophy of which Findlay's The Rock of Truth further enlarges. This book also contains a lucid review of the various world religions, including Christianity, and Findlay claims a common origin for all religious beliefs. He also argues for the development of Christianity out of the beliefs prevailing in countries adjoining Palestine during the first 300 years of the Christian era. Findlay's conclusion is that religious instinct originates in man's psychic structure.

Findlay died on July 24, 1964.

Sources:

Findley, Arthur J. The Curse of Ignorance. 2 vols. London, 1947.

———. An Investigation of Psychic Phenomena. London, 1924.

———. Looking Back: the Autobiography of a Spiritualist. London: Psychic Press, 1955.

———. On the Edge of the Etheric. London: Psychic Press, 1931.

———. The Psychic Stream. London, 1939.

———. The Rock of Truth, or Spiritualism, the Coming World Religion. London: Rider, 1933.

———. The Unfolding Universe. London, 1935.

———. The Way of Life London, 1953.

Fingitas

This legendary stone is described as quite transparent and hard like marble. A certain king supposedly built a temple of it that needed no windows, the light being admitted into it as if it were open to the day.

Finias

One of the four great cities from which the Irish mythical Danaans were said to have sprung. The other cities were Falias, Gorias, and Murias. From Finias, the Danaans brought a magic spear.

Finn Mac Cummal

In ancient Irish romance, captain of the Fianna warrior band and the center of the Ossianic tales. His father, Cumhal, chief of the clan Basena, was slain at Castle Knock by the rival clan Morna, but his mother succeeded in saving him from the enemy. He was brought up in hiding and given the name of Finn from the clearness of his skin.

He learned science and poetry from the druid Finegas, who lived on the river Boyne. The druid had been unable to catch the salmon of knowledge until Finn became his pupil, and when he did succeed in catching it, he told Finn to watch it while it was cooking but not to partake of it. Finn, however, burned his fingers as he turned the spit and put one of them in his mouth. Seeing this, Finegas bade him eat the salmon and he became filled with the wisdom of all ages.

Afterward Finn took service with King Cormac, to whom he revealed his name and lineage. Cormac promised him the leadership of the Fianna if he succeeded in killing the fire-blowing demon that came yearly to set Tara in flames. Finn slew the demon and carried its head back to Tara. The Fianna were therefore ordered to swear allegiance to Finn as their captain. Under Finn the Fianna rose to great eminence that at length became tyrannical, and they were defeated at the battle of Bowra.

Finn's death is shrouded in mystery. According to popular tradition he and his great companions lie sleeping in an enchanted cave and will arise in the hour of their country's need, like Arthur, Barbarossa, and Charlemagne.

Fioravanti, Leonardi (d. 1588)

Italian alchemist, doctor, and surgeon of the sixteenth century. Fioravanti was born in Bologna, studied medicine, and practiced in Palermo from 1548 to 1550. He traveled to Africa with the Spanish fleet, returning in 1555 and going on to Rome, Venice, and Bologna, where he was appointed a doctor and count. He published a number of books, the most well known being Il compendio dei secreti di scienza rationali intorno alla medicina, cirugia et alchimia (Summary of the Arcana of Medicine, Surgery, and Alchemy). Published in Venice in 1564, it was reprinted in many editions. This venture into alchemy included an application of the principles and methods of hermetica to medicine. Fiorarant's account of the petra philosophorum or philosophers' stone claimed its designation to be purely arbitrary. It was a mixture of mercury, potassium nitrate, and other ingredients intended as a stomachic and had no connection with the transmuting lapis of the alchemists, he said.

Fire Immunity

A most dramatic claimed paranormal manifestation, frequently witnessed in the course of history. An early instance recorded in the Bible is that of Meschach, Shadrach, and Abednego, who were thrown into Nebuchadnezzar's furnace:

"Lo, I see four men loose walking in the midst of the fire and they have no hurt. And the princes, governors and captains and the king's counsellors, being gathered together saw these men upon whose bodies the fire had no power, nor was a hair of their heads singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed them." (Dan. 3:25–27)

Fire Immunity and Religion

Immunity to fire has often been recorded as a religious miracle, especially as an element in the life of saints. St. Francis of Paula (1508), in whose arms Louis XI of France died, held red-hot cinders in his hands and said to the amazed spectators, "All creatures obey those who serve God with a perfect heart." According to the theologian St. Bonaventura, St. Francis was told that nothing could relieve the inflammation in his eyes but cauterization from the jawbone to the eyebrow. He addressed the flame in the brazier, "My brother Fire, the Most High hath created thee beyond all other creatures, mighty in thine enviable glory, fair and useful. Be thou clement unto me in this hour and courteous. I beseech the great Lord who created thee that he temper thy heat unto me, so that I may be able to bear thy gentle burning." He made the sign of the cross over the cauterizing iron and felt no pain whatever on its application.

St. Catherine of Siena fell into a trance with her face in the midst of burning coals on a hearth. When she was discovered and dragged away she was found unhurt. On another occasion, in church, a lit candle fell on her head while she was in a state of contemplation and was not extinguished until it was entirely consumed. She was not burned in the least.

The Camisard leader Claris, during the rise of the Huguenots against Louis XIV, in a state of possession and in the presence of 600 men, put himself on top of a pyre. The flames rose above his head. He continued to speak all the while and did not stop until the wood was consumed and there was no more flame. He was unhurt; there was no mark of fire on either his clothes or hair. One Colonel Cavalier, when in London in 1706, affirmed this as a fact; he was the leader of the troop that had surrounded the fire. Durand Page corroborated his statement. He had helped to fetch wood for the fire and did his best to comfort Claris's shrieking wife.

The Convulsionnaires of St. Medard exhibited similar phenomena. P. F. Mathieu states in his Histoire des Miracles:

"Marie Sonet, called the Salamander, on several occasions, in the presence of Carré de Montgeron and others, stretched herself on two chairs over a blazing fire, and remained there for half an hour or more at a time, neither herself nor her clothing being burnt. On another occasion, however, she thrust her booted feet into a burning brazier until the soles of both boots and stockings were reduced to a cinder, her feet remaining uninjured."

Bernadette Soubirous, the girl who had a vision of the Virgin Mary at Lourdes, was seen by a Dr. Dozous in prayer in the grotto. P. J. Boisserie, quoting Dozous in his book Lourdes (1891), notes:

"During her ecstasy, she put her hands together, and her fingers were loosely crossed above the flame of a taper which they enveloped in the cavity between the two hands. The taper burnt; the flame showed its point between the fingers and was blown about at the time by a rather strong current of air. But the flame did not seem to produce any alteration in the skin it touched. Astonished at this strange fact I did not allow anyone to put a stop to it, and taking out my watch I could observe it perfectly for a quarter of an hour. Her prayer ended, Bernadette rose, and prepared to leave the grotto. I kept her back for a moment and asked her to show me her hand, which I examined with the greatest care. I could not find the slightest trace of a burn anywhere. I then tried to place the flame of the taper beneath her hand without her observing it; but she drew her hand quickly back, exclaiming 'You burn me!'"

The fire ordeal of the Middle Ages to establish the innocence of a suspected person was performed, according to the famous jurist Sir William Blackstone, either by taking up in the hand unhurt a piece of red-hot iron of one, two, or three pounds weight, or else by walking barefoot and blindfolded over red-hot ploughshares laid lengthwise at unequal distances. If the party escaped being hurt he was judged innocent; if not he was condemned as guilty.

Fire ordeals as a kind of religious ceremony still took place as late as the 1920s. According to an article by Victor Forbin in the Revue Aristote, there was a demonstration of fire walking at Maritzburg, South Africa, in September 1929. Twelve tons of wood were burned in a ditch 14–15 meters long. Eight Hindus and four Englishmen walked through this bed of flames with bare feet. One of the Englishmen, two or three feet from the edge of the brazier, was seized with feebleness, fell on his knees, then recovered and finished the course. He fainted when he was beyond the ditch and was taken to the hospital where the doctors found the soles of his feet badly burned. When he regained consciousness he declared to reporters that his misfortune was because of the shouts of the public, which prevented him from concentrating on the Supreme Being (see also the contribution on the fire walk by Victor Forbin in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research [SPR], vol. 26, p. 83.).

In 1935 the psychical researcher Harry Price arranged a scientific investigation of fire walking in Surrey, England, with the cooperation of Kuda Bux, a Moslem fakir from Kashmir. The tests were successful, but two other individuals who attempted the walk suffered blisters on their feet (see Bulletin II of the University of London Council for Psychical Investigation, 1936).

Psychic Immunity to Fire

Among mediums none was more famous for handling fire with impunity than D. D. Home. In the report of a subcommittee for the London Dialectical Society (1871), five witnesses stated that they had seen red-hot coals applied to the hands or heads of several persons by Home without producing pain or scorching.

A Mrs. Honeywood and the Master of Lindsay, the earl of Crawford, described how in a séance on March 17, 1869, Home placed a red-hot coal on his hostess's white muslin dress without harming it and how he held a spray of white flowers, taken from a vase on the table, in the fire of the grate. Smoke rose from the coals, but the flowers remained uninjured and their pure white color undimmed. In the same séance, intensely hot lampglass was easily handled by Honeywood and Lindsay while Home thrust the heated glass (which instantly ignited a match held to it) into his mouth. Lindsay later reported:

"Eight times I myself have held a red-hot coal in my hands without injury, when it scorched my face on raising my hand. Once, I wished to see if they really would burn, and I said so, and touched a coal with the middle finger of my right hand, and I got a blister as large as a sixpence; I instantly asked him [Home] to give me the coal, and I held the part that had burnt me, in the middle of my hand, for three or four minutes, without the least inconvenience."

On one occasion Home knelt down and held his face in the flames of a bright coal fire. Lord Adare, in Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home (1869), thus describes the incident:

"Having apparently spoken to some spirit, he went back to the fire, and with his hand stirred the embers into a flame; then kneeling down, he placed his face right among the burning coals, moving it about as though bathing it in water. Then, getting up, he held his finger for some time in the flame of the candle."

Sir William Crookes witnessed Home handling fire on two or three occasions. In the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 6) he reports his experience, also shared by Sir W. Huggins, former president of the Royal Society, as follows:

"Mr. Home then waved the handkerchief about in the air two or three times, held it above his head and then folded it up and laid it on his hand like a cushion; putting his other hand into the fire, took out a large lump of cinder, red-hot at the lower part, and placed the red-hot part on the handkerchief. Under ordinary circumstances it would have been in a blaze. In about half a minute, he took it off the handkerchief with his hand saying, "As the power is not strong, if we leave the coal longer it will burn." He then put it on his hand and brought it to the table in the front room where all but myself had remained seated."

On this occasion, with another piece of red-hot coal nearly as big as an orange, Home improvised a furnace in his hand by covering the coal with his left hand and blowing at it until it was nearly white-hot. "Then," continues Crookes, "he drew my attention to the lambent flame which was flickering over the coal and licking round his fingers; he fell on his knees, looked up in a reverent manner, held up the coal in front, and said, 'Is not God good? Are not his laws wonderful?'"

William Stainton Moses also saw Home's strange abilities with fire:

"He then went to the fireplace, removed the guard, and sat down on the hearth rug. Then he seemed to hold a conversation by signs with a spirit. He repeatedly bowed, and finally set to work to mesmerize his head again. He ruffled his bushy hair until it stood out like a mop, and then deliberately lay down and put his head in the bright wood fire. The hair was in the blaze, and must, under ordinary circumstances, have been singed off. His head was in the grate, and his neck on a level with the top-bar. This was repeated several times. He also put his hand into the fire, smoothed away the wood and coal and picked out a live coal which he held in his hand for a few seconds; but replaced soon, saying the power was not sufficient. He tried to give a hot coal to Mr. Crookes, but was unable to do it. He then came to all of us to satisfy us that there was no smell of fire on his hair. There was absolutely none."

F. W. H. Myers showed this account to Crookes, who declared that he was unable to explain how it was that Home was not severely burned. Crookes then told Myers:

"I do not believe in the possibility of the ordinary skin of the hand being so prepared as to enable hot coals to be handled with impunity. Schoolboys' books and medieval tales describe how this can be done with alum or certain other ingredients. It is possible that the skin may be so hardened and thickened by such preparations that superficial charring might take place without the pain becoming great, but the surface of the skin would certainly suffer severely. After Home had recovered from the trance I examined his hand with care to see if there were any signs of burning or of previous preparation. I could detect no trace of injury to the skin, which was soft and delicate like a woman's. Neither were there signs of any preparation having been previously applied. I have often seen conjurers and others handle red-hot coals and iron, but there were always palpable signs of burning."

Mrs. S. C. Hall's testimony of an occurrence on July 5, 1869, is often quoted. In this case the burning coal was placed on the head of Mr. Hall. He felt it warm but not hot. Home

"then proceeded to draw up Mr. Hall's white hair over the red coal. Mr. Home drew the hair into a sort of pyramid, the coal, still red, showing beneath the hair; then, after, I think, four or five minutes, Mr. Home pushed the hair back, and taking the coal off Mr. Hall's head, he said . . . addressing Mrs. Y.: 'Will you have it?' She drew back; and I heard him murmur, 'Little faith, little faith!' Two or three attempted to touch it, but it burnt their fingers. I said, 'Daniel, bring it to me; I do not fear to take it.' It was not red all over. . . . but it was still red in parts. I put out my right hand but he murmured, 'No, not that; the other hand.' He then placed it in my left hand. . . . I felt it. . . . 'warm'; yet when I stooped down to examine the coal my face felt the heat so much that I was obliged to withdraw it."

The source usually cited for this incident is S. C. Hall's Retrospect of a Long Life. It does not appear in that work, however, and may simply be an apocryphal tale.

Another fire test was reported by Frank Podmore from a letter written to him by Mrs. William Tebb in June 1882:

"Only on Friday I was in a circle with five others when one fell apparently in deep trance and put his hands over a flame and held them for some time without apparent injury. He also held the flame close to his eyes, to our horror, and we had to beg for the fire test to be dropped. It seemed too much to risk the eyesight in such a way. The burning of the hands we had been able to bear. The man afterwards was apparently no worse."

An American woman named Suydam handled hot iron and live coals and lamp chimneys at their most intense heat in public séances. "While she is under the control of the 'Fire Queen'," reported the Religio Philosophical Journal of Chicago, "her hands are cold and clammy; as cold as ice."

James Robertson, in his book Spiritualism, an Open Door to the Unseen Universe (1908) describes a séance with John Hopcroft, a London shoemaker, in his own house in Glasgow in which "he placed his hands amidst the ruddy coals in the fireplace, and lifting a piece which was perfectly red, he walked through the room so that its glow was reflected by the pictures on the wall."

The New York Herald of September 7, 1871, published the remarkable case of Nathan Coker, a 58-year-old African blacksmith of Easton, Maryland, who in the presence of a committee placed an iron shovel heated to a white heat upon the soles of his feet and kept it there until the shovel became black. When it was again red hot he laid it on his tongue and licked it until it became cooled. He poured a large handful of melted squirrel shot into the palm of his hand and then put it into his mouth, allowing it to run all around his teeth and gums. He repeated the operation several times, each time keeping the molten lead in his mouth until it solidified. After each operation he was carefully examined by physicians and was found unhurt.

The British newspaper Daily Express published a story in 1917 about an interesting experience Rose de Crespigny had with the medium Annie Hunter, in the presence of the paper's correspondent. The control of the medium was said to be a Persian fire worshiper. A log that the reporter brought up from the cellar when red hot was lifted out of the fire by the entranced medium. Talking in an excited way in a foreign language, she carried it about the room. The reporter shrank away. His hair was singed. De Crespigny also held the log across her arms for some seconds without the least harm. Another man, encouraged by what he had seen, allowed her to put the log near his head without any bad results.

There are a variety of different explanations of fire immunity and a variety of conjuring tricks that include apparent fire immunity. A substance called Mallot's metal melts at very low temperatures and can be handled safely for relatively brief periods. It has been noted that under hypnosis, a person can be made to produce a blister on his body after being touched by a pencil and told that it is a lit cigarette. In various altered states of consciousness the body reacts differently to its environment and can, for example, develop an immunity to pain. Few today attempt such feats, except for the well-documented fire-eating by circus performers, and from the sketchy descriptions of reporters it is often difficult to discern exactly what occurred in past generations.

Sources:

Boisserie, P. J. Lourdes. Paris, 1891.

Carrington, Hereward. "Psychical Phenomena Among Primitive Peoples." Psychic Research (October 1930).

Lang, Andrew. "The Fire Walk." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 15, p. 36.

Leroy, Oliver. Les hommes salamandres: Recherches et réflexions sur l'incombustibilité du corps humain. Paris, 1932.

Michell, John, and Robert J. M. Rickard. Phenomena: A Book of Wonders. London: Thames and Hudson, 1977. Reprint, New York: Pantheon Books, 1977.

Price, Harry, and E. J. Dingwall, eds. Revelations of a Spirit Medium. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1922.

Rickard, Robert, and Richard Kelly. Photographs of the Unknown. London: Book Club Associates, 1980.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Fire Ordeal

The fire ordeal is of great antiquity and probably arose from the concept of the purifying influence of fire. Among the Hindus, from the earliest times until comparatively recently, those who were suspected of wrongdoing were required to prove their guilt or innocence by walking over red-hot iron. If they escaped unharmed their innocence was proved beyond a doubt. In the great Hindu religious epic the Ramayana, after Sita, wife of Rama, has been rescued from the demon Ravana, Sita proves her purity by the fire ordeal. The priestesses of Cappodocian goddess Diana Parasya walked barefoot on red-hot coals, attributing their invulnerability to the powers of the divinity.

In Europe, trial by fire was of two kinds—traversing the flames, or undergoing the ordeal of hot iron. The latter comprised carrying red-hot irons in the hand, walking over iron bars or glowing ploughshares, and thrusting the hand into a red-hot gauntlet. An early instance of the former trial method in European history was the case of Pierre Barthelémy, who in 1097 declared to the Crusaders that heaven had revealed to him the place where the spear that had pierced the Savior's body was concealed. To prove his assertion he offered to undergo the ordeal by fire and was duly required to walk a path about a foot in width and some fourteen feet in length, on either side of which were piled blazing olive branches. The judgment of the fire was unfavorable, and 12 days later the rash adventurer died in agony.

Books were also sometimes submitted to trial by fire. This method was adopted to decide the claims of the Roman and Mozaratian liturgies, the former emerging victorious from the flames. The fire ordeal was also widely known in New Zealand, India, Fiji, and Japan.

In may be suspected that the outcome of such ordeals was not always left to the gods. There is no doubt that the ancient Egyptians were acquainted with substances that rendered the body temporarily impervious to fire. Albertus Magnus gives a recipe for this purpose. The concoction was made up of powdered lime made into a paste with the white of an egg, radish juice, marshmallow juice, and fleabane seeds. A first coat of this mixture was applied to the body and allowed to dry, then a second coat was applied. If the feet were constantly oiled or moistened with sulphuric acid they could be rendered impervious. Possibly the ancients were not unaware of the fire-resistant properties of asbestos.

The fire ordeal persisted into relatively modern times as one of the phenomena of Spiritualism. The famous medium D. D. Home frequently handled live coals and laid them on a handkerchief without damaging the material in the least. On one occasion he enclosed a glowing coal in his hands and blew upon it until it became white-hot.

In an account given by a Mrs. Honeywood and the Master of Lindsay of a séance with the same medium, Home took a chimney from a lighted lamp and put it into the fire—making it so hot that a match applied to it ignited instantly—and then thrust it into his mouth, touching it with his tongue, without any apparent ill effects. Another account stated that Home placed his face right into the fire among the burning coals, "moving it about as though bathing it in water." Other mediums in England and America emulated this feat with some measure of success.

It has been suggested that the state of trance generally accompanying such exploits, and corresponding to the ecstasy of the shaman performing a similar feat, may produce an anesthesia like insensibility to the pain of burning. How skin remains unscorched and a handkerchief unmarked by burning coals, however, is not easy to say.

Contemporary Fire Walking

Fire walking is still practiced in many parts of the world, including India, Pakistan, Japan, Malaya, Fiji, Tonga, Samoa, and Tahiti. Fire walkers believe that their faith protects them from injury and undergo the ordeal for purification, to fulfill vows, or to prove innocence. In 1935 Harry Price arranged a scientific investigation of fire walking in Surrey, England, with the cooperation of Kuda Bux, a Moslem from Kashmir. The tests were successful, but two volunteers who attempted the walk suffered blisters on the feet. Price concluded that the secret of fire walking involved three factors: the short contact time of each foot on the glowing embers (with a limit of two steps per foot); the low thermal conductivity of burning or burned wood embers; and confidence and steadiness in walking.

Interest in fire walking has been revived in the second half of the twentieth century. The 50-year-old film made by Harry Price of his investigation of Kuda Bux's fire walking was reproduced on the British television series Arthur C. Clarke's World of Strange Powers. A discussion of timely experiments and theories concerning scientific aspects of the subject followed the airing of the film. Various experiments were also detailed in the accompanying book to the series by John Fairley and Simon Welfare, Arthur C. Clarke's World of Strange Powers (1984). One notable citation was the work of Jearl Walker, professor of physics at Cleveland State University, Ohio. Walker had studied fire walking and was particularly intrigued by the research of Johann Gottlieb Leidenfrost, a German doctor who published a paper on the properties of water in 1756. Leidenfrost observed that if water was dropped onto a very hot surface, the drops danced about for a longer period than if the surface was cooler. Walker's own experiments showed that at 2100° centigrade the drops would last a minute or more on a hot surface, whereas they would evaporate in a few seconds at a lower temperature. Walker also discovered that the water drops were kept from contact with the hot surface by a thin vapor layer. He concluded that this "Leidenfrost effect" must be the secret of fire walking—that at a high temperature perspiration on the fire walker's feet forms a protective layer long enough to prevent injury.

Walker was courageous enough to put his theories to a personal test. He constructed a five-foot bed of hot coals in his back garden. He stated, "I suddenly found it remarkably easy to believe in physics when it is on paper, but remarkably hard to believe in it when the safety of one's own feet is at stake." Nevertheless, he later reported, "Clutching my faded copy of Halliday & Resnick's Physics in one hand, I strode over the five feet of hot coals. Apparently I am a true believer in physics. I have to report, however, that my feet did get a bit hot."

A German scientific team from Adubingen subsequently investigated the annual fire-walk ceremony at Langadhas, in northern Greece. The ceremony is held on May 21 each year at the festival of St. Constantine and St. Catherine to celebrate the traditional belief that Emperor Constantine successfully removed sacred relics from a burning church without injury to himself. In May 1980 the scientific team ensured that the fire was four yards long, with some two inches of hot coals with a surface temperature of 5000° Celsius. Three of the fire walkers agreed to have electrodes taped to their heads to secure an electroencephalogram (EEG), with thermocouples on their feet to give temperature readings. Both records were relayed from a backpack transmitter to the scientists with EEG recorder and tape recorder for temperature readings.

Two significant results were noted. First, although the surface of the fire was 5000°, the soles of the walkers' feet recorded only 1800°; second, increased theta activity was registered in the brain during the fire walk. Unfortunately a definitive physical explanation of the phenomenon of fire immunity proved elusive; when two of the scientific team ventured the fire walk, they suffered third-degree burns.

Evidence that immunity in fire walking is due solely to religious faith is also inconclusive. In 1982 a team of doctors and students from the medical faculty at Colombo University, Sri Lanka, took part in an extraordinary event designed to highlight the superiority of medical science to magic and superstition. As well as sponsoring vasectomies for family planning and medical treatment for snake-bite and venereal disease, the doctors staged demonstrations of fire walking. These deliberately flouted religious taboos as the doctors ate pork and imbibed alcohol (both forbidden by religion) while walking on red-hot coals without harm. The intention was to show that such fire immunity is a scientific phenomenon and not related to spiritual faith.

Another interesting case, quoted by Arthur C. Clarke and his co-authors, was that of Methodist minister Jon Munday from Katonan, New York, who took part in a fire walk in 1970 at the summer ashram retreat of Swami Vishnudevananda near Montreal, Canada. Munday described how he prepared himself by "chaotic meditation"—a combination of dancing, singing, and meditation—before joining others in a fire walk. Munday stated, "I didn't feel like I'd gone into a trance. Then, seconds before we stepped onto the coals I felt like something had happened and just walked right across, probably no more than six steps. I wasn't burned at all. I remember I fell on the ground face forward and held there kicking my feet. It was the exhilaration of having done something so incredible."

New Age Fire Walking

Fire walking has been revived in the United States and Britain as a kind of New Thought technique for raising human potential. It is claimed that by proving that the mind can control pain and physical reaction, individuals can liberate hidden potential for other achievements. In the United States, Eric Best, an industrial systems analyst, has been conducting seminars in which students are taught to overcome their fears through fire walking. Psychological techniques are used to prepare students by helping them face their longstanding fears before fire walking. Eventually the group surrounds a large bonfire that is later dismantled and used to feed a bed of glowing coals three feet wide and ten feet long.

The fire walkers are taught to internalize energy, to concentrate on it, then to assure themselves that the walk is on "cool moss." They shout, "Energy in!" then, "Strong focus!" "Eyes up!" and then, "Cool moss!" as they walk confidently over the glowing coals (a variant final chant used by some fire walkers is "Cool green moss!"). Walkers are instructed not to proceed with the ordeal unless they "feel right."

The technique was introduced to Britain by Hugh Bromiley, a karate black belt and member of the British Society of Hypnotherapists, after observing a fire-walking workshop in California. Participants are prepared by a "Power and Personal Research Training" course at which they are taught to confront their fears and successes before walking across burning embers. Local council authorities in London have banned fire walking, however, and medical authorities on burns have strongly discouraged the project.

In a valuable report on his own fire-walking experience, parapsychologist Charles T. Tart tells how he successfully maneuvered through the fire without injury. In his discussion of the various theories of immunity he concludes that a key factor is the belief of the fire walker that he or she can walk over the coals without being burned. This belief may be rationalized in many different ways, depending upon the disposition of the participant and whether he holds a religious or scientific philosophy. Tart questions the simplistic explanation of the Leidenfrost effect and points out discrepancies in the theory based on his own experience.

For a valuable collection of papers on fire walking, see Psi Research (vol. 4, no. 2, 1985). For a bibliography of articles on fire walking, see Bulletin II of the University of London, Council for Psychical Investigation (London, 1936).

Sources:

Burkan, Tolly. Guiding Yourself into a Spiritual Reality. Twin Harte, Calif.: Reunion Press, 1983.

Danforth, Loring M. Firewalking and Religious Healing: The Anastenaria of Greece and the American Firewalking Movement. Princeton, N.J: Princeton University Press, 1989.

Michell, John, and Robert J. M. Rickard. Phenomena: A Book of Wonders. London: Thames and Hudson, 1977. Reprint, New York: Pantheon Books, 1977.

Rickard, Robert, and Richard Kelly. Photographs of the Unknown. London: Book Club Associates, 1980.

Sandwith, George, and Helen Sandwith. Research in Fiji, Tonga & Samoa. Surrey, England: Omega Press, 1954.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Tart, Charles T. "Firewalk." Parapsychology Review 18, no. 3 (May–June 1987).

Truzzi, Marcelo. "A Bibliography on Fire-Walking." Zetetic Scholar 11 (1983): 105–07.

Firebrace, Roy Charles (1889–1974)

British researcher in psychical science, radionics, hypnostism, and astrology. Born August 16, 1889, at Halifax, Nova Scotia, Firebrace served in the British army for almost four decades (1909–46) and retired with the rank of brigadier. Firebrace took special interest in the study of mediumship and the evidence for survival of personality after death and also edited booklets on astrology. He was president of the Astrological Association, Britain, in 1958 and played a valuable part in the development of the College of Psychic Science (now College of Psychic Studies).

During his period as a British military attache at Riga, Latvia, he took part in séances with a direct voice circle, at which he became convinced of the reality of survival of personality after death. He also attended séances with Helen Duncan (at which a materialized figure conversed with him in Russian), with Alec Harris (at which 18 materializations are said to have formed), and with voice medium Leslie Flint.

Firebrace practiced healing by radionics, the system originally developed by Albert Abrams involving diagnosis of blood spots by the use of a black box device. He was president of the College of Psychic Studies for 13 years, after supervising its change of name. He died November 10, 1974.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fires, Paranormal

Spontaneous combustion or "auto-oxidation" of human beings is one of the most baffling types of unexplained phenomena. For centuries, cases have been reported of individuals who burst into flames for no apparent reason; although their bodies were destroyed by fire, their clothes and surrounding objects were often unaffected. For example, on December 16, 1904, Mrs. Thomas Cochrane, a widow of Falkirk, Scotland, was burned to death in her bedroom. There was no fire in the grate but she was burned almost beyond recognition, although the chair in which her body was found and the pillows and cushions with which she was surrounded were not even scorched. In January of the same year Elizabeth Clark of Hull, England, was found with her body covered with burns. There was no fire and her bed was not scorched. Although still alive when found, she could not explain what had happened, and she soon died. On December 13, 1959, Billy Thomas Peterson was found burning in his garaged automobile in Pontiac, Michigan. His left arm was so badly burned that the skin rolled off; his nose, mouth, and ears were burned; and his genitals were charred to a crisp. The hairs on his body were unsinged, however, and all his clothing remained unscorched, although the heat involved was so intense that a plastic religious statue on the auto dashboard had melted.

Such cases are usually explained away by rationalizations that do not meet the facts. For example, when a victim of spontaneous combustion has been seated near a fireplace, the usual explanation is that a cinder from the fire ignited the clothing—ignoring the fact that the calcined body indicates tremendous heat but often clothing is unaffected. In some cases of victims who were seated in autos, the instrument panel and fuel tanks were unaffected in spite of the great heat required to burn up a human body. Of course there are cases that are less ambiguous, where clothing and surroundings have been burned and some natural explanation is indicated.

The phenomenon of spontaneous combustion has been recognized by the medical profession over many years, although it is frankly admitted that a coroner's verdict of "death by spontaneous combustion" or even "accidental death" explains nothing in such cases.

Early Cases

The first professional recognition of spontaneous combustion recorded in print appears to be in the book Acta Medica & Philosophica Hafniensia Ann. 1671 & 1672, by Thomas Bartholin, published in Copenhagen in 1673. The earliest detailed account of spontaneous combustion of a human body is in De Incendiis Corporis Spontaneis, by Jonas Dupont, published in Leyden in 1763. During the nineteenth century, the phenomenon was often discussed in medical works and journals, but there was a tendency to dogmatize on insufficient evidence. An 1833 paper by M. J. Fintelle for the French Academy of Sciences suggested that the victims were usually corpulent women who were addicted to alcohol, thus generating "inflammable gases" in the stomach, and were usually seated near a source of heat or flame. Examination of numerous cases of spontaneous human combustion has shown these assumptions to be little more than inaccurate generalizations. There have been many male victims, most not heavy drinkers and often not seated near a source of flame.

The case of John Greley, helmsman of the S.S. Ulrich is instructive. On April 7, 1938, he was steering the ship toward Liverpool, England, when the second mate noticed it was beginning to yaw. The second mate ran to the wheelhouse, where he found the helmsman burned to a crisp at the wheel. The compass, varnished wooden wheel, and even the holystoned deck were not scorched. Interestingly enough, on the same day two other individuals died of spontaneous combustion. George Turner, a British truck driver, was heading for Liverpool from southeast England when the vehicle stopped and rolled into a ditch. Turner was later found calcined in his cab, but nothing else was burned—not even a grease stain on the passenger side of the truck. Willen ten Bruik, an 18-year-old Dutchman, also similarly died at the wheel of his vehicle while driving into Ubbergen, Holland.

The extraordinary coincidence of these three similar deaths on the same day is heightened by the fact (pointed out by Michael Harrison in his book Fire From Heaven) that the deaths were geographically linked, taking place in a triangular area with two sides roughly 340 miles long. Is this another "fatal triangle" mystery? No other similar coincidences have been recorded in the same area, although the mystery remains. As journalist Michael McDougall wrote in the Newark Sunday Star-Ledger: "It was as if a galactic being of unimaginable size had probed Earth with a three-tined fork: three fingers of fire, which burned only flesh."

Little is known of the reason for spontaneous combustion, but the Transactions of the Medical Society of Tennessee for 1835 reports a remarkable case of partial combustion that offers clues to the onset of the phenomenon. On January 5, 1835, on a very cold day, James Hamilton, professor of mathematics of the University of Nashville, walked home, a distance of about three-quarters of a mile. Forty minutes later he was inspecting a hygrometer that he had hung outside his house when he felt a sudden pain in his left leg "like a hornet sting, accompanied by a sensation of heat." He looked down and saw a bright flame, several inches long, "about the size of a dime in diameter," issuing like a gas flame from his trousered leg. After slapping the flame several times, he eventually extinguished it by cupping his hands around it to cut off oxygen. After putting out the flame he found that his leg had an injury that resembled an abrasion; the wound was very dry and the scar tissue had gathered in a roll at the lower edge of the abraded surface. Other writers have stated that spontaneous combustion begins with a bluish flame that extends rapidly all over the body until all parts are blackened and burned to a cinder. Throwing water on this flame only aggravates it, they say.

During the nineteenth century the phenomenon of spontaneous combustion was so familiar that it was referred to in various works of fiction, such as Frederick Marryat's Jacob Faithful (1833), Honore de Balzac's Le Cousin Pons (1847), Herman Melville's Redburn (1849), Charles Dickens's Bleak House (1853), and Mark Twain's Life on the Mississippi (1833).

Cases of human spontaneous combustion are still reported. Various theories have been advanced to account for this weird phenomenon, such as unusual effects of ball lightning, static electricity, or even psychical effects related to levitation and telekinesis. If this latter theory should seem far-fetched, it is worth quoting a comment of Soviet parapsychologist Genady Sergeyev about the telekinetic subject Nina Kulagina, reported in the British newspaper Sunday People (March 14, 1976): "She can draw energy somehow from all around her. . . . On several occasions the force rushing into her body left burn-marks up to 4 inches long on her arms and hands. . . . I was with her once when her clothing caught fire from this energy-flow—it literally flamed. . . .''

Of the many recorded cases of spontaneous human combustion it is probable that there is no single appropriate explanation but rather various types of phenomena. In some cases there may be a simple explanation, in others a mysterious and as yet inexplicable reason. Joe Nickel and John F. Fischer, skeptics of the paranormal, tried their hand at explanations, but fared little better than previous observers. Jerome Clark suggested that spontaneous human combustion may be a manufactured mystery bringing together a series of unrelated cases, each of which has its own explanation.

Sources:

Bartholin, Thomas. Acta Medica & Philosophical Hafniensia Ann. 1671 & 1672. Copenhagen, 1673.

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Gaddis, Vincent H. Mysterious Fires and Lights. New York: McKay, 1967.

Harrison, Michael. Fire From Heaven. London, 1976. Reprint, New York: Methuen, 1977. Rev. ed. London: Pan, 1977.

Lair, Pierre. Essai sur les combustions humaine, produites par l' abus des liqueurs spiritueses. Paris, 1808.

Michell, John, and Robert J. M. Rickard. Phenomena: A Book of Wonders. London: Thames and Hudson, 1977. Reprint, New York: Pantheon Books, 1977.

Nickell, Joe, and John F. Fischer. Secrets of the Supernatural: Investigating the World's Occult Mysteries. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Press, 1988.

Rickard, Robert, and Richard Kelly. Photographs of the Unknown. London: Book Club Associates, 1980.

Russell, Eric Frank. Great World Mysteries. London, 1957.

United States Army. Index-Catalogue of the Library of the Surgeon-General's Office. Washington, D.C., 1882.

Firman, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. (ca. 1876)

British mediums who claimed to be controlled by "John King" and produced direct voice phenomena. Mrs. Firman produced wax molds (see plastics) and materialization of spirit forms.

William Oxley, author of Modern Messiahs and Wonder Workers (1889), claimed to have observed a total dematerialization of the medium while the phantom was outside the cabinet. The phantoms either shrank through the floor or rose to the ceiling and slowly disappeared. Similarly, Emma Hardinge Britten wrote of the production of the mold of a spirit foot in her Nineteenth Century Miracles (1883). The Honorable J. L. O'Sullivan recorded in The Spiritualist an instance of May 4, 1877, when four spirits were present at once with the sleeping form of the medium plainly visible.

Unfortunately, when mediums claimed to do materializations, discovery of fraud usually followed, and the Firmans were no exception. There was a very serious disclosure in the Procès des Spirites by Mme. P. G. Leymarie (Paris, 1875), according to which Mr. Firman was detected in Paris masquerading as an Indian spirit and left his mantle in the hands of the woman who seized him.

First Church of Satan

The First Church of Satan emerged in the 1990s as an Internet fellowship focused upon the ideas of Lord Egan, the public persona of John Dewey Alle (b. 1951), a former member of the Church of Satan. Alle had joined the Church of Satan in 1970 and adopted what he saw as its Dionysian celebration of the individual. He believed that it was the duty of people to throw off the self-image imposed by their early social training and remake themselves as the unique individuals they could become. Through the 1980s Alle turned his attention from the world of Satanism to pursue other concerns.

When he once again returned to the Satanic subculture in the mid-1990s, he noticed that the early atmosphere of individualism that had so pervaded the church that Anton LaVey had founded, had disappeared. Under current church leader Blanche Barton, he found an organization that had shifted from a celebration of individualism to an emphasis on elitism, a subtle but important change.

Lord Egan founded the First Church of Satan to champion Satanism as an alternative spiritual path. He sees Satanists as freethinkers moving toward spiritualism through spiritual stimulation and self-exploration. He has incorporated the church and is seeking tax-exempt status. He sees the church as fitting the image of a public benefit association and promotes all causes that accelerate human growth and potential.

Lord Egan uses many images to describe Satan, such as the Capricornian goat that leaps upon mountain tops ever seeking the lofty heights. He discourages debate over the existence of Satan, and sees the important issue to be the nature of one's belief system. Is it dogmatic or non-dogmatic? He favors the latter, especially in light of contemporary life that must be lived without absolutes. Thus the First Church of Satan does not replace the structures and rules of the past with a new structure and rules; rather, it offers a place to be that allows all authority to be challenged. It accepts all spiritual paths as valid and a means to the same eternal truths. The Satanic Bible, first published by LaVey in the 1960s, and its teachings are seen not as another competing spiritual path to which conformity is demanded, but as a call to develop one's own way.

Satanism is seen as opposed to devil-worship, that is, the subordination to a post-Christian deity and the adoption of an anti-Christian creed. It does not believe in nor practice animal sacrifice, believing that killing can be done only for self-defense or for food. Given its emphasis upon individualism and its acceptance of a wide range of spiritual perspectives, the First Church of Satan includes a wide range of belief and practice united by their common libertarian spirit. The church may be contacted at PMB 172, 203 Washington St., Salem, MA 01970. It has an Internet presence at http://www.churchofsatan.org/.

Sources:

First Church of Satan. http://www.churchofsatan.org/. June 20, 2000.

First Satanic Church

The First Satanic Church was created on October 31, 1999, by Karla LaVey, the elder daughter of Anton LaVey (1930–1997), the founder of the Church of Satan. Following his death, the church was involved in an extensive controversy and litigation over the future of the church and the inheritance of LaVey's possessions. Blanche Barton, LaVey's secretary, emerged as the person in control of the church. Among those who did not accept Barton's leadership was Karla LaVey.

It is LaVey's opinion that much had been lost within the Church of Satan since her father's death. The First Satanic Church is an effort to revive the Church of Satan as she knew it at an earlier time. The church continues to use The Satanic Bible and the other books authored by Anton LaVey and sees itself as an elite remnant that wishes to engage in the public and serious study of Satanism and the occult sciences. It differs from the Church of Satan in that it does not recruit new members and is not an open membership church. It carefully screens any who apply for membership. While the church has several Internet sites, it does not see itself as a cyberspace organization. Prospective members are asked to make contact via more traditional means.

The church teaches that Satanism is not the inverse of Christianity, nor is it concerned with popular images of animal mutilation and other grisly crimes. Rather it is centered upon Satan as the Adversary, the Opposition. It thus emphasizes virtues of individualism and rational self-interest.

Among the projects supported by the church is The 600 Club (a parody of The 700 Club, the television talk show hosted by Christian evangelist Pat Robertson), a cybernet presence to provoke thought among Satanists (both inside and outside the First Satanic Church), to emphasize individuality within the larger world of Satanism, and to counter what are considered false reports concerning Satanism in general and the First Satanic Church in particular that appear in the media. The club, in turn, sponsors The Voice of Satan radio show.

The First Satanic Church may be contacted at P.O. Box 475177, San Francisco, CA. 94147. It publishes a quarterly newsletter. It has two Internet sites, http://www.satanicchurch.com/html/contact.html and http://www.the600club.com/.

Sources:

First Satanic Church. http://www.satanicchurch.com/html/contact.html. May 20, 2000.

The 600 Club. http://www.the600club.com/. May 20, 2000.

Firth, Violet Mary (1890–1946)

Leading British occultist, author, and founder of the Fraternity of the Inner Light. Firth was born December 6, 1890, at Bryn-y-Bia, Llandudno, Wales. She manifested some mediumistic abilities in her teens. She later became interested in psychoanalysis and studied the work of Freud, but came to prefer C. G. Jung's perspective. She worked for a time at the Medico-Psychological Clinic in London. She also became interested in the writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky but was put off by the Eastern style of occultism dominant in the Theosophical Society.

About 1919 she joined the Alpha and Omega Lodge of the Stella Matutina, an outer order of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, a ritual magic group under the guidance of J. W. Brodie-Innes. He instructed her in various magic practices. Firth's pseudonym, "Dion Fortune," was derived from her period as a member of the Stella Matutina. She took the motto Deo Non Fortuna (By God, not luck), and this was condensed to "Dion Fortune" when she began to write. Under her own name she wrote one early book, Machinery of the Mind (1922).

In 1924 she founded the Community (later Fraternity) of the Inner Light to attract recruits for the Golden Dawn but eventually split off from the main body as warden of the new order. She taught her own variation of magic, based on claimed contacts from the "inner planes" of wisdom.

Firth wrote several books on magic and the occult and several occult novels, notably The Secrets of Dr. Traverner (1926), The Demon Lover (1927), Through the Gates of Death (1932), The Winged Bull (1935), The Goat-Foot God (1936), The Sea Priestess (1938), and Moon Magic (ca. 1939). Her books of occult instruction include Sane Occultism (1929), Psychic Self-Defence (1930), The Training and Work of an Initiate (1930), and The Mystical Qabalah (1935).

Sources:

Chapman, Janine. Quest for Dion Fortune. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1993.

Fielding, Charles, and Clark Collins. The Story of Dion Fortune. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1985.

Fortune, Dion. Applied Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1962.

———. The Esoteric Orders and Their Work. London: Rider, 1929. Reprint, St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1971.

———. The Mystical Qabalah. London: Ernest Benn, 1935.

———. Psychic Self-Defence. London: Rider, 1930.

———. Sane Occultism. London: Rider, 1929.

———. The Secrets of Dr. Traverner. London: Noel Douglas, 1926.

———. The Training and Work of an Initiate. London: Rider, 1930.

———. The Winged Bull. London: Williams & Norgate, 1935.

Richardson, Alan. Priestess: The Life and Magic of Dion Fortune. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1987.

Fischer, H(enri) Thèodore (1901–)

Dutch professor of anthropology who was also active in the field of parapsychology. Born April 6, 1901, at Poerwakarta, Dutch East Indies, Fischer was awarded a Ph.D. in cultural anthropology in 1929 and became professor of cultural anthropology at the University of Utrecht in 1936.

He was also director of the Volkenkundig Institut, Utrecht; president of the Dutch Society for Psychical Research (1945–56); and a charter member of the Parapsychological Association. He took a special interest in clairvoyance and the evidence for survival after death. In addition to his papers for various periodicals dealing with anthropology, Fischer published several books on anthropology and ethnology.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fish, (Ann) Leah (ca. 1814–1890)

The eldest of the famous Fox sisters, whose claimed spirit raps at Hydesville, New York, in 1848 launched the Spiritualist movement in the United States. Her birth date is not known, but is believed to be around 1814. Leah Fox was only 14 when she married Bowman Fish. He deserted her and she was living in Rochester teaching music when the rappings began in the family home in Hydesville. Leah later married Calvin Brown, and after his death in 1853 she married Daniel Underhill in 1858.

In 1885, as Leah Underhill, she published The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism (1885), detailing her recollections of the Rochester rappings and the development of Spiritualism as a link between the living and the dead. The book was severely criticized by her younger sister Kate Fox (Jencken) in 1888 as "a string of lies." That was also the year in which Kate allied herself with her sister Margaret in a confession of fraud. They blamed Leah for continuing the fraud past the first weeks, but they retracted everything in the following year.

Fisk, G(eorge) W(illiam) (1882–1972)

British parapsychologist and lecturer in physics. Fisk was born January 9, 1882, at Liverpool, England. He studied at London University (B.D., 1906) and Victoria University (B.A., 1907). After graduation, Fisk moved to China where he lectured in physics at Chi-lu University, Shantung, China (1908–1915), and served as British vice-consul at the Chinese Emigration Bureau Center, North China (1915–19), and as labor superintendent of Kailan Mining Administration (1919–30). While in China, Fisk joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR). He became fascinated with the examples of paranormal activity he saw in the Orient. Later, upon his return to England, he became a charter member of the Parapsychological Association, joined the SPR Council (1950), and served as editor of the Journal and Proceedings of the SPR (1957–66). In 1958 he and Donald J. West received the McDougall Award for their paper "Psychokinetic Experiments with a Single Subject."

Fisk spent more than 30 years in quantitative research on ESP. His articles were published in the Journal of the SPR and the Journal of Parapsychology. He also wrote a Chinese-English-French phrase book for mining engineers.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Fisk, George W. "How Primitive is ESP?" Tomorrow (spring 1957).

———. "We Card-Guessers." Tomorrow (winter 1957).

Fisk, George W., and Donald J. West. "Psychokinetic Experiments with a Single Subject." Parapsychology Newsletter (November–December 1957).

Heywood, Rosalind. "G. W. Fisk and ESP." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 47 (1973).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fitzlar, Martin von (ca. 1750)

German alchemist who lived in the first half of the eighteenth century. He was probably a Hessian, residing chiefly at the village of Fitzlar. While a young man he studied pharmacy, intending to make it his profession, but he soon grew interested in the quest of gold-making, and when the celebrated alchemist Lascaris came to Germany, Fitzlar hastened to see him hoping to glean his secrets.

Along with several other young men, Fitzlar was allowed to witness numerous experiments, and it seemed that the great secret lay open before him, but afterward, when he made attempts on his own, he found that Lascaris had duped him shamefully and had even taken advantage of his ignorance. Then—unlike the majority of thwarted alchemists—he renounced the futile search altogether and resumed his original calling as a pharmacist.

Fitzsimons, Frederick William (1875– ?)

South African scientist and Spiritualist. Fitzsimons was an expert on snakes and was curator of the Natal Society Museum, Pietermaritzburg, Natal. His interest in Spiritualism led him to investigate psychic photographer William Hope and to sit with Etta Wriedt while in London in 1920. He later published one book, Opening the Psychic Door (1933).

Flagellation

Flagellation (usually with whips) has been associated with religious fervor from pagan times. In ancient Egypt devotees of the goddess Isis scourged themselves at an annual festival. According to Pausanias, women were flogged in the temple of Dionysus. Plutarch states that the priests of Cybele were flogged in the temple of the goddess.

In the Christian religion, flagellation found many rationalizations. It was used as an official punishment for priests and monks, a self-inflicted penance, and a dramatization of the sufferings of Christ. There was an epidemic of flagellant sects in Europe during the tenth and fourteenth centuries, associated with penance and love of Christ, and the Catholic authorities took extreme measures to suppress what they considered a morbid enthusiasm for the act. In Latin American countries, flagellation still occurs at religious processions of penitentes.

Symbolic whippings have also been associated with certain Tibetan and Mongolian sects, and some American Indian tribes used whipping to test the endurance of young males in ritual ordeals. In the witchcraft movement of the mid-twentieth century, flagellation was introduced by Gerald Gardner; it is used both as a means of exciting psychic awareness and as a disciplinary measure.

The persistent and widespread practice of flagellation both as a religious ritual and in sadomasochistic deviations appears to be based on the intense emotional and sexual sensations it arouses, sometimes culminating in paranormal consciousness. Although there is widespread sadomasochistic literature for those addicted to flogging and related practices, there has been little attempt to analyze the psychosomatic basis of flagellation.

In his book The Function of the Orgasm (1942) Wilhelm Reich explains masochism as a compulsion neurosis arising from sexual anxiety; he does not accept that real pain is desired—rather that the suggestion of pain evokes inhibited pleasure sensations in individuals with long-established sexual inhibitions. This inhibited pleasure, Reich says, is a longing for release from tensions and is expressed biologically in the organism as in well as the psyche. The historical facts of the association of actual pain and injury with flagellation, however, would indicate that Reich's explanation does not go far enough.

On a more everyday level, devotees of the sauna bath will testify to the overall tonic effect of scourging with twigs. It would seem that flagellation certainly elicits biological and psychic excitation, sometimes involving intense sexual and emotional release, and when associated with religious fervor it may induce almost mystical states of transport, although of a psychopathological kind.

Sources:

Cooper, William M. [James Glass Bertram]. Flagellation and the Flagellants: A History of the Rod in All Continents from the Earliest Period to the Present Time. London, 1868. Rev. ed. Paris: C. Carrington, 1900.

Gibson, Ian. The English Vice: Beating, Sex, and Shame in Victorian England and After. London: Duckworth, 1978.

History of Flagellation Among All Nations. New York: Medical Publishing, 1903.

Reich, Wilhelm. The Function of the Orgasm: Sex-Economic Problems of Biological Energy. New York: Orgone Institute Press, 1942. Reprint, New York: Farra, Straus and Giroux, 1973.

Valiente, Doreen. An ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's, 1973.

Weigle, Marta. Brothers of Light, Brothers of Blood: The Penitentes of the Southwest. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1976.

Flamel, Nicholas (ca. 1330–1418)

One of the most famous alchemists. Flamel was said to have been born at Pontoise to a poor but respectable family, about the beginning of the fourteenth century. Very little is certain about his life, but it is believed that he received a good education, of which his natural abilities enabled him to make the best use. Moving to Paris, he obtained employment as a public scrivener. The occupation provided a modest income, and Flamel also had some skill in poetry and painting. Eventually he prudently married a well-to-do widow named Pernelle.

One day he came across a remarkable book of alchemy written on leaves made from the bark of trees and with a cover made of brass. The book cost two florins. The calligraphy was as admirable as the language was cryptical. Each seventh leaf was free from writing but emblazoned with a picture; the first representing a serpent swallowing rods, the second, a serpent crucified on a cross, and the third, the arid expanse of a desert in whose depths a fountain bubbled, with serpents trailing their slimy folds from side to side.

The author of this mysterious book purported to be "Abraham, the patriarch, Jew, prince, philosopher, Levite, priest, and astrologer." He had included a complete exposition of the art of transmuting metals—describing every process, explaining the different vessels, and pointing out the proper seasons for making experiments. The book was addressed not so much to the novice as to the expert, however, and took it for granted that the reader was already in possession of the philosophers' stone.

Flamel showed the book to scholars and learned men, but they were unable to interpret the text, until one day it was suggested that a rabbi might be able to translate it. Since the chiefs of the Jews were principally located in Spain, Flamel went there and from one of the Hebrew sages obtained some hints that afforded a key to the mysteries. Returning to Paris, he resumed his studies with a new vigor and was rewarded with success.

On February 13, 1382, according to the story, Flamel made a projection on mercury and produced some virgin silver. During the following April he converted some mercury into gold and found himself the fortunate possessor of an inexhaustible treasure. His wife assisted in his experiments. As they had no children, they spent their wealth on churches and hospitals, and several of the religious and charitable institutions of France still attest to their well-directed benevolence.

One of Flamel's works on the fascinating science of alchemy—a poem entitled The Philosophic Summary—was printed as late as 1735. William Salmon's valuable and unusual Medicina Practica (1691) preserves some specimens of the drawings in Abraham's treatise on metallurgy and some of his handwriting.

More skeptical writers have suggested that Flamel used his alchemical studies to disguise his financial activities, primarily his usurious practices. The writers also say he used alchemy to account for immense wealth acquired by money-lending to young French nobles and by transacting business between the Jews of France and those of Spain, and they accuse him of inventing the story of his discovery of the philosophers' stone. For an argument against this theory, see Alchemists Through The Ages (1970), a reprint of A. E. Waite's Lives of the Alchemystical Philosophers (1888).

Sources:

Federmann, Reinhard. The Royal Art of Alchemy. New York: Chilton, 1964.

Magre, Maurice. The Return of the Magi. London: P. Allen, 1931.

Waite, A. E. Lives of the Alchemystical Philosophers. London: George Redway, 1888. Reprinted as Alchemists Through The Ages. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1970.

Flammarion, Camille (1842–1925)

Famous French astronomer who also became a notable psychical researcher. Flammarion was born February 26, 1842. He was a student astronomer from 1858 to 1862 and from 1876 to 1882 he was an astronomer at the Paris Observatory. In 1882 he founded Juvisy Observatory, which he directed for the rest of his life. That same year he also founded the French Astronomical Society. As a scientist he made balloon ascents to study the upper atmosphere and was celebrated for his research on double and multiple stars and the topography of Mars. He was named a commander of the Legion of Honor, one of France's highest nonmilitary honors.

His first contact with psychical phenomena was during November 1861. When writing his first book, The Plurality of Inhabited Worlds, he came across Spiritualist Allan Kardec's Le Livre des Esprits, paid him a visit, and joined the Society for Psychologic Studies, of which Kardec was president. The weekly séances of the society were devoted to inspirational writing. Flammarion himself tried to practice it and succeeded, after several attempts, in obtaining words and phrases.

The scripts were mostly on astronomical subjects and were signed by Galileo. Flammarion, however, believed them to be wholly the product of his own intellect and had no doubt that the illustrious Florentine astronomer had nothing to do with them. These communications remained in the possession of the society and were published in 1867 in Kardec's Genesis under the head of "General Uranography."

Flammarion soon obtained entrance to the chief Parisian spiritistic circles and even acted as honorary secretary to one of them for several years. Nevertheless, he did not become a Spiritist. After two years of experience in automatic writing, in the use of the planchette, and in rapping communications, he came to the conclusion that the method practiced by Kardec's society permitted a margin for doubt and that the automatic scripts did not prove the intervention of another mind from the spirit world at all.

In 1865, under the title Des Forces naturelles inconnues (Unknown Natural Forces), he published his first book on the subject of psychical research, a monograph of 150 pages that was meant as a critical study "apropos of the phenomena produced by the Davenport brothers and mediums in general." It was not so much about the Davenport brothers that he wrote, but about psychic (he used this word in his early writings) matters, stating that, "these forces are as real as the attraction of gravitation and as invisible as that." His book Les Forces Naturelles Inconnues, published in 1906 (translated as Mysterious Psychic Forces, 1907), is in a sense an enlarged edition of this early work.

Allan Kardec died March 30, 1869, and Flammarion was asked to deliver the funeral oration. In the eulogy he impressed upon all students of the mysterious phenomena that "spiritualism is not a religion but a science, of which we as yet scarcely know the a.b.c."

In 1899, through the Annales Politiques et Litteraires, the Petit Marseilles, and the Revue des Revues, Flammarion started to make his own census of hallucinations. Of 4,280 people questioned 1,824 answered that they had had phantasmal visions. Of these, 786 cases were selected as having evidential value. They were dealt with in the Annales Politiques et Litteraires, for which Flammarion was writing articles on psychic subjects. Revised and amplified, these articles formed the substance of L'Inconnu, published in 1900 in an attempt to prove the reality of telepathy, apparitions of the dying, premonitory dreams, and clairvoyance. Flammarion concludes that the soul exists as a real entity independent of the body; it is endowed with faculties still unknown to science; and it is able to act at a distance without the intervention of the senses.

He reaffirmed his belief in the reality of psychical phenomena in Mysterious Psychic Forces on the basis of very wide experience. "During a period of more than forty years," he writes "I believe that I have received at my home nearly all of them [mediums], men and women of divers nationalities and from every quarter of the globe." He met Italian medium Eusapia Palladino for the first time on July 27, 1897, at Montfort l'Amaury. The report of the séances conducted there form the subject of Guillaume de Fontenay's Apropos d'Eusapia Palladino (1898).

In cooperation with the editor of the Annales Politiques et Litteraires, Flammarion extended an invitation to Palladino to come to Paris. She accepted and gave eight séances in Flammarion's home during November 1898. Many scientists were present and surprising manifestations were witnessed. Additional opportunities for observation with the same medium were afforded by a later series of séances in 1905, and especially in 1906 under Flammarion's own conditions in his home, often in the full light of a gas chandelier. He felt no hesitation in declaring that "mediumistic phenomena have for me the stamp of absolute certainty and incontestability, and amply suffice to prove that unknown physical forces exist outside the ordinary and established domain of natural philosophy."

Nevertheless, he was not yet convinced of survival, and in Mysterious Psychic Forces he makes the following conclusions: "The universe is a dynamism. . . . Matter is only a mode of motion. Life itself . . . is a special kind of movement, a movement determined and organized by a directing force. . . . The vital force of the medium might externalize itself and produce in a point of space a vibratory system which should be the counterpart of itself in a more or less advanced degree of visibility and solidity. . . .

"It is not the body which produces life; it is rather life which organizes the body. . . .

"As to beings different from ourselves—what may their nature be? Of this we cannot form any idea. Souls of the dead? This is very far from being demonstrated. The innumerable observations which I have collected during more than forty years all prove to me the contrary. No satisfactory identification has been made.

"The communications obtained have always seemed to proceed from the mentality of the group, or, when they are heterogeneous, from spirits of an incomprehensible nature. The being evoked soon vanishes when one insists on pushing him to the wall and having the heart out of his mystery. . . .

"That souls survive the destruction of the body I have not the shadow of a doubt. But that they manifest themselves by the processes employed in séances the experimental method has not yet given us absolute proof. I add that this hypothesis is not at all likely. If the souls of the dead are about us, upon our planet, the invisible population would increase at the rate of 100,000 a day, about 36 millions a year, 3 billions 620 millions in a century, 36 billions in ten centuries, etc.—unless we admit re-incarnations upon the earth itself.

"How many times do apparitions or manifestations occur? When illusions, auto-suggestions, hallucinations are eliminated what remains? Scarcely anything. Such an exceptional rarity as this pleads against the reality of apparitions."

As the years passed Flammarion was forced to surrender his old stand. His trilogy La Mort et son mystère (Death and Its Mystery), its three volumes subtitled Before Death, At the Moment of Death, and After Death (1921–23), aims mainly at demonstrating the continuity of existence. His Les maisons hantées (Haunted Houses) (1924) discusses the activities of the dead under exceptional circumstances. In his presidential address before the Society for Psychical Research in October 1923, he summed up his conclusions after 60 years of psychical research: "There are unknown faculties in man belonging to the spirit, there is such a thing as the double, thought can leave an image behind, psychical currents traverse the atmosphere, we live in the midst of an invisible world, the faculties of the soul survive the disaggregation of the corporeal organism, there are haunted houses, exceptionally and rarely the dead do manifest, there can be no doubt that such manifestations occur, telepathy exists just as much between the dead and the living as between the living."

Flammarion died at Juvisy Observatory, Paris, on June 3, 1925. His return was soon claimed by Spiritualists, the most notable account being published in Egoland (1932), by Emily Loweman, through the mediumship of her father, A. H. Loweman, a shopkeeper and the postmaster of Little Glemham. "Egoland" was Flammarion's name for the spirit world.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

De Fontenay, Guillaume. Apropos d'Eusapia Palladino. Paris, 1898.

Flammarion, Camille. Death and Its Mystery: After Death. New York: Century, 1923.

———. Death and Its Mystery: At the Moment of Death. New York: Century, 1922.

———. Death and Its Mystery: Before Death. New York: Century, 1921.

———. Haunted Houses. Detroit: Tower Books, 1971.

———. "The Unknown of Yesterday and the Truth of Tomorrow." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 29 (1935).

Loweman, Emily. Egoland. London, 1932.

Flat Earth Research Society International

Organization founded in 1800. Members were individuals whose outlook was zetetic, or characterized by a seeking for truth and the denial of "imaginary" theories. They relied only on provable knowledge and consequently believed that the "spinning ball" theory regarding Earth was absurd and that, in reality, the Earth was flat and infinite in size. Members maintained that Australia was not under the world; Australians did not hang by their feet, nor did ships sail over the edge of the world to get there. They also asserted that continental drift was really the result of the earth and water being "shaken asunder by God."

The society gathered information, disseminated the results of its findings, and sought to "push forth the frontiers of knowledge in geophysical matters."

The society conducted research programs, confered a Seeker for Truth Award, and published the Flat Earth News. Last known address: Box 2533, Lancaster, CA 93539.

Sources:

Larsen, David. "Society Flatly Denies Global Theory." Los Angeles Times, May 15, 1978.

Fleming, Alice Kipling (1868–1948)

Sister of British author Rudyard Kipling who became a well-known psychic, producing automatic writing under the name "Mrs. Holland." Born June 11, 1868, Alice Kipling was privately educated. She went to India at age 16 and married British army officer John Fleming.

While in India she wrote a number of poems, and in 1893 initially experimented with automatic writing. After a long illness she returned to England in 1902 and in the following year read the classic study Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death, by F. W. H. Myers. As a result she contacted the secretary of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, regarding her own automatic writing.

She took part in the SPR's cross-correspondence tests, in which several automatic writers produced scripts that only became meaningful when combined. Her contribution was described in several papers by Alice Johnson in the Proceedings of the SPR (1908–09).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Johnson, Alice. "On the Automatic Writing of Mrs. Holland." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 21 (1908).

———. "Second Report on Mrs. Holland's Script." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 24 (1910).

———. "Supplementary Notes on Mrs. Holland's Scripts." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 22 (1909).

———. "Third Report on Mrs. Holland's Scripts." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 25 (1911).

Saltmarsh, H. F. Evidence of Personal Survival from Cross Correspondences. London: G. Bell & Son, 1938.

Fletcher, John William (1852–1913)

American clairvoyant and trance medium. His mother possessed the gift of second sight. As a boy he was a puzzle to his teachers; instead of the lesson he would recite a paper presented to him in a vision. When barely 17 he was known and sought out as a trance speaker.

As a young man he married Susie Willis, who was a clairvoyant and had been a public lecturer since age 15. In 1873 both embarked on professional mediumship at the Lake Pleasant camp meeting. Fletcher's control was an Indian girl, "Winona," and some of her sitters claimed to have seen her materialized.

In 1877 Fletcher visited London. Because of the Henry Slade trial, American mediums were not popular there at the time. At James Burns's Spiritual Institution he was coldly received. Although The Spiritualist newspaper never ceased to attack him, Fletcher continued his tour and gave test sittings at the house of Agnes Guppy-Volckman, at the British National Association of Spiritualists, and at the Dalston Association. In Cavendish Rooms and in Steinway Hall he delivered many platform addresses on the religion and philosophy of Spiritualism and instituted Sunday class meetings on the plan of the Children's Lyceums of America.

In 1881 the Fletchers were overtaken by disaster. Mrs. Fletcher was sentenced to 12 months' hard labor for obtaining, by undue influence, the property of Mrs. Hart Davies. Her defense was that she was sheltering the woman, who appealed to her for refuge and protection, and only reluctantly consented to take charge of her property as long as Davies desired it, since she and her husband were paying Davies's expenses while she stayed in their home. At the time of his wife's trial Fletcher was addressing an audience of three thousand in Boston. He never went back to England, fearing the same fate that befell his wife.

In his later years Fletcher practiced as a palmist in New York. In June 1913 the police made a sudden raid with a warrant for his arrest. He collapsed and died from heart failure.

Sources:

Gay, Susan E. John William Fletcher, Clairvoyant. London, 1883.

Marryat, Florence. There is No Death. New York: John W. Lovell, 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Flew, Antony G(arrard) N(ewton) (1923–)

British author, humanist, and professor of philosophy who has written widely on parapsychological subjects. Flew was born February 11, 1923, in London. He became a lecturer at Christ Church College, Oxford, England, and at the University of Aberdeen, Scotland. In 1954 he became a professor of philosophy at the University of Keele, Staffordshire, England. He was a distinguished research fellow at the Social Philosophy and Policy Center, Bowling Green State University; a professor emeritus of the University of Reading, in England; and a visiting teacher and lecturer at several universities around the world. Flew is a humanist-rationalist and is known internationally as a skeptic regarding paranormal claims. Over the years he has contributed many articles on philosophy and parapsychology, especially on issues of personal survival, to various journals, including the Cambridge Journal, the British Journal of Sociology, the Philosophical Quarterly, New Biology, and the Rationalist Annual, and contributed articles for several anthologies.

His many books include A New Approach to Psychical Research (1953), his main text touching on the paranormal; Hume's Philosophy of Belief (1961); God and Philosophy (1966); Evolutionary Ethics (1967); An Introduction to Western Philosophy (1971); Crime or Disease? (1973); Thinking About Thinking (1975; reissued as Thinking Straight, 1977); The Presumption of Atheism (1976); Sociology, Equality, and Education (1976); The Warren-Flew Debate (1977); A Rational Animal (1978); Philosophy: An Introduction (1979); The Politics of Procrustes (1981); and The Logic of Mortality (1987). He also edited the 1964 book Body, Mind and Death.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Flew, Antony G. N., ed. Body, Mind and Death. New York: Macmillan, 1964.

———. "Is There a Case for Disembodied Spirit?" Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 66 (1972).

———. The Logic of Mortality. Oxford: Blackwell, 1987.

———. A New Approach to Psychical Research. London: C. A. Watts, 1953.

Ludwig, J. K., ed. Philosophy and Parapsychology. Buffalo, N.Y.: Promethus Books, 1978.

Flint, Leslie (ca. 1911–1994)

Noted British medium who specialized in independent direct voice communications (i.e., voice phenomena purported to be from dead individuals that originate a little above the medium's head and to one side, without the use of his or her vocal cords). In some 35 years of mediumship, Leslie Flint was tested by a number of psychical researchers using electrical devices, but nothing of a fraudulent nature was discovered. William R. Bennett, professor of electrical engineering at Columbia University, New York, tested Flint in 1970 and stated, "My experience with Mr. Flint is first hand; I have heard the independent voices. Furthermore, modern investigation techniques not available in earlier tests corroborate. . . . that the voices are not his."

Bennett also discounted the possibility of accomplices. In a few instances Flint conveyed messages from living individuals who were either in a coma or deep sleep at the time. Flint, a dedicated Spiritualist, places emphasis on providing evidence of survival after death.

During the 1940s Flint had several private sittings with film star Mae West when she visited London. He also visited her in Hollywood during his short American tour in 1949. He retired from public séance work in 1976. The next year he was named "Spiritualist of the Year" by readers of the British newspaper Psychic News.

Sources:

Flint, Leslie. Voices in the Dark. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971.

Flournoy, Theodore (1854–1920)

Professor of psychology at the University of Geneva, Switzerland, and a noted psychical researcher. Flournoy was born August 15, 1854, and studied at the University of Strasbourg Medical School. From 1891 to 1919 he taught physiological psychology, experimental psychology, and the philosophy of science at the University of Geneva. He published many important works on medicine and psychology, including Des Phénomènes de Synapsie (Phenomena of Synapsis) (1893), Les Principes de la psychologie religieuse (1903), and Le Genie religieux (1904).

He became interested in mediumship, which led to his writing one of the more famous books in psychical research, Des Indes à la Planète Mars (1900), translated as From India to the Planet Mars in 1901. This was the sensation of the year, and the passage of time has in no way affected its unusual scientific worth or mitigated its absorbing interest. The book deals with the mediumship of Hélène Smith, to whose circle Flournoy was first admitted in the winter of 1894–95. It was published at a time when the work of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, and information on the mediumship of Lenora Piper had prepared a large part of the public for scientific revelation regarding another life.

Flournoy's book, written with erudition and a vivid sense of humor and irony, questioned many Spiritualistic beliefs and threw great doubt on the ascertainability of the extramundane existence of the entities that appear to communicate through mediums. He admitted many puzzling phenomena in the history of Smith's mediumship, however. He found the Hindu reincarnation remarkably real, and he could not offer an explanation for the medium's knowledge of remote historical incidents and traces of the Sanskrit language.

The arguments he advanced to prove that the communicators were subconscious impersonations were most impressive. He saw no reason to surrender this attitude in his subsequent Nouvelles Observations sur un cas de Somnambulisme (Geneva, 1902).

The reality of other psychic phenomena, such as telekinesis, telepathy, and clairvoyance, he did not doubt. He became convinced of telekinesis through his experiences with Eusapia Palladino and he found sufficient proof of telepathy in the research of the SPR.

Flournoy investigated the question of apparitions of the dying and the dead as early as 1898 by addressing a questionnaire to the members of the Societé des Études Psychiques and others concerning their personal experiences. He received 72 replies and published his conclusions in February 1899 in the Revue philosophique. Because he did not accept the narratives at their face value he was accused of suppressing evidence.

Feeling honor-bound to publish the correspondence in full, he included it in a later work, Esprits et Médiums, Mélanges de Métapsychique et de Psychologie (Paris, 1911), translated into English in an abridgment under the title Spiritism and Psychology in the same year. It is a book of reference and contains a detailed exposition of his conclusions regarding psychical research and survival. Flournoy believed in the survival of the soul but not in experimental communications with the dead. He referred briefly to Lenora Piper's mediumship and the evidence of cross-correspondence but was hesitant in offering telepathy as an explanation.

Flournoy died November 5, 1920.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Flournoy, Theodore. Esprits et Médiums, Mélanges de Métapsychique et de Psychologie. Geneva: Libraire Kundig, 1911. Translated by Hereward Carrington and abridged as Spiritism and Psychology. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1911.

———. Des Indes à la Planète Mars. 1900. Translated as From India to the Planet Mars. New York: Harper, 1901.

———. The Philosophy of William James. Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1969.

LeClair, R. C. The Letters of William James and Theodore Flournoy. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966.

Flower, Amanda Cameron (1863–1940)

Amanda Cameron Flower was a medium and the founder of the Independent Spiritualist Association of the United States of America. She was born October 15, 1863, at Owen Sound, Ontario, and at the age of 27 moved to the United States. She was attracted to Spiritualism as a young woman and became a medium with the National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC), the oldest of several Spiritualist churches in the United States. Her first pastorate was located in Owosso, Michigan. Around the turn of the century, with money given her by her husband, she built the Church of Truth in Grand Rapids, Michigan. It was incorporated in 1908 as the Spiritualist Temple Society (Church of Truth) in Grand Rapids.

Flower proved a popular medium and contributed greatly to the growth of the movement in Michigan and throughout the Midwest. However, in the 1920s she began to bristle under some of the NSAC rules, especially those that prevented her from speaking or doing mediumship work in congregations not associated with the NSAC. She had also absorbed some elements of Theosophy into her thinking, including a belief in reincarnation, an idea actively opposed by the NSAC. In 1924 she had a vision of a new association of churches bound together in a loose fellowship. She withdrew from the NSAC and founded the Independent Spiritualist Association of the United States of America. The association grew rapidly through several states of the Midwest. She founded and edited the association's newsletter. In 1931 she was elected president for life. She died November 20, 1940.

Sources:

Corey, Kathleen. Rev. Amanda C. Flower. Holly, Mich.: The Author, n.d.

Judah, J. Stillson. The History and Philosophy of the Metaphysical Movement in America. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1967.

Flower Essences

During the New Age Movement of the 1970s and 1980s, many discovered aromatherapy, the fragrant essences of certain plants that are believed to assist the healing process and the opening to spiritual awareness. So in like measure, many discovered the healing powers of flower extracts, substances first isolated by British homeopathic physician Edward Bach (1886–1936) in the 1920s. During his early years at the Homeopathic Hospital in London, Bach's observation of a patient he was asked to diagnose led him to believe that there were 12 basic personality types. Each personality type was distinguished by a common set of moods, states of mind, and underlying weaknesses. He began a search to find substances that could treat these personality peculiarities that ultimately allowed disease to exist.

He discovered the first of these remedies in 1929. He next developed the process of extracting from the plant its healing substance and doing it in such a way as to enhance its properties. He went on to isolate 11 additional plant essences, all like the first located in flowering plants. His discoveries were introduced to the world in a 1931 text, Heal Thyself. Having found the 12 basic substances, he turned his search to additional essences that could help people with specific problems. Through the 1930s, 26 such essences were isolated. Periodically as a set of new discoveries was made, he published a new edition of his book, the last appearing in 1936 as the Twelve Healers and Other Remedies: A Simple Herbal Treatment. He died shortly thereafter and his remedies were largely unnoticed through the war years. His work was carried on by several close associates who worked out of his home, which had been transformed into the Dr. Edward Bach Healing Center.

The idea of flower essences was rediscovered in the 1960s by an American herbalist, Leslie J. Kaslof, who created an American affiliate to the Bach Centre and is largely responsible for making flower essences known in North America. Through the 1970s the Bach remedies were integrated into the larger holistic health movement. Among those influenced by Kaslof was Richard Katz, who began to experiment on a set of uniquely California flowers from which he extracted an additional set of remedies. In 1979, he founded the Flower Essence Society to publicize the new remedies.

The spread of the message of the Flower Essence Society suggested that flowers from a number of different locations could be the source of equally potent remedies, and through the 1980s and 1990s, other enterprises such as Alaskan Flower Remedies and Pegasus Products (Colorado) were founded. Second, the original observation of Bach that there were 12 personality types was suggestive of a possible correlation between flower remedies and astrology. In fact, astrologers, such as Donna Cunningham, discovered such to be the case, and through the 1990s various astrologers found them a meaning supplement to their work.

Cynthia Kemp, an astrologer, founded Desert Alchemy to provide specific lower remedies related to specific events noted in a chart. Another astrologer, John Stowe, founded Earthfriends to produce both flower remedies and aromatherapy products. As astrological remedies, flower essences have enjoyed a heretofore unprecedented popularity.

Sources:

Bach, Edward. The Twelve Healers and Other Remedies: A Simple Herbal Treatment. 3rd ed. London: C. E. W. Daniel, 1936.

Chancellor, Philip M. Handbook of the Bach Flower Remedies. New Canaan, Conn.: Keats Health Books, 1980.

Cunningham, Donna. Flower Remedies Handbook. New York: Sterling Products, 1992.

Fludd (or Flud), Robert (1574–1637)

English Rosicrucian and alchemist who was born at Milgate House, in the parish of Bearsted, Kent, England. His father was Sir Thomas Fludd, a knight who enjoyed the patronage of Queen Elizabeth and served her for several years as "treasurer of war in the low countries."

At age 17 Robert entered St. John's College, Oxford. Five years later he took his bachelor of arts degree. Soon afterward he decided to take up medical science and left England to study on the Continent, visiting France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, supporting himself as a teacher. Upon returning home his alma mater, Oxford, conferred on him the degrees of bachelor of medicine and doctor of medicine; five years later, in 1609, he became a fellow of the College of Physicians.

Having prepared himself thoroughly for the medical profession, Fludd went to London and took a house in Fenchurch Street. He soon gained an extensive practice, his success attributable not merely to his genuine skill but also to his having an attractive and even magnetic personality. Although he kept busy with his medical practice, Fludd found time to write at length on medicine. He also became an important and influential member of the Fraternity of the Rosy Cross and began experiments in alchemy. He preached the great efficacy of the magnet, of sympathetic cures, of the weapon salve, and declared his belief in the philosophers' stone, the universal alkahest or solvent, and the elixir vitae.

As a writer, Fludd represented a school of medical mystics, which laid claim to the possession of the key to universal sciences. Fludd maintained that all things were animated by two principles: condensation, the boreal, or northern virtue; and rarefaction, the austral, or southern virtue. He asserted that the human body was controlled by a number of demons, that each disease had its peculiar demon, and each demon his particular place in the frame of humanity, and that to conquer a disease—say, in the right leg—one must call in the aid of the demon who ruled the left, always proceeding by this rule of contraries. As soon as the doctrines of the Rosicrucians were promulgated in the early seventeenth century Fludd embraced them with eagerness, and when several German writers attacked them he published a defense in 1616, under the title Apologia Compendiaria Fraternitatem de Rosea-Cruce Suspicionis et Infamiæ Maculis Aspersam Abluens, which procured him a widespread reputation as one of the apostles of the new fraternity.

Fludd met with the usual fate of prophets and was lustily denounced by a host of critics, including Pierre Gassendi and Johann Kepler. Fludd retorted in an elaborate treatise, Summum Bonum, quod est Magiæ, Cabalæ, Alchimiæ, Fratrum Roseæ-Crucis Verorum, et adversus Mersenium Calumniatorem. At a later period he made an adventurous attempt to identify the doctrines of the Rosicrucians with what he called the "philosophy of Moses" in his new volume, Philosophia Mosaica, in quâ sapientia et scientia Creationis explicantur (1638), and wrote numerous treatises on alchemy and medical science. His Philosophia Mosaica is notable for a discussion of the relationship between a rod and the mineral and vegetable world (i.e., the divining rod or dowsing rod). He also founded an English school for Rosicrucians.

Fludd was one of the high priests of the magnetic philosophy and learnedly expounded the laws of austral medicine, the doctrines of sympathies, and the fine powers and marvelous effects of the magnet. According to his theory, when two men approach each other their magnetism is either active or passive, that is, positive or negative. If the emanations that they send out are broken or thrown back, there arises antipathy, or magnetismus negativus; when the emanations pass through each other, positive magnetism is produced, for the magnetic rays proceed from the center to the circumference. Humans, like the earth, have their poles, or two main streams of magnetic influence, according to Fludd's theory. Like a miniature world, humans are endowed with a magnetic virtue that is subjected to the same laws as those of the universe. How these principles could be developed in the cure or prevention of disease is described at length in Fludd's books.

Fludd died September 8, 1637, at a house in Coleman St., London, to which he had moved a few years before. Before his death he had won a fairly wide reputation founded on his chemical ability and had also written a number of books that contributed to the establishment of Rosicrucianism in Europe.

Sources:

The Dictionary of National Biography. London: Oxford University Press, 1953.

Fludd, Robert. Medicina Catholica. Frankfurt: William Fitzer, 1629.

———. Monochordum Mundi Symphoniacum. Frankfurt, 1622.

———. Philosophia Mosaica, in quâ sapientia et scientia Creationis explicantur. Gouda: Peter Rammazen, 1638. Translated as Mosaicall Philosophy. London: Humphrey Moseley, 1659.

———. Tractatus Apologeticus integritatem Societatis de Rosae Cruce defendans. Leiden: Gottfried Basson, 1617.

———. Veritatis Proscenium. Frankfurt: Johann Theodore de Bry, 1621.

Godwin, Joscelyn. Robert Fludd: Hermetic Philosopher and Surveyor of Two Worlds. Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1979.

Fluid Motor

A simple device invented by the Count de Tromelin, described in his book Les Mysteres de l'Univers (ca. 1908). It was supposed to demonstrate the existence of human energy emanations analagous to the subtle "fluid" of animal magnetism. It was composed of a paper cylinder about two inches in diameter, open at each end and crossed diametrically at its upper part by a piece of straw. A needle was stuck through the middle with the point resting on the bottom of a small, inverted porcelain or glass jar. The paper cylinder was suspended outside and concentric with the inverted jar, the point of the needle acting as a pivot and enabling it to turn easily under the slightest impulse.

Count de Tromelin claimed that if the right hand was placed behind this apparatus it would turn counterclockwise. If the left hand was placed behind, it would turn in the other direction. W. Warcollier, writing in the Annals of Psychical Science (August–September 1908), observes that this motion has nothing to do with the polarity of the two hands. The left hand produces the same effect as the right in the same position, writes Warcollier; moreover the heat of the hand is sufficient to create an air current that is capable of producing the rotation.

A more satisfactory instrument of this kind was invented by Paul Joire and was known as a sthenometer. (See also biometer of Baraduc; magnetometer)

Flute, Charm of the

The flute is often mentioned in history as being used for the purpose of charming animals, and serpents were said to have been peculiarly delighted with its music. It was claimed that adders would swell at the sound of the flute, raising themselves up, twisting about, and keeping proper time. An early Spanish writer stated that in India he had often seen people leading enchanted serpents, making them dance to the sound of a flute, putting them around their necks, and touching them without harm, and to this day a musical instrument of this nature is used by the snake charmers of that country.

However, it is now known that serpents cannot hear music, but instead are captivated by the swaying movements of the snake charmer, although some have suggested it is possible that snakes somehow perceive musical vibrations.

The Flying Dutchman

Sailors in Holland long believed that a Dutch skipper named van Straaten was condemned as a penalty for his sins to sail for year after year through the seas around the Cape of Storms (an early name for the Cape of Good Hope). Crews returning to the Zudyer Zee (the northern coast of the Netherlands) after voyaging in this region used to declare that they had seen van Straaten's mysterious craft and fled from it in terror. The legend is a very old one, although its exact date is not known. The story is found in Dutch, German, and other folklore.

Several German versions call the ill-fated seaman von Falkenberg and maintain that it was not near South Africa but in the North Sea that his spectral ship commonly hovered. Others contend further that the devil paid periodic visits to the captain on board his ship and frequently the two were seen playing dice on deck, the stakes being von Falkenberg's soul.

The tale soon found its way from folklore into actual literature; among the greatest of writers utilizing it was Heinrich Heine. In his rendering the sailor has a chance of salvation; that is, the fates allow him to walk on land again once every seven years. If during his brief period of respite he contrives to win the affection of a pure maiden, liberation from perennial sea-wandering will be granted him as reward.

Heine's form of the story appealed greatly to the composer Richard Wagner, who always regarded women devoutly as a regenerating force, and the great composer based his opera Der Fliegende Holländer on Heine's version. It is set in the North Sea, and the sailor is called van Derdecken; the maiden to whom he makes advances is Senta. This opera was first staged at Dresden in 1843, and although it did not win speedy appreciation, it became popular in the course of time. The novelist Frederick Marryat also wrote his story The Phantom Ship (1839) on the subject of the Flying Dutchman.

During the nineteenth century, there were reliable reports of sightings of the Flying Dutchman. An English ship's log of 1835 stated that the captain and ship's crew saw the vessel bearing down on them "with all sails set" during a heavy gale. Another entry in the log of the Bacchante in 1881 reported that the Flying Dutchman crossed their bows, glowing with a strange red light before suddenly disappearing into a clear, calm night. Thirteen persons saw the phantom vessel, and two other ships in the vicinity reported seeing a strange red light. (See also sea phantoms and superstitions)

Sources:

Basset, W. Wanderships. Chicago, 1917.

Jal, A. Scènes de la vie maritime. Paris, 1830.

Rappoport, Angelo S. Superstitions of Sailors. London, 1928. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: Gryphon Books, 1971.

Flying Saucer Chronicle

Publication formerly issued ten times per year, connected with the investigations of the United Aerial Phenomena Agency, reporting UFO sightings in the United States and elsewhere.

Flying Saucer News

Journal concerned with flying saucers and UFOs, published for many years by Flying Saucer News Company in New York City.

Flying Saucer Review

Quarterly British publication on UFOs. The Flying Saucer Review was founded in 1955 in London by Derek Dempster, a former Royal Air Force pilot. Under the editorship of Brinsley le Poer Trench (1956–59) it developed a reputation as an uncritical periodical, but during the tenure of Charles Bowen it became one of the most influential journals serving the UFO community. Bowen retired because of illness in 1982 and was succeeded by Gordon Creighton. Creighton, influenced by various conspiracy theories, has aliented many in the UFO establishment who no longer consider the Flying Saucer Review a serious UFO organ. Address: The Editor, FSR Publications Ltd., P.O. Box 162, High Wycombe, Bucks., HP13 5DZ, England. Website: http://www.fsreview.net/.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Flying Saucers

Popular term for Unidentified Flying Objects or UFOs. The terms flying saucer and UFO were used somewhat synonymously in the 1950s, but the former term was eventually adopted by those who claimed to have positive evidence that what others called UFOs were in fact extraterrestrial crafts. The term originated from a report by Kenneth Arnold, whose 1947 sightings of UFOs near Mt. Rainier in Washington began the modern UFO era.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Flying Saucers International

Former quarterly publication of the Amalgamated Flying Saucer Clubs of America. It was published from 1962 to 1969.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Fodor, Nandor (1895–1964)

Prominent psychoanalyst and psychical researcher. Fodor was born May 13, 1895, at Beregszasz, Hungary. He studied law and took his LL.D. degree at the Royal Hungarian University of Science in 1917 and served as a law assistant during World War I (1917–21). From 1921 to 1928, he worked as a journalist and in 1921 visited the United States as a staff reporter on the New York Hungarian language daily Amerikai Magyar Nepszava. His chance discovery of a book on psychic phenomena by researcher Hereward Carrington led to an interview with Carrington and a meeting with veteran Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. Fodor's interest was aroused and he began to correspond with Carrington.

In 1926 Fodor interviewed Sandor Ferenczi, prominent psychoanalyst and associate of Freud, and became interested in psychoanalysis. Later Fodor was to integrate three professions as journalist, psychoanalyst, and psychical researcher.

He was employed as a secretary by British press magnate Lord Rothermere in 1929. During this period in England, Fodor was able to compile his monumental Encyclopaedia of Psychic Science. Fodor also became assistant editor of the Light, the oldest British Spiritualist journal. He was also appointed research officer of the International Institute for Psychical Research and undertook careful investigations into mediumistic transfiguration, apports, direct voice, levitation, hauntings, materializations, and poltergeist phenomena.

Fodor lectured extensively on such subjects and wrote a number of books and articles. In 1938 he was responsible for a number of highly skeptical newspaper articles on mediumship and Spiritualism, which aroused a good deal of opposition from Spiritualists. Soon afterward Fodor returned to the United States, where he renewed his friendship with Hereward Carrington and practiced as a psychoanalyst. He took a profound interest in the psychological aspects of mediumship and published a number of important studies on the subject. He also advocated a more open methodology in studying mediumship as opposed to the attempts to control the environment of the séance room with ropes and other devices then used by investigators.

During his lifetime Fodor was an honorary member of the Danish Society for Psychical Research and the Hungarian Metaphysical Society, a member of the New York Academy of Science, the American Psychological Association, and the New York State Psychological Association. He wrote a number of books and contributed more than 70 articles to various psychoanalytic, neurological, and psychiatric journals. He died May 17, 1964.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Fodor, Nandor. Between Two Worlds. New York: Paperback Library, 1964.

———. Encyclopedia of Psychic Science. London: Arthurs Press, 1934.

———. The Haunted Mind: A Psychoanalyst Looks at the Supernatural. New York: Garrett Publications, 1959.

———. New Approaches to Dream Interpretation. New York, 1951. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1951.

———. On the Trail of the Poltergeist. New York: Citadel Press, 1958.

———. These Mysterious People. London: Rider, 1936.

———. The Unaccountable. New York: Award Books, 1968.

Fodor, Nandor, and Hereward Carrington. Haunted People. New York: Dutton, 1951.

———. The Story of the Poltergeist down the Centuries. London: Rider, 1953.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

FOG Newsletter

Former bimonthly newsletter of the International Society for the Investigation of Ghosts. FOG is an acronym for "Friends of Ghosts." The society may be contacted at P.O. Box 5011, Salinas, CA 93901.

Fohat

In Theosophy, a term for the primal life force or power of the Logos. It was adapted from the Tibetan in the writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky.

Folklore Frontiers

British quarterly publication concerned with new frontiers of urban belief stories, tall tales, and folklore, including Fortean phenomena, Earth mysteries, and modern shamanism. Last known address: 6 Egton Dr., Seaton Carew, Hartlepool, Cleveland, TS25 2AT, England.

Folklore Society

Pioneer British scholarly society for the study of oral traditions and cultures, founded in 1878. The term folklore was coined by the antiquary W. J. Thomas (1803–1885) to denote old-world manners, customs, and popular superstitions. The Folklore Society has as its objectives to promote research into and recording of popular traditions, legendary ballads, local proverbial sayings, superstitions, and old customs, both British and foreign, as well as other related subjects. Over the years many distinguished scholars have been associated with the society, including Max Müller, E. B. Tylor, and Andrew Lang. In 1912 Sir William Crookes, famous for his research in Spiritualism, was president of the society.

The society publishes a biannual journal, Folklore (founded as Folk-Lore Record in 1878), a newsletter, and various books and pamphlets on various aspects of folklore. Address: University College, Gower St., London, WC1E 6BT, England.

Fongities

According to ancient belief this was a gem said to assuage anger.

Fontaine, Jean de la (or John Fontaine) (ca. 1413)

Flemish alchemist and poet who lived at Valenciennes toward the close of the thirteenth century. Two books are ascribed to him, La Fontaine des Amoureux de Science and La Fontaine Perilleuse, both of which were written in French and published in Paris, the first in 1561 and the second in 1572.

Fontaine's claims to the authorship of the latter work have frequently been disputed, but the former is almost certainly his, and is a curious production. At the outset the author professes himself an expert in hermetic philosophy, and thereafter he proceeds, in poetry of an allegorical style that recalls The Roman of the Rose, to describe the different processes involved in achieving a transmutation. There is little in this metrical treatise that indicates that the writer was an alchemist of any great ability, but he certainly possessed a distinct gift for writing pleasant verse.

Sources:

Fontaine, Jean de la. La Fontaine des Amoureux de Science. Paris, 1561.

———. La Fontaine Perilleuse. Paris, 1572.

Fontenettes, Charles

Author of a Dissertation sur une fille de Grenoble, qui depuis quatre ans ne boit ni ne mange (1737). This prodigy was commonly attributed to the devil, but Fontenettes explains that it was due to a less sinister cause.

Ford, Arthur A(ugustus) (1896–1971)

American Spiritualist medium and founder of the International General Assembly of Spiritualists. Ford was born January 8, 1896, at Titusville, Florida. As a youth he followed a pilgrimage that took him from Episcopalianism to the Baptists to Unitarianism and finally to the Disciples of Christ. He attended Transylvania College, a Disciples of Christ school in Lexington, Kentucky. Ordained as a Disciples minister, he served a church in Barbourbville, Kentucky.

Ford realized his psychic abilities during World War I. While in the army he would "hear" the names of people he served with, and those names would appear on the casualty lists several days later. In the years after the war he investigated psychic phenomena and eventually joined the Spiritualists. Around 1921 Ford emerged as a trance medium, and "Fletcher," his control for the rest of his life, made his first appearance in trance sessions. He developed a popular following and in 1927 traveled to Great Britain. One of his lectures was attended by veteran Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who enthusiastically told people the next day, "One of the most amazing things I have ever seen in 41 years of psychic experience was the demonstration of Arthur Ford."

Ford founded a congregation in New York City, but soon experienced conflict with the National Spiritualist Association, the main Spiritualist organization of the time. Ford had come to believe in reincarnation, a belief the association rejected. After many years of tension, in 1936 Ford led in the founding of the General Assembly, which had a more open perspective on reincarnation.

Ford achieved fame far beyond the Spiritualist community in 1928 by allegedly breaking the secret code between the late Houdini and his wife Beatrice. Houdini had arranged with his wife that if he died before she did he would attempt to communicate through a secret code known only to them. Arthur Ford is credited with revealing that code through his control, "Fletcher."

As a result of a tragic auto accident in 1931, in which his sister died, Ford was severely injured and became addicted first to morphine and then to alcohol. In his autobiography Nothing So Strange (1958) he states that it took him 20 years and much suffering to overcome his addiction. (In fact, he never overcame his addiction and suffered from alcoholism until the end of his life.)

In spite of his affliction he impressed numerous people with his abilities, including prominent researchers William McDougall and William G. Roll, Jr. of the Psychical Research Foundation. He also traveled widely to demonstrate his mediumship and in Britain visited the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies. In 1955 Ford was active in the formation of a similar organization in the United States, the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship, now the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship.

In 1967 Ford again came into public prominence during a television discussion on life after death, when he went into a trance and delivered several messages to Episcopal bishop James Pike. One claimed to be from Pike's son and another from the prominent theologian Paul Tillich. Duly impressed, Pike later publicly affirmed his belief in the reality of psychic phenomena in his book The Other Side (1968). The television program also revived public interest in Spiritualism and psychic phenomena, and within a month Ford received more than 12,000 letters. It was only after Ford's death that Allen Spraggett and William Rauscher, while compiling materials for his biography, discovered his notes for the session among his papers, revealing the fact that he faked the famous séance.

Ford died in Miami, Florida, January 4, 1971. Shortly after his death, Ruth Montgomery claimed to have received messages from Ford, which were later published in her book A World Beyond (1971).

The most decisive incident in evaluating Ford's mediumship seems to be his relationship to the Houdini code. The evidence for the authenticity of the code message from the deceased Houdini received through Ford's mediumship is contradictory. The message itself involved a secret code that was supposed to have been known only to Houdini and his wife. The stage magician Dunninger, however, claimed that the code had been published earlier.

The testimony of Houdini's widow is contradictory. She was said to have told a reporter that she did not know what the message would be, although she later wrote an impassioned private letter to columnist Walter Winchell stating emphatically that the message received from Ford was definitely the one agreed upon with Houdini and that she had not previously revealed it to Ford. She insisted it was not a fraud, as some had claimed.

However, New York Graphic reporter Rea Jaure, in a story headlined "Houdini Message A Big Hoax!" (January 10, 1929) stated that Ford had come to her apartment for an interview and admitted that Mrs. Houdini had supplied the code to him. Jaure produced two witnesses who confirmed her story with sworn statements. Ford's attorney produced three witnesses who affirmed that Ford had been elsewhere at the time of the claimed interview. An anonymous man stated that he had been paid to impersonate the medium.

Sources:

Christopher, Milbourne. Mediums, Mystics & The Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.

Ford, Arthur. The Life Beyond Death. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1971.

———. Nothing So Strange. New York: Harper, 1958.

———. Spiritual Vibrations. New York: H.P.B. Publishers, 1926.

———. Unknown But Known. New York: Harper, 1968.

———. Why We Survive. Cooksburg, N.Y.: 1952.

Montgomery, Ruth. A World Beyond. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1971.

Spraggett, Allen, with William V. Rauscher. Arthur Ford, The Man Who Talked with the Dead. New York: New American Library, 1973.

Tribbe, Frank, ed. An Arthur Ford Anthology: Writing By and About America's Sensitive of the Century. Nevada City, Calif.: Blue Dolphin, 1999.

Forman, Simon (1552–1611)

Simon Forman, a late sixteenth-century magical practitioner, was born on December 30, 1552, at Quidhampton, Wiltshire, England. He received a grammar school education and at some point mastered Latin. At the age of 37 he moved to London and took up the practice of astrology, magic, and medicine. In the context of the times, though without any credentials, he was a success as a doctor and accumulated some degree of wealth.

Forman followed many of the common medical practices of his day, such as bleeding, but avoided some of the more egregious. He used his astrological skills to diagnose conditions and prescribe treatment. But possibly the most important attribute demonstrated by Forman was his willingness to stay in London and care for patients during times of plague outbreaks.

Forman, a contemporary of John Dee, the more famous of the Elizabethan magicians, had a passion for magic, and his papers included magical texts, most notably an introductory text for the summoning of spirits. It also appears that he practiced some of the lesser forms of traditional magic, namely the practice of supplying clients with vials of poison, the knowledge of which was quite consistent with his medical training.

The most famous incident in Forman's life actually consisted of a series of events that concluded only some years after his death. The young and beautiful daughter of the Earl of Suffolk was in despair over being forced to marry the Earl of Essex. She turned to Forman, who supplied her with a potion that rendered the earl impotent and thus unable to consummate the marriage. After her marriage was annulled, she turned her attention to the Earl of Somerset, and to assist in getting his attention she had Forman make her some waxed figures that became the focus of some image magic. In the midst of this working, Forman died (1611). His magic was successful, however, and in 1613, the young lady became the wife of the Earl of Somerset.

During her courtship, she became aware that Sir Thomas Overbury was trying to reach her future husband and warn him of her machinations. Before he could reach Somerset, however, he was arrested on an unrelated matter. The future wife decided to eliminate her problem and turned to Forman's student, Anne Turner, also skilled in the art of poison. When she was successful, accusations led to her arrest and that of the earl and his wife. Tried in 1616, they were found guilty. Turner was executed. King James pardoned the earl and his wife. While the pair were able to return to their home, Forman's nefarious activities became public and have since set his image for the pages of history.

Sources:

Rowse, A. L. The Case Books of Simon Forman. London: Picador, 1976.

Turner, Robert. Elizabethan Magic. Longmead, Dorset, UK: Element Books, 1989.

Formative Causation

A bold theory concerned with the origin and growth of form and characteristics in nature. This theory was proposed by biochemist and plant researcher Rupert Sheldrake in his book A New Science of Life: The Hypothesis of Formative Causation.

For many years, embryologists have used the general term morphogenetic fields to indicate the mysterious factors that influence the development of growth and characteristics in plants and animals. The term is derived from the Greek morphe (form) and genesis (coming into being) and is usually assumed to embrace a complex of inherited characteristics programmed in DNA molecules. Sheldrake's theory, however, proposes a literal interpretation of morphogenetic fields as structures independent of time and space. All the past fields of a given type are available instantly to, or coexist with, subsequent similar systems.

The genes only define parameters within which development takes place and do not determine the future form of the organism. The fertilization of a seed or egg, says Sheldrake, is a "morphogenetic germ" for development that is influenced by "previous systems of which structures similar to these morphogenetic germs were a part. [It] thus becomes surrounded by, or embedded within, the morphogenetic field of the higher-level system [i.e., the cell is influenced by the tittuse-field, the tissue by the organ-field], which then shapes or moulds the process of development towards the characteristic form."

Sheldrake calls the influence of one morphogenetic field upon another "morphic resonance," involving a new kind of action at a distance, independent of space and time. This influence does not appear to be electromagnetic and may involve some as yet undiscovered method of action, a theory that clearly has relevance to such parapsychological phenomena as telepathy and clairvoyance.

Sheldrake's theory applies to crystals as well as to animals and plants. If a new organic compound is crystallized the shape may be merely a matter of chance. Once crystallization has taken place, however, it establishes a morphogenetic field affecting all subsequent crystallizations of that substance, influencing them to take the same form. Successive crystallizations reinforce the field, facilitating future formation of a particular crystal shape. In the same way, future developments of animal or plant species are affected by the establishment of morphogenetic fields in the past. In simplest outline the theory suggests that it is easier to learn something because others have learned it before.

Although Sheldrake does not discuss the implications for parapsychology in detail in his book, his references make it clear that since morphogenetic fields are claimed as independent of space and time they could also act as channels for transmission of information, and are thus related to telepathy and clairvoyance.

The theory had an astonishingly hostile reception by the editors of the journal Nature (September 1981):

"What is to be made of Dr. Rupert Sheldrake's book. . . . This infuriating tract has been widely hailed by the newspapers and popular science magazines as the 'answer' to materialistic science, and is now well on its way to being a point of reference for the motley crew of creationists, anti-reductionists, neo-Lamarckians and the rest. The author, by training a biochemist and by demonstration a knowledgeable man, is, however, misguided. His book is the best candidate for burning there has been for many years. In reality, Sheldrake's argument is in no sense a scientific argument but is an exercise in pseudoscience. Preposterously, he claims that his hypothesis can be tested . . . and the text includes half a dozen proposals for experiments that might be carried out to verify that the forms of aggregations of matter are indeed moulded by the hypothetical morphogenetic fields that are supposed to pervade everything. These experiments have in common the attributes of being time-consuming, inconclusive in the sense that it will always be possible to postulate yet another morphogenetic field to account for some awkwardly inconclusive result, and impractical in the sense that no self-respecting grant-making agency will take the proposals seriously. . . . His book should not be burned (nor even confined to closed shelves in libraries) but, rather, put firmly in its place among the literature of intellectual aberrations."

In correspondence in subsequent issues of Nature, however, readers deplored this "emotional outburst." Clearly the suggestion that experiments should not be undertaken to test a theory because they would be "time-consuming" or "inconclusive" seemed thoroughly unscientific, they wrote, since many scientific theories that appeared at first sight to be "preposterous" were validated by later experiments.

A thoughtful discussion of Sheldrake's theory is a comprehensive article by R. J. M. Rickard in Fortean Times (Spring 1982), which printed a detailed interview and discussion with Sheldrake himself at the home of John Mitchell.

Sources:

Sheldrake, Rupert. A New Science of Life: The Hypothesis of Formative Causation. London: Blond & Briggs, 1981.

———. The Presence of the Past: Morphic Resonance and the Habits of Nature. New York: Vintage Books, 1989.

Forrest, Stephen (1949–)

Stephen Forrest is an astrologer best known for his work on the somewhat abstract symbology of astrology and the application of the different symbols to an individual's personal life. His exposition of astrological symbols was spelled out in a series of articles and three books, The Changing Sky (1984), The Inner Sky (1986), and Skymates (1989). The latter study focused on male-female relationships.

Forrest was born in Mount Vernon, New York, on January 6, 1949. He attended the University of North Carolina, from which he earned a B.A. in religious studies (1971). He began his career as a professional astrologer soon after his graduation and became known for his interest in the inner life of the individual and the use of astrology for enhancing the exploration of the psyche. He became a popular lecturer throughout North America and his articles began to appear in astrological periodicals. The thrust of his work supported the trend within the astrological community to integrate psychological and astrological insights.

Forrest countered his concern for the inner life with an added emphasis on technical precision in the production of astrological charts, a problem now largely solved with the development of numerous computer programs. He composed "The Sky Within" report written for Matrix Software (a major producer of astrological programs for computers) and has continued to work for Matrix.

In 1985, Professional Astrologers Incorporated gave Forrest its annual Award for Outstanding Contribution to the Art and Science of Astrology. In the mid-1990s Forrest turned his attention to the continual challenge to the viability of astrology from the contemporary scholarly establishment and made the intellectual defense of contemporary astrology the subject of his fourth book, The Night Speaks. He currently serves as the chairperson of the board of advisors of the Kepler College of Astrological Arts and Sciences, a projected four-year college whose curriculum will be based upon astrological premises.

Sources:

Forrest, Stephen. The Changing Sky. San Diego: Astro Computer Services, 1984, 1989.

———. The Inner Sky. San Diego: Astro Computing Services, 1986, 1989.

———. The Night Speaks. San Diego: A C S Publications, 1992.

———, and Jodie Forrest. Skymates. San Diego: Astro Computer Services, 1989, 1992.

Fort, Charles (Hoy) (1874–1932)

American journalist, writer, and explorer of scientific anomalies. He was the archenemy of dogmatic science. Fort was born on August 9, 1874, in Albany, New York. As a boy he wanted to be a naturalist. Instead he became a journalist at age 17. Two years later he decided to see the world and spent two years traveling, from New York to New Orleans, Nova Scotia, England, Scotland, Wales, and South Africa. His vast store of travel impressions over 30,000 miles laid the foundation for his later preoccupation with accumulating and analyzing data.

Back in New York he married an English woman named Anna Filing on October 26, 1896. They lived in poverty while Fort took various nondescript jobs and worked on his writing. He sold feature stories to the New York press, then began to write humorous short stories. He also started a number of large-scale novels, only one of which was ever published, The Outcast Manufacturers (1909). He read widely, took thousands of notes on a myriad of subjects that he discovered in encyclopedias and scientific materials while frequenting the New York Public Library, trying to hammer out a personal philosophy. He decided that science consisted of believers and cranks, and out of his skepticism he said whimsically that he would be a crank.

In 1916 Fort inherited a share of his grandfather's estate, and the following year, after his brother's death, he inherited that share. Freed from the financial problems that had dominated his adult life, he was able to devote his time to what had become a growing obsession: to explain the unexplained. He had collected many notes on odd phenomena that had been reported but remained outside the explanation of science as it existed in his day, such as flying saucers and spontaneous human combustion. With the help of his friend novelist Theodore Dreiser, Fort was able to publish the result of his early research called, The Book of the Damned (1919). The "damned" were the data rejected or explained away by mainstream science. He relentlessly chronicled strange falls from the sky, mysterious disappearances and reappearances, strange synchronicities, enigmatic artifacts, and astronomical ambiguities.

When the book was first published in 1919 it attracted favorable comments from Booth Tarkington, John Cooper Powys, Ben Hecht, and other notable persons. It was followed by New Lands (1923), Lo! (1931), and Wild Talents (1932). By the time the last book was published Fort's health was failing. He died on May 3, 1932. His wife died five years later.

Shortly before Fort's death Tiffany Thayer organized the Fortean Society to promote the study of his books and continue the work of gathering "Fortean data." Thayer urged the one-volume reprinting of Fort's books a decade later and wrote the introduction to The Books of Charles Fort (1941). After Thayer's death in 1959 the society essentially ceased to exist, but a new group, the International Fortean Organization, was founded in 1965.

Charles Fort was the first individual to gather and make a systematic study of many unusual physical phenomena. He studied UFOs long before the modern UFO era, which began in 1947. He called attention to many unusual phenomena and the extent of their occurrence. Among many topics now studied as "Fortean phenomena" are falls of frogs, stones, blood, or ice from the sky, mysterious fires, stigmata, invisible assassins, UFOs, poltergeists, ancient technologies, levitation, teleportation, monsters, fireballs, meteors, and ancient artifacts. Until Fort began to write, no one realized how many strange events were occurring and how weak "scientific" explanations of them were. In the years since, many of the mysteries he addressed have been examined and brought into the body of scientific knowledge. Many remain unexplained, however, and new ones are continually being added to the list.

Sources:

Fort, Charles. The Complete Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941. Reprint, New York: Dover, 1974.

———. The Outcast Manufacturers. B. W. Dodge, 1909. Gross, Loren E. Charles Fort, the Fortean Society, and Unidentified Flying Objects. Fremont, Calif.: The Author, 1976.

Knight, Damon. Charles Fort, Prophet of the Unexplained. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

The Fortean News (Journal)

A British journal devoted to "Fortean data," i.e., strange phenomena, curiosities, prodigies, portents, coincidences, and mysteries in the spirit of the late Charles Fort, who first correlated and studied such things. Originally issued as The News beginning in November 1973, the name was changed to The Fortean News with issue 16 in June 1976. It is both published and edited by Robert J. M. Rickard. Last known address: 96 Mansfield Rd., London NW3 2HX, United Kingdom. (See also INFO)

Fortean Society

Founded by author Tiffany Thayer to honor Charles Fort, chronicler of the unexplained, promote the study of his books, preserve his notes and papers, and continue the work of collecting "Fortean data." Founded January 26, 1931, the society was the forerunner of organizations studing unidentified flying objects and other bizarre phenomena. The first issue of the Fortean Society Magazine appeared in September 1937. With the eleventh issue (Winter 1944–45) the title was changed to Doubt, emphasizing Fort's characteristic preoccupation with healthy skepticism toward dogma. Thayer died in 1959 and the society languished. Doubt owed much to Thayer's indefatigable enthusiasm, and issue no. 61 was the last.

Although the society was never officially dissolved, its work was superseded by INFO, the International Fortean Organization, headed by Paul and Ron Willis, which publishes INFO Journal (P.O. Box 367, Arlington, VA 22210-0367). A related journal of Fortean curiosities is the Fortean Times (originally The News), published by Robert J. M. Rickard and Paul Sieveking. A one-act play, The Great Caper, dealing with Fortean mysteries, was written by Ken Campbell and produced at the Royal Court Theatre, London, in October 1974.

Sources:

Fort, Charles. The Complete Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941. Reprint, New York: Dover, 1974.

Fortean Times

British journal devoted to "Fortean data," (i.e., strange phenomena, curiosities, prodigies, portents, mysteries) in the spirit of the late Charles Fort. It was founded in November 1973 and originally titled The News. The name change dates from issue no. 16 (June 1976). The journal is published by Robert J. M. Rickard and Paul Sieveking. Rickard has compiled several books from data assembled for the magazine. Address: The New Boathouse, 136-142 Bramley Rd., London W1O 6SR, England. Website: http://www.forteantimes.com/.

Sources:

Fortean Times. http://www.forteantimes.com/. April 25, 2000.

Michell, John, and Robert J. M. Rickard. Phenomena: A Book of Miracles. London: Thames and Hudson, 1977. Reprint, New York: Pantheon Books, 1977.

Rickard, Robert J. M., and Richard Kelly. Photographs of the Unknown. London: Book Club Associates, 1980.

Forteana

Quarterly publication (in Danish language) of the Scandinavian Fortean Organization (SCANFO), concerned with reports of unusual phenomena (e.g., UFO sightings, apparitions). Last known address: Classensgade 17-A-4TH, DK-2100, Copenhagen, Denmark.

Forthuny, Pascal (1872–1962)

Pseudonym of Georges Cochet, French author, musician, poet, painter, art critic, and possessor of remarkable powers of psychometry. The loss of a son in an aviation accident at the end of World War I induced Forthuny to take an interest in table sittings. The result was not strictly evidential, yet it had a soothing effect on the grieving father. Then in July 1921, while engaged in ordinary writing, his hand was seized by what appeared to be an extraneous power. Strokes and loops were followed by mirror writing and scripts, delivered at an extreme speed, full of high thoughts and affection, which he believed emanated from the spirit of his son.

Soon, however, claimed Forthuny, the influence gave way to an obsessive entity that demanded entire command over his life, representing itself as having a mandate from Christ and driving Forthuny to strange acts. By an effort of will Forthuny regained his self-control; but when banished, the obsessive entity predicted that Forthuny would lose his mediumship.

Forthuny's phenomenon of automatic writing did disappear in about six months, but more important gifts took its place. During a visit to the Institut Métapsychique in 1922 Forthuny picked up an envelope containing an autograph of Landru, the Bluebeard murderer, which Gustav Geley had prepared for another psychic, and gave an accurate description of the cottage at Gambais where Landru committed his crimes.

Mrs. Geley then picked up a fan and asked jokingly, "Where does this fan come from?" Forthuny answered, "I feel as though I were choking and I hear Elisa by my side." The fan had belonged to an old lady named Elisa who died of congestion of the lungs.

Eugèn Osty's Supernormal Faculties in Man (1923) and Charles Richet's Our Sixth Sense (1929) deal extensively with Forthuny's powers, which were tested in many experiments at the institute. For instance, walking among 50 unknown persons Forthuny addressed each as he felt inspired and disclosed amazingly accurate facts about their lives.

He was actually stimulated by a large audience. He did not go into trance nor call himself a medium, was ignorant of the machinery through which he got his supernormal knowledge, and preserved a remarkable spirit of criticism in his moments of intuition. He was sensitive to hostile attitudes, but they only made him more convinced of the exactness of his vision and induced him to publicly denounce the hostility. He did not "fish" for information nor ask leading questions but wanted to be stopped if he ran off the subject, since, he said, he often experienced the blending of two influences. Generally he "heard" the names, at other times he saw colored pictures or written names.

In April 1924 he was appointed general secretary of the Union Spirite Française and gave regular clairvoyant sittings at the Maison des Spirites, Paris. On one occasion he visited Geley and, very much moved, told him that he had just had a vision of an airplane crash in Poland in which a physician was killed. Forthuny insisted that his vision be recorded at the institute. He said he did not know who the physician was—possibly a "Voronoff" but he was not sure. On July 14 of the same year Geley was killed in an airplane crash near Warsaw.

In 1919 Forthuny paid a visit to the Society for Psychical Research (SPR). V. J. Woolley concludes in his report (Proceedings of the SPR, vol. 39) that "we are driven to assume that his knowledge comes from some supernormal faculty, and it seems reasonable to suppose that this faculty consists mainly in a supernormal knowledge of what is in the minds of people present with him, whether we call such knowledge telepathic or clairvoyant."

The archskeptic Harry Price met Forthuny in Paris in 1927 and was impressed by his "remarkable psychic powers." Price became friendly with Forthuny, whom he described as a "fine clairvoyant."

Fortune, Dion

Pseudonym of Violet M. Firth (1890–1946), the prominent British occultist and author who founded the Fraternity of the Inner Light.

Fortune-Telling

Fortune-telling in Britain was formerly included under the crime of witchcraft and was made punishable by death under the Statute of 1563. This act was repealed by George II (1683–1760), who ordained that no prosecution should thereafter be made on a charge of witchcraft and that all persons professing to occult skill or undertaking to tell fortunes might be sentenced to imprisonment for one year, made to stand pillory, and pledge future good behavior.

Punishment by pillory was later abolished. Under George IV (1762–1830) fortune-tellers were included along with other vagrants under the general category of "rogues and vagabonds" and were liable to imprisonment for three months. This provision was made applicable to Scotland also and provided that "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes or using any subtle craft, means, or device, by palmistry or otherwise to deceive, and impose on any of His Majesty's Subjects" would be deemed a vagabond and rogue and be punished accordingly.

The first case to be prosecuted under this law was the Smith case. A woman named Jone Lee Smith was charged in the police court at Glasgow with a violation of the enactment. She was convicted of the violation and drew a suspension. The court overturned the conviction, on the grounds that the complaint was irrelevant in that it did not set forth that the accused had pretended to tell fortunes with intent to deceive anyone. Lord Young, one of the judges, said,

"It has never been imagined, so far as I have ever heard, or thought, that writing, publishing, or selling books on the lines of the hand, or even on astrology—the position of the stars at birth and the rules upon which astrologers proceed in telling fortunes therefrom. I say that I have never heard of publishing, or selling such books is an offence, or that reading such books, and telling fortunes therefrom is an offence. Roguery and knavery might be committed that way, but it would be a special case. I am not in any way suggesting that a spae wife or anyone else may not through that means commit knavery and deception, and so be liable to punishment."

It thus appears that fortune-telling was of itself no offense unless accompanied by fraud. While it might be an offense for the palmist or fortune-teller to knowingly accept payment from a foolish or ignorant person, it could hardly be said that the ordinary person who consulted and then paid a professional fortune-teller or crystal gazer should feel imposed upon if the character delineations were faulty or the forecast inaccurate.

British Spiritualists continued to be harassed under the Vagrancy Act of 1824 throughout the first half of the twentieth century. Psychical research might be quite respectable, but until as recently as 1951 a medium could be prosecuted under sections of the Witchcraft Act of 1735 and the Vagrancy Act of 1824. In a 1921 case a judge stated, "I cannot reverse the decision on the claim that the intention to deceive was not necessarily to be proved. The act of fortune-telling is an offence in itself."

Perhaps the most deplorable type of prosecution was that in which undercover agents were employed by the police to obtain evidence. Disguised policewomen posing as bereaved parents would approach a medium, begging for some consolatory message. A small sum of money would be proffered as a "love offering," and if this was accepted the medium could be prosecuted—often for as little as the equivalent of a 25-cent "donation" to the Spiritualist church. Unsympathetic magistrates, convinced that all Spiritualists were frauds, often imposed a fine, or a sentence of up to three months' imprisonment.

As late as 1944 the medium Helen Duncan was prosecuted for "pretending to communicate with spirits." Duncan was found guilty and served a sentence of nine months' imprisonment. After her release she resumed mediumistic activities and in October 1956 was seized by police at a séance in Nottingham. She became ill and died five weeks later. This case stimulated efforts by Spiritualists to get the old punitive legislation repealed, since it could theoretically make any séance illegal.

In 1951 the old witchcraft and vagrancy legislation was finally repealed by the new Fraudulent Mediums Act, which, although not wholly satisfactory, at least implicitly acknowledged that there might be genuine mediumship. In New York comparable outdated legislation had been amended in 1929 to exempt ministers and mediums of Spiritualist associations acting in good faith without personal fees.

The dropping of the old witchcraft law had a second, and unplanned, effect: the revival of a new form of witchcraft. Following the repeal of the anti-witchcraft legislation, Gerald Gardner published several books announcing the continued existence of witchcraft followers in England.

Sources:

Gardner, Gerald. Witchcraft Today. London: Rider, 1954.

The Forum Newsletter

Publication concerned with the relatively new field of thanatology, emphasizing information on various alternative approaches to death and dying. Published by the Association for Death Education and Counseling at 342 N. Main St., West Hartford, CT 06117-2507. Website: http://www.adec.org/.

Sources:

Association for Death Education and Counseling. http://www.adec.org/. March 22, 2000.

Forwald, Haakon Gabriel (1897–1978)

Scandinavian electrical engineer, inventor, and parapsychologist. Born August 21, 1897, at Mandal, Norway, Forwald was educated at the Technical College of Oslo. From 1918 to 1923 he was a pilot with the Norwegian Naval Air Force. In 1925 he received his B.A. from the Technische Hochschule, Danzig, and later studied at the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology, Zurich, and the Royal Institute of Technology, Stockholm. He worked as a consulting engineer and held many patents for his engineering and electrical work.

In 1950 he began experimenting in the field of parapsychology, particularly psychokinesis. In 1957 he was a research fellow at Duke University and in 1959 a research fellow at the University of Pittsburgh. He was given the William McDougall Award for Distinguished Work in Parapsychology for his paper (with J. G. Pratt) on "Confirmation of the PK Placement Effect" (1958).

Forwald became a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and wrote a number of articles on parapsychology. In 1969 he contributed Mind, Matter and Gravitation: A Theoretical & Experimental Study to the Parapsychology Foundation monograph series. In this paper he discusses his experiments in psychokinesis and states that they "led to the recognition of mathematical structures which are the same in PK-forces as those observed in physics. The findings suggest that PK-forces are of a gravitational kind, and that they originate from a mental influence on atomic nuclei in the material which is used in the moveable bodies in the experiments." He died September 16, 1978, at Ludvika, Sweden.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Forwald, Haakon G. "An Approach to Instrumental Investigation of Psychokinesis." Journal of Parapsychology (1954).

———. "Experiments with Alternating PK Placement and Control Tests." Journal of Parapsychology (1955).

———. "A Further Study of the PK Placement Effect." Journal of Parapsychology 16 (1952).

———. Mind, Matter and Gravitation. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

———. "A Study of Psychokinesis in its Relation to Physical Conditions." Journal of Parapsychology 19 (1955).

Forwald, Haakon G., and Joseph G. Pratt. "Confirmation of the PK Placement Effect." Journal of Parapsychology 22 (March 1958).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Foster, Charles H. (1838–1888)

American medium who had a controversial career. The claim put forward in The Salem Seer (1891) by his enthusiastic biographer, George C. Bartlett, that he was the greatest spiritual medium since Emanuel Swedenborg seems somewhat exaggerated, and whatever powers he possessed he probably magnified through fraud.

Foster was born in Salem, Massachusetts, and educated at a public school there. According to Bartlett, the first indications of his mediumship were noticed at age 14. During school hours raps were heard on his desk. At night he was awakened by violent noises and the furniture was tossed about in his room. Some time later the phenomena began to occur in daylight, and furniture was heard moving about in rooms where no one was present. Skin writing (see dermography) and pellet reading were the special features of his mediumship. Both were subjects of lively discussion and controversy.

According to an amusing story told in his biography, Foster was once rudely seized by the arm when skin writing was produced. Two men asked for a test in plain sight. While they were holding him, in large round characters the words "Two Fools" appeared on the medium's arm. In such skin writing the letters were blood-red and, as a rule, displayed the name of the communicating spirit. They appeared mostly on Foster's forearm.

In pellet reading the usual procedure was to ask the sitters to write the names of their deceased relatives on slips of paper while the medium was out of the room, roll them up, and put as many blank pellets as they liked together with them in a heap on the table. On his return the names on the slips were spelled out by raps, and Foster picked out the writing, delivered trance addresses, and gave clairvoyant and clairaudient descriptions of spirits. He claimed that Virgil, Camoens, Cervantes, and many other illustrious entities were among his communicators.

In 1861 Foster visited England and while there materialization phenomena were added to his performances. His first séance was given in the house of William Wilkinson, the editor of Spiritual magazine. He became friendly with the Master of Lyt- ton, with whom he stayed at Knebworth. The literary elite—Charles Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Robert Chambers, and William Howitt—came to him for sittings. John Ashburner, an authority on animal magnetism and Spiritualism, recorded unusual phenomena. He saw nine materialized hands floating over the dining table and witnessed a levitation of the medium and of the piano on which he was playing.

In January 1862, at the invitation of Thomas P. Barkas, Foster gave four séances in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. At each of these, ten persons participated. Their names were kept in a private book and withheld from the medium. With these 40 people the errors in the communications, according to Barkas, did not exceed three percent, and these usually happened during some trifling confusion or controversy.

Nevertheless, Barkas had the impression that, although Foster was a genuine medium, he occasionally, perhaps frequently, heightened the effects by trickery and deception. In support of this surmise, Barkas points out, in his Outlines of Ten Years Investigations into the Phenomena of Modern Spiritualism (1862), that the names of the departed spirits were written by the medium according to the spelling on the pellets, which was sometimes wrong; the communications were extraordinarily similar; his rapid entrancement and sudden relief were more likely to be apparent than real; and the writing, whether obtained directly or automatically, always resembled the normal writing of the medium.

Sentiment eventually turned against Foster. In 1863 Spiritual magazine stated that the editor had received from a Judge Edmonds such "sickening details of his criminality in another direction that we should no longer soil our pages with his mediumship." Foster simply left England for the Continent. He went to Paris, appeared before Napoleon III, toured Australia, and finally returned to New York.

Epes Sargent records convincing personal experiences in pellet reading with Foster in Planchette, or the Despair of Science (1869). On the other hand, John W. Truesdell, in The Bottom Facts Concerning the Science of Spiritualism (1883), tells of an exposure in 1872 in New York. Foster palmed the pellets and read them by continually relighting his cigar, the match being held in the hollow of his hand.

The case of Charles Foster well illustrates the difficulty of assessing the phenomena of psychic people. It seems likely that Foster was often guilty of fraud, particularly in such phenomena as pellet reading, which is peculiarly amenable to simple magic tricks. On the other hand there is strong testimony of some genuine mediumistic insights.

Foster was a convivial character who enjoyed drinking alcohol and smoking long cigars in barrooms with his companions as much as he did transmitting messages from the dead. His biographer, Bartlett, summarizes his observations of Foster thus: "He was extravagantly dual. He was not only Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, but he represented half-a-dozen different Jekylls and Hydes. . . . He was an unbalanced genius, and at times, I should say, insane. . . . He wore out many of his friends. He seemed impervious to the opinions of others, and apparently yielded to every desire."

Some of Foster's strangest phenomena, like skin writing, appear to have been involuntary. During Foster's tour of England in 1861 Dr. John Ashburner was called to Foster's bedside by one of his companions, who stated that Foster was near death. Ashburner found him in a drunken stupor, following a night of unrestrained drinking with friends. After Ashburner examined the medium, then in a drunken torpor, an extraordinary phenomenon occurred, as Ashburner narrates in his book Philosophy of Animal Magnetism and Spiritualism (1867):

"Suddenly the bedclothes were tightly rolled downwards as far as his groin. The shirt was then rolled tightly, like a cord, exposing to our view the skin of the chest and abdomen. Soon there appeared in large red letters raised on the surface the word 'DEVELOPMENT,' which extended from the right groin to the left shoulder, dividing the surface into two triangular compartments. These were filled up with sprigs of flowers, resembling fleur-de-lys. The phenomenon lasted nearly ten minutes, when the shirt and bedclothes were unrolled gently and replaced as they were at first."

In his later years Foster became addicted to alcohol. In 1881, at age 48, he was taken to Danvers Insane Asylum, suffering, according to reports, from advanced alcoholism and softening of the brain. For the last four years of his life he apparently lived a vegetable existence under the care of an aunt, simply staring into space most of the time.

A few days after his death the equally controversial psychic Kate Fox was practicing automatic writing with her friend Mrs. Taylor and found her hand galvanized into frantic, incoherent messages that were signed "Charles Foster, medium."

Sources:

Ashburner, John. Philosophy of Animal Magnetism and Spiritualism. London, 1867.

Bartlett, George C. The Salem Seer. New York, 1891.

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1970.

Truesdell, John W. The Bottom Facts Concerning the Science of Spiritualism. New York: G. W. Carleton, 1883.

Foster, Esther Bond (1913–1963)

American school psychologist who worked at the Duke University Parapsychology Laboratory and wrote several papers published in the Journal of Parapsychology. Foster was born March 16, 1913, at Apalachicola, Florida. She studied at Florida State College for Women, Tallahassee (B.S., 1932; M.S., 1933). After her graduation she worked as a secondary school teacher at Sarasota, Florida (1933–38), and as an assistant psychologist at the Department of Veterans Affairs, Ottawa, Canada, (1945–46). In 1948 she became a research assistant at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke, where she remained for the next eight years. She died March 1, 1963.

Sources:

Foster, Esther B. "General Extrasensory Perception with a Group of Fourth and Fifth Grade Retarded Children." Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1937).

———. "A Re-examination of Dr. Soal's Clairvoyance Data." Journal of Parapsychology 20 (1956).

Foster, Esther B., and Karlis Osis. "Multiple Aspect Targets in Tests of ESP." Journal of Parapsychology 16 (1952).

———. "A Test of ESP in Cats." Journal of Parapsychology 17 (1953).

Foster, Esther B., and J. G. Pratt. "Displacement in ESP Card Tests in Relation to Hits and Misses." Journal of Parapsychology 14 (1950).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Foundation Church of the Divine Truth, Inc.

The Foundation Church of the Divine Truth, Inc. is one of two organizations that emerged out of the organizational chaos that beset the Foundation Church of the New Birth beginning in 1982. In that year, the sole surviving trustee of the church, Rev. John Paul Gibson, died. Leadership passed to Victor Summers. Since its founding, the headquarters and most of the leadership of the church had been in Washington, D.C. However, in 1983 Summers moved first to San Diego, California, and then to Lake Helen, Florida. He then resigned from all church offices and disbanded the church.

Members in the Washington, D.C., area who did not accept Summers's actions reorganized as the New Birth Christian Healing Sanctuary and were granted permission to receive the mail directed to the former church's postal mail box. Then in 1985 nine former members founded the Foundation Church of Divine Truth as the successor to the former Foundation Church of the New Birth.

The Foundation Church is based upon channeled messages believed to be from Jesus Christ, a selection of high celestial spirits, and other spirits received through James Edward Padgett (1852–1923). Padgett was a Methodist Sunday School teacher who had become interested in Spiritualism following the death of his wife in 1914. Advised to begin practicing automatic writing, he soon became adept at it. Shortly thereafter, he received a message, purportedly from Jesus Christ, telling him to pray for an inflowing of the Father's divine love. Padgett was told that he had been selected to disseminate the Father's truths to humankind.

Padgett channeled some 1,500 messages between 1914 and 1923. The manuscripts were left in the care of an associate, Leslie R. Stone. Stone saw to the publication in 1940 of a selection of the channeled material under the title True Gospel Revealed Anew by Jesus. Subsequently three other volumes, the last published in 1972, appeared. These four volumes are believed by church members to constitute Christ's second coming.

The message of the Padgett channelings flows from Spiritualism and affirms the continuity of the soul after death, and its life and continued growth in the spirit realm. The soul progresses through various realms to paradise (the sixth realm). Should it seek to be filled with the divine love of the Creator, it may then progress to the celestial heavens. In heaven it is conscious of its immortality and continues to receive inflowings of the divine essence of the Father. Jesus' mission on Earth was to make known the possibilities of divine love to all persons.

It has several hundred members in the United States, Canada, England, Nigeria, and Togo. It has published a new edition of Padgett's writings under the title Angelic Revelations of Divine Truth. A second group of followers of the Padgett teachings was organized in 1991 under the church's original name. Currently, the Foundation Church functions as a through-the-mail, nonprofit Christian Spiritualist foundation. It may be contacted at PO Box 66003, Washington, D.C. 20035-6003.

Sources:

Padgett, James E. True Gospel Revealed Anew by Jesus. 4 vols. Washington, D.C.: Foundation Church of the New Birth, 1958–72.

Foundation Church of the New Birth

The Foundation Church of the New Birth is one of two organizations that grew out of the turmoil among the followers of the revelations of channel James Edward Padgett (1852–1923). Beginning in 1914, Padgett received some 1,500 messages, believed to be from Jesus Christ and other spirit entities. These messages affirmed the immortality of the human spirit. Following Padgett's death, a close associate, Leslie R. Stone, took charge of the manuscripts. He saw to the publication of an initial volume drawn from the material in 1940. In 1958 the Foundation Church of the New Birth was incorporated in Washington, D.C. The small church was headed by a board of trustees. The last of those trustees, Rev. John Paul Gibson, died in 1982. Leadership passed to Victor Summers, but in 1983 Summers resigned all connection with the church and formally dissolved it.

Summers's actions were opposed by the majority of members. One group in Washington, D.C., moved to reorganize. They founded the New Birth Christian Healing Sanctuary and were eventually incorporated as the Foundation Church of the Divine Truth, under which name they continue to exist. A second group reorganized in 1991 using the original name, the Foundation Church of the New Birth. The church upholds the beliefs of the original body and disseminates the teachings of the Padgett revelations, contained in the four-volume set True Gospel Revealed Anew by Jesus.

The Foundation Church of the New Birth may be contacted at P.O. Box 996, Benjamin Franklin Sta., Washington, DC 20044. Website:http://www.divinelove.org.

Sources:

Padgett, James E. True Gospel Revealed Anew by Jesus. 4 vols. Washington, DC: Foundation Church of the New Birth, 1958–72.

Foundation Faith of God

The Foundation Faith of God was founded in 1974 by former members of the Process Church of the Final Judgment, including the great majority of the leadership. Many in the Process Church had become increasingly discouraged by the direction being taken by church founder Robert de Grimston. He had come to focus more and more on a dualist doctrine of the unity of Christ and Satan, and the church had been identified as a Satanist religion in the popular press. The leaders collectively withdrew, leaving the church an empty shell, and reorganized as the Foundation Church of the Millennium. They later changed names to the Foundation Faith of the Millennium (1977) and adopted the present name in 1980.

The Foundation Faith of God has a doctrine approaching orthodox Christianity and affirms a belief in the Christian Trinity, the deity of Christ, salvation from sin, and the necessity of a new birth. The church is strongly focused on endtime issues of the Second Coming of Christ and the coming kingdom of God. It has a healing ministry and many of the ministers offer spiritual (psychic) consultations. The church also maintains a strong social ministry.

Address: Faith Center, 3030 Palomino Ln., Las Vegas, NV 89107-4510.

Foundation for A Course in Miracles

The Foundation for A Course in Miracles is a study and retreat center established in 1982 by cofounders Kenneth Wapnick and his wife, Gloria Wapnick. Wapnick, a clinical psychologist, was a close friend and associate of Helen Schucman and William Tetford, the two people whose collaboration was the initial stimulus for the scribing of A Course in Miracles (ACIM). He first saw the manuscript of the Course in 1973 and worked with Dr. Helen Schucman, the person responsible for channeling the Course from an entity she believed to be Christ. He helped prepare the manuscript for publication and has sat on the executive board of the Foundation for Inner Peace, the corporation founded to publish and distribute the text. He became a full-time teacher of ACIM soon after it was published.

Wapnick was raised Jewish but turned agnostic. After reading the works of Thomas Merton, however, he had decided to convert to Catholicism and become a monk. He was on his way to Israel to move into a monastery when he met Helen Schucman. Gloria Wapnick is a former social studies instructor and high school dean of students who has been working with A Course in Miracles since 1977. Raised a Catholic, she drifted away from the religion. In 1977 she had a session with Pat Rodegast, the person who channels an entity named Emmanuel. Directed to Wainwright House, a seminar center in Rye, New York, she found herself in a class on the ACIM. She met Wapnick at a conference on the Course. They were married in 1981.

Founded to facilitate the Wapnicks' teaching work, by 1984 the Foundation for A Course in Miracles (FACIM) evolved into a teaching and healing center in Crompond, New York, which was quickly outgrown. In 1988 the Wapnicks opened the Academy and Retreat Center in upstate New York, and in 1995 began the Institute for Teaching Inner Peace through A Course in Miracles (ITIP-ACIM), an educational corporation chartered by the New York State Board of Regents. The institute operates under the aegis of the foundation, administering workshops and academy courses.

The Wapnicks had been inspired by Plato and saw the foundation as modeled on Plato's Academy, a place where people could study in an atmosphere conducive to learning, and then implement the acquired wisdom in their daily life. The foundation's Statement of Purpose is as follows:

> To foster spiritual development through the study and practice of A Course in Miracles, a set of three books channeled by Jesus, that teach that the way to remember God is by undoing guilt through forgiving others. The corporation has as its specific aims to teach the Course, helping those interested to integrate the Course's principles into their personal lives, that they may better realize their true identity, shared with all people, as children of God; to teach and train those who wish to teach the Course to others; to teach the Course's reinterpretation of traditional Christian principles such as sin, suffering, forgiveness, Atonement, and the meaning of the Crucifixion; to further understanding of the Course by means of educational and training programs, seminars, and publications.

The Foundation for A Course in Miracles is headquartered at 1275 Tennanah Lake Rd., Roscoe, NY 12776-5905. It publishes a periodical, The Lighthouse. The website for the foundation is at http://facim.org/.

Sources:

Wapnick, Kenneth. Absence from Felicity : The Story of Helen Schucman and Her Scribing A Course in Miracles. Roscoe, N.Y.: Foundation for A Course in Miracles, 1991.

———. Christian Psychology in A Course in Miracles. Roscoe, N.Y.: Foundation for A Course in Miracles, 1992.

———. The Fifty Miracle Principles of A Course in Miracles. Roscoe, N.Y.: Foundation for A Course in Miracles, 1992.

———. Forgiveness and Jesus: The Meeting Place of A Course in Miracles and Christianity. Roscoe, N.Y.: Foundation for A Course in Miracles, 1992.

Foundation for Inner Peace

The Foundation for Inner Peace, the corporation that assumed primary responsibility for the publishing and distribution of the very successful channeled work known as A Course in Miracles, was originally founded in 1972 by Judith Skutch and her husband, Robert Skutch, as the Foundation for ParaSensory Investigation, an organization to facilitate the Skutches' programming activities within the psychic community in New York City.

On May 29, 1975, Judith Skutch met Drs. Helen Schucman (1910–1981) and William Tetford (1923–1988). Schucman had been the channel and Tetford the transcriber for A Course in Miracles (ACIM). The material was believed to have come directly from Jesus Christ. The two had been joined in the endeavor by Kenneth Wapnick, who worked with Schucman in editing the text. The three let Skutch in on the secret they shared, and she soon became as enthused as they over the teachings of the Course. They met frequently over the next weeks and decided to publish the manuscript that existed in three segments—a text, a workbook for students, and a manual for teachers. Skutch offered her already existing corporation as the vehicle for the publishing activity. It was renamed the Foundation for Inner Peace. Schucman turned her copyright interest in the Course to the foundation and by the end of the summer the first edition was released as a reduced-size, softcover offset reproduction of the manuscript, some 300 copies. The following year a three-volume hardcover edition of 5,000 copies was published.

In 1978, Helen Schucman channeled a personal message of guidance from Jesus to the foundation that it was to extend its program by offering means to discuss the content of the Course. This additional activity was assigned primarily to Wapnick. He began his teaching work forthwith. He soon met his future wife, Gloria, and they were married in 1981. At the beginning of 1982, they founded the Foundation for A Course in Miracles to facilitate their teaching work.

Also in 1978, the decision was made to move the Foundation for Inner Peace to Tiburon, California (where psychologist Gerald Jampolsky, a significant supporter of the ACIM, had located his Center for Attitudinal Healing). The Wapnicks remained in New York, but relocated from the city to Roscoe, New York. The foundation expanded its publishing program, including two further works channeled by Schucman, Psychotherapy: Purpose, Process and Practice and The Song of Prayer, as well as a collection of her poems, The Gifts of God. They have also issued Course-related cassettes and videos. In 1982, the foundation established a translation program. The Spanish edition appeared in 1993. Subsequently Chinese, Dutch, German, Hebrew, Italian, Portuguese, and Russian editions have been published and work continues on Croatian, Czech, Danish, Finnish, Greek, Hungarian, Japanese, Norwegian, Polish, Slovene, and Swedish editions.

In New York in 1995, the foundation created an educational arm, the Institute for Teaching Inner Peace through A Course in Miracles.

The Foundation for Inner Peace is headquartered at P. O. Box 598, Mill Valley, CA 94942-0598. Its webpage may be found at http://www.acim.org/.

Sources:

A Course in Miracles. 3 vols. New York: Foundation for Inner Peace, 1975.

Koggend, John. "The Gospel According to Helen." Psychology Today 14 (September 1980): 74–78.

Miller, D. Patrick. The Complete Story of the Course: The History, the People and the Controversies Behind A Course in Miracles. Berkeley, Calif.: Fearless Books, 1997.

Skutch, Judith. "A Course in Miracles, the Untold Story." Parts 1 & 2. New Realities 4, no. 1, 2 (August, September/October 1984): 17–27; 8–15, 78.

Foundation for Mind-Being Research

A research facility established in 1980 to further consciousness studies and to bring this field into wider recognition as a bona fide science. Its interdisciplinary nature is reflected in the wide range of interests of the membership, including engineering, science, medicine, the humanities, and the arts. The foundation holds regular meetings and issues a newsletter. Address: 442 Knoll Dr., Los Altos, CA 94024. Website: http://www.epcomm.com/fmbr/.

Sources:

Foundation for Mind-Being Research Homepage. http://www.epcomm.com/fmbr/. March 8, 2000.

Foundation for Mind Research

Organization formed by the husband and wife team Robert E. L. Masters and Jean Houston in New York to conduct experiments on the border between mental and physical experience. Houston is a professor of psychology, and Masters is a poet and sexologist and the author of many books. Both have experimented with clinically controlled hallucinogenic drugs.

Masters and Houston also developed the ASCID (Altered States of Consciousness Induction Device), better known as "the witches' cradle." It was suggested by historical accounts of witches being suspended from tree branches in swinging bags.

Masters and Houston developed a metal swing in which the subject is secured blindfolded with ear baffles and swings in various directions. In this situation of sensory deprivation and confusing movement, the subject experiences enhanced fantasies and alteration in consciousness. A more primitive and dangerous form of this activity has long been called "dervish dangling" and has been reported to result in paranormal perception.

Sources:

Houston, Jean. Lifeforce: The Psycho-historical Recovery of the Self. New York: Delacorte Press, 1989.

Masters, Robert E. L., and Jean Houston. Mind Games. New York: Viking Press, 1972.

———. The Varieties of Psychedelic Experience. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966.

Foundation for Reincarnation and Spiritual Research

The Foundation for Reincarnation and Spiritual Research was founded in India in 1985 to focus empirical research on reincarnation. It aimed to follow up on the technique developed by American parapsychologist Ian Stevenson for in-depth investigation of cases suggestive of reincarnation, several volumes of which were published through the 1970s. The leading researcher connected with the foundation is Jamuna Prasad, its research adviser who through the 1960s and 1970s established an impressive record in studying life after death, especially in his cooperation with Karlis Osis of the American Society for Psychical Research in his study of deathbed experiences. Also integral to the program of the foundation was the attempt to discover correlated between the results of scientific research and the teachings of the ancient Hindu (Vedic and yogic) literature of India.

The foundation was a membership organization that drew most of its members from India but coordinated its research with that of other like organizations around the world. Last known address: 109 Rami Mundi, Allahabad 211003, Uttar Pradeshm, India.

Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man (FRNM) See Rhine Research Center

Founding Church of Scientology See Scientology, Church of Fountain of the World Fellowship See WFLK Fountain of the World

Fountain Spirits

According to German mystic Jakob Boehme (1575–1624) there were in nature seven active principles, the "Fountain Spirits" or "Mothers of Existence": the astringent quality, the sweet quality, the bitter quality, the quality of fire, the quality of love, the quality of sound, and the quality of essential substance. The reciprocal action of these antipathetic qualities resulted in supreme unity. Each was at once the parent and the child of all the rest, being generated and generating one another. They were typified by the seven golden candlesticks of Rev. 1:20.

Boehme's mystical visions are detailed in his books, notably Aurora, first published in 1612, translations of which have been reissued.

Sources:

Boehme, Jacob. The Life and Doctrines of Jacob Boehme. New York: McCoy Publishing, 1929.

Fourth Dimension

A "higher" form of space that mathematicians conceive as another direction from which a fourth line may be drawn at right angles to each of the three lines (mutually at right angles) that three-dimensional space permits to be drawn through any point in it. A highly speculative form of the theory that such a higher form of space exists has been employed in the attempt to solve certain questions concerning psychic phenomena.

For beings living on a flat surface, having no thickness, and possessing all their nerve endings on the periphery of their bodies, only two directions could exist. A circle drawn on their plane with chalk would be a closed space into which they could not penetrate except through a cut in it. Having no concept of a third dimension, they could not picture objects passing out of and into the circle if the objects did not pass through the cut.

From a third dimension, however, both the inside and outside of the circle are visible and accessible. Similarly, for beings living in a four-dimensional world, enclosed spaces would appear open. Persons could make objects mysteriously vanish in the direction of the fourth dimension and make them reappear again in an apparent transgression of the law of impenetrability.

A similar explanation is presented for apport phenomena, the reported materialization of an object in the midst of a séance. Johann Zöllner made the first attempt at the experimental demonstration of the fourth dimension in his sittings with the medium Henry Slade. Cesare Lombroso considered it an ingenious solution to many perplexing psychic problems. W. W. Carington, in A Theory of the Mechanism of Survival (1920), hypothesizes that after physical death the individual consciousness is embodied in a vehicle made not from physical matter, but from four-dimensional matter (i.e., that which in four-dimensional space corresponds to what we call matter in three-dimensional space). The connecting link between the physical body and the four-dimensional vehicle is the etheric double.

Clairvoyants who see the front, sides, back, and every internal point of three-dimensional objects simultaneously are thus believed to employ a four-dimensional organ of sight. Traveling and medical clairvoyance are better understood by using this hypothesis.

If the four-dimensional vehicle is so pliable that it is capable of being molded by the mere power of will, apparitions will find a ready explanation, provided the percipient is receptive to supernormal impressions. Another application is the phenomenon of prevision, bound up with the riddle of time. Its adoption as a working hypothesis has also been offered as a way to bridge the gap between religious and scientific thought.

Sources:

"A. Square" [E. A. Abbott]. Flatland: A Romance of Many Dimensions. 1884. 6th ed. New York: Dover Publications, 1953.

Hinton, C. H. The Fourth Dimension. London: G. Allen & Unwin, 1934.

———. Scientific Romances. London, 1886.

Rucker, Rudy von Bitter. The Fourth Dimension: Toward a Geometry of Higher Reality. Boston: Houghton-Mifflin, 1984.

Fourth Way

The system of mystic and occultist Georgei I. Gurdjieff (1872–1949), which he contrasted to the three traditional ways of mysticism—those of the fakir, the monk, and the yogi. Gurdjieff maintained that human beings are "asleep" (i.e., not living at full potential of awareness and performance). To develop greater awareness requires hard work in removing illusory or limited experience and awakening to higher reality, he said. This evolution can be assisted by special work involving a system of psychophysical exercises including movement, music, and dance. Gurdjieff's system was especially concerned with achieving evolution in everyday life, rather than retreating from society.

An early enthusiast for the work of Gurdjieff was the journalist Peter D. Ouspensky. Later disciples included Maurice Nicoll, J. G. Bennett, and Thane Walker, each of whom founded schools concerned with teachings stemming from the philosophy and methods of Gurdjieff. A leading group concerned with Gurdjieff work in the United States is the Gurdjieff Foundation of New York.

Traditional Gurdjieff schools carry on unobtrusively and avoid publicity. There is little centralized organization, and proselytizing attempts are low key. Prospective followers of the Fourth Way are usually expected to have studied books dealing with the life and thought of Gurdjieff.

Sources:

Bennett, J. G. Gurdjieff, A Very Great Enigma: Three Lectures. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

———. Gurdjieff: Making a New World. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.

De Hartmann, Thomas. Our Life with Gurdjieff. New York: Penguin, 1972. Rev. ed. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983.

Driscoll, J. Walter. Gurdjieff: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1985.

Gurdjieff, G. I. All and Everything. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1950. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1963.

———. Meetings With Remarkable Men. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1964.

———. Views From the Real World: Early Talks in Moscow, Essentuku, Tiflis, Berlin, London, Paris, New York, Chicago as Recollected by His Pupils. New York: Triangle Editions; London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1973.

Webb, James. The Harmonious Circle. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1980.

Fowler, Edward P. (ca. 1852– ?)

Principal medium of the New York Circle, established as the first Spiritualist organization in the summer of 1851. Fowler was a medical student, brother of a well-known phrenologist, and the first medium who produced direct writing in the United States. Suspicion of fraud was aroused, however, because a Hebrew text that he claimed to have received while asleep and alone in his room did not withstand the criticism of experts.

Much publicity was given to another script, "Peace, but not without freedom," similarly obtained in December 1951. It was signed by 56 spirits, including many of the original signatories of the Declaration of Independence, in their characteristic handwriting. The autographs are reproduced by Emma Hardinge Britten in her Modern American Spiritualism (1869). According to Britten, one Professor Bush desired to test the possibility of communicating in Hebrew through raps, called out the alphabet in that language, and received highly satisfactory answers.

Fowler's mediumship was the subject of a debate between S. B. Brittan, editor of the Shekinah, and B. W. Richmond. The case chiefly rested on the medium's own testimony and the internal evidence of his scripts.

Sources:

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Modern American Spiritualism. 1869. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1979.

Fowler, Lottie (1836–1899)

Professional name of Charlotte Connolly, American clairvoyant and medical diagnoser. While biographical details are scarce, Fowler attained brief fame during a trip to England in 1872. During this tour, in April 1872, she initially introduced Stainton Moses to Spiritualism. Florence Marryat often acted as transcriptionist for Fowler in taking down trance answers to letters as dictated by "Annie," her German guide. According to Marryat, Fowler was consulted by physicians of the court at the time of the Prince of Wales's dangerous illness, and from the beginning predicted his recovery.

It was through her mediumship that the body of the late Master of Lindsay of Balcarres, which had been stolen from the family vault, was eventually recovered. She predicted a London riot and the Tay Bridge disaster. Among her more unusual stories, in Medium and Daybreak (1872), is her claim that on February 17, 1872, she was paranormally transported from a bus near Oxford Circus, London, to an apartment in Bloomsbury, about three miles away.

Sources:

"Fritz." Where Are the Dead? London, 1873.

Hellenbach, Baron. Eine Philosophie des Gesunden Menschenverstandes. N.p., 1876.

Marryat, Florence. The Spirit World. London, 1894.

———. There is No Death. London, 1892. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Fox, George (1624–1691)

Mystic and founder of The Society of Friends (Quakers). In his Journal (1694), one of the great religious autobiographies, he testifies to many extraordinary psychic experiences. In the 1920s Walter Prince cited him as one of the "noted witnesses for psychic occurrences." Once he lay in trance for 14 days, had great spiritual struggles and ecstasies, heard voices that he believed to be of the Lord, and proclaimed by direct revelation the doctrine of the Inner Light: "I saw that Christ enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving light, and I saw that the manifestation of the spirit of God was given to every man to profit withal."

It was said that there was a wonderful magnetism and power about the eyes of George Fox. He had gifts of healing and himself made many wonderful recoveries. He foretold the fall of the Rump Parliament; he had a striking presentiment of the approaching death of Cromwell; he had a vision of the fire of London years before it happened; and he had a foreshadowing of the coming revolution of 1689. He reportedly had so much psychic power that during some of the meetings at which he was present the house was shaken, and on one occasion a clergyman ran out of the church fearing it would fall on his head.

Fox's journal contains accounts of the miraculous events of his life.

Sources:

Cadbury, H. J. George Fox's "Book of Miracles." Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1948.

Fox, George. Journal. Edited by John L. Nickalls. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1952.

Prince, Walter F. Noted Witnesses for Psychic Occurrences. Boston: Boston Society for Psychic Research, 1928. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Fox, Marietta Newton (1928–1996)

American psychologist active in the field of parapsychology. Fox was born January 18, 1928, at Bradford, Pennsylvania. She studied psychology at the College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio (B.A., 1950), after which she became a researcher at the Para- psychology Laboratory at Duke University. She joined the staff of the Institute of Living, Hartford, Connecticut, in 1952. From 1953 to 1954, she was a schoolteacher in Wheaton, Illinois. She was a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Fox, Marietta N., and Kenneth Bates. "An Experimental Study of ESP Capacity in Mental Patients." Journal of Parapsychology (December 1951).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fox, Oliver

Pseudonym of Hugh G. Callaway (1885–1949), pioneer British exponent of astral projection, or out-of-the-body travel. His book Astral Projection: A Record of Out-of-the-body Experiences (1939) was the first major British publication on the subject.

Fox, Selena (1949–)

Selena Fox, Wiccan priestess and founder of Circle Sanctuary, was born on October 20, 1949, in Arlington, Virginia. She was an honors student at the College of William and Mary, from which she received her B.S. in psychology in 1971. She then pursued professional training in clinical and social psychology at several institutions. She was also one of the first persons attracted to the new Pagan Wiccan movement (distinguished by its worship centered upon acknowledgement of a feminine deity) that had been brought to the United States from Great Britain by students of Gerald B. Gardner. Her studies had included a search through a variety of religious options, especially Native American shamanism.

In 1974 Fox founded the Church of Circle Wicca, one of the first Wiccan organizations to receive its federal and state tax exemption. Working with Jim Alan, a Wiccan priest, and a small group of Pagans in Madison, Wisconsin, Fox began a networking effort among Pagans nationally. She and Alan traveled widely and between their music and ritual leadership, they quickly emerged as spokespersons for the highly diffuse movement. In 1977 they founded Circle Network to facilitate international contact among those who professed an Earth-centered spirituality. To assist that contact, Circle began to issue a periodically updated Pagan directory. By the end of the decade, Circle Network News, the church's periodical, had the highest circulation of any Neo-Pagan periodical in the world.

The Pagan movement grew rapidly through the 1970s and by the beginning of the 1980s several national Wiccan fellowships had emerged, including the Covenant of the Goddess which provided a home for those Wiccans who were not a part of the older fellowships built around the lineage of priestesses in the Gardnerian or Alexandrian tradition. Fox became aware of two needs within the larger Pagan community and moved to supply them. First, she founded the Pagan Spirit Alliance, an inclusive national fellowship that included not only Wiccans (those Pagans who called themselves Witches) but other Pagans who did not identify themselves as Wiccans. Such Pagans went by a variety of names, from Druid to Asatru to simply Goddess worshippers. Then in 1983, she purchased a farm in rural Wisconsin that included a large wooded area, and dedicated it as a national Pagan retreat area named Circle Sanctuary (the new name adopted by the church). The farm became the residence of a small community and the site of regular rituals, especially the major Pagan festivals which mark the solar cycle approximately every six weeks (at the solstices and equinoxes and halfway between). It also became the location for a round of summer programs, including the annual Pagan Spirit Gathering.

In 1984, Fox and Alan ended their relationship. Two years later Fox married Dennis Carpenter, who now functions as the high priest for Circle. By this time, Circle Sanctuary became the focus of two controversies: one within the Pagan community over the propriety of the community supporting the Sanctuary, which was owned by a private (albeit a nonprofit) corporation; and a more intense one created by neighbors offended by the existence of a center for Witches in their midst. Both controversies were eventually resolved in Fox's favor.

Through the 1990s, Fox established herself as a major spokesperson of Paganism, which she terms Earth-centered spirituality. With her husband, she has worked to end discrimination against Pagans (largely a remnant of anti-Witch propaganda during the late medieval period) and to bring Neo-Paganism into the larger religious community (which includes dispelling the identification of Pagan Goddess worship with Satanism). Her round of activities are chronicled in the pages of Circle Network News.

Sources:

"Selena Fox: Building Bridges of Understanding: An Interview." Fireheart (spring/summer 1989): 10–17.

Fox Sisters, Kate [Catharine] (1836–1892) and Margaret(ta) (1833–1893)

The pioneers of modern Spiritualism, along with a third sister, (Ann) Leah (1814–1890), variously known by marriage as Mrs. Fish, Mrs. Brown, and Mrs. Underhill. According to Leah Fox's book The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism (1885), psychic power ran in the family.

Their great-grandmother was a somnambulist (sleepwalker). She attended phantom funerals of people yet living and described every detail about the officiating minister and the persons present. Her descriptions corresponded with the facts as they were later observed. An aunt, Elisabeth Higgins, as told in Robert Dale Owen's Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World (1860), saw in a dream her own tombstone; she died on the day inscribed in her vision.

The events that made the Fox family name historic date from December 11, 1847, the day on which John D. Fox, the father, took the tenancy of a house in Hydesville, New York. The house had a mysterious reputation. Michael Weakman, the former tenant who had moved in two years before, left it because of strange noises, but the family of John D. Fox did not experience serious discomfort until March 1848. At that time raps, knocks, and noises as of moving furniture were heard at night. They increased in intensity. On March 31 there was a very loud and continued outbreak of inexplicable sounds. Fox's wife suggested that the sashes might have rattled since the night was windy. John Fox got up and tried the sashes, shaking them to see if they were loose. One of the girls happened to remark that when her father shook the window sash the noises seemed to reply. The idea came to her to ask for an answer by imitating the sounds. John's wife, Margaret, in a testimony signed four days later, described the occurrences as follows:

"On the night of the first disturbance we all got up, lighted a candle and searched the entire house, the noises continuing during the time and being heard near the same place. Although not very loud, it produced a jar of the bedsteads and chairs that could be felt when we were in bed. It was a tremulous motion, more than a sudden jar. We could feel the jar when standing on the floor. It continued on this night until we slept. I did not sleep until about twelve o'clock. On March 30 we were disturbed all night. The noises were heard in all parts of the house. My husband stationed himself outside the door while I stood inside, and the knocks came on the door between us. We heard footsteps in the pantry, and walking downstairs; we could not rest, and I then concluded that the house must be haunted by some unhappy restless spirit. I had often heard of such things, but had never witnessed anything of the kind that I could not account for before.

"On Friday night, March 31, 1848, we concluded to go to bed early and not permit ourselves to be disturbed by the noises, but try and get a night's rest. My husband was here on all these occasions, heard the noises and helped in the search. It was very early when we went to bed on this night—hardly dark. I had been so broken of my rest I was almost sick. My husband had not gone to bed when we first heard the noise on this evening. I had just lain down. It commenced as usual. I knew it from all the other noises I had ever heard before. The children, who slept in the other bed in the room, heard the rapping and tried to make similar sounds by snapping their fingers.

"My youngest child, Cathie, said: 'Mr. Splitfoot, do as I do,' clapping her hands. The sound instantly followed her with the same number of raps. When she stopped the sound ceased for a short time. Then Margaretta said, in sport, 'No, do just as I do. Count one, two, three, four,' striking one hand against the other at the same time; and the raps came as before. She was afraid to repeat them. Then Cathie said in her childish simplicity, 'Oh, mother, I know what it is. To-morrow is April-fool day and it is somebody trying to fool us.' "I then thought I could put a test that no one in the place could answer. I asked the noise to rap my different children's ages, successively. Instantly each one of my children's ages was given correctly, pausing between them sufficiently long to individualize them until the seventh, at which a longer pause was made, and then three more emphatic raps were given, corresponding to the age of the little one that died, which was my youngest child.

"I then asked: 'Is this a human being that answers my questions so correctly?' There was no rap. I asked 'Is it a spirit? If it is make two raps.' Two sounds were given as soon as the request was made. I then said: 'If it was an injured spirit, make two raps,' which were instantly made, causing the house to tremble. I asked: 'Were you injured in this house?' The answer was given as before. 'Is the person living that injured you?' Answered by raps in the same manner. I ascertained by the same simple method that it was a man, aged 31 years, that he had been murdered in this house and his remains were buried in the cellar; that his family consisted of a wife and five children, two sons and three daughters, all living at the time of his death, but that the wife had since died. I asked: 'Will you continue to rap if I call my neighbors that they may hear it too?' The raps were loud in the affirmative.

"My husband went and called in Mrs. Redfield, our nearest neighbor. She is a very candid woman. The girls were sitting up in bed clinging to each other and trembling with terror. I think I was as calm as I am now. Mrs. Redfield came immediately (this was about half past seven), thinking she would have a laugh at the children. But when she saw them pale with fright and nearly speechless, she was amazed and believed there was something more serious than she had supposed. I asked a few questions for her and she was answered as before. He told her age exactly. She then called her husband, and the same questions were asked and answered.

"Then Mr. Redfield called in Mr. Duesler and wife, and several others. Mr. Duesler then called in Mr. and Mrs. Hyde, also Mr. and Mrs. Jewell. Mr. Duesler asked many questions and received answers. I then named all the neighbors I could think of and asked if any of them had injured him and received no answer. Mr. Duesler then asked questions and received answers. He asked 'Were you murdered?' Raps affirmative. 'Can your murderer be brought to justice?' No sound. 'Can he be punished by law?' No answer. He then said: 'If your murderer cannot be punished by the law manifest it by raps,' and the raps were made clearly and distinctly. In the same way Mr. Duesler ascertained that he was murdered in the east bedroom about five years ago and that the murder was committed by a Mr.— on a Tuesday night at twelve o'clock; that he was murdered by having his throat cut with a butcher's knife; that the body was taken through the buttery, down the stairway and that it was buried ten feet below the surface of the ground. It was also ascertained that he was murdered for his money by raps affirmative.

"'How much was it—one hundred?' No rap. 'Was it two hundred?' etc., and when he mentioned five hundred the raps replied in the affirmative.

"Many called in who were fishing in the creek, and all heard the same questions and answers. Many remained in the house all night. I and my children left the house. My husband remained in the house with Mr. Redfield all night. On the next Saturday the house was filled to overflowing. There were no sounds heard during the day, but they commenced again in the evening. It was said that there were over three hundred persons present at the time. On Sunday morning the noises were heard throughout the day by all who came to the house.

"On Saturday night, April 1, they commenced digging in the cellar; they dug until they came to water and then gave it up. The noise was not heard on Sunday evening nor during the night. Stephen B. Smith and wife (my daughter Marie) and my son David S. Fox and wife, slept in the room this night.

"I have heard nothing since that time until yesterday. In the forenoon of yesterday there were several questions answered in way by rapping. I have heard the noise several times to-day.

"I am not a believer in haunted houses or supernatural appearances. I am very sorry there has been so much excitement about it. It has been a great deal of trouble to us. It was our misfortune to live here at this time; but I am willing and anxious that the truth should be known and that a true statement should be made. I cannot account for these noises; all that I know is that they have been heard repeatedly as I have stated. I have heard this rapping again this (Tuesday) morning, April 4. My children have also heard it."

John D. Fox then signed the following statement:

"I have also heard the above statement of my wife, Margaret Fox, read, and hereby certify that the same is true in all its particulars. I heard the same rappings which she has spoken of, in answer to the questions, as stated by her. There have been a great many questions besides those asked, and answered in the same way. Some have been asked a great many times and they have always received the same answer. There has never been any contradiction whatever.

"I do not know of any way to account for those noises, as being caused by any natural means. We have searched every nook and corner in and about the house at different times to ascertain if possible whether anything or anybody was secreted there that could make the noise and have not been able to find anything which would or could explain the mystery. It has caused a great deal of trouble and anxiety.

"Hundreds have visited the house, so that it is impossible for us to attend to our daily occupations; and I hope that, whether caused by natural or supernatural means, it will be ascertained soon. The digging in the cellar will be resumed as soon as the water settles, and then it can be ascertained whether there are any indications of a body ever having been buried there; and if there are I shall have no doubt but that it is of supernatural origin."

The digging could not be resumed until summer. Then, at a depth of five feet, they found a plank, along with charcoal and quicklime, and finally hair and some bones, which were pronounced by medical men to belong to a human skeleton. The rest of the skeleton was believed to be found 56 years later. According to a report of the Boston Journal, November 23, 1904, some parts of a rough wall built one yard from the true wall of the cellar fell down. Excavations were made by the owner of "the spook house" and an almost complete human skeleton was found. It was thought that the murderer first buried the body in the middle of the cellar, then became alarmed, dug it up, and buried it in the space between the two walls.

As the murder victim's spirit continued to communicate with the Foxes in 1848, Mrs. Fox's hair turned white as a result of the disturbances in the house. The phenomena soon assumed the character of formal haunting. The sound of a death struggle, the gurgling of a throat, and the heavy dragging of a body across the room was heard night after night. Finally the family could not stand it any longer and moved out. But the raps continued in the house even after they left, and one night more than 300 people conversed with the invisible entity.

From Raps to the Message of Spiritualism

Kate took refuge at her brother's house in Auburn, and her sister Margaret went to her sister Leah's house in Rochester. The raps broke out again in both places. In Rochester they were especially violent. Calvin Brown, who afterward became Leah's second husband and who lived in the same house, was opposed to the manifestations and became the object of poltergeist attacks. Things were thrown at him, but without causing him injury. Blocks of wood were found scattered in the rooms, sometimes with sentences written on them. The manifestation was intelligent and spiteful.

"We had become satisfied," writes Leah in The Missing Link (1885), "that no earthly power could relieve us. While on our knees pins would be stuck into different parts of our persons. Mother's cap would be removed from her head, her comb jerked out of her hair and every conceivable thing done to annoy us." The spirits "carried on the manifestations on the very peak of the roof. It sounded like the frequent discharge of heavy artillery. It was stated to us the next day that the sounds were heard a mile away. We feared that the roof would fall in upon us."

These violent disturbances went on until Isaac Post, a visiting friend, suddenly remembered that Leah's brother David "conversed with the Hydesville spirits by using the alphabet." Tremendous raps came in answer to the first question and this message was spelled out: "Dear Friends, you must proclaim this truth to the world. This is the dawning of a new era; you must not try to conceal it any longer. When you do your duty God will protect you and good spirits will watch over you." From that time on, communications began to pour through and the manifestations became orderly. The table rocked, objects moved, guitars were played, and psychic touches were experienced.

On November 14, 1849, the first meeting of a small band of Spiritualists took place in the Corinthian Hall in Rochester. The excitement grew. Public investigation was demanded. The report of a committee of five that could not explain the phenomena as fraud was rejected and another committee was delegated. They were also forced to report that when the girls "were standing on pillows with a handkerchief tied round the bottom of their dresses, tight to the ankles, we all heard rapping on the wall and floor distinctly."

Passions rose to fury; once the girls were nearly lynched, but in spite of a hostile atmosphere and denunciation in the press, the movement kept growing. Other mediums sprang up. Mrs. Tamlin and Mrs. Benedict of Auburn, the first two well-known mediums who were developed in the circle of Kate Fox (see Apostolic Circle), were followed by a host of others, and on November 28, 1849, because of the increasing demand for sittings, Leah became a professional medium.

The first public sittings were soon followed by a propaganda tour to Albany in May 1850, then to Troy, where their lives were threatened and they were fired on. On June 4, 1850, they took the message of Spiritualism to New York City. Horace Greeley, the editor of the New York Tribune, was their first caller. Fearing for their safety, he advised them to charge a $5 admission fee. Later, under the aegis of the Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge, free public sittings were initiated, for which Mr. H. H. Day paid $1,200 per annum to Kate. Interest ran high from the very first.

Greeley's report in the Tribune was enthusiastic:

"We devoted what time we could spare from our duties out of three days to this subject, and it would be the basest cowardice not to say that we are convinced beyond a doubt of their perfect integrity and good faith in the premises. Whatever may be the origin or cause of the 'rappings,' the ladies in whose presence they occur do not make them. We tested this thoroughly and to our entire satisfaction."

The phenomena in these first seances were not spectacular in light of later occurrences associated with the Fox sisters. Raps were heard, the table and chairs moved, and the sitters were touched by invisible hands. Perhaps their most powerful early manifestation was recorded in 1853 by Governor Talmadge. It was the complete levitation of the table with the governor himself on top. He also claimed to have received a communication in direct writing from the spirit of John C. Calhoun. According to Robert Dale Owen, Leah was the best medium for raps. With her he obtained them on the seashore on a rock, in a sailing boat (sounding from underneath), on tree trunks in the woods, and on the ground beneath their feet in open air. Spirit lights and materializations were a comparatively late development, and they were produced by both Kate and Leah Fox.

"Exposures," Tests, and Confessions

Claimed exposures from time to time were common. In February 1851 the "snapping of the knee joints" explanation of the raps was advanced for the first time. Dr. Austin Flint, Dr. Charles A. Lee, and Dr. C. B. Coventry of the University of Buffalo published in the Commercial Advertiser of February 18, 1851, the disclosure that the raps were produced within the sisters' anatomies. A second investigation upheld this theory, and an alleged confession of Margaret Fox, published in April 1851 by a relation named Mrs. Norman Culver, threatened to bury both the Fox sisters and the fledgling Spiritualistic movement.

There was, however, a flagrant contradiction in the allegation, which claimed that when the committee held the ankles of the Fox sisters in Rochester a Dutch servant girl rapped with her knuckles under the floor of the cellar. She was instructed to rap whenever she heard their voices calling on the spirits. Yet the investigation to which the revelation referred was held in the houses of the members of the committee or in a public hall, the girls did not keep a servant, and Kate Fox was not present at these meetings at all. Nevertheless, the effect of the revelation was that "the Rochester impostors" were at the mercy of the press, having but one significant defender—Horace Greeley. His interest was so deep, however, that he furnished funds for Kate Fox to polish up her imperfect education.

Investigations into the reality of the phenomena were numerous. Test after test was applied. The skeptics faced two problems: explaining what they believed were the "fraudulent" production of the rappings and determining the nature of the intelligence that answered the questions, which were in many cases asked mentally. The second problem was seldom tackled; the first was addressed often and with very great ardor. One popular explanation was that the raps were produced by flexing the knee joints. In 1857, as a result of the challenge to mediums in the Boston Courier, several mediums appeared before a committee of Harvard professors in Boston. Kate and Leah Fox were among them. The committee was difficult to satisfy and their promised report was never published.

There is much in the personal history of the Fox sisters in these early years that remains obscure. Years of public mediumship in a hostile atmosphere, the drain of too-frequent sittings on their energy, the commercial exploitation of their talents, and the absence of understanding regarding the religious implications of Spiritualism combined to produce a deteriorating influence.

Margaret Fox married Dr. Elisha Kane, the famous Arctic explorer. With marriage, she retired from public mediumship. Before his marriage to Margaret, Kane was skeptical. He never arrived at any satisfactory solution to the phenomena, and apparently was convinced that Margaret was exploited in a mercenary spirit by her elder sister, Leah. When he was away in the Arctic he had Margaret stay with his aunt for the purpose of polishing up her education and married her on his return. Some time after Kane's death in 1857, under the title The Love Letters of Dr. Elisha Kane (1865), was published a book that exacerbated suspicion of the Fox sisters. Kane, in his letters, continually reproached Margaret for living in deceit and hypocrisy. He also strongly objected to the sisters' indulgence in alcohol.

In 1861 Kate Fox was engaged as a medium exclusively for Charles F. Livermore, a rich banker from New York whose wife, Estelle, had died a year before. Over a period of five years Kate gave him nearly 400 sittings of which detailed records were kept. The doors and windows were carefully locked and the seances, witnessed by prominent men, were often held in Livermore's own house.

The medium retained consciousness while "Estelle" gradually materialized. She was not recognized until the 43rd sitting when she was illuminated by a psychic light. Later the materialization became more complete, but the figure could not speak except for a few words. The communication took place through raps and writing. Estelle and another phantom, calling himself "Benjamin Franklin," wrote on cards brought by Livermore. Kate Fox's hands were held while she wrote. The script was said to be a perfect reproduction of the characters "Estelle" used when on earth. At the 388th seance, "Estelle" declared that she was appearing for the last time. Livermore never saw her again. In gratitude for the consolation he derived from these sittings, he enabled Kate Fox to visit England in 1871. In a letter to Benjamin Coleman he praised Kate's irreproachable character and detailed her idiosyncrasies.

The career of Kate Fox in England was undisturbed. She sat for many important people, gave excellent opportunities to Sir William Crookes for investigation, and often held joint sittings with D. D. Home and Agnes Guppy-Volckman. On December 14, 1872, Kate married H. D. Jencken, a barrister-at-law. They had two sons, both strongly psychic at an early age. Jencken died in 1881. In 1883 the widowed medium visited Russia on the invitation of Alexander Aksakof and was consulted about the auspices of the coronation of the czar.

Financial circumstances forced Margaret Fox back into professional mediumship. According to Isaac Funk, she lived in poverty. Leah died in 1890, Kate in 1892, and Margaret in 1893. Kate (known as Mrs. Sparr from her last marriage) and Margaret were buried in the Brooklyn Cypress Hill Cemetery.

In 1916 the old Hydesville house where the Fox family had lived in 1848 was moved to Lily Dale, a campground in Western New York that has served at times as an informal headquarters for American Spiritualists. Unfortunately, it burned to the ground in 1955. The house was reconstructed in 1968 as a tourist attraction on the Hydesville site, which bears a marker erected in 1927 reading: "Birthplace of Modern Spiritualism 1848." The reconstructed building includes a niche in the cellar wall where the skeleton was found.

Sources:

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1970.

Davenport, Reuben Briggs. The Death Blow to Spiritualism. New York: G. W. Dillingham, 1888.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London, New York, 1926. Reprint, Arno Press, 1975.

Fornell, Earl Wesley. The Unhappy Medium: Spiritualism and the Life of Margaret Fox. Austin, Tex.: University of Texas Press, 1964.

Jackson, Herbert G., Jr. The Spirit Rappers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

Lewis, E. E. A Report of the Mysterious Noises Heard in the House of Mr. John D. Fox. Canandaigua, N.Y.: The Author, 1848.

Pond, Mariam Buckner. Time Is Kind: The Story of the Unfortunate Fox Family. New York: Centennial Press, 1947. Reprinted as The Unwilling Martyrs. London: Psychic Book Club, 1947.

Taylor, W. G. Langworthy. Katie Fox, Epochmaking Medium and the Making of the Fox-Taylor Record. Boston: Bruce, 1933.

Underhill, A. Leah. The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism. New York: T. R. Knox, 1885. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Fragarach (The Answerer)

In ancient Irish legend, a sword that could pierce any armor. It was one of the magical gifts brought by Lugh from the Land of the Living. Another gift was the horse of Mananan, named Aonbarr, able to travel on land and sea. (See also Danaans)

FRANCE

Early Belief in Sorcery

According to occultist Éliphas Lévi, the practice of magic in pre-Roman France originated with the Druids and was nearly identical to that of the Draids in Britain, from which it derived. It is unlikely that Roman magic gained any footing in Gaul, but there is little evidence of whether this was or was not the case.

In his book The History of Magic (1913), Lévi states that in the early Frankish period of the Merovingian dynasty, Fredegond, wife of Hilperic, king of Soissons, destroyed many people apparently through sorcery, or malevolent magic. She also experimented with black magic, the calling up of spirit entities, and protected many practitioners of the art, Lévi says. On one occasion, she saved a sorceress who had been arrested by Ageric, bishop of Verdun, by hiding her in the palace.

The practice of magic was not punished under the rule of the early French kings, except on those occasions when (usually through poisonings) it intruded into the royal caste and thus became a political offense, as in the case of the military leader Mummol, who was tortured by command of Hilperic for sorcery. One of the Salic laws attributed to Pharamond by Sigebert stated: "If any one shall testify that another had acted as hèrèburge or strioporte [titles applied to those who carry the copper vessel to the spot where the vampires perform their enchantments] and if he fail to convict him, he shall be condemned hereby to a forfeit of 7,500 deniers, being 180 1/2 sous. . . . If a vampire shall devour a man and be found guilty, she shall forfeit 8,000 deniers, being 200 sous."

The Christian church also legislated against sorcerers and vampires, and the Council of Agde in Languedoc, held in 506 C.E., pronounced excommunication against them. The first Council of Orleans, convened in 541, condemned divination and augury. The Council of Narbonne, in 589, excommunicated all sorcerers and ordained that they be sold as slaves for the benefit of the poor. Those who allegedly had dealings with the devil were condemned to whipping.

Some extraordinary phenomena are said to have occurred in France during the reign of Pepin le Bref (714?–768): the air seemed to be alive with human shapes, mirages filled the heavens, and sorcerers were seen among the clouds, scattering powders and poisons with open hands. Crops failed, cattle died, and many people perished. Such visions may have been stimulated by the teachings of the famous Kabbalist Zedekias. He presided over a school of occult science, where he withheld the secrets of his art and contented himself with postulating his ideas about elemental spirits. The spirits he stated, had been subservient to him before the fall of man. The aforementioned visions might have been caused by mass belief that sylphs and salamanders were descending in search of their former masters. Lévi wrote as follows:

"Voyages to the land of sylphs were talked of on all sides as we talk at the present day of animated tables and fluidic manifestations. The folly took possession even of strong minds, and it was time for an intervention on the part of the church, which does not relish the supernatural being hawked in the public streets, seeing that such disclosures, by imperilling the respect due to authority and to the hierarchic chain of instruction, cannot be attributed to the spirit of order and light. The cloud phantoms were therefore arraigned and accused of being hell-born illusions, while the people—anxious to get something into their hands—began a crusade against sorcerers. The public folly turned into a paroxysm of mania; strangers in country places were accused of descending from heaven and were killed without mercy; imbeciles confessed that they had been abducted by sylphs or demons; others who had boasted like this previously either would not or could not unsay it; they were burned or drowned, and, according to Garinet, the number who perished throughout the kingdom almost exceeds belief. It is the common catastrophe of dramas in which the first parts are played by ignorance or fear.

"Such visionary epidemics recurred in the reigns following, and all the power of Charlemagne was put in action to calm the public agitation. An edict, afterwards renewed by Louis the Pious, forbade sylphs to manifest under the heaviest penalties. It will be understood that in the absence of the aerial beings the judgments fell upon those who had made a boast of having seen them, and hence they ceased to be seen. The ships in air sailed back to the port of oblivion, and no one claimed any longer to have journeyed through the blue distance. Other popular frenzies replaced the previous mania, while the romantic splendors of the great reign of Charlemagne furnished the makers of legends with new prodigies to believe and new marvels to relate."

Mysterious legends grew around the figure of Charlemagne. It was said that the Enchiridion of Pope Leo III, a collection of written magic charms, was presented to Charlemagne. Lévi illustrates the condition of affairs in Charlemagne's France:

"We know that superstitions die hard and that degenerated Druidism had struck its roots deeply in the savage lands of the North. The recurring insurrections of Saxons testified to a fanaticism which was (a) always turbulent, and (b) incapable of repression by moral force alone. All defeated forms of worship—Roman paganism, Germanic idolatry, Jewish rancour—conspired against victorious Christianity. Nocturnal assemblies took place; thereat the conspirators cemented their alliance with the blood of human victims; and a pantheistic idol of monstrous form, with the horns of a goat, presided over festivals which might be called agapæ of hatred. In a word, the Sabbat was still celebrated in every forest and wild if yet unreclaimed provinces. The adepts who attended them were masked and otherwise unrecognisable; the assemblies extinguished their lights and broke up before daybreak, the guilty were to be found everywhere, and they could be brought to book nowhere. It came about therefore that Charlemagne determined to fight them with their own weapons.

"In those days, moreover, feudal tyrants were in league with sectarians against lawful authority; female sorcerers were attached to castles as courtesans; bandits who frequented the Sabbats divided with nobles the bloodstained loot of rapine; feudal courts were at the command of the highest bidder; and the public burdens weighed with all their force only on the weak and poor. The evil was at its height in Westphalia, and faithful agents were despatched thither by Charlemagne entrusted with a secret mission. Whatsoever energy remained among the oppressed, whosoever still loved justice, whether among the people or among the nobility, were drawn by these emissaries together, bound by pledges and vigilance in common. To the initiates thus incorporated they made known the full powers which they carried from the emperor himself, and they proceeded to institute the Tribunal of Free Judges."

Lévi's observations must be taken with a grain of salt, however. It is unlikely that the Sabbat was celebrated to such an extreme. Also, the Vehmgericht was founded 450 years after Charlemagne's reign.

From the reign of Robert the Pious to that of St. Louis (1215–70), there is not much to stimulate the student of occult history. In St. Louis's time flourished the famous Rabbi Jachiel, a celebrated master of the Kabbalah. There is some reason to believe that he possessed electricity, because a radiant star was said to appear in his home at night, the light so brilliant that no one could look at it without being dazzled, and it gave off rainbow colors. It appeared to be inexhaustible and was never replenished with oil or any other combustible substance. When the rabbi was annoyed by intruders at his door he struck a nail fixed in his cabinet, producing a blue spark on the head of the nail and on the door-knocker, to which, if the intruder clung, he received a severe shock.

German scholar and scientist Albertus Magnus lived during the same period.

The twelfth century had seen the founding of the Knights Templars of the Temple of Solomon, a French-based religious order of military men dedicated to protecting pilgrims on their way to the Holy Land. The order prospered until its prosecution by Philip the Fair (1268–1314), who accused the order of various occult crimes, including the worship of the devil in the form of the idol, Baphomet. Another prosecution for sorcery was that of the sadistic Gilles de Laval (1404–40), lord of Rais, the prototype of Bluebeard. Laval was a renowned sorcerer who, with two assistants, practiced diabolical rites at his castle of Machecoul, celebrating the black mass in an alarming manner. He slaughtered children as part of a ritual he hoped would assist him in his search for the philosophers' stone. Jeanne d'Arc, under whom Gilles had fought at the siege of Orleáns, was suspected of sorcery but was actually condemned as a heretic.

The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries

As early as the thirteenth century, a charge of sorcery was made as a means of branding the Waldenses, who were accused of selling themselves to the devil and of holding sabbatical orgies. About the middle of the fifteenth century France began to oppress suspected sorcerers.

In 1315 Enguerraud de Marigny, a minister of Philip the Fair who had conducted the execution of the Templars, was hung along with an adventurer named Paviot for attempting to kill the counts of Valois and St. Paul. In 1334 the countess of Artois and her son were thrown into prison on suspicion of sorcery.

In 1393, during the reign of Charles VI, his sister-in-law, the duchess of Orleans, who was the daughter of the Duke of Milan, was accused of driving the king mad by sorcery. The ministers of the court resolved to pit a magician against her, and a certain Arnaud Guillaume was brought from Guienne as a suitable adversary to the noble lady. He possessed a book Smagorad, and said the original was given to Adam by God to console him for the loss of his son Abel. Guillaume claimed that the possessor of this volume could hold the stars in subjection and command the four elements. He assured the king's advisers that Charles was suffering because of a sorcerer's malice but in the meantime the young monarch recovered, and Gillaume fell back into his original obscurity.

Five years later the king had another attack, and two Augustine friars were sent from Guienne to cure him. But their conduct was so outrageous that they were executed.

A third attack in 1403 was combated by two sorcerers of Dijon. They established themselves in a thick wood near the gates of Dijon, where they made a magic circle of iron that was supported by iron columns the height of an average man, to which 12 chains of iron were attached. The King's subjects were so anxious for his recovery that the two sorcerers were able to persuade 12 of the town's principal persons to enter the circle and allow themselves to be chained. The sorcerers then proceeded with their incantations, but without result. They were arrested and burned for their pretenses.

After the duke of Burgundy ordered the duke of Orleans murdered, he attempted to justify his crime by alleging that the dead duke had attempted to kill him by means of sorcery.

Witchcraft Persecutions

By the year 1400 belief in the nightly meetings of the witches' Sabbat was widespread. In Paris alone, in the time of Charles IX, there were said to be no less than thirty thousand sorcerers, and it was estimated that France contained more than three times that number during the reign of Henry III. Not a town or village was exempt from accusations and trials. The accused belonged to all classes, and generally met the same fate, regardless of rank, age, or sex. Children of the tenderest years and nonagenarians alike were committed to the flames. The terror of being publicly accused as a sorcerer hung like a black cloud over the life of every successful man because it was a charge readily available to an envious enemy who wished him destroyed.

England had no edict regarding witchcraft at this period, but in France and other Continental countries (especially Germany) a law had been taking shape. By the end of the fifteenth century there was an international belief in the efficacy of sorcery and a conviction that witchcraft was a religion of devil worshipers. In the 1480s the pope gave his official approval for the Inquisition to move against the supposed witches, and two Dominican fathers wrote a textbook describing them, their crimes, and the method of proceeding against them.

During the early sixteenth century witchcraft trials were rare in France, and there are few cases recorded before the year 1560. The first instance would almost be humorous if it were not a taste of things to come. In 1561 a number of persons were brought to trial at Vernon, accused of having held their Sabbat gathering in a ruined castle. The "witches" were accused of having arrived at the castle in the shape of cats. Witnesses were deposed who claimed to have seen the assembly and to have been attacked by the pseudofeline conspirators. After a good laugh and the proper expression of righteous indignation, the court dismissed the charges as worthy only of ridicule.

In 1564 three men and a woman were executed at Poitiers, having been forced to confess to various acts of sorcery. They said they had regularly attended the witches' Sabbat held three times a year, and that the demon who presided at it ended by burning himself to make powder for his agents to use in mischief. These first executions were followed by a series of others in the 1570s.

In 1571 a mere conjurer who played tricks with cards was thrown into prison in Paris, forced to confess that he was an attendant on the Sabbat, and was executed. In 1573 a man was burned at Dôle on the charge of changing himself into a wolf and devouring children. Several persons who confessed to having been at the Sabbats were condemned to be burned that same year in different parts of France. In 1578 another man was tried and condemned in Paris for changing himself into a wolf, and a man was condemned at Orleans for the same supposed crime in 1583.

Wolves were prolifie in France and people often connected their ravages with witchcraft. The belief in what were in England called werewolves (men-wolves) and in France loupsgarous was ancient and widespread.

In 1578 a woman was burned at Compiègne after she confessed that she had given herself to the devil, who appeared to her as a great black man on horseback, booted and spurred. Another supposed witch was burned the same year; she also stated that the Evil One came to her in the shape of a black man. In 1582 and 1583 several "witches" were burned.

Local councils of the time passed severe laws against witchcraft, and a significant number of victims were put to death in France under such accusations. In the course of only 15 years, from 1580 to 1595, in the province of Lorraine alone, the president Remigius burned nine hundred witches, and as many more fled the country to save their lives. About the close of the century, a French judge stated that the crime of witchcraft had become so common that there were not enough jails to hold the prisoners or judges to hear their cases. A trial he witnessed in 1568 induced physician Jean Bodin to write De la Demonomanie des Sorciers (1580), which became a standard French textbook on the subject of witchcraft.

Among English witches, the devil was generally said to come in person to seduce his victims, but in France and other countries this seems to have been unnecessary. Once initiated each person became seized with an uncontrollable desire to make converts, whom he or she carried to the Sabbat to be duly enrolled as witches. According to Bodin's imaginings, one witch was enough to corrupt five hundred honest persons. The infection quickly ran through a family and was generally carried down from generation to generation, which explained satisfactorily, according to his commentary on demonology, the extent to which witchcraft had supposedly spread in his day. The novice received a burlesque rite of baptism and was marked with the sign of the demon on some unexposed part of the body. The first act of compliance with the devil was then performed, and it was frequently repeated, the evil one presenting himself to the converts as a member of the opposite sex, as Bodin tells it.

Toward the end of the sixteenth century, infatuation with witchcraft had risen to its greatest height in France. Not only the lower classes but also persons of the highest rank in society were liable to suspicion of dealing in sorcery. Such charges were publicly made against King Henry III and Queen Catherine de Medici and early in the following century became grounds for state trials that had fatal conclusions.

In 1610, during the reign of Louis XIII, the cause cŒlèbre of the marechale d'Ancre occurred. Among Marie de Medici's servants was a certain Eleanora Dori, who married Concini, a prodigal spendthrift. As guardian to her son, Marie de Medici was ruler of France and considerable power was exercised by these favorite servants. Because of this favor the peers of France joined together against the upstarts, but with little result at first. Concini was named marechal of France, with the title of marquis d'Ancre.

His wife, who was very superstitious, became sick, which she blamed on sorcery. The result was that d'Ancre was assassinated by the nobles during a hunting expedition. The mob dragged d'Ancre's corpse from its grave and hanged it on the Pont Neuf. His wretched widow was accused of sorcery and bewitching the Queen.

The exorcists who had helped her free herself from illness advised her to sacrifice a cock, which was thought to be connected with the Devil. Also the astrological nativities of the royal family were found in her possession, as were several occult books, and a great number of magic symbols. After being tortured, she was beheaded and burned. Strangely enough the anger of the Parisian mob then turned to general commiseration.

Many other interesting cases occurred in France in the seventeenth century, including several cases of reputed demoniac possession among the Ursulines at Aix (see Louis Gaufridi), the nuns of Louviers, and the nuns of Auxonne. The case of the nuns of Loudon resulted in the burning alive of Urbain Grandier.

The Rise of Modern Occultism

The eighteenth century in France is rich in occult history. At a time when the Enlightenment was destroying the older supernatural magic, a new magic was beginning to evolve that made use of scientific information. While the eighteenth century was the low point in practice of the occult in Europe, the founders of modern occultism were emerging. Perhaps the most striking personality of this age was the Comte de Saint Germain, who was credited with possessing the secrets of alchemy and magic. His family connections were unknown, and he spoke as if he had lived for many centuries. Another mysterious adept was an alchemist calling himself Lascaris, who literally sowed his path through Europe with gold.

Then followed Cagliostro, who attained a fame unrivaled in the history of French occultism. He founded many Masonic lodges throughout the country, Freemasonry being credited with spreading the democratic beliefs underlying the French Revolution and the democratic upheavals across the continent during the next century.

A school of initiates was founded by Martinez de Pasqually, which appeared in some measure to have incorporated the teachings of the later European adepts. Another important figure at this time was Louis Claude de Saint-Martin, known as "le Philosophe Inconnu" (the unknown philosopher), who came under the influence of Pasqually, and later that of the writings of the mystical Jakob Boehme, whose works Saint-Martin translated. Jacques Cazotte was one of the first men associated with both magic and the Revolution. Much of the Revolutions inception is owed to those mysterious brotherhoods of France and Germany, which during the eighteenth century sowed the seeds of equality and Illuminism throughout Europe.

Loiséaut, a parishioner of Sainte-Mandé, formed a mystical society in 1772 that met in great secrecy, awaiting a vision of John the Baptist, who supposedly came to them to foretell the Revolution. The spiritual director of this circle was a monk named Dom Gerle, one of the first mesmerists in Paris, who was said to have foretold the dreadful fame of Robespierre through the seeress Catherine Théot. He was expelled by the members of the circle, who acted on the advice of member Sister Françoise André, who wanted to preserve the crown for the future reign of Louis XVII.

The appearance of Marie Lenormand, as a prophetess at the end of the eighteenth century, may be said to have ended a chapter of the occult history of that age. With the beginning of the nineteenth century the influence of Austrian physician Franz A. Mesmer (1733–1825) had led to a widespread interest in animal magnetism, which in turn culminated in the growth of Spiritualism. The Baron du Potet de Sennevoy did much to advance Mesmer's views which by this time were being seriously pursued by Cahagnet and others.

By the middle of the nineteenth century the new occultism was well established in Paris. A story by Alphonse Esquiros titled The Magician (1838) led to the founding of a school of magic fantasy, which was assiduously developed by Henri Delaage, who was said to have the gift of ubiquity and who collected recipes for acquiring physical beauty from the old magicians. In his works The Reform of Philosophy and Yes or No, J. M. Hoene-Wronski claimed to have discovered the first theorems of the Kabbalah and later beguiled rich persons of weak intellect into paying him large sums in return for knowledge of the Absolute.

Spiritual Healing

The celebrated Curé D'Ars, founder of the D'Ars "Providence," and many other noble works of charity, was born Jean Baptiste Vianney in the vicinity of Lyons in 1786. At school he was remembered as a somewhat dull student. Circumstances opened the way for his becoming a priest, although he had only enough Latin to say mass and no learning beyond the routine of his profession. His amiable nature and unaffected piety won him friends wherever he went. After some changes of fortune and the rejection of two good offers of rich positions, he accepted the pastoral charge of the little agricultural village of D'Ars, now in the arrondisement of Trevoux.

Very soon his reputation for beneficence drew to him a much larger circle of poor dependents than he could provide for, and it was then that he began his extraordinary life of faith, supplicating in fervent prayer for whatever means were necessary to carry out his divine mission of blessing his unfortunate fellow creatures. In this way the sphere of his benevolence and the wonderful results of the prayer he employed to maintain it reached remarkable proportions.

But a more wonderful thing was to happen in the blessed region of D'Ars. The sick began to experience sudden cures while praying before the altar or making confessions to the curé. The fame of this new miracle soon spread abroad, until the Abbé Monnin declared that more than twenty thousand persons annually came from Germany, Italy, Belgium, all parts of France, and even from England to see the curé, and that in less than six years, this number increased to an average of eighty thousand. Diseases of every kind that had been pronounced incurable were cured at once. The curé gave himself up to his work, heart and soul. His church stayed open day and night, and the immense crowds that surrounded it had to wait for hours and sometimes days to reach the healer.

No one was allowed to take precedence over others except in cases of extreme poverty or extreme suffering. Princes, nobles, and great ladies often drove up as near as they could to the church in grand carriages and were astonished when they found out they too had to wait in line.

The curé only allowed himself to sleep four hours a night, namely from 11:00 to 3:00, and when he woke the church was always packed. Omnibuses were established to convey patients from Lyons to D'Ars, and the Saône was crowded with boats full of anxious pilgrims.

Spiritualism and Animal Magnetism

The Comte d'Ourches was the first to introduce automatic writing and table turning to France. Baron Ludwig von Guldenstubbe, in his Practical Experimental Pneumatology; or, the Reality of Spirits and the Marvellous Phenomena of their Direct Writing (first published in French in 1857) gives an account of his discovery:

"It was in the course of the year 1850, or about three years prior to the epidemic of table-rapping, that the author sought to introduce into France the circles of American spiritualism, the mysterious Rochester knockings and the purely automatic writings of mediums. Unfortunately he met with many obstacles raised by other mesmerists. Those who were committed to the hypothesis of a magnetic fluid, and even those who styled themselves Spiritual Mesmerists, but who were really inferior inducers of somnambulism, treated the mysterious knockings of American spiritualism as visionary follies. It was therefore only after more than six months that the author was able to form his first circle on the American plan, and then thanks to the zealous concurrence of M. Rousaan, a former member of the Sociètè des Magnètiseurs Spiritualistes, a simple man who was full of enthusiasm for the holy cause of spiritualism. We were joined by a number of other persons, amongst whom was the Abbé Châtel, founder of the Eglise Française, who, despite his rationalistic tendencies, ended by admitting the reality of objective and supernatural revelation, as an indispensable condition of spiritualism and all practical religions. Setting aside the moral conditions which are equally requisite, it is known that American circles are based on the distinction of positive and electric or negative magnetic currents.

"The circles consist of twelve persons, representing in equal proportions the positive and negative or sensitive elements. This distinction does not follow the sex of the members, though generally women are negative and sensitive, while men are positive and magnetic. The mental and physical constitution of each individual must be studied before forming the circles, for some delicate women have masculine qualities, while some strong men are, morally speaking, women. A table is placed in a clear and ventilated spot; the medium is seated at one end and entirely isolated; by his calm and contemplative quietude he serves as a conductor for the electricity, and it may be noted that a good somnambulist is usually an excellent medium. The six electrical or negative dispositions, which are generally recognised by their emotional qualities and their sensibility, are placed at the right of the medium, the most sensitive of all being next him. The same rule is followed with the positive personalities, who are at the left of the medium, with the most positive next to him. In order to form a chain, the twelve persons each place their right hand on the table. Observe that the medium or mediums, if there be more than one, are entirely isolated from those who form the chain.

"After a number of séances, certain remarkable phenomena have been obtained, such as simultaneous shocks, felt by all present at the moment of mental evocation on the part of the most intelligent persons. It is the same with mysterious knockings and other strange sounds; many people, including those least sensitive, have had simultaneous visions, though remaining in the ordinary waking state. Sensitive persons have acquired that most wonderful gift of mediumship, namely, automatic writing, as the result of an invisible attraction which uses the nonintelligent instrument of a human arm to express its ideas. For the rest, non-sensitive persons experience the mysterious influence of an external wind, but the effect is not strong enough to put their limbs in motion. All these phenomena, obtained according to the mode of American spiritualism, have the defect of being more or less indirect, because it is impossible in these experiments to dispense with the mediation of a human being or medium. It is the same with the table-turning which invaded Europe in the middle of the year 1853.

"The author has had many table experiences with his honourable friend, the Comte d'Ourches, one of the most instructed persons in Magic and the Occult Sciences. We attained by degrees the point when tables moved, apart from any contact whatever, while the Comte d'Ourches has caused them to rise, also without contact. The author has made tables rush across a room with great rapidity, and not only without contact but without the magnetic aid of a circle of sitters. The vibrations of piano-chords under similar circumstances took place on January 20, 1856, in the presence of the Comte de Szapary and Comte d'Ourches. Now all such phenomena are proof positive of certain occult forces, but they do not demonstrate adequately the real and substantial existence of unseen intelligences, independent of our will and imagination, though the limits of these have been vastly extended in respect of their possibilities. Hence the reproach made against American spiritualists, because their communications with the world of spirits are so insignificant in character, being confined to mysterious knockings and other sound vibrations. As a fact, there is no direct phenomenon at once intelligent and material, independent of our will and imagination, to compare with the direct writing of spirits, who have neither been invoked or evoked, and it is this only which offers irrefutable proof as to the reality of the supernatural world."

Spiritualism was popular in France for the rest of the century.

Mesmerism

After public attention was drawn to animal magnetism by Mesmer and D'Eslon, several distinguished scientists followed their experiments with great success. Among them was the Baron Du Potet, whose deep interest in the subject of magnetism led him to publish the periodical Journal du Magnètisme.

Du Potet's investigations began about 1836, and for the next decade he chronicled the production of remarkable phenomena and their attestation by scientific and eminent witnesses. The baron's magnetized subjects reportedly experienced clairvoyance, trance speaking, healing, stigmata (raised letters and figures on the subject's body), levitation, and insensibility to fire, injury, or touch. In the presence of the magnetized subjects, heavy bodies were moved without human contact and distant objects materialized through walls and closed doors (generally termed apports). Sometimes the "lucides" (magnetized clairvoyants) described scenes in the spirit world, found lost property, prophesied, and spoke in foreign languages.

In 1840 Du Potet wrote that he had "rediscovered in magnetism the magic of antiquity."

"Let the savants," he stated, "reject the doctrine of spiritual appearances; the enquirer of to-day is compelled to believe it; from an examination of undeniable facts. . . . If the knowledge of ancient magic is lost, all the facts remain on which to reconstruct it."

But of all those to whom French Spiritualism was indebted for evidence of supermundane intercourse, none was more prominent than Alphonse Cahagnet, author of Magnètisme: Arcanes de la vie future dévoilés (2 vols., 1948–49), which was translated into English in 1850.

Cahagnet was a mechanic, though he was a sensible and interesting writer. He said he was a "materialist" when he was first attracted to the subject of animal magnetism, but he determined to devote all his leisure time to a thorough examination of its possibilities. When he found that he could induce the magnetic sleep in others, he proceeded with a task generally adopted by mesmerists—to substitute his own senses, mind, and will for those of the sleeper.

Cahagnet discovered that he could cure disease and determined to put all his energy into healing. However, a new obstacle arose to confound his philosophy and theories: some of his subjects, instead of representing what he willed, began to wander off to regions they persisted in calling the "land of spirits" and to describe people whom they emphatically affirmed to be the souls of the dead.

For a long time Cahagnet fought what he termed these "wild hallucinations," but when he found them recurring and saw that many of those who came to witness the experiments in magnetism recognized dead individuals in descriptions given by the somnambulists, he was compelled to admit there was another dimension to clairvoyance. After a long series of experiments Cahagnet wrote The Celestial Telegraph; or, Secrets of the Life to Come.

In her book Nineteenth Century Miracles (1884), Emma Hardinge Britten quotes from the anonymous author of Art Magic (1876):

"The narrow conservatism of the age, and the pitiful jealousy of the Medical Faculty, rendered it difficult and harassing to conduct magnetic experiments openly in Europe within several years of Mesmer's decease. Still such experiments were not wanting, and to show their results, we give a few excerpts from the correspondence between the famous French Magnetists, MM. Deleuze and Billot, from the years 1829 to 1840. By these letters, published in 1836 [sic], it appears that M. Billot commenced his experiments in magnetizing as early as 1789, and that during forty years, he had an opportunity of witnessing facts in clairvoyance, ecstasy, and somnambulism, which at the time of their publication transcended the belief of the general mass of readers. On many occasions in the presence of entranced subjects, spirits recognised as having once lived on earth in mortal form would come in bodily presence before the eyes of an assembled multitude and at request bring flowers, fruits, and objects, removed by distance from the scene of the experiments.

"M. Deleuze frankly admits that his experience was more limited to those phases of somnambulism in which his subjects submitted to amputations and severe surgical operations without experiencing the slightest pain. . . . In a letter dated 1831 M. Billot, writing to Deleuze, says, 'I repeat, I have seen and known all that is permitted to man. I have seen the stigmata arise on magnetized subjects; I have dispelled obsessions of evil spirits with a single word. I have seen spirits bring those material objects I told you of, and when requested, make them so light that they would float, and, again, a small boiteau de bonbons was rendered so heavy that I failed to move it an inch until the power was removed.'

"To those who enjoyed the unspeakable privilege of listening to the somnambules of Billot, Deleuze, and Cahagnet, another and yet more striking feature of unanimous revelation was poured forth. Spirits of those who had passed away from earth strong in the faith of Roman Catholicism—often priests and dignitaries of that conservative Church, addressing prejudiced believers in their former doctrine—asserted that there was no creed in Heaven, no sectarian worship, or ecclesiastical dogmatism there prevailing.

"They taught that God was a grand Spiritual Sun—life on earth a probation—the spheres, different degrees of comprehensive happiness or states of retributive suffering, each appropriate to the good or evil deeds done on earth. They described the ascending changes open to every soul in proportion to his own efforts to improve.

"They all insisted that man was his own judge, incurred a penalty or reward for which there was no substitution. They taught nothing of Christ, absolutely denied the idea of vicarious atonement, and represented man as his own Saviour or destroyer.

"They spoke of arts, sciences, and continued activities, as if the life beyond was but an extension of the present on a greatly improved scale. Descriptions of the radiant beauty, supernal happiness, and ecstatic sublimity manifested by the blest spirits who had risen to the spheres of Paradise, Heaven, and the glory of angelic companionships melts the heart, and fills the soul with irresistible yearning, to lay down life's weary burdens and be at rest with them."(The reference to the correspondence between Deleuze and Billot is probably to G. P. Billot's Recherches psychologiques sur la cause de phénomenes extraordinaires, published in two volumes in 1839, and the correspondence would have ceased before that date.)

Spiritualism and Spiritism

Spiritualism emerged in France, as in Germany, out of the awakening interest in psychic powers resulting from experiments in animal magnetism. It appears that although Spiritualism gained an immense foothold and exerted an influence upon the popular mind, one of the chief obstacles to its general acceptance was its lack of internal unity and the antagonism among its leaders.

Two leaders who figured most prominently in the drama of French Spiritualism, and in all probability exerted more influence upon public opinion than any other members of its dramatis personae, were Allan Kardec and A. T. Pierart, the respective editors of the movement's two leading journals: La Revue Spirite and La Revue Spiritualiste. Pierart and Kardec may also be regarded as the representatives of the two opposing factions generally known as Spiritualists and Spiritists, the former teaching that the soul undergoes only one mortal birth and continues its progress through eternity in spiritual states, the latter affirming the doctrine of reincarnation and claiming that the human spirit can and does undergo many incarnations in different mortal forms. Kardec and his followers represented Spiritism, and Pierart led the opposing faction commonly called Spiritualists.

Kardec derived his communications chiefly from writings and trance mediums who proved the most susceptible to his influence, and is said to have persistently banished from his circles not only D. D. Home, M. Brédif, and other physical mediums but all those who did not endorse his favorite dogma through their communications.

In Nineteenth Century Miracles Britten noted how the schism in French Spiritualism reached out across Europe. In France, Kardec's personal influence fitted him for a propagandist and his opinions were generally accepted by his readers. Little or no Spiritualist literature had been disseminated in the French language when Kardec's works were first published. He pursued his beliefs with an indomitable energy that his rival Pierart lacked.

The doctrines of the reincarnationists, although defended ability by their propagandists—who included many of the most capable minds of France—were not allowed to pass without severe castigation by their English neighbors. In the London Spiritual Magazine of 1865 the editor, commenting on the ominous silence of the Spirite journals concerning Maldigny's opera, Swedenborg, states:

"It is worthy of note that the journals of the Kardec school, so far as we have seen them, do not take the least notice of this opera. The Avenir of Paris, which appears weekly, but greatly wants facts, has not a word to say about it. . . . It is greatly to be regretted that the main object of the Kardecian journals seems to be, not the demonstration of the constantly recurring facts of Spiritualism, but the deification of Kardec's doctrine of reincarnation.

"To this doctrine—which has nothing to do with Spiritualism, even if it had a leg of reason or fact to stand on—all the strength, and almost all the space of these journals is devoted.

"These are the things which give the enemies of Spiritualism a real handle against it, and bring it into contempt with sober minds. Reincarnation is a doctrine which cuts up by the roots all individual identity in the future existence. It desolates utterly that dearest yearning of the human heart for reunion with its loved ones in a permanent world. If some are to go back into fresh physical bodies, and bear new names, and new natures, if they are to become respectively Tom Styles, Ned Snooks, and a score of other people, who shall ever hope to meet again with his friends, wife, children, brothers and sisters? When he enters the spirit-world and enquires for them, he will have to learn that they are already gone back to earth, and are somebody else, the sons and daughters of other people, and will have to become over and over the kindred of a dozen other families in succession! Surely, no such most cheerless crochet could bewitch the intellects of any people, except under the most especial bedevilment of the most sarcastic and mischievous of devils."

In the January 1866 issue a stronger article on this subject was written by William Howitt, who protests Spiritualists toying with the doctrine of reincarnation:

"In the Avenir of November 2nd, M. Pezzani thinks he has silenced M. Pierart, by asserting that without Reincarnation all is chaos and injustice in God's creation: 'In this world there are rich and poor, oppressed and oppressors, and without Reincarnation, God's justice could not be vindicated.' That is to say, in M. Pezzani's conception, God has not room in the infinite future to punish and redress every wrong, without sending back souls again and again into the flesh. M. Pezzani's idea, and that of his brother Re-incarnationists is, that the best way to get from Paris to London is to travel any number of times from Paris to Calais and back again. We English believe that the only way is to go on to London at once. . . . As to M. Pezzani's notions of God's injustice without Re-incarnation, if souls were reincarnated a score of times, injustice between man and man, riches and poverty, oppression and wrong, all the enigmas of social inequality would remain just then as now.

"In noticing these movements in the Spiritist camp in France, we should be doing a great injustice if we did not refer to the zealous, eloquent, and unremitting exertions of M. Pierart in the La Revue Spiritualiste, to expose and resist the errors of the Spirite to which we have alluded. The doctrine of Reincarnation, M. Pierart has persistently resisted and denounced as at once false, unfounded on any evidence, and most pernicious to the character of Spiritualism."

Allen Kardec died in 1869. Even though receiving communications through physical mediumship was not favored by his followers, physical phenomena of all kinds were recorded in Pierart's journal and others. Characteristic aspects of non-Kardecean Spiritualism in France may be found in such sources.

French Spiritualism

The first well marked impulse that Spiritualism received in France was owed to the visits of D. D. Home, the celebrated medium, and subsequently to the large influx of professional mediums who found in France an excellent field for the demonstration of their gifts.

Home's séances remain the most remarkable of their kind. His manifestations were given almost exclusively in the presence of persons of rank or those distinguished by literary fame. During his residence in Paris, under the Imperial régime, he was a frequent visitor at the court of Emperor Louis Napoleon.

A record of the manifestations produced through his mediumship was kept by command of the empress and frequently read to her favored friends. Among these memoranda is one published in the papers when it occurred. It concerns a séance held at the Tuileries when only the emperor, the empress, the duchess of Montebello, and Home were present:

Pen, ink, and paper were placed on the table and a spirit hand was seen. It dipped the pen into the ink and wrote the name of the first Napoleon, in perfect likeness of that monarch's handwriting. The emperor asked if he could kiss this wonderful hand. It instantly rose to his lips, subsequently passing to those of the empress, and Home. The emperor preserved this precious autograph, and inscribed it with a note that the hand was warm, soft, and resembled that of his great predecessor and uncle.

As evidence of the wide popularity Spiritualism had attained by 1869, Pierart quotes an article by Eugène Bonnemère from the Siécle, a leading paper that editorialized against the movement:

"Although somnambulism has been a hundred times annihilated by the Academy of Medicine, it is more alive than ever in Paris; in the midst of all the lights of the age, it continues, right or wrong, to excite the multitude. Protean in its forms, infinite in its manifestations, if you put it out of the door, it knocks at the window; if that be not opened, it knocks on the ceiling, on the walls; it raps on the table at which you innocently seat yourselves to dine or for a game of whist. If you close your ears to its sounds, it grows excited, strikes the table, whirls it about in a giddy maze, lifts up its feet, and proceeds to talk through mediumship, as the dumb talk with their fingers.

"You have all known the rage for table-turning. At one time we ceased to ask after each other's health, but asked how your table was. 'Thank you, mine turns beautifully; and how goes yours on?' Everything turned; hats and the heads in them. One was led almost to believe that a circle of passengers being formed round the mainmast of a ship of great tonnage, and a magnetic chain thus established, they might make the vessel spin round till it disappeared in the depth of the ocean, as a gimlet disappears in a deal board. The Church interfered; it caused its thunders to roar, declaring that it was Satan himself who thus raised the devil in the tables, and having formally forbade the world to turn, it now forbade the faithful to turn tables, hats, brains, or ships of huge size. But Satan held his own. The sovereign of the nether world passed into a new one, and that is the reason that America sends us mediums, beginning so gloriously with the famous Home, and ending with the Brothers Davenport. One remembers with what a frenzy everyone precipitated himself in pursuit of mediums. Everyone wished to have one of his own; and when you introduced a young man into society, you did not say, 'He is a good waltzer,' but, 'He is a medium.' Official science has killed and buried this Somnambulism a score of times; but it must have done it very badly, for there it is as alive as ever, only christened afresh with a new name."

Among the many distinguished adherents of Spiritualism in France, most prominent were astronomer Camille Flammarion, authors Victor Hugo and Alexandre Dumas, and Victorien Sardou, the renowned writer of French comedy. Sardou was himself a talented medium. He executed a number of drawings purporting to represent scenes in the spirit world. Among them was an exquisite and complex work of art entitled The House of Mozart.

In addition to Home and the Davenport brothers, many other famous mediums visited France, including Henry Slade, William Eglinton, Elizabeth d'Esperance, Florence Cook and Lottie Fowler. They stimulated interest in the scientific investigation of claimed phenomena.

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

The formation of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) in Britain in 1882 led to scientific interest in Spiritualism all over the world. One of the pioneers of French psychical research was the physiologist Charles Richet, who was elected president of the SPR in 1905. Another notable Frenchman with an interest in the findings of psychical research was the philospher Henri Bergson, elected president of the SPR in 1913. (Bergson's sister was a devoted practitioner of magic.)

The engineer Gabriel Delanne had founded the Societé d'Etude des Phénomènes Psychiques and studied various mediums. In 1890 the Annales des Sciences Psychiques was first published under the direction of a Dr. Dariex and Richet (an English edition was published beginning in 1905).

In 1918, through the generosity of Jean Meyer, the Institut Métapsychique International was founded and Richet became its first honorary president. Meyer, a follower of Kardec, had founded Le Maison des Spirites to propagate knowledge of Spiritism, and he founded the Institut Métapsychique for psychical research. In 1920 the Revue Métapsychique became the official publication of the Institut and continued the excellent work of the earlier Annales des Sciences Psychique. The Revue Métapsychique is still the leading publication of its kind.

Richet's interest in psychical research stemmed from the work of Col. Eugen Rochas, who had experimented with hypnosis and human radiation. Other workers in the field of human radiations included Dr. Paul Joire, Hippolyte Baraduc, Emile Boirac, Dr. Joseph Maxwell, Prof. Blondlot, Jules Regnault, Louis Favre, and G. de Fontenay.

French workers in the field of psychical research included Paul Gibier, Alfred Binet, Pierre Janet, Gustave Geley, Theodore Flournoy, Eugèn Osty, René Sudre, and Rene Warcollier. Another notable researcher was Cesar de Vesme, whose Histoire du Spiritualisme experimentale (History of Experimental Spiritualism, 1928) was awarded a prize by the Paris Académie des Sciences. Geley experimented with the famous medium Eva C., who specialized in materialization phenomena; Flournoy investigated the strange talents of the medium Hélène Smith.

In the transition from psychical research to parapsychology, the Groupe d'Etudes et de Recherches en Parapsychologie (GERP) was formed in 1971. GERP experimenters studied animal parapsychology and possible cases of psychokinesis. Other experiments include those of Paul and Christiane Vasse, who have studied plant germination and growth in relation to mental effects.

The Laboratory of Parapsychology was founded in Bordeaux by Dr. Jean Barry, who experimented with PK effects on fungi virus. Other PK experiments have been conducted by engineers G. Chevalier and De Cressac. Another modern researcher is Dr. R. Dufour, who experimented with clairvoyance and psychometry.

Among the more noteworthy modern developments was the establishment of the Centre d'Eclairagisme headed by Yvonne Duplessis, aided by a grant from the Parapsychology Foundation in New York. The center specialized in the subject of eyeless sight, first propagated by the great novelist Jules Romains, and volunteers have discovered the ability of blind persons to distinguish colors.

Radiesthesia and Out-of-the-Body Travel

An offshoot of interest in "human radiation" through the research of Baraduc and others has been French interest in such subjects as radiesthesia and astral projection. It has always been difficult to draw a line between such subjects as psychical research, Spiritualism, and radiesthesia, and in the past many prominent French psychical researchers endorsed Spiritualist beliefs and astral projection out of their belief in the reality of the human soul or subtle body. Some researchers who claim to have detected human radiation have also propagated concepts of the subtle body; Baraduc claimed to have photographed it.

Radiesthesia, a French term for dowsing and divining for water and metals, is specifically concerned with subtle radiation, not only human but also animal and mineral. French experimenters have specialized in the use of the pendulum in place of the divining rod, and a number of exponents of radiesthesia were priests. Radiesthesiests developed the use of the pendulum in prospecting over a map of an area in order to trace minerals, water, or even detect the movement of individuals. Another interesting application of radiesthesia is in diagnosis of health and disease in individuals. In 1930 a society was formed under the name L' Association des Amis de la Radiesthesie, including among its members were engineers and doctors. The monthly journal La Chronique des Sourciers was issued under the editorship of its president le Vicomte Henry de France. It was superseded by two currently published journals: Radiésthesie and Les Amis de la Radiésthesie.

Closely associated with radiesthesia is the comprehensive study of psychotronics, described as the study of the relationship of man to the universe, interaction with other physical bodies and matter, and fields of energy, known or unknown. The Organisation pour la Recherche en Psychotronique publishes the Revue Française de Psychotronique at Siége Social Bureau 644, U.E.R. de Mathématiques, Universite Toulouse le Mirail.

A pioneer experimenter in out-of-the-body travel was a Frenchman, Marcel Louis Forhan, whose book Le Médecin de l'Âme was first published in English as Practical Astral Projection in 1935, under the pseudonym Yram. Yram's record of his personal experiences antedated the 1938 book Astral Projection, by Oliver Fox (Hugh G. Callaway), so important to the launching of research on the topic in English-speaking countries.

Sources:

Baraduc, Hippolyte. L'Âme humaine. Paris, 1896.

Cauzons, Theodore de. La Magie et la Sorcellerie en France. 4 vols. Paris, 1900.

De France, Henri Vicomte. The Elements of Dowsing. London: G. Bell & Son, 1948.

Delanne, Gabriel. Evidence for a Future Life. London: Philip Wellby/New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1904.

Deleuze, J. P. F. Practical Instruction in Animal Magnetism. Rev. ed. New York: Samuel R. Wells, 1846.

De Vesme, Cesar. A History of Experimental Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Rider, 1931.

Du Potet, Baron. Magnetism and Magic. London: Allen & Unwin, 1927.

Geley, Gustave. From the Unconscious to the Conscious. London: William Collins Sons, 1920.

Flournoy, Theodore. From India to the Planet Mars. New York & London, 1900. Huxley, Aldous. The Devils of Loudon. London, 1952. Reprint, New York: Harper, 1971.

Joire, Paul. Psychical and Supernormal Phenomena. London: William Rider & Son, 1916.

Kardec, Allan. The Mediums' Book (Experimental Spiritism). London, 1876.

Michelet, Jules. The Sorceress. London, 1905. Reprinted as Satanism and Witchcraft. Wehman, 1939.

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research. London: W. Collins Sons, 1923. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Summers, Montague. The Geography of Witchcraft. London, 1927. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1958.

———. The Werewolf. London, 1933. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Yram [Marcel Louis Forhan]. Practical Astral Projection. London: Rider, 1935. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, n.d.

Franck (or Frank), Sebastian (ca. 1499–ca. 1543)

Sixteenth-century visionary and freethinker. In 1531 he published the treatise L'Arbu de la science du bien et du mal, dont Adam a mangé la mort, et dont encore aujourd'hui tous les hommes la mangent. According to this work, the sin of Adam is an allegory and the Tree of Knowledge represents the person, will, knowledge, and life of Adam.

Franck's major publication was his Chronica, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibel (1536), based on the Nuremberg Chronicle. His Guldin Arch (1538) discusses pagan parallels to Christian sentiments and caused Franck trouble with religious authorities, who accused him of heresy. He was contemptuously criticized by Luther as "a devil's mouth." And yet although Franck is usually grouped with other spiritual reformers or mystics of his time, because he rebelled against the rigidity of mainstream religion, he was a universalist and claimed no authority or special insight by virtue of some unique personal revelation. He did not engage in fanciful verbal mysticism and had no predilection for magic.

Sources:

Franck, Sebastian. Paradoxa. Jena, Germany: E. Diederichs, 1909.

Gillispie, Charles Coulston, ed. Dictionary of Scientific Biography. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1970–76.

Williams, George H. The Radical Reformation. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1962.

Wollgast, Siegfried. Der deutsche Pantheismus im 16. Jahrhundert. Berlin: Deutscher Verlag der Wissenschaften, 1972.

Francke, Christian (1549–ca. 1595)

A sixteenth-century visionary who frequently changed his religion, which gained him the nickname "Weathercock." He believed the religion of Japan to be the best because he had read that its ministers were ecstatic. He published Colloquium Jesuiticum in 1579.

Frankenstein

The name of the creator of the archetypal zombielike artificial man, as well as the moniker given his creation. Frankenstein; or, the Modern Prometheus, by Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley (1797–1851), a classic of English occult fiction, was first published in London in 1818 in three volumes. It tells the story of how Dr. Victor Frankenstein creates an artificial man out of fragments of bodies from churchyards and dissecting rooms—a human form without a soul. The monster longs for love and sympathy but inspires only horror and loathing and becomes a powerful force for evil. It seeks revenge against its creator, murdering his friend, brother, and bride and ultimately bringing death to Frankenstein himself.

The book owes much to discussions of the time regarding the scientific work of Erasmus Darwin and to theories of spontaneous generation and the power of electricity, and is thus also an early science-fiction story. In her introduction Mary Shelley writes of the possibility that a corpse might be reanimated.

The book also contains powerful writing with an overall theme of the moral limits of science and technology. The subtitle refers to the question of whether science has the right to usurp the divine function of creation. (Prometheus was a mythological Greek who stole fire from heaven and thereafter suffered a horrible punishment from the god Zeus.) The book was also popular as a modern myth of the dangers of the industrial era and the many unplanned horrors created by human inventions manufactured to be a boon to the race.

Mary Wollstonecraft wrote a first draft of the story of Frankenstein in the company of Percy Shelley, Lord Byron, John Polidori, and Claire Clairmont when the group spent a week taking opium while vacationing at the Villa Diodati, Geneva, in the summer of 1816. Polidori's The Vampyre, came from a suggestion by Byron that weekend and generated interest in another monster theme, culminating in such later thrillers as Bram Stoker's Dracula (1897).

Sources:

Baldrick, Chris. In Frankenstein's Shadow: Myth, Monstrosity, and Nineteenth-Century Writing. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Florescu, Radu. In Search of Frankenstein. New York: New York Graphic Society, 1975.

Forry, Steven Earl. Hideous Progenies: Dramatizations of Frankenstein from Mary Shelley to the Present. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.

Glut, Donald F. The Frankenstein Catalog. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1984.

Troop, Martin. Mary Shelley's Monster. Houghton Mifflin, 1977.

Franklin, Benjamin (1706–1790)

A versatile statesman, printer, inventor, scientist, and diplomat, Franklin was also associated with the occult doctrine of his time, although his attitude was largely skeptical. He was familiar with astrology, and while at college he calculated the horoscope of another student named Titus Leads, allegedly predicting the exact time of his death.

In 1784 Franklin was a member of the committee of the Academie des Sciences in Paris, which reported on the phenomena of Franz Anton Mesmer during the furor created by animal magnetism. Although certain aspects of animal magnetism were acknowledged by the committee, the report attributed these to other causes. Franklin associated with Rosicrucians and became a Freemason in February 1730, a member of the Lodge of the Nine Muses, which was said to have influenced the French Revolution.

Franklyn, Julian (1899–1970)

British author, lecturer, and editor, active in the field of parapsychology. Born December 30, 1899, in London, Franklyn became an expert on London Cockneys and their slang, as well as heraldry. He was a member of the Heraldry Society and the Society of Genealogists.

He was editor of an important compilation titled A Survey of the Occult (1935), reprinted as A Dictionary of the Occult (1973). He also published articles on parapsychological topics in Tomorrow magazine and wrote a variety of nonoccult books, including The Cockney (1953), A Dictionary of Rhyming Slang (1960), Shield and Crest (1960), and A Dictionary of Nicknames (1962). His final book, on witchcraft, was Death by Enchantment, published posthumously in 1971.

Sources:

Franklyn, Julian. Death by Enchantment. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1971.

———. A Survey of the Occult. London, 1935. Reprinted as A Dictionary of the Occult. New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fraser-Harris, David (Fraser) (1867–1937)

Professor of physiology and histology who also took an active interest in psychical research. Born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in February 1867, Fraser-Harris had a distinguished career in Scotland, Birmingham, and later in Nova Scotia.

His first experiences in psychical research were at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research, founded by Harry Price, in May 1931 while investigating the claimed materialization phenomena of Helen Duncan. Following this he attended seances with the medium Rudi Schneider from February to May 1932 and testified (Hibbert Journal, October 1932) to Schneider's genuine telekinetic powers. He suggested the term teledynamist for physical mediums.

In addition to his books on medical and technical subjects, Fraser-Harris published Sixth Sense (1928) and The Rhythms of Life (1929). He contributed articles to the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research and occasionally lectured at the British College of Psychic Science. He died January 3, 1937.

Sources:

Fraser-Harris, David. The Great Design: Order and Progress in Nature. New York: Macmillan, 1934.

Fraternitas L. V. X. Occulta

The Fraternitas L. V. X. Occulta, also known as the Fraternity of the Hidden Light, is one of several contemporary groups inspired by the tradition of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (HOGD), the British magical order that flourished at the beginning of the twentieth century. It was founded in 1982 in Covina, California. It is the assertion of the leaders of the Fraternity of the Hidden Light that early in the century, leaders of the HOGD reorganized as a mystery school and a transitional body whose task was to bring in the New Age. That mystery school is now assuming a more public profile.

The fraternity draws the substance of its teachings from the Hermetic writings attributed to Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus. Atunement to the ancient wisdom has suggested three primary objectives for the fraternity: preserving and perpetuating the ancient wisdom, training individuals in the wisdom tradition so that they can develop a life of selfless service, and promulgating the ancient wisdom in society. The fraternity teachings include instruction on the use of the Tarot, astrology, alchemy, and occult psychology. These are offered through a graded progressive curriculum that includes instruction in practices such as meditation and in the performance of magical ritual. Ritual centers upon high magic, i.e., that aimed at altering the consciousness of the magician.

The fraternity was founded and is now headed by Paul A. Clark. It is organized in three levels: an outer training level; a second level of the accomplished magicians; and a third level of the Great Adapts who are believed to guide the fraternity in its course. The individuals composing the third level are equivalent to the Great White Brotherhood or the Hidden Masters spoken of by other occult orders. The fraternity may be contacted at Box 5094, Covina, CA 91723. It publishes several periodicals including The Hidden Light and has a web presence at http://www.lvx.org.

Sources:

Clark, Paul A. The Book of the Rose. Covina, Calif.: Fraternity of the Hidden Light, 1985.

Fraternitas Rosae Crucis

The Fraternitas Rosae Crucis is the oldest of the several presently existing Rosicrucian bodies. Founded by Paschal Beverly Randolph (1825–75) in 1858, its first lodge opened in San Francisco in 1861. The fraternity had an unstable history throughout the nineteenth century, as Randolph moved around the country; on three occasions it closed for a period and reopened first in Boston (1871), then again in San Francisco (1874), and following Randolph's death in Philadelphia (1895).

According to Randolph's claim, he became the Supreme Hierarch of the Rosicrucian Fraternity in 1846, the same year he retired from the sea and settled in Philadelphia. However, it was not until 1861 that he organized the First Grand Lodge. As American Rosicrucianism developed, Randolph formulated his ideas in dialogue with Spiritualism. He championed the act of volition as a central element in occult development and decried the need of mediums to go into trance and lose control in order to obtain results. The mature mystical system formed the teachings given out to members of the fraternity. Randolph developed a process of occult transmutation, by which the base self was transformed into the finest spiritual gold. The teachings included a belief in reincarnation and the development of a healthy body through natural means. The inner circle of the fraternity, to whom its highest teachings were given, was called the Aeth Priesthood. Closely associated with the fraternity was the Church of Illumination.

Randolph died at a relatively young age in 1875. He was succeeded by Freeman B. Dowd, and he in turn by Edward H. Brown (1907), R. Swinburne Clymer (1922), and Emerson M. Clymer. The order was largely moribund during the last decades of the nineteenth century, but was revived primarily through the efforts of Swinburne Clymer, a natural physician and writer, who wrote numerous books and led the fight to legitimize the fraternity, whose place was challenged by newer groups such as the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC) and the Rosicrucian Fellowship, both founded in the early twentieth century.

The fraternity was headquartered at a rural complex near Quakertown, Pennsylvania. It was headed by a Council of Three and the Hierarch of Eulis. Included in that complex were the Humanitarian Society and the Clymer Health Clinic, both of which continue Randolph's and Clymer's concern for naturalistic health services. Last known address: c/o Beverly Hall, Quakertown, PA 18951.

Sources:

Clymer, R. Swinburne. The Age of Treason. Quakertown, Pa.: Humanitarian Society, 1959.

———. The Rose Cross Order. Allentown, Pa.: Philosophical Publishing, 1916.

———. The Rosicrucian Fraternity in America. 2 vols. Quakertown, PA: Rosicrucian Foundation, 1935.

———. The Rosy Cross: Its Teachings. Quakertown, Pa.: Beverly Hall, 1965.

Deveney, John Patrick. Paschal Beverly Randolph: A Nineteenth-Century Black American Spiritualist, Rosicrucian, and Sex Magician. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.

Fraternitas Saturni

An influential occult group in Germany before World War II, headed by Albin Grau as grand master, accepting much of the teachings of Aleister Crowley. The group was disbanded by the Nazis in 1933 but reorganized in 1945.

A German ritual magic group the Fraternitas Saturni grew out of the spread of Crowley's ideas in Germany in the 1920s among members of the Grand Pansophical Lodge, a Masonic occult order. Among the leaders of the lodge was Eugen Grosche, better known as Gregor A. Gregorius. Gregorius was favorably impressed by Crowley's ideas of a new aeon of magic activity characterized by the law of thelema (will) and his teachings on sexual magic, but did not wish to associate directly with Crowley or any of the organizations he headed. In 1926 he led in the dissolving of the Pansophical Lodge and the formation of the Fraternitas Saturni, drawing additional inspiration from reports of Saturnian lodges that had existed in Germany in earlier centuries.

Gregorius began to write a series of books and documents for the new fraternity, borrowing heavily from Crowley's works. The lodge was suppressed shortly after Hitler came to power in 1933 and Gregorius moved to Switzerland. He was extradited to Germany in 1943 but survived the war and refounded the group in 1945. Its growth was delayed by its location in Soviet territory through the late 1940s. The lodge was not truly revived until 1950, when Gregorius was able to move to west Germany. In 1957 a grand lodge was established in Berlin and Gregorius was declared its grand master, a position he held until his death in 1964.

After Gregorius's death the lodge went through a period of dissension and split into three factions. Copies of materials that had been kept secret were handed over to Dr. Aldolf Hemberger, who published them along with his study of the group. Finally, in 1971, the three factions of the fraternity reunited and returned to their secret ritual life. The order continues to exist in Germany, according to reports.

In the 1970s the Fraternitas Saturni emerged in Toronto, Ontario, under the leadership of Frater Set-Orion, the North American grand master. Its present status is uncertain. Copies of the pre-1969 rituals were published in English in 1990 by Edred Flowers, who manifested no knowledge of any North American lodge.

Sources:

Flowers, S. Edred. Fire and Ice: Magical Teachings of Germany's Greatest Secret Occult Order. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1990.

Fraternity of the Inner Light See Society of the Inner Light

Fraud

Spiritualism is unique as a religious community. In no other religious group have substantive charges of fraud played such a large part, and within no other group has the need to confront fraud had such an effect upon its development. Soon after the founding of the movement charges of deliberate fraud were leveled against a growing number of mediums, and the movement itself was charged with complicity in the fraud and a refusal to rid itself of obviously fraudulent leaders.

The frequency with which mediums were exposed in acts of trickery and even convicted of fraud induced many people—concluding the bulk of the phenomena to be fraudulently produced—to abandon both the movement and psychical research. The era of systematic research on Spiritualist phenomena came to a close in the 1930s when psychical researchers concluded that there was little, if anything, real in physical phenomena. Psychical research was gradually superseded by laboratory-oriented parapsychology. In most countries Spiritualism was pushed to the fringes of the community of people interested in paranormal phenomena and has never regained its credibility. It is conspicuously absent from the New Age movement.

The question of fraud is an interesting and complicated one, however, worthy of the student's attention. Simple deception practiced for money was founded, but there were also many instances of apparently deliberate trickery in which there was no reward to be obtained, and even some cases in which the medium seemed entirely innocent and ignorant of the fraud.

The great majority of fraud was related to the production of physical phenomena, especially materialization, apports, and the levitation of trumpets and other objects. A significant portion of the mental phenomena remains that provides an interesting arena for research and explains the continuing fascination with the paranormal.

Conscious and Unconscious Fraud

It is helpful to distinguish between conscious and unconscious fraud, although at times one seemed to shade imperceptibly into the other. During the century (1850–1950) when researchers turned their attention to Spiritualism, conscious fraud most often appeared in connection with physical phenomena. Almost at the outset of the spiritualistic movement (i.e., in 1851) three doctors demonstrated that the rappings that attended the Fox sisters were produced by manipulation of the knee and toe joints, a fact that was soon afterward corroborated by a relative of the Fox family. In the wake of the sisters' contradictory claims, confessions, and recantations the evidence was declared inconclusive, but the possibility of fraud had been shown.

After that many mediums have at one time or another been detected in fraud, and every phase of physical mediumship was eventually discredited. Slate writing, spirit photography, and materialization were all in turn exposed, and now exist only in the fringes of Spiritualism, primarily at Camps Chesterfield in Indiana and Silver Belle in Pennsylvania and in the several churches associated with them. A major exposure of materialization fraud was published as late as 1960 in the Psychic Observer by Andrija Puharich. The result of the exposure was the bankruptcy of the periodical. In the 1970s Lamar Keene, a Spiritualist medium heavily involved in the production of fraudulent phenomena, left the profession and published his memoirs. In the 1980s magician James Randi discovered several faith healers operating on the fringe of the Pentecostal community using some old conjuring tricks to convince their audiences that miracles were occurring.

Time and again, sitters beheld the form and features of the medium in the materialized spirit; shadowy figures in filmy draperies were shown to be dummies wrapped in muslin. False beards and white draperies were found on the medium's person. Apports—jewels, flowers, perfumes, objects d'art—were smuggled into the séance room in order to be showered upon the sitters by generous "spirits." Threads and human hairs were used to move furniture and other objects. More elaborate and complicated machinery was sometimes provided, but more often the fake medium depended upon sleight of hand and skillful suggestion to accomplish his ends. Some of the mediums were so skilled that professional magicians admitted to séances failed to discover the modus operandi of the phenomena, which would only be revealed at a later date.

Fraud can also be illustrated by many instances of self-styled clairvoyance where the medium acquired information by muscle-reading, or by judicious inquiry before the séance. Fraud of this kind may have been either conscious or unconscious.

A large group of automatic phenomena occuring when the medium was in a trance state must be classed under the heading of unconscious fraud. In many of the more pronounced cases of automatism, the agent was not consciously responsible for his or her acts. There was a slighter degree of automatism where the agent may have been partly conscious of, and responsible for, the phenomena. The latter state, if frequently induced and if the automatist's willpower was somewhat relaxed, may have passed into the more profound stage, so that fraud that was at first conscious and voluntary may have become unconscious and spontaneous. Thus it is extremely difficult to know when an accusation of fraud was fairly brought against a medium.

There is evidence that many trance mediums reproduced in their discourses information subconsciously acquired at some more or less remote period. The trance utterances of Leonora Piper, Rosina Thompson, and others revealed this peculiarity. It is true that extensive and apparently fraudulent arrangements were sometimes made before a séance. It is possible, though unlikely, that such preparations were made automatically in a state similar to the mediumistic trance.

Spiritualists themselves were often called to face exposures of undoubted fraud, and on such occasions various apologies of a more or less ingenious nature were sometimes offered for the fraudulent medium. Sometimes it was said that the medium was controlled by a mischievous, lying, or lower spirit who made use of the medium's physical organism to perform tricks and deceptions, an apology that opened Spiritualists to charges of demonic possession from Christian detractors. It was sometimes stated that the medium felt an irresistible impulse to perform the action that he or she knew was in the mind of the control.

Italian medium Eusapia Palladino sometimes extended her hand involuntarily in the direction in which movement of furniture was to take place, although without actual contact. Perceiving that the spirits desired to move the object, she was impelled to attempt a physical (and fraudulent) forestalling of the action, it was said. Other investigators who examined this medium's phenomena declared that their production caused Palladino a great deal of pain and fatigue, and that she therefore seized an opportunity to produce them easily and without trouble. Such an opportunity, they held, only presented itself when their rigorous precautions were relaxed.

The same explanation was given in connection with other mediums. Following cases of materialization séances when the spirit form was grasped and found to be the medium, apologists attempted an elaborate if ultimately unsatisfying explanation. A certain amount of the medium's physical energy, it was suggested, was imparted to the spirit. If the latter was roughly handled, spirit and medium would unite for their joint benefit, either within or outside of the cabinet. If the medium possessed the greater amount of energy she drew the spirit to herself. If most of the energy belonged to the materialized spirit the medium would instantly be attracted to the spirit. The fact that the latter invariably happened had no significance for committed Spiritualists.

Alternatively, Spiritualists suggested, as did Sergeant Cox, on one occasion, that the medium was controlled in order to impersonate a spirit entity.

Whatever the reason for fraud, it became clear to psychical researchers that even the most honorable medium could not be trusted without reserve, even if his character in normal life was blameless and there was no apparent objective for committing fraud. Investigators had to rely on the strictest vigilance and the most up-to-date scientific methods and apparatus.

The Mechanics of Fraud

While some Spiritualists were apologists for the most questionable phenomena and proved themselves the exponents of an intense "will to believe," a few manifested an eagerness to challenge and expose fraudulent mediumship and proved themselves far from gullible. On a few occasions Spiritualists joined in the exposure of fraudulent colleagues, such as the celebrated rogue William Roy, although these instances were rare.

From the time of the Hydesville phenomena many mediums, including most all the physical mediums, were accused of cheating and fell victim to compromising exposures. In the attempt to test the genuineness of the extraordinary claims of Spiritualism, mediums were pursued both by people who hoped the phenomena proved true and skeptics eager to uncover fraud. The means of fraudulent production of phenomena has a literature of its own. Hereward Carrington aptly stated:

"The ingenuity of some of these methods is simply amazing, and in some respects the race between fraudulent mediums and psychical investigators has resembled that between burglars and police—to see which could outwit the other. It may be said, however, that these trick methods are now well known. To take one simple example, it may be pointed out that Mr. David O. Abbot's book Behind the Scenes with the Mediums and my own Psychical Phenomena of Spiritualism have between them explained more than a hundred different methods of fraudulent slate-writing."

More efficient controls evolved with the development of the science of deception. Wooden sleeves and pants were tied on the Davenport brothers in Bangor, Maine. Augustus Politi was brought before the psychical research society of Milan in a woolen sack. Elizabeth d'Esperance, Mrs. C. E. Wood, and Annie Fairlamb were meshed in nets like fish to prevent masquerading during their séances of materialization. Florence Cook was closed into an electrical circuit. Charles Bailey was shut in a cage with mosquito netting. Eusapia Palladino was tied by Enrico Morselli to the couch with a thick, broad band of surgical tape like that used in asylums to fasten down violent lunatics. Rudi Schneider was under a formidable triple control while being tested at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research.

From the simple method of holding the medium (one of the most efficient methods of control) to the electrical indicators and infrared cameras of modern psychical research laboratories (as in the Institut Métapsychique), a long line of evolution might be traced to the point where fraud was reduced to a negligible factor. To operate fraudulently under the conditions thus imposed might be a far greater marvel than a genuine physical phenomenon.

With mental phenomena the control was more laborious and fraught with many psychological difficulties. There is no doubt, however, that persevering examination of an imposture inevitably leads to the discovery of the source of deception. Through the early twentieth century many physical mediums avoided detection primarily because of the ineptness of the observers.

As early as 1894 pioneering researcher F. W. H. Myers divided séance-room phenomena into three classes. The first and by far the largest class consisted of tricks whose mechanism was perfectly well known—as well known as the way in which the ordinary conjurer produced the rabbit from the hat. These tricks, indeed, were generally on a lower level than those of the conjurer at a fair, but in spite of repeated exposures they deceived the great mass of seekers hoping and expecting to contact the supernatural.

The second class consisted of phenomena somewhat similar to those of the first class, but that confounded the average magician, who was unable to reproduce the phenomena. If these phenomena were genuine, the first class may be called imitations of them. If they were fraudulent, they indicate that here and there a so-called medium had professional secrets of his own.

The third class consisted of a few rarely attested phenomena, of which Home fire-tests are examples, which were not imitated with any kind of plausibility, even by the most accomplished conjurers. This leads to the hypothesis that genuine mysterious phenomena have occurred, or, equally interesting, that some kind of hallucination was induced in the observers in some readily imitable manner.

In the past, charges of fraud often resulted from a lack of knowledge of unsuspected possibilities. William H. Mumler, the first spirit photographer, was promptly accused of trickery when, instead of the spirit of the dead, the double of the living appeared on his plate. The famous third limbs or "pseudopods" of Eusapia Palladino were first ascribed to movement of her hands.

The suggestion that a mysterious substance, ectoplasm, existed as an agent for physical phenomena provided some critical examples of the problem of fraud in psychical research. For example, in his experiments with the Goligher Circle, William J. Crawford posited the existence of ectoplasm to account for some otherwise odd phenomena carring minute particles of fresh paint discovered on objects and on the medium's body. It was later discovered that the phenomena in the circle was fraudulently produced. The idea of ectoplasm was later abandoned altogether, but before that searching out the substance and attempting to define its properties proved a formidable task for psychical researchers.

Charles Richet, for example, suggested that "there is a quasi-identity between the medium and ectoplasm, so that when an attempt is made to seize the latter a limb of the medium may be grasped; though I make a definite and formal protest against this frequent defence of doubtful phenomena by the spiritualists. More frequently the ectoplasm is independent of the medium, indeed, perhaps it is always so."

Apologies for Fraud

The resemblance of the materialized phantom to the medium was a frequent source of the accusations throughout the history of materializations. The more dedicated argued that the double of the medium served as a model for the first materialization and appeared before the manifestation of true phantoms.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle suggested that the medium's double served as a pattern on which the temporary new body was built. He carried the suggestion too far, however. In pointing out that in certain cases so much ectoplasm was taken from the medium that hardly anything was left behind than an invisible simulacrum, he conjectured that when a materialized figure was seized it might not dematerialize into the simulacrum but absorb the residue of the medium. The acceptance of such a naive explanation would have opened the gates of fraud and made it nearly impossible to present evidence in case of brazen fraud.

The problem, however, was not so complicated as Doyle suggested. The simple truth was that nearly all materializing mediums were from time to time exposed by spirit grabbing. The "ectoplasm" was often seen to disappear, but quite often the medium was found in undergarments and without shoes, so that conscious or unconscious masquerade appeared to be incontestable.

It was suggested that many genuine mediums, when they felt their powers ebbing, could not resist the temptation of supplementing then by artifice. Some, in an extreme state of suggestibility, might have obeyed the secret urging of a deceitful person. Such was the defense of Eusapia Palladino in an instance in Genoa before Cesare Lombroso. Julien Ochorowitz said, "When it is understood that the medium is but a mirror for reflecting and directing the nervous energies of the sitters to an ideoplastic purpose, it will not be found surprising that suggestion should play an important part. With controllers imbued with the notion of fraud the medium will be dominated by the suggestion of fraud."

Gustav Geley was forced to declare that "when a medium tricks the experimenters are responsible." Hereward Carrington's advice in the case of genuine mediums who resorted to trickery was "to say nothing but to let the medium see by one's manner that one is displeased and the phenomena evidently not convincing. If she perceives that such attempts are useless, she will settle down, pass into a trance, and genuine phenomena will be obtained." In his Mysterious Psychic Forces (1907), Camille Flammarion notes:

"One may lay it down as a principle that all professional mediums cheat. But they do not always cheat; and they possess real, undeniable psychic powers. Their case is nearly that of the hysterical folk under observation at the Salpétrière or elsewhere. I have seen some of them outwit with their profound craft not only Dr. Charcot, but especially Dr. Luys and all the physicians who were making a study of their cases. But because hysterics deceive and simulate it would be gross error to conclude that hysteria does not exist."

Unconscious fraud was facilitated by the anesthetic condition observed by William James in automatic writing, which involved the medium's hands and arms to a considerable degree. James H. Hyslop found this as an explanation when, with the medium's consent, he made several flashlight photographs of the production of physical phenomena. The medium was dumbfounded when the pictures were shown to her. They plainly showed that she produced every manifestation.

The unconscious impulse to cheat is sometimes quite beyond control. Laura I. Finch, editor of the Annals of Psychic Science, confessed that once, during a materialization séance, she felt a nearly overpowering impulse to roll up her sleeve in the cabinet and pass her arm out between the curtains.

Andrew Jackson Davis adduced the impulse as a partial explanation of the Stratford Poltergeist phenomena that occurred in the home of Eliakim Phelps. The testimonial given to Henry Gordon by the Springfield Harmonial Circle in January 1851 attempted an explanation:

"It may be stated, however, as a circumstance which seems to have been the cause of some misapprehension, that the individual referred to is highly susceptible to the magnetic power of the spirits, and that under the influence of an impression which he is unable to resist, he occasionally endeavors to perform the very action which he perceives to be in the mind of the spirit."

Professor Haraldur Neilsson of Iceland quoted a case in Psychic Science (July 1925) in which a perfectly senseless fraud was committed by one of the circle and a spirit afterward confessed to instigating the fraud.

A few have suggested, though it stretches credulity, that a state of dissociated consciousness prompting automatic preparations for fraud before a séance be considered as a possibility for understanding a medium's tricks. Such activity might be attributed to a form of "posthypnotic promise." Frank Podmore suggested that in trance the medium may promise to apport flowers in the next séance and then, in the waking state, might buy them and hide them in the séance room without conscious knowledge. Some hint of this possibility is given in Philippe Tissé's book Les Rèves (Paris, 1890), which narrates the case of a man who repeatedly commits thefts in the daytime under the effect of a dream in the night before.

Fraud by Psychical Researchers and Parapsychologists

Accredited scientists who performed psychical research were expected to have training in various disciplines that made them reliable observers and experimenters. It was assumed that only mediums were likely to practice fraud and that it was the task of the scientist to expose any fraud. Many scientists approached the paranormal already convinced that claimed phenomena must be fraudulent (or the result of some other mundane explanation), since they not only violated accepted physical laws but contradicted their own personal experience. Thus, to the average scientist examining mediums, it was only a matter of finding out how a medium cheated.

In the nineteenth century many scientists had a devout religious heritage, a heritage they felt had been stolen from them by science. When the opportunity of using science to reconstruct the lost foundations upon which their traditional religious beliefs had been constructed, they eagerly pursued it. The biographies of the founders of psychical research suggest that just such a motivation energized their investigations.

The possibility of rebuilding a lost faith coupled with the genuine scientific breakthrough that would result if their work proved fruitful was enough to test the integrity of any individual. The contemporary awareness of fraud in every area of scientific endeavor testifies to the temptation to cheat, even when the likely reward was far less than that afforded by any positive data in psychical research. It is to the credit of psychical research that no serious charges of fraud were leveled at the primary people involved in leading the Society for Psychical Research and the American Society for Psychical Research during its foundational years.

Within the last decade or so, however, a formidable attack on the credibility of Sir William Crookes was sustained. He allegedly was a party to deception by the medium Florence Cook because he was sexually involved with her, and the séances were a coverup for the affair.

There is every reason to doubt much of Cook's phenomena; the claim that Crookes was her lover is not conclusive, but does explain why he reported so favorably on them, given his scientific training and later unquestioned accomplishments. Crookes's defenders have argued that he was scrupulous in his other investigations of psychical phenomena, and that it would be absurd to attempt to invalidate his work with Daniel Dunglas Home, for example, on the grounds that he was sexually involved with him. Yet the question remains: if Cook was a fraud, why was Crookes so completely taken in?

After the death of veteran psychical researcher Harry Price, other researchers declared that Price had been guilty of deception in the famous case of the haunting of Borley Rectory, and that doubt must therefore be cast upon his other investigations. In his biography The Search for Harry Price (1978), author Trevor H. Hall (who also made the substantive charges against Crookes), even questions Price's personal integrity. Hall seems to go beyond the evidence of Price's shortcomings as a researcher in extending his critique to Price's basic honesty.

The modern era of parapsychology has also been affected by evidence of error and deception. In the summer of 1974 J. B. Rhine announced that Walter J. Levy, Jr., the director of the Institute for Parapsychology, had been discovered deliberately falsifying experimental results. This announcement was clearly a challenge to parapsychology, then in the midst of a controversy surrounding charges of fraud directed at S. G. Soal, a leading British parapsychologist. Soal died in 1975, and three years later hard evidence of fraud (conscious manipulation of computer data) was uncovered and publicized. Fortunately for the field, such cases have been rare, and parapsychologists have not been hesitant in reporting them when found.

Conjuring Campaigns Against Parapsychology

By World War I awareness of the depth of fraud that beset Spiritualism had become common knowledge within psychical research, though hope remained that some elements of real phenomena existed and could be isolated. It was during this time that Harry Houdini introduced his magic show, and it became evident that his conjuring skills would be helpful in uncovering Spiritualist tricks the average untrained researcher would miss.

Many intelligent Spiritualists and psychical observers were led to believe that what they perceived was the result of psychic faculty. Doyle thought Houdini's tricks so inexplicable that he declared him a psychic.

Trained stage magicians were especially helpful in the observation and denouncement of fraudulent psychics and healers whom laboratory-oriented parapsychologists considered outside their concern. Such phenomena is often found in worship services and thus difficult to fully examine as one might in an experimental situation, but the religious setting has not proved insurmountable.

Assuming the mantle of Houdini during the late twentieth century as the archenemy of fake psychics and miracle workers is the magician James Randi (known as "the Amazing Randi"). He has never acknowledged observing any genuine psychical phenomena, and operates out of a stated desire to destroy belief in the paranormal. He has become a leading public spokesperson for the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal. While his work has rarely spoken to the claims and efforts of mainstream parapsychology, he has demonstrated that he can ostensibly perform ESP, psychic surgery, metal bending and other parapsychological phenomena by trickery. He also demonstrated that at least some who call themselves parapsychologists were incompetent in detecting fraud.

To prove his point Randi planted magicians in tests by parapsychologists. At a press reception in New York in 1982, he revealed that two young "metal benders," Steve Shaw and Mike Edwards, had deceived parapsychologists at the McDonnell Laboratory for Psychical Research, Washington University, St. Louis, for four years. On various occasions Randi himself was present at some sessions in disguise. The researchers at McDonnell believed that Shaw and Edwards had demonstrated genuine paranormal talent in metal bending and psychokinesis.

Randi's point was driven home in 1984 when Masuaki Kiyota, hailed as the Japanese Uri Geller, revealed in a television interview that he had faked the phenomena that had been verified by both American and Japanese researchers. Randi had long denounced Geller as a fake, but had been unable to provoke a decisive confrontation. Kiyota claimed that he had reproduced the primary Geller phenomenon, metal bending, as well as another frequently hailed phenomenon associated with psychic Ted Serios—the paranormal creation of pictures on film.

The incidents in which researchers did not discover fraud are important, but must also be placed in the larger context of parapsychology. Even before Randi revealed his scheme at the McDonnell Laboratory, for example, parapsychologists had called attention to methodological problems in their research that would have to be solved before they could accept any optimistic initial findings. The application of those proper controls tied the hands of the two magician/subjects and they were unable to perform.

During his research of fake ministers operating as Pentecostal healers, Randi investigated several in whom he could find no evidence of deceit, even though he found their faith naive and personally unacceptable.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Christopher, Milbourne. ESP, Seers, and Psychics. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1970.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini, A Magician among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Keene, M. Lamar. The Psychic Mafia. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1976.

Price, Harry, and Eric J. Dingwall. Revelations of a Spirit Medium. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1922.

Randi, James. The Faith Healers. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1987.

———. Flim-Flam: Psychics, ESP, Unicorns, and Other Delusions. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1982.

———. The Magic of Uri Geller. New York: Random House, 1975.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Free Daist Communion

An Advaita Vedanta (Hindu) religious community founded and headed by Avadhoota Da Love-Ananda (born Franklin Jones). It was previously known as the Dawn Horse fellowship and the Johannine Daist Communion. A religious seeker, in 1960 Jones began to study with Swami Rudrananda (1928–73), an American-born disciple of Indian spiritual teacher Swami Muktananda (1908–82). Rudrananda guided him to a Lutheran seminary. Then in 1968 he went to India to visit Muktananda's ashram. While there he had a deep experience that led two years later to his entering what he called a permanent state of "Sahaj Samadhi" (trance). It is believed by his followers that he had surrendered that condition at the time of his entering this present incarnation at birth, and that his lifetime of seeking was an attempt to recover it while still in the embodied condition.

Jones began to teach small groups of students shortly after the 1970 experience. Then in 1973 he made a pilgrimage to India, during which journey he changed his name to Bubba Free John, understanding "Bubba" to be a familial way of denoting "brother." Later in the 1970s he became one of the most well known of the new spiritual teachers (gurus) to emerge in America. He was distinctive for his confrontational style of teaching, especially for placing his students in stressful conditions to enhance their learning. All his lessons were meant to show the futility of the search for meaning in sexuality, material possessions, and various psychic and spiritual experiences.

The teachings were leading toward a form of Advaita Vedanta that he called "the way of radial understanding." At the heart of Vedanta is denial of the illusion of the separateness of our individual selves from the "all-comprehensive divine reality." We aware of this illusion but live in a somewhat forgetful state. Our realization of our true state tends to occur in stages.

In his attempt to bring his students through the various stages of enlightenment Bubba Free John has on several occasions changed his name, indicating a new phase of his work. In 1979 he withdrew from public work and became known as Da Free John, "Da" being understood as "giver." In the mid-1980s he took his present name, more informally known as Heart Master Da Love-Ananda.

In 1991 there were approximately twelve hundred members of the Free Daist Community, the majority in North America. Heart Master Da Love-Ananda resides at the group's retreat center in the Fiji Islands. Last known address: 750 Adrian Way, San Rafael, CA 94903.

Sources:

Bubba Free John [Franklin Jones]. No Remedy. Lower Lake, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1976.

Da Free John [Franklin Jones]. The Dawn Horse Testament. San Rafael, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1985.

Da Love-Ananda. The Holy Jumping Off Place. San Rafael, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1986.

Jones, Franklin. The Method of the Siddhas. Los Angeles: Dawn Horse Press, 1973.

Freeman, John Albert (1920–)

Psychologist and parapsychologist. He was born January 15, 1920, and studied at Ouachita College, Arkadelphia, Arkansas; Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Kentucky; and Oklahoma State University, Stillwater.

Freeman was a staff member of the Department of Psychology at Oklahoma Baptist University in Shawnee (1953–56) and head of the Department of Psychology at Wayland Baptist College in Plainview, Texas (1956–60). A charter member of the Parapsychological Association, Freeman set up the parapsychology laboratory at Wayland Baptist College. In 1960 he became a research associate at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University and became the author of many papers on the paranormal.

Freemasonry

An occult movement of the seventeenth century. Freemasonry emerged as the British form of revived gnosticism analogous to the Rosicrucian movement in Germany. While having its roots in the architectural and construction guilds of the Middle Ages, modern masonry is rooted in the post-Reformation revival of Gnostic thought and occult practice. The mythical history of masonry served to protect it in the religiously intolerant atmosphere operative in Great Britain at the time of its founding.

History and Mythic Origin

Although it would not be exactly correct to say that the history of Freemasonry was lost in the mists of antiquity, it is possible to say that although to a certain degree traceable, its records are of a scanty nature, and so crossed by the trails of other mystical brotherhoods that disentanglement is an extremely difficult process.

The ancient legend of its foundation at the time of the building of the Temple at Jerusalem is manifestly mythical. If one might hazard an opinion, it would seem that at a very early epoch in the history of civilization, a caste arose of builders in stone, who jealously guarded the secret of their craft. Where such a caste of operative masons might have arisen is altogether a separate question, but it must obviously have been in a country where working in stone was one of the principal arts. It is also almost certain that this early brotherhood must have been hierophantic with a leadership adept in the ancient mysteries. Its principal work to begin with would undoubtedly consist in the raising of temples and similar structures, and as such it would come into very close contact with the priesthood, if indeed it was not wholly directed by it.

In early civilization only two classes of dwelling received the attention of the architect—the temple and the palace. For example, among the ruins of Egypt and Babylon, remains of private houses are rare, but the temple and the royal residence are conspicuous everywhere, and we know that among the ruins of Central America temples and palaces alone remain, the huts of the surrounding dwellers having long ago disappeared. The temple was the nucleus of the early city. Commerce, agriculture, and all the affairs of life revolved around the worship of the gods.

A medieval cathedral took more than one generation to erect, and in that time many masons came and went. The lodge was invariably founded near the rising cathedral or abbey, and apprentices and others started work as opportunity offered. Indeed, a man might serve his apprenticeship and labor all through his life on one building, without ever seeing any work elsewhere.

The evidence as to whether the master-masons were also architects is very conflicting, and it has been held that the priests were the architects of the British cathedrals, the master-masons and operatives merely carrying out their designs. There is good evidence, however, that this is not wholly true. Of all arts, architecture is by far the most intricate. It is undoubtedly one that requires a long and specific training. Questions arise of stress and strain of the most difficult description, and it is obvious that ecclesiastics, who had not undergone any special training, would not be qualified to compose plans of the cathedrals.

Professional architects existed at a very early period, though instances are on record where the priests of a certain locality have taken upon themselves the credit of planning the cathedral of the diocese. Be this as it may, the "mystery" of building was sufficiently deep to require extensive knowledge and experience and to a great extent this justifies the jealousy with which the early masons regarded its secrets. Again, the jealousy with which it was kept from the vulgar gaze may have been racial in its origin, and may have arisen from such considerations as the following: "Let no stranger understand this craft of ours. Why should we make it free to the heathen and the foreigner?"

Masonry in Great Britain

In Great Britain, prior to the founding of the Grand Lodge, York and the north of England in general were regarded as the most ancient seat of the fraternity. Indeed, without stretching probabilities too far, the line of evolution so far as York is concerned is quite remarkable. In the early days of that city a temple of Serapis existed there, which was afterward a monastery of the Begging Friars, and the mysteries of this god existed beside the Roman Collegia or Craftsmen's Society.

Some have argued that the crypt of York Minster affords evidence of the progress of masonry from Roman to Saxon times. It is stated that it has a mosaic pavement of blue and white tiles laid in the form employed in the first degree of masonry. Undoubted is the fact that the craft occasionally met in this crypt during the eighteenth century.

Masonic tradition goes to show that even in the beginning of the fourteenth century, masonry in Britain was regarded as a thing of great antiquity. Lodge records for the most part only date back to the sixteenth century in the oldest instances, but ancient manuscripts are extant which undoubtedly relate to masonry.

Thus the old charges embodied in the Regius manuscript, which was unearthed in 1839 by Halliwell Phillips, are dated at 1390 and contain a curious legend of the craft that tells how the necessity of finding work of some description drove men to consult Euclid, who recommended masonry as a craft to them. It goes on to tell how masonry was founded in Egypt, and how it entered England in the time of King Athelstan (d. 940). The necessity for keeping close counsel as regards the secrets of the craft is insisted upon in rude verse.

The Cooke manuscript from the early fifteenth century likewise contains versions of the old charges. Egypt was regarded here as the motherland of masonry, and King Athelstan the medium for the introduction of the craft into the island of Britain. But that this manuscript was used among masons at a later date was proved by the 1890 discovery of a more modern version dated about 1687 and known as the William Watson manuscript. In all, about 70 of these old charges and pseudohistories have been discovered since 1860. They all have much in common and are of English origin.

The Birth of Speculative Masonry

Whatever the ancient and medieval roots of masonry, in the seventeenth century it was given a new direction by the widespread acceptance into the lodges of non-masons who used the lodges as a home for their pursuit of spiritual wisdom apart from the theology of the established church, often while keeping a nominal membership in the Church of England. (By 1723, for example, all specific references to Christianity were removed from the movement's constitution; members had only to acknowledge God, the Great Architect of the Universe.) The first prominent speculative Freemason was astrologer Elias Ashmole (1617–1692), an officer in the court of Charles II. Ashmole, and his contemporaries such as Robert Fludd (1574–1637), helped spread the revived gnosticism represented on the continent by Rosicrucianism. Through the century, speculative lodges consisting primarily if not exclusively of accepted masons spread throughout England and Scotland where they existed as a condoned (and somewhat unrecognized) form of religious dissent.

The coming of age of speculative masonry was signaled by the formation of the Grand Lodge of England, inaugurated on St. John the Baptist's Day 1717 by four of the old London lodges. Rev. John Theophilus Desguliers, who became Grand Master in 1719, was the chaplain to the Prince of Wales, and used his considerable influence to spread the movement both in England and France. The Grand Lodge provided the fraternity with its first central governing body, as prior to this time each lodge was self-governing. Many lodges speedily came under its aegis, and Ireland formed a Grand Lodge of her own in 1725, but Scotland did not follow until 1736, and even then many lodges held aloof from the central body, only 33 out of 100 falling into line.

From one or other of these three governing bodies all the regular lodges and variant rites throughout the world have arisen, so that modern masonry may truthfully be said to be of British origin. To say that Continental masonry is the offspring of the British lodges is not to say that no masonic lodges existed in France and Germany before the formation of the English Grand Lodge, but underscores the break between the masonry of the builders of the medieval architectual wonders and the speculative masonry of the seventeenth century. All of the modern speculative lodges in Europe date from the inception of the English central body. However, the Continental masonry possesses many rites that differ entirely from those found in the British craft.

In Germany, which existed at this time as a number of independent states, it was said that the Steinmetzin approximated very strongly in medieval times to the British masons, if they were not originally one and the same, but again, the modern lodges in Germany all dated from the speculative lodge founded in 1733.

We find the beginnings of modern French masonry in the labors of Martine de Pasqually, Louis Claude de Saint-Martin, and perhaps to a some extent Cagliostro who toiled greatly to found his Egyptian rite in France. It is noticeable, however, that Cagliostro had become a member of a London lodge before attempting work on the Continent. In France, masonry had a more political complexion, being a source of the democratic thought underlying the French (and later the Italian) Revolution. Because of the political alignment of continental Freemasonry, an extreme enmity developed between Freemasonry and the Roman Catholic Church, which had aligned itself to the royal families of Europe. Masonry in England, a country that broke with Rome during the Reformation of the sixteenth century, had a much more apolitical stance.

Official opposition to Freemasonry by the Roman Catholic Church dates back to Papal bulls of 1738 and 1751 and is a tangled story of suspicion and intrigue relating to masonic secrecy and to complex political developments of the time. Much antagonism has been deliberately fostered by mischief makers. For example, during the nineteenth century, the French journalist Gabriel Jogand-Pagés, writing under the name Leo Taxil, perpetrated an extraordinary and prolonged hoax in which he claimed to have exposed a Satanist activity within Freemasonry. The motive appears to have been to embarrass the Roman Catholic Church, but it also added to traditional Church prejudices against Freemasonry and caused much trouble for masons.

The plot involved the claim that a certain Diana Vaughan, claimed to have been a High Priestess of Satanic Freemasonry and dedicated to overthrowing Christianity and winning the world for Satanism, had been converted to the Roman Catholic faith. The memoirs of "Diana Vaughan," written by Jogand, were read by Pope Leo XIII, and Jogand himself was received in private audience by the pope, and an anti-masonic congress was summoned in 1887 at Trent.

On Easter Monday 1897, at a press conference to present Diana Vaughan, Jogand confessed to his conspiracy and the details of his complex hoax are now generally known. But, great damage had already been done to relations between Roman Catholics and Freemasons. In 1917 the church declared that anyone who joined a masonic lodge was automatically excommunicated.

The Masonic Worldview

The Freemasons instituted an initiatory degree system by which members were step-by-step brought into the inner working of the lodge. Initially there were three degrees, but these could never satisfy the true gnostics. Various elaborate systems of degrees were developed to picture the levels leading from this world to God and to symbolize the journey of the knowing soul back home. The most famous, due to its success and longevity, was the 30° system placed upon the original three degrees that emerged as the 33° system of the Ancient and Accepted Rite, the system operative in the United Grand Lodge. This system became integral to the dominant American masonic body, the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite, and its teachings as illustrated in the writings of Albert Pike, its dominant intellectual leader.

As speculative masonry emerged, it espoused the idea that masonry was a restatement of the ancient religion of humankind. At one time, the masons suggested, there were two religions, one for the educated and enlightened and one for the masses. The one religion of the enlightened became the base upon which the various historic faiths emerged. Through the centuries, however, adepts (masters) kept the original teachings intact, and they were eventually passed in their purity to the masonic leadership. In the modern age, due to the evolution of the race, more people are now capable of receiving and safely handling that secret wisdom that is now being disseminated by the masonic lodges. That secret wisdom came from the ancient East and Middle East, and both Eastern religions (especially Hinduism) and Western mystical systems such as Kabalism assist the process of describing it.

The ancient wisdom myth of Freemasonry found an origin in the Bible, a significantly more acceptable source to a Christian establishment than Arabia and the Muslim countries of Rosicrucianism. In 1 Kings 7:13–45, the masons found the story of Hiram. Hiram was employed by King Solomon to work on the temple in Jerusalem. After his work, he disappeared from both the pages of the Bible and from history. Freemasons, however, developed his biography that included a murder by his artisan colleagues. Hiram, in working on the temple, became aware of the "Word of God" inscribed in the secret parts of the temple. He would not reveal what he had learned and his noncollegial reticence cost him his life. His death then became integral to the ritual initiation of members who symbolically die and are reborn into the craft.

The masonic worldview begins with three fundamental realities. First, there is a omnipresent, eternal, boundless, and immutable principle that is ineffable, beyond any limiting descriptors of human language, the end-point of all metaphysical speculation, the rootless root and the uncaused cause. Natural law is a representation of the permanency of the absolute. Second, there exists what we term space in the abstract. Space is a symbol of divinity as it is basic to all experience; it is fathomless but at the same time integral to all human concepts. Third, there exists motion, another abstract notion, representing unconditioned consciousness that manifests as spirit and matter. Spirit and matter are two facets of the absolute.

The universe is seen as a boundless plane, a playground upon which numerous universes come and go. There is an eternal flex in which new universes begin to develop and are absorbed back into the boundless space out of which they were formed. Creation of a universe begins as space becomes turgid and produces a first or potential matter called the akasa. Operating on this matter is absolute abstract motion, latent potential energy, consciousness, and cosmic ideation.

Thus at the beginning is the universal energy (fofat) and the universal substance (akasa) behind which stands consciousness and ultimately the absolute. As creation proceeds, it will occur in steps of seven. Seven plans of creation will be formed from the purely spiritual to physical substance. These seven planes of existence are reflected throughout the universe. Each human also possesses these seven levels. The seven levels are: atma, buddhi, manas, kama, astral, life principle, and physical. The operation of these seven planes in the universe and in the individual provide much room for speculative elaboration and would later provide material upon which Theosophy would build.

Masonry in America

Through the eighteenth century, Freemasonry had aligned itself with the Enlightenment and with the anti-monarchial ideals of the late-century revolutionaries. Masonic and Rosicrucian ideals flowed through the salons of France and supplied vital ideological components of the new revolutionary ethos that allowed the complete overthrow of an obsolete government system and the institution of a new democratic system. The Marquis de Lafayette, who joined in the American Revolution, was a mason. In the United States James Madison; James Monroe; Benjamin Franklin, who financed much of the revolution; and George Washington, who led its armies, were Freemasons. The input of Freemasonry in the founding of the republic can now be found on the dollar bill, which hails the coming of the "ordo nuevo seculorum," the "new order of the ages" and the pyramid topped with the all-seeing eye.

But masonry had established itself in America long before the revolution. The Grand Lodge of Massachusetts dates from 1733 and that of South Carolina was founded just four years later. The General Grand Chapter of the Royal Arch Masons of the U.S.A. was founded in Boston in 1797 by representatives from Massachusetts and New York. The Supreme Council 33 of Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America was formed in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1801. Albert Pike, the most noteworthy of nineteenth century masons, was the leader of this latter organization for many years (1859–1891). The Order of the Eastern Star, an auxiliary for female relatives of masons, was founded in 1876. The masonic movement now encompasses millions of members primarily in lodges affiliated to its larger organizations, but also in a variety of smaller masonic groups that follow various patterns of different speculative rites.

Understanding the origins of speculative masonry as an occult movement, and the essentially gnostic nature of its thought, does much to explain why many prominent occultists such as Manly Palmer Hall trumpeted their masonic connections. It also shows how masonic thought served as a basis for Theosophy, and the manner in which masonic organizations provided the substructure upon which modern Rosicrucianism emerged at the end of the nineteenth century. Masonry supplied the organizational model not only for Rosicrucianism, but for ceremonial magic groups such as the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and the Ordo Templi Orientis.

Sources:

Coil, Henry. Coil's Masonic Encyclopedia. Richmond, Va.: Macoy Publishing, 1961.

———. Freemasonry Through Six Centuries. 2 vols. Richmond, Va.: Macoy Publishing, 1961.

Hall, Manly P. Lost Keys of Freemasonry. Richmond, Va.: Macoy Publishing, 1923.

Haywood, H. I. The Newly Made Mason. Richmond, Va.: Macoy Publishing, 1948.

Knight, G. Norman, and F. Smyth. The Pocket History of Freemasonry. London: Fred K. Muller, 1977.

Knight, Stephen. The Brotherhood: The Secret World of the Freemasons. New York: Stein & Day, 1984.

Mackey, Albert G. Mackey's Revised Encyclopedia of Freemasonry. Richmond, Va.: Macoy Publishing, 1909.

Mellor, Alec. Our Separated Brethren: The Freemasons. London: George G. Harp, 1964.

Voorhis, Harold V. B. Masonic Organizations and Allied Orders and Degrees. N.p.: Press of Henry Emmerson, 1952.

Waite, A. E. A New Encyclopedia of Freemasonry. 2 vols. London: William Rider; New York: David McKay, 1921. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970. Reprint, New York: Weatherwane, 1971.

Freer, Ada Goodrich See Ada Goodrich-Freer

Free Spirit; Resources for Personal and Social Transformation (Directory)

Quarterly networking publication of New Age topics and information, primarily for the New York metropolitan area. Similar networking periodicals serve most major urban areas in North America. Free Spirit covered the arts, business services, children and childbirth, events and gatherings, healing and bodywork, intuitive arts and sciences, movement, martial arts and yoga, natural foods and nutrition, schools, certification and degrees, spiritual practices, social change, therapy and counseling, tools of life, and women's concerns. It included "Yellow Pages of Consciousness," addresses of organizations, and a comprehensive calendar of events. Free Spirit was distributed free in locations in the area it served. Last known address: 34 Prospect Pl., Brooklyn, NY 11217.

Frei, Gebhard (1905–1967)

Roman Catholic priest and professor of philosophy and comparative religion. He was born March 24, 1905, at Lichtensteig, St. Gallen, Switzerland. He took his Ph.D. in 1935 at the University of Innsbruck and then became a professor of philosophy and comparative religion at the Theological Seminary of Schöneck/Beckenried, Switzerland, in 1933. He founded and served as a professor at the C. G. Jung Institute in Zürich. He also acted as president of the Swiss Society of Philosophy and the Swiss Society of Catholic Psychotherapeutists.

Frei served a term as president of Imago Mundi, the international society of Catholic parapsychologists. He wrote many articles on parapsychological subjects and edited a series of books titled Grenzfragen der Psychologie (Borderline Questions of Psychology). He served as the Vatican's consultant on parapsychology and contributed to Konstantin Raudive's study of electronic voice phenomenon. Frei died October 27, 1967.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Frei, Gebhard. "Psychologie, Parapsychologie and Weltanschaung." Schweizer Rundschau. N.p., 1946.

———. "Die Heutige Situation in der Parapsychologie" (The Present Situation of Parapsychology). Neue Wissenschaft. N.p., n.d.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Raudive, Konstantin. Breakthrough. New York: Taplinger, 1971.

Freie Interessengemeinschaft für Grenz- und Geisteswissenschaften und Ufologie-Studien

The Freie Interessengemeinschaft für Grenz- und Geisteswissenschaften und Ufologie-Studien (Free Community of Interests in the Border and Spiritual Sciences and UFO Studies) grew out of a metaphysical study group founded by UFO contactee William Eduard "Billy" Meier (b. 1937) at his home in the German-speaking section of western Switzerland. It was to that study group in 1975 that Meier began to reveal his lifetime of contacts with space beings and to whom he first showed the photographs of flying saucers he had taken.

Through 1976, the European, especially in the German-speaking countries, gave extensive coverage to Meiers' claims and many people interested in UFOs visited Meier. Toward the end of the year, writers Lou Zinstaag and Timothy Good, took copies of the Meier pictures to the United States where they were researching a book, and gave then to contactee enthusiast Wendelle Stevens. Impressed, he visited Switzerland in 1977 and began an investigation of Meier and his claims. His first impressions confirmed, Stevens led in the formation of a publishing company, Genesis III Productions, and began issuing volumes drawn from Meier's materials. Separating Meier from other contactees were the many pictures that had so impressed Stevens, and thus it was natural that the first book from Genesis III was a large picture book featuring Meier's pictures of the "beamships" that Meier claimed frequently visited near his home. A second picture book followed and during the 1980s some dozen books appeared from Genesis III.

The circulation of the Meier material led to the growth of the Free Community in Europe and the emergence of an American affiliate, the Semjase Silver Star Center, named for Meier's primary contact, Semjase, a beautiful space commander from the Pleiades star system. The Free Community tries to exist in that area where science and religion converge. Meier makes claims concerning the objective reality of his flying saucer contacts that include travels to outer space in a beamship and numerous face-to-face meetings with various extraterrestrials. On the other hand, most of the contacts have been in traditional contactee fashion, via telepathy. The material conveyed by Semjase and her colleagues also have a distinctly religious message. Traditional religion is denounced for its detrimental effect on humanity, but in its place the Pleiadians advocate the following of the "Ten Bids," the things which nature bids us follow.

The universe is entering the Aquarian Age during which humanity will experience a massive spiritual upheaval. Meier is the herald of Truth, the one designated to spread Creation's Universal Laws. Creation is seen as the mass of Spiritual Energy through the universe. The combination of pictures and spiritual message has had a marked influence on the continuing New Age movement with its emphasis on spiritual emergence. As early as 1989, channelers in North America also began to claim contact with the Pleiadians, most notably Barbara Marciniak. At the same time, ufologists denounced Meier as a hoaxer, though the several volumes demonstrating that fact have been lost among the many books and videos supportive of his claims.

Sources:

Elders, Lee J., Brit Nilsson-Elders, and Thomas K. Welch. UFO . . . Contact from the Pleiades, Volume I. Phoenix, Ariz.: Genesis III Productions, 1979.

———. UFO . . . Contact from the Pleiades, Volume Two. Phoenix, Ariz: Genesis III Productions, 1983.

Kroff, Kal K. Spaceships of the Pleiades: The Billy Meier Story. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Press, 1995.

Meier, Eduard "Billy." Decalogue or the Ten Bids. Alamogordo, N. Mex.: Semjase Silver Star Center, 1987.

———. The Psyche. Alamogordo, N. Mex.: Semjase Silver Star Center, [1986].

French, Mrs. E. J. (ca. 1860)

Nineteenth-century medium of New York who specialized in psychic painting. The pictures—brightly colored flowers, birds, or insects—were produced in a curtained-off dark cabinet under a small table with prepared pencils, brushes, and paints. The speed of execution was remarkable, pictures of considerable artistic merit being produced within 8 to 15 seconds. Scraping and rubbing sounds, suggesting extremely rapid movement, were distinctly heard by the sitters. It was discovered, however, that many of the pictures produced in this way were copies of existing pictures and suspicions of fraud were entertained by some sitters. In light of other exposures of similar phenomena, such as those produced by David Duguid, it seems likely that French operated fraudulently.

Benjamin Coleman describes his experiences with French in his book Spiritualism in America (1861). (See also direct drawing and painting)

French, Emily S. (1830–1912)

Direct voice medium of Buffalo, New York, and a relative of President Grover Cleveland. French was investigated for 20 years by Edward C. Randall of Buffalo. Isaac Funk and James H. Hyslop also conducted remarkable experiments to prove that the voices did not originate in the vocal organs of the medium.

Her Indian control "Red Jacket" had an exceedingly loud, masculine voice that would have easily filled a hall with a seating capacity of 2000 people. The medium at that time was a frail old woman with a weak heart and was deaf, yet the sitters could hear every remark of the communicators.

For 22 years French assisted Randall's "rescue circle," where "earthbound spirits" were helped. She gave her mediumistic services without charge. Randall's book The Dead Have Never Died (1917) describes their work and contains biographical information. French died July 24, 1912.

Sources:

Funk, Isaac. The Psychic Riddle. London/New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1907.

Freud, Sigmund (1856–1939)

Founder of psychoanalysis. Freud conducted some experiments in parapsychology but was unsympathetic to public discussion of the occult, which he believed to be enveloped in dangerous superstition. Freud was born at Freiburg, Moravia, on May 6, 1856. He graduated from Vienna University, Austria, and became a demonstrator at the physiological institute and an assistant physician at Vienna General Hospital. In 1885 he worked under the neurologist J. M. Charcot in Paris and, after returning to Vienna, started to treat patients by hypnosis. In 1902, while a professor of neurology at Vienna University, he also treated patients in his private clinic.

In 1904 he abandoned hypnosis and developed his own theories of psychoanalysis using techniques of free association in the treatment of neurosis. He later attached great significance to the role of dreams and the importance of the sexual drive, both in individuals and in the development of civilization. His sexual theories were supported and developed in new directions by his pupil Wilhelm Reich.

It was Freud's emphasis on sex and mistrust of mystical and occult areas that caused the defection of another pupil, C. G. Jung, who later established his own system of psychotherapy with elaborate theories of the significance of mythology and symbolism in human affairs. Jung himself had personal occult experiences.

By 1921 Freud had reached a reluctant private conclusion that there might be something to telepathy; he experimented with the Hungarian psychoanalyst Sandor Ferenczi but did not wish his interest to be made public. His papers on the paranormal were later gathered and published by George Devereaux. He died in London, September 23, 1939.

Freud once wrote to Hereward Carrington, "If I had my life to live over again, I should devote myself to psychical research rather than to psychoanalysis."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Devereaux, George, ed. Psychoanalysis and the Occult. New York: International Universities Press, 1953.

Fodor, Nandor. Freud, Jung, and Occultism. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1971.

Freud, Sigmund. Studies in Parapsychology. Edited by Philip Rieff. New York: Collier Books, 1963.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Friar Rush

A character in medieval German folklore, Friar Rush (Brüder Rausch) was the devil disguised as a friar. He was a mischief-maker who entered monasteries to cause trouble for the monks by confusing and tempting them. His pranks were described in English chapbooks of the sixteenth century, and he is also mentioned in an anonymous farce, Gammer Gurton's Needle (ca. 1575), ascribed to John Still or William Stevenson. In English folklore Friar Rush is associated with drunkenness, playing such pranks as turning on the wine taps in the cellars.

Frick, Harvey Lee (1906–)

School psychologist who was a student of J. B. Rhine and William McDougall at Duke University and an early worker in the field of parapsychology. Frick was born November 15, 1906, at Gold Hill, North Carolina, and took his M.A. in 1931 at Duke.

After graduation he was successively a laboratory instructor at Wayne University College of Medicine, Detroit, Michigan (1933–35); school psychologist for the Detroit public schools (1935–42); and, during World War II, a personnel consultant (military psychologist) for the U.S. Army (1942–46).

Frick's primary work in parapsychology occurred during his college days. At Duke he took part in some of the experiments that later culminated in the establishment of the Parapsychology Laboratory. He also participated in telepathy tests conducted by John F. Thomas. Frick's master's thesis, Extrasensory Cognition, was one of the first on such a subject and was taken from his own experiments. It also includes an historical survey of the field.

Sources:

Frick, Harvey Lee. Apostate Physician. New York: House of Field, 1937.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Fricker, Edward G. (1910–)

British psychic healer. When his mother died from cancer, Fricker prayed that he might be able to heal others. A Spiritualist medium brought him a message from his mother that Fricker indeed had such a healing gift.

His autobiography, God Is My Witness (1977), tells of his humdrum life as shop assistant, butcher, and costermonger (hawker of fruit or vegetables) before he developed his healing gift. He writes that he was inspired by a "voice" that put him in touch with a team of doctors in the spirit world. He claims to have healed over a million people during the last 25 years, although he has no medical knowledge.

After Fricker was featured on a television program, the station that broadcast the program was swamped with thousands of calls from sufferers. His clients at his clinic in the Westminster area of London have included such well-known personalities as British TV presenter Katie Boyle, actor Christopher Lee (famous for his Dracula roles), and actress Ann Todd.

Friendly Contacts Associates

Defunct organization founded in 1965, comprised of state and local groups, that brought together professionals interested in studying parapsychology, healing, hypnosis, and reincarnation. Through the 1970s it conducted research and held seminars on nonsectarian psychical, metaphysical, and religious issues; sponsored a speakers bureau; and maintained a library at its Florida headquarters. It published the Friendly Contacts newsletter.

Friends in New Directions See The Institute for Consciousness Research

Friends of Astrology

The oldest astrological organization currently operating in the Chicago area. It was founded in 1938 with Mary Adams as its first president, and it was incorporated two years later. It functions to raise the standards of astrology and to educate students of astrology. It provides a gathering place where serious students of the subject can continue their learning and improve their competence. It currently operates through several branches in Chicago and its suburbs and publishes a monthly newsletter, Friends of Astrology Bulletin. Address: 514 N. Richmond Rd., Westmont, IL 60559. Website: http://www.toonland.com/astro/index.html.

Friends of God

A mystical school founded in Germany in the fourteenth century for the purpose of ministering to the poor by preaching, sacrament, and meditation. Those associated with it included men and women of every rank and station, not only monks and nuns but knights, farmers, artisans, and merchants.

The name Friends of God derived from the Christian New Testament (John 15:15): "Henceforth I call you not servants; for one servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends." The Friends of God were not organized as a formal society but rather as a school of thought with a strongly mystical trend. Their law was, "That universal love, commanded by Christ, and not to be gainsaid by his vicar."

Many Dominicans were Friends of God, and notable mystics associated with the school included Meister Eckhart (1304–1328), Nicolas of Basle (1330–1383), and John Tauler (1290–1361). Their teachings roused antagonism among the establishment clergy of their time, who strongly condemned them. They influenced the first generation of Protestant thinkers.

Sources:

Inge, William Ralph. Christian Mysticism. London: Methuen, 1899.

Friends of Runnings Park

Occult society founded in London, England, by a small group guided by the spirit "Helio-Arcanophus," who claimed to have been a high priestess of Atlantis and channeled through Tony Neate. The philosophy stresses the uniqueness of each individual, self-empowerment and the finding of God within. In 1983 the group founded an accredited course called "The College of Healing." At Runnings Park, they also have The School of Channeling, which was founded in 1990. Address: Runnings Park, Croft Bank, West Malvern, Worchester WR14 43P, England.

Sources:

Neate, Tony. Channelling for Everyone. London: Piatkus, 1997. Reprint, Freedom, Calif.: The Crossing Press, 1999.

———. The Guide Book. Malvern, England: Pegasus, 1986.

———. H-A Life & Living. Malvern, England: Pegasus, 1989.

Wilson, Annie. Where There's Love. Bath, England: Gateway Books, 1986.

Friends of the Garden Seed Centre

Loosely organized group of individuals seeking New Age mystical experience, deriving their name from Gandalf's Garden. Founded by Muz Murray, the group became a focal point for New Age seekers in Chelsea, London, before its dispersal in 1971 into various "seed centers" in different parts of the world. Friends of the Garden Central Seed Centre was established at 24 St. Margaret's Close, Norstead, Norwich, England.

Sources:

Murray, Muz. Seeking the Master: A Guide to the Ashrams of India. London: Neville Spearman, 1980.

Friends of the Wisdom Religion

Community of students of the teachings on higher consciousness of Franklin Merrell-Wolff. It was originally known as the Assembly of Man. Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Merrell-Wolff, Franklin. Pathways Through to Space: A Personal Record of Transformation in Consciousness. New York: Warner, 1976.

———. The Philosophy of Consciousness without an Object. New York: Julian Press, 1973.

The Friendship Centre

Founded by Stephen Foster in 1929 at 85 Lancaster Gate, London, W2, England. It became the new home of the Conan Doyle Memorial Psychic Library and Museum and held regular meetings for psychometry, psychic demonstrations, healing, and classes for development of psychic ability. Unfortunately the Conan Doyle Museum collection was later dispersed and some of the items were lost or destroyed. The center closed during World War II.

FRNM See Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man

FRNM Bulletin

Former publication of the Parapsychology Press, giving information and news related to the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man (FRNM), directed by J. B. Rhine. With issue no. 14 (autumn 1969) it became the Parapsychology Bulletin. In 1995, when the FRNM changed to the Rhine Research Center, the bulletin ceased publication altogether.

Fronczek, Janusz (ca. 1926)

Polish mining engineer of Warsaw who was a medium for telekinetic, teleplastic, and luminous phenomena. Eric J. Dingwall, then research officer of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), had three sittings with Fronczek in August and September 1923 and was impressed. Lights appeared to "come from the medium's mouth and to remain apparently unsupported in space two or three inches from the lips. The brilliancy of each appearance varied, not only as compared with others but apparently in itself when still in view," Dingwall said.

Fronczek was invited to London to sit at the SPR. He arrived April 17, 1925. According to the report of V. J. Woolley and Dingwall in the society's Proceedings (vol. 36), before he entered the séance room he disrobed entirely and offered himself unreservedly for examination. He sat in a pajama suit, and his hands and legs were controlled. He preferred silence or low conversation during the sitting.

The phenomena seemed to be preceded by vigorous grinding of the teeth. Greenish, bright spherical sparks were seen, lights appeared on Fronczek's arm and jerked up toward his mouth. The floating lights were about one to two inches from his lips; a bell was telekinetically moved while both hands and both feet were under control.

Throughout the sittings the medium constantly rubbed his chest with his hands (still controlled) and soon afterward a light appeared. Since the investigators could not discover the modus operandi for the supposed fraudulent production of the phenomena, they summed up their conclusions as follows:

"(1) At three sittings out of a total of nine given by Mr. Fronczek at the Society's rooms, phenomena occurred which purported to be produced supernormally.

(2) At one of these three the phenomena consisted of the movements of small luminous objects provided by us for the purpose and we suppose these movements to have been brought about by the employment of a cushion held in the medium's mouth.

(3) At the other two sittings the phenomena consisted of the appearance of small luminous objects which appeared to come from the medium's mouth and to be attached to it, but we were unable to discover their nature or the method of their introduction into the seance room."

Frontiers of Science Newsletter

Former bimonthly newsletter of the Mankind Research Foundation. The publication was concerned with parapsychology and parascience. It included articles by researchers and reports on activities of the foundation. The newsletter ceased when the foundation changed its name to the Rhine Research Center.

Frost, Gavin (1930–)

Gavin Frost, cofounder of the Church and School of Wicca, was born in Stratfordshire, England. During his childhood years his Welsh family took him on trips to the homeland, where he was introduced to magical folklore and awakened to what became a lifelong interest. He attended London University from which he received his B.S. in mathematics in 1953. He later earned a doctorate in math. In the 1960s he moved to Canada to continue a career in the aerospace industry. By this time he had become involved in Witchcraft. He moved on to Anaheim, California, where he met his future wife, Yvonne Wilson. She was a Spiritualist, and together they began to study psychic development at a Spiritualist center. They moved to St. Louis, Missouri, and while there they were formally initiated into the Craft.

They began to write up the material they had received in their occult training but had difficulty finding a publisher. They decided to reorganize the material into lessons for a correspondence course. They organized a "School of Wicca" and advertised the lesson in various occult periodicals. Shortly thereafter the Church of Wicca was also formed. In the midst of these developments, in 1970 Gavin married Yvonne.

In the early 1970s the school found a level of response from youthful seekers and in 1972 Gavin quit his job to devote full time to its development. In 1974, they relocated their headquarters to New Bern, North Carolina. By the middle of the decade it had become one of the largest groups within the emerging Wiccan community, and the publication of their original book in 1975 as The Witch's Bible was met with a high level of criticism from other Wiccans. They complained that the book implied that it spoke for all Wiccans (a fact that Frost denied), but were most upset over the lack of emphasis upon the Goddess. The controversy was soon resolved as each side agreed to disagree.

Through the 1970s and 1980s Frost led the church and school as its archbishop. With Yvonne, he wrote a number of books on Witchcraft and magic. The school has maintained an enrollment of approximately 5,000. Toward the end of the 1990s, Frost retired and passed along the leadership of the school to his lieutenants. The headquarters has since moved to West Virginia.

Sources:

Frost, Gavin, and Yvonne Frost. The Magic Power of Witchcraft. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1976.

———. Meta-Psychometry: Key to Power and Abundance. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1978.

———. Power Secrets from a Sorcerer's Private Magnum Arcanum. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1980.

———. Who Speaks for the Witch. New Bern, N.C.: Godolphin House, 1991.

———. The Witch's Bible. New York: Berkley Books, 1975.

———. A Witch's Guide to Life. Cottonwood, Ariz.: Esoteric Publishing, 1978.

Frost, Yvonne (1931–)

Yvonne Frost, cofounder of the Church and School of Wicca, was born Yvonne Wilson in Los Angeles, California. Raised a Baptist, she rejected her childhood faith as a teenager and became a spiritual seeker. She read books on comparative religion, but put her quest somewhat on hold in 1950 when she married. She divorced in 1960 and returned to school. She earned an associate's degree from Fullerton Junior College in Fullerton, California, in 1962. Following her graduation she took a job with an aerospace company in Anaheim, where she met her future husband, Gavin Frost. By this time she had become involved in Spiritualism, and she and Gavin began to participate in psychic development classes at a local Spiritualist center.

A short time later they moved to St. Louis to take new jobs and while there, in the late 1960s, were initiated into Witchcraft. They began to write and prepared the text of a book. Unable to find a publisher, they hit upon the idea of editing the material as a set of lessons that could be offered to people through a correspondence course. Ads were placed in occult periodicals. Within a short time they organized the School of Wicca and then the Church of Wicca. In 1970 Yvonne married Gavin and assumed the role of bishop in the church.

In 1974 the Frosts moved to New Bern, North Carolina, where the church and school headquarters was relocated. The book that she and Gavin had written was eventually published in 1975 as The Witch's Bible. It met a storm of controversy generated by witches who disagreed with much of it, especially its downplaying of the centrality of the Goddess, considered by many witches as the central affirmation of their religion.

Over the next two decades Frost provided leadership for the church and school and coauthored a number of books on witchcraft and magic with her husband. In the 1990s she moved into retirement.

Sources:

Frost, Gavin, and Yvonne Frost. The Magic Power of Witchcraft. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1976.

———. Meta-Psychometry: Key to Power and Abundance. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1978.

———. Power Secrets from a Sorcerer's Private Magnum Arcanum. West Nyack, N.Y.: Parker Publishing, 1980.

———. Who Speaks for the Witch. New Bern, N.C.: Godolphin House, 1991.

———. The Witch's Bible. New York: Berkley Books, 1975.

———. A Witch's Guide to Life. Cottonwood, Ariz.: Esoteric Publishing, 1978.

Fry, Daniel (1908–)

One of the early 1950s flying saucer contactees. Fry was born July 19, 1908, in Vernon, Minnesota. A former technician of White Sands Proving Grounds, Fry claimed that in 1950 while he was walking in the New Mexico desert he found a flying saucer that had landed. He said he held a conversation by telepathy with an invisible spaceman called "Alan" and took a ride in the saucer over New York. Following the publication of his books White Sands Incident and Alan's Message: To Men of Earth in 1954, Fry became a celebrity in the contactee movement. He went on to found Understanding, Inc. (now World Understanding) in 1955, through which he teaches the metaphysical perspective he has derived from his space contacts.

Sources:

Fry, Daniel. Alan's Message: To Men of Earth. Los Angeles: New Age Publishing, 1954.

———. Atoms, Galaxies, and Understanding. El Monte, Calif.: Understanding Publishing, 1960.

———. Can God Fill Teeth? The Real Facts Behind the Miracle Ministry of Evangelist Willard Fuller. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA, 1970.

———. The Curve of Development. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA, 1965.

———. White Sands Incident. Los Angeles: New Age Publishing, 1954.

Fukurai, Tomobichi

President of the Psychical Institute of Japan, professor of Kohyassan University, and former professor at the Imperial University of Tokyo. He was obliged to resign because of a book he published in 1913 on his experiments with Chizuko Mifune and Ikuko Nagao, declaring clairvoyance to be a fact.

With Nagao's assistance, Fukurai also conducted experiments in thought photography. Other mediums with whom he experimented included three women, Tetsuko Moritake, Sadako Takahashi, and Tenshin Takeuchi, and one man, Kohichi Mita. His results were presented in the 1913 book, translated into English in 1921 under the title Clairvoyance and Thoughtography. The book was reissued with additional matter in 1931 and again in 1975. The implications of Fukurai's pioneer work were not pursued in the West for many years. Jule Eisenbud's work with the "thought photography" of Ted Serios in 1964 had parallels to Fukurai's investigations.

Sources:

Fukurai, Tomobichi. Clairvoyance and Thoughtography. 1921. Rev. ed. London: Rider, 1930. Reprint, 1975.

Otani, Soji. "Past and Present Situation of Parapsychology in Japan." In Parapsychology Today: A Geographic View. Edited by Allan Angoff and Betty Shapin. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1973.

Fuller, Curtis (1912–1991)

Cofounder and publisher of FATE magazine. Fuller was born March 2, 1912, in Necedah, Wisconsin, and was educated at the University of Wisconsin (B.A., 1933) and Northwestern University (M.S., 1937). He married Mary Margaret Stiehm on September 24, 1938. After a period as a newspaper writer, he was an editor on several magazines in the late 1930s and 1940s. By the mid-1940s he was working for Ziff-Davis, a large Chicago-based publisher.

In the wake of Ziff-Davis's contemplated move to New York and the sighting of flying saucers by Kenneth Arnold in 1947, Fuller and Ray Palmer (also a Ziff-Davis employee) decided to start a new company, Clark Publishing, and issue FATE magazine to explore UFOs and other mysteries. In 1955 he bought out Ray Palmer, who had already withdrawn from active editorial work. In 1966 Mary Margaret Fuller was named editor and Curtis Fuller assumed duties as publisher. He also created a second company, Woodall, Inc., which operated in the travel field and issued directories for trailers and campers.

Fuller had a sympathetic but skeptical view of paranormal phenomena and always insisted on high editorial standards and supporting data on any extraordinary claims made in the magazine's pages. He was a member of the Illinois Society for Psychical Research (president 1961–64) and was active in the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship (treasurer 1962–69). The Fullers directed FATE together through the 1970s and 1980s, but following Mary Margaret's retirement in 1988 the magazine was sold to Llewellyn Publications. The March 1989 issue of FATE contained a farewell editorial from Curtis Fuller. He died April 29, 1991.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Fuller, J(ohn) F(rederick) C(harles) (1878–1966)

Distinguished British soldier and friend of magician Aleister Crowley. As a young man he became impressed by Crowley's poems and occult philosophy and wrote a eulogistic book, The Star in the West (1907), in which he hailed Crowley as "more than a new-born Dionysis, he is more than a Blake, a Rabelais or a Heine; for he stands before us as some priest of Apollo . . ."

"Crowleyanity" was to be the new religion of mankind. It was Fuller who introduced Crowley to poet Victor Neuburg, who was to become Crowley's foremost disciple. (Fuller was not related to Jean Overton Fuller, who wrote an excellent biography of Victor Neuburg.)

Fuller parted company with Crowley in 1911 after a disagreement over a court action and later repudiated The Star in the West as "a jumble of undigested reading with a boyish striving after effect." Before he died, however, in the year of his death, Fuller stated that Crowley "remains one of the greatest of English lyric poets."

Fuller's long career included service in the Boer War (1899–1902) and World War I. He wrote several books on military strategy, including Tanks in the Great War, 1914–18 (1920). Stationed in India for a period, he developed an interest in Eastern philosophy and yoga mysticism. He rose to the rank of major-general in 1930. He also continued to write on occult topics, his later books including Yoga: A Study of the Mystical Philosophy of the Brahmins and Buddhists (1925) and The Secret Wisdom of the Qabalah (1937). He died February 10, 1966.

Sources:

Fuller, John F. The Secret Wisdom of the Qabalah. London, 1937.

———. The Star in the West. London: Walter Scott Publishing, 1907. Reprint, Mokelumne Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1969.

———. Yoga: A Study of the Mystical Philosophy of the Brahmins and Buddhists. London, 1925.

Fuller, Jean (Violet) Overton (1915–)

Actress, writer, and member of a group that included poet Dylan Thomas and novelist Pamela Hansford Johnson. Fuller was born March 7, 1915, at Iver Heath, Buckinghamshire, England. She studied at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art (1930–31), was a student of painting at Academie Julien, Paris, and finished college at the University of London (B.A. honors English, 1945). She later studied astronomy (because of an interest in astrology) at Goldsmith's College (1962–64).

Her varied career included a period as an actress, government service with the British Ministry of Information, and lecturing at the Speech Fellowship, London. She was a member of the British Astronomical Association, the Society of Authors, PEN, Poetry Society, Manifold Group of Poets, and the Dulwich Group of Poets. She also was a member of the Society for Physical Research, and Buddhist Society, and served as vice-president of the Astrological Lodge of the Theosophical Society.

Besides her involvement with Theosophy, teaching about God and the world based on mystical insights, in the circle of Dylan Thomas during the 1930s she became a close friend of occultist and poet Victor Neuburg and wrote a sympathetic biography of him, The Magical Dilemma of Victor Neuburg (1965). This volume contains one of the most complete accounts of the magic work of Neuberg and Aleister Crowley, including the story of Crowley's rediscovery of "sex magick" in 1912 in the Cairo workings. (Fuller was not related to J. F. C. Fuller, who also knew Neuburg and Aleister Crowley.) Fuller also wrote biographies of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Noor Inayat Khan.

Sources:

Fuller, Jean Overton. Blavatsky and Her Teachers: An Investigative Biography. London: East-West Publications, 1988.

———. Madeleine: The Story of Noor Inayat Kahn. London: Gollancz, 1952. Reprinted as Noor-un-nisa Inayat Kahn (Madeleine). Rotterdam: East-West Publications, 1971.

———. The Magical Dilemma of Victor Neuburg. London: W. H. Allen, 1965.

Fuller, Willard (1915–)

Spiritual healer specializing in the astounding phenomenon of psychic dentistry. Born in Grant Parish, Louisiana, Fuller was brought up as a Baptist and hoped to become a minister, but suffered from a pronounced stammer. After graduating from college with a B.A. in business administration and a B.E. in electrical engineering, he joined the army, where he reached the rank of master sergeant. By the time he returned to civilian life in his own town his stammer had ceased. When a traveling evangelist preached on two consecutive nights on the theme "Go Preach," Fuller decided that this had a special meaning for him. He determined to enter the ministry.

In 1946 he studied at the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in New Orleans, where he graduated in theology. During one of his own revivalist meetings a stranger told him that he would be used "as a funnel through which God would pour blessings on His people." Later Fuller felt impelled to leave the Baptist ministry and become a Pentecostal. One day he felt a sudden surge of spiritual force and heard a voice declare that he was given the gift of healing and would heal people in the name of Jesus. At his next service he invited those who needed healing to come forward, and a number of remarkable cures took place.

He attended a service by evangelist A. C. McCabe, who practiced dental healing. McCabe told Fuller that he would also perform dental healing. Fuller was at first reluctant to attempt this, but a man he had cured of a stomach ulcer returned to his meetings and asked him to pray for a tooth cavity. Fuller laid hands on the man's head and prayed, "In the name of Jesus, be thou everywhere whole," and the man confirmed that his tooth cavity was healed. From March 1960 on, Fuller demonstrated this strange healing ability at his meetings. Those who attended his services stated that they saw or personally experienced dental healing, involving instantaneous filling of cavities with gold, silver, or porcelain, straightening of crooked teeth, and healing of decayed teeth and gums. On various occasions such phenomena were witnessed by professional dentists in the congregation.

Although such dental healing phenomenon seems incredible to skeptics, the suggestion of fraud seems even more incredible in the face of numerous eyewitness reports and considering the large sums of money that would be involved in skillful conjuring with substantial quantities of gold, silver, and other cavity fillings.

Fuller organized the Lively Stones World Healing Fellowship to give focus to his ministry. He was assisted by his wife, Margaret, a trained psychologist. She worked for several years in the area of counseling within the realm of the ministry and was herself a healer. She used the same method as her husband—that of laying on of hands and praying in the name of Jesus.

The Fullers were devoted to a healing ministry based on spiritual faith and the power of prayer. Although a number of those who attended their services claimed to receive miraculous dental healing, the Fullers did not become rich through their healing. They had a simple lifestyle and lived for some time on a houseboat. They did not charge for their healing, and their ministry was sustained only by voluntary contributions. They traveled wherever they were invited if their schedule permitted. They moved freely among groups of all persuasions and beliefs. They believed and taught that we are living in the New Age in which God's kingdom will be established on this Earth and perfect order in all things will once again be a reality.

Sources:

Fry, Daniel W. Can God Fill Teeth? The Real Facts Behind the Miracle Ministry of Evangelist Willard Fuller. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1970.

St. Clair, David. Psychic Healers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974. Rev. ed. New York: Bantam, 1979.

Fumigation (in Exorcism)

One of the most important rites during the exorcism of an evil spirit appears to have been the fumigation of the victim, and for this various prescriptions were given throughout occult history. If it was found difficult to dislodge the demon, a picture of him would sometimes be drawn, which was to be thrown into a fire after having been "signed with the cross, sprinkled with holy water, and fumigated."

At other times if the evil spirit refused to give his name the exorcist would fumigate the possessed person. The recipe for fumigation included such substances as asafoetida, sulphur, and salt. Fumigation was sometimes enhanced by flagellation.

Fund for UFO Research

Founded in the District of Columbia in 1979 to provide grants for UFO research and public education. The chairman since its beginning has been physicist Bruce Maccabee. It reviews research proposals and approves those that promise to advance scientific knowledge and public awareness of UFO phenomena. It grants interviews to news media, bestows awards, and conducts research programs. It is not a membership organization nor does it publish a magazine, although it issues occasional reports. It does not investigate UFO reports, but it works with and funds groups that do. Address: P.O. Box 277, Mt. Rainier, MD 20712.

Sources:

A Brief History of the Fund for UFO Research. Washington, D.C.: Fund for UFO Research, n.d.

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s. Vol. 1 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

The Government UFO Collection: A Collection of UFO Documents from the Government of the USA and Canada. Mt. Rainier, Md.: Fund for UFO Research, 1981–85.

Fung Hwang

A bird to which the ancient Chinese attributed almost the same qualities as other cultures did to the phoenix. It was said to have a cock's head, a snake's neck, a swallow's beak, a tortoise's back, and to be of five different colors and more than six feet high. According to the Lun Yü Tseh Shwai, "its head resembles heaven, its eye the sun, its back the moon, its wings the wind, its foot the ground, and its tail the woof." Like the dragon, tortoise, and unicorn, the fung hwang was considered to be a spiritual creature.

The appearance of the fung was always regarded as an auspicious augury. Women adorned themselves with the image of this bird in gold, silver, or brass, according to their means.

Sources:

Gould, Charles. Mythical Monsters. London, 1886. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1969.

Funk, Isaac Kauffmann (1839–1912)

Born in Clinton, Ohio, Funk worked in the field of religious journalism before becoming director and principal proprietor of the publishing house Funk and Wagnalls. A well-known psychical investigator and author of several books on the paranormal, Funk was converted to a belief in Spiritualism by the medium May Pepper of Brooklyn, New York, through whom he received a manifestation from Richard Hodgson a few weeks after Hodgson's death, and by numerous other important incidents. James H. Hyslop, in his book Contact with the Other World (1919), devotes a chapter to claimed spirit communication from Funk through the mediumship of Minnie Meserve Soule (Mrs. Chenoweth).

Sources:

Funk, Isaac K. The Next Step in Evolution; The Present Step. London/New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1902.

———. The Psychic Riddle. London/New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1907.

———. The Widow's Mite and other Psychic Phenomena. London/New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1904.

G

Gadbury, John (1627–1704)

John Gadbury, British astrologer and associate of astrologer William Lilly, was born on New Year's Day of 1627 in Wheatley, Oxon, England, the son of a farmer. As a youth he was apprenticed to a tailor, but in his late teens was sent to Oxford by his mother's father, Sir John Curson. After completing his studies, he married (1645) and, settling in Oxford, studied astrology with Dr. Nicolas Fiske. He published his first book on astrology in 1652. Two years later, with Timothy Gadbury (possibly a brother), he published a book of astrological charts of the kind needed to erect a horoscope. His primary text, the Doctrine of Nativities, appeared in 1659. This latter book surveyed natal astrology and supplied the set of tables from which charts could be prepared. With this book alone, the practicing astrologer could build a chart and offer a basic interpretation.

As a young man Gadbury made the acquaintance of William Lilly (25 years Gadbury's senior). Lilly appears to have been favorably impressed and wrote the introduction to one of Gadbury's books. However, they found themselves on opposite sides of the major political factions of the era, Gadbury favoring Oliver Cromwell, and Lilly supporting the king. However, in 1658, a series of events were initiated that led to a bitter break. In his 1658 Almanac, Lilly paid some compliments to Charles X, the king of Sweden, and predicted a long reign. In response, the next year Charles sent Lilly a gold chain. For reasons not altogether clear, Gadbury responded with a predicton that Charles' reign would be quite short. The king died the next year.

The hostile and competitive feeling between the two astrologers broke into the open again in 1675 when Lilly published some observations on the astrological sign Scorpio, emphasizing its negative traits. Gadbury took the publication personally as he had Scorpio rising in his chart. He attacked Lilly in his next book, Obsequim Rationabile (1675). Over the next several years, Lilly's supporters periodically attacked Gadbury and Lilly noted that Gadbury had responded by acting in the very manner typical of a Scorpio. The hard feelings continued even after Lilly's death in 1681. As late as 1693, John Partridge continued the attack in The Black Life of John Gadbury.

Apart from his lengthy battles with Lilly, Gadbury is most remembered for his Collectio Geniturarum, his astrological commentary on the lives of 150 famous, most notable contemporaries. Three centuries later, it provides a unique glimpse into the seventeenth century, though there are some notable errors in several birthdates.

After a long and productive life, Gadbury died in March of 1704.

Sources:

Gadbury, John. Collectio Geniturarum. London: James Cottrel, 1662.

———. Genethlialogia, or the Doctrine of Nativities. London, 1658.

———. Obsequim Rationabile. London, 1675.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

McCaffery, Ellen. Astrology: Its History and Influence in the Western World. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1942.

Parker, Derek. Familiar to All: William Lilly and Astrology in the Seventeenth Century. London: Jonathan Cape, 1975.

Gagates

Ancient term for jet (a velvet-black coal often used for jewelry), believed to be a black species of electrum or amber. The name derives from the area of Gagas, in Lycia, where the substance was found in classical times. Various occult properties are ascribed to it.

Gaia

Pre-Olympian Greek earth goddess, worshiped as mother of all. She mated with her son Uranus and bore Titans, the Cyclops, and Hectoncheires. Worship of Gaia continued after the rise of the Olympians, and she was regarded as a powerful influence in marriage, healing the sick, and divination. She was represented as a gigantic female form. Earlier cultures also had religious concepts of a great earth goddess.

The concept of Gaia as earth goddess has been revived in New Age ecological and mystical beliefs. On September 6, 1970, Otter G'Zell, founder of the Church of All Worlds, one of the early modern Neo-Pagan organizations, had a vision of the unity of the Earth's planetary biosphere—a single organism. He shared the vision with other church members and wrote about it in 1971 in the periodical he edited, The Green Egg.

Atmospheric biochemist James E. Lovelock had a very similar idea at somewhat the same time and through his books Gaia (1979) and The Ages of Gaia (1988) emerged as the leading proponent of this modern Gaia hypothesis of the earth as a living organism. His books propose a dynamic interaction between life and environment, with earth regulating life, and life regulating earth, virtually a single self-regulating entity.

The controversial aspect of Lovelock's concept is the extent the earth may be regarded as a living organism in which life and environment form one dynamic interacting whole. Although not unsympathetic to modern environmentalism, Lovelock proposes a broader frame of reference, and in The Ages of Gaia states: "At the risk of having my membership card of the Friends of the Earth withdrawn, I say that only by pollution do we survive. We animals pollute the air with carbon dioxide, and the vegetation pollutes it with oxygen. The pollution of one is the meat of the other." The Gaia hypothesis has stimulated New Age and Neo-Pagan veneration of Gaia as a living earth goddess and become an integral part of the revival of goddess worship in the last two decades.

The modern Gaia hypothesis was earlier prefigured by such writers as Gustav Fechner (1801–1887) and Francis Younghusband.

Sources:

Derrey, Francois. The Earth is Alive. London: Arlington Books, 1968.

G'Zell, Otter. Gaia: A New Look at Life on Earth. London: Oxford University Press, 1979.

———. "Theogenesis: The Birth of the Goddess." Green Egg 21, 81 (May 1, 1988): 4–7, 27.

Olson, Carl. The Book of the Goddess, Past and Present. Philadelphia: J. P. Lippincott, 1983.

Pedlar, Kit. Quest for Gaia. UK: Sovereign Press, 1979.

Stein, Diane. The Women's Spirituality Book. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1987.

Younghusband, Sir Francis. The Living Universe. London: John Murray, 1933.

Galactites (or Galaricides)

A precious stone of white color. According to ancient belief it was greatly valued by magicians, its property being to make magical writings known and ghosts to appear and also to return answers to questions. It was said to promote love and friendship.

Galbreath, Robert (Carroll) (1938–)

Writer and editor on folklore, popular culture, and the occult. He was born October 24, 1938, in Cincinnati, Ohio. He attended the University of Michigan (A.B. with high honors, 1960; Ph.D., 1970) and Harvard University (A.M., 1961). He was awarded a Woodrow Wilson fellowship for 1960–61. He taught at Bowling Green State University, Ohio (1965–70) and then became a postdoctoral fellow at the Center for Twentieth Century Studies at the University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee (1972–74). He taught at the University of Wisconsin for several years before moving to a position at the Northwestern University library in Evanston, Illinois.

Galbreath has had a longstanding interest in the occult and has published a number of articles in various scholarly journals. He is a member of the American Society for Psychical Research and the Popular Culture Association. Through the latter he published his main book, The Occult: Studies and Evaluations (1972). He also served as the associate editor for Explorations: A Newsletter of Research into the Occult.

Sources:

Galbreath, Robert C. "Arthur Edward Waite, Occult Scholar and Christian Mystic: A Chronological Bibliography." Bulletin of Bibliography 30, no. 2 (April–June 1973).

———. "History of Modern Occultism: A Bibliographical Survey." Journal of Popular Culture 5, no. 3 (winter 1971).

———, ed. The Occult: Studies and Evaluations. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1972.

Galeotti, Marzio (or Martius) (ca. 1440–ca. 1494)

Italian astrologer and theologian who appears to have been a native of Narni, in Umbria. It seems that while a young man he settled for a while at Bologna, where he gave grave offense to the Church of Rome by promulgating the doctrine that good works are not the road to salvation, which is only to be obtained by faith in Christ. Finding the priests around him growing daily more and more hostile, Galeotti left for Hungary, where be became secretary to the king, Matthias Corvinus, and also tutor to the king's son, Prince John.

His secretarial and tutorial duties did not occupy all his time, so he was able to study astrology and also wrote a book, De jocose Dictis et Factis Regis Matthiae Corvini. Some of the tenets in this work caused further offense to the clergy, and eventually their rancor was such that the writer was seized and taken to Venice, where he was imprisoned for a while.

He was eventually released, chiefly through the influence of Pope Sixtus IV, whose tutor he is said to have been at an earlier, indeterminate date. Thereupon, Galeotti left for France, where he came under the notice of the king, Louis XI, who appointed him his state astrologer. He acted in this capacity for many years, sometimes living within the precincts of the royal castle of Plessis-les-Tours, sometimes at the town of Lyons. In 1478, while staying at Lyons, he was informed that Louis was approaching and he rode out to meet him, but fell from his horse and died shortly afterward as a result of injuries sustained in the fall.

A special interest attaches to Galeotti in that he appears in Sir Walter Scott's inimitable story of medieval France, Quentin Durward. Early in the tale, soon after Quentin has entered the Scots Guard of Louis XI, the latter and his new guardsman are depicted as visiting the astrologer, the king being anxious for a prophecy regarding Quentin's immediate future. The scene is a very memorable and graphic one, among the best in the whole book, and it is historically valuable because it contains what is probably a fairly accurate description of the kind of study used generally by an astrologer in the Middle Ages.

Galeotti is represented "curiously examining a specimen, just issued from the Frankfurt Press, of the newly invented art of printing," and the king questions him about this novel process, whereupon the seer speaks of the vast changes it is destined to bring about throughout the whole world.

This scene has a special point, since although the novelist himself did not refer to the matter in his notes, nor did Andrew Lang refer to it in his annotations to the Border Waverley edition, it is known that Louis was keenly interested in printing. Soon after the craft first made its appearance, the king commissioned the director of his mint (one Nicholas Janson or Jenson) to give up his post in favor of studying typography, with a view to its being carried on in France.

Galigai, Leonora (d. 1617)

Wife of the Maréchal d'Ancre Concinoc, who was killed by King Louis XIII's men April 24, 1617. The queen's niece and foster sister, she was believed to be a sorceress and was said to have bewitched the queen, becoming one of her favorites. She was found with three volumes full of magic characters, in addition to charms and amulets. At her trial, it was established that the marshal and his wife had consulted magicians, astrologers, and sorcerers, had made use of waxen images, and had brought sorcerers from the town of Nancy to sacrifice cocks.

It is said that she was condemned on her own confession and beheaded and burned. When President Courtin had asked her by what charm she had bewitched the queen, she had replied, proudly, "My spell was the power of a strong mind over a weak one."

Gallagher, Christina (1953–)

Brigid Christina Gallagher, a contemporary visionary in Ireland, has reported a series of apparitions of the Virgin Mary. Gallagher was born on June 4, 1953, in the town of Calladashan, County Mayo, and grew up to marry and settle into the life of a housewife and mother of two children. She had her initial vision in 1985 when she saw the head of Jesus crowned with thorns. She was to see a number of visions over the next few years that included various heavenly personages and scenes. Then in 1988, while visiting relatives in Dublin, the Virgin Mary appeared to her. She held a clear glass sphere in her hand and invited Gallagher under her mantle. She made the sign of the cross and left. Another person present at the time saw nothing. Back in County Mayo, Mary appeared a week later accompanied by Bernadette Soubirous (1844–1879), the visionary of Lourdes.

At the third vision, on February 4, 1988, Mary spoke and identified herself as the Queen of Peace. She suggested that time was short and called the Irish people to pray the Rosary. Subsequent apparitions occurred to her privately in her home and in a few locations in Gortnadreha, where she now resides. On several occasions a small group gathered with her at a local grotto for a few of the apparitions. While the apparitions remained fairly private occurrences, word of her receiving messages soon spread throughout the predominantly Catholic land. Among her messages, the Virgin suggested that beginning in 1992 a series of terrible things would begin to happen and the number of calamities would multiply. She also indicated that the Antichrist was behind the Maastricht Treaty (that was leading to a united Europe).

Into the early 1990s, Gallagher experienced a broad spectrum of spiritual/psychic experiences including glossolalia, bilocation, and the apparitions of different personages. These were anchored by some 25 major messages from the Virgin in 1988. In one of these apparitions, the Lady requested the striking of a medal, the Matrix Medal, showing the Virgin on her knees before the cross. Through the 1990s more than a million Matrix Medals were distributed. In 1989 Gallagher began to show the stigmata, as wounds like those traditionally believed to have been inflicted upon Jesus during His last days appeared on her body. She also had visions of a number of the popular saints such as Padre Pio and St. Therese of Lisieux. The overall message of the experiences was one of warning of future disasters, a call for non-Christians to convert, and a plea for Roman Catholics to become more pious.

Gallagher's experiences have continued to the present.

Sources:

Petrisko, Thomas W. The Sorrow, the Sacrifice, and the Triumph: The Apparitions, Visions, and Prophecies of Christina Gallagher. New York: Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, 1995.

Gallagher, Danny

Irish healer, the seventh son of a seventh son, and thus, according to folk tradition, destined to heal by touch. Although aware of this tradition, Gallagher did not attempt to practice healing until 1974, when he was working as an ice cream vendor in Coalisland, Northern Ireland. He had often saved an ice cream for a young girl who was paralyzed from the waist down. One day the girl was late in meeting the ice cream van, and Gallagher had a sudden premonition that he should help the child. He entered the house of her parents and told them he believed he could cure the girl. He succeeded, and when the news spread rapidly, Gallagher was overwhelmed by requests from scores of sick people for his healing touch. He sold his ice cream van and began a new life as a healer.

At the beginning of his ministry thousands of invalids traveled miles and waited in line for hours to spend just a few moments with the healer. Many remarkable cures have been claimed. Invalids have stood up from their wheelchairs and walked, terminal cancer patients have recovered, the deaf have regained hearing, and the blind have recovered their sight. For example, Jean Pritchett had been blind for 22 years, and a specialist had even recommended removal of one of her eyes. Jean's brother Peter went to a faith healing meeting in Birmingham, England, and just happened to take Jean along with him. After treatment by Gallagher, Jean recovered her sight.

Gallagher's healing technique normally involves three sessions with a patient. In the first session he lays his hands on the afflicted part of the body and requests that the patient bring soil from consecrated ground for the second visit. On that visit he "blesses" the soil and asks the patient to mix it with water and bathe the troubled area with it. On the third visit the treatment is normally completed.

Danny does not consider what he does healing by faith. Rather, he observes, "A person can come with faith in me, or God, or themselves, or none at all. It doesn't matter." He says he believes he acts only as a channel for divine healing power.

After traveling through Ireland, England, Australia, and the United States giving healing sessions, Gallagher set up a clinic at the house of his friends Mr. & Mrs. Jim Shannon at 49 Crouch Hill, Finsbury Park, London, N4. His address in Ireland is 122 Glen Rd., Maghera, Co. Derry, Northern Ireland.

Gandalf's Garden

A British experimental community of the sixties situated in Chelsea, London, embracing popular mysticism, yoga, meditation, gurus, and occultism. It was a meeting place for young people interested in such topics, with a craft shop and free food. The center was founded by Muz Murray, an art student who spent seven years hitchhiking in Europe, the Middle East, and Africa. He claims that while in Cyprus during 1964 he experienced mystical awareness, which he later compared with the LSD experience, finding the latter inferior. He developed Gandalf's Garden (named after author Tolkien's white wizard in Lord of the Rings) to create a spiritual and mystical lifestyle for young people. Their journal, Gandalf's Garden, included articles on new and old systems of developing changes in consciousness presented in the somewhat sensationalist pop style of the sixties.

Gandalf's Garden was dispersed in 1971 into various "seed centers" in different parts of the world, and the journal ceased publication. The "Friends of the Garden" described their centers as "gatherings of people who are not restricted by or to any one spiritual viewpoint, religion, sect or path, and who are open to the totality of things to be discovered in this incredible state of existence, whether it be from the intuitive mystical experience or the aware scientific investigation of the Cosmos." There is a Friends of the Garden Central Seed Centre at 24 St. Margaret's Close, Norstead, Norwich, England.

Gandillon Family (Pierre, Georges, Antoinette, Perrenette) (d. 1598)

French werewolves of St. Claude, in the Jura region, France, one of the major historical cases of lycanthropy. Perrenette believed that she was a wolf and one day in 1598 attacked two children who were picking wild strawberries. One of the children, a four-year-old boy, defended his sister with a knife, but Perrenette wrenched the knife from him and gashed his throat. He died of the wound after communicating the news that the wolf had human hands. Perrenette was found in the vicinity and torn to pieces by the enraged villagers.

Antoinette confessed to being a werewolf, and also to sleeping with the devil (who had taken the form of a goat), attending a Sabbat, and producing magical hailstorms. Her brother Pierre was also accused of making hailstones, luring children to a Sabbat, turning himself into a wolf, and killing and eating people. He stated that Satan clothed them as wolves and that they hunted on all fours. Pierre's son Georges also confessed to changing into a wolf by smearing himself with a salve and killing two goats.

Antoinette, Pierre, and Georges were all convicted as werewolves and burned in 1598. The presiding judge was Henri Boguet whose Discours des sorciers became a standard guide to witchcraft.

Ganguly, Sachindra Nath (1932–)

Indian university lecturer in philosophy who has explored the connections between yoga and parapsychology. Ganguly was born on September 1, 1932, at Calcutta, India. He attended Presidency College, Calcutta University, graduating with an M.A. in philosophy in 1953.

He was appointed lecturer in philosophy at Jadavpur University, Calcutta, and between 1960 and 1962 researched at the Department of Philosophy of the University of Bristol, England. He is a founding member of the Narsingdas Academy of Yoga and Parapsychology, Calcutta, and a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He has taken a special interest in the development of psi faculty in relation to repeatable tests.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Ganzfeld Setting

A development in modern parapsychological techniques popularized by Charles Honorton, director of research at the Division of Parapsychology and Psychophysics at Maimonides Medical Center, New York. The term Ganzfeld roughly translates as "total field," and the Ganzfeld Setting is basically a sensory isolation situation used for testing ESP. The subject, wearing earphones and blinders, sits in a comfortable chair in a soundproof booth and is instructed to stare at a bold red light, creating a diffused glow. Over the headphones comes a soft hiss of white noise.

The subject normally stays in the isolation booth for about 35 minutes and is instructed to think aloud, describing mental images, thoughts, and feelings. This monologue is monitored by an experimenter on an intercom system. Meanwhile another assistant (often a friend or associate of the subject) starts looking at pictures (often on slides held to the light). Experimenters have found frequent similarity between the images viewed by the assistant and the reveries of the subject in the Ganzfeld Setting.

In the first 30 tests initiated by parapsychologists Honorton and Harper in 1973, 43.3 percent of the subjects demonstrated a match with selected targets, as against a 25 percent chance expectation. In other cases, there was a suggestion of possible clairvoyant or precognitive faculty. Remarkable results were also achieved by parapsychologist D. Scott Rogo in California with the gifted subject Claudia Adams, a Los Angeles actress. During tests, Adams displayed such uncanny prescience that problems arose in limiting her ESP faculty to the disciplines of a given test. For example, in one test Rogo had prepared four pictures in sealed envelopes, only one of which was to be used, leaving the other three for later tests. However, Adams accurately described all four pictures during one test.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Blackmore, Susan. "A Report of a Visit to Carl Sargent's Laboratory." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 54, no. 808 (July 1987).

Harley, Trevor, and Gerald Matthews. "Cheating, Psi, and the Appliance of Science: A Reply to Blackmore." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 54, no. 808 (July 1987).

Rogo, Scott. "ESP in the Ganzfeld: An Exploration of Parameters." In Research in Parapsychology 1975, edited by J. D. Morris, W. G. Roll, and R. L. Morris. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1976.

———. "Free Response Ganzfeld Experiments With a Selected Subject." In Research in Parapsychology 1975, edited by J. D. Morris, W. G. Roll, and R. L. Morris. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1976.

Garabandal

San Sebastian de Garabandal is a village in Spain, located 90 kilometers from Santander, where beginning in 1961 four young girls claimed to see apparitions of the Virgin Mary. In July 1961 Maria Cruz Gonzalez, Jacinta Gonzalez, Mari Loli Mazon, and Maria Conception (known as Conchita) Gonzales, ages 11 and 12, astonished villagers by declaring that an angel had appeared to them, followed by an apparition of the virgin. These visions came several times in a week, when the girls went into trance, oblivious to the crowds surrounding them. Afterward they said they were talking to the Blessed Mother, the Virgin Mary. In the course of time, their trances were witnessed and recorded by priests and psychologists, even filmed. When the girls were pricked with pins and bright lights flashed in their faces they did not respond.

In October 1961 the message from the Virgin Mary was that they had been chosen to receive a message for the world: "We must make many sacrifices, perform much penance and visit the Blessed Sacrament frequently, but first we must lead good lives. The cup is already filling up and if we do not change, a very great chastisement will come up on us."

During such visions the girls were shown part of the chastisement threatened to the world, and they screamed in terror. The visions continued until 1965, when Conchita was 15 years old. Conchita asked the Virgin Mary to send proof that these visions were truly from God and was told that a great miracle would take place. Conchita reported,

"The only thing I can tell is that it's going to be something that will happen in my village. . . . [T]he people who are sick are going to be cured. The day after there is going to be a sign in the pine trees . . . something we can see is gonna be there for ever." This miracle was to be announced eight days in advance.

By this time Conchita was the only one of the four girls to continue to see visions, and early in 1965 she stated that she was to receive a second worldwide message. It came late at night on June 18 before a large, expectant crowd. The following morning Conchita stated that the message was similar to the earlier one but much stronger:

"Before the cup was filling up, now it is flowing over. Many cardinals, many bishops, and many priests are on the road to perdition and taking many souls with them. I, your Mother, ask you to amend your lives. You are now receiving the last warnings. I love you very much and do not want your condemnation. You should make more sacrifices, think about the passion of Jesus."

By November 1965 the visions ceased entirely, but Conchita was constantly pressed to reveal the date of the promised miracle, known only to her. Then quite suddenly Conchita lost faith in her visions, feeling it was all a dream. The village priest sent her to the bishop, who simply advised her not to talk further about the apparitions. She decided to leave the village, feeling she could not stay there with people wanting to talk to her and not knowing what to say to them. She emigrated to the United States and lived anonymously.

An advocacy center for the Garabandal visions was founded in New York, and a branch was formed in London. The center declares that before the "chastisement" there will be great miraculous signs that the world will accept as supernatural. There will be a worldwide warning that everyone will be aware of, regardless of race, color, or creed. Conchita will announce the great miracle eight days in advance. It will take place at Garabandal, where the sick will be cured and sinners converted, and in this spectacular miracle God will manifest at the pine trees a visible sign that will remain until the end of time for the conversion of the world.

Meanwhile Conchita lives quietly and avoids publicity, trying to escape the attention of the public. She did, however, take part in a British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) television feature on Garabandal (telecast in the "Everyman" series in 1980), although she declined the standard fee for her appearance. This program highlighted the extraordinary challenge of such apparitions of the Virgin Mary and the dilemma they pose for those who see them.

Whereas the story of Lourdes now depends upon hearsay accounts and traditions of a century ago, the case of Garabandal is so topical that film records were actually taken of the girls during their trances, and direct interviews were recorded with Conchita herself. In the BBC feature it was clear from interviews with Conchita that she faces a strange problem, intensified as the date of the miracle, known only to her, presumably approaches. If there is no miracle, she will be branded a fake or hysteric. If there is a miracle, her privacy and family life will be invaded and disrupted by publicity.

Even the simple life of the villagers of Garabandal has changed as the village has become a great pilgrim center. Speculators have bought up land and new houses are being built to accommodate pilgrims. Every year thousands visit the pine trees where the miracle is scheduled. In the United States, Conchita Gonzales waits with her family and dedicates herself to "love God and do his work."

Fr. Robert Pelletier, the strongest advocate for the Garabandal visions in North America, has attempted to liken Garabandal to Fatima, even recounting a similar miracle of the sun's dancing in the sky. Unlike Fatima in neighboring Portugal, however, Garabandal has not received the endorsement of the Catholic Church. An initial inquiry under the bishop of Santander in 1967 reported to Rome negatively about the events at Garabandal. Rome did not act on these findings, and thus the church has made no official pronouncement on the validity of the apparitions.

Sources:

Gonzalez, Conchita, and Harry Daley. Miracle at Garabandal: The Story of Mysterious Apparitions in Spain and a Message for the Whole World. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983.

McClure, Kevin. The Evidence for Visions of the Virgin Mary. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

Pelletier, Robert A. God Speaks at Garabandal. Worcester, Mass.: Assumption, 1970.

———. The Sun Dances at Garabandal. Worcester, Mass.: Assumption, 1973.

Perry, Nicholas, and Loreto Echeverria. Under the Heel of Mary. London: Routledge, 1988.

Garatronicus

A red-colored stone that Achilles is believed to have carried with him in battle. It was said to render its possessor invincible.

"Garden of Pomegranates"

A sixteenth-century tract, Pardis Rimonim, by Rabbi Moses Cordovero reflecting the later spirit of the Kabala. The title derives from the biblical Song of Songs: "Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates." The pomegranate has been a favorite Eastern symbol of mystics in the context of the garden of the soul. The title A Garden of Pomegranates was also given to a modern outline of kabbalistic teachings by magician Israel Regardie.

Sources:

Cordovero, Moses ben Jacob. Moses Cordovero's Introduction to Kabbalah: An Annotated Translation of His Or na'errav. New York: Michael Sharaf Publishing Trust of the Yeshiva University Press, 1994. (Originally published sixteenth century.)

Regardie, Israel. A Garden of Pomegranates. London: Rider, 1936. Reprint, St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1970.

Gardner, F(rederick) L(eigh) (1857–ca. 1930)

British occultist, member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn occult society. Gardner's private papers and correspondence have helped to throw light on some aspects of the Golden Dawn and its members, such as W. W. Westcott, S. L. M. Mathers, and W. A. Ayton.

Gardner was born in Highbury, North London, March 31, 1857, the son of an accountant. His parents were Spiritualists and held séances at their home, at one of which young Gardner was controlled by an Indian guide.

Gardner began employment as a stockbroker's clerk, becoming a member of the Stock Exchange in 1886. He joined the Theosophical Society around 1884 and was informed that his mahatma (a master or adept of the Society) was "Koot Hoomi." He married soon after this, and his wife shared his theosophical interests. Gardner knew Helena Petrovna Blavatsky personally and became a member of the Blavatsky Lodge in 1890. He lost interest in the Theosophical Society after joining the Golden Dawn in 1894.

He corresponded frequently with Rev. W. A. Ayton, another member of the Golden Dawn, who was a student of alchemy, and their letters (a collection of which, edited by Ellie Howe, was published in 1985) are valuable for their sidelights on the order. Gardner was also a Freemason, later joining the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia and becoming its librarian. He became financially involved in sponsoring publication of the English translation by Mathers of the important occult treatise The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin in 1898.

Gardner retired from membership of the Stock Exchange in 1903 and thereafter was an antiquarian bookseller, with special interest in occult works. He edited and privately published the limited edition, three-volume Catalogue Raisonné of Works on the Occult Sciences, consisting of Rosicrucian Books (1903), Astrological Books (1911), and Freemasonry: A Catalogue of Lodge Histories (1912). These remain very useful bibliographical contributions.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic, ed. The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: The Letters of the Revd W. A. Ayton to F. L. Gardner and Others 1886–1905. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1985.

———. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

Gardner, G(erald) B(rosseau) (1884–1964)

Pioneer of the modern witchcraft revival. Gardner was born at Blundell Sands near Liverpool, England, June 13, 1884. Beginning at age 16, he spent much of his life in the East, as a tea planter in Ceylon (1900–19), a rubber planter in Borneo and Malaya (1923), and a customs official in Malaya (1936). In the East he took the opportunity to study magic practices and even became an expert on the kris, a Malay ceremonial dagger, about which he wrote a definitive text. In Ceylon he also became a Mason.

On his retirement from Malaya, Gardner and his wife settled in New Forest in Hampshire, England, where he associated with members of a theosophical group, the Crotona Fellowship of Rosicrucians. One of the members supposedly had belonged to a secret witch coven and introduced Gardner to witchcraft. In fact, it appears that Gardner set out to construct a new popular occult religion, drawing upon all the things he had learned in the East. Elements of this new religion were first published in 1949 in a novel, High Magic's Aid, issued under a pseudonym, Scire. Then in 1951 the last of the archaic anti-witchcraft laws (which had in this century been used primarily to attack Spiritualists) were removed from British law. Three years later Gardner completed his most important book, Witchcraft Today. By this time he had created a working coven, but he presented his new religion as the faith of an old witchcraft group that was dying out. The book was a means of contacting people who wanted to be members of the witchcraft faith. It was followed by Meaning of Witchcraft (1959).

Throughout the 1950s the practice of witchcraft spread in England. Gardner opened a witchcraft museum on the Isle of Man and made himself available to the press and to prospective new witches. In 1962, shortly before Gardner's death, the Americans Rosemary and Raymond Bucklad traveled to his home and were initiated as priestess and priest and returned to found the Gardnerian movement in the United States. Gardner died at sea on February 12, 1964. After his death the contents of the museum were sold to Ripley's Believe It or Not and were subsequently disbursed to various Ripley's museums and sold to private collectors.

Gardner's form of witchcraft was based on a polytheism centered on the Great Mother Goddess and her consort, the Horned God. In the coven, the basic organizational and worshiping group of the movement, the two deities are symbolized by the priestess and priest. The priestess has clear dominance, and the lineage of authority is passed through her. The ritual is in three degrees, Gardner having assembled ritual elements from a variety of sources. Much of the third degree is taken from the writings of Aleister Crowley.

As Gardner's movement spread, a number of variations developed, first by former members Alexander Sanders and Sybil Leek, and in the United States by various self-described "traditionalists." In North America upward of fifty thousand people have been attracted to the Gardnerian or Neopagan Wiccan movement.

Sources:

Bracelin, L. L. Gerald Gardner: Witch. London: Octagon Press, 1960.

Gardner, Gerald. A Goddess Arrives. London: A. W. Stockwell, 1948.

———. Meaning of Witchcraft. London: Aquarian Press, 1959.

———. Witchcraft Today. London: Jerrolds, 1954.

Kelly, Aidan A. Crafting the Art of Magic: A History of Modern Witchcraft, 1939–1964. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1991.

Valiente, Doreen. The Rebirth of Witchcraft. London: Robert Hale, 1989.

Gardner, Martin (1924–)

Journalist and writer, born in Tulsa, Oklahoma, on October 21, 1914. Gardner graduated from the University of Chicago (B.A., 1936). His first job was as a reporter for the Tulsa Tribune. In the 1950s he moved to New York and in 1957 became associated with Scientific American, for which he has written a column on mathematical games for many years.

In 1952 Gardner wrote what has become the most famous and enduring of his many books, In the Name of Science (reprinted in 1957 as Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science), a skeptical book dealing with numerous scientific deadends, hoaxes, and religious groups that made scientific claims to support their beliefs. The volume has become a classic of debunking literature relative to the occult.

Gardner continued to turn out books, primarily on mathematics, over the years. Periodically he gathered his columns into what has turned into a series of books on mathematical games. In the 1980s he returned to the debunking role and turned out three new volumes: Science: Good, Bad, and Bogus (1981), The New Age: Notes of a Fringe-Watcher (1988), and How Not to Test a Psychic: Ten Years of Remarkable Experiments with Renowned Psychic Pavel Stepanek (1989). In this debunking role he has identified with the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal, of which he was an original member.

Sources:

Gardner, Martin. How Not to Test a Psychic: Ten Years of Remarkable Experiments with Renowned Psychic Pavel Stepanek. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1989.

———. In the Name of Science. New York: George Putnam's Sons, 1952. Reprinted as Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science. New York: Dover Publications, 1957.

———. New Age Notes of a Fringe Watcher. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1988.

———. Science, God, Bad, and Bogus. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1981.

Garinet, Jules (1797–ca. 1877)

French bibliophile and author of Histoire de la Magie en France (1818), in which he includes a description of the Sabbat, a dissertation on demons, and a discourse on the superstitions connected with magic among the ancients and his contemporaries.

Sources:

Garinet, Jules. Histoire de la Magie en France. Paris, 1818.

Garland, Hamlin (1860–1940)

Author, lecturer, and psychical researcher. Born at La-Crosse, Wisconsin, September 14, 1860, he was educated at Cedar Valley Seminary, Iowa, the University of Wisconsin (Hon. LL.D., 1926), and the University of California (1927).

As a young man Garland spent his early life in farming. At age 24 he moved to Boston for further formal education and became established as a critic and lecturer. He was a staunch defender of farmers and also of women's rights. His book Daughter of the Middle Border (1921) won a Pulitzer Prize. While in Boston, Garland joined the American Society for Psychical Research and conducted his own investigations into psychic matters. He also wrote many articles on the subject. His books include Forty Years of Psychic Research (1936) and The Mystery of the Buried Crosses (1939). He died March 4, 1940.

Sources:

Garland, Hamlin. Forty Years of Psychic Research. New York: Macmillan, 1936.

Holloway, Jean. Hamlin Garland, a Biography. Austin, Tex.: University of Texas Press, 1960.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Garlic

A member of the lily family that has been used worldwide as a Garlic herb and medicine. It was cultivated throughout Europe, where it was believed that using it or even mentioning its name was a sure charm against witchcraft, the evil eye, and vampires. Newly built houses and the sterns of boats belonging to Greece and Turkey once had long bunches of garlic hanging from them as a preventive against the fatal envy of any ill-disposed person. In ancient Rome soldiers believed that eating garlic gave them courage in battle. In addition to its use as an amulet, garlic was also credited with medical virtue as an antiseptic, salve, and water purifier.

Garlic also appeared in the folklore of Mexico, South America, and China, where it emerged as an antivampire agent. It was also long believed to have aphrodisiac properties and was forbidden in the diet of yogis in higher spiritual development in ancient India.

Sources:

Lehrer, Ernst, and Johanna Ernst. Folklore and Odysseys of Food and Medicinal Plants. New York: Tutor Publishing, 1962.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: An Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1994.

Garnet

Gemstone that was popularly believed to preserve health and promote joy, but in the case of lovers might cause discord.

Garnett, Richard (1789–1850)

British philologist who maintained a secret interest in astrology. He was born July 26, 1789, in Otley, Yorkshire, and educated at Otley Grammar School. In time he mastered several languages—French, Italian, German, Latin, and Greek—and became a curate at Blackburn and assistant master of the grammar school. He also contributed articles to the Protestant Guardian. After the death of his first wife and their infant daughter, he moved to Lichfield, where he became priest-vicar of Lichfield Cathedral in 1829 and absorbed himself in the study of comparative philosophy. He contributed important papers to the Quarterly Review dealing with English lexicography, dialects, and the Celtic languages. In 1834 he married his second wife, Rayne Weaks.

In 1838 he became assistant keeper of printed books at the British Museum Library. He became a member of the Philological Society and contributed important papers to its Transactions. He died September 27, 1850.

Few suspected that this eminent scholar of philology and important official at the august British Museum Library was secretly fascinated by astrology. However, he not only studied early accounts of this subject but also experimented himself with research on the association of planetary positions with mental illness. He published his findings under the pseudonym A. G. Trent (an anagram of his own name).

Garnier, Gilles (d. 1574)

Notorious French werewolf of the Dôle area of France-Comté during the sixteenth century and a classic instance of lycanthropy. Following an epidemic of attacks on young children in 1573, Garnier and his wife were arrested and tried as werewolves. Garnier confessed that he had killed a 12-year-old boy and was about to eat his flesh but was interrupted by villagers. Garnier and the villagers testified that Garnier appeared in human form, although in other instances it was claimed that he appeared as a wolf.

Garnier confessed that on another occasion he killed a ten-year-old girl while in the shape of a wolf, tearing her flesh with his teeth and claws, and then devoured her, and that on another occasion he attacked a girl while in the shape of a wolf but was interrupted and had to flee. He then claimed that a few days later he strangled a ten-year-old boy while in the shape of a wolf, tearing off a leg with his fangs and eating the flesh. In reaction to his confession, the authorities burned him alive at Dôle on January 18, 1574, and scattered his ashes to the winds.

Garrett, Eileen J(eanette Vancho Lyttle) (1892–1970)

Psychic medium, foundation executive, writer, editor, publisher, and one of the most important figures of the early parapsychological scene. She is believed to have been born March 14, 1892, in Meath, Ireland, and given the name Emily Jane Savage. In later years, Emily became known variously as "Jane Savage" or "Jean Lyttle" (or "Little"). The latter name was the pseudonym for her four published novels.

Garrett was a natural sensitive from an early age. Her psychic ability was further developed by Spiritualist James Hewat McKenzie at the British College of Psychic Science, London, between 1924 and 1928. Garrett, however, was unique among mediums in developing an objective approach to her own phenomena. She also enlisted the assistance of qualified researchers and scientists in investigating paranormal phenomena. She was invited to the United States by the American Society for Psychical Research in 1931, and from time to time visited Duke University, working under the guidance of William McDougall and J. B. Rhine. She worked with many famous investigators of the paranormal, including Alexis Carrel, Nandor Fodor, and Hereward Carrington. She experimented with telepathy, trance, psychic controls, poltergeist, ESP, and many other phenomena.

Her own powers of telepathy and clairvoyance were remarkable. As a medium she attracted world interest when she received a communication apparently from the dead captain of the airship R101 after the airship had crashed but before the news was reported.

In 1941 Garrett started the publishing house Creative Age Press in New York with her own book Telepathy, written in five weeks. She also launched Tomorrow magazine, one of the most intelligent journals on paranormal topics of the time, and established Helix Press, another publishing house.

In 1951 she set up the Parapsychology Foundation in New York to encourage organized scientific research through grants and international conferences. The foundation published the International Journal of Parapsychology, the first issue of which appeared in the summer of 1959. The foundation organized its first international conference on parapsychology at the University of Utrecht, Holland, on July 29, 1953, under the chairmanship of Gardner Murphy.

Garrett had been married twice before her marriage to J. W. Garrett in 1918. During her lifetime she encountered many famous literary figures and worked with the greatest parapsychologists of her time. She died September 15, 1970, and was buried at Marseilles, France.

Sources:

Angoff, Allen. Eileen Garrett and the World Beyond the Senses. New York: William Morrow, 1974.

Garrett, Eileen J. Adventures in the Supernormal. New York: Garrett Publications, 1949.

———. Awareness. New York: Creative Age Press, 1941.

———. Life is the Healer. Philadelphia: Dorrance, 1957.

———. Many Voices: The Autobiography of a Medium. 1968. Reprint, New York: Dell, 1969.

———. My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. London: Rider, 1939.

———. The Sense and Nonsense of Prophecy. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1950. Reprint, New York: Berkley, 1968.

———. Telepathy: In Search of a Lost Faculty. New York: Creative Age Press, 1945.

———, ed. Beyond the Five Senses. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1957.

———. Does Man Survive Death? New York: Helix Press, 1957.

Progoff, Ira. The Image of an Oracle: A Report on Research into the Mediumship of Eileen Garrett. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Garunda

The Garunda was a Spanish secret society reported to have originated from an apparition of the Virgin Mary in the 1490s to a hermit named Apollinario. At the time Spain was just emerging. King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella were pushing the Moors southward, Columbus had discovered the New World, and the Jews had been banished from the kingdom. Apollinario was dedicated to removing all that was not Catholic from the land, and in the midst of his veneration of the Virgin Mary, she appeared to him. She told him that the original Moorish conquest of Spain was an act of divine punishment, but that now, through Mary's intercession, the Catholics of Spain were being given a new chance. The recent defeat of the Moors was a sign of the future. She now was asking the hermit to go on a special mission for her.

Apollinario was to gather the patriots and take possession of the Moorish land. As a sign, she gave to the hermit a button that she had removed from the clothing of Jesus. Anyone wearing one like it would be protected from danger and from heresy. The Garunda was organized as a guerrilla army. Members joined in the continuing war against the Moors and attacked the homes of suspected heretics. They killed, looted and burned, all under the belief that they had the backing of heaven. In the subsequent peace after the war ended, they were an embarrassment to the crown, but had become wealthy and powerful enough that King Ferdinand could not move against them.

The Garunda settled in as a secret intelligence network. One target of its spying was the Maranos, Jews who had outwardly converted to Catholicism, but were secretly adhering to Judaism. The Garunda aligned with the Inquisition over the next century and shared any confiscated property and money with it. It also spread to Spanish territories in South America.

In 1821, the Spanish government finally moved against the Garunda, found a set of incriminating books, and the following year executed many of its leaders. The Garunda was effectively suppressed in Spain, but continued to operate in South America through the nineteenth century. It is believed to have reemerged in Spain during the Franco era (1936–75).

Sources:

Daraul, Akron. A History of Secret Societies. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1961.

Gastromancy

Divination from the belly, an ancient method now generally believed to have been ventriloquism, the voice sounding low and hollow, as if issuing from the ground. Eusèbe Salverte, author of Des sciences occultes (1834), put forward this opinion, adding, "The name of Engastrimythes, given by the Greeks to the Pythie (priestesses of Apollo)[,] indicates that they made use of this artifice."

Another method of practicing gastromancy connects it with crystal gazing. At one time vessels of glass, round and full of clear water, were placed before several lighted candles. In this case, a young boy or girl was generally the seer, and the demon was summoned in a low voice by the magician. Replies were then obtained from the magical appearances seen in the illuminated glass vessels.

Sources:

Salverte, Eusèbe. Des sciences occultes. Paris, 1834.

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Gaufridi, Louis (Jean Baptiste) (d. 1611)

French priest burned as a sorcerer at Aix-en-Provence in 1611. He was a cure at Marseilles, where his personality and manners gained him a footing in high society. He became friendly with a 14-year-old girl, Madeleine de Demandolx, who had attended the Ursuline convent school at Aix for two years. Madeleine fell in love with the personable 34-year-old Gaufridi, who was already much in demand as a confessor by the women of the district.

After some gossip, Madeleine entered a convent in 1607, where she confessed to intimacies with Gaufridi. About two years later, Madeleine exhibited convulsive fits and claimed visions of devils. After an unsuccessful exorcism, her symptoms spread to other nuns at the convent. The girls were removed and examined by other exorcists. Madeleine accused Gaufridi of obscene bewitchment. Gaufridi attempted to clear his name, appealing to the bishop of Marseilles and the pope.

In 1611 the Parliament at Aix held a trial at which Madeleine was a star witness, exhibiting demoniacal possession and affirming her lascivious desire for Gaufridi. Meanwhile the unfortunate priest had spent a year chained in an underground dungeon with rats. Three devil's marks were said to have been found on his body. After torture he confessed to magic, sorcery, and fornication but later retracted his confession. He was sentenced to be burned alive on a slow fire. Before this was carried out, he was tortured so horribly that he was willing to confess to any atrocity—even eating roasted babies! Before being burned, he was dragged through the streets. (See also Urbain Grandier; Loudun, Nuns of; Louviers, Nuns of)

Gauher-abad

The "Abode of Jewels," the name given to one of the capitals of the peris of Persian romance. The peris were beings of an angelic or pleasant disposition who were believed to inhabit the earth, along with the divs or evil-doers, before the creation of man. After this event, they became inhabitants of the aerial regions and had three capitals: Shad-u-kam (Pleasure and Desire), Gauher-abad, and Amber-abad (City of Ambergris).

Gauld, Alan (1932–)

Contemporary British parapsychologist and historian of psychical research. Gauld was born on June 17, 1932, in Portland, Dorset, England, and attended Harvard University (1956–57) and Emmanuel College, Cambridge, England (M.S. 1958; Ph.D., 1962). Gauld became a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1954, was co-opted to its Council in 1962, and elected to the Council in 1966. From 1965 to 1970 he edited the SPR's Journal and Proceedings. He is also senior lecturer in psychology at the University of Nottingham, England. He is the author of several books, including Mediumship and Survival (1982) and A History of Hynotism (1993).

Sources:

Gauld, Alan. The Founders of Psychical Research. New York: Schocken Books, 1968.

———. Human Action and its Psychological Investigation. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1977.

———. Mediumship and Survival. London: Heineman, 1982.

Gauld, Alan, and A. D. Cornell. Poltergeists. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1979.

Gauld, Alan, and J. D. Shotter. Human Action and its Psychological Investigation. Boston and London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1977.

Gauquelin, Françoise Schneider (1929–)

Swiss astrologer and statistician, born in French-speaking Switzerland. She attended the University of Paris, where she received a degree in statistics. In Paris she met and married Michel Gauquelin. While still in school, the two began to collect birth dates of large groups of people to determine if there was any relationship between the positions of the planets in the solar system and such factors as a person's choice of profession.

In their search for correlations they concentrated on outstanding professionals—sports champions, army officers, scientists, and so on. One of the first patterns they found was the presence of the planet Mars at either the horizon or the midheaven (two significant positions in the birth chart) at the time of birth. The frequency of these occurrences far exceeded any normal distribution due to chance alone and gave rise to the name "Mars effect" denoting a significant correlation between the position of the planets and professional achievement. Writers, for example, had a significantly positioned Moon, and scientists a significantly placed Saturn.

The Gauquelins' findings began to appear in publications in the 1960s. Michel published an initial book in 1967, The Cosmic Clocks, and then through the 1970s more than 25 volumes of statistical data were published by the couple from the Laboratoire d'Etude des Relations entre Rythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, which they had founded in Paris. Their collaboration, however, as well as their marriage, came to an end in the 1980s.

Since that time Françoise has continued to write and publish (Michel died in 1991). For a number of years she edited Astro-Psychological Problems (1982–88). Her 1982 Psychology of the Planets emphasizes the agreement of her and Michel's statistical results and traditional astrology, the differences having been emphasized in several of Michel's writings.

Sources:

Lewis, James L. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Series A: Professional Notabilities. 6 vols. Paris: Laboratoire d'Etude des Relations entre Rythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, 1970–71.

Series B: Heredity Experiments. 6 vols. Paris: Laboratoire d'Etude des Relations entre Rythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, 1970–71.

Series C: Psychological Monographs. 5 vols. Paris: Laboratoire d'Etude des Relations entre Rythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, 1972–77.

Series D: Scientific Documents. 10 vols. Paris: Laboratoire d'Etude des Relations entre Rythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, 1976–82.

Gauquelin, Michel (Roland) (1928–1991)

French psychologist and writer who attempted to put astrology on a scientific basis through his special studies of correlation between personality and cosmic influences. Gauquelin was born November 13, 1928, in Paris and was educated at the Sorbonne, University of Paris (Ph.D., 1954). In 1954 he married Françoise Schneider, a science writer and psychologist, who collaborated with him on research and writing. Gauquelin served in the French Military Reserve (active duty, 1953–54) and attained the rank of lieutenant. He began practicing psychology and writing in 1956.

With his wife he established the Laboratory for Study of the Relations between Cosmic Rhythms and Psychophysiologics in Paris. In 1949, having found that previous quantitative studies in astrology lacked sufficient controls, the Guaquelins began collecting large pools of birth data and analyzed planetary positions in relation to various factors, especially career choice and performance. Among the statistically significant factors they discovered was a correlation between the position of Mars in the natal chart and success in sports. This correlation became known as the Mars effect.

The research was published in a series of books beginning with The Cosmic Clocks in 1967. The research was hailed by the astrological community as good news, even though the findings contradicted many standard astrological affirmations. It served as part of the catalyst for the formation of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal, which began a project to refute the data presented by the Gauquelins. The project, in fact, replicated the Gauquelins' results, but rather than publish its findings, the committee falsified the results. The ensuing "Starbaby" scandal severely damaged the credibility of the committee. The controversy was aired quite thoroughly in several issues of the Zetetic Scholar.

Regarding his studies in "cosmopsychology," Gauquelin wrote:

"Until the beginning of this century, science believed that man was in isolation on earth, separated from the rest of the universe. Now we know that the biological clocks of our brain and our body are attuned to the movement of the cosmic forces. . . . This new conception should have not only scientific but also philosophical and even poetical implications for modern thought."

The Gauquelins divorced in the 1980s, and each continued to pursue an independent line of research. Michel Gauquelin went on to work with astrologers on a revised neoastrology that would embody the results of his research. Besides writing numerous books, he contributed articles to periodicals and wrote television programs on psychology and cosmic influences. He died in Paris on May 20, 1991.

Sources:

Curry, Patrick. "Research on the Mars Effect." Zetetic Scholar 9 (1982): 34–52.

Dean, G. Recent Advances in Natal Astrology. Cowes, England: The Author, 1977.

Gauquelin, Michel. The Cosmic Clocks: From Astrology to a Modern Science. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1967. Reprint, New York: Avon, 1969.

———. Cosmic Influences on Human Behavior. 2nd ed. New York: ASI Publishers, 1978.

———. Dreams and Illusions of Astrology. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1979.

———. How Atmospheric Conditions Affect Your Health. New York: Stein and Day, 1971.

———. The Scientific Basis of Astrology: Myth or Reality? New York: Stein and Day, 1969.

Gauquelin, Michel, and Françoise Guaquelin. The Mars Effect and Sports Champions: A New Replication. Paris: Laboratorie d'Études des Relations entre Rhythmes Cosmiques et Psychophysiologiques, 1979.

Lewis, James. Encyclopedia of Astrology. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1994.

Seymour, Percy. The Scientific Basis of Astrology. New York: St. Martin's, 1992.

Gauthier, Jean

Self-described alchemist of the sixteenth century. Charles IX (1550–1574) of France, deceived by his promises, provided him with 120,000 pounds with which to make gold. After he had worked for a week, he ran away with the king's money. He was pursued, captured, and hanged.

Gauthier of Bruges

According to medieval legend, Gauthier, a Franciscan monk made a bishop by Pope Nicholas III and deposed by Clement V, appealed to God against his deposition and asked to be buried with his act of appeal in his hand. Some time after his death, Pope Clement V visited Poitiers and, finding himself one day in a Franciscan monastery, asked to see Gauthier's remains. He caused the tomb to be opened and was horrified to see Gauthier of Bruges presenting his act of appeal with a withered hand.

Gaveshana Journal

A former Hindi quarterly journal of philosophy, psychology, sociology, religion, mysticism, and parapsychology, published by J. P. Atreya. Publication seems to have ceased in the early 1990s.

Gay, Kathleen Agnes Robson (1890–1969)

British parapsychologist. She was born June 22, 1890. During World War I, she was a voluntary worker for the Invalid Children's Aid Association (1914) and a member of the British Red Cross Society (1914–16). Later she worked at the British Treasury Department (1916–18) and the School of Oriental Studies, London (1920–22). Once World War II began she served with the British Red Cross Society and the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association (1939–45).

During the last years of her life, she became interested in psychical research. She joined the Council of the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1950 and served as chairperson of the Sir Oliver Lodge Posthumous Test Committee. She took special interest in work with mediums. From her research she wrote articles for the Journal of the SPR.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Gayatri Mantra

The most famous and powerful mantra ("power sound prayer") of Hinduism. It is said to have been revealed to the great sage Vishwamitra, preceptor of Prince Rama of the Ramayana religious epic. Its origin, however, is believed to have been the supreme creative force Brahma, before the Vedic scriptures were revealed. Thus the Gayatri mantra has been named "Vedamata" (Mother of the Vedas).

Every devout Brahmin is required to perform the Gayatri mantra each morning and evening. The mantra is addressed to the sun as "Savitri," personified as a goddess, wife of Brahma. The mantra translates roughly as "Earth, sky, heaven, we meditate on these and the ineffable light and power of the resplendent sun, may it guide our understanding."

The three regions of earth, sky, and heaven are also associated with physical, emotional, and mental states. Mantras, when properly intoned, vibrate the body. Some practitioners have combined the repetition of the Gayatri mantra with pranayama (breathing techniques) in order to activate the psychic body, especially as it is pictured in the chakras or mystical centers, and thus arouse kundalini energy (which is seen as resting latent at the base of the spine) to transform consciousness.

Gazzera, Linda (ca. 1900–)

Nonprofessional Italian medium discovered by psychical researcher Enrico Imoda, who published an important book, Fotographie di fantasma (1912), on his experiments with her at Turin in the house of the Marquise de Ruspoli. Gazzera produced impressive telekinesis and materialization phenomena. Her primary control was a deceased cavalry officer, "Vincenzo," and at times "Carlotta," a child of four.

Charles Richet describes her powers in Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923):

"I hold Linda's two hands, her head and knees. A hand, seemingly from behind me, strikes me heavily. I think I can distinguish its fingers and this is repeated a second time. I hold the left hand firmly, Imoda holding the right, which I frequently verify by touch. The objects were taken from the cupboard behind, a thimble was put on the first finger of my left hand, a sheath [étui] was put on my nose, and I felt fingers touching my nose and face."

Richet compared her phenomena to that of Eusapia Palladino:

"Telekinetic experiments succeed well with Linda as she is more easily controlled than Eusapia, for she scarcely moves at all, while Eusapia is in continual jerky movement. In the first experiment the ectoplasmic hand that I felt was cold and stiff; in the fourth experiment it was warm, articulated and supple."

A notable feature of Gazzera's mediumship was the rapidity with which phenomena were manifest, often within a few moments of the light being extinguished during dark séances. Richet's colleague Guillaume de Fontenay took some excellent photographs of phenomena, and Richet enthusiastically endorsed her mediumship as genuine.

Sources:

Imoda, Enrico. Fotographie di fantasma. Turin, 1912.

Gbalo

A former order of priests among the Ga people of the Gold Coast, west of Togoland in West Africa.

Geber (d. ca. 776 C.E.)

Arabian alchemist whose real name has been variously stated as Dschabir Ben Hayyan or Abou Moussah Djafar al Sofi. According to the tenth-century Kitab-al-Fihrist, Geber was born at Tarsus and lived at Damascus and Kufa. Very little is known of his early life. He undertook wide experiments in metallurgy and chemistry with the object of discovering the constituent elements of metals, in the course of which he stumbled upon nitric acid and red oxide of mercury. It is upon such actual discoveries that his reputation is based, not upon the many spurious treatises that have been attributed to him and embrace the entire gamut of eighth-century science.

His alleged extant works, which are in Latin, are regarded with suspicion, especially since several other medieval writers adopted his name. It is believed, however, that the library at Leyden and the Imperial Library at Paris contain Arabic manuscripts that might have been written by him. His books Sum of Perfection and Investigation into the Perfection of Metals are his most important works. Complete editions were published at Dantzic in 1682 and are included in the Bibliotheca Chemica Curiosa of Mangetus, published at Cologne in 1702.

Sum of Perfection professes to draw its inspiration from alchemical authors who lived before Geber, but because alchemy was not advanced at that time the derivation is an unlikely one. The book states that success in the great art is only to be achieved by rigid adherence to natural law. A spirit of great strength and a dry water are spoken of as the elements of the natural principle. The philosophical furnace and its arrangement are dealt with in detail, as is the "philosopher's vessel," a glass vase with several intricate details.

Sources:

Federman, Reinhold. The Royal Road of Alchemy. New York: Chilton, 1969.

Gehenna

One of the words in the Christian New Testament for hell, the place of destruction. The word is derived from the Hebrew ge and hinnom, the Valley of Hinnom—originally a valley in Palestine where the Hebrews passed their children through the fire to Moloch, the god of the Ammonites (1 Kings 11; 2 Kings 23:10).

Gehenna was popularly regarded as a place of destruction to which the wicked were consigned when they died (Matt. 18:7–8). Gehenna is usually translated as "hell fire" in the New Testament (Mark 9:43; Luke 12:5). Over the centuries it was merged with other terms for the abode of the dead, and through the writings of novelists such as Dante and John Milton the Christian world was given a description of hell as a place of unutterable anguish, horror, and despair.

The locality of hell and the duration of its torments have for centuries been the subject of much speculation. Some imagined there was a purgatorial region—a kind of upper Gehenna "in which the souls of just men are cleansed by a temporary punishment" before being admitted to heaven. It was believed that during this period the soul could revisit the places and persons it had loved. The Persians understood Gehenna as the place inhabited by the divs (rebellious angels), to which the rebels were confined when they refused to bow down before the first man.

Geley, Gustav (1868–1924)

Distinguished French psychical researcher. Geley was born in 1868 at Montceau-les-Mines, France, and became a physician. In his first book, l'Etre Subconscient (1899), he expounded a theory of "dynamo-psychism," a sort of soul energy by which he sought to escape from the difficulties of materialistic philosophy. In his second book, De l'Inconscient au Conscient (1919), published in English as From the Unconscious to the Conscious, he developed his idea into a more comprehensive treatise and admitted an external direction and intention in the phenomena of trance that could not be referred to the medium or the experimenters.

Shortly before the publication of his second book, which is considered by many the most important contribution to psychical research since F. W. H. Myers's Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death (1903), Geley abandoned his medical practice at Annecy and accepted the post of director of the Institut Métapsychique International founded by Jean Meyer.

Geley was a keen and indefatigable investigator. When, under fraud-proof circumstances, paranormal results were apparently produced in his laboratory, he had to defend himself against the accusation of medical colleagues that he was an accomplice of the medium. He consented to having his premises examined for secret doors and to being chained up with other investigators.

The most palpable evidence he produced for the reality of metapsychical phenomena were plaster casts from the mediumship of Franek Kluski, which were put on view in the institute. Geley's last book, L'Ectoplasmie et la Clairvoyance (1924), based chiefly on his experiences with Eva C., marked another milestone in psychical research. It was to have been followed by a second volume, "The Genesis and Meaning of Metapsychic Phenomena," which, unfortunately, was never written because of Geley's death in an airplane accident on July 15, 1924.

Geley was essentially a spiritist, because he accepted the reality of survival, reincarnation, and communication with the dead. He was careful not to declare his opinion on subjects that would have alienated the scientific community. However, his belief system seems to have made him a target for tricks by the mediums he studied and, in the end, capable of suppressing negative evidence. After his death it was reported that some very suspicious photographs of the mediumship of Eva C. were found among his papers, and it was suggested that these indicated the possibility of fraud. For a discussion of the facts and speculations involved, see Rudolf Lambert's article in the November 1954 issue of the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research.

Sources:

Geley, Gustave. L'Etre Subconscient. Paris: Editions Pygmalion, 1899.

———. De l'Inconscient au Conscient. Paris: F. Alcan, 1919. Translated as From the Unconscious to the Conscious. New York and London: Harper & Brothers, 1921.

Lambert, Rudolf. "Dr. Geley's Reports on the Medium 'Eva C.'&43" Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 37, 682 (November 1954).

Geller, Uri (1946–)

One of the most famous exponents of claimed ESP and paranormal phenomena in the 1970s. Geller was born in Tel Aviv, Israel, December 20, 1946. As a boy he performed feats of stopping the hands of watches through paranormal means. In 1969 he demonstrated telepathy and became a full-time professional performer. In August 1971 his feats were witnessed in Tel Aviv by parapsychologist Andrija Puharich, who then became closely associated with Geller, assisted him in traveling to America, and conducted scientific investigations of his phenomena.

At the Stanford Research Institute, California, during November 1972 Geller demonstrated metal bending, guessing contents of metal cans and numbers on dice (shaken in a closed box), and telepathy. Some of the tests were supervised by former astronaut Edgar D. Mitchell, who had become actively involved in the study of paranormal phenomena. The most publicized talent demonstrated by Geller was the ability to cause metal objects to bend or break without direct physical pressure—the so-called Geller effect, a form of telekinesis. This deformation of metals (particularly the bending of forks, spoons, nails, or keys) was demonstrated on television programs in the United States and Britain. During such television shows in Britain many viewers reported that they shared the same ability. Geller also involved viewers in the starting of clocks and watches that had not functioned for some time.

In his book Uri, a biography published in 1974, Puharich claims that Geller's powers came from outer space intelligences on a planet millions of light-years distant, and also claims that Geller dematerialized objects. Geller's autobiography, published soon afterward, claims additional phenomena such as teleportation. While some American and British scientists reported favorably on Geller phenomena, some commentators (notably stage magicians Milbourne Christopher of the Occult Investigation Committee of the Society of American Magicians and James Randi of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal [CSICOP]) alleged sleight of hand and other conjuring tricks as the probable explanation. In 1983 it was revealed that James Randi had organized fake metal-bending accomplices in an undercover operation to discredit parapsychologists investigating the phenomenon. In 1991, in response to a remark by Randi accusing Geller of fakery, Geller filed a multimillion-dollar lawsuit claiming defamation. After a four-year legal battle the U.S. District Court in Washington D.C., ruled in favor of CSICOP and ordered Geller to pay the not-for-profit scientific and educational organization at least $70,000.

The strongest scientific support for the reality of Geller's phenomena came from British mathematician John Taylor, who tested Geller during 1974 and also investigated children and adults who manifested similar paranormal ability after seeing Geller's appearances on British television programs. However, Taylor, a distinguished scientist, largely retracted his support of Geller's phenomena in his book Science and the Supernatural (1980). Another British scientist, John Hasted, was more sympathetic to the genuineness of the "Geller effect."

After Geller's visit to Tokyo in 1973, thousands of Japanese children apparently manifested similar paranormal powers. Eight of these children were investigated in 1974 by Shigemi Sasaki, professor of psychology at Denki Tsushin University, Tokyo, with a team of 15 researchers. Laboratory tests were devised to test PK (psychokinetic ability) and metal bending. One 12-year-old, Jun Sekiguchi, demonstrated an amazing ability to bend spoons paranormally and also recharged dead electric batteries by merely holding them. J. B. Rhine of Durham, North Carolina, commented: "The tests in Tokyo have shown that PK power exists among many of their children. The research is of great significance."

In the mid–1970s, at the height of his fame, Geller was earning approximately $5,000 a session for his media performances involving spoon bending, telepathy, and clock or watch restarting, generating intense public enthusiasm and also hostile criticism from stage magicians and other critics who claimed that his apparently paranormal feats were ingenious trickery. At the height of worldwide interest in his claimed powers, Geller suddenly disappeared from the public scene for ten years. There were various rumors—that he had lost his powers, that he had been finally exposed in fraud and silenced, or even that he had been recruited for secret psychic warfare.

In 1986 the newspaper Financial Times (a British equivalent of the Wall Street Journal) published a report by Margaret van Hatten revealing that in 1974 Geller had been persuaded to put his psychic talents at the disposal of industrialists by dowsing for oil and minerals. The report stated that Geller had met the late Sir Val Duncan, then head of the prestigious Rio Tinto-Zinc Corporation and himself an amateur dowser, who suggested that Geller try psychic prospecting. At Duncan's homes in Britain and Majorca, Geller experimented successfully with dowsing for bottles of olive oil and mineral objects that had been buried in gardens. From this Geller progressed to experimenting with dowsing over scale maps (teleradiesthesia) and distinguishing the various types of valuable mineral deposits in different parts of the world.

When Geller developed accuracy in dowsing Duncan eventually told him, "You're on your own—go out and make some money." Geller's first attempts at dowsing for a South African mining group were given free of charge although they apparently resulted in a large-scale discovery of coal deposits near Zimbabwe. In time Geller had sufficient confidence to ask for a standard fee of one million pounds sterling as an advance against royalties. Geller says he has always found something, even if not a mineral deposit of commercial viability. Of 11 projects over ten years, he maintains that four were highly successful, resulting in royalties way beyond the original one million pound advance. He also advised companies where drilling would be ineffective, so they could save money.

In general, oil and mining companies have been reluctant to substantiate these remarkable claims. Understandably, directors and shareholders might feel that this expensive and unconventional method of prospecting sounds bizarre. Peter Sterling, chairman of Zanex, an Australian mineral exploration company, did confirm, however, that Geller was flown to the Solomon Islands to help pinpoint gold deposits, at Geller's standard fee, and that the company was successful in finding alluvial gold in the Solomons. In addition the company sent Geller some topographical maps and received the response that the company should look for diamonds on Malaita. Although the company had never considered that area to be geologically appropriate for diamonds, Geller insisted, and samples taken there were "very encouraging," according to Sterling. Diamond-like kimberlite rock was located, as were all the minerals usually associated with diamond deposits.

The Financial Times report quoted Peter Sterling as stating that it was not easy to explain the employment of Geller to his board of directors and shareholders. He said:

"Most mining people are pretty down to earth and materialistic, and the sort of work Uri does doesn't fit current scientific knowledge. I'm an engineer—I have no idea how it works, though I think that in 20 to 30 years time science will know, and will be building machines to do the same thing. But now—well the reaction is a bit like witch hunters in the dark ages, or flat earthers. There are a lot of flat earthers around."

In October 1986 Geller launched a new book, cowritten with parapsychologist Guy Lyon Playfair, titled The Geller Effect. The book tells Geller's story from 1976 to 1986, recounting jet-set friendships, approaches by the CIA, FBI, customs, and narcotics agents, and Geller's activities in prospecting for mining companies. To publicize the book Geller appeared on television talk shows where he presented exactly the same phenomena he had ten years earlier—spoon bending, telepathy, and starting clocks and watches that had been inactive for a long time. Many of these performances were quite impressive, although staged informally without rigid controls. Coming in the same breath as the revelations about million-pound fees, these familiar activities were something of an anticlimax. Stage magicians can and do duplicate such effects under similar circumstances by conjuring.

From time to time, sensational reports are circulated that Geller significantly changed the course of world events, such as mentally influencing Gorbachev's top aide so that the Soviet leader made an offer of dramatic cuts in nuclear weapons. It seems more credible that the Soviets would be influenced by traditional diplomacy or the enlightened efforts of such private negotiators as the late Armand Hammer.

Geller's book itself offers little new material to resolve the fierce controversies over the genuineness of his talents beyond his anecdotal claims and the reputed faith of wealthy and highly placed friends or officials of mining companies. In it he tries to distance himself from (without denying) some of the more sensational claims Puharich makes in his 1974 biography, for instance, that Geller was an instrument of extraterrestrial intelligences. Geller writes:

"Although much of his [Puharich's] book was accurate factual reporting, many people were put off by the space-fantasy passages, and I admit that they caused me some embarrassment. . . . You must remember that all of this fantasy material was obtained while I was under hypnosis. One reason I wrote My Story was to give my own version of events, though I must emphasize that there is a slight possibility that some of my energies do have extraterrestrial connection. Andrija and I are still the closest of friends and I have never forgotten how much of my success is due to him." Geller continues to write and appear on radio and TV, exploring subjects as varied as ESP and UFOs to self-help topics and using his psychic powers to aid teams in World Cup soccer competitions.

Sources:

Christopher, Milbourne. Mediums, Mystics & the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.

Geller, Uri. My Story. New York: Praeger, 1975.

Geller, Uri, and Guy Lyon Playfair. The Geller Effect. London: Jonathan Cape, 1986.

Hasted, John. The Metal-Benders. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981.

Panati, Charles, ed. The Geller Papers. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1976.

Randi, James. The Truth about Uri Geller. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1982.

Taylor, John. Science & the Supernatural. London: Temple Smith, 1980.

———. Superminds: An Investigation into the Paranormal. New York: Warner Books, 1975.

Geller Effect

Term used to indicate the apparent ability to bend metal paranormally, as in the demonstrations by Uri Geller. Alternative terms used are metal bending or "PK-MB" (psychokinesis-metal bending).

Gematria

A form of numerology. In Jewish mysticism gematria was the study of Hebrew letters in association with numbers. The method was used to discover hidden meanings in Hebrew words. Prominent words could be systematically converted into numbers and linked to other words with the same numerical value, which were then regarded as comments upon the original words. This kind of numerology was also used with the Greek alphabet.

A related system of gematria is Notarikon, in which letters taken from phrases form mystical acronyms, or words are developed into mystical phrases. A more complicated procedure is temurah, in which letters of words are transposed or replaced according to complex rules. Some modern occultists have applied gematria to the tarot cards, associating the 22 trump cards with the Hebrew letters, a practice suggested by Éliphas Lévi, author of The History of Magic (1913).

Gematria became an integral part of modern ceremonial magic as practiced in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and by Aleister Crowley. Crowley and William Westcott of the Golden Dawn wrote several books on the subject, and Crowley published a key word guide to numerological meanings of words titled 777.

Sources:

Bond, Bligh, and Thomas Simcox Lea. Gematria: A Preliminary Investigation of the Cabala. London: Research into Lost Knowledge Organization, 1977.

Crowley, Aleister. 777. London: Walter Scott Publishing, 1909. Revised as 777 Revised. London: Neptune Press, 1952.

Ginsburg, Christian D. The Kabbalah (with The Essenes). London: Routledge, 1863. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Kozminsky, Isidore. Numbers—Their Meaning and Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, n.d.

Westcott, William W. An Introduction to the Study of the Kabalah. New York: Allied Publications, n.d.

———. Numbers: Their Occult Power and Mystic Virtues. New York: Allied Publications, n.d.

General Assembly of Spiritualists

The General Assembly of Spiritualists originated in 1930 when its members withdrew from the National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC) and reorganized independently. The NSAC was in the midst of a reoccurring debate over reincarnation. The traditional Spiritualist position in North America and England opposed reincarnation, which seemed to deny the possibility of spirit contact (if the spirit was reincarnated). However, a belief in reincarnation had become entrenched in the New York area. The Declaration of Principle of the General Assembly of Spiritualists is identical to that of the parent body except that it lacks the statement on prophecy, which was only added to the NSAC statement after the schism. The General Assembly of Spiritualists is headquartered at the Ansonia Hotel, 2107 Broadway, New York, New York 10023.

Sources:

General Assembly of Spiritualists, State of New York. New York: Flying Saucer News, n.d.

Lomaxe, Paul R. What Do Spiritualists Believe? New York: General Assembly of Spiritualists, 1943.

General Church of the New Jerusalem

The General Church of the New Jerusalem is the largest of the several churches in North America that have grown out of the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). Its origins can be traced ultimately to the 1838 decree adopted by the General Convention of the New Jerusalem requiring all member societies to organize under the same rule of order. Rev. George De Charms, then pastor of the society in Philadelphia and editor of an influential magazine, the Precursor, rejected the new rule, which he saw as a move by the Boston headquarters church to set itself up as the mother church of the convention and require all societies to acknowledge its primacy. De Charms and his congregation left the convention, and in 1840 he founded the Central Convention, which emphasized the writings of Swedenborg.

In reaction, the General Convention changed its rules. It loosened its control over the societies, adopted a structure granting more equitable representation from the societies, and renounced any spiritual authority inherent in the Boston headquarters. With his basic objection now resolved, De Charms dissolved the Central Convention in 1852 and his Philadelphia church and rejoined the General Convention.

The independent impulse of the Central Convention was preserved, however, by William Benade, a young pastor who—like De Charms—stressed the authority of Swedenborg's writings. In 1859 he proposed the formation of an academy of scholars to study Swedenborg's writings and to train young men for the priesthood. The idea of a priesthood was plainly stated in Swedenborg's writings, but the General Convention never implemented it as many did not like the idea of priests.

Benade formed the academy in 1874 and started a periodical, Words for the New Church. Over the years it developed a unique stance within the convention, with controversy centering on its liberal view of sexuality and its stance against temperance. A break between the academy and the convention occurred in stages beginning with the formation of a school in Philadelphia. In 1882 Benade became a bishop of the church in Philadelphia, which included seven societies. Other societies favorable to Benade's views associated themselves with the Philadelphia church. The final break came in 1890, and those affiliated with the academy reorganized as the General Church of the New Jerusalem.

The church is headed by its bishops and a general assembly who elect the national church officers. Affiliated congregations are found in Europe, Australia and New Zealand, South Africa, and Brazil. In the 1980s there were 2,618 members and 31 congregations in North America and an additional 1,157 members worldwide. Headquarters are located in suburban Philadelphia in the small community at Box 743, 1100 Cathedral Rd., Bryn Athyn, Pennsylvania 19009. Website: http://www.newchurch.org.

Sources:

De Charms, George. The Distinctiveness of the New Church. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: Academy Book Room, 1962.

The General Church of the New Jerusalem: A Handbook of General Information. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: General Church Publication Committee, 1965.

General Convention of the New Jerusalem in the United States of America

The ecclesiastical organization that grew out of the response to the writings of seer Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). It began in the United States in 1792 when members of the New Church migrated from England to Baltimore, Maryland, and formed the first society. Over the next 25 years, 17 societies formed in cities along the East Coast and as far west as Madison Town, Indiana. These were brought together for a convention in 1817 following a call from the society in Philadelphia. At that time delegates regularized the ordination of ministers and strategized on spreading their message west of the Allegheny Mountains. The church spread across the eastern half of the United States through the 1800s, but it was severely weakened by a schism in 1890 which led to the founding of the General Church of the New Jerusalem.

The organization is a Christian one, but it interprets the Bible and Christian doctrine according to Swedenborg's basic perspective. Swedenborg believed the Bible to have two levels of meaning, the material and the spiritual. He learned the true spiritual meaning of the Bible from his conversations with the angels, the results of which fill numerous volumes. Swedenborg compiled a condensed statement of his belief in a small booklet, The New Jerusalem and Its Heavenly Doctrine, which serves as a doctrinal statement for the convention.

The convention believes in a divine Trinity, not of persons, but of principle. Salvation is open to all who cooperate with God by faith and obedience. When people die, they immediately pass to judgment and enter either heaven or hell, their fate depending on the spiritual character they acquired on earth. Worship is liturgical, and both the Lord's Supper and baptism are administered.

The church is organized with a modified episcopacy. Local societies manage their own affairs. The convention meets annually and elects a president and other national officers. A board of missions oversees work in Europe, Japan, and Guyana. In 1999 there were 1,686 members and 32 societies in the United States and 401 members and 7 societies in Canada. The convention is headquartered at 11 Highland Ave., Newtonville, Massachusetts 02460.

Sources:

Zacharias, Paul. Insights into the Beyond. New York: Swedenborg Publishing Association, n.d.

Genesa Update

Now-defunct newsletter of the Genesa Foundation, which was concerned with energies generated by pyramidical and other geometrical shapes.

Genius

Generally used to denote a human being of extraordinary intelligence, but historically indicating a superior class of entities holding an intermediate rank between mortals and immortals. The latter meaning appears to be the signification of daemon, the corresponding term in Greek. It is probable that the whole system of demonology was invented by the Platonic philosophers and grafted by degrees onto popular mythology.

The Platonists, however, professed to derive their doctrines from the "theology of the ancients," so this system may have come originally from the East, where it formed a part of the tenets of Zoroaster. This sage ascribed all the operations of nature to the agency of celestial beings, the ministers of one supreme first cause, to whose brilliant image—fire—homage was paid.

Some Roman writers referred to the genius as "the God of Nature," or "Nature" itself, but their notions seem to have been modified by, if not formed from, etymological considerations more likely to mislead than to afford a clue to the real meaning of the term. At a later period they supposed almost every created thing, animate or inanimate, to be protected by its guardian genius—a sort of demigod who presided over its birth and was its constant companion until death. Censorinus, who lived about the middle of the third century, noted:

"The genius is a god supposed to be attendant on everyone from the time of his birth. . . . Many think the genius to be the same as the lars of the ancients. . . . We may well believe that its power over us is great, yea, absolute. . . . Some ascribe two genii at least to those who live in the houses of married persons."

Euclid, the Socratic philosopher, gave two genii to everyone, a point on which Lucilius, in his Satires, insists we cannot be informed.

To the genius, therefore, so powerful through the whole course of one's life, yearly sacrifices were offered. As the birth of every mortal was a peculiar object of his guardian genius's solicitude, the marriage bed was called the genial bed (lectus genialis). The same invisible patron was also supposed to be the author of joy and hilarity, hence a joyous life was called a genial life (genialis vita).

There is a curious passage relating to the functions of the Greek demons in the Symposium of Plato, in which he has Socrates state:

". . . from it [i.e., the agency of genii] proceed all the arts of divination, and all the science of priests, with respect to sacrifices, initiations, incantations, and everything, in short, which relates to oracles and enchantments. The deity holds no direct intercourse with man; but, by this means, all the converse and communications between gods and men, whether asleep or awake, take place; and he who is wise in these things is a man peculiarly guided by his genius."

Plato highlights the connection between demonology and magic, an association characteristic of the romances of the East if the jinns of the Moslems are compared to the genii of the Platonists.

A modern understanding of the term genius is well illustrated by F. W. H. Myers in his book Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death (1903):

"Genius should be regarded as a power of utilising a wider range than other men can utilise of faculties in some degree innate in all; a power of appropriating the results of subliminal mentation to subserve the supraliminal stream of thought; so that an 'inspiration of genius' will be in truth a subliminal uprush, an emergence into the current of ideas which the man is consciously manipulating of other ideas which he has not consciously originated but which have shaped themselves beyond his will, in profounder regions of his being."

Theodore Flournoy said he considered Myers's chapter on genius one of the most remarkable and strongest of the work because it made one feel the insufficiency of all the naturalistic explanations advanced up to that time.

In The Road to Immortality (1932), claimed to be composed of posthumous communications from Myers through the mediumship of Geraldine Cummins, the discarnate "Myers" expands on genius with reference to the idea of a group-soul:

"If a certain type of psyche is continually being evolved in the one group, you will find that eventually that type, if it be musical, will have a musical genius as its representative on earth. It will harvest all the tendencies in those vanished lives, and it will then have the amazing unconscious knowledge that is the property of genius."

The often-quoted dictums of Jane Ellice Hopkins, "Genius only means an infinite capacity for taking pains," and Thomas Edison, "genius is one percent inspiration and ninety-nine percent perspiration," draw attention to the phenomenon that prolonged absorption and study often result in an inspirational leap of awareness and insight. Many new concepts and discoveries have taken place in this way. This is comparable to the mystic's experience in which meditation leads to enhancement of consciousness, sometimes to ecstatic conditions of so-called cosmic consciousness.

Sources:

Cummins, Geraldine. The Road to Immortality. London: Ivor Nicholson & Watson, 1933.

Galton, Francis. Hereditary Genius. London, 1869. Reprint, London: Watts, 1950.

Kenmore, Dallas. The Nature of Genius. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1972.

Lombroso, Cesare. The Man of Genius. London: Scott, 1889.

Storr, Anthony. The School of Genius. London: A. Deutsch, 1988.

Geomancy

A system of divination by means of scattering pebbles, dust, sand grains, or seeds on the earth and interpreting their shape and position. A later development by occultist Cornelius Agrippa involved making marks on the ground with a stick (currently practiced with a pencil on paper). Interpretations are partly intuitive and partly by means of a system of positions reminiscent of the I Ching hexagrams.

The term geomancy is also applied to the Chinese practice of feng-shui (wind and water), and was used by nineteenth-century writers to translate feng-shui. This Chinese art is concerned with the relationship between human beings and the subtle energies of nature. In classical Chinese sources the term ti li (land patterns) was also used; another related term is kan-yü (cover or support), with special reference to relationships between heaven and earth.

Feng-shui and ti li are concerned with the "dragon lines" or subtle energies of the earth in relation to the placement of buildings and the interaction between human life and earth currents. Feng-shui experts would determine the most suitable places for roads, bridges, canals, wells, and mines in relation to earth currents; the sites of graves were especially important. Bodies might be kept unburied for some time until a suitable burial place with harmonious currents was determined, and in some cases bodies were reburied.

It seems likely that the Western form of geomancy for divinatory purposes grew out of feng-shui concepts, since the position of pebbles, dust, or seeds has something in common with acupuncture pressure points on the "body" of nature and its energies. Chinese concepts of the subtle energies of the earth also parallel the Western concepts of leys and dowsing.

Sources:

Asher, Maxine. Ancient Energy: Key to the Universe. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.

Cole, J. A. Abayomi. Astrological Geomancy in Africa. London, 1898.

Hartmann, Franz. Geomancy: The Art of Divining by Punctuation According to Cornelius Agrippa and Others. London: William Rider & Son, 1913.

Pennick, Nigel. Geomancy. Cambridge: Cokayne Publishing, 1973.

Skinner, Stephen. The Oracle of Geomancy. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1977.

———. Terrestrial Astrology: Divination by Geomancy. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1980.

Watkins, Alfred. The Old Straight Track. 1925. Reprint, London: Garnstone Press, 1970.

George, Demetra (1946–)

Demetra George, a popular contemporary astrologer, has become well known for promoting consideration of the role of asteroids in the interpretation of the horoscope, and for her integration of goddess mythology to illuminate the life of her clients. She was born in Chicago, Illinois, on July 25, 1946. She attended Randolph-Macon Women's College but completed her B.A. degree in philosophy at the State University of New York's campus at New Platz. Through the 1960s she studied astrology with a variety of teachers, including Zipporah Dobyns. She became a professional astrologer in the early 1970s and an active member of the Association for Astrological Networking and the National Council for Geocosmic Research (NCGR).

George started her career in astrology just as interest in asteroids, especially the four largest—Ceres, Pallas, Juno, and Vesta—was on the rise, and one of her teachers, Dobyns, was in the forefront of promoting that interest. George found the inclusion of the asteroids a meaningful addition to her perspective on horoscope charts. She eventually became president of the Asteroid Special Interest Group of the NCGR, and in 1986 she and Douglas Bloch completed their groundbreaking study, Asteroid Goddesses: The Mythology, Psychology, and Astrology of the Reemerging Feminine. To provide additional content, George did not merely supply characteristics of the several asteroids as had been assigned to the standard planets, but proposed an additional principle. She asserted that when a planet or asteroid holds a particularly prominent place in one's birth chart, the mythological story of the god or goddess for whom the planet or asteroid is named is especially relevant to the individual. While most of the planets (except for Venus) are named for ancient Pagan deities, the prominent asteroids are named for female deities.

George currently resides in Oregon. She lectures before astrological groups internationally and regularly addresses national and regional astrological conventions.

Sources:

George, Demetra. Mysteries of the Dark Moon: The Healing Power of the Dark Goddess. San Francisco: Harper, 1992.

———, and Douglas Bloch. Asteroid Goddesses: The Mythology, Psychology, and Astrology of the Reemerging Feminine. 1986. 2nd ed., San Diego: Astro Computing Services, 1990.

———. Astrology for Yourself: A Workbook for Personal Transformation. Berkeley: Wingbow Press, 1987.

George, Llewellyn (1876–1954)

Prominent astrologer and founder of the Llewellyn Publishing Company. He was born in Swansea, Wales, on August 17, 1876. After his father's death his mother remarried and the family moved to the United States. He grew up in Chicago, but moved to Portland, Oregon, around the turn of the century. He studied astrology with L. H. Weston and in 1901 founded the Llewellyn Publishing Company and the Portland School of Astrology. In 1908 he began issuing the Astrological Bulletina. He later moved his business to Los Angeles.

George emerged as the champion of a more scientific astrology. He attempted to move away from an astrology based on hermetic philosophy and build instead upon newer understandings of gravitational and other forces operating in the solar system. Eventually, however, as science had little to offer, he had to fall back on occult speculations.

George wrote a score of works on astrology, beginning with, The Planetary Hour Book in 1907. He followed with a set of books to assist the new astrological student, The A to Z Horoscope Delineator (1910), Practical Astrology for Everyone (1911), and The Student's Chart Reader (1912). Among his more important books are How Planets Affect People (1921) and Astrology: What It Is and What It Is Not (1931).

His most well known publications are the Moon Sign Book (published annually since 1905) and the Astrological Bulletin, a quarterly magazine, which he edited for nearly twenty years. He also founded the Llewellyn College of Astrology, which greatly expanded the audience for astrology by offering home study courses.

Llewellyn Publications emerged as a major center of astrological publishing. Prominent astrologers published by George over the years include Donald Bradley (Solar and Lunar Returns) and Grant Lewi (Astrology for the Millions and Heaven Knows What).

After George's death in 1954, the Moon Sign Book was edited by Sydney Omarr. In 1960 the company was purchased by Minnesota businessman Carl Llewellyn Weschcke, well known as an astrologer and occultist, who moved the company to St. Paul, Minnesota, as Llewellyn Publications, now one of the largest publishing and wholesaling organizations of occult books in the United States.

Sources:

George, Llewellyn. The A to Z Horoscope Delineator. Portland, Ore.: Portland School of Astrology, 1910.

———. Astrology: What It Is and What It Is Not. Los Angeles: Llewellyn Publishing, 1931.

———. How Planets Affect People. Los Angeles: Llewellyn Publishing, 1921.

———. Practical Astrology for Everyone. Portland, Ore.: Portland School of Astrology Bulletina Publishing, 1911.

———. The Student's Chart Reader. Portland, Ore.: Portland School of Astrology Bulletina Press, 1912.

Lewis, James R. The Astrology Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

George Adamski Foundation

Foundation formed after the death of flying saucer contactee George Adamski (1891–1965) in 1965 to keep his work alive, especially his philosophical teachings. It was founded by Alice Wells (d. 1980), a close associate. She was succeeded in leadership by Fred Steckling. The foundation is headquartered at PO Box 1722, Vista, CA 92085. Website: http://www.gafintl.com/html/GAFpg1.htm.

Sources:

Adamski Foundation Home Page. http://www.gafintl.com/html/GAFpg1.htm. March 8, 2000.

Adamski, George. Cosmic Philosophy. Freeman, S.D.: Pine Hill Press, 1971.

———. Wisdom of the Masters of the Far East. N.p.: Royal Order of Tibet, 1936.

Steckling, Fred. We Discovered Alien Bases on the Moon. Vista, Calif.: GAF International Publishers, 1981.

———. Why Are We Here? New York: Vantage Press, 1969.

Gerhardie, William (Alexander) (1895–1977)

Famous British novelist who was also intensely preoccupied with the paranormal. He was born William Gerhardi, on November 21, 1895, in St. Petersburg, Russia, of British subjects. He was educated in St. Petersburg (1900–13), Kensington College, London (1913–16), and Worcester College, Oxford (M.A., B. Litt.). He added an e to his name in 1971.

His novels include Futility (1922), The Polyglots (1925), Pending Heaven (1930), Resurrection (1934), Of Mortal Love (1937), My Wife's the Least of It (1938), and This Present Breath (4 vols., 1975). He also wrote several plays as well as volumes of short stories and miscellaneous literature. A gifted author, he was awarded an Order of the British Empire and an Order of St. Stanislas of Russia.

An acute observer of the tragedy and comedy of human intercourse, Gerhardie gave little hint in his books of his profound interest in psychic manifestations, extrasensory perception, bilocation, synchronicity, time anomalies, and other aspects of the paranormal. Only a few friends were aware of such preoccupations, and since Gerhardie lived a hermitlike existence, seldom leaving his London apartment, he held long telephone conversations with his friends on a wide range of anomalous topics.

His novel Resurrection relates his own out-of-the-body travel experience, which must have had a profound effect on his philosophy of life and death. He died July 15, 1977.

Sources:

Gerhardie, William A. Memoirs of a Polyglot. London: Macdonald, 1973.

———. The Memoirs of Satan. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1933.

———. Resurrection. London: Macdonald, 1973.

Gerloff, Hans (1887– ?)

Teacher, author, and parapsychologist. Born May 31, 1887, in Berlin, Germany, he obtained his Ph.D. from the University of Jena in 1911. Gerloff lectured on German language and literature at the University of Lund, Sweden (1912–13 and 1915–16), before becoming a cultural exchange officer in Germany and Scandinavia (1916–37).

In 1932 Gerloff began a special study of physical mediumship and worked with Einer Nielsen and Anna Rasmussen in Copenhagen, Maria Sukfull in Austria, and Hela Zimmermann in Germany. He lectured on parapsychology throughout Europe and wrote a number of books, his work being ended by the rise of Nazi power in his homeland. Gerloff also contributed articles on parapsychology to Natur und Kulter and Neue Wissenschaft.

Sources:

Gerloff, Hans. The Crisis in Parapsychology: Stagnation or Progress? Tittmoning, Obb., Germany: W. Pustet, 1965.

———. Die Heilungen von Lourdes im Lichte der Parapsychologie (The Healings at Lourdes in the Light of Parapsychology). Budingen-Geltenbach: Verlag Welt und Wissen, 1959.

———. Materialisation: Die Phantome von Kopenhagen (Materialization: The Phantoms of Copenhagen). N.p., 1956.

———. Das Medium Carlos Mirabelli: Eine kirtische Untersuchung (The Medium Carlos Mirabelli: An Investigation.) N.p., 1960.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Germain, Walter (1889–1962)

American author who wrote and lectured on parapsychology. Born February 23, 1889, at Saginaw, Michigan, Germain worked as a businessman, and from 1930 to 1950 was an officer with the Saginaw Police Department. In 1950 he began writing on ESP and other aspects of parapsychology. He describes his own experiences in his book The Magic Power of Your Mind (1956). He also contributed articles to Fate magazine and Science of Mind. He died June 22, 1962, at Saginaw.

Sources:

Germain, Walter. The Magic Power of Your Mind. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1956.

GERMANY

Magic & Witchcraft

For an account of the magical beliefs of the early Teutonic peoples, see the entry on Teutons. Magic as formulated and believed in by the Germans in the Middle Ages bears, along with traces of its unmistakable derivation from the ancient Teutonic religion, the impress of the influence brought by the natural characteristics of the country upon the mind of its inhabitants.

Deep forests, mountains, limitless morasses, caverned rocks, and springs all helped to shape the imagination which may be traced in Teutonic mythology, and later in aspects of magic and in Christian fears of witchcraft, which first arose in Germany and obtained ready credence there.

As the clash and strife of Teuton and Roman, of Christian and others left records in folklore and history, they have also characterized the magical belief of the Middle Ages. Earlier monkish legends are replete with accounts of magic and sorcery, indicating how ancient deities became evil following the introduction of the newer religion. Miracles were recounted in which these villians were robbed of all power in the name of Christ, or before some blessed relic, then chained and prisoned beneath mountain, river, and sea in eternal darkness. At the same time, tales were told of how misfortune and death were the consequence to those who still might follow the outcast gods.

Again, the sites and periods of the great religious festivals of the Teutons were perpetuated in those localities said to be the place and time of the witches' sabbat and other mysterious meetings and conclaves. Mountains especially retained this character. The Venusberg, the Horselberg, and Blocksberg now became the devil's realm and an abode of the damned. Chapels and cathedrals were full of relics to exorcise the spirits of evil, along with the bells that had to be blessed, as ordained by the Council of Cologne, in order that "demons might be affrighted by their sound, calling Christians to prayers; and when they fled, the persons of the faithful would be secure; that the destruction of lightnings and whirlwinds would be averted, and the spirits of the storm defeated."

Storms were considered to be the work of the devil, or the conjuration of his followers. The trampling heard was thought to be his fury, his fiery train above the tossing forests or holy spires. In that way, Odin and his associated deities transformed.

The Valkyries, the Choosers of the Slain, riding to places of battle, became the medieval witches riding astride broomsticks on their missions of evil in much the same manner. Castles of flames, where the devil held wild revels; conclaves of corpses revivified by evil knowledge; unearthly growths, vitalized by hanged humans' souls, springing to life beneath gallows and gibbets; little people of the hills, malicious spirits, with their caps of mist and cloaks of invisibility. It was possible to trace the origins of the belief in dire consequences from these stories. For those who believed in magic were doomed as the pagan and Christian stories of the Middle Ages merged to form one myth.

Witchcraft was first derided as a delusion by church leaders. Belief in it was forbidden by some of the earlier councils. It was in the fourteenth century in the form of sorcery (malevolent magic), and then in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries as witchcraft that it attained prominence. This was especially true when the practice of witchcraft was declared a crime in the eyes of the church (heresy and apostasy) in 1484—a crime punishable by confiscation and death. In their deliberation on witchcraft the inquisitors first systematized and formulated an understanding of black magic. Under such authority, belief in black magic flourished, filling people with either an outright fear or unholy curiosity.

Once placed on the books, the motives for charging a person with sorcery or witchcraft were numerous. In addition to the care for their souls, individuals otherwise involved in personal feuds, political enmities, and religious conflict, not to mention rulers facing empty treasuries, found the charges of black magic an unfailing and sure means of achieving their ends. For several centuries, the charges were hurled at high and low. Death was the consequence.

The Council of Constance (1414) began with its proscription of the doctrines of Wyclif and the burning of John Huss and Jerome of Prague. Less known, at this time, too, a multivolume work was published by one of the inquisitors, called the Formicarium, a comprehensive list of the sins against religion. The fifth volume contained an account of sorcery. The list of crimes accomplished by witches was also detailed: second sight, the ability to read secrets and foretell events; the power to cause diseases and death by lightning and destructive storms; the ability to transform themselves into beasts and birds; and powers to bring about illicit love or barrenness of living beings and crops. Finally, it detailed their enmity against children and practice of devouring them (a crime often brought against socially proscribed groups).

Witchcraft Persecutions

Papal bulls appeared for the appointment of inquisitors, free of any interference by the civil authorities. The emperor and reigning princes took them under their protection. The persecutions rose to level unparalleled in other countries until the following century. Hundreds of alleged witches were burned in a few years. Immediately after the redefinition of witchcraft in 1484, two inquisitors, Jakob Sprenger and Heinrich Kramer, compiled the Malleus Maleficarum (first published in 1486), a complete system of witchcraft, along with a detailed method of how to prove any accused capable and guilty of any and every crime.

Persecutions in Germany were intermittent throughout the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Germany was more concerned with the split brought about by the activity of reformers Martin Luther and John Calvin. Still persecution broke out with renewed vigor in the seventeenth century stimulated by the increasing strife between Catholics and Protestants. The country had also been devastated by wars, plague, and famine. Two cities in particular, Bamberg and Würzburg, attained notoriety for trials and the number of victims.

In Bamberg, Prince-Bishop George II, and his suffragan Frederic Forner, prosecuted the holy inquisition so intensely that between the years 1625 and 1630 over 900 trials took place, and approximately 600 people were burned. Confessions were extracted from the victims under extreme torture. Rich and poor were gathered into the jails—often to such a degree that names were never taken nor recorded. The prisoners were only noted anonymously as numbers.

In other parts of Germany, Lutheranism was gaining ground. Here the charge of sorcery was brought against its followers. Protestants had no disagreement with Roman Catholics on the issue of witchcraft. At Würzburg, the bishop, Philip Adolph, in 1623, did not prosecute them openly, but nevertheless acted against the accused. In Eberhard David Hauber's Bibliotheca, Actaet Scripta Magica (1738–45) is a list of 29 burnings from the 1620s. Each burning consisted of several victims, the numbers ranging from two up to ten or more, which included old men and women; little girls and boys and infants; noble ladies; washerwomen; vicars; canons; singers and minstrels. Also among the accused were Bannach, a senator; a wealthy man; a keeper of the pot-house; the bishop's own nephew and page; a huckster; and a blind girl.

At Würzburg, in 1749, the last trial for witchcraft took place. Maria Renata of the Convent of Unterzell was condemned and burned in June that year for consorting with the devil and for being the focus of bewitchments and other infernal practices.

Toward the end of the seventeenth century, disbelief in the truth of witchcraft and criticism of the wholesale burnings began to be heard, although earlier than this some had dared to speak against the injustice and ignorance. Before 1593, Cornelius Saos, a priest in Mainz, had stated his doubt of the whole proceedings, but suffered for his recklessness. Johann Weyer, physician to the Duke of Cleves, Thomas Erast, another physician, Adam Tanner, a Bavarian Jesuit, and Frederick Spree, also a Jesuit, all attempted to put forward rational views about witchcraft persecution.

Alchemy and Occultism

Alchemy, one medieval form of Gnosticism, was seen as operating from the realm of magic. Many believed it was satanic in origin. Though few were charged unless caught in fraud for trying to make gold, alchemists were liable to the charge of sorcery and the death penalty if found guilty. Yet alchemy attracted emperors and princes who took up the study themselves, or, more frequently who hired well-known practitioners of the art. For example, Joachim I had Johannes Trithemius as teacher of astrology and "defender of magic," and the Emperor Rudolph employed Michael Maier as his physician.

Germany has supplied numerous names famous for their discoveries in magic—men who were open to suspicion because of their philosophical pursuits. Among those were Paracelsus—who in his search for the elixir of life discovered laudanum, a form of opium distilled from poppies; Cornelius Agrippa; Basil Valentine, prior and chemist; Henry Khunrath, physician and philosopher; and a host of students, all searching for the mysteries of life, the innermost secrets of nature.

Some people believed the activities of these men to be nothing more than pacts with the devil. The knowledge that the alchemists gained could be acquired only by evil means. Religious people reasoned that the soul of the magician was the price promised and demanded by the Evil One. These myths and imaginings centered around one magician especially, and in the Faust legend we may find the general attitude and belief of the Middle Ages regarding the interaction of learning and supernatural beliefs.

Mystical Societies

While the alchemist conducted rudimentary scientific research, they were Gnostic mystics, as their writings testify. Their work fits into the larger Gnostic world whose exponents were Rosicrucians and theosophists. Among the more notable mystics was the shoemaker, Jakob Boehme, the son of peasants.

During the Thirty Years' War (1618–1648), many preachers, seers, and fanatics appeared, exhorting and prophesying. It is believed the condition of the country contributed towards producing the hallucination and hysteria. Reportedly there are accounts of ecstatics absorbed in supernatural visions, such as Anna Fleischer of Freiburg, and Christiana Poniatowitzsch, who traveled throughout Bohemia and Germany relating her visions and prophesing.

At the end of the seventeenth century the old tenets of magic were undergoing a gradual change, except alchemy. The Gnostic magical beliefs found new expression in secret societies, many of which were founded on those of the Middle Ages. Freemasonry—whose beginnings are attributed by some to a certain guild of masons banded together for the building of Strasburg Cathedral, but by other authorities to Rosicrucian-ism—formed the basis and pattern for many other secret societies.

In the eighteenth century, occultism flourished. There were stories of Frederick William who worked with Steinert in a house specially built for evocations; Schroepfer, proprietor of a café with his magic punch and circles for raising the spirits of the dead; the physiognomist J. K. Lavater, said to have two spirits at his command; the Mopses, a society whose rites of initiation were said to resemble those of the Templars and witches' sabbat in a mild and civilized form; and Carl Sand, the mystical fanatic who killed the dramatist August Kotzebue.

The Illuminati, whose teachings spread to France and underlay the French Revolution, was banded together as a society by Adam Weishaupt and fostered by Baron von Knigge, a student of occultism. This society reportedly originated as an attempt to circumvent the authority of the Jesuits. In its development it absorbed mysticism and supernaturalism, finally becoming political and revolutionary as it applied its philosophies to civil and religious life. Although the Illuminati was disbanded and dispersed in 1784, its ideas continued through other occult groups and reappeared in the democratic wave that swept Europe in the next century.

Mysticism and Animal Magnetism

In the transition from occultism to a more scientific view of the paranormal largely accomplished in the nineteenth century, many occult elements reemerged in the development of animal magnetism and Spiritualism. Some of the significant names of the period included: Johann Heinrich Jung (1740–1817), better known as Jüng Stilling, a seer, prophet, and healer; Franz Anton Mesmer (c. 1733–1815), the discoverer and apostle of animal magnetism; the Marquis de Puységur, magnetist and spiritualist; Madame von Krudener, preacher of peace and clemency to monarchs and princes; Heinrich Zschokke, the Gothic novelist; and Dr. Justinus Kerner (1786–1862), believer in magnetism and historian of two cases of possession and mediumship, the "Maid of Orlach" and Frederica Hauffe, the "Seeress of Prevorst." Also during this period, the poet, playwright, philosopher and novelist, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe whose own story of Faust made his name synonomous with the struggle between good and evil, showed serious interest in the occult, particularly dreams. His grandfather's dreams seemed to be prophetic, and Goethe served as a witness to the truth of them. Goethe himself was considered psychic.

The cures said to be affected by Prince Hohenlohe, a dignitary of the church occured early in the nineteenth century. He was led to believe in the power of healing through the influence of a peasant named Martin Michel. Most of these cures took place at Würzburg, the scenes of former witch-burnings, and it was reported that more than 400 people, deaf, mute, blind, and paralytic, were cured by the power of prayer.

About this time the case of stigmata with Catherine Emerich, the nun of Dülmen also rose to prominence. Supposedly there was an appearance of a bloody cross encircling the head; marks of wounds on her hands, feet, and side; and crosses on her breast that frequently bled. Again in Germany, around 1918, a twenty-year old Bavarian woman named Therese Neumann underwent a series of ailments following a fall while helping to fight a fire. Within two years she was totally blind and paralyzed. Three years later in 1923, Neumann believed she had a vision of St. Therese of Lisieux, known as the "Little Flower" and her blindness disappeared. Supposedly, she took no food or drink from that time until her death in 1962. It was in 1926 that her stigmata began to appear during a weekly series of visions and trances from Thursday at midnight to early Friday morning. She became a worldwide celebrity. Every Catholic school child throughout the time until her death knew her name as well as those of the saints. In 1932 the Catholic church had attempted to conduct its own investigation of her claims, but could not agree on the terms with Neumann's father. Neither did psychical researchers ever investigate.

In nineteenth-century occultism we find, as in the earlier periods, stories of hauntings and spirits existing side by side with learned disquisitions, such as that on the "fourth dimension in space" by Johann C. F. Zöllner in his Transcendental Physics (1880) and another on the luminous emanations from material objects in Baron Karl von Reichenbach's treatise on od or odylic force, similar to some aspects of the magic of the Middle Ages.

Spiritualism

It was some years after the original Rochester Rappings in America before the Spiritualism movement surfaced in German-speaking lands. Several intellectual leaders made note of the movement, including the philosopher J. G. Fichte, a proponet of Spiritualism; Edward von Hartmann, author of Philosophy of the Unconscious (1869), who gave the phenomena a place in his philosophy; and Carl du Prel, who, in his Philosophy of Mysticism (1889), held up Spiritualistic manifestations as evidence of a subconscious region in the human mind. Du Prel also founded a monthly magazine, The Sphinx, devoted to the interest of Spiritualism, and Alexander Aksakof, the Russian Spiritualist, published the results of his research in Germany and in the German language because he was not permitted to publish them in Russian. Baron Lazar De Baczolay Hellenbach, integrated Spiritualist teachings in his hypothesis that no change of world or "sphere" occurs at birth or death, but merely a change in the mode of perception.

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

German psychical research owes much to the work of Baron Albert Schrenck-Notzing, who conducted investigations of such mediums as Eva C., Stanislawa Tomczyk, Franek Kluski, Linda Gazzera, Willi and Rudi Schneider, and Eusapia Palladino. His book Phenomena of Materialisation (London, 1920) reports on the claimed phenomenon of materialization.

The engineer Fritz Grünewald (d. 1925) was a pioneer of scientific testing of mediums, and maintained a laboratory in Charlottenburg, Berlin with various recording instruments. With the British investigator Harry Price, he tested such psychics as Jan Guzyk and Eleonore Zügun.

Other German researchers include Karl Grüber (1881–1927), who investigated the Schneider brothers, Traugott Konstantin Oesterreich (1880–1949), who published a comprehensive study of possession; Rudolph Tischner (1879–1961); General Josef Peter (1852–1939); Dr. Albert Moll (1862–1939), a psychiatrist who contributed a study on hypnotism; Max Dessoir, who first used the term "parapsychologie" in 1889; and Hans Driesch (1867–1941). Graf Carl von Klinckowstroem, even though skeptical regarding some psychical phenomena, wrote on water-divining and published a history of the divining rod. In 1874, Alexander Aksakof founded the journal Psychische Studien in Leipzig, published until 1934. It was superseded by the Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie. Another prominent German professor of philosophy, Trangott Konstantin Osterreich was especially well-known for investigating mediums. When the Nazis rose to power, he was stripped of his position and did not regain it until after the war. He died in 1949.

Parapsychology was largely destroyed during the Nazi era, but quickly rose again. Hans Bender, a post-war German researcher, was instrumental in founding the Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene (IGPP–the Institute for Border Areas of Psychology and Mental Health) in Freiburg in 1950, and held the chair for Border Areas of Psychology established at Freiburg University. The institute, located at Wilhelmstrasse 3a, D-79098, Frieburg i. Br. Germany, or through their website at http://www.igpp.de. IGPP was scheduled to be host for the worldwide Parapsychological Association Convention during August of 2000.

One of Bender's more famous investigations involved the Nickelheim Poltergeist that first became apparent in the Bavarian village in 1969. On the windows and doors of the house of a couple who lived with their teenaged daughter, strange knocking sounds began sounding. Further strange occurences, such as stones thrown against the house, dolls and toilet articles flying across rooms, water poured in shoes and eggs broken in visitors' hats, escalated. Soon after, while a priest was blessing the house, teleportation, (the penetration of matter through matter) phenomena began occuring—a stone fell from the ceiling with all of the windows and doors shut. No further reports of later investigation were available.

In 1966, a Department for the Border Areas was established at the university's Psychological Institute and in 1968, the 11th Convention of the Parapsychological Association was held. The institute has conducted investigations into psychokinesis, poltergeist, electronic voice phenomenon, and qualitative and quantitative extra sensory perception research. As of 1991 Eberhard Bauer, was a German historian of parapsychology and managing editor of Zeitschrift fur Parapsychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie, the only journal of parapsychology in Germany. He has had the distinction of being the leading European authority on the history of parapsychology and the contemporary scene.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Driesch, Hans. Psychical Research: The Science of the Supernormal. London, 1933. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Du Prel, Carl. Die Magie als Naturwissenschaft. Leipzig: M. Altmann, 1912.

Grüber, Karl. Parapsychologische Erkenntnisse. Munich: Drei Masken Verlag, 1925.

Gulat-Wellenburg, W. von et al. Der Physikalische Mediumismus. Berlin: Ullstein, 1925.

Hansen, Joseph. Zauberwahn, Inquisition und Hexenprozess in Mittalalter und die Entstehung der grossen Hexenverfolgung. Munich/Leipzig: R. Oldenbourg, 1900. Reprint, Aalen: Scientiia, 1983.

Lea, Henry Charles. Materials Toward a History of Witchcraft. 3 vols. Philadelphia, 1939. Reprint, New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1957.

Moll, Albert. Hypnotism. London: W. Scott, 1901.

Oesterreich, T. K. Possession, Demoniacal & Other, Among Primitive Races, In Antiquity, the Middle Ages, and Modern Times. London, 1930. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Reichenbach, Karl von. Researches on Magnetism, Electricity, Heat Light, Crystallization, and Chemical Attraction, in Their Relations to the Vital Force. London, 1851. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Tischner, Rudolf. Geschichte der Parapsychologie. Titmoning (Pustet), 1960.

Germer, Karl Johannes (1885–1962)

Karl Johannes Germer, successor to Aleister Crowley as outer head of the order of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), was born January 22, 1885, in Germany. His college career at the Sorbonne, University of Paris, was interrupted by World War I, when he was drafted into the German army. He served as a reserve officer and was awarded the Iron Cross, both first and second class, possibly for intelligence activity in regards to Russia.

After the war Germer joined the publishing firm Barth Verlag in Munich as a manager. In the early 1920 he worked with Tränker, a member of the OTO in the publication of several short works by Crowley, including Der Meister Therion: Eine biographische Nachricht (1925). By this means Germer became acquainted with Crowley and moved to England, where he worked publishing Crowley's writings. Also with the help of Martha Küntzel, a former Theosophist, he founded Thelema-Verlag in Leipzig to publish German translations of Crowley's books. In 1935, on a visit to Leipzig, he was arrested by the Nazi government, which was in the process of suppressing occult work. Germer was confined at Alexanderplatz prison and Esterwegen concentration camp for ten months and kept his sanity by reciting the Thelemic Holy Books, the essential writings of thelemic magic as taught by Crowley. Shortly before his release, he was given a vision of his Holy Guardian Angel, a major early magical step for all thelemites. (The word thelema, the central concept of Crowley's magic, is derived from the Greek word for will.)

Germer then moved to Brussels and tried to keep in touch with the scattered OTO groups, but all of these were finally closed in 1937. In 1941 he was arrested again and spent ten months in an internment camp before he was allowed to get out of the country. He migrated to the United States, and Crowley named him the Grand Treasurer of the order. Germer concentrated on raising money to continue the fragile publication program of the OTO. He wrote an account of his experiences in prison but was never able to find a publisher. Among his duties as the highest ranking officer in the United States was mediating a dispute in the Pasadena lodge concerning the magical work of Jack Parsons. Germer worked through Grady McMurtry as his representative.

Crowley named Germer his successor as head of the order, then died in 1947. Germer lived quietly in rural California and seemed unwilling and uninterested in carrying out his duties as chief administrator of the OTO. In 1955 he chartered a lodge in England under Kenneth Grant, who formed the New Isis Lodge with instructions to limit his work to the first three of the eleven OTO degrees. When Grant began to work higher degrees, Germer withdrew his charter. He also chartered a Swiss lodge, but otherwise remained aloof from the members, many of whom were unaware for several years of his death on October 25, 1962.

Germer died without naming a clear successor or establishing a process for appointing a successor. His work was carried by several claimants, including Metzger in Switzerland, Kenneth Grant in England, Marcelo Ramos Motta in Brazil, and eventually Grady McMurtry in California, each of whom would head a separate branch of the OTO.

Sources:

King, Francis. Sexuality, Magic, and Perversion. Secacus, N.J.: Citadel Press, 1972.

Gervais, Bishop (d. 1067)

Archbishop of Rheims. His death was said to have been revealed to a Norman knight, returning from a pilgrimage to Rome, by a hermit he met on the way. According to popular belief, the hermit told the knight that on the previous night he had been disturbed by a vision of demons making a great noise. He said the demons told him they had been carrying the body of Gervais from Rheims, but because of his good deeds in life the body had been taken from them. On his return to Rheims the knight learned that Gervais was dead, and that the time of his death corresponded exactly with the time of the hermit's vision.

GESP

Abbreviation for general extrasensory perception, a term used by parapsychologists to cover both telepathy (in which there is an apparent transfer of information paranormally from one mind to another) and clairvoyance (in which apparent paranormal cognition relates to an object or event).

Gestefeld, Ursula Newell (1845–1921)

Ursula Newell Gestefeld, an independent Christian Science teacher and one of the founders of New Thought, was born April 22, 1845, in Augusta, Maine. As a child she was quite sickly and her family had doubts that she would live to adulthood. She did survive, however, and eventually married newspaperman Thomas Gestefeld. They had four children and settled in Chicago.

Early in 1884 Gestefield obtained a copy of Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, the Christian Science textbook written by Mary Baker Eddy. Attracted to what she read, she joined the class Eddy taught in Chicago in the spring of that year. Soon after the class she became a practitioner and a popular teacher in her own right. She wrote for the Christian Science Journal and in the late 1880s wrote three books, Mental Medicine? (1887), Ursula Gestefeld's Statement of Christian Science (1888), and Science of the Christ (1889). These books brought her into conflict with Eddy, who accused Gestefeld of distorting her teachings. Gestefeld was dismissed from Eddy's church and responded with an attack on Eddy in Jesuitism in Christian Science (1888).

Gestefeld developed her own variation on Christian Science, which she termed the Science of Being. For several years she functioned as an independent teacher and writer. Besides a number of books, in 1896 she began the magazine Exodus (1896–1904). She also founded informal Science of Being groups, one of which was in England. In 1897 she founded the Exodus Club, which grew in 1904 into the Church of New Thought, one of the first metaphysical churches to use that name. As the pastor of the church, she was recognized as one of the leading figures of the emerging New Thought Movement, which had developed out of the independent Christian Scientists of the previous decade. In 1901 she wrote the most important statement of her mature position, The Builder and the Plan. She addressed the first meeting of the International New Thought League in 1899 in Boston. That organization was a precursor to the International New Thought Alliance, founded in 1914.

She continued to lead her church until her death on October 22, 1921, in Chicago, but it dissolved soon after her passing. She was cremated, and her ashes were buried in Chicago.

Sources:

Gestefeld, Ursula N. The Builder and the Plan. Chicago: Exodus Publishing, 1901.

———. Jesuitism in Christian Science. Chicago: The Author, 1888.

———. The Science of the Christ. Chicago: The Author, 1889.

———. A Statement of Christian Science. Chicago: The Author, 1888.

Ghadiali, Dinshah Pestanj (1873–1966)

Dinshah Pestanji Ghadiali, an Indian American, pioneered vegetarianism and chromotherapy (healing with color) in twentieth-century America. Born November 28, 1873, into a Zoroastrian family in Bombay, India, he developed an early interest in chemistry and trained himself through his reading. He was only 11 when he became an assistant in math and science at Wilson College.

During his teen years Ghadiali became a rational materialist, then in 1891 he encountered the Theosophical Society. At the time of his initiation he had a visionary experience of one of the mahatmas, the superhuman entities who are believed to guide the work of the society. Ghadiali studied with a Hindu neighbor and gave up meat and alcohol. Through the society, he was introduced to the world of religion, and for a time became a student of Hindu guru Swami Murdhan Shastri.

After finishing college, Ghadiali practiced medicine. He moved to the United States in 1911 and was naturalized in 1917. His medical degree was not recognized in the United States, and he was also alienated from medicine as it then existed. He had adopted the Hindu virtue ahimsa, harmlessness, as a basic principle of living and was led to naturopathy, which had developed out of older natural schools of healing. In 1919 he became vice president of the National Association of Drugless Practitioners and actively participated in efforts to have the government recognize alternative medical practices.

In 1920 Ghadiali announced that he had perfected the techniques of spectro-chrome therapy, a method of healing using attuned color waves. The machine he developed could project beams of light upon the body of an ill person. In addition, Ghadiali received his medical degree in chiropractic, naturopathy, and several other healing practices, and two years later he purchased land in Malaga, New Jersey, and opened the Spectro-Chrome Institute. He wrote several books over the next few years, but his primary text, the three volume Spectro-Chrome Metry Encyclopedia, was finished in 1933. Meanwhile, Ghadiali faced a series of court actions as the government moved against his healing practices. He was arrested for fraud in 1931 but was acquitted. In 1934 an attempt was made to strip him of his citizenship, as had happened to so many Indian Americans under provisions of the 1924 anti-Asian immigration law. He argued that though he was an Indian, he was of Persian ancestry, and thus was able to retain his citizen's status.

During the next decade, Ghadiali was able to train more than 100 students in the techniques of spectro-chrome therapy, but in 1945 the government acted again. Ghadiali faced charges that he had made false claims about his spectro-chrome healing device. In 1947 he was convicted but not sent to prison on the condition that he cease practicing chromotherapy. His books and unsold devices were destroyed, and those that had been sold were confiscated from their owners. In the 1950s he resumed his healing practice and operated quietly until his death on April 30, 1966. His son, H. Jay Dinshah, continues Ghadiali's work, but concentrates on veganism, a strict form of vegetarianism. Dinshah founded and heads the American Vegan Society.

Sources:

Ghadiali, Dinshah P. Spectro-Chrome Metry Encyclopedia. 3 vols. Malaga, N.J.: Spectro-Chrome Institute, 1933.

The Life of a Karmi-Yogi. Malaga, N.J.: American Vegan Society, 1973.

Ghirardelli, Cornelio (ca. 1610)

Originally listed in the Encyclopedia of Occultism by Lewis Spence (1920) as "Quiradelli, Corneille." Ghirardelli was a Franciscan monk born in Boulogne, France, toward the end of the sixteenth century. He studied astrology and was the author of several works on astrology, physiognomy, and other subjects.

Sources:

Ghirardelli, Cornelio. Cefalogia fisonomica divisa in dieci Doche, dove conforme a'documenti d'Aristotile, e d'altri filosofi naturali. . . . Bologna, Italy, 1630.

———. Compendio della cefalogia fisonomica; nella quale si contiene cento sonetti di diversi eccellenti posti sopra cento teste humane. Bologna, Italy, 1673.

The Ghor-Boud-Des

The people of Ghor-bund-land. Edward Pococke in his book India in Greece (1852) maintains that these people were the same as the Corybantes, or ministers of the gods, otherwise known as the Cabiri. Pococke claims, on somewhat slender evidence of place-names, that Palestine and Greece were colonized from India in ancient times.

Sources:

Pococke, Edward. India in Greece. London: J. J. Griffin & Co., 1852.

Ghost

The disembodied spirit or image of a deceased person, appearing to be alive. The term does not include apparitions of the living. Reports of appearances of ghosts go back to ancient times, and ghost stories have always been popular as a special genre of literature. Ghosts are believed to be ethereal, able to penetrate doors and walls, and are often said to appear at the moment of death to a distant relative or friend. Ghosts are also believed to haunt specific localities, either dwellings associated with their earthly life or locales with a tragic history. Children are often reported to have encountered ghostly playmates.

Although the evidence for ghosts is largely anecdotal, it is widespread and persistent. For a detailed discussion of various types of ghosts and related appearances, see apparitions. (See also double; haunting; and dress, phantom)

The Ghost Club Society

One of the original psychical research organizations. It was founded in 1862 by individuals interested in ghost phenomena. Its membership (by invitation only) has included prominent psychical researchers, as well as actors, actresses, authors, and poets. Today the club, which has been superseded as a research organization, holds an annual dinner at which members relate personal experiences concerned with ghosts. Membership is not limited to believers in ghostly phenomena. Address: The Hon. Secretary, Mr. Trevor Kenward, Pine Trees, 26 Dewlands Rd., Verwood, Dorset, BH31 6PL England.

Ghost Research Society

The Ghost Research Society was started in 1977 by Martin V. Riccardo, better known for his leadership of the informal group pursuing Vampire Studies, and other youthful friends interested in things occult. Most lived in Chicago or the suburbs to the south and west. The organization focused interest on ghosts, poltergeists, and hauntings. In 1982, Riccardo turned over the society to Dale D. Kaczmarek (b. 1952) who assumed its presidency. During the last quarter of the twentieth century, Kaczmarek has become a well-known personality in the Chicagoland psychic community.

The society began with research into the many stories of ghosts and hauntings in Chicago and organized informal visits to local sites such as Bachelor's Grove Cemetery, Resurrection Cemetery, and Robinson Woods. They also sought out contemporary reports of hauntings and investigated incidents of ghostly appearances. Kaczmarek began to appear on talk shows and his adventures have over the years been the subject of numerous news features on television and in newspapers. Media appearances gave him and the society some level of fame and other ghosthunters from around the country joined their efforts to his. The society gathered members and established chapters in other states. State coordinators currently reside in five states. Relationships have also been developed with the Ghost Club, the older ghost research group in England.

Kaczmarek has hoped to prove the existence of life after death through his investigations. He has gathered a collection of spirit photographs and pursued ghosts on numerous field trips. However, he has been largely cut off from contemporary parapsychology. While such ghost hunting as the society has pursued was popular in the early days of psychical research, contemporary parapsychology has found it a deadend, and scholarly journals have ignored its findings. The society publishes its own periodical, the Ghost Trackers Newsletter, which is now issued three times a year. It contains reports of ghosts, poltergeists, and hauntings from around the world.

The Ghost Research Society may be contacted at P. O. Box 205, Oak Lawn, IL 60454-0205. Website: http://www.ghostresearch.org.

Sources:

The Ghost Research Society. http://www.ghostresearch.org. March 4, 2000.

Jarvis, Sharon, ed. Dead Zones. New York: Warner Books, n.d.

———. True Tales of the Unknown: The Uninvited. New York: Bantam Books, 1985.

Ghost Seers

European folklore belief maintains that persons born at a particular time of the day have the power to see ghosts. For example, British folklorist T. F. Thiselton Dyer in The Ghost World (1893), observes:

"Thus it is said in Lancashire that children born during twilight are supposed to have this peculiarity, and to know who of their acquaintance will next die. Some say that this property belongs also to those who happen to be born exactly at twelve o'clock at night, or, as the peasantry say in Somersetshire, 'a child born in chime-hours will have the power to see spirits.' The same belief prevails in Yorkshire, where it is commonly supposed that children born during the hour after midnight have the privilege through life of seeing the spirits of the departed. Mr. Henderson [T. F. Henderson, Notes on the Folk-lore of the Northern Counties, 1866] says that a Yorkshire lady informed him she was very near being thus distinguished, but the clock had not struck twelve when she was born. When a child she mentioned this circumstance to an old servant, adding that 'Mamma was sure her birthday was the 23rd, not the 24th, for she had inquired at the time.' 'Ay, Ay,' said the old woman, turning to the child's nurse, 'mistress would be very anxious about that, for bairns born after midnight see more things than other folk.'&43"

This idea, part of a much larger belief in the significance of various days in explaining little-understood phenomena such as luck, prevailed on the Continent. In Denmark, children born on Sunday had prerogatives far from enviable. The antiquarian Benjamin Thorpe tells how:

". . . in Fryer there was a woman who was born on a Sunday, and, like other Sunday children had the faculty of seeing much that was hidden from others. But, because of this property, she could not pass by a church at night without seeing a hearse or a spectre. The gift became a perfect burden to her; she therefore sought the advice of a man skilled in such matters, who directed her, whenever she saw a spectre to say, 'Go to Heaven!' but when she met a hearse, 'Hang on!' Happening sometime after to meet a hearse, she, through lapse of memory cried out, 'Go to Heaven!' and straightway the hearse rose in the air and vanished. Afterwards, meeting a spectre she said to it, 'Hang on!' when the spectre clung round her neck, hung on her back, and drove her down into the earth before it. For three days her shrieks were heard before the spectre would put an end to her wretched life."

It used to be a popular belief in Scotland that those who were born on Christmas Day or Good Friday had the power to see spirits and even command them, a superstition to which Sir Walter Scott alludes in his poem "Marmion" (stanza 22). The Spaniards attributed the haggard and downcast looks of their Philip II to the disagreeable visions to which this privilege subjected him.

Among primitive tribes it was supposed that spirits are visible to some persons and not to others. The people of the Antilles used to believe that the dead appeared on the road when one went alone but not when people went together; among the Finns the ghosts of the dead were to be seen by the shamans and not by men generally, unless in dreams. It was also a popular theory with primitive races that the soul appeared in dreams to visit the sleeper, and hence it was customary for tribes to drink various intoxicating substances under the impression that when thrown into the state of ecstasy they would have pleasing visions.

On this account certain tribes of the Amazon used narcotic plants, producing an intoxication lasting 24 hours. During this period they were said to be subject to extraordinary visions, in the course of which they acquired information on any subject they wished.

For a similar reason the inhabitants of northern Brazil, when anxious to discover some guilty person, administered narcotic drinks to seers, in whose dreams the criminal made his appearance. Californian Indians gave children certain intoxicants to gain from the ensuing vision information about their enemies. The Darien Indians used the seeds of the Datura sanguines to produce in children prophetic delirium, during which they were said to reveal the whereabouts of hidden treasures.

One of the most famous seers in the British Isles was Kenneth Ore, the Brahan Seer of the Highlands of Scotland. The faculty of such prophetic vision was generally known in Scotland as second sight. Other seers favor inducing visions by such means as crystal gazing.

Sources:

Campbell, John L., and Trevor H. Hall. Strange Things: The Story of Fr. Allan McDonald, Ada Goodrich Freer, and the Society for Psychical Research's Enquiry into Highland Second Sight. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1968.

Dyer, T. F. Thiselton. The Ghost World. London: Ward & Downey, 1893.

Henderson, William. Notes on the Folk-lore of the Northern Counties, and the Borders. London, 1866. Reprint, London: Folk-Lore Society, 1879.

Mackenzie, Alexander. The Prophecies of the Brahan Seer Doinneach Odhar Fiosaiche. Stirling, Scotland: Eneas Mackay, 1935. Rev. ed., Golspie, Scotland: Sutherland Press, 1970. Reprint, London: Constable, 1977.

Ghost Tours

Regular weekend "supernatural tours" of Chicago, Illinois, are organized by lecturer/researcher Richard T. Crowe, who broadcasts on occult topics and has appeared on television shows. The tours include visits to a reputedly haunted church, a cemetery, the grave of a miracle child, the locale of a hitchhiking ghost, and sites of other historic mysteries. International ghost tours are also arranged. Crowe may be reached at P.O. Box 557544, Chicago, Illinois 60655-7544. Website: http://ghosttours.com/.

Sources:

Chicago Supernatural Tours. http://ghosttours.com/. March 22, 2000.

Ghost Trial of the Century

Term given by the New York Times to the legal contest in Arizona from March to October 1967 in which 134 individuals and organizations competed for the funds of the late James Kidd (1879–ca. 1949), a prospector and miner who left nearly a quarter of a million dollars for "research on scientific proof of a soul of the human body." The judge's decision of October 20, 1967, awarded the funds to the Barrow Neurological Institute, Phoenix, Arizona.

Sources:

Fuller, John G. The Great Soul Trial. New York: Macmillan, 1969.

Ghoul

An evil spirit or revived corpse supposed to rob graves and feed on human corpses. It is similar to the vampire, but differs in that it not only drinks blood but also consumes flesh. The term is from the Arabic ghul (feminine form, ghulah) meaning "to seize," and the story of the ghoul has been widely disseminated in Moslem countries, ranging from India to Africa. Some people believe that the superstition stems from wild animals that disturb graves at night, others that its origin is the terror of death in the lonely desert. The idea of the ghoul entered into the West in the nineteenth century through translations of the Arabian Nights.

Among Hindus there are similar beliefs in ghoul-like figures, such as the vetala, a demon that haunts cemeteries and animates dead bodies, and the rakshasas, a whole order of evil demons that disturb sacrifices, harass devout people, and devour human beings. Even lower than the rakshasas are the pishachas, the vilest and most malignant of fiends. In India the line between ghoulish and vampire figures is often unclear. In Hinduism the eating of human flesh is a forbidden and degrading act, but certain tantric yoga groups (who find enlightenment by indulging in what other groups avoid) in India and Tibet practice a necrophilistic rite of lying upon a corpse, or eating a portion of the flesh.

In modern times the concept of the ghoul has become commonplace in Hollywood horror movies. Ghouls made probably their best-known appearance in George Romero's 1968 horror classic Night of the Living Dead and its sequels.

Sources:

Barber, Richard, and Anne Riches. A Dictionary of Fabulous Beasts. New York: Walker, 1971.

Giant Rock Space Convention

Organized annually by George Van Tassell from 1954 until just before his death in 1977 at Giant Rock airport near Valley, California. The 1954 and 1958 events attracted more than ten thousand attendees. Van Tassell, author of the book I Rode in a Flying Saucer (1952), claimed that the Giant Rock area was a "natural cone of receptivity" for flying saucers and that he received telepathic messages from UFO "crew members," who were also said to visit him.

The space conventions resembled old-time Spiritualist camp meetings, with lectures by "contactees" or speakers on the metaphysical and religious aspects of UFOs. The conventions declined in attendance through the 1960s and were discontinued after Van Tassell's death.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Van Tassell, George. I Rode in a Flying Saucer. Los Angeles: New Age Publishing, 1952.

Gibier, Paul (1851–1900)

French scientist, director of the American branch of the Pasteur Institute of New York, who became interested in psychical research in 1885 and found a remarkable medium in Mrs. Salmon (pseudonym of Carrie M. Sawyer), with whom he conducted experiments for ten years both in his New York laboratory and at his country home.

Gibier established the reality of some surprising phenomena and planned to take his medium to England, France, and Egypt, but his plans were cut short when he was killed by a runaway horse. The night before the accident he reportedly dreamed that he rode out alone, was thrown from his buggy, and died; he told his dream to his wife and laughed at her fears.

Sources:

Gibier, Paul. Physiologie transcendentale: Analyse des choses. 1890. Translated as Psychism: Analysis of Things Existing. N.p., 1890.

———. Le Spiritisme (Fakirisme occidental). Paris: C. Doin, 1887.

Gibran, Kahlil (1883–1931)

Metaphysical poet and philosopher. He was born in the town of Bsharýe, Lebanon, traditionally the area of the forest of the Holy Cedars, which furnished timber for King Solomon's temple in ancient Jerusalem. Gibran was baptized in the Maronite (Eastern Rite) branch of the Roman Catholic Church and named after his paternal grandfather as Gibran Kahlil Gibran, a name he retained in Arabic, although he used the simpler "Kahlil Gibran" in his English writings.

He was educated in Lebanon and emigrated to the United States with his family when he was 12, settling in Boston in 1895. There he attended a public school but he returned to the Middle East for schooling two years later.

In Lebanon he studied at the Madrasat Al-Hikmat (The School of Wisdom), founded by the Maronite bishop Joseph Debs in Beirut. After graduation he traveled in Syria and Lebanon, visiting historic places.

In 1902 he returned to the United States to dedicate himself to painting, and in 1908 went to Paris to study under famous sculptor Auguste Rodin at the Academy of Fine Arts. He then returned to the United States once again, where he continued to paint. Gibran wrote many books of mystical inspiration that dramatize a quest of self-fulfillment, of which The Prophet (1923) is by far the most popular.

Sources:

Gibran, Kahlil. Beloved Prophet: The Love Letters of Kahhil Gibran and Mary Haskell and her Private Journal. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1972.

———. Earth Gods. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1931.

———. Gibran: A Self-Portrait. New York: Citadel, 1959.

———. Jesus the Son of Man. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1956.

———. The Prophet. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1923.

———. Sand and Foam. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1926.

———. Wisdom of Kahlil Gibran. New York: Philosophical Library, 1966.

Hawi, Khalil. Kahlil Gibran: His Background, Character, and Works. Beirut, 1963.

Nu'aymah, Mikha'il. Kahlil Gibran: A Biography. New York: Quartet, 1988.

Sherfan, Andrew Dib. Kahlil Gibran: The Nature of Love. New York: Philosophical Library, 1971.

Young, Barbara. This Man from Lebanon: A Study of Kahlil Gibran. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, n.d.

Gibson, Edmund P(aul) (1898–1961)

American writer, engineer, and researcher in parapsychology. Born May 20, 1898, in Grand Rapids, Michigan, he took part in ESP card research in Grand Rapids (1932–37) and conducted experiments in precognition and psychokinesis at Duke University (1938–40). In 1946 he investigated the mediumship of William H. Thatcher.

Gibson was a member of the Society for Psychical Research and the American Society for Psychical Research and an associate member of the Parapsychological Association. In addition to numerous articles on archaeology, he contributed writings on psychical subjects to Tomorrow, Light, FATE, Blue Book, and the Journal of Parapsychology. He died March 19, 1961.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Gichtel, John Georg (1638–1710)

German theosophical mystic in the tradition of Jakob Boehme. He was born at Ratisbon, Germany, on March 14, 1638. He attributed his leaving a legal career to a meeting with Baron Justinianus von Weltz, who presented a vision for the union of Christianity. As a result Gichtel became the head of a small society, the Christerbauliche Jesusgesellschaft. It was not long before the church authorities expressed their disapproval, and Gichtel moved to Holland, the most religiously tolerant country on the Continent at the time. There he discovered Boehme's mystical writings and became an ardent disciple. He saw to the publication of the writings in 1682 and organized a Boehmist society called the Brethren of the Angels. Gichtel's own major literary contribution lay primarily in a number of letters he wrote that were gathered and published by one of his followers as Theosophia practica (1701).

Gidlow, Elsa (1898–1986)

Elsa Gidlow, poetess, Goddess worshipper, and herald of the contemporary Women's Spirituality Movement, was born in Hull, Yorkshire, England. Soon after her birth, her family to Montreal, Canada, where she grew up. As a teenager she became aware of her lesbian inclinations and began to read the works of Sappho, Oscar Wilde, Edward Carpenter, and other works reflective of a homosexual life. She also began to write her first poems. At the age of 19 she moved to New York, where two years later she published her first book of openly gay poems, On a Grey Thread. As early as 1918 she penned a poem indicative of her later Goddess worship, "To an Unknown Goddess."

In the 1920s, she settled in northern California. She was attracted to the Theosophical Society and the writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, but was put off by the homophobic attitudes she found among theosophists. She turned to Eastern religions and developed a devotion to bodhisattva Kwan Yin. She also studied Celtic lore. In the 1940s she purchased land in Marin County, north of San Francisco, which became a private retreat for many in the Bay Area's alternative community that emerged into prominence in the 1950s. She began to associate with the likes of Gary Snyder and Alan Watts. She and Watts cofounded the Society for Comparative Philosophy, an organization anticipating the burst of interest in Eastern religions that would be initiated in 1965 by the change in the immigration law and the subsequent migration of large numbers of Asians to the United States.

During the 1960s Gidlow led the Druid Heights Artists' Retreat, which anticipated the Neo-Pagan Witchcraft movement with its celebration of the moon phases with both original liturgies and the reading of poetry. She had for many years celebrated the Goddess with a Yule ritual that recalled the women she had known who had, metaphorically speaking, tended sacred and domestic fires in their life. In the 1970s she easily became a participant and leader in the emerging Women's Spirituality Movement. In 1973 she published a manifesto, Ask No Man Pardon: The Philosophical Significance of Being Lesbian, in which she defined the lesbian as by nature a "virgin, androgynous, priestess, dedicated to the Goddess. . . a daughter of the Amazons."

Shortly before her death in 1986, she completed her autobiography, Elsa: I Come with My Songs.

Sources:

Conner, Randy P., David Hatfield, and Mariya Sparks. Cassell's Encyclopedia of Queer Myth, Symbol and Spirit. London: Cassell, 1997.

Gidlow, Elsa. Elsa: I Come with My Songs. San Francisco: Bootlegger Press, 1986.

———. Sapphic Songs: Eighteen to Eighty: The Love Poetry of Elsa Gidlow. San Francisco: Bootlegger Press, 1982.

Gidney, William "Starets" (1972–)

William "Starets" Gidney, born May 24, 1972, is the grotto master of the Nepotism Grotto of the Church of Satan and the editor of an independent Satanist magazine, Mourning Star. He attended the State University of New York and the Indian River Community College in Fort Pierce, Florida, and served a term in the United States Army. He also married Lady Ygraine (Gabrielle Gidney), a witch, and they settled in Port Saint Lucie, Florida.

During the 1980s, both Gidney and his wife had become occultists, and in 1988 he publicly identified himself as a Satanist. He joined the Church of Satan in 1989 and in 1993 he became an agent for the church. However, in that same year he dropped his affiliation with the Church of Satan and he and Lady Ygraine founded the First Occult Church, for which she served as president and he as vice president. As part of his work for the church he edited A Taste from the Cauldron, the church's periodical. The church functioned as an umbrella for a wide variety of occultists including Wiccans, Voudouists, Pagans, and ritual magicians, all of whom functioned in the context of a dominant Satanic philosophy. He headed the church's Order of the Infernal Grotto that explored Satanism in light of both ancient and contemporary Pagan thought.

Through the mid-1990s, Gidney's thought matured, and eventually the First Occult Church was closed and A Taste from the Cauldron discontinued. In 1997 he began a new periodical, Mourning Star, as an independent Satanist magazine. The following year he reaffiliated with the Church of Satan, and in January 1999 Lady Ygraine opened an occult bookstore, Pandora's Box, in Port Saint Lucie that catered to Satanists and other occultists. Pandora's Box closed after two years of operation. In 1999 Gidney also led in the formation of the Nepotism Grotto of the Church of Satan and has since that time served as grotto master.

Gidney has come to see Satanism as a synthesis of social Darwinism, the sociopolitics of the Machiavellian tradition, and Nietzschean philosophical thought that has merged around a religious aesthetic personified in the archetype of the antihero (as understood from a Jungian psychological perspective). Satanism is antiegalitarian and proposes a meritocracy that threatens those who are weak of will and mind. As such, there is nothing secretive about Satanism and nothing that places the practitioner outside the law. Satanists are seen as adversaries of social and intellectual stagnation.

A poet and musician, Gidney has organized the Jesus of Borg rap-metal rock band for which Lady Ygraine provides the vocals. The band's first CD was released in 2000. The band has an Internet site at http://www.geocities.com/jesusofborg/.

Sources:

Mourning Star. Port Saint Lucie, Florida, n.d.

A Taste from the Cauldron. Port Saint Lucie, Florida, n.d.

Giffard, Ellen Hovde (1925–)

Film editor with special interest in parapsychology. Giffard was born March 9, 1925, at Meadville, Pennsylvania, and attended the Carnegie Institute of Technology at Pittsburgh. She worked as an assistant in marine ecology at the Marine Biological Laboratory, Woods Hole, Massachusetts; as secretary to the New York Aquarium; and as a freelance film editor (1950–63). She was a member of the Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics held in New York during 1958.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Gilbert, Mostyn (d. 1992)

Noted psychical researcher and active member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR). Although born in the United States, he lived and worked in Britain. Gilbert had special interests in table turning, mediumship, materialization, electronic voice phenomena, and the history of nineteenth-century Spiritualism. He became secretary of the Survival Joint Research Committee (SJRC) of the SPR in 1963 and prepared its quarterly agenda and minutes of meetings. The SJRC, now a trust, was concerned with investigating evidence for survival after death, and Gilbert was actively involved in its formation, together with such Spiritualists friends as Maurice Barbanell (former editor of the newspaper Psychic News). The committee brought together Spiritualists and scientists.

Gilbert was a friend of Eric J. Dingwall and helped him prepare his book The Critic's Dilemma (1966), dealing with the research of Sir William Crookes, a subject on which Gilbert also made contributions to the Journal of the SPR (in volumes 41–44). He did valuable work in editing the society's Combined Index, part IV (1973), and also cataloged the collection of the Britten Memorial Library in Manchester prior to its transfer to the Spiritualists' National Union headquarters at Stansted.

Gilbert did not hesitate to criticize what he considered shortcomings in council proceedings, but many members believed that his comments were a valuable stimulus. He was extremely helpful for several years in the organization of the Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena (ASSAP).

Gilbert, R(obert) A(ndrew) (1942–)

Book dealer and authority on the history of magic and esoteric organizations. He was born October 6, 1942, in Bristol, England, and attended the University of Bristol (B.A. honors, 1964). Since 1966 Gilbert and his wife have been antiquarian book dealers. Gilbert is also a trustee of the Yarker Library Trust and the Hermetic Research Trust and is a member of the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies. He has written a number of books and articles, but is possibly most known for his work on the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and in particular one of its members, occult author Arthur E. Waite.

Gilbert has stated that his aim is:

"to promote those elements within the esoteric traditions of Western Europe and of the Judeo-Christian tradition which have been unjustly neglected on account of their presumed unorthodoxy. I wish to demonstrate their compatibility with orthodox Christianity. In addition, I continue to work on the questions of the nature and communication of mystical experience, the distribution of life within the universe, and the religious implications of cosmology."

He has been an incisive critic of the pretentious and the charlatanic in occultism.

Sources:

Gilbert, Robert A. A. E. Waite: A Bibliography. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

———. A. E. Waite: Magician of Many Parts. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1987.

———. The Golden Dawn Companion. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1986.

———. The Golden Dawn: Twilight of the Magicians. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

———, ed. The Sorcerer and His Apprentice: Hermetic Writings of S. L. McGregor Mathers & J. W. Brodie Innes. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

——— [Edward Dunning]. Selected Masonic Writings of A. E. Waite. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1988.

Gilbert, Robert A., and Michael A. Cox, eds. The Oxford Book of English Ghost Stories. Oxford: Oxford University Press; New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Gilbert, Robert A., and W. N. Birks. The Treasure of Montsegur. Crucible, 1987.

Waite, Arthur Edward. Hermetic Papers of A. E. Waite. Edited by R. A. Gilbert. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1987.

Gill, Madge (d. 1961)

British psychic and London housewife who practiced automatic drawing and painting and produced work claimed to be inspired by spirit guidance. Gill's mediumship began after the death of her eight-year-old son. She said she felt "impelled to execute drawings on a large scale on calico." These drawings were complex, with a mysterious atmosphere. In 1942 one of the drawings, measuring 36 feet by 5 feet, was priced at 1,000 pounds. The London borough of Newham sponsored an exhibition of her works. In 1977 another exhibition was arranged at the Central School of Art and Design, London.

Gilles de Rais (1404–1440)

Lord of Rais (or Retz) and marshal of France, the "Bluebeard" of nursery legends, and a famous sorcerer. He was born Gilles de Laval in September or October 1404 at Machecoul to one of the most outstanding families of Brittany. His father, Guy de Montmorency-Laval, died when Gilles was 20 years old, and the impetuous young man found himself possessed of unlimited power and wealth.

After his father's death he became Gilles de Rais, the lord of 15 princely domains, yielding a revenue of 300,000 livres. He was handsome and distinguished by a beard of bluish-black. His appearance was fascinating, his erudition extensive, and his courage unimpeachable. All this seemed to ensure him a splendid career, yet the name of Bluebeard came to be associated with horror and atrocious crimes.

At the outset of his career de Rais did nothing to suggest an evil predisposition. He served with zeal and gallantry in the wars of Charles VI against the English and fought under Joan of Arc in the Siege of Orléans. His exploits won him the dignified title marshal of France.

From that point de Rais's career drifted downward. He retired to his castle of Champtocé and indulged in the display of his luxury. Two hundred horsemen accompanied him on his travels, and the magnificence of his hunting entourage exceeded that of the king himself. His retainers wore the most sumptuous clothing; his horses were caparisoned with the richest trappings; his castle gates were open day and night to all comers. A whole ox was roasted daily for his guests. Sheep, pigs, poultry, mead, and hippocras (wine) were provided for five hundred persons.

De Rais carried the same love of pomp into his devotion. His principal chaplain, a dean, a chanter, two archdeacons, four vicars, a schoolmaster, twelve assistant chaplains, and eight choristers comprised his ecclesiastical establishment. Each of these had his own horse and servant; all were dressed in robes of scarlet and furs and had costly appointments. Sacred vessels and crucifixes, all of gold and silver, were transported with them wherever their lord went, as were many organs, each carried by six men. De Rais was intent on having all the priests of his chapel wear the mitre; he sent many embassies to Rome to obtain this privilege, but without success.

He maintained a choir of 25 young children of both sexes, who were instructed in singing by the best masters of the day. He also had comedians, morris dancers, and jugglers, and every hour was crowned with some sensual gratification or voluptuous pleasure.

In 1420 Lord de Rais wedded Catherine, the heiress of the noble House of Thouars. The wedding afforded him a fresh occasion to display his passion for luxurious pomp. He gave splendid banquets and participated in chivalric tournaments.

History or Legend?

From this point on it is difficult to separate fact from popular tradition. The folklore version of the horrific events that transpired is related by Éliphas Lévi in The History of Magic (1913). Lévi writes: "He had espoused a young woman of high birth and kept her practically shut up in his castle at Machecoul, which had a tower with the entrance walled up."

Since de Rais had spread a report that the tower was in a ruinous state, no one sought to enter it. Madame de Rais—who was frequently alone during the dark hours—saw red lights moving to and fro in the tower but did not venture to question her husband, whose bizarre and somber character filled her with terror.

De Rais's expenses were so extensive that they eventually exhausted even his apparently inexhaustible revenues, and to procure the funds for his pleasures and extravagance he was compelled to sell several of his baronies.

For de Rais, unable to live in diminished splendor, money became the principal object of desire, and to obtain it he decided to turn to alchemy.

He sent accordingly into Italy, Spain, and Germany and invited the alchemical experts to the splendors of Champtocé. Among those who obtained the summonses, and continued attached to de Rais during the remainder of his career, was Prélati, an alchemist of Padua. At their instigation de Rais built a stately laboratory and, joined by other alchemists, they eagerly began the search for the philosophers' stone. For 12 months the furnaces blazed brightly and a thousand chemical combinations disposed of the marshal's gold and silver.

Impetuous, de Rais could not abide such lingering processes. He wanted wealth and he wanted it immediately. If the grand secret could not be discovered by any quicker method, he would have none of it, nor, as his resources were fast melting away, would it avail him much if the search occupied several years. At this junction the Poitousan physician and the Paduan alchemist whispered to de Rais that there were quicker methods of obtaining the desired alkahest if he had the courage to adopt them.

De Rais immediately dismissed the inferior alchemists and put himself in the hands of the two abler and subtler masters, one a physician. They persuaded him that the devil could at once reveal to them the secret and offered to summon him so that the marshal could conclude with him whatever arrangement he thought best. Short of sacrificing his soul, the lord of Rais professed himself willing to do anything the devil might command.

In this frame of mind he went to the physician at midnight to a solitary spot in the neighboring woods where the physician drew a magic circle and made the customary conjurations. De Rais listened to the invocation with wonder, expecting that at any moment the Spirit of Darkness would burst upon the startled silence. After a lapse of 30 minutes, the physician manifested signs of the greatest alarm—his hair seemed to stand on end, his eyes glared with unutterable horror, he talked wildly, his knees shook, a deadly pallor overspread his countenance, and he sank to the ground.

The lord of Rais was a dauntless man and gazed upon the strange scene unmoved. After awhile the physician seemed to recover. He arose and, turning to his master, inquired if he had not seen the wrathful countenance of the devil. De Rais replied that he had seen no devil, whereupon the physician declared that the Evil One had appeared in the form of a wild leopard and had growled at him horribly.

Lévi quotes the physician: "You would have been the same, and heard the same, but for your want of faith. You could not determine to give yourself up wholly to his service, and therefore he thrust a mist before your eyes.'' De Rais acknowledged that his resolution had indeed somewhat faltered, but said that he would believe if the Evil One could really be coerced into revealing the secret of the universal alkahest.

The physician said certain herbs grew in Spain and Africa that possessed the power necessary to coerce the devil, and offered to go in search of them himself if the lord of Rais would supply the funds. Since no one else would be able to identify the herbs, de Rais thanked the physician for volunteering and loaded him with all the gold he could spare. The man then took leave of his credulous patron, who never saw him again.

As soon as the physician left Champtocé, de Rais was once more seized with the fever of unrest. His days and nights were consumed in ceaseless visions of gold.

He now turned for help to the alchemist Prélati, who agreed to undertake the enterprise if de Rais furnished him with the necessary charms and talismans. The marshal was to sign with his blood a contract that he would obey the devil in all things and offer up a sacrifice of the hands, eyes, blood, heart, and lungs of a young child. The madman having willingly consented to these terms, Prélati went out alone on the following night. After an absence of three hours, he returned to his impatient lord. His tale was a monstrously extravagant one, but de Rais believed it.

The devil, Prélati improvised, had appeared in the shape of a comely young man of 20 who desired to be called ''Barron'' and had pointed out to him a store of ingots of pure gold buried under an oak in the adjacent woods. It was to become the property of the lord of Rais if he fulfilled the conditions of his contract. But this bright prospect was clouded by the devil's injunction that the gold was not to be searched for until a period of seven times seven weeks had elapsed, or it would turn to slates and dust.

Gilles was by no means willing to wait so many months for the realization of his wishes and asked Prélati to inform the devil that he would decline any further dealings with him if matters could not be expedited. Prélati persuaded de Rais to wait for seven times seven days, and then the two went with pickax and shovel to dig up the treasure.

They eventually dug up a load of slates inscribed with hieroglyphical characters. Prélati broke into a fit of rage and branded the Evil One a liar, a knave, and a rogue—de Rais heartily joining in his fierce denunciations. Prélati persuaded his master to give the devil a further trial, however, and led him on from day to day with dark oracular hints and pretended demoniac intimations until he had obtained nearly all de Rais's remaining valuables. He was preparing to escape with his plunder when a catastrophe occurred that involved him in his lord's ruin.

On Easter Day in the year 1440, Gilles de Rais received Communion solemnly in his chapel and bade farewell to his wife, telling her that he was departing to the Holy Land. The poor woman was even then afraid to question her husband. She was also several months along in her pregnancy. The marshal permitted her sister to come on a visit as a companion during his absence. Madame de Rais took advantage of this indulgence, after which de Rais mounted his horse and departed.

Madame de Rais communicated her fears and anxieties to her sister. The two women wondered what went on in the castle. Why was her lord so gloomy? What signified his repeated absences? What became of the children who disappeared day by day? What were those nocturnal lights in the walled-up tower? These and other questions caused both women to burn with curiosity. But what could they do?

The marshal had expressly forbidden them even to approach the tower, and before leaving he had repeated this injunction. It must surely have a secret entrance, Madame de Rais and her sister Anne agreed, and they proceeded to search through the lower rooms of the castle, corner by corner, stone after stone. At last, in the chapel, behind the altar, they came upon a copper button hidden in a mass of sculpture. It yielded under pressure, a stone slid back, and the trembling curiosity seekers distinguished the lowermost steps of a staircase, which led them to the condemned tower.

At the top of the first flight there was a kind of chapel, with an inverted cross and black candles; on the altar stood a hideous figure, no doubt representing the devil. On the second floor they came upon furnaces, retorts, alembics, charcoal—all the apparatuses of alchemy. The third flight led to a dark chamber where the heavy and fetid atmosphere compelled the young women to retreat. Madame de Rais bumped into a vase, which fell over. She then became aware that her robe and feet were soaked by some thick liquid. On returning to the light at the head of the stairs, she found that she was bathed in blood.

Anne would have fled from the place, but Madame de Rais's curiosity was stronger than her disgust and fear. She descended the stairs, took a lamp from the infernal chapel, and returned to the third floor, where a frightful spectacle awaited her. Copper vessels filled with blood lined the whole length of the walls, bearing labels with a date on each. In the middle of the room was a black marble table on which lay the body of a child, obviously murdered recently. It was one of the gory basins that had fallen, and black blood spread over the grimy and worm-eaten wooden floor.

The two women were horrified. Madame de Rais endeavored at all costs to destroy the evidence of her indiscretion. She used a sponge and water to wash the boards, but she only extended the stain, and that which at first seemed black became all scarlet. Suddenly a loud commotion echoed through the castle, mixed with the cries of people calling to Madame de Rais: ''Here is Monseigneur come back!'' The two women made for the staircase, but at the same moment they were aware of footsteps and the sound of other voices in the devil's chapel. Sister Anne fled upward to the battlement of the tower; Madame de Rais rushed down the stairs trembling and found herself face to face with her husband, accompanied by an apostate priest and Prélati.

De Rais seized his wife by the arm and without speaking, dragged her into the infernal chapel. According to Lévi, Prélati told the marshal: ''It is needs must, as you see, and the victim has come of her own accord. . . .'' ''Be it so,'' answered his master. ''Begin the Black Mass. . . .'' The apostate priest went to the altar while de Rais opened a little cupboard inside and drew out a large knife. He sat down close to his swooning spouse, who was crumpled in a heap on a bench against the wall. The sacrilegious ceremonies began.

Lévi explains that the marshal, instead of taking the road to Jerusalem, had proceeded only to Nantes, where Prélati lived, and had attacked the miserable traitor with the utmost fury, threatening to slay him if he did not reveal the means of extracting from the devil the long-sought gold. Stalling, Prélati declared that terrible conditions were required by the infernal master; first would be the sacrifice of the marshal's unborn child, after tearing it from the mother's womb. De Rais made no reply but returned at once to Machecoul, the Florentine sorcerer and his accomplice the priest on his heels.

Meanwhile, Anne, left to her own devices on the roof of the tower and not daring to come down, had used her veil to send distress signals. These were answered by two cavaliers accompanied by a posse of armed men, who were riding toward the castle. They proved to be her two brothers, who, on learning of the spurious departure of the marshal for Palestine, had come to visit and console Madame de Rais. Soon after, they arrived with a clatter in the court of the castle, Lévi narrates, whereupon Lord de Rais suspended the hideous ceremony and said to his wife:

''Madame, I forgive you, and [put] the matter at an end between us if you do now as I tell you. Return to your apartment, change your garments, and join me in the guest-room, whither I am going to receive your brothers. But if you say one word, or cause them the slightest suspicion, I will bring you hither on their departure; we shall proceed with the Black Mass at the point where it is now broken off, and at the consecration you will die. Mark where I place this knife."

De Rais rose and led his wife to the door of her chamber, then received her brothers, saying their sister was preparing herself to come and greet them. Madame de Rais appeared almost immediately, pale as a specter. Her husband never took his eyes off her, seeking to control her by his glance. When her brother suggested that she was ill, says Lévi, she answered that it was the fatigue of pregnancy, but added in an undertone, "Save me, he seeks to kill me."

At the same moment Sister Anne rushed into the hall, crying, "Take us away; save us, my brothers, this man is an assassin," and she pointed to de Rais. The marshal summoned his men, but the visitors' escort surrounded the women with drawn swords. The marshal's people disarmed instead of obeying him. Madame de Rais, with her sister and brothers, crossed the drawbridge and left the castle.

Terrible rumors spread through all the countryside. Many young girls and boys had disappeared; some had been traced to the castle of Champtocé and not beyond. The public accused de Rais of murder and of crimes even worse than murder. It was true that no one dared openly accuse a baron so powerful as the lord of Rais. Whenever the disappearance of so many children was mentioned in his presence, he reacted with the greatest astonishment. Suspicions aroused are not easily allayed, however, and the castle of Champtocé and its lord had acquired a fearful reputation and were shrouded in mystery.

The continued disappearance of young boys and girls had caused so bitter a feeling in the neighborhood that the church felt compelled to intervene. At the urging of the bishop of Nantes, the duke of Brittany ordered de Rais and his accomplices arrested.

De Rais's Trial

Their trial took place before a commission composed of the bishop of Nantes, the chancellor of Brittany, the vicar of the Inquisition, and Pierre l'Hôpital, the president of the provincial parliament. De Rais was accused of sorcery, sodomy, and murder. At first he stood his ground, denouncing his judges as worthless and impure and declaring that rather than plead before such shameless knaves he would be hung like a dog, without trial. But overwhelming evidence brought against him day after day—terrible revelations by Prélati and de Rais's servants about his unquenchable sexual lust, his sacrifices of young children for the supposed gratification of the devil, and the ferocious pleasure with which he gloated over the throbbing limbs and glazing eyes of those who were the victims of both his sensuality and his cruelty—shook even de Rais's imperturbability and he confessed everything.

The final count showed that 140 children had fallen victim to de Rais and his insane lust for the philosophers' stone. Both de Rais and Prélati were doomed to be burned alive, but in consideration of rank, the punishment of the marshal was somewhat mitigated—he was strangled before he was given over to the flames.

The sentence was executed at Nantes, on October 26, 1440. The chronicler Monstrelet states:

"Notwithstanding his many and atrocious cruelties, he made a very devout end, full of penitence, most humbly imploring his Creator to have mercy on his manifold sins and wickedness. When his body was partly burned, some ladies and damsels of his family requested his remains of the Duke of Brittany, that they might be interred in holy ground, which was granted. The greater part of the nobles of Brittany, more especially those of his kindred, were in the utmost grief and confusion at his shameful death."

The records of the trial and judgment are preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, and at Nantes.

The castle of Champtocé stands in a beautiful valley, and many a romantic legend flowers about its gray old walls. Novelist Anthony Trollope described it thus:

"The hideous, half-burnt body of the monster himself circled in flames, pale, indeed, and faint in colour, but more lasting than those the hangman kindled around his mortal form in the meadow under the walls of Nantes—is seen on bright moonlight nights, standing now on one topmost point of craggy wall, now on another, and is heard mingling his moan with the sough of the night-wind. Pale, bloodless forms, too, of youthful growth and mien, the restless, unsepulchred ghosts of the unfortunates who perished in these dungeons unassoiled, may at similar times be seen flitting backwards and forwards in numerous groups across the space enclosed by the ruined walls, with more than mortal speed, or glancing hurriedly from window to window of the fabric, as still seeking to escape from its hateful confinement."

Sources:

Bataille, Georges. Procès de Gilles de Rais. Paris, 1959.

Gabory, Emile. Alias Bluebeard. New York: Brewer & Warren, 1930.

Lévi, Éliphas. The History of Magic. London: Rider, 1913.

Wilson, Thomas. Blue-Beard: A Contribution to History & Folk-Lore. London, 1899. Reprint, New York: B. Blom, 1971. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1981.

Wolf, Leonard. Bluebeard: The Life & Crimes of Gilles de Rais. New York: Crown, 1980.

Gillespie, William Hewitt (1905–)

British psychiatrist and psychoanalyst who also wrote on parapsychological subjects. Gillespie was born August 6, 1905, at Pei-Tai-Ho, China. He later attended the Universities of Edinburgh (Scotland) and Vienna. He held important positions in the LCC Mental Hospitals Service, London (1931–36); the Institute of Psychiatry (1944–70); and the London Clinic of Psychoanalysis (1944–47) and was appointed to the Maudsley Hospital, London in 1936, where after a long tenure he was named emeritus physician. During his career he wrote a number of articles on parapsychological subjects.

Sources:

Gillespie, William H. "Extrasensory Elements in Dream Interpretation." Psychoanalysis and the Occult. Edited by George Devereaux. New York: International Universities Press, 1953.

Ginnungagap

In Norse mythology, the unfathomable gap between Niflheim (the region of eternal cold, mist, and darkness) and Muspellsheim (the realm of fire)—the void before the creation. Cold winds from the abyss changed the streams into blocks of ice, which fell into the void with the sound of thunder, the legends say. Sparks from Muspellsheim turned the ice into streams, forming layers of frost that filled the gap. The inchoate mass became animate, taking the form of the primeval giant Ymir. Ymir was slain by Odin, Villi, and Ve, who threw his body into the chasm, where his blood became the sea, his flesh the earth, his bones the mountains and rocks, his skull the sky, and his brains the clouds.

During the eleventh century, the sea between Greenland and America was named Ginnungagap.

The name was also used by author James Webb as the title of the first chapter of his book The Occult Establishment (1976) to denote the political and economic chaos in Western Europe after World War I, from which arose occult and political cults and their leaders, profoundly influencing modern society.

Ginseng

Pronounced "jin-seng," a plant of the genus Panax, family Aralia, indigenous to China, Korea, and North America. The Chinese and Korean species, Panax ginseng, is said to have curative properties, including the ability to prolong life.

The roots sometimes resemble the human form, rather like the mandragoras or mandrake, and a legend similar to that of the mandrake says that ginseng also screams when uprooted. Chinese tradition claims that ginseng absorbs a special earth vitality that is communicated to those who consume the plant (usually in the form of an infusion); hence in former times its use was restricted to emperors.

Although the plant's medicinal value is still disputed in Europe and the United States, it is now cultivated widely for sale in health food stores.

The American general William Westmoreland reportedly took ginseng tea at breakfast during the Vietnam War, and Russians gave it to cosmonauts to combat infectious disease.

Sources:

Harriman, Sarah. The Book of Ginseng. New York: Pyramid Books, 1975.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Girard, Jean-Baptiste (1680–1733)

A Jesuit born at Dôle in France. Girard was persecuted by the Jansenists, who accused him of seducing a girl named Catherine Cadière, who showed symptoms of possession and had to be sent to a convent of Ursulines at Brest. His enemies found it impossible to implicate him in the affair, and the Parliament of Aix-en-Provence, before which he was tried in 1731, was forced to acquit him. He returned to his native Dôle, where he died two years later. The case resembles similar accusations against priests by nuns that occurred at Loudon and Louviers.

Gladen, The Root of

Regarded as a remedy for a disease called the "elf cake," which caused a hardness in the side. Thomas Lupton's A Thousand Notable Things (1595) gives the following prescription for making up the medicine: "Take a root of gladen, and make powder thereof, and give the diseased party half a spoonful thereof, to drink in white wine, and let him eat thereof so much in his pottage at one time, and it will help him within awhile." Gladen or Gladdon is an old name for both varieties of iris—the garden flower (Iris pseudo-acorus) and the wild iris (Iris foetidissima). The root of the former was reputed to be effective for dropsy and the root of the latter for hysterical disorders.

Gladstone, William Ewart (1809–1898)

The great Victorian statesman, four times prime minister of Great Britain, who was interested in psychical research, which he considered "the most important work which is being done in the world—by far the most important." Gladstone came to that belief rather late in his life. On October 29, 1884, he had a successful slate-writing sitting with the medium William Eglinton. After the séance he was quoted as saying:

"I have always thought that scientific men run too much in a groove. They do noble work in their own special line of research, but they are too often indisposed to give any attention to matters which seem to conflict with their established modes of thought. Indeed, they not infrequently attempt to deny that into which they have never inquired, not sufficiently realising the fact that there may possibly be forces in nature of which they know nothing."

Shortly after the Eglinton sitting, Gladstone joined the Society for Psychical Research.

Sources:

Feuchtwanger, E. J. Gladstone. Blasingtoke, U.K.: Macmillan, 1989.

Tweedale, Violet. Ghosts I Have Seen and Other Psychic Experiences. New York: Frederick A. Stokes, 1919.

Glamourie

The state of mind in which witches were said to see apparitions and visions of many kinds. (See also witchcraft)

Glanvill, Joseph (1636–1680)

Chaplain to Charles II, prebendary of Worcester, philosopher, and one of the earliest fellows of the Royal Society. An orthodox clergyman of the Anglican Church, Glanvill was a self-avowed skeptic and enemy of dogma. He was the author of several books, including Scepsis Scientifica (1665) and Sorcerers and Sorcery (1666). He is best remembered as a precursor of modern psychical researchers and the author of Sadicismus Triumphatus (1681), which contains accounts of remarkable cases of witchcraft and details of the author's personal investigation into the poltergeist known as the Drummer of Tedworth.

Sources:

Glanvill, Joseph. Sadicismus Triumphatus. London: Printed for J. Collins and S. Lownds, 1681.

Redgrove, H. Stanley, and I. M. L. Redgrove. Joseph Glanvill and Psychical Research in the Seventeenth Century. London: William Rider & Son, 1921.

Taylor, Sascha. Glanvill: The Uses and Abuses of Skepticism. New York: Pergamon Press, 1981.

Glas Ghairm

A rhyme or spell of Scottish origin to keep a dog from barking or to open a lock. The glas ghairm was also supposed to be of special value to young men in their courtship days. About 1900 a well-known character in Skye (Hebrides, Scotland) named Archibald the Lightheaded was believed to know this incantation but repeated it so quickly that no one could understand what he said. The man was insane, but the fear that dogs had of him was ascribed to his knowledge of the glas ghairm. It was believed that this rhyme had some reference to the safety of the children of Israel on the night before the biblical Exodus: "against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast" (Exod. 11:7). (See also hand of glory)

Glaskin, G(erald) M(arcus) (1923–)

Australian novelist who has experimented with the "Christos experience," a method of inducing altered states of consciousness. Born December 16, 1923, in Perth, Western Australia, Glaskin traveled widely. During World War II, he served in the Australian navy and air force. He began to write short stories and articles at age 18 in a military hospital.

After the war he worked as a stockbroker in Singapore for ten years, then returned to Perth in 1959 as a full-time writer. Beginning with A World of Our Own (1955), Glaskin wrote a number of novels and other books, as well as several dramas. His writing has brought him numerous honors in his homeland. He first encountered the Christos experience through a group at Mahogany Creek, Western Australia, who published several volumes of a magazine titled Open Mind. In his first Christos experience, Glaskin appeared to be transported to a life in ancient Egypt. In his 1976 book Worlds Within, he describes the techniques for inducing the Christos experience.

Glaskin wrote three books dealing with the Christos experience: Windows of the Mind: Discovering Your Past and Future Lives through Massage and Mental Exercise (1974), Worlds Within: Probing the Christos Experiment and A Door to Eternity: Proving the Christos Experiment (1979).

Sources:

Glaskin, G. M. A Door to Eternity: Proving the Christos Experience. London: Wildwood, 1979.

———. Windows of the Mind: Discovering Your Past and Future Lives through Massage and Mental Exercise. New York: Delacorte, 1974.

———. Worlds Within: Probing the Christos Experiment. 1976. Reprint, London: Arrow, 1978.

Glastonbury

A town in Somerset, England, that has become the focus of romantic legends of both Paganism and Christianity. It is situated among orchards and water meadows in the fen country surrounding Glastonbury Tor, a hill on what was once an island. Although there is an old Christian chapel on the Tor, Celtic legends state that this was the entrance to a pagan underworld, home of the fairy folk. The ruined abbey at Glastonbury is associated with the legend of Joseph of Arimathea, who is said to have brought the Holy Grail to the Vale of Avalon and planted a staff in the ground, which grew as a thorn, flowering on Christmas Eve.

The Glastonbury thorn actually existed until Reformation times, when it was destroyed, but varieties exist in other parts of Britain. Glastonbury is also believed to be the resting place of King Arthur.

During the early decades of this century, Frederick Bligh Bond received a number of messages—published as the Glastonbury Scripts—that directed his excavations of the abbey. In the 1920s, Katherine Maltwood began to examine reports that the land around Glastonbury was laid out as a giant horoscope, which became known as the Glastonbury zodiac. More recently Glastonbury became the home of magician Dion Fortune.

This "power complex" of traditions and legends has attracted many young people to Glastonbury as a pilgrimage center in the contemporary occult and mystical revival. New mythologies crossed with the old as thousands of young pilgrims spend magical weekends at Glastonbury, combining flying saucer cults, Hare Krishna incantations, and rock music with legends of King Arthur and Joseph of Arimathea.

Glastonbury is now regarded as a power center of the New Age of Aquarius, and a community magazine, Torc, has been founded to further knowledge of Glastonbury and its associations. (Address for subscription information: 3 Jacobs Close, Windmill Hill, Glastonbury, Somerset, U.K.) In 1989 the "alternative" community of Glastonbury, through an organization called Unique Publications, launched a journal, The Glastonbury Gazette.

For a skeptical account of the Glastonbury legends, see Christianity in Somerset (1976), by Robert Dunning. Dunning claims that all the stories of King Arthur and St. Joseph were twelfth-century fabrications used to attract funds for the rebuilding of the abbey.

Sources:

Ashe, Geoffrey. The Quest for Arthur's Britain. London, 1968.

Greed, John A. Glastonbury Tales. Bristol, England: St. Trillo Publications, 1975.

Howard-Gordon, Francis. Glastonbury: Maker of Myths. Glastonbury, England: Gothic Image, 1982.

Lewis, Lionel. St. Joseph of Arimathea at Glastonbury. London: James Clarke, 1955.

Michell, John. New Light on the Ancient Mystery of Glastonbury. Glastonbury, England: Gothic Images Publications, 1990.

Reiser, Oliver L. This Holyest Erthe: The Glastonbury Zodiac and King Arthur's Camelot. Bedford, England: Perennial Books, 1976.

Treharne, R. F. The Glastonbury Legends. London, 1967.

Williams, Mary. Glastonbury: A Study in Patterns. Hammersmith, England: Research into Lost Knowledge Organization, 1969.

Glastonbury Scripts

Title given to a series of nine booklets edited by Frederick Bligh Bond containing various automatic writing communications concerning Glastonbury Abbey and its history: (1) The Return of Johannes, (2) Pages from the Book of Immortal Remembrance, (3 and 7) Life of Hugh of Avalon, (4) Life of Abbot Ailnoth, (5) The Vision of Mathias, (6) The Rose Miraculous, (8) The Founding of the First Christian Church, and (9) King Arthur and the Quest of the Holy Grail.

Number 1 contains writing obtained by Bond with the medium John Alleyne (psudonym of J. Allen Bartlett). The communicator claimed to be "Johannes Bryant," a monk of Glastonbury of the period 1497–1534. Numbers 3, 4, and 7 are the work of two American sitters to whom the history of the abbey was unknown.

Number 2 records the writings of a Winchester medium whose hand was allegedly used automatically without her volition. The communicators claimed to be monks of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. According to psychical researcher Nandor Fodor, "they were veridical in scores of cases, the most famous of which is the discovery of the Norman wall of Herlewin's Chapel, recorded by Bond in his book The Company of Avalon" (1924). It was the public's linking this discovery with psychical research (in Bond's publications) that led to the abrupt closing of the excavations in 1922. Bond was suspended from his directorship of the excavations and forfeited his privileges. In the atmosphere of the times, when Spiritualism was considered a crackpot belief by many, the abbey trustees were alienated. Several of Bond's findings were allegedly obliterated by the removal of stones and the filling of trenches.

Numbers 5, 6, 8, and 9 of the Glastonbury Scripts were obtained by Bond in his sessions with Hester Dowden, who claimed that his presence and the contact of his fingers on her hand or wrist was a sine qua non in the process of obtaining them. The mental contact came through Bond, Dowden said. Her contribution was the motor power of transmission and the more mechanical side of the word formation. For this reason the automatist disclaimed sole copyright, alleging "dual mediumship."

This view was energetically contested by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle who in conjunction with the Authors' Society gave his support to the chancery court action of July 1926 (Cummins v. Bond), which established the ruling that all automatic scripts are the sole copyright of the amanuensis, who is thus regarded by law as the only author.

The story of the Glastonbury Scripts carried on the record of prediction and discovery as told by Bond in a series of earlier books: The Gate of Remembrance (1918), The Hill of Vision (1919), and The Company of Avalon (1924). These examples of cross-correspondence were obtained through four far-separated mediums. To these a fifth may be added, since the monk "Johannes" again wrote, in his old style, through the hand of Mina Crandon of Boston in 1926–27. Part of the record is printed in the Clark University Symposium of 1926.

Sources:

Bond, F. Bligh. The Glastonbury Scripts. 9 vols. Glastonbury, England: Abbot's Leigh, n.d.

Kenawell, William W. The Quest at Glastonbury: A Biographical Study of Frederick Bligh Bond. New York: Garrett Publications, 1965.

Lambert, G. W. "The Quest at Glastonbury." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43, 728 (June 1960).

Glastonbury Zodiac

One of the strangest features of legend-haunted Glastonbury in Britain is the so-called zodiac formation of earthworks, field tracks, river banks, and other ground markings over an area of some 30 miles, resembling a gigantic star map. An early mention of the Glastonbury zodiac was made by John Dee, famous Elizabethan scholar and occultist, but it was not until comparatively recent times that the subject was examined in detail.

In her book A Guide to Glastonbury's Temple of the Stars (1929), Katherine E. Maltwood maps a giant zodiac from the features of the Glastonbury landscape with additional features suggestive of symbols of the Holy Grail tradition.

Although this theory has been received with some skepticism, aerial surveys have tended to support the ground markings as suggestive of a zodiac. (See also leys)

Sources:

Caine, Mary. The Glastonbury Zodiac: Key to the Mysteries of Britain. Torquay, England: Grael Communications, 1978.

Maltwood, Katherine E. A Guide to Glastonbury's Temple of the Stars. London, 1929.

Glauber, Johann Rudolph (ca. 1604–1670)

German apothecary and alchemist. Glauber was born at Karlstadt and grew up in Franconia. He traveled widely in Germany seeking alchemical knowledge and eventually settled in Amsterdam, Holland, in 1648. He was a prolific writer and left many treatises on medicine and alchemy. He discovered and prepared medicines of great value to pharmacy, some of which are still in common use, for example the familiar preparation known as Glauber's salt.

He was a firm believer in the philosophers' stone and the elixir of life. Concerning the former, he stated:

"Let the benevolent reader take with him my final judgment concerning the great Stone of the Wise; let every man believe what he will and is able to comprehend. Such a work is purely the gift of God, and cannot be learned by the most acute power of human mind, if it be not assisted by the benign help of a Divine Inspiration. And of this I assure myself that in the last times, God will raise up some to whom He will open the Cabinet of Nature's Secrets, that they shall be able to do wonderful things in the world to His Glory, the which, I indeed, heartily wish to posterity that they may enjoy and use to the praise and honour of God."

According to fellow alchemist Goossen van Vreeswych, Glauber died in Amsterdam, March 14, 1670. Some of Glauber's principal works include Philosophical Furnaces; Commentary on Paracelsus; Heaven of the Philosophers, or Book of Vexation; Miraculum Mundi; The Prosperity of Germany; and Book of Fires.

Glosopetra (or Gulosus)

A miraculous stone said to fall from heaven in the wane of the moon. It was supposed to be shaped like a human tongue and was used by magicians "to excite the lunar motions."

Glossolalia

A form of religious speech generally called "speaking in tongues" or "pseudo-tongues." It is also occasionally confused with xenoglossis, which refers to speaking in tongues unknown to the medium or psychic.

Glottologues

Mediums or ecstatics who speak in unknown tongues. (See Xenoglossis)

Gloucester, Duchess of (Eleanor Cobham) (d. ca. 1443)

Wife of Humphrey of Gloucester, who was uncle of Henry VI and lord protector of England during the king's minority. Although Humphrey was very popular in England, he was not without enemies, and one of the most bitter of these was Henry Beaufort, cardinal of Winchester, great-uncle to the king. Beaufort brought a charge of witchcraft against the duchess of Gloucester, hoping thus to destroy her husband's power as the actual head of the realm and heir to the throne in the event of the king's death.

It was supposed that the duchess had first resorted to witchcraft in order to gain the affections of Humphrey. When she became his second wife and the death of the duke of Bedford had removed all but one barrier between her and a crown, she set about to secretly remove that barrier—the unfortunate king.

To assist in her plot, she was said to have sought the advice of Margery Jourdain (the Witch of Eye), Roger Bolingbroke, Thomas Southwell, and Fr. John Hun, a priest. All five were accused of summoning evil spirits and plotting to destroy the king. They were also suspected of making a waxen image, which was slowly melted before a fire in the expectation that as the image was consumed the king would also waste away.

The five were tried. Father Hun turned informer and was pardoned. Bolingbroke was publicly humiliated, then hanged and drawn and quartered. Southwell died in prison, Margery Jourdain was burned as a witch, and in 1441 the duchess of Gloucester was disgraced and sentenced to walk through the streets of London on three separate occasions bearing a lighted taper in her hand and attended by the lord mayor, sheriffs, and others.

She was imprisoned for life, first in Chester Castle, then (from October 1443) in Kenilworth. She died around 1443.

Early in 1443 Humphrey had set out for parliament in the hope of securing a pardon for the duchess, but he was arrested on suspicion of treason and died in custody. Known as "Good Duke Humphrey," he is remembered chiefly for his love of books; he made generous gifts to the library of Oxford University.

The Gnome Club of Great Britain See Gnomes Anonymous

Gnome International See Gnomes Anonymous

Gnomes Anonymous

British organization that developed from a reorganization of the Gnome Club of Great Britain and Gnomes International, both founded in 1978 by Ann Atkin at the Old Rectory, West Putford, Devon.

In 1983 the Gnome Reserve was moved to Surrey under the administration of Alex Adams, "gnome-in-chief." The purpose of Gnomes International was to "unite gnomes and their human keepers," and membership was open to people of all ages interested in gnomes. The organization offered children's services, conducted research, and maintained a speakers' bureau. It published Gnome News three times a year. Last known address: Alex Adams, Gnome Reserve, 224 Kingston Rd., New Malden, Surrey, KT3 3UH, England.

Gnosis

Gnosis, a journal of the Western Inner Tradition, was first issued in 1985 and quickly emerged as one of the highest quality newsstand periodicals serving the groups and individuals whose spiritual vision has emerged out of the Western alternative spiritual tradition that has collectively been known as Gnosticism. Associated with Gnosis as its sponsor was the Lumen Foundation, a nonprofit organization existing primarily to raise the income to keep Gnosis financially solvent.

Gnosticism enjoyed a widespread popularity in the early centuries of the Common Era, but lost out to Orthodox Christianity. Since that time it has periodically reappeared in the West as a series of movements that challenge some of the basic concepts of Christian Orthodoxy. The Divine is generally thought of as transcendent, impersonal, and ultimately unknowable rather than as personal and involved in human history. God did not create the world by a sovereign act; rather, the visible universe is the end result of God's emanations of His own spiritual essence. The universe is structured in layers with the visible universe at the lowest level. Salvation consists in gaining the wisdom (gnosis) that provides the information for escaping the world of matter, in which human entities are trapped on a wheel of reincarnation. Commonly, Gnostics believe that humans have forgotten their divine origin as an emanation of the deity and thus need to reawaken their memory by various spiritual disciplines.

The Gnostic vision experienced a notable revival in the seventeenth century in such movements as Rosicrucianism and speculative Freemasonry. Modern representatives include Theosophy, ceremonial magic, and the New Age movement of the 1980s. Spiritualism, Christian Science, and New Thought have all grown from Gnosticism, and the movement has its Eastern correlates in the various mystical movements such as Sufism and Sant Mat. In the twentieth century, several groups emerged trying to self-consciously revive the traditions and teachings of second-century Gnostic Christianity. Gnosis attempted to speak to the modern heirs of the Gnostic spiritual impulse. It claimed among its writers some of the finest scholars and spiritual leaders representing the Gnostic impulse.

Each issue of Gnosis was built around a set of articles, the lead articles usually being grouped around a single theme. Especially prominent were the book reviews, which were of the kind one expected of a literary journal rather than a newsstand magazine. In the end, it failed to find a popular audience that would allow it to survive. After struggling to exist for 15 years, its last issue was released in 1999.

Gnosis was issued quarterly from publishing headquarters in the San Francisco Bay area under the direction of Jay Kenny, editor-in-chief, and Richard Smoley, editor.

Sources:

Gnosis. San Francisco, California, n.d.

Gnosis Association for Multidisciplinary Research on the Hypothesis of Survival

The Gnosis Association for Multidisciplinary Research on the Hypothesis of Survival is a parapsychology research facility founded by Giorgio de Simone (1925–) in Italy in July 1981. Simone, a professor at the University of Naples, began work in parapsychology in 1950 and for a quarter of a century was the president of the Italian Centre for Parapsychology (1963–89) For most of that time he was also editor of Informazioni di Parapsychologia (1964–89).

Parapsychology has concentrated on laboratory research into ESP (clairvoyance and telepathy) and psychokinesis. It has largely neglected research on survival that was the mainstay of psychical research in the early twentieth century. Simone felt that the time had come for a renewed interest in the possibility that a self-aware autonomous nucleus (analogous to the soul) exists independently of bio-physical laws and is capable of operating on its own. That is to say, he was positing the possibility of this nucleus functioning with intelligence and decision-making abilities after the death of the human body.

Gnosis was established as an interdisciplinary effort to assemble, study, and evaluate all of the data, both research and speculative, on the single problem of the survival of the human self following bodily death. The object would be the formulation of a rational theory on the survival of the self beyond death. Gnosis has offered itself as a point of unification and discussion of survival in a context of objectivity and free from what is considered the ''irrationality'' of magic and religious dogmatism.

The Gnosis program has four main areas: Observation (primarily in philosophy, anthropology, and history of religions); analysis (parapsychology); critical elaboration (using material from other sciences), and experimental work investigating such phenomena as out-of-the-body travel, trance, hypnosis, etc.

Gnosis publishes a triannual journal, Quaderni Gnosis, and holds an annual convention. It is headquartered at via Belvedere 87, 80127, Napoli, Italy. Its website is at http://www.agora.stm.it.gnosis/wmoremt.htm.

Sources:

Gnosis Association for Multidisciplinary Research on the Hypothesis of Survival. http://www.agora.stm.it.gnosis/wmoremt.htm. April 19, 2000.

Gnostica

Bimonthly journal that appeared through the 1970s and covered all aspects of the contemporary occult scene. It was edited by Carl L. Weschcke and was published by Llewellyn Publications, 213 4th St., St. Paul, Minnesota 55101.

During a brief time in the 1980s Gnostica was superseded by Llewellyn's New Times, which has also ceased publication.

Gnostic Alchemical Church of Typhon—Christ

The Gnostic Alchemical Church of Typhon—Christ is a thelemic magick group that came into existence in the 1990s as a result of the publication of the English Qabala. The English Qabala is a system of numerical correspondences developed in the 1970s by British thelemite Jim Lees and a small group of associates with whom he shared his original findings. The English Qabala begins with the assignment of numerical values to each letter of the English alphabet as is done in ordinary numerology. It differs in the method of arriving at the numerical value assigned.

Lees assigned the letter ''A'' the value of 1. He then counted 11 letters and arrived at the letter ''L,'' which was assigned the numerical value of 2. Eleven letters further brought him to ''W.'' He continued that process through the alphabet, starting back at the beginning each time he got to the end. The result was an alphabet ordered thusly: A L W H S D O Z K V G R C N Y J U F Q B M X I T E P

Each letter was assigned a value from 1 (A) to 26 (P). Using these new values in a manner similar to the way that the values of the Hebrew alphabet are applied by Kabbalists to the Bible, thelemites began a new look at The Book of the Law, the holy book of the movement launched by magician Aleister Crowley early in the twentieth century and now divided into several dozen organizations.

In its choice of name, the Gnostic Alchemical Church affirms its alignment with Gnosticism and the ancient esoteric tradition that dates to the second century C.E. and has been revived in modern theosophy and magic. By gnosis, the church means the direct knowledge/experience that individuals have of the divine. It seeks to further gnosis (wisdom) by reference to the revelations that have come and continue to appear in the English Qabala and The Book of the Law.

The church differs from many thelemite groups in its offering members access to rituals (both public and private) designed to be used at moments of major astrological conjunctions. In astrological thought, the close proximity of two planets allows the energies of the two planets to join. For members of the Gnostic Alchemical Church, rituals are particularly effective during the conjunctions of the Sun and Venus, the Sun and Mercury, and the Sun in Jupiter. These rituals lead the individual to what is termed "Ordeal X," a high magical initiation.

The Gnostic Alchemical Church of Typhon-Christ has branches in France, England, Canada, and the United States. It supports an Internet site at http://www.geocities.com/Area51/Stargate/7770/, and it may be contacted through the site.

Sources:

Gnostic Alchemical Church of Typhon-Christ. http://www.geocities.com/Area51/Stargate/7770/. May 20, 2000.

Gnostic Association of Cultural and Anthropological Studies

The Gnostic Association of Cultural and Anthropological Studies was one of the largest occult groups to operate among Spanish-speaking people. It was founded in 1952 by Samuel Aun Weor (d. 1977), a native of Colombia. Weor studied with German esotericist Arnold Krumm Heller, a leader in the Ordo Templi Orientis. Over the years Weor became an accomplished esotericist and teacher and began to write books in Spanish. His central teachings appeared in his 1961 volume, The Perfect Matrimony.

Weor sought to synthesize the many occult, magical, and yogic materials he had absorbed, resulting in a system of occult sexuality. He believed that humanity could be redeemed by the transmutation of sexual energies and that God manifests as both Father (knowledge) and Mother (love). The "perfect marriage" occurs when two people who know how to love unite. Individuals could transform themselves into gods with the fire of love. Weor taught that during the sexual act, individuals are charged with universal magnetism. The true white magician practices what is known as karazza and ends the union before any semen is spilled. Transmuting the creative energies, so that orgasm does not occur and therefore semen is not released, is equated with the committing of an act of sexual magic. The success of the magic is experienced by the awakening of the kundalini energy, which is pictured as stored at the base of the spine, which then travels up the spine. When it reaches the brain, individual consciousness awakens.

The association spread first through South and Central America, then traveled to Spain and Portugal before it penetrated Europe. It came to New York and Los Angeles in the 1970s and spread across the United States in the Spanish-speaking communities. Through the 1970s and 1980s, many of Weor's books were translated into English and other languages. An English language periodical, The Gnostic Arhat, was begun in 1987. The first international congress of the association occurred in 1986 in Montreal. Last known address: P.O. Box 291488, Los Angeles, CA 90029.

Sources:

Almarez, Anita Ford. Simple Introduction to the Ancient Science of Gnosis. Chicago: Gnostic Association, n.d.

Weor, Samuel Aun Weor. Manual of Practical Magic. Los Angeles: Gnostic Association, 1988.

———. Manual of Revolutionary Psychology. Los Angeles: Gnostic Association, 1987.

———. The Perfect Matrimony. New York: Adonai Editorial, 1980.

Gnostic Catholic Church

The Gnostic Catholic Church is a contemporary occult church generally associated with the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) and the thelemic magical tradition. It exists as one faction of the Nouvelle Église Gnostique Universelle founded in 1890 by Jules-Benoit Doinel (1842–1902). Around 1890 Doinel had a mystical encounter with the Virgin Mary and was consecrated as a bishop by Jesus Christ. He in turn assumed the role of patriarch of the new church. In the four years remaining in his life he consecrated four bishops, each of whom began as the head of separate lineages and from which several dozen small jurisdictions have sprung, most teaching a form of Gnostic Christianity.

In 1892, Gerard Encausse, known publicly as Papus, accepted consecration as a bishop in Doinel's church. Through Papus, the church entered the milieu of the German and British occult orders. While Papus remained loyal to one faction of the church following its initial schism in 1908, as a bishop he possessed authority to consecrate others as he saw fit. It is claimed by some that he in fact consecrated both Theodor Reuss and Aleister Crowley, the Outer Heads of the Order of the Ordo Templi Orientis, but documentation is lacking.

What is known is that Crowley wrote a Gnostic mass that embodied thelemic teachings in a liturgy that while following much of the form of the Roman Catholic Mass was definitely not Christian in any perceptible manner. In 1917 Reuss translated that mass into German. At that time he described himself as the Head of the Gnostic Neo-Christians. He also spoke of himself as the Swiss legate of the Église Gnostique Universelle, the faction of Doinel's original church to which Papus was aligned. That church was headed by Jean Baptiste Bricaud (1881–1934), reportedly consecrated by Papus in 1911. He would later accept several additional consecrations. Bricaud also advocated the use of Crowley's mass in Freemason circles, but his efforts were turned back.

Toward the end of Crowley's life and during the years of the leadership of the Ordo Templi Orientis by Crowley's successor, Karl Johannes Germer, the order dwindled almost to the point of nonexistence. The issue of the Gnostic Catholic Church and the performance of the Gnostic mass was put aside. Then in 1957 in Switzerland, Hermann Joseph Metzer, a local leader in the OTO, accepted consecration as a bishop of the Gnostic Catholic Church from Herbert Fritsche (1911–1960) of the Doinel factions. He succeeded Frische as patriarch of that church in 1960. In 1963, following Germer's death, he held an election among the German OTO leaders and proclaimed himself as the new international Outer Head of the Order of the OTO. He then moved to create an integrated system that included both the OTO and the Gnostic Catholic Church.

In the 1970s, the OTO in America revived under the leadership of Grady McMurtry as its caliph. It was asserted that the Outer Head of the Order was also the patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church and that McMurtry had an implied consecration through the same emergency documents by which he assumed leadership of the American OTO after Germer's death. This assertion made McMurtry's role as head of the church extremely tenuous, being based on both an undocumented consecration of Crowley by Papus and the unstate consecration of McMurtry by Crowley. McMurtry's successor, William Breeze, has largely laid the controversy over the church to rest by his reception of the consecration of Jack Hogg, a bishop of the Gnostic Church of Thelema, whose lineage can be traced to Doinel. However, it has also been enriched by the lineage of Joseph René Vilatte through the American Catholic Church. The American Catholic Church adopted a theosophical theological position in the middle of the twentieth century. All ninth-degree members of the American OTO are now considered bishops in the Gnostic Catholic Church and its head as the church's patriarch.

Sources:

Anson, Peter. Bishops at Large. London: Faber and Faber, 1964.

Koenig, Peter R. "Hermann Joseph Metzger—OHO of the O.T.O. and Patriarch of the Gnostic Catholic Church." http://www.cyberlink.ch/~koenig/bishops.htm. April 23, 2000.

———. "Stranded Bishops." http://www.cyberlink.ch/~koenig/bishops.htm. April 23, 2000.

Ward, Gary L., Bertil Persson, and Alan Bain, eds. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit: Apogee Press, 1990.

Gnosticism

Gnosticism, from the Greek "Gnosis," meaning "to know," refers to a number of different groups in the second century C.E. Roots of the movement are evident in the Christian New Testament writings of the first century; they drew on various Pagan, Jewish, and occult ideas current in the Mediterranean Basin. Some have seen the roots of Gnosticism in the writings of Apollonius of Tyana and the biblical magician Simon Magus, mentioned in Acts 8:9–24. However, the emergence of gnostic thinking is seen most clearly in passages such as the opening verses of the Gospel of John, Paul's epistle to the Collossians 2:18, and I John 4:1, where gnostic themes are denounced.

Among some of the Gnostics, a priesthood of the mysteries existed and these initiated priests practiced magic, astrology, incantations, exorcisms, the fashioning of charms, talismans, and amulets, of which many are in museums and special collections. These priests were viewed as heretics by the church, which in the second and third century struggled to separate itself from them. Upon gaining control of the Roman Empire, Christian leaders periodically suppressed Gnostic groups and occasionally these movements provided the ideology for revolutionary groups.

Manicheism, a later movement of Gnosticism that emphasized its dualistic tendencies, was founded by a prophet named Mani (216–276 C.E.), who was noted for his skill in astrology, medicines, and magic.

The most notable gnostic teacher was Valentinus, a second-century Alexandrian who moved to Rome around 140 C.E. He became a teacher in the church of Rome before being expelled as a heretic. He continued to teach as a rival of the church for the next two decades. His major literary production was the Gospel of Truth, known only from quote in Christian polemical writings until a copy was discovered in the Egyptian desert in the twentieth century.

Magical and Occult Element in Gnosticism

The Carpocratians, one of the Gnostic sects, seem to have derived some of their mysteries and rites from Isis worship, and used theurgic incantations, symbols, and signs. The Ophites also adapted Egyptian rites, and, as their name indicates, these included serpent symbolism, an actual serpent being the central object of their mysteries. Marcos, a disciple of Valentinus, and founder of the Marcian sect, reportedly celebrated Mass with two chalices, pouring wine from the larger into a smaller, and on pronouncing a magical formula, the vessel was filled with a liquor like blood. Other sects practiced divination and prophecy by using female somnambules. Some of the sects engaged in rituals of a sexual nature.

The Gnostic talismans were mostly engraved on gems, the color and traditional qualities of the jewel being part of its magical efficacy. They used spells and charms and mystic formulas, said to "loose fetters, to cause blindness in one's enemies, to procure dreams, to gain favor, to encompass any desire whatsoever."

In a Greek Gnostic papyrus the following spell of Agathocles for producing dreams was found:

"Take a cat, black all over, and which has been killed; prepare a writing tablet, and write the following with a solution of myrrh, and the dream which thou desirest to be sent, and put in the mouth of the cat. The text to be transcribed runs: 'Keimi, Keimi, I am the Great One, in whose mouth rests Mommom, Thoth, Nauumbre, Karikha, Kenyro, Paarmiathon, the sacred Ian icê ieu aêoi, who is above the heaven, Amekheumen, Neunana, Seunana, Ablanathanalba,' [here follow further names, then] 'Put thyself in connection with N.N. in this matter [as to the substance of the dream named] but if it is necessary then bring for me N.N. hither by thy power; lord of the whole world, fiery god, put thyself in connexion with N.N. . . . Hear me, for I shall speak the great name, Thoth! whom each god honours, and each demon fears, by whose command every messenger performs his mission. Thy name answers to the seven (vowels) a, e, ê, i, o, u, ô, iauoeêaô oueê ôia. I named thy glorious name, the name for all needs. Put thyself in connection with N.N., Hidden One, God, with respect to this name, which Apollobex also used.'&43"

The repetition/chanting of various syllables, otherwise apparently meaningless, was always held to be of great efficacy in magical rites, either as holding the secret name of the powers invoked, or of actual power in themselves. A similar practice, japa yoga, may be found in Hinduism with the repetition of mantras.

In Atanasi's Magic Papyrus, Spell VII directs one to place the link of a chain upon a leaden plate, and having traced its outline, to write around the circumference the common Gnostic legend in Greek characters (reading both ways) continuously. Within the circle should be written the nature of what was to be prevented. The operation was called "The Ring of Hermes." The link was then to be folded up on the leaden plate, and thrown into the grave of one dead before his time, or else into a disused well. After the formula was to follow in Greek: "Prevent thou such and such a person from doing such and such a thing"—a proof that the string of epithets all referred to the same power.

These instances might be multiplied, although much of the Gnostic teachings were lost as the gnostic lost out in the religious struggles of the era. Gnosticism was passed on through the centuries in various groups usually described as heretical groups such as the Cathars and Bogomils. It reemerged in the late Middle Ages in alchemy and the kabala. With the rise of Rosicrucianism and nineteenth-century Theosophy, it became well established in the emerging pluralistic culture and has enjoyed a new life in the New Age movement.

Many of the lost gnostic texts were recovered in 1945 in the accidental discovery of a fourth-century gnostic library in the Egyptian desert at Nag Hammadi. Many complete copies of books, such as the Gospel of Truth, previously known only from a few surviving quotes in other books, were discovered intact. This discovery has stimulated modern gnostic studies, and one book, The Gospel of Thomas, a collection of lost sayings attributed to Jesus, has been adopted as holy writ by several contemporary gnostic churches.

Sources:

Doresse, Jean. The Secret Books of the Egyptian Gnostics. London: Hollis and Carter, 1960. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1972.

Hedrick, Charles W., and Robert Hodgson, Jr., eds. Nag Hammadi, Gnosticism, and Early Christianity. Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson Publishers, 1986.

Lacarriere, Jacques. The Gnostics. London: Peter Owen, 1977.

Mead, G. R. S. Fragments of a Faith Forgotten. London, 1931. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1964.

———. Pistis Sophia; A Gnostic Miscellany. London, 1921. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Robinson, James, ed. The Nag Hammadi Library in English. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988.

Rudolph, Kurt. Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987.

Gnostic Order of Christ

The Gnostic Order of Christ is the largest of several organizations, that was formally founded in 1988, visibly emerged in the mid-1990s from the remnants of the Holy Order of MANS. The Holy Order of MANS was founded in the 1960s by Fr. Paul Blighton, a former engineer who spent much of his life considering the problem of the relationship between science and religion. The end result was a new ordered community modeled on a Roman Catholic religious order but following an esoteric Christian theology. The Holy Order was effectively dissolved in 1986 when it merged into a small Eastern Orthodox jurisdiction, the Greek Orthodox Missionary Archdiocese of Vasiloupolis.

Many of the scattered members of the former Holy Order began to communicate with each other and one group who felt called upon to continue its work organized the Gnostic Order of Christ in 1988. Instrumental in the creation of the Gnostic Order was Timothy D. Harris. Harris was an original member of the Holy Order, having joined the Science of Man Church that had preceded it. He was initiated by Blighton as a master teacher and in 1970 was given the rites of ordination. In 1972, Fr. Timothy left the Holy Order and became a private teacher of metaphysics. In 1984 he received consecration as a bishop from an independent Old Catholic bishop. Also instrumental in the founding of the new Gnostic Order was Jessica Catherine Burkhouse. She took her life vows with the Holy Order in 1978. As Sister Jessica, she worked with the Immaculate Heart Sisters of Mary, a female suborder within the Holy Order. She was ordained as a master teacher in the Holy Order. Within the new Gnostic Order, she has worked to reestablish the sisterhood as the Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary.

The Gnostic Order is an esoteric order community that follows the teachings and practice of the former Holy Order. It has a theology built on Hermetic principles and follows a life of ordered service. Members of the order accept the Master Jesus as a universal teacher, but also accept the validity of all spiritual paths and the sacred writings of all the great religions as sacred literature. Bishop Timothy facilitated Burkhouse and the other former master teacher who joined in the formation of the Gnostic Order receiving similar episcopal consecration to his own.

The teachers of the Gnostic Order are now scattered across the United States. Headquarters have been established at P.O. Box 8660, San Jose, CA 95155-8660. The order has a website at http://www.gnostic.net/.

Sources:

Gnostic Order of Christ. http://www.gnostic.net/. May 13, 2000.

Goat

The devil was frequently represented as a goat, and as such presided over the witches' Sabbat. The goat was also the "emblem of sinful men at the day of judgment." (See also Baphomet; she-goat; witchcraft)

Goblin

A spirit formerly supposed to lurk in houses. Goblins were generally of a mischievous and grotesque nature. Hobgoblins, according to Junius, were so called because they used to hop on one leg. (See also fairies)

God (in Occult Perspective)

According to the ancient magical conception of God in the scheme of the universe, evil is the inevitable contrast and complement of good. God permits the existence of the shadow in order that it may intensify the purity of the light. He has created both and they are thus inseparable, the one being necessary to and incomprehensible without the other.

The very idea of goodness loses its meaning if considered apart from that of evil—Gabriel is a foil to Satan and Satan to Gabriel. The dual nature of the spiritual world penetrates into every department of life, material and spiritual. It is typified in light and darkness, cold and heat, truth and error, in brief, the names of any two opposing forces will serve to illustrate the primary law of nature—namely, the continual conflict between the positive or good and the negative or evil.

For a scriptural illustration of this point, the story of Cain and Abel can be used. The moral superiority of his brother is at first irksome to Cain, finally intolerable. He murders Abel, thus bringing on his own head the wrath of God and the self-punishment of the murderer. For in killing Abel, Cain has done himself harm. Cain has not done away with Abel's superiority, but has added to himself a burden of guilt that can end only by much suffering.

Suffering is shown in the Judaeo-Christian scriptures to be one means evil is overcome by good. Cain reappears in the story of the prodigal son, who after deprivation and suffering is restored to his father who forgives him fully and freely.

It is believed that the possibility of sin and error is consistent with and inseparable from life. The great sinner is a more vital being than the colorless character, because having greater capacity for evil he has also greater capacity for good, and in proportion to his faults so will his virtues be when he turns to God. "There is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons," because more force of character, more power for good or evil is displayed by the sinner than by the feebly correct. And that power is the most precious thing in life. The apostle Paul specifically rejected this approach to understanding sin and redemption in Romans 6: 1-2.

This dual law of right and wrong, two antagonistic forces, is designated by the term "duad." It is the secret of life and the revelation of that secret means death. This secret is embodied in the myth of the Tree of Knowledge in Genesis. At death the discord will be resolved, but not until then.

From the duad is derived the triad based on the doctrine of the Trinity. Two forces producing equilibrium, the secret of nature, are designated by the duad, and these three—life, good, and evil—constitute one law. By adding the conception of unity to the triad the tetrad is produced, the perfect number of four, the source of all numerical combinations.

According to orthodox theology there are three persons in God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, and these three form one Deity. In occult speculations, three and one make four, the fourth reality being the unity required to explain the Three. Hence, it is suggested, in many languages (most notably Hebrew), the name of God is symbolized by four letters. Again, two affirmations make two negations either possible or necessary. According to the Kabalists the name of the Evil one consisted of the same four letters spelled backward, signifying that evil is merely the reflection or shadow of good—"The last reflection or imperfect mirage of light in shadow." Everything exists in light or darkness, good or evil, and exists through the tetrad. The triad or trinity, then, is explained by the duad and resolved by the tetrad.

Such occult interpretations of God echo the ancient mysticism such as the Eastern religion of Hinduism, where the pairs of opposites like good and evil are regarded as twin poles of a larger reality, where anthropomorphic concepts of God the creator are considered legal fictions for a divine infinity, beyond time, space, and causality.

Sources:

Achad, Frater. The Anatomy of the Body of God. Chicago: Collegium ad Spiritum Sanctum, 1925.

Akiba ben Joseph Rabbi. The Book of Formation. (Sepher Yetzirah). London: William Rider, 1923.

Angeles, Peter A. The Problem of God; A Short Introduction. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1981.

Arya, Ushbarbudh. God. Honesdale, Pa.: Himalayan International Institute, 1979.

Brightman, Edgar S. The Problem of God. New York: Abingdon Press, 1930.

Goblet D'Alviella, E. F. Lectures on the Origin and Growth of the Conception of God. London, 1892. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1982.

Pereira, Jose, ed. Hindu Theology: A Reader. Garden City, N.Y.: Image Books, 1976.

Godfrey (or Gaufridi) (d. 1611)

A priest of Provence, France, who was accused of seducing several women, one of them a nun. To save herself the nun asserted that Godfrey had bewitched her. Arrested and imprisoned, Godfrey was tortured until he confessed that he was a magician and that he had, through his breathing and other enchantments, corrupted the woman and several more. He was even induced, in his extreme agony, to speak of his presence at the witches' Sabbat and to give a long description of it.

After these confessions had been extorted from the priest, the Parliament of Aix-en-Provence condemned him. On April 30, 1611, Godfrey was burned alive as guilty of magic, sorcery, impiety, and abominable lust. This horrible affair gave rise to an adventure related by the abbé of Papon:

"The process contained many depositions upon the power of the demons. Several witnesses protested that after being anointed with a magic oil, Godfrey transported himself to the Sabbat, and afterwards returned to his chamber down the shaft of the chimney. One day, when these depositions had been read to the Parliament, and the imagination of the judges excited by a long recital of supernatural events, there was heard in the chimney an extraordinary noise, which suddenly terminated with the apparition of a tall black man. The judges thought it was the devil come to the rescue of his disciple, and fled away swiftly, with the exception of a councillor Thorton, their reporter, who finding himself entangled in his desk, could not follow them. Terrified by what he saw, with trembling body and staring eyes, and repeatedly making the sign of the cross, he in his turn affrighted the pretended demon, who was at a loss to understand the magistrate's perturbation. Recovering from the embarrassment he made himself known, and proved to be a chimney sweeper who, after having swept the chimney of the Messieurs des Comptes, whose chimneys joined those of the Tournelle, had by mistake descended into the chamber of the Parliament."

(For further details, see entry on Louis Gaufridi, the name by which the notorious priest is better known.)

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (1749–1832)

Probably the most celebrated of all German writers. Goethe had strong interest in mysticism and occult subjects. He was born at Frankfurt-on-Main, August 28, 1749. His father was a lawyer of some eminence. At an early age the boy showed a persistent fondness for drawing and learned with surprising ease. In 1759 a French nobleman of aesthetic tastes came to stay with the Goethes, and a warm friendship developed between him and the future author. The friendship accelerated young Goethe's intellectual development.

Shortly after this, a French theater was founded at Frankfurt, and there Goethe became conversant with the plays of Racine; he also made some early attempts at original writing and began to learn Italian, Latin, Greek, English, and Hebrew.

He soon moved from his native town to Leipzig, where he entered the university, intending to become a lawyer. At Leipzig, Goethe showed little affection for the actual curriculum; instead he continued in essay writing and drawing and even took lessons in etching. He also found time for a love affair, but this was cut short in 1768 when he developed a serious illness. On his recovery he decided to leave Leipzig and go to Strasbourg.

There he became friendly with Jung-Stilling (see Johann Heinrich Jung), and his taste for letters was strengthened, Homer and Ossian being his favorites among the masters. Although he continued to appear indifferent to the study of law, he succeeded in becoming an advocate in 1771 and returned to Frankfurt.

Goethe had already written a quantity of verse and prose, and he began to write critiques for some of the newspapers in Frankfurt. At the same time he started writing Goetz von Berlichingen and Werther. These works were soon followed by Prometheus, and in 1774 the author began working on Faust.

The following year saw the production of some of Goethe's best love poems, written for Lilli Schönemann, daughter of a Frankfurt banker. Nothing more than poetry, however, resulted from this new devotion. Scarcely had it come and gone before Goethe's whole life was changed, for his writings had become famous. As a result the young duke Carl August of Weimar, anxious for a trusty page, invited the rising author to his court. The invitation was accepted. Goethe became a member of the privy council; subsequently he was raised to the rank of Geheimrat (privy counselor) and then ennobled.

Goethe's life at Weimar was a very busy one. Trusted implicitly by the duke, he directed the construction of public roads and buildings, attended to military and academic affairs, and founded a court theater. As occupied as he was, he continued to write voluminously. Among the most important works he produced during his first years at the duke's court were Iphigenie and Wilhelm Meister.

In 1787 he had a lengthy stay in Italy, visiting Naples, Pompeii, Rome, and Milan. Returning to Weimar, he began writing Egmont. In 1795 he made the acquaintance of poet and dramatist Friedrich von Schiller, with whom he quickly became friendly and with whom he worked on the Horen, a journal designed to elevate the literary tastes of the masses.

About this period, too, Goethe wrote his play Hermann und Dorothea and also began translating Voltaire, Diderot, and Benvenuto Cellini.

(For an account of a strange psychic experience at Weimar, when Goethe saw the projected double of a friend, see double.)

The year 1806 was a significant one in Goethe's life, marked by his marriage and also by the entry of Napoleon into Weimar. The conquering general and the German poet found much in each other to admire, and Napoleon decorated Goethe with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

In 1811 Goethe wrote Dichtung und Wahrheit, Wilhelm Meister's Wanderjahre; in 1821 he began working at a second part of Faust. During this time he had two famous visitors—Beethoven from Vienna and Thackeray from London. Although the composer thought himself coldly received, the novelist spoke with enthusiasm of the welcome accorded him. Goethe was then well advanced in years, however, and his health was beginning to fail. He died March 22, 1832.

Few great writers—not even Disraeli or Sir Walter Scott—had fuller lives than Goethe. His love affairs, besides those mentioned here, were many, and his early taste for the graphic arts continued to the end of his days, resulting in a vast collection of treasures.

His interest in mysticism manifested itself in various forms besides the writing of Faust. With a temperament aspiring to the unattainable, Goethe's mind was essentially a speculative one. During his childhood at Frankfurt he did symbolic drawings of the soul's aspirations to the deity, and he later became immersed in the study of the Christian religion. Eventually he grew skeptical on this subject, his ideas being altered not only by his own ruminations but by reading various iconoclastic philosophers, especially Rousseau. Later his intellect was seemingly less engaged by Christianity than by ancient Eastern faiths, as demonstrated by some of his works, notably Westöstliche Divan.

One of his notebooks shows that, while a young man at Strasbourg, Goethe made a close study of Giordano Bruno and other early scientists. As a boy he was a keen student of alchemy, reading deeply in Welling, Jean Baptiste van Helmont, Basil Valentine, and Paracelsus, and even fitting up a laboratory where he spent long hours in arduous experiments. No doubt it was while thus engaged that Goethe first conceived the idea of writing a drama on the subject of Faust, and his alchemistic and other scientific research certainly proved advantageous when he was composing that work.

The story's main outlines are visible in Calderon's and Marlowe's versions, as well as in the operas of Gounod, Schumann, and Berlioz. It is mainly because of Faust that Goethe is considered a great mystic, for his rendering of the immortal theme is acknowledged as among the finest in the whole of mystical literature.

Sources:

Cottrell, Alan P., ed. Goethe's Faust: Seven Essays. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1976.

Davidson, Thomas. Philosophy of Goethe's Faust. Boston, 1906. Reprint, Haskell, 1969.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von. The Autobiography of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. 2 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

Gray, Ronald D. Goethe, the Alchemist: A Study of Alchemical Symbolism in Goethe's Literary & Scientific Works. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1952. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1979.

Lewes, George H. The Life of Goethe. London, 1864. Reprint, Norwood Editions, 1979.

Reed, T. J. Goethe. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Steiner, Rudolph. Goethe's Conception of the World. Reprint, Brooklyn: Haskell, 1972.

———. The Theory of Knowledge Implicit in Goethe's World Conception. Hudson, N.Y.: Anthroposophic Press, 1978.

Goldberg, Bruce (1948–)

Bruce Edward Goldberg, a dentist who developed a practice in hypnotherapy, was born on November 18, 1948, in New York City. He attended Southern Connecticut State College, where he graduated magna cum laude in 1970 with a B.A. in chemistry and biology. He completed his dentistry degree in 1974 at the University of Maryland. Before opening a practice he did a year of work in hypnotherapy with the American Society of Clinical Hypnosis. In 1976 he opened both a dentistry and hypnotherapy practice in Baltimore which he continued through the 1980s. As he concentrated more and more on his hypnosis work, he attended Loyola College and earned his master's degree in counseling and psychology. After moving to Los Angeles, California, in 1989, he abandoned his dentistry career and has since been a full-time hypnotherapist.

His work with hypnotherapy had two aspects, the assisting of his patients with their personal problems, and the exploration of some of the phenomena of hypnosis that emerge in the reports of previous incarnations. Such reports have been quite common in the past generation. However, from his training in psychology, he made a systematic study of the material he evoked from his clients. Along with regressing patients into the past, he also progressed them into the future. Though the subject of progressive hypnosis had been broached in previous publications, his 1982 book, Past Lives, Future Lives, was the first book-length study of the phenomena. The book was a popular success, was translated into a number of languages, and established Goldberg as one of the leading psychologists studying reincarnation.

In 1990 Goldberg became the president of the Los Angeles Academy of Clinical Hypnosis. He is also a life member of the Association for Past Life Research and Therapy. Through the 1990s, he has authored a string of books exploring a variety of issues in hypnosis therapy and reincarnation, including a set of small books issued by Llewellyn Publications in 1998 and 1999.

Sources:

Goldberg, Bruce. Astral Voyages. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1998.

———. New Age Hypnosis. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1998.

——— Past Lives, Future Lives: Accounts of Regression and Progression through Hypnosis. North Hollywood, Calif.: Newcastle, 1982. Reprint, New York: Ballantine, 1988.

———. Peaceful Transition. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1997.

———. The Search for Grace: A Documented Case of Murder and Reincarnation. Sedona, Ariz.: The Author, 1994. Reprint, St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1997.

Golden Age

Golden Age is one of several prominent periodicals serving the metaphysical and post-New Age spiritual community in Australia. A full-color periodical that covers a wide range of current topics across the spectrum of personal psychic and spiritual development and holistic health, it has begun to find an international audience. Though retaining an Australian focus, it is distributed in North America.

Each issue of the Golden Age is built around a set of feature articles of interest to the post-New Age spiritual community. Regular topics include astrology, psychic and spiritual realities, the wisdom of ancient cultures, UFOs, and various health alternatives. Descriptions of various development centers inform readers of the range of options in the world of alternative spiritualities in Australia. The Golden Age views itself as providing a full range of perspectives on Truth. It sees its readership as those who have chosen to take responsibility for their own spirituality and progress. To those it attempts to offer inspiration and upliftment.

While not designed as a networking magazine, the Golden Age carries a wide range of advertisements from different organizations and movements, from Spiritualist and theosophical centers to the headquarters of various Eastern teachers. Numerous psychic counselors, spiritual healers, and divinatory readers offer their services through the magazine.

Golden Age is published by Merlin Publications, P.O. Box 146, Highbury, South Australia 5089.

Sources:

Golden Age. Highbury, South Australia, n.d.

Golden Dawn, Hermetic Order of the Fountainhead of the modern revival of ceremonial magic. As a secret order it attracted some of the most interesting and talented personalities of its time, including poet William Butler Yeats, Annie Horniman (who sponsored the Abbey Theatre, Dublin), Florence Farr (mistress of G. B. Shaw), S. L. MacGregor Mathers, Aleister Crowley, Israel Regardie, A. E. Waite, Algernon Blackwood, Arthur Machen, Violet Firth, and many others.

The order dated from the discovery in 1887 of a cipher manuscript, bought from a bookstall in Farringdon Road, London, by William Wynn Westcott. He was a coroner and a member of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (Rosicrucian Society of Freemasons). Westcott deciphered the manuscript, which contained a series of mystical rituals. With the aid of his occultist friend MacGregor Mathers, these rituals were expanded and systematized. Also among the pages of the manuscript was a slip of paper with the address of Fräulein Anna Sprengel, a Rosicrucian adept living in Germany.

Reportedly, Westcott corresponded with Sprengel, who authorized him to found an English branch of the occult society Die Goldene Dämmerung (The Golden Dawn). It has been suggested, however, that Sprengel did not exist and that Westcott fabricated the correspondence to establish the new secret order.

The Isis-Urania Temple of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn was established in London in 1888, with Westcott, Mathers, and W. R. Woodman (another occultist Freemason) as chiefs. Between 1888 and 1896 the Osiris Temple was formed at Weston-super-Mare, Somerset; the Horus Temple at Bradford, Yorkshire; the Amen-Ra Temple at Edinburgh, Scotland; and the Ahathoor Temple in Paris. A total of 315 initiations took place during this period.

The Golden Dawn consisted of ten main grades, associated with the symbolism of the Kabala: zelator 10°=100°, theoricus 20°=90°, practicus 30°=80°, philosophus 40°=70°, adeptus minor 50°=60°, adeptus major 60°=50°, adeptus exemptus 70°=40°, magister templi 80°=30°, magus 90°=20°, and ipsissimus 100°=10°.

Selected candidates who passed the adeptus minor grade might qualify for admission to a secret second order—the Ordo Rosae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis (Order of the Red Rose and Cross of Gold). Behind the second order loomed the so-called secret chiefs, equivalent to the fabled mahatmas of the Theosophical Society. These chiefs might be contacted on the astral plane.

The complex rituals of the order were partially revealed in the journal The Equinox by Aleister Crowley, who joined the Golden Dawn in November 1898 and left early in 1900. A more detailed record of the teaching, rites, and ceremonies was later published by Israel Regardie in four volumes (1937–40).

Although the rituals of the Golden Dawn were little more than a rather complicated Freemasonry embroidered with occult symbolism, the special studies related to them developed the individual's insight into occultism and mysticism. The poet W. B. Yeats placed a high value on his magic studies with the order and once wrote, "If I had not made magic my constant study I could not have written a single word of my Blake book, nor would The Countess Kathleen have ever come to exist."

Yeats played a prominent part in a conflict with Aleister Crowley, who tried to take over the London lodge in 1900. Crowley was expelled from the Golden Dawn, and Yeats took charge of the Rosae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis and also became imperator of the Isis-Urania Temple Outer Order. Crowley eventually founded his own order (the A∴A∴) in 1905, using material he had first encountered in the Golden Dawn.

The Golden Dawn continued to fragment as leadership of the various branches changed hands and new orders were formed. Several Golden Dawn offshoots are still in existence; possibly the most substantive is the Los Angeles–based Builders of the Adytum. In addition several new groups have organized, in part to offer an alternative to the magic practiced in those groups that derive from Aleister Crowley.

Sources:

Colquhoun, Ithell. The Sword of Wisdom: MacGregor Mathers and the Golden Dawn. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1975.

Gilbert, Robert A. The Golden Dawn: Twilight of the Magicians. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

Harper, George Mills. Yeats's Golden Dawn. New York: Macmillan, 1974.

Howe, Ellic. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London, 1972.

King, Francis. Astral Projection, Ritual Magic & Alchemy: Being Hitherto Unpublished Gold Dawn Material. London: Neville Spearman, 1971.

———. Ritual Magic in England (1887 to the Present Day). London, 1970.

Regardie, Israel. The Golden Dawn. 4 vols. Chicago: Aries Press, 1937–40. Reprint, St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1989.

———. What You Should Know About the Golden Dawn. Phoenix: Falcon Press, 1983.

Roberts, Marie. British Poets and Secret Societies. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble, 1986.

S.M.R.D., Frater, et al. The Secret Workings of the Golden Dawn: Book "T" the Tarot. Cheltenham, England: Helios Book Service, 1967.

Torrens, Robert George. The Inner Teachings of the Golden Dawn. London: Neville Spearman, 1969.

———. Secret Rituals of the Golden Dawn. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1973.

Wang, Robert. An Introduction of the Golden Dawn Tarot. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1978.

Wang, Robert, and Chris Zalewski. Z-Five: Secret Teachings of the Golden Dawn. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1991.

Zalewski, Patrick J. Golden Dawn Enochian Magic. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1990.

———. Secret Inner Order Rituals of the Golden Dawn. Phoenix: Falcon Press, 1988.

Golden Dawn, Hermetic Order of the (1982)

The original Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (HOGD), founded in 1888, became the origin of magical activity of the twentieth century. Though short-lived, it members went on to found and lead groups that carried on its traditions. The main body of documents generated by the order have been published, beginnings with the several published by Aleister Crowley in his magazine Equinox. In the 1930s, Israel Regardie (1907–1985) oversaw the publication of the basic body of the HOGD rituals. In the meantime, the primary thrust of ceremonial magic continued through Crowley's thelemic teachings.

In the 1970s, contemporaneous with the revival of Crowley's Ordo Tempi Orientis, some magical students, including Chris Monnastre, began to seek a revival of the HOGD and turned to Regardie as a teacher in the tradition who was still available. He took in a few students to train them in the belief and practice of the HOGD. Then, in 1982, with Regardie's blessing, Monnastre resurrected the Golden Dawn and founded the Osiris Khenti Amenti Temple. Simultaneously, Regardie gave her several of his personal magical tools which she gave to the new order. The order exists in two divisions, the Golden Dawn and the Ordo Rosae Rubeae et Aureae.

Since the founding of the original temple, subsequent temples have been formed. The order has also brought together individuals and small groups possessing lineages and charters from the various groups evolving from the original HOGD, including the Stella Matutina and the Holy Order of the Golden Dawn (founded by writer Arthur Edward Waite). These groups have been brought together in the United Confederation of Independent and Autonomous Temples.

The new HOGD, one of several efforts to revive the Golden Dawn, has set itself against those revival groups that offer self-initiations or what are termed "astral" initiations. All ritual initiations for this group will be done in the physical presence of HOGD leaders.

The headquarters of the HOGD is at 270 N. Canon Dr., Ste. 1302, Beverly Hills, CA 90210. Website: http://www.magusbook.com.

Sources:

Regardie, Israel. The Golden Dawn. 4 vols. Chicago: Aries Press, 1937–40. Reprint, St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1971.

———. What You Should Know About the Golden Dawn. Phoenix, Ariz.: Falcon Press, 1983.

"Golden Key"

Many volumes have been published under this title purporting to reveal an infallible method of attaining success in a lottery. La Clef d'or, or La Véritable trésor de la fortune (1810), reprinted from time to time at Lille, Belgium, is based on the doctrine of sympathetic numbers, which the anonymous author claims to have discovered from study of the works of Cagliostro, Cornelius Agrippa, and others. Each number drawn, he declares, has five sympathetic numbers that directly follow it. For example, the number 4 has for its sympathetic numbers 30, 40, 50, 20, and 76. With this knowledge it is claimed to be an easy matter to win a lottery.

The Golden Path

Nonprofit organization founded in 1963 by psychic Irene Hughes to teach students to develop their psychic talents. It operated out of Chicago, Illinois, through the 1970s.

Goldney, Kathleen M(ary) H(ervey)

Noted British worker in the fields of psychical research and parapsychology. Goldney joined the Society for Psychical Research in 1927 and became a council member in 1943. She served as organizing secretary from 1949 to 1957.

Through the 1950s and 1960s Goldney worked on a number of notable research projects. She assisted S. G. Soal in his pioneer investigations into ESP with Basil Shackleton, and also investigated the celebrated haunting of Borley Rectory with Harry Price. She then collaborated with Eric J. Dingwall and Trevor Hall on their book The Haunting of Borley Rectory (1956), which raised doubts about the part played by Price. Goldney also discussed the evidence for charges that Sir William Crookes was misled or falsified his investigations into the mediumship of Florence Cook.

Sources:

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Goldney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54, 195 (March 1964).

Golem

An artificial man-monster of Jewish legend created from clay by a magic religious ceremony. The word golem was first used in talmudic references to the creation of Adam to indicate formless matter before the inception of a soul. Talmudic stories of the third and fourth centuries suggest that certain rabbis might have been able to create a manlike creature by magic that followed the divine process of creation. In medieval kabbalistic legends, such stories revolved around the symbolism of the Sepher Yetsirah (Book of Creation), in which numbers and letters are associated with parts of the body and astrological correspondences. Much of Western occult practice is related to such texts.

Jakob Grimm refers to such legends in his 1808 book Zeitung für Einsiedler (Journal for Hermits): "The Polish Jews, after having spoken certain prayers and observed certain Feast days, make the figure of a man out of clay or lime which, after they have pronounced the wonderworking Shem-ham-phorasch over it, comes to life. It is true this figure cannot speak, but it can understand what one says and commands it to do to a certain extent. They call it Golem and use it as a servant to do all sorts of housework; he may never go out alone. On his forehead the word Aemaeth (Truth; God) is written, but he increases from day to day and can easily become larger and stronger than his house-comrades, however small he might have been in the beginning. Being then afraid of him, they rub out the first letters so that nothing remains but Maeth (he is dead), whereupon he sinks together and becomes clay again."

In the sixteenth century, such legends crystallized around Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague (ca. 1520–1609), who was said to have created a golem who not only worked as a servant but also saved the Jews from persecution arising from false accusations of ritual murders. The tomb of Rabbi Loew may still be visited in the old Jewish Cemetery of Prague in Czechoslovakia.

In the seventeenth century, such stories were recorded in a manuscript titled "Nifloet Mhrl" (Miracles of Rabbi Loew), which formed the basis of the enchanting Der Prager Golem of Chayim Bloch, translated into English by Harry Schneiderman as The Golem: Legends of the Ghetto of Prague, published in Vienna in 1925. The book contains photographs of the Altneuschul and the monument to Rabbi Loew in Prague. One of the legends related by Bloch is "The Golem as Water Carrier," and there is a tradition that this story inspired Goethe's ballad The Sorcerer's Apprentice during his visit to Prague.

The Prague legends also stimulated production of the German silent film Der Golem, directed by Henrik Galeen and Paul Wegener, released in 1915 and remade in 1920, as well as later Czech and French films on the same theme. It also seems likely that golem legends may have influenced British novelist Mary Shelley in the creation of her famous novel Frankenstein, first published in 1818. A later literary work influenced by the legend was the powerful occult novel The Golem, by Gustav Meyrink (1928).

Sources:

Bloch, Chayim. Der Prager Golem. Translated by Harry Schneiderman as The Golem: Legends of the Ghetto of Prague. Vienna, 1925.

Meyrink, Gustav [G. Meyer]. The Golem. London, 1928. Reprint, New York, 1964.

Scholem, Gershom G. On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism. New York: Schocken Books, 1965.

Sherwin, Byron L. The Golem Legend: Origins and Implications. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1985.

Wiesel, Elie. The Golem: The Story of a Legend. New York: Summit Books, 1983.

Winkler, Gershon. The Golem of Prague. New York: Judaica Press, 1980.

Goligher Circle

A small Spiritualist group in Ireland that became the subject of a series of experiments by Dr. W. J. Crawford. The circle was created from a poor Belfast family consisting of a father, four daughters, a son, and a son-in-law. The girls were all mediumistic, Kathleen Goligher (b. 1898) being the most noteworthy among them. The experiments lasted from 1914 until Crawford's death in 1920. For four years the family accepted no payment since Spiritualism was their religion. The séances were held in dim red light either in the Goligher home or in Crawford's house.

Six members of the family formed the circle, while Crawford retained liberty of movement for better observation and experiments. Communication with the invisible operators was maintained through raps. Kathleen only went into trance when prolonged discussion on the phenomena became necessary. The explanation then came through trance speaking.

Crawford wrote enthusiastically of the phenomena he witnessed and speculated broadly about its implication for understanding the nature of the world. Psychic researchers William Barrett and Whateley Carington witnessed the phenomena and also believed it real. Two years after Crawford's death, however, E. E. Fournier d'Albe sat with the circle and suggested fraud as the better explanation for the unusual manifestations. After his book appeared, Kathleen Goligher (by then Lady G. Donaldson) discontinued sittings for outside inquirers.

Sources:

Crawford, W. J. Experiments in Psychical Science: Levitation, "Contact," and the "Direct Voice." London: John M. Watkins, 1919.

———. The Psychic Structures at the Goligher Circle. London: John M. Watkins, 1921.

———. The Reality of Psychic Phenomena: Raps, Levitations, etc. 2nd ed. London: John M. Watkins, 1919.

D'Albe, E. E. Fournier. (Psychical Research). The Goligher Circle: May to August, 1921. London: John M. Watkins, 1922.

Gomes, Alair de Oliveira (1921–)

Brazilian engineer who wrote on parapsychological topics. He was born December 20, 1921, in Rio de Janeiro and was educated at the University of Brazil. Gomes was a contributor to the Brazilian Journal of Philosophy and published an article, "A Parapsicologia e um Problema Classico de Ciencia e Filosofia" (Parapsychology and a Classical Problem of Science and Philosophy), in the Bulletin of the Institute of Psychology of the University of Brazil in 1956.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Gonne, Edith Maud (1866–1953)

Edith Maud Gonne, a social activist and devotee of ritual magic, was born in Tongham, Surrey, England, into a wealthy family of wine merchants. In 1868 she moved to Ireland where her father was stationed with the British Army, and she developed a lifelong identification with her new home. In 1874, however, several years after her mother's death, she was sent to England to be cared for by relatives. The arrangement did not work out, and a short time later she wound up in France in the care of a very independent-minded governess. She grew into an attractive young woman and was the subject of constant male attention. Her father moved her several times to keep her from the notice of the Prince of Wales, a royal heir who had a reputation for womanizing.

One of the determining events in her life occurred in 1886 when one evening she quietly made a pact with the Devil. She agreed that in return for the ability to control her own life, the Devil could have her soul. Coincidentally, a few weeks later, her father passed away. Gonne decided to become an actress, but an illness prevented her debut on stage. She retired to France to recover and while there she met Lucien Millevoye, a French political activist who sought to win back Alsace-Lorraine, which France had lost in the Franco-Prussian War. Their relationship solidified Gonne's anti-British sentiment and transformed her into an activist for Irish independence. She also had a child with Millevoye in 1890, though the child died a year later.

In 1889 Gonne met William Butler Yeats, the Irish poet and member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (HOGD). In 1891 she joined the HOGD and over the next few years became an accomplished magician. She settled in Paris in the mid-1890s and in 1896 worked with Samuel L. MacGregor Mathers and his wife Moina Mathers in 1896 in their exploration of the Celtic magical tradition. She also began L'Association Irlanaise to work for Irish independence. Yeats joined her in several lecture tours, including one in America.

In December of 1898 Gonne had an unusual experience of a dream in which she was carried into the spirit realm where she was married to Yeats. That same evening Yeats had a dream in which she kissed him. They would come to describe this experience as a spiritual marriage that would never be consummated on the physical level. They remained close friends and coworkers for the rest of their lives. In 1903, Gonne joined the Catholic Church and married John MacBride, but the marriage lasted only two years. In 1908 she again found herself working with Yeats. In 1917 he finally asked her to marry him, but she turned him down and he married another. The following year she went to Ireland but was arrested and returned to England, where she was imprisoned for six months as a member of the Sein Fein Party. Following her arrest, her son Sean (the second child born of her relationship with Millevoye) joined the Irish Republican Army.

Gonne's experience in prison diverted her activism to the cause of jail reform and the plight of the wives and children of political prisoners. She also served in the Irish White Cross, a relief organization. She remained active in pro-Irish causes. In 1938 she completed her autobiography, A Servant of the Queen. She died on April 27, 1953, near Dublin.

Sources:

Gonne, Maud. "Yeats and Ireland." In Stephen Gwynn, ed. Scattering Branches: Tributes to the Memory of W. B. Yeats. London: Macmillian, 1940.

Greer, Mary K. Women of the Golden Dawn: Rebels and Priestesses. Rochester, Vt.: Park Street Books, 1995.

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

McBride, Maud Gonne. A Servant of the Queen: Reminiscences. 1938. Reprint, Woodbridge, Surrey, UK: Boydell Press, 1983.

Gonzalez-Quevado, Oscar

Director of the Centro Latino-Americano de Parapsicologia, São Paulo, Brazil. Gonzalez-Quevado is a Spanish-born Jesuit priest, residing in São Paulo, who condemns Spiritualist miracles, which he ridicules by performing his own (which he claims to be phoney). His public demonstrations of such feats as apparently levitating a young girl in the open air, however, have tended to encourage belief in miraculous powers by many in his audiences. He has also parodied psychic surgery and reportedly has summarized his experience with the paranormal by saying, "Everything is in the mind. Clairvoyance is just a trick, and if people have visions or hear voices, it is just a hallucination."

Sources:

Gonzalez-Quevado, Oscar. A face Oculta da Mente. São Paulo, Brazil: Edicos Loyola, 1967.

———. As Forcas Fisicas da Mente. São Paulo, Brazil: Edicos Loyola, 1968.

Good, Sarah (d. 1692)

One of the first women to be declared a witch in the famous proceedings at Salem Village, Massachusetts. Discovered using an egg white as a scrying (divining) instrument, the two young daughters of parish minister Samuel Parris began to complain of being victims of witchcraft. They accused Tituba, a slave who had showed them the scrying technique, Sarah Osburn, and Sarah Good of bewitching them. Good already had a reputation for possessing a sharp tongue and a short temper. Neighbors sometimes accused her of cursing them and causing various malevolent incidents, including the death of a cow.

Good was arrested on a warrrant issued on February 29, 1692. Her age is not known, but at the time of her arrest and trial she was the mother of a four-year-old daughter, Dorcas, and a recently born infant, whom she was still nursing. Before her trial, Sarah Osburn died in prison, but four others, including Rebecca Nurse, were arrested. The five were tried on June 30 and condemned together. Good and the others were executed by hanging on July 19, 1692.

Good is remembered not only for being the first of those killed at Salem Village (now Danvers, Massachusetts) but also for her last words to the crowd, "If you take away my life, God will give you blood to drink."

Sources:

Ericson, Eric. The World, The Flesh, and The Devil: A Biographical Dictionary of Witches. New York: Mayflower Books, 1981.

Hansen, Chadwick. Witchcraft at Salem. New York: George Braziller, 1969.

Goodavage, Joseph F. (1925–1989)

Journalist and astrologer, born in Philadelphia on October 29, 1925. Goodavage served in the South Pacific during World War II and was awarded both the Bronze Star and the Silver Star. After the war he attended the Philadelphia Museum College of Art, Temple University, and the University of Pittsburgh (B.A., 1953). He began his journalistic career in 1954 with the Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph and later worked for such papers as the Cleveland Plain-Dealer, the Chicago Tribune, and the New York Times. Along the way Goodavage became interested in astrology and joined the American Federation of Astrologers. His first major writing in the field, Astrology: The Space Age Science, appeared in 1965. The next year that book was picked up as the first title in the New American Library paperback "Mystic Arts Series." It was followed by Write Your Own Horoscope (1969), the Astrology Guide Almanac for 1970 and The Comet Kohoutek (1974).

Goodavage also wrote two astrological columns for Saga magazine and the Bell McClure syndicate. His significant production of books through the 1970s slowed in the 1980s, but he continued to write popular articles on astrology and related topics.

Sources:

Goodavage, Joseph F. Astrology: The Space Age Science. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1965. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1966.

———. The Comet Kohoutek. New York: Pinnacle Books, 1974.

———. Our Threatened Planet. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1978.

———. Seven by Seven. New York: New American Library, 1978.

———. Storm on the Sun. New York: New American Library, 1979.

———. Write Your Own Horoscope. New York: New American Library, 1969.

Goodman, Linda (1925–1995)

American astrologer, born Mary Alice Kemery on April 9, 1925, in Parkersburg, West Virginia. She emerged into public notice in 1958 as the writer-broadcaster for a Pittsburgh radio show, "Letter from Linda." She moved to New York City in 1964 and later became a speechwriter for the National Urban League. In 1968 Goodman published her first book, Sun Signs, a massive work on astrology and human relationships offering advice for changing one's responses to the actions of others in accordance with one's own astrological characteristics as well as those of whomever one is dealing with. It became one of the best-selling astrology texts of the period. It went into 17 hardback printings prior to paperback publication in the fall of 1971. By the end of the decade it had sold more than four million copies. From having no prior connection to the astrological community, Goodman became one of the most influential astrologers in America, and her clients included a number of celebrity personalities.

Additional astrological texts by Goodman include Venus Trines at Midnight (1970) and her equally popular Linda Goodman's Love Signs: A New Approach to the Human Heart (1978).

Less known, Goodman founded a new religion she termed Mannitou, a synthesis of teachings from St. Francis of Asissi and some Native American tribes. She put a large percentage of the income from her books into establishing her new faith.

Sources:

Goodman, Linda. Linda Goodman's Love Signs: A New Approach to the Human Heart. New York: Harper, 1978.

———. Sun Signs. New York: Taplinger, 1968. Reprinted as Linda Goodman's Sun Signs. New York: Bantam Books, 1971.

———. Venus Trines at Midnight. New York: Taplinger, 1970.

Goodrich-Freer, Ada (1857–1931)

Pioneer psychical researcher who wrote under the pseudonym "Miss X." Goodrich-Freer was born May 15, 1857, in Rutland, England. Mystery surrounds much of her life and parentage, and she appears to have been responsible for the deliberate clouding of many details, probably to impress influential patrons and associates. However, she was also noted for useful research and for her valuable editorial association with W. T. Stead, with whom she coedited the magazine Borderland. In 1905 she married the Reverend Hans H. Spoer, although continuing to be known professionally as "Miss Freer" or "Miss Goodrich-Freer."

She was an early member of the Society for Psychical Research in Britain and an associate of F. W. H. Myers, one of its founders. She was also a member of the Folklore Society. Between 1918 and 1920 she was assistant to her husband, who was then district commander under the Allied high commissioner in Armenia.

In addition to her collaboration with Stead on Borderland, Goodrich-Freer wrote a variety of articles for different journals in folklore and in psychical research, most of which appeared under the pseudonym "Miss X."

In 1897 Goodrich-Freer became involved in an investigation of a haunting at Bellechin. The affair turned into a fiasco, and she and Myers had a heated quarrel that led to a permanent break in relations. The period proved critical for her, since her employment with Stead at Borderland ended and three years later her patron, Lord Bute, died. In 1901 she left England for Palestine and eventually settled in the United States. She dropped out of psychical research during this period, though she wrote a number of books on her travels in the Middle East. She died in New York on February 24, 1931.

History has not treated Goodrich-Freer kindly. John L. Campbell and Trevor H. Hall, who looked over the body of material she left, accused her of a lifetime of falsification and deception, the pseudonym being only a small part of the ruse. She regularly plagiarized from others in her publications, said Campbell and Hall, and was accused of using fraud in her sittings.

Sources:

Campbell, John L., and Trevor H. Hall. Strange Things. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1968.

Goodrich-Freer, Ada. Arabs in Tent and Town. London: Seeley, Service, & Co. Int., 1924.

———. Essays in Psychical Research. 2nd ed., London: G. Redway, 1899.

———. Inner Jerusalem. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1904.

———. Outer Isles. London: A. Constable, 1902.

———, and John, Marquess of Bute. The Alleged Haunting of B. House. London: G. Redway, 1899.

Gopi Krishna, Pandit (1903–1984)

A modern Hindu teacher who focused attention on the kundalini, the latent force in the human organism said to be responsible for sexual activity and (in a sublimated form) higher consciousness or mystical experience.

In Hindu mythology kundalini is personified as a goddess with creative and destructive aspects and serpentlike movement. Kundalini is often described as a serpent that sleeps at the base of the spine, darting upward when aroused, bringing sexual excitement or enlightenment or pain. This concept has been loosely correlated with the biblical story of Adam and Eve and the serpent and has analogues in other religions as well.

Gopi Krishna was born in Kashmir in 1903. After failing his college examinations he devoted himself to a personal discipline of yoga and meditation while working as a minor civil servant.

In 1937 he experienced the sudden arousal of kundalini energy. The experience was a shattering one, because the energy was aroused prematurely in a negative form. Although the pandit had strange visions and insights, the shock resulted in his suffering ill health for a number of years. He sustained the ordeal, however, and after years of practice he discovered that the energy had transformed him gradually and manifested a positive aspect, with states of higher consciousness, mystical insight, and some paranormal side effects.

Gopi Krishna's first book, The Shape of Events to Come (1968; reissued 1979), describes a New Age–like vision of human affairs characterized by materialism and decadence. He writes of an impending nuclear war, after which human beings will rediscover the importance of the moral and ethical principles that are the basis of most great religions and thereby prepare the way for a great evolutionary surge.

Several of the pandit's books are in verse format, "dictated by a Higher Intelligence" at great speed. At the apex of the pandit's condition of higher consciousness in 1950 he spontaneously dictated poems in German, French, and Italian, languages that he had never learned. His prose works concerned with the concept of kundalini transcended his own simple education and average intelligence. Like his poetry they were written during full consciousness, not in the trance condition of a psychic or channeler. Yet his writings were a product of his higher consciousness.

Although accounts of the arousal of kundalini through yoga practice—culminating in mystical consciousness—have appeared in Hindu Scriptures for centuries, firsthand accounts are so rare in modern times that some consider kundalini a mere fable. Gopi Krishna was one of several mid-twentieth-century gurus who succeeded in arousing kundalini and as a result wrote a number of books on the subject. He was known for his detailed description of the aroused kundalini state. His writings draw upon his outgoing personal experience of higher consciousness.

He claimed that kundalini is a biological force with an important role in human evolution and believed that the goal of higher consciousness may eventually lead humankind away from materialistic ambition and world conflicts toward new goals for religion and science.

Gopi Krishna's books attracted the serious attention of such eminent thinkers as Carl von Weizsäcker of the Max Planck Institute for the Life Sciences, Germany. The Indian government also expressed interest in the subject of kundalini. In 1974 Dr. Karan Singh, minister of health, announced an ambitious kundalini research project, to be sponsored by the All-India Institute of Medical Science, to research "kundalini concept and its relevance to the development of higher nervous functions." Unfortunately the project was discontinued with a change in the Indian government.

Meanwhile sympathizers with the work of Pandit Gopi Krishna founded the Central Institute for Kundalini Research at Srinagar, Kashmir, India, and the Kundalini Research Foundation was established in New York (later relocated to P.O. Box 2248, Darien, CT 06820) and in Switzerland at Gemsenstrasse 7, CH-8006 Zürich.

Gopi Krishna died in Srinagar, Kashmir, on July 31, 1984, at age 81. During the last week of his life, he met with Hindu leaders in order to convince them of the importance of strengthening and unifying the Hindu community so that adequate social services could be developed in case of difficult times in Kashmir.

During his lifetime he made great efforts to interest scientists in investigating and verifying the phenomenon of kundalini as a biological force in human affairs, with implications for the study of the paranormal as well as the intellectual and ethical evolution of humanity.

Sources:

Gopi Krishna. The Awakening of Kundalini. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1975.

———. Biblical Prophecy for the 20th Century. Toronto: Kundalini Research Institute of Canada, 1979.

———. The Biological Basis of Religion and Genius. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

———. Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. New Delhi, 1967. Reprint, Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1970.

———. Living with Kundalini: The Autobiography of Gopi Krishna. Boston: Shambhala, 1993.

———. The Secret of Yoga. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

———. The Shape of Events to Come. New Delhi: Kundalini Research and Publication Trust, 1979.

Gordon, Henry C. (ca. 1850)

One of the earliest American physical mediums to claim to demonstrate levitation. At a New York conference on June 18, 1852, he seemed to levitate in the crowded assembly room; at another time he was apparently carried through the air over a distance of 60 feet. Gordon was scientifically tested by Robert Hare in 1853 and demonstrated to Hare's satisfaction the existence of a psychic force.

Gordon was several times accused of fraud, however. He was exposed at a New York séance when he was discovered in the cabinet with faces painted on cardboard, luminous cloth, and other fraudulent properties.

Sources:

Hare, Robert. Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestations. 1854. Reprint, Elm Grove, Wis.: Sycamore Press, 1963.

Gormogons

A Jacobite society, perhaps related to the lodges of Harodim. They employed pseudonyms like the Harodim and had an ambassador at Rome. The duke of Wharton and the chevalier Ramsay, who were well-known Jacobites, were members of the order. Gormogons had a cipher and secret reception of their own and used a jargon in which the names of places and individuals were transposed. An extant engraving by William Hogarth lampoons the order under the title "The Mystery of Masonry brought to light by ye Gormogons." The intention of the Gormogons, apparently, was to establish a countertradition to Freemasonry.

Government-Sponsored Research on Parapsychology

In the opening years of the Cold War, the idea of the use of psychics for information gathering began to be discussed within government circles. As early as 1952, physician Andrija Puharish spoke at the Pentagon on extrasensory perception (ESP) and psychological warfare. A brief initial investigation of psychic phenomena was made by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) under the label Project ULTRA in 1961. Then in 1969 the CIA became concerned over reports of Soviet research on psychic phenomena, and in 1970 under the name SCANATE began an assessment of what had actually been learned.

Then in 1972 what was to become a long-term research effort was initiated by physicists Harold Puthoff and Russell Targ, who had previously conducted some parapsychological research at the Stanford Research Institute (SRI). The pair approached the C IA with the assertion that they had found several psychics they felt could produce results. Their best example was Ingo Swann who made an impression with his seeming ability to effect a highly shielded magnetometer. Changes in the magnetometer coincided with Swann's own changes in consciousness. They later involved another psychic, Pat Price, in the successful demonstration of remote viewing, a form of clairvoyance. A review in 1976 noted the ambiguous nature of the remote view tests, and led to the relationship with SRI being dropped and the employment of Price as an independent agent. Unfortunately, he died of a heart attack a short time later, and the research momentarily came to a halt. In spite of some stops and starts, SRI through Puthoff and Targ would conduct additional research funded by the government until 1990.

In the meantime the Army had become interested in ESP, due in large part to experiences in Vietnam with soldiers who gained a reputation as being psychic and hence contributing to a lowering of casualties in their units. For a short time the Navy and Air Force also showed some interest. Then in 1977 the Department of Defense established a secret program, GONDOLA WISH, to develop remote viewing and to use it in various intelligence gathering operations consisting of a half dozen intelligence officers. While much material on this unit was made public in 1995, the actual progress of the effort remains a matter of debate.

In 1878 GONDOLA WISH gave way to GRILL FLAME. A selection of Army personnel and a few civilians, all believed to have some psychic ability, were brought together at Ft. Meade, Maryland. The heart of the GRILL FLAME program was an operational unit that began to work on actual psychic espionage and to pass along the results of their finding to various Armed Forces intelligence personnel. From the beginning, the operational unit was employed in a variety of situations. Its work was and remains secret, but it seems to have held together until 1988.

At the same time, the SRI staff trained some of the psychics involved with GRILL FLAME in the use of remote viewing techniques, and also did a number of ESP experiments with them. The SRI personnel were unaware of the operational unit or how the people they were working with were using their skills on an immediate espionage operations. interacting with that unit. Among the people who joined the staff at Fort Meade in the early 1980s was Edward Dames, a former intelligence officer who had previously utilized the data supplied by the operational unit. About the same time, SRI and Ingo Swann introduced Swann's new model of remote viewing and the techniques of training people based upon that new understanding. Dames and a group of the people involved with GRILL Flame trained with Swann. According to Dames, utilizing Swann's new approach, he was able to create a group of remote viewers with an unprecedented consistency and accuracy. They enhanced their effectiveness by acting as a team on common remote viewing targets.

In spite of its effectiveness, however, the unit, now redesignated INSCOM CENTER LANE became a matter of persistent controversy within the Army. Some of that controversy was generated by a breach in its secrecy that led to an April 1984 news column by reporter Jack Anderson. That same year, the remote viewing research program went through a major review by the National Research Council of the National Academy of Science. The report was negative. In 1985 the Army ended its involvement in the program and oversight shifted by the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) which had a continuing interest in Soviet experiments in psychic phenomena. This shift also had an accompanying name change to SUNSTREAK.

Under the new program Dames continued to train people who were moved into the program. By 1988, however, psychics who had not been trained in remote viewing in the manner taught by Swann were invited into the work and mixed with the operational unit developed by Dames. Also, under the DIA, the thrust of doing remote viewing on actual situations was dropped (though Dames and his people continued to quietly work on various matters and pass information to intelligence contacts). Among the people who became involved in the unit during this transitional period was Major David A. Morehouse, one of the last officers to be trained as a remote viewer. He remained with the secret program for two year, before returning to a more conventional Army assignment.

At the end of the 1980s, Dames and the remaining people who had been working with him left the Army and formed a private company, PSI-TECH, to continue their remote viewing work. Dames and the others were replaced with additional psychics recruited by Dale Graff, the head of the SUNSTREAK. By this time various members of Congress had learned of the unit's existence and several began to make requests of the psychics for information of a more personal nature. Also, in 1991, the research program moved from SRI to the Science Applications International Corporation (SAIC) and continued under the direction of physicist Edwin May who had previously worked with the SRI research program.

In 1995, the Army hired the American Institute for Research to do a comprehensive review of the research program. The four-member review panel concluded that the continued use of remote viewing in intelligence gathering operations is not warranted." The program was discontinued and many of the papers related to it were declassified, though many related to the more secret operation unit have not yet become available. Again the name was changed to Project STAR GATE, the name by which the entire program would later become popularly known.

In 1995 Project STAR GATE underwent a comprehensive review by a panel set up by the American Institutes for Research (AIR). AIR invited two out side panelists, University of Oregon psychologist Raymond Hyman, a well-known spokesperson for a skeptical position regarding psychic phenomena, and Jessica Utts, a Professor of Statistics at the University of California-Davis, who had written several articles favorable to the existence of psychic phenomena. The report concluded that the laboratory results that they examined had produced above chance results but that it was unclear if those results were due to psychic phenomena or some other cause. They also concluded that the continued use of remote viewing in intelligence gathering efforts was unwarranted.

As a result of the AIR report, Project STAR GATE was closed. Toward the end of the year, the existence of the whole research program was made known to the public and a selection of document relative to the research made public. It produced an immediate controversy. Edwin May argued, for example, that the best results from the research had not been shown to the panel. Edward Dames argued that the operation unit had achieved good results in its intelligence gathering and that the material he had produced was also not shown to the panel. In spite of the complaints, the government program of research ended. It has been estimated that more than 80,000 pages of research data remain classified.

In the wake of the public disclosures over Project STAR GATE, many of the 23 remote viewers who had worked on the program at one time or another went public. Joseph McMoneagle claimed that he had provided information on more that 150 targets for the intelligence community. Morehouse, who worked with Dames at PSI-TECH for several years, eventually left, wrote a bestselling book, Psychic Warrior, and founded another company, Remote Viewing Technologies.

Sources:

FAS Intelligence Resource Program: STAR GATE. http://www.tas.org/irp/program/collect/stargate.htm. April 20, 2000.

May, Edwin. "The American Institutes for Research Review of the Department of Defense' Operation STAR GATE Program: A Commentary." The Journal of Parapsychology 60 (March 1996): 3–23.

Morehouse, David A. Nonlethal Weapons: War without Death. New York: Praeger Press, 1996.

———. Psychic Warrior: Inside the CIA's Stargate Program, the True Story of a Soldiers' Espionage and Awakening. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Operation Star Gate. http://www.parascope.com/articles//starGareDocs.htm. April 19, 2000.

Puthoff, Harold E. "CIA-Initiated Remote Viewing Programming at Stanford Research Institute." Journal of Scientific Exploration 10, 1 (1996).

———, and Russell Targ. Mind-Reach: Scientists Look at Psychic Ability. New York: Delacorte Press, 1977.

Gow, David (d. ca. 1939)

Scottish journalist, poet, and Spiritualist. As a poet Gow contributed to such journals as Cassell's Saturday Journal, London Magazine, and London Scotsman and his poems were included in such anthologies as Modern Scottish Poets and Book of Highland Verse. He was author of Four Miles From Any Town (1929) and edited Ask the Spirits (1934).

Gow was an outstanding figure in British Spiritualism. In January 1914 he took over editorship of the famous Spiritualist journal the Light following the death of editor E. W. Wallis. Gow continued in that position until 1930. He was a lucid and prolific writer on psychic literature and philosophy and knew many of the leading figures in the field, including Agnes Guppy-Volckman and Emma H. Britten.

Gowdie, Isobel (fl. seventeenth century)

Isobel Gowdie, a seventeenth-century Scottish witch, gave a series of confessions, all produced apart from any torture, that seemed to confirm popular theories about Witchcraft, and became the keystone of a new wave of persecutions in Scotland during the reign of Charles II (1660–85). Gowdie emerged out of obscurity in April of 1662 when she gave the first of her confessions relating 15 years of involvement with the Devil. According to her story, she had initially encountered Satan at the church at Auldearne. She made a pact with the Devil that began with her renunciation of Christianity. The Devil placed his mark on her, on her shoulder, sucked some of her blood, and rebaptized her with it. He gave her a new name, Janet. She confessed her new faith while placing one hand on her head and one on the bottom of her foot.

In her four separate confessions given over a six-week period (April 13–May 29), a variety of supernatural elements came to the fore. For example, she claimed that she placed a broom in bed to fool her husband when she left in the evening to gather with other witches. She flew through the air to her meeting, able to slay any passing Christians she met (and who could report her activity) unless they were able to bless themselves first.

Most important were her descriptions of the witches' meetings, as they represent the first clear records of the small groups of 13 that would later become standard fare in witchcraft accounts. Gowdie also introduced the term "coven" into the trial records. Gowdie's stories thus mark the completion of the transition in popular culture of the view of Witchcraft as the surviving religion of the people in pre-Christian Europe into the view of Witchcraft as a new post-Christian Satanic cult that existed as a complete Christian parody. It is this latter view that the authorities had been attempting to use to support their persecution of individuals since the end of the fifteenth century. Gowdie also claimed that she and her fellow witches could change into animal forms as easily as they could affect the weather. If the witches disobeyed the Devil or missed a meeting, they were punished with a whip.

From a contemporary perspective, Gowdie appears to have been mentally disturbed. There is some reason to suggest that the judges who heard her stories also concluded the same, as there is no record of her execution. However, accounts of her confessions would provide substantiation for the last generation of witchcraft trials that culminated at Salem, Massachusetts, a generation later. Interestingly enough, both Montague Summers and Margaret Murray would take Gowdie's accounts seriously in their theoretical analysis of Witchcraft. Murray, especially, referred to Gowdie in her theories of the organization of the Witch cult into covens of 13 members.

Sources:

Murray, Margaret. The Witchcult in Western Europe. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1921.

Robbins, Russell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown, 1970.

Summers, Montague. A History of Demonology and Witchcraft. New York. Alfred A. Knopf, 1926.

Graal, The Lost Book of the

The alleged origin of the Christian form of the Graal (Holy Grail) legend. Seven ancient books are cited as being the possible source of the story, but not one has been so proven. The Huth Merlin refers to a "Book of the Sanctuary," but this volume is a book of records, not containing any special spiritual allusion. If the lost book of the Graal ever existed it may have been a mass book used about 1100. Its contents would have related to a mass following the Last Supper.

The mystery of the Graal is threefold: (1) its origin, which is part of the mystery of the Incarnation; (2) its manifestation, which would have taken place had the world been worthy; and (3) its removal—this world being unworthy, the Graal was said to be removed, yet not hidden, for it is always discernible by anyone worthy of seeing it.

It seems unlikely that such a mass book ever existed.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur E. The Holy Grail: The Galahad Quest in the Arthurian Literature. London: J. M. Watkins, 1921. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Grad, Bernard (1920–)

Canadian biologist who experimented in the field of paranormal healing. Grad was born February 4, 1920, Montreal, Canada. He attended McGill University (B.S., 1944; Ph.D., 1949), where he remained through his professional career. He was a research assistant, lecturer, and assistant professor at McGill. In 1985 he became an associate professor at the University of Quebec, Montreal. He became well known for his research on cancer.

As early as the 1940s Grad became interested in the orgone energy theories as postulated by Wilhelm Reich. The death of his daughter further stimulated his interest in spiritual healing, and in 1957 he came to know Oscar Estabany, a Hungarian refugee who professed to have healing powers. Working with Estabany in the 1960s, he carried out a series of experiments on plant seeds and mice that resulted in some of the strongest evidence of a healing power to arise in parapsychology. In a series of more complicated tests, all carried out with double blinds, Grad was able to isolate a healing power that seemed to radiate from Estabany. It could be transferred to plant seeds to stimulate their growth, to mice to speed healing, and even to water used for plants.

Sources:

Grad, Bernard. "Paranormal Healing and Life Energy." American Society for Psychical Research Newsletter 7 (1981).

———. "Some Biological Effects of the 'Laying on of Hands': A Review of Experiments with Animals and Plants." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 59 (1965).

———. "A Telekinetic Effect on Plant Growth." International Journal of Parapsychology 3 (1961); 5 (1963).

Grad, Bernard, Remi J. Cadoret, and G. I. Paul. "The Influence of an Unorthodox Method of Treatment on Wound Healing in Mice." International Journal of Parapsychology 3, no. 2 (1961).

Grail, Holy

A portion of the Arthurian cycle of romance, of late origin, embodying a number of tales dealing with the search for a certain vessel of great sanctity called the "Grail" or "Graal." Versions of the story are numerous, the most celebrated of them being the Conte del Graal, the Grand St. Graal, Sir Percyvalle, Quete del St. Graal, and Guyot, but there are also many others. These overlap in many respects, but the standard form of the story may perhaps be found in the Grand St. Graal, one of the latest versions, which dates from the thirteenth century.

It tells how Joseph of Arimathea employed a dish used at the Last Supper to catch the blood of the Redeemer, which flowed from his body before his burial. The wanderings of Joseph are then described. He leads a band to Britain, where he is cast into prison, but is delivered by Evelach or Mordrains, who is instructed by Christ to assist him. Mordrains builds a monastery where the Grail is housed. Brons, Joseph's brother-in-law, has a son Alain, who is appointed guardian of the Grail. Alain, having caught a great fish with which he feeds the entire household, is called "the Rich Fisher," which becomes the perpetual title of the Grail keepers. Alain places the Grail in the castle of Corbenic and in time, various knights of King Arthur's court come in quest of the holy vessel. Only the purest of the pure could approach it, and in due time the knight Percival manages to see the marvel.

It is probable that the idea of the Grail originated with early medieval legends of the quest for talismans that conferred great boons upon the finder, for example, the shoes of swiftness, the cloak of invisibility, and the ring of Gyges, and that these stories were interpreted in the light and spirit of medieval Christianity and mysticism.

The legends may be divided into two classes: those that are connected with the quest for certain talismans, of which the Grail is only one, and that deal with the personality of the hero who achieves the quest; and second, those that deal with the nature and history of the talismans.

A great deal of controversy has raged around the possible Eastern origin of the Grail legend. Much erudition has been employed to show that Guyot, a Provençal poet who flourished in the middle of the twelfth century, found at Toledo, Spain, an Arabian book by an astrologer, Flegitanis, which contained the Grail story. But the name "Flegitanis" can by no means be an Arabian proper name. It could be the Persian felekedânêh, a combined word which signifies "astrology," and in that case it would be the title of an astrological work. Some believed the legend originated in the mind of Guyot himself, but this conclusion was strongly opposed by the folklorist Alfred Nutt. There is, however, some reason to believe that the story might have been brought from the East by the Knights Templar.

The Grail legend has often been held by various ecclesiastical apologists to support theories that either the Church of England or the Roman Catholic Church has existed since the foundation of the world. From early Christian times the genealogy of these churches has been traced back through the patriarchs to numerous apocryphal persons, although it is not stated whether the religions possessed hierophants in neolithic and paleolithic times, or just how they originated. Such theories, which would logically identify Christianity with the grossest forms of paganism, are confined only to a small group.

The Grail legend was readily embraced by those who saw in it a link between Palestine and England and an argument for the special separate foundation of the Anglican Church by direct emissaries from the Holy Land. Glastonbury was fixed as the headquarters of the Grail immigrants, and the finding of a glass dish in the vicinity of the cathedral there some years ago was held to be confirmation of the story by many of the faithful. The exact date of this vessel was not definitely estimated, but there seemed little reason to suppose that it was more than a few hundred years old.

A new conspiratorial interpretation of the Grail legend is offered in the book The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail (1982), by Michael Baigent, Richard Leigh, and Henry Lincoln. Their speculation involves suggestions that Jesus did not die on the Cross, but married and had children. His wife, they postulate, fled to the south of France with her family, taking with her the "Royal and Real Blood," the "Sang-real" or Grail of medieval romance. This line will supposedly culminate in a second Messiah, all this being the secret of an order named the Prieure de Sion. Apparently the investigation of this amazing story began with the mystery of Berenger Sauniere, a parish priest at Rennes-le-Château in the Pyrenees, who seemed to have discovered a secret that gave him access to a vast sum of money before his death, under mysterious circumstances, in 1917. That secret involved the history of Rennes-le-Château and its association with the Templars, the Cathars, and the royal bloodline of the Merovingian dynasty. The story has too many jumps in history and logic to ever be researched, and only time will show whether its major claims can be independently substantiated.

Patricia and Lionel Fanthorpe refute the theory of Baigent, Leigh, and Lincoln in their 1982 book The Holy Grail Revealed: The Real Secret of Rennes-le-Château.

Sources:

Bruce, James Douglas. The Evolution of Arthurian Romance, From the Beginnings Down to the Year 1300. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1923.

Cooper-Oakley, Isabel. Traces of a Hidden Tradition in Masonry and Medieval Mysticism. London, 1900.

Fanthorpe, Patricia, and Lionel Fanthorpe. The Holy Grail Revealed: The Real Secret of Rennes-le-Château. North Hollywood, Calif.: Newcastle Pub. Co., 1982.

Lacy, Norris J., ed. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland Publishing, 1986.

Loomis, Roger Sherman. The Grail: From Celtic Myth to Christian Symbol. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1963.

Nutt, Alfred. Studies on the Legend of the Holy Grail. London: Folklore Society, 1888. Reprint, New York: Cooper Square Publishers, 1965.

Rhys, Sir John. Studies in the Arthurian Legend. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1891.

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Holy Grail: The Galahad Quest in the Arthurian Literature. London, 1933. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Weston, Jessie L. From Ritual to Romance. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1920. Reprint, Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1957.

———. The Quest of the Holy Grail. London: G. Bell & Sons, 1913; London: Frank Cass, London, 1964.

Grail Movement

The Grail Movement emerged in the 1920s to disseminate the material written by Oskar Ernest Bernhardt (1875–1941). In 1924 Bernhardt moved to Bavaria, where he wrote and lectured under the pen name Abd-ru-shin. He moved to Austria in 1928 and began publishing In the Light of Truth, but his work was suppressed by the Nazis in 1938. Bernhardt died during the war. Followers attracted to the writings reorganized after the war, and the foundation has continued unabated ever since, spreading throughout Europe and North America. The first U.S. center was founded in 1939 in Mt. Morris, Illinois.

According to Bernhardt, God created human beings and sent them in search of self-consciousness and maturity. They wandered into gross matter and acquired physical bodies in which to function on Earth. All are to learn to live by the original laws of creation and eventually return to their place of origin as mature, self-conscious entities.

The Grail Movement may be contacted at 2081 Partridge Ln., Binghamton, New York 13903. It publishes the English edition of In the Light of Truth and other writings by Bernhardt. In recent decades the movement has become international with followers on every continent.

Sources:

Abd-ru-shin [Oskar E. Bernhardt]. Awake! Selected Lectures. Vomperberg, Austria: Maria Bernhardt Publishing, n.d.

———. In the Light of Truth. 3 vols. Vomperberg, Austria: Maria Bernhardt Publishing, 1954.

Grail Sword

Associated with the Holy Grail in Arthurian legend. Its supposed history begins with King David, who bequeathed the sword to Solomon, who was bidden to recast the pommel. In Solomon's time it was placed in a ship built and luxuriously furnished by Solomon's wife. Subsequently discovered by the Knights of the Quest, it was assumed and worn by Sir Galahad.

Gram

In medieval legend, a magic sword thrust into a tree by Odin and pulled out by Sigmund. It bestowed upon its possessor exceptional powers and performed many miracles. The story is told in The Lay of the Volsungs.

The Grand Grimoire

A grimoire, or text of instruction for use in ceremonial magic. It was supposedly edited by one Antonia del Rabina from a copy transcribed from the genuine writings of King Solomon. The Grand Grimoire is divided into two parts, the first containing the evocation of "Lucifuge Rocofale" and the second concerned with the rite of making pacts with demons.

The first portion of The Grand Grimoire describes a process for evoking evil spirits to assist the operator in discovering hidden treasure. The second part suggests the surrender of the magician's body and soul to the demon, but the pact is grossly unfair to the devil, for it is such that the magician can readily slip through his fingers.

The work has been regarded as one of the more atrocious grimoires.

Sources:

Le Grand Grimoire, ou l'art de commander les esprits célestes. Paris, 1845.

McIntosh, Christopher. The Devil's Bookshelf. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1985.

Grandier, Urbain (d. 1634)

Urbain Grandier, a canon of the French church and a popular preacher of the town of Loudun in the district of Poitiers, was brought to trial in the year 1634, accused of practicing magic and causing demonic possession of the Ursuline nuns of Loudun. The prime cause of the accusations, however, seems to have been the envy of his rival preachers, whose fame was eclipsed by Grandier's superior talents. The second cause was a libel upon Cardinal Richelieu falsely attributed to Grandier.

In addition to his eloquence, Grandier was distinguished for his courage and resolution, for his physical appearance, and for the extraordinary attention he paid to his dress, which gave him the reputation of being a ladies' man.

In 1633 certain nuns of the convent of Ursulines at Loudun were attacked with a disease that manifested extraordinary symptoms, suggesting to many that they were possessed by devils. A rumor was spread that Grandier, prompted by some offense he had conceived against the nuns, had caused the possessions through his skill in sorcery.

Unfortunately the same Capuchin friar who assured Richelieu that Grandier was the author of the libel against him also told the cardinal the story of the possessed nuns. The cardinal seized this opportunity for private vengeance and wrote to the counselor of state at Loudun, asking him to begin a strict investigation of the charges, plainly implying that what he sought was the destruction of Grandier.

According to an authorized transcript of the trial, Grandier was convicted on the evidence of Astaroth, a devil of the order of seraphims and chief of the possessing devils, and sentenced to be burned alive. In fact, he was convicted upon the evidence of 12 nuns who, being asked who they were, gave 12 demonic names and professed to be possessing devils compelled by the order of the court to testify. Sentence was passed on August 18, 1634, and Grandier was condemned to torture so severe that his legs were smashed, followed by burning at the stake.

Grandier met his fate with constancy. At his death an enormous drone fly was said to be seen buzzing about his head and a monk who was present at the execution attested that the fly was Beelzebub (in Hebrew the god of flies), come to carry away to hell the soul of the victim. Such stories may have been circulated to justify a cruel and unjust persecution. The nuns involved in the accusations continued to exhibit the signs of demonic possession after Grandier's execution.

Sources:

Carmona, Nichel. Les diables de Loudun: sorcellerie et politique sous Richelieu. Paris: Fayard, 1988.

Huxley, Aldous. The Devils of Loudun. London: Chatto & Windus, 1952.

Grand Lodge of England

For the foundation of The Grand Lodge of Masons in England in 1717, see Freemasonry.

Granny-Wells

A folk term for sacred wells dedicated to St. Anne, mother of the Virgin Mary and grandmother of Christ. According to a Breton legend, St. Anne lived in Brittany in her old age and was visited by Christ, of whom she requested help for the sick in her district. Christ pierced the ground with a staff and opened a healing spring, later named St. Anne-de-la-Palue.

Grant, Ernest A. (1893–1968)

Astrologer and cofounder of the American Federation of Astrologers (AFA). Grant was born in Detroit, Michigan, on June 4, 1893. As a teenager he moved to Washington, D.C., and held a variety of jobs as stenographer, court reporter, and eventually secretary to a U.S. senator. He married and through the 1920s both he and his wife, Catherine, studied astrology. She became a prominent astrologer and had a number of prominent Washingtonians among her clients. Through the 1930s they increasingly saw the need for a professional organization for astrologers, whose work was still held in disdain by many. Numerous laws against fortune-telling hampered the development of the profession in many parts of the country.

Together with Anna May Cowan and Swen Erickson, Grant led in the founding of the AFA, now the largest and most prestigous of the several professional associations for astrologers. He was its first president (1938–41) and then became its first executive secretary (1941–59). The association was headquartered in the Grant home. In 1949 he quit his other jobs and devoted full time to the AFA. Two years later he led in the purchase of a small parcel of land adjacent to the Library of Congress where a new headquarters was erected.

With his wife, Grant began work on a set of basic textbooks in astrology, and he published a set of ephemeris volumes for the important years associated with the founding of the nation (1776, 1777, and 1781). Together they also founded the National Astrological Library, a publishing house and retail book outlet. While Catherine Grant continued to see clients, Ernest Grant specialized in teaching astrology and research. He also developed a special interest in political astrology.

Grant died on March 6, 1968. His wife continued as an astrologer and eventually sold the library to the AFA. In the early 1970s, along with the AFA, she moved to Tempe, Arizona, and worked there into her early 90s. She died in 1988.

Sources:

Grant, Ernest. Astrological America. Washington, D.C.: National Astrological Library, 1949.

———. Ephemeris for the Year 1776. Washington, D.C.: National Astrological Library, 1944.

———. Tables of Diurnal Planetary Motion. Washington, D.C.: National Astrological Library, 1948.

Grant, Ernest, and Catherine T. Grant. Grant Textbook Series. 4 vols. Washington, D.C.: National Astrological Library, n.d.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Grant, Joan (Joan Marshall Kelsey) (1907–1989)

Author of various fictional works dealing with reincarnation that she claimed were partly biographical. Grant believed she had inherited her mother's psychic experiences, which allowed Grant to sense from an object the experiences and feelings of people who had handled it in the past. This turned her towards writing books she claimed were part historical novels but "far memories" of past times. In her first book, Winged Pharaoh (1937), Grant describes the life and death of Sekeeta, a princess of First Dynasty Egypt. In Return to Elysium (1947), she tells of a Greek girl for the second century C.E. In her book Many Lifetimes (1969), written in collaboration with her third husband, Dr. Denys Kelsey, Grant describes claimed memories of former existences revealed when she was hypnotized by her husband.

Sources:

Grant, Joan. Eyes of Horus. London: Methuen, 1942. New York: Arno Press, 1980.

———. Far Memory. Reprinted as Time Out of Mind, A Lot to Remember. New York: Arno Press, 1980.

———. Life as Carola. London: Methuen & Co. Ltd., 1939; New York & London: Harper & Brothers, 1940; New York: Arno Press, 1980.

———. Lord of the Horizon. London: Methuen & Co. Ltd., 1943.

———. Return to Elysium. New York: Arno Press, 1980.

———. So Moses Was Born. London: Methuen, 1952; New York: Arno Press, 1980.

———. Winged Pharaoh. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1938.

Kelsey, Denys, and Joan Grant. Many Lifetimes. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1967.

Grant, Kenneth

Founder of a branch of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), a ceremonial "magick" group in the tradition of Aleister Crowley, in Great Britain. Grant was initiated into Crowley's own order, the A∴ A∴, and the OTO.

After Crowley's death in 1947 he was succeeded by Karl Germer as outer head of the order. Germer was at that time living in the United States. He presented Grant a charter to open the New Isis Lodge of the OTO in 1955. Grant was limited to teaching the first three OTO grades. After Germer died in 1962 Grant claimed leadership of the OTO. While members in America did not acknowledge him, there was no one in England to oppose his authority. Grant began to accept initiates for all ten working degrees of the order (the eleventh being purely administrative).

Grant worked with John Symonds, Crowley's literary executor, to produce The Confessions of Aleister Crowley (1969). Grant also published The Magical Revival (1972), an informative survey of occult theory and practice in modern times. A particularly valuable chapter is concerned with the work of occult artist Austin Osman Spare. Grant also published Images and Oracles of Austin Osman Spare (1975), a study of the work of this strange and talented artist.

Grant's wife, Steffi, contributed beautiful illustrations to five Carfax Monographs issued by the Grants in London in a limited edition, dealing with The Tree of Life, The Golden Dawn, Aleister Crowley, Austin Osman Spare, and Vinum Sabbati.

Sources:

Grant, Kenneth. Aleister Crowley and the Hidden God. London: Muller, 1973.

———. Cults of the Shadow. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1976.

———. Images and Oracles of Austin Osman Spare. London: Muller, 1975.

———. The Magical Revival. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

———. Nightside of Eden. London: Muller, 1977.

———. Outside the Circles of Time. London: Frederick Muller, 1980.

Symonds, John, and Kenneth Grant. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. New York: Hill & Wang, 1969.

Grapevine (Newsletter)

(1) Former monthly newsletter of the Psychic Information Exchange. Included articles on the paranormal, self-development lessons, notices of meetings, and book reviews. Apparently no longer active.

(2) Monthly newsletter of the Movement for a New Society, devoted to alternative and nonviolent living. Last known address: 6722 Baltimore Ave., Philadelphia, PA 19143.

Graphology

The study of handwriting, involving the interpretation of character and personality traits. Empirical interpretation of handwriting dates back to ancient times. Aristotle claimed that he could define a person's soul by his way of writing. Suetonius noted that Emperor Augustus did not separate his words when writing and concluded that this demonstrated a neglect of detail when forming a picture of a whole situation.

In the seventeenth century Camillo Baldi published a small Latin treatise called De Signis ex Epistolis (1622). Graphology was systematized in nineteenth-century France when the Abbé Flandrin (1809–64) made a detailed study of autographs. In 1872 Adolphe Desbarolles published Les mystères de l'écriture; art de juger les hommes sur leurs autographes. Since then there have been many books on graphology, often falling somewhere between scientific principle and popular occultism.

Although modern graphologists have evolved a scientific rationale that assigns particular significance to the slope of handwriting, the formation of individual letters, size of characters, joinings and disjoinings of letters, and so on, interpretation remains largely subjective and allows considerable room for the practitioner's psychic ability to operate and add material. Some graphologists allow the handwriting itself to convey impressions in much the same way as objects function in psychometry. Perhaps one's signature is the most characteristic piece of handwriting, for consciously or unconsciously it becomes a kind of symbolic self-portrait, indicating the personality as a whole. In this it resembles the magic sigil of celestial intelligences. Part of the perennial attraction of autograph collecting and book signing is the emotional association with great or famous individuals as represented by their signatures.

Graphology is to be sharply delineated from handwriting analysis. The latter is concerned with establishing the authenticity of writing and signatures, and such analysts are frequently called upon to make judgments in legal situations. Graphology has made some progress toward respectability, however. Some corporations now employ graphologists to elucidate staff applications, and police authorities have been known to hire graphologists to analyze the writing of criminals.

Sources:

Byrd, Anita. Handwriting Analysis: A Guide to Personality. New York: Arco, 1982.

Casewit, Curtis. Graphology Handbook. Rockport, Mass.: Para Research, 1980.

Friedenhain, Paula. Write and Reveal: Interpretation of Handwriting. London, 1959.

Golson, K. K. Presidents Are People. New York: Carlton Press, 1964.

Jacoby, H. J. Analysis of Handwriting. London: Allen & Unwin, 1929.

Kurdsen, Stephen. Graphology: The New Science. Washington, D.C.: Acropolis Books, 1971.

Lowengard, Manfred. How to Analyze Your Handwriting. London: Marshall Cavendish, 1975.

Marcuse, Irene. The Key to Handwriting Analysis. New York: R. M. McBride, 1959.

Moretti, Girolamo M. The Saints Through Their Handwriting. New York: Macmillan, 1964.

Schang, F. C. Visiting Cards of Celebrities. Paris: Gale Research, 1973.

Solomon, Shirl. How to Really Know Yourself Through Your Handwriting. New York: Taplinger, 1974. Reprint, London: Coronet, 1975.

Grattan-Guinness, Ivor (1941–)

Born June 23, 1941, in Bakewell, England, Grattan-Guinness was educated at Wadham College, Oxford (B.A., 1962; M.A., 1967), and the London School of Economics (M.Sc., Ph.D.). Grattan-Guinness is a Reader in mathematics at Middlesex Polytechnic, England, and a council member of the Society for Psychical Research, England. His main areas of research have concerned the history and philosophy of mathematics, the history of psychical research, and the relationship of parapsychology to established science and ufology. His paper "What Are Coincidences?" was published in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 49).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Grattan-Guinness, Ivor. Psychical Research: A Guide to its History, Principles and Practices, in Celebration of 100 Years of the Society for Psychical Research. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1982.

Gray Barker's Newsletter

Fanzine edited during the 1970s by the late Gray Barker, author of They Knew Too Much About Flying Saucers (1975). The newsletter covered UFO sightings, news of personalities in the UFO field, activities of organizations, and book and magazine reviews.

The Great School of Natural Science

The School of Natural Science was founded in Stockton, California, in 1883 by John E. Richardson, then an attorney. His spiritual pilgrimage had led him from his Baptist upbringing to Spiritualism to a negative evaluation of Spiritualist phenomena. The occasion for founding the school was Richardson's encounter with a stranger at the Grand Central Hotel in Stockton. The stranger introduced himself as "Hoo-Kna-ka," a representative of the School of the Master, headquartered in India. He traced Richardson's pilgrimage and with Richardson's consent began to teach him what became known as the Great Work.

In 1894 Richardson moved to Chicago, where he associated with Florence Huntley. They founded the Indo-American Book Company in 1907, which published Richardson's books, the Harmonic Series. They also began the periodical Life in Action. The work flourished for a decade until 1916, when charges of financial mismanagement were leveled at TK, the name under which Richardson was known by members of the school. Richardson soon moved to California and reorganized the work, which still survives.

The school teaches that universal intelligence is revealed through immutable laws. Nature is engaged in the evolution of individual intelligences and impels individuals to higher levels of consciousness. The individual is an immortal soul, which passes through a succession of physical and spiritual bodies. The soul possesses free will. Freely conforming to natural law leads to self-mastery, poise, and happiness.

It may be contacted at P.O. Box 1115, Cedar Ridge, California 95924. It offers correspondence courses on the school's teachings. Website: http://school-of-natsci.org.

Sources:

Richardson, J. E. The Great Message. Great School of Natural Science, 1950.

———. The Great Work. Chicago: Indo-American, 1907.

———. Who Answers Prayer? Great School of Natural Science, 1954.

West, Sylvester A. TK and the Great Work in America. Chicago: The Author, 1918.

The Greater World (Newspaper)

London Spiritualist weekly established in 1928 by Winifred Moyes and C. A. Aeschimann to spread the teachings of the Zodiac Circle. It led to the foundation in 1931 of the Greater World Christian Spiritualist Association. It had as its aim "the spreading in all directions of the truth of survival after death under the banner of Jesus Christ." The Greater World ceased publication in March 1989 and was superseded by a newsletter.

Greater World Christian Spiritualist Association

British Spiritualist organization founded in 1931 as the Greater World Christian Spiritualist League. It grew out of the Zodiac Circle, which was organized in the early 1920s around the mediumship of Winifred Moyes. Moyes was a channel who transmitted teachings from the entity "Zodiac," who claimed he was a temple scribe at the time of Christ. These teachings were at first transmitted to a small home circle held on Sunday evenings, but the movement grew rapidly to claim a membership of twenty thousand in Britain. Moyes was president of the league until her death in 1957, after which F. M. Tolkin became president until 1963, when he was succeeded by Margaret Hoare.

In addition to the weekly newspaper The Greater World, discontinued in 1989, the association also published The Children's Greater World and in 1933 launched French (Le Monde Superior) and German (Die Größere Welt) editions. The newspaper was replaced by a newsletter.

Members of the association must subscribe to eight basic beliefs, arising from the teachings of "Zodiac": (1) I believe in one God, who is Love; (2) I accept the leadership of Jesus Christ; (3) I believe that God manifests through the illimitable power of the Holy Spirit; (4) I believe in the survival of the human soul and its individuality after physical death; (5) I believe in the communion with God, with his angelic ministers, and with the soul's functioning in conditions other than the Earth life; (6) I believe that all forms of life created by God intermingle, are interdependent, and evolve until perfection is attained; (7) I believe in the perfect justice of the divine laws governing all life; and (8) I believe that sins committed can only be rectified by the sinner himself or herself, through the redemptive power of Jesus Christ, by repentance and service to others. There is also the following pledge: "I will at all times endeavour to be guided in my thoughts, words, and deeds by the teaching and example of Jesus Christ."

The league is now administered through the Greater World Spiritualist Association Trust and has a board of literature responsible for official publications. In 1961 the league affiliated with the National Federation of Spiritual Healers.

Very early in its life the league was involved in social work. In 1937 the league organized a convalescent home for elderly women at Leigh-on-Sea, and more recently added another at Bridlington, Yorkshire. The league's night shelter for homeless women in Lambeth, London, was destroyed by German bombs during World War II, but a new shelter and rest home was opened at Deptford in South London in 1948. That shelter continued its work until 1955, when a new law made it an offense for women to be on the streets at night without a lodging. A night shelter opened in Leeds in 1935 and continues as a home for women and children.

The London headquarters at 3–5 Conway St., London, W1P 5HA, includes a sanctuary and a church with accommodation for nearly 150 people. Services, lectures, healing meetings, and circles are held regularly. There is also a Greater World Healing Fellowship, concerned with spiritual healing through accredited healers. Each of the affiliated churches throughout Britain has at least one medium. Affiliated congregations are also found in Canada, the United States, and New Zealand. The association offers a diploma to mediums who meet the league's standards and for long-standing service to the league. Website: http://www.greaterworld.com.

Sources:

Edmunds, Simeon. Spiritualism: A Critical Survey. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

Greatrakes, Valentine (1629–1683)

Irish mesmerist, born in the county of Waterford. In 1662 Greatrakes dreamed that he had received the gift of healing by laying on of hands. He ignored the dream, but when it recurred on several occasions he experimented on his wife, which proved quite successful. He subsequently practiced the laying on of hands for practically all diseases and in 1666 went to London, where he was summoned to court. While there he healed many persons, but the insults of the courtiers proved too much for him and he was forced to withdraw to a house near London, where he continued his cures. In his Critical History of Animal Magnetism (2 vols., 1813, 1819), J. P. F. Deleuze states: "Amongst the most astonishing cures which history records, are those of an Irish gentleman in London, Oxford, and other cities of England and Ireland. He himself published in London in 1666 a full account of them: Val. Greatrakes Esq., of Waterford, in the kingdom of Ireland, famous for curing several diseases and distempers by the stroak of his hand only: London, 1660.

Joseph Glanvill, a chaplain to Charles II, stated in a letter that Greatrakes was a simple, amiable, and pious man, a stranger to all deceit. A similar testimony was offered by George Rust, bishop of Dromore in Ireland, who stated that Greatrakes was at his house for three weeks, giving him an opportunity to observe his sound morals and many of his cures. Through the simple laying on of hands, said the bishop, he drove pain to the extremities. Many times the effect was very rapid and as if by magic. If the pain did not immediately subside he repeated his rubbings and always drove the pain finally into the limbs to expel it.

The Bishop further stated that "I can as eyewitness assert that Greatrakes cured dizziness, very bad diseases of the eyes and ears, old ulcers, goitre, epilepsy, glandular swellings, scirrhous indurations, and cancerous swellings. I have seen swellings disperse in five days which were many years old, but I do not believe by supernatural means; nor did his practice exhibit anything sacred. The cure was sometimes very protracted, and the diseases only gave way through repeated exertions; some altogether resisted his endeavours."

It appeared to the bishop that "something healing, something balsamic" flowed from the healer. Greatrakes himself believed that his power was a special gift of God. He healed even epidemic complaints by his touch and believed it his duty to devote himself to the cure of diseases.

To the bishop's testimony may be added that of two physicians, Faireklow and Astel, who assiduously inquired into the reality of his cures. Faireklow noted, "I was struck with his gentleness and kindness to the unhappy, and by the effects which he produced by his hand." Astel stated, "I saw Greatrakes in a moment remove most violent pains merely by his hand. I saw him drive a pain from the shoulder to the feet. If the pains in the head or the intestines remained fixed, the endeavor to remove them was frequently followed by the most dreadful crises, which even seemed to bring the patient's life into danger; but by degrees they disappeared into the limbs, and then altogether. I saw a scrofulous child of twelve years with such swellings that it could not move, and he dissipated merely with his hand the greatest part of them. One of the largest, however, he opened, and so healed it with his spittle."

Astel stated that he saw a number of other cures, and repeated the testimonies of Rust and Faireklow on the character of Greatrakes.

The celebrated Robert Boyle, president of the Royal Society of London, stated, "Many physicians, noblemen, clergymen, etc., testify to the truth of Greatrakes' cures, which he published in London. The chief diseases which he cured were blindness, deafness, paralysis, dropsy, ulcers, swellings, and all kinds of fevers."

Greatrakes was one of the most celebrated of the early mesmerists, and there is no question that mesmerism owed some of its popularity to his cures. According to accounts, he cured the king's evil, palsy, dropsy, epilepsy, ulcers, gallstones, wounds and bruises, lameness, deafness, and partial blindness by laying on of hands, stroking the pain out of its seat, and finally driving it out at the extremities. The Royal Society published accounts of his cures in their Transactions.

After several years of spectacular cures, Greatrakes seemed to lose his power.

Sources:

A Brief account of Mr. Valentine Greatrakes, and divers of the strange cures by him lately Performed; written by himself in a letter addressed to the Honourable Robert Boyle Esq. London, 1666. Reprint, Dublin: Samuel Dancer, 1688.

Greatrakes, V. Val. Greatrakes, Esq., of Waterford, in the kingdom of Ireland, famous for curing several diseases and distempers by the stroak of his hand only. London: The Author, 1660.

Henry Stubbe: The Miraculous Conformist; or an account of Several Marvailous Cures performed by Mr. Valentine Greatarick. Oxford, England, 1666.

Pechlin, J. N. Observationes Physico-Medicae. Hamburg, Germany, 1691.

Great White Brotherhood

The group of superhuman adepts or masters who many Theosophists and other occultists believed guide the development of the human race. The brotherhood was occasionally associated with a "great white lodge" situated in astral realms. Modern Rosicrucians define the Great White Brotherhood as "the school or Fraternity of the Great White Lodge and into this invisible Brotherhood of visible members every true student of the Path prepares for admission." Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Garver, Will. Brother of the Third Degree. Halcyon, Calif.: Halcyon Temple Press, 1929.

Great White Brotherhood. The Books of Azrael: Teachings. Santa Barbara, Calif.: J. F. Rowney Press, n.d.

Johnson, K. Paul. The Masters Revealed: Madam Blavatsky and the Myth of the Great White Lodge. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Leadbeater, Charles W. The Masters and the Path. Chicago: Theosophical Press, 1925.

Perkins, Lynn F. The Masters as New Age Mentors. Lakemont, GA: CSA Press, 296.

Prophet, Elizabeth Clare. The Great White Brotherhood in the Culture, History and Religion of America. Los Angeles: Summit University Press, 1983.

GREECE

Magic in Ancient Greece

Magic in all of its aspects was native to the imagination and genius of the Greeks, as was the case with most ancient peoples. Evidence abounds in their theogony, mythology (essentially magical in conception and meaning), literature, sculpture, and history. The nature that surrounded them gave rise to their imaginations. The mountains and valleys, mysterious caves and fissures, vapors and springs of volcanic origin, and sacred groves were all, according to their character, dedicated to the gods. Parnassus was the abode of the sun-god Apollo; the lovely vale of Aphaca that of Adonis; the oak-groves of Dodona favored of Zeus; and the gloomy caves with their roar of subterranean waters the Oracle of Trophonius.

Innumerable instances of magical wonder-working are found in the stories of Greek deities and heroes. The power of transformation is shown in a multitude of cases, among them that of Bacchus who, by waving a spear, could change the oars of a ship into serpents and the masts into heavy-clustered vines. He could also cause tigers, lynxes, and panthers to appear amidst the waves and the terrified sailors leaping overboard to take the shape of dolphins. In the story of Circe, the enchantress took her magic wand and with her enchanted philter turned her lovers into swine.

The serpent-staff of Hermes gave, by its touch, life or death, sleep or waking; Medusa's head turned its beholders into stone; Hermes gave Perseus wings that he might fly and Pluto a helmet which conferred invisibility. Prometheus molded a man of clay and to give it life stole celestial fire from heaven; Odysseus, to peer into the future, descended to Hades in search of Tiresias the Soothsayer; Archilles was made invulnerable by the waters of the Styx.

Dedicated by immemorial belief, there were places where the visible spirits of the dead might be evoked and where men in curiosity, longing, or remorse strove to call back those who had passed beyond mortal ken. In March, when the spring blossoms appeared and covered the trees, the Festival of the Flowers was held at Athens. The Commemoration of the Dead also occurred in the spring. It was thought that the spirits of the deceased rose from their graves and wandered about the familiar streets, striving to enter the dwellings of men and the temples of the gods but were shut out by the magic of branches of whitethorn, or by knotted ropes and pitch.

Oracles

Of great antiquity and eminently of Greek character and meaning were the Oracles. For centuries they ministered to that longing ingrained in human nature to know the future and to invoke divine foresight and aid in the direction of human affairs, from those of a private citizen to the multitudinous needs of the state. Divination and prophecy became the great features of the oracles. They were inspired by various means, including intoxicating fumes, natural or artificial mind-altering drugs, the drinking of mineral springs, signs and tokens, and dreams.

The most famous Oracles were those at Delphi, Dodona, Epidaurus, and that of Trophonius, but others of renown were scattered over the country. Perhaps one of the earliest was that of Aesculapius, son of Apollo and called the Healer, the Dream-sender, because his healing was given through the medium of dreams that came upon the applicant while sleeping in the temple-courts, the famous temple-sleep. This temple, situated at Epidaurus, was surrounded by sacred groves and whole companies of sick persons lingered there in search of lost health and enlightenment through divine dreams.

Famous above all was that of Apollo, the Delphian oracle, on the Southern Slopes of Parnassus, where kings, princes, heroes, and slaves of all countries journeyed to ask the questions as to the future and what it might hold for them. The temple was built above a volcanic chasm, amid a wildness of nature that suggested the presence of the unseen powers. Here the priestess, the Pythia, so named after the serpent Pytho whom Apollo slew, was seated on a tripod placed above the gaseous vapors rising from the chasm. Intoxicated to a state of frenzy, her mouth foaming, wild torrents of words fell from her lips. These words were shaped into coherence and meaning by the attendant priests and given to the waiting questioner crowned with laurel, the symbol of sleep and dreams, who stood before the altar.

Priests and priestesses were also crowned with these leaves, which were sacred to Apollo and burned as incense. Before the Pythias chamber hung a falling screen of laurel branches, while at the festival of the Septerion every ninth year a bower of laurel was erected in the forecourt of the temple. One writer has left strange details, such as the rule that the sacred fire within the temple must only be fed with firwood, and although a woman was chosen as the medium of the prophetic utterance, no woman might question the oracle.

The Oracle of the Pelasgic Zeus at Dodona was the oldest of all. It answered by signs rather than inspired speech, by means of lots and the falling of water, or by the wind-moved clanging of brazen-bowls, two hollow columns standing side by side.

The three priestesses or Peliades (meaning doves) were given titles signifying the Diviner of the Future; the friend of man, Virtue; and the virgin-ruler of man, Chastity. For 2,000 years this oracle existed. It was consulted by those heroes of the ancient myths struggling in the toils of Fate—Hercules, Achilles, Ulysses and Aeneas—down to the later vestiges of Greek nationality.

The Oracle of Trophonius was also of great renown. Here there were numerous caverns filled with misty vapors and troubled by the noise of hidden waters far beneath. In this mysterious gloom the supplicants slept sometimes for nights and days, coming forth in a somnambulic state from which they were aroused and questioned by the attendant priests. Frightful visions were generally recounted, accompanied by a terrible melancholy, so that it passed into a proverb regarding a sorrowful man, "He has been in the cave of Trophonius."

Magic, in the sense of secret revelations, miraculous cures, prophetic gifts, and unusual powers, had always existed for the Greeks. The oracles were a human way of communicating with their gods on earth.

Magic in the sense of sorcery was introduced into Greece from Asia and Egypt. It had to fit into a conception of Fate as inexorable and inescapable for gods, rulers, and slaves alike, a belief which warred a form of magic that had for its primary aim a certain command of the destinies of man.

Good and evil and the perpetual strife between these two principles and the belief in demonology gradually evolved within Greek thought. It was said that the first mention of good and evil demons could be traced to the Pythagorean school. Not until after the Persian War was there a word in the Greek language for "magic." As these beliefs emerged, they were ascribed to the native deities, gradually becoming incorporated with the ancient histories and rites.

Sorcery and Enchantment

After the invasion by the Persians, Thessaly, where their stay was of lengthy duration, became famous for its sorceresses and their practices, engaging in miracles and magic enough to call down the moon or to brew magical herbs for love or death. Thus Apuleius in his romance The Golden Ass stated that when in Thessaly he was in the place,

". . .where, by common report of the world, sorcery and enchantments were most frequent. I viewed the situation of the place in which I was, nor was there anything I saw that I believed to be the same thing which it appeared to be. Insomuch that the very stones in the street I thought were men bewitched and turned into that figure, and the birds I heard chirping, the trees without the walls, and the running waters, were changed from human creatures into the appearances they were. I persuaded myself that the statues and buildings could move; that the oxen and other brute beasts could speak and tell strange tidings; that I should hear and see oracles from heaven conveyed in the beams of the Sun."

Homer told the tale of Circe the enchantress, with her magic philters and magic songs, but made no mention of Medea, the arch-sorceress of later times. Around her name the later beliefs clustered. All the evil arts were attributed to her. She became the witch par excellence, her infamy increasing from age to age.

The same was true of Hecate, the moon-goddess, at first sharer with Zeus of the heavenly powers, but later an ominous shape of gloom, ruler and lover of the night and darkness, of the world of phantoms and ghouls. Like the Furies she wielded the whip and cord; she was followed by hell hounds, by writhing serpents, lamiae, strygae and empusae, and figures of terror and loathing. She presided over the dark mysteries of birth and death; she was worshipped at night in the flare of torches. She was the three-headed Hecate of the crossroads where little round cakes or a lizard mask set about with candles were offered to her in propitiation, that none of the phantom mob might cross the threshold of man.

Love-magic and death-magic, the usual forms of sorcery, became common in Greece as elsewhere. Love philters and charms were eagerly sought, the most innocent being bitten apples and enchanted garlands. Means of protection against the evil eye became a necessity, tales of bewitchment were spread abroad, and misfortune and death were being brought upon the innocent and unwary by means of a waxen figure molded in their image and tortured by the sorceress.

In tombs and secret places, leaden tablets were buried with inscriptions of the names of foes and victims and pierced through with a nail in order to bring disaster and death upon them. At this time it became law that no one who practiced sorcery might participate in the Eleusinian Mysteries, and at Athens a Samian Sorceress, Theoris, was cast to the flames.

Orphic Magic

The introduction of Egyptian influences were due generally to the agency of Orpheus and Pythagoras, who, while in Egypt, had been initiated into the mysteries. The story of Orpheus shows him as preeminently the wonder-worker, but one of beneficence and beauty. To men of his time, everything was enchantment and prodigy. By the irresistible power of his music he constrained the rocks, trees, and animals to follow him; at his behest storms arose or abated. He was the necromancer, who by his golden music overcame the powers of darkness, and, descending to the world of shades, found his beloved Eurydice. They gained the upper air that brought her back to the living world.

Jealous women tore him limb from limb, and his head floated down the waters of the Hebrus and was cast on the rocky shores of Lesbos where, still retaining the power of speech, it uttered oracles that gave guidance to people. Orpheus was believed to have instructed the Greeks in medicine and magic, and for long afterward remedies, magical formulas, incantations, and charms were engraved upon Orphean tablets and the power of healing was ascribed to the Orphean hymns.

Pythagoras, a philosopher, geometrician, and magician who was tireless in the pursuit of knowledge, had an immense influence on the thought of his time. After his return from Egypt he founded a school where to those who had previously undergone severe and drastic discipline he communicated his wide and varied knowledge. He was also credited with miraculous powers such as being visible at the same hour in places as far apart as Italy and Sicily, taming a bear by whispering in its ear, and calling an eagle from its flight to alight on his wrist.

Mysteries

Among the greatest features of religious life were the mysteries held at periodic intervals in connection with the different deities, such as the Samothracian, the Bacchic, and, most famous of all, the Eleusinian. Their origin is to be traced mostly to a prehistoric nature-worship and vegetation-magic.

All these mysteries had three trials or baptisms by water, fire, and air, and three specially sacred emblems, the phallus, egg, and serpent, generative emblems sacred in many secret rites.

The Samothracian centered around four mysterious deities: Axieros, the mother; her children: Axiocersos, male; Axiocersa, female; and Casindos the originator of the universe. The festival probably symbolized the creation of the world and also the harvest and its growth. Connected with this mystery was the worship of Cybele, goddess of the earth, cities, and fields. Her priests, the Corybantes, dwelt in a cave where they held their ceremonies, including a wild and orgiastic weapon-dance, accompanied by the incessant shaking of heads and clanging of swords on shields.

The cult of Bacchus, it was thought, had been carried into Greece from Egypt by Melampus. He was the god of the vine and vegetation, and his mysteries typified the growth of the vine and the vintage—the winter sleep of all plant life and its renewal in spring. Women were his chief attendants—the Bacchantes, who, clashing cymbals and uttering wild cries in invocation of their god, became possessed by ungovernable fury and homicidal mania.

Greatest of all in their relation to Hellenic life were the Eleusinian Mysteries. These were the paramount interest and function of the state religion exerting the widest, strongest influence on people of all classes. The rites were secret and their details are practically unknown, but they undoubtedly symbolized the myth of Demeter, corn-goddess, and were held in spring and September.

Prior to initiation, a long period of purification and preparation was enforced. During this time the higher meaning of the myth was ingrained. The original meaning became exalted by the genius of the Greeks into an intimate allegory of the soul of man, its birth, life, death, descent into Hades, and subsequent release therefrom. After this came the central point of the mysteries, the viewing of certain holy and secret symbols; next, a crowning of garlands, signifying the happiness that arises from friendship with the divine. The festival also embodied a scenic representation of the story of Demeter, the rape of Persephone, the sorrow of the mother, her complaints before Zeus, and the final reconciliation.

Women played a great part in this, the reason being that as they themselves "produce," so by sympathetic magic their influence was conveyed to the corn, as when crying aloud for rain they looked upward to the skies, then down to the earth with cries of "Conceive!" These priestesses were crowned with poppies and corn, symbolical attributes of the deity they implored.

Divination

Besides the priests and priestesses attached to the different temples, there was an order of men called "interpreters," whose business was divining the future by various means such as the flight of birds and entrails of victims. These men often accompanied the armies in order to predict the success or failure of operations during warfare and thus avert the possibility of mistakes in the campaign. They fomented or repressed revolutions in state and government by their predictions.

The most celebrated interpreters were those of Elis, where in two or three families, notably the Iamidae and the Clytidae, this peculiar gift or knowledge was handed down from father to son for generations. There were also others who were authorized by the state, both men and women, who professed to read the future in natural and unnatural phenomena, eclipses, thunder, dreams, unexpected sight of certain animals, convulsive movement of eyelids, tingling of the ears, sneezing, and a few words casually dropped by a passerby.

In the literature and philosophies of Greece, magic in all its forms is found as a theme for imagination, discussion, and belief. In the hands of the tragic poets, sorceresses such as Circe and Medea became figures of terror and death, embodiments of evil.

Pythagoras left no writings but on his theories were founded those of Empedocles and Plato. In the verses of Empedocles he teaches the theory of reincarnation, he himself remembering previous existences wherein he was a boy, a girl, a plant, a fish and a bird. He also claimed to teach the secrets of miraculous medicine, of the reanimation of old age, of bringing rain, storm, or sunshine, and of recalling the dead.

Aristides, the Greek orator, gave exhaustive accounts of the many dreams he experienced during sleep in the temples and the cures prescribed therein. Socrates told of his attendant spirit or genius who warned him, and others through his agency, of impending danger, also foretelling futurity. Xenophon, treating of divination by dreams, maintained that in sleep the human soul reveals her divine nature, and, being freed from trammels of the body, gazes into futurity.

Plato, while inveighing against sorcery, took the popular superstitions relating to magic, demons, and spirits and used them as a basis for a spiritual and magical theory of things. On his teaching would be founded the Neo-Platonists school, which was among the most fervid defender of magic.

Aristotle stated that prediction is a purely natural quality of the imagination. Both precognition and telepathy were crucial in his reasoning. His philosophy allowed for the possibility of parapsychological phenomena even if it could not be scientifically proven. Another important figure and commentator from Ancient Greece, Plutarch gave an exhaustive account on the somnambulic states of the oracular priestess, Pythia, attributing them to possession by the divinity.

Vampirism

Some of the later superstitions of the Hellenic archipelago partake more of the nature of Slavonic tradition than that of the ancient inhabitants of Greece. One of the most notable circumstances in later Greek superstition relates to vampirism.

The vampire was called vroucolaca or broucolack by the Greeks, and appears to have come into Greek thought from the Slavic world in early medieval times. French researcher Augustine Calmet, author of Dissertations Upon the Apparitions of Angels, Daemons and Ghosts, and concerning . . . Vampires (1759) stated,

"It is asserted by the modern Greeks, in defence of their schism, and as a proof that the gift of miracles, and the episcopal power of the keys, subsists in their church more visibly and evidently than in the church of Rome, that, with them, the bodies of excommunicated persons never rot, but swell up to an uncommon size, and are stretched like drums, nor ever corrupt or fall to dust, till they have received absolution from some bishop or priest. And they produce many instances of carcasses which have been in their graves uncorrupted, and which have afterwards putrefied as soon as the excommunication was taken off.

"They do not, however, deny that a body's not corrupting is sometimes a proof of sanctity, but in this case they expect it to send forth an agreeable smell, to be white or ruddy, and not black, stinking, and swelled like a drum, as the bodies of excommunicated persons generally are. We are told, that in the time of Manuel, or Maximus, patriarch of Constantinople, the Turkish emperor having the mind to know the truth of the Greek notion concerning the incorruption of excommunicated bodies, the patriarch ordered the grave of a woman, who had lived in a criminal commerce with an archbishop of Constantinople, to be opened. Her body being found entire, black and much swelled, the Turks put it into a chest, under the emperor's seal, and the patriarch having repeated a prayer, and given absolution to the deceased, the chest was opened three days after and the body was found reduced to ashes. It is also a notion which prevails among the Greeks, that the bodies of these excommunicated persons frequently appear to the living, both day and night, and speak to them, call upon them, and disturb them several other ways.

"Leo Allatius is very particular upon this head, and says, that in the isle of Chio, the inhabitants never answer the first time they are called, for fear of its being a spectre; but if they are called twice, they are sure it is not a Broucolack (this is the name they give these spirits). If any one appears at the first call, the spectre disappears, but the person certainly dies.

"They have no way to get rid of these evil genii, but to dig up the body of the person that has appeared, and burn it after having repeated over it certain prayers. By this means the body being reduced to ashes, appears no more. And they look upon it as a clear case, that either these mischievous and spiteful carcasses come out of their graves of their own accord, and occasion the death of the persons that see or speak to them; or that the devil himself makes use of these bodies to frighten and destroy mankind. They have hitherto discovered no remedy which more infallibly rids them of these plagues, than to burn or mangle the bodies which were made use of for these cursed purposes. Sometimes the end is answered by tearing out the heart and letting the bodies rot above ground before they burn them again, or by cutting off the head, or driving a large nail through the temples."

Sir Paul Rycaut in his The Present State of the Greek & Armenian Churches (1679) observed that the opinion that excommunicated bodies are preserved from putrefaction prevails not only among the Greeks, but also among the Turks, and he gives us a fact that he had from a caloyer (monk) of Candia, who confirmed it to him upon oath. The caloyer's name was Sophronius, a man well known and respected in Smyrna.

A man, who was excommunicated for a fault that he had committed in the Morea, died on the island of Milo and was buried in a private place, without any ceremonies, and in unconsecrated ground. His relatives and friends expressed great dissatisfaction that he was treated in this manner; soon after that the inhabitants of the island were tormented every night by frightful apparitions, which they attributed to this unhappy man. Upon opening the grave his body was found entire; his veins swelled with blood and a consultation was held upon the subject with the caloyers dismembering his body, cutting it in pieces, and boiling it in wine, which, it seems, is the usual manner of proceeding there in those cases.

The friends of the deceased prevailed upon them, by dint of entreaty, to delay the execution, and in the meantime sent to Constantinople to get absolution for him from the patriarch. Until the messenger could return, the body was laid in the church, and prayers and masses were said daily for the repose of his soul. One day while Sophronius, the caloyer above mentioned, was performing the service, there was suddenly heard a great noise in the coffin and upon examination the body was found reduced to ashes, as if it had been dead seven years. Particular notice was taken of the time when the noise was heard, and it was found to be the very morning when the absolution was signed by the patriarch. Sir Paul Rycaut, who has recorded this event, was neither a Greek nor Roman Catholic, but a staunch Protestant of the Church of England.

He observes upon this occasion that the notion among the Greeks is that an evil spirit enters into the excommunicated carcass and preserves it from corruption by performing the usual functions of the human soul in a living body. They suppose that these corpses eat by night and actually digest and are nourished by their food; that several have been found of a fresh, ruddy color, with their veins ready to burst with blood, full forty days after their death; and that upon being opened there is a large a quantity of warm, fresh blood as if it were coming from a healthy young person. This opinion prevails so universally, that everyone is furnished with a story to this purpose.

Father Theophilus Raynard, a Roman Catholic author of a particular treatise upon this subject, asserted that this return of the dead is an undoubted truth and is supported by unquestionable facts. He also argued that to pretend that these spectres are always excommunicated persons, and that the Church of Greece has a privilege of preserving the bodies of those who die in the church, is something that cannot be affirmed. It is certain that excommunicated bodies rot as well as others, and that several who have died in the communion of the church, Greek as well as Roman, have continued uncorrupted. (In the Western Roman tradition, to die and remain uncorrupted was a sign of great sanctity.) There have even been instances of this nature among the heathens, and frequently among other animals, whose carcasses have been found unputrefied in the ground, and among the ruins of old buildings.

In his book A Voyage Into the Levant (1741), J. Pittonde Tournefort gave an account of the digging up of a believed broucolack in the island of Mycone, where he was January 1, 1701.

Psychical Research & Spiritualism

Because of the religious control asserted by the Greek Orthodox Church in the decades since modern Greece attained independence from Turkey, Greece has been one of the most hostile countries to the emergence of religious pluralism. Spiritualism, Theosophy, and other new religious impulses, occult and other aspects of the parapsychological movement have found little open support among the people of the country. In common with other European countries, Greek scientists did take an active interest in psychical studies during the 1920s and 1930s. Prominent societies included the Hellenic Society of Psychical Research and the Society for Psychical Research and the Society for Psychic Studies. The most prominent researcher was Angelos Tanagras, a high ranking naval officer who edited the Revue Psychikae Creonae of Athens from 1925 onward. He proposed a theory of precognition which involved the psychokinetic action of the percipient, thus sidestepping the issue of determinism.

At the present time, there are two active societies: The Society for the Scientific Study of Metaphysics, Rue Agathoupoleus 104, Athens; and the Psychic Society of Athens, 32 Tsiller-str., Athens 905. Both publish periodicals.

A society operating on the island of Cyprus not far from Greece in the Mediterranean, a country that was often fought over by both the Turks and the Greeks, is Psychognosis. Run by Linda Leblanc and John Knowles, it is a center for the investigation of psychic phenomena of all kinds. The society's website can be reached at: http://www.psychognosis.com.

Sources:

Abbott, G. F. Macedonian Folklore. Chicago: Argonaut, Inc., 1909.

Apuleius. The Golden Ass. Trans. Adlington. London: William Heineman, 1935.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Fontenrose, Joseph. Python: A Study of Delphic Myth and Its Origins. Berkeley, Calif.: University of California Press, 1959.

Lawson, John C. Modern Greek Folklore and Ancient Greek Religion. 1910. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: An Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Psychognosis Center, Island of Cyprus. http://www.psychognosis.com. June 6, 2000.

Schwab, Gustav. Gods and Heroes: Myths and Epics of Ancient Greece. New York: Pantheon Books, 1946.

Greeley, Horace (1811–1872)

Famous American political writer, editor of the New York Tribune, and an important figure in early American Spiritualism. He was the first to call upon the Fox Sisters on their arrival in New York in June 1850, and he admitted publicly that he was puzzled by the phenomena he observed and that he thought the good faith of the mediums could not be questioned.

The Fox sisters were guests at Greeley's home in New York for three days. During that period he became convinced of the genuineness of their mysterious rappings, although he did not accept the spirit hypothesis. "Whatever may be the origin of the cause of the rappings," he wrote, "the ladies in whose presence they occur do not make them. We tested this thoroughly and to our entire satisfaction."

The columns written in Greeley's paper were fair and impartial during periods of the wildest controversy. In his Recollections of a Busy Life (1868), he admits that "the jugglery hypothesis utterly fails to account for occurrences which I have personally witnessed," and that "certain developments strongly indicate that they do proceed from departed spirits." He submitted, however, that nothing of value was obtained from the investigation, that the spirits "did not help to fish up the Atlantic cable or find Sir John Franklin."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Moore, Lawrence R. In Search of White Crows. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.

Van Deusen, Glyndon G. Horace Greeley: Nineteenth-Century Crusader. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953.

Green, Celia Elizabeth (1935–)

Founder and director of the Institute of Psychophysical Research, Oxford, England, founded in 1961 to undertake research in the field of parapsychology and in "hitherto unexplored areas." Green was born November 26, 1935, in London. She studied at Oxford University, from which she received her B.A. (1957), M.A. (1960), and B. Litt. (1960). From 1958 to 1960 she studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, on a Perrott studentship in psychical research, and from 1957 to 1962 she was research secretary of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London. She is a fellow of the Royal Society of Medicine.

During the 1950s Green participated in the SPR study of spontaneous paranormal phenomena in Britain, covering some fifteen hundred cases. She wrote several books and a number of articles and contributed to the encyclopedia Man, Myth, and Magic (1970). Green also translated the English edition of René Sudre's book Traité de Parapsychologie, published as Treatise on Parapsychology (1960) in Britain and as Parapsychology (1960) in the United States.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Green, Celia. The Decline and Fall of Science. London: Hamilton, 1976.

———. The Human Evasion. London: Hamilton, 1969.

———. Lucid Dreams. Oxford: Institute of Psychophysical Research, 1968.

———. Out-of-the-Body Experiences: Proceedings of the Institute of Psychophysical Research. London: Hamilton, 1968.

———. "Report on the Spontaneous Cases Enquiry." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 53, no. 191 (November 1960).

Green, Celia, and Charles McCreely. Apparitions. London: Hamilton, 1975.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Greenbank, Richard Kelly (1924–)

Psychiatrist and psychoanalyst who wrote on parapsychology. He was born April 23, 1924, in Washington, D.C., and studied at George Washington University, Washington, D.C.; the Medical College of Virginia, Richmond; and the Philadelphia Psychoanalytic Institute. Before entering private practice as a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst in 1955, he was a resident psychiatrist at Norways Foundation Hospital, Indianapolis, Indiana, and a resident in psychiatry and research fellow at Jefferson Medical School and Hospital, Philadelphia. In 1968 he became chief of section of the Department of Psychiatry, Philadelphia General Hospital. In addition to many articles on psychiatric subjects, including hypnosis and the psychotherapy of schizophrenia, Greenbank wrote various articles on parapsychological subjects.

Sources:

Greenbank, Richard K. "Allegedly Prophetic Dreams in Psychotherapeutic Treatment." International Journal of Parapsychology (Summer 1960).

———. "Communication of Suicidal Thoughts." Canadian Psychiatric Association Journal (July 1957).

———. "My Wolf." Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology (May 1957).

———. "Unexplained Mental Phenomena Regarding Suicide." Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases (January 1957).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Green Egg

Green Egg, one of the oldest periodicals serving the contemporary Pagan community, dates to 1962 and the formation of a "water brotherhood" by Tim Zell and Lance Christie, both students at Westminster College in Fulton, Missouri. They were inspired in part by the description of a religious group in Robert Heinlein's science fiction classic, Stranger in a Strange Land. They called the brotherhood "Atl" and issued an information newsletter, The Atlan Torch. Shortly thereafter they transferred to the University of Oklahoma and the Atl became the Atlan Foundation. The Torch was transformed into The Atlan Annals.

In 1968, following his graduation, Zell relocated to St. Louis, Missouri, and the foundation again transformed this time into the Church of All Worlds (the name of the group in the Heinlein novel), and identified with the emerging Pagan movement. The Atlan Annals was discontinued and superseded by the Green Egg. The first issue was but a single sheet reproduced on a ditto machine. Over the next decade it grew into an 80-page magazine issued eight times annually and circulated freely as the organ for the expression of the diversity within the community. Numerous debates were fought out on the pages of its extensive letters-to-the-editor column. The Church of All Worlds prospered until 1974, when Zell retired from leadership and moved to rural northern California. He left the Green Egg in charge of the church members and it was soon discontinued. Through the next decade the church almost dissolved.

In the late 1980s Zell (now known as Otter) began to revive the church and in 1988 the first issue of what would be a new series of the Green Egg appeared on the 20th anniversary of its initial issue. It quickly regained its position within the Pagan community and in 1991 won the Silver Award from the Wiccan/Pagan Press Alliance as the "Most Professionally Formatted Pagan Publication." Adopting the professional look available in the 1990s for desktop publications, it has continued to improve in quality and became one of the first Pagan periodicals to be generally distributed first through the network of metaphysical bookstores and more recently into the chains of secular bookstores.

As of the end of the 1990s, Green Egg is a 72-page bimonthly publication reflective of the beliefs and practices of the contemporary Pagan Goddess-oriented world. Most recently, Maerian Morris has succeeded Zell, now known as Oberon Zell-Ravenheart, as editor. Each issue contains a set of feature articles, generally grouped around a single theme. Space is also devoted to issues being discussed within the Pagan community, poetry, and several columns. The magazine still features the "Forum," its extensive letters-to-the-editor column.

Green Egg is published at 212 S. Main St., Ste. 22B, Willits, CA 95490. It has a website at http://www.greenegg.org/.

Sources:

Green Egg. Willits, Calif., n.d.

Green Egg. http://www.greenegg.org/. February 28, 2000.

The Green Man

A mysterious legendary character in British folklore dating back to medieval times, deriving from a pagan god of vegetation and the woodlands. Although his origins are shrouded in antiquity, he may also be related to myths of the Arcadian goat-god, Pan. The Green Man is usually represented by a human face embedded in foliage, but some ancient representations depict him as horned, suggesting a connection with a witchcraft deity. He has even been depicted in carved decorations on old churches and cathedrals, suggesting that at some period, pagan deities were supplanted by Christianity.

During the Christian eras, the Green Man survived in folk plays and folklore customs, such as the May Day revels, when he was called "Jack in the Green" or some similar name. Traditions of the Green Man may also have merged with the legends of Robin Hood.

Greenwood, Joseph Albert (1906–1988)

Mathematician who worked in the field of parapsychology. He was born September 18, 1906, at Breckenridge, Missouri, and studied at the University of Missouri (B.A., 1927; M.A., 1929; Ph.D., 1931).

He was an instructor and later an assistant professor of mathematics at Duke University (1930–42). While there he worked with J. B. Rhine, who recruited him to provide the statistical work for his research on parapsychology. Greenwood emerged as a major spokesperson answering criticisms of the statistical work being carried on at Duke, about which he wrote a number of articles. After the war began in 1942, he left Duke to serve in the United States Navy (1942–46). He spent his postwar career working for the U.S. government. He became a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man. "Joseph A. Greenwood, 1906–1988." Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man Bulletin 37 (Spring 1988).

Greenwood, Joseph A. "Analysis of a Large Chance Control Series of ESP Data." Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1938).

———. "A Co-Variation Statistic." Journal of Parapsychology 3 (1939).

———. "An Empirical Investigation of Some Sampling Problems." Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1938).

———. "Mathematical Techniques Used in ESP Research." Journal of Parapsychology 1 (1937).

———. "A Reply to Dr. Feller's Critique." Journal of Parapsychology 4 (1940).

———. "Some Mathematical Problems for Future Consideration Suggested by ESP Research." Journal of Parapsychology 3 (1939).

———. "Variance of the ESP Call Series." Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1938).

Greenwood, Joseph A., and C. E. Stuart. "Review of Criticisms of the Mathematical Evaluation of ESP Data." Journal of Parapsychology 1 (1937).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Gregory, Anita (Kohsen) (1925–1984)

British parapsychologist with a background in psychology; her late husband, C. C. L. Gregory, was also a parapsychologist. Anita Gregory was principal lecturer in education at the Polytechnic of North London, where she taught psychology and philosophy. Gregory was born Anita Kohsen on June 9, 1925, in Berlin, Germany. Because her parents were Jewish, it was soon necessary for her to leave Germany. For a time she was entrusted to a Belgian convent before eventually moving to England, where she studied at Birkbeck College, University of London, taking an honors degree in languages before studying politics, economics, philosophy, psychology, and physiology at St. Hugh's College, Oxford University. In 1949 she became interested in psychical research through Dr. William Brown, a reader in mental philosophy at Oxford, who discussed with her the phenomena of the Austrian medium Rudi Schneider.

In 1954 Kohsen married Clive Gregory, emeritus director of the University of London Observatory, and the two formed the Institute for the Study of Mental Images at their home in Hampshire and published various joint papers on psychology and cosmology. Between 1961 and 1964 they issued their own journal, Cosmos, which included contributions on Clive Gregory's concept of the "O-Structure," a theory of psychophysical cosmology.

In 1962 Anita Gregory translated a study of ESP by the Russian parapsychologist L. L. Vasiliev, which was published the following year by the Institute for the Study of Mental Images under the title Experiments in Distant Influence. An expanded edition was published in 1976. Gregory also edited a collection of the writings of Sir Cyril Burt on psychical research, published as ESP and Psychology. Her own study of the Rudi Schneider case occupied a full issue of the journal Annals of Science in 1977 and was later published as a separate book. She also contributed various articles to Psychic News, using the pseudonyms "Zebedee" and "John Barnes."

She was an active member of the Society for Psychical Research, serving on the council and becoming honorary secretary for a period. While with the society, Gregory conducted a series of experiments with British psychic Matthew Manning, resulting in an 85-page report in 1982. This included some valuable observations on the role of the experimenter by Manning himself. In 1981 Gregory participated in the Parapsychology Foundation's Thirtieth Annual International Conference in New York, presenting a paper on "Investigating Macro-Physical Phenomena."

In August 1983 she was awarded a doctorate by the Council for National Academic Awards. She taught a course on psychical research at the School of Education in the North London Polytechnic. She suffered from illness for a long period after the death of her husband in 1964 and died November 7, 1984.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Gregory, Anita. "London Experiments with Matthew Manning." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 56 (1982).

———. "Psychical Research as a Social Activity." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 51 (1981).

———. The Strange Case of Rudi Schneider. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1985.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Gregory VII, Pope (ca. 1023–1085)

A pope of the eleventh century against whom a charge of necromancy was brought. Gregory was chiefly noted for his bitter and prolonged struggle with Henry IV, emperor of Germany. A quarrel arose between them regarding a gift by Henry of ecclesiastical dignities. Henry was summoned before Gregory to account for the gifts. He refused to appear, was excommunicated, and, in return, had the pope kidnapped by brigands.

Gregory, however, was rescued by the people of Rome and on his release commanded the Germans to elect a new emperor, Rudolph, duke of Swabia. Henry, attended by a very small retinue, went to Canossa, where Gregory resided, to arrange for terms of peace. He was treated with such severity and neglect that he lost his desire to come to terms with the pope, and on his return he elected an antipope, Clement III. In the struggle that ensued, Henry defeated Rudolph in battle and Gregory was sentenced as a sorcerer. He died in exile at Salerno.

Gregory's fame rests not in magic but chiefly on a prophecy he made publicly that Rudolph would be victorious "before St. Peter's day," a statement on which he staked his papal crown. The unfortunate Rudolph, entirely trusting Gregory's prediction, renewed the battle six times and finally died without having obtained the promised victory.

Other stories credit Gregory with the power of making lightning with a motion of his hand and causing thunder to dart from his sleeve. It was related by Benno that on one occasion he left his magic book behind him at his villa. Entrusting two of his servants with the task of returning for it, he warned them not to look into it on pain of the most awful punishment. Curiosity overcame the fears of one of them, and, opening the book, he pronounced some words. Immediately a band of imps appeared and asked what they commanded. The terrified servants begged the demons to cast down as much of the city wall as lay in their way; thus they escaped punishment for their disobedience. Notwithstanding such folklore, there is no real evidence that Gregory practiced sorcery.

Grenzgebiete der Wissenschaft (Journal)

German-language quarterly journal of parapsychology, the organ of the Austrian organization the Institut für Grenzgebiete der Wissenschaft und von Imago Mundi, edited by Professor Andreas Resch. Address: Resch Verlag, Maximilianstr. 8, Postfach 8, A-6020 Innsbruck, Austria.

Greville, T(homas) N(all) E(den) (1910–1998)

Mathematician who took part in statistical evaluation of experiments on ESP. He was born December 27, 1910, in New York City and studied at the University of the South in Sewanee, Tennessee (B.A., 1930), and the University of Michigan (M.A., 1932; Ph.D., 1933). After graduation Greville became an instructor in mathematics at the University of Michigan (1937–40) and then worked for the United States Bureau of the Census during World War II (1940–46). After the war he spent his career as a mathematician and statistician for various government agencies.

Greville compiled the United States Life Tables and Actuarial Tables 1939–41 (1946), one of several books on statistics. His parapsychological interest was largely in statistical evaluation of ESP experiments, on which he wrote a number of papers. He was a member of the Parapsychological Association and served as statistical editor of the Journal of Parapsychology.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Greville, T. N. E. "Exact Probabilities for the Matching Hypothesis." Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1938).

———. "A Method of Evaluating the Reinforcement Effect." Journal of Parapsychology 15 (1951).

———. "On Multiple Matching with One Variable Deck." Annals of Mathematical Statistics 15 (1944): 432–34.

———. "A Reappraisal of the Mathematical Evaluation of the Reinforcement Effect." Journal of Parapsychology 18 (1954).

———. "A Summary of Mathematical Advances Bearing on ESP." Journal of Parapsychology 3 (1939).

———. "A Survey and Appraisal of the Statistical Methods Used in Parapsychological Research." Journal of Parapsychology 13 (1949).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

The Grimoire of Honorius

A grimoire, or text of magic instructions, published in Rome in 1629, and not, as is generally thought, connected in any way with kabbalistic magic. The work is actually permeated with Christian ideas. It is extremely unlikely that it is the work of the Roman bishop known as Honorius. The work has been called "a malicious and somewhat clever imposture," since it pretends to convey the sanction of the papal chair to the operators of necromancy. It deals with the evocation of the rebellious angels.

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. The History of Magic. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1971.

McIntosh, Christopher. The Devil's Bookshelf. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1985.

Grimoires

Detailed books of magic rituals and spells, often invoking spirit entities. The term derives from grammarye or grammar, as magic was in times past intimately connected to the correct usage of language. Several of the more important grimoires were attributed the wise biblical king Solomon, while others were said to be the work of other ancient notables.

Grimoires began to appear during medieval times, when Western society was controlled by the Roman Catholic church, and the early grimoires reflect the conflict with Catholicism's supernaturalism. The grimoires called upon spirits generally thought to be evil by the church and were thus often branded as instruments of black magic. Some grimoires directly challenged church authority. One book of black magic was attributed to a pope. In the last century, a new form of ceremonial magic that operates outside the Christian sphere has arisen. Grimoires have thus taken on the trappings of an alternative religious worldview that assumes a neutral position with regard to Christianity.

Throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, students of magic have tracked down many grimoires, some rare copies of which survived in the British Museum and the Bibliotheque de l'Arsenal in Paris, and made them available to the public. The Magus, published by Francis Barrett in London in 1801, stands as the fountainhead of these efforts. Barrett had access to a number of magic documents from which he took bits and pieces to construct a section of his book, which he titled The Cabala or The Secret Mysteries of Ceremonial Magic Illustrated. It includes not only instructions for working magic but also imaginative drawings of the various evil spirits he discusses. The Magus is important in being the first modern publication with sufficient instruction to actually attempt magic rituals.

The next major step in preserving grimoires came in the mid-nineteenth century with the writings of Éliphas Lévi. His 1856 book, The Ritual of Transcendent Magic, enlarges upon Barrett's presentation and discusses several grimoires. In The History of Magic (1971) he includes a lengthy discussion of The Grimoire of Honorius (1629). Lévi's books did much to create a revival of magic which then took embodiment in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the first modern group to create a whole system of ritual magic. As a result of the order's activities, several of its members took important steps in publishing grimoires.

The Work of MacGregor Mathers

Among the most important works attributed to Solomon was The Key of Solomon. A manuscript of the work in Greek found in the British Museum may date from as early as the thirteen century, and other copies in various languages can be found around Europe. In 1559 the Inquisition pronounced the Key a dangerous book and prohibited its being published or read. Many of the later grimoires, however, show its influence. In 1889 Golden Dawn leader S. L. MacGregor Mathers published an abridged edition of the work collating some seven different versions of it from the British Museum collection. His translation then became a major source for Golden Dawn rituals. It was reprinted in 1909, and a slightly revised, pirated American edition was published by L. W. deLaurence. The book, even in its abridged version, offers detailed instructions for preparing and executing various magic rituals involving the summoning and control of spirit entities.

Mathers also began work on a new edition of the Lemegeton, or Lesser Key of Solomon, (1916) a shorter book that lists a large number of spirit entities and gives instructions for summoning them. It seems to date from the sixteenth century. For whatever reason, the Lemegeton was not published and existed only in a manuscript version, which Mathers lent to Aleister Crowley. In 1903 Crowley and Mathers had a falling out, and Crowley published Mathers's work in 1904. As with The Key of Solomon, deLaurence published a pirated American edition.

Mathers then turned to his most impressive translating work, The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abra-Melin the Mage, (1974) a grimoire attributed to Abraham the Jew, a fourteenth-century German magician. In the introduction, Abraham claims that he met Abra-Melin in Egypt, where the older sage entrusted him with the secrets embodied in the text of The Book of Sacred Magic. The volume lays out in some detail the prerequisites for doing magic and then offers instructions on the rather rigorous process by which it is accomplished. The chief operation it describes leads one toward knowledge and communication with one's guardian angel (what some would call the higher self), an essential occurrence in the development of any ritual magician. Mathers's translation appeared in 1898 and, as with his other works, was also reprinted in a pirated American edition.

Mathers's work inspired others to action, not the least being Arthur E. Waite, who in 1898 published The Book of Black Magic and of Pacts Including the Mysteries of Goëtic Theurgy, Sorcery and Infernal Necromancy. Waite included a lengthy survey of the history and origin, as far as it could be known, of the various grimoires and then provided a working summary, with copious quotes and illustrations, of some of the more important grimoires. In addition to The Key of Solomon and the Lemegeton, the following grimoires are discussed in the book:

Arbatel, a sixteenth-century work published in Basle in 1575. It was supposed to include nine sections, but only one was ever published. That initial section, the "Isagoge," deals with fundamental magic instructions. Basic instructions for summoning the seven Olympic spirits believed to rule the planets are given.

The Grand Grimoire, also known as the Red Dragon. This grimoire had also been discussed at length by Éliphas Lévi. It had been published in the seventeenth century in France and was notable as a true work of black magic, for it included instructions on how to make a pact with the devil.

The Grimorium Verum, an eighteenth-century work claiming sixteenth-century origins. It is based in part on The Key of Solomon and claims Solomon as its ultimate source. It describes the characters and seals of the demons, their powers, and the method of invoking them.

The Grimoire of Honorius, attributed to an eighth-century bishop of Rome. It seems, however, to be a seventeenth-century product first published in 1629. It purportedly gave the sanction of the papal office to the practice of ritual magic.

The Black Pullet (1972), a product of the late eighteenth century and a type of popular romantic piece of the period. It is allegedly the product of a French soldier in Egypt during the Napoleonic excursion. Left for dead near the pyramids, he was rescued by a man who came out of one of them. The soldier was allowed to go into the pyramid, where he discovered a vast magic center. He was given information on the use of 22 talismans and the secret of manufacturing the black pullet, or the hen with the golden eggs.

Waite's discussions were continued by Idries Shah in The Secret Lore of Magic (1957) and to a lesser extent by Migene González-Wippler in The Complete Book of Spells, Ceremonies & Magic (1978).

Since World War II there has been a large market in magical texts, including grimoires, which has led to a number of reprintings of older editions. There have also been effort to create new grimoires, such as The Master Grimoire of Magickal Rites & Ceremonies (1982), by Nathan Elkana, which integrates material from the older works into a modern perspective with little mention of spirits and demons. A few completely new grimoires have appeared, and there have been several attempts to create The Necronomicon (1977), the book first mentioned in the fictional works of horror writer H. P. Lovecraft.

Sources:

Barett, Francis. The Magus. London: Lackington, Allen, 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

The Grimoire of Raphael. Edited by Fra. Zarathustra [Nelson White]. Pasadena, Calif.: The Technology Group, 1987.

Lemegeton; Clavicula Salomonis: or, The Complete Lesser Key of Solomon the King. Edited by Nelson White and Anne White. Pasadena, Calif.: The Technology Group, 1979.

Simon, ed. The Necronomicon. New York: Schlangekraft/ Barnes Graphics, 1877. Reprint, New York: Avon Books, 1977.

The Sword Book of Honourius the Magician. Translated and edited by Daniel J. Driscoll. Gilette, N.J.: Heptangle Books, 1977.

The Grimorium Verum

A grimoire, or textbook of magic instructions, first published in 1517 and purported to be translated from the Hebrew. It is based to some extent upon the "Key of Solomon the King" and is quite honest in its statement that it proposes to invoke devils. It refers to the four elements, so these would appear to be elementary spirits. A part of the account it gives regarding the hierarchy of spirits is taken from the Lemegeton, or Lesser Key of Solomon.

The work is divided into three portions. The first describes the characters and seals of the demons, with the forms of their evocation and dismissal; the second gives a description of the supernatural secrets that can be learned by the power of the demons; and the third is the key of the work and its proper application. But these divisions only outline what the Grimorium Verum purports to place before the reader, since the whole work is a mass of confusion. The plates that supply the characters do not apply to the text. The book really consists of two parts—the Grimorium Verum itself, and a second portion consisting of magic secrets. The first supplies directions for the preparation of the magician based on those of the Clavicle of Solomon. Instructions are given for the manufacture of magic instruments and for the composition of a parchment on which the characters and seals are to be inscribed, as well as the processes of evocation and dismissal.

The second part contains the "admirable secrets" of the pretended Albertus Magnus, the "Petit Albert," and so forth. The work is only partially diabolical in character, and some of its processes might be classified as white magic.

Grof, Stanislav (1931–)

Psychiatrist Stanislav Grof, known for his work in assisting people benefit from altered states of consciousness, was born on July 1, 1931, in Prague, Czechoslovakia (now the Czech Republic). He attended the Czechoslovakian University School of Medicine from which he received his M.D. and the Czechoslovakian Academy of Science who granted him a Ph.D. During his early adulthood he began research on various psychoactive drugs that would gain him an initial following.

In 1967 he was invited to Johns Hopkins University and in 1969 continued his research at the Maryland Psychoanalytic Research Institute. Then in 1973 Grof became a scholar-in-residence at Esalen Institute, the innovative human potentials center in the Big Sur country south of San Francisco, California. Over the next few years, he and his wife, Christina Grof, developed Holotropic Breathwork, a meditative practice that combines accelerated breathing with music and a relaxed body state that leads to various altered states of consciousness. They introduced the technique at Esalen in 1976 and continued to offer regular workshops through their tenure at Esalen, which came to an end in 1987. By this time, Holotropic Breathwork had become a popular practice within the burgeoning New Age community, and the Grofs founded Grof Transpersonal Training, through which they offer a two-year curriculum to train teachers of the breathwork techniques.

In the meantime, Grof authored a number of books including The Holotropic Mind: Three Levels of the Human Consciousness and How They Shape Our Lives, (1993) LSD Psychotherapy: Exploring the Frontiers of the Hidden Mind, (1994) and The Cosmic Game (1998). He was a cofounder and first president of the Association for Transpersonal Psychology.

Grof Transpersonal Training is headquartered at 20 Sunnyside, Ste. A314, Mill Valley, CA 94941. It has an Internet site at http://www.dnai.com/~gtt/.

Sources:

Grof Transpersonal Training and Holotropic Breathwork. http://www.dnai.com/~gtt/. May 23, 2000.

Grof, Stanislav. Beyond the Brain: Birth, Death, and Transcendence in Psychotherapy. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1986.

———. Books of the Dead: Manuals for Living and Dying. London: Thames and Hudson, 1994.

———. The Cosmic Game: Explorations of the Frontiers of Human Consciousness. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.

———. The Holotropic Mind: Three Levels of the Human Consciousness and How They Shape Our Lives. San Francisco: Harper San Francisco, 1993.

Gronkydoddles

A race of invisible pixies, first described by the ESP Laboratory, a group founded by Alcie Gwyn Manning of Los Angeles, California, and now known as ESP Laboratory of Texas. Address: 804 E. High St., Wills Point, TX 75169.

Gross, Don Hargrave (1923–)

American clergyman with special interests in paranormal healing, on which he wrote extensively. Gross was born on February 16, 1923, at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and studied at Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh (B.S. in physics, 1944).

He finished college just as World War II began and he joined the United States Naval Reserve as a technical radar officer (1944–46). He completed his seminary training at the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1949. He served several parishes before returning to school to earn a master's degree in psychology from the University of Pittsburgh (1959). From 1959 to 1960 he was assistant rector at Emmanuel Church, Boston, Massachusetts, the famous church from which the healing movement in the Episcopal Church originated. In 1960 he became the associate rector at Christ Church, Hamilton, Massachusetts.

Through the 1950s Gross wrote one book, The Case for Spiritual Healing (1958), and a variety of articles on healing. He contributed to the symposium "Spiritual Healing" in the spring 1956 issue of Religion in Life and wrote the section "Questions and Answers on the Healing Ministry" for The Churches' Handbook for Spiritual Healing (1957). He had a special interest in Kathryn Kuhlman, a healer from his hometown. He was a member of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Gross, Don H. The Case for Spiritual Healing. New York: T. Nelson, 1958.

———. "Kathryn Kuhlman: Another Point of View." The Pittsburgher (October–December 1954).

———. "Prayer That Heals." Religion in Life (Spring 1955).

———. "Spiritual Healing and the Archbishop's Commission." International Journal of Parapsychology (Autumn 1959).

Grosseteste, Robert (ca. 1175–1253)

Bishop of Lincoln, England, from 1235, generally known as Robert of Lincoln. A notable statesman and philosopher, he was also rumored to be proficient in the art of magic. Born of poor parents, he was compelled early to earn his own living and even at times to beg for bread. He was at length "discovered" by the mayor of Lincoln, who was attracted by his appearance and the shrewdness of his remarks and had him sent to school, where his capacity for study was so great that he was able to complete his education at Oxford, Cambridge, and Paris.

The illustrious Roger Bacon described Grosseteste and his friend Friar Adam de Marisco as the most learned men of their time. Grosseteste was well skilled in the sciences of mathematics and astronomy and was a master of Greek and Hebrew. As a member of the clergy he distinguished himself chiefly by his vigorous denunciation of the abuses in the court of Rome, particularly those of the pope, Innocent IV. Grosseteste did not hesitate to point out the misdeeds of the ecclesiastical dignitaries. He openly declared Innocent to be the Antichrist. In addition to reputedly publishing a treatise entitled Magick (probably a false ascription), legend also has it that he constructed a brazen head that would answer questions and foretell the future. (This story was also told of both Pope Silvester II and Roger Bacon.)

Ground Saucer Watch

A now-defunct organization, founded in 1957, that had a membership of scientists, engineers, professionals, and educated laymen interested in taking scientific action to resolve the controversial elements in UFO reports. Its objectives were as follows: to provide an accessible outlet for all interested persons who wish to report any aerial phenomena experiences without fear of ridicule or undue publicity; to "edify a confused media" with factual press releases, lectures, conferences, and interviews; to research and evaluate all UFO cases to which scientific criteria can be applied and analyzed with the use of specialized talents and instrumentation; to continue to pursue legal action against the federal government with lawsuits and Freedom of Information Act requests for release of UFO materials; and to bring forth workable hypotheses and theories of UFO origin and reasons for their continuing surveillance.

The Ground Saucer Watch ceased when it ran into financial troubles.

Group Soul

A philosophical concept expounded in The Road to Immortality (1932), a script purporting to be from the deceased and discarnate F. W. H. Myers as channeled through British medium Geraldine Cummins. The concept posits a number of souls bound together by one spirit, acting and reacting upon one another in the ascending scale of psychic evolution. There may be contained within that spirit any number of souls, according to Cummins:

"It is different for each man. But what the Buddhists would call the karma I had brought with me from a previous life is, very frequently, not that of my life, but of the life of a soul that preceded me by many years on earth and left for me the pattern which made my life. I, too, wove a pattern for another of my group during my earthly career. . . . I shall not live again on earth, but a new soul, one who will join our group, will shortly enter into the pattern or karma I have woven for him on earth. . . . Here, in the After-death, we become more and more aware of this group-soul as we make progress. Eventually brethren . . . its spirit feeds, with life and mental light, certain plants, trees, flowers, birds, insects, fish, beasts, men and women; representatives of living creatures in varying stages of evolution. It inspires souls who are on various planes, various levels of consciousness in the After-death. It feeds also creatures on other planets. For the spirit must gather a harvest of experience in every form."

Sources:

Cummins, Geraldine. The Road to Immortality. London: Ivor Nicholson & Watson, 1932.

Gruagach

"The long-haired one," from the Gaelic gruag, a wig. The gruagach was a fairy being with protective duties in Scottish legends, apparently of either sex, but generally female. The gruagach was particularly associated with cattle, and milk was laid aside for him or her every evening—otherwise no milk would be given at the next milking. Usually this being was of a beneficent nature, although it occasionally made mischief by loosing the cattle so that the herders had to get up, sometimes several times during a night, to tie them up. This apparently caused the gruagach much impish delight.

Among the many stories of fairies, there are tales in different parts of Scotland about the gruagach. It seems that this fairy commonly had long hair and was well dressed, whichever sex it happened to be.

Sources:

Thompson, Francis. The Supernatural Highland. London: Robert Hale, 1976.

Gruber, Karl (1881–1927)

Professor of biology and zoology at Munich Polytechnic, Germany, and a noted psychical researcher. Gruber was born in Freiburg on October 30, 1881. His background in biology led to an interest in the claims of paranormal abilities in animals. In 1923 he studied the Elberfeld horses, and later investigated Rolf, the "talking" dog of Mannheim. He also studied supernormal phenomena in conjunction with Rudolf Tischner and Baron Schrenck-Notzing. He did valuable work in the elucidation of the problem of clairvoyance and psychometry. His conclusions were detailed in his Parapsychologische Erkenntnisse (1925) and in a posthumously published volume, Okkultismus und Biologie.

Sources:

Gruber, Karl. Okkultismus und Biologie. Munich, 1930.

———. Parapsychologische Erkenntnisse. Munich, 1925.

Grünewald, Fritz (d. 1925)

German engineer who pioneered instrumental control for testing psychical phenomena. His ingenious laboratory instruments were exhibited at the 1921 International Congress for Psychical Research in Copenhagen, and they served as a model for research laboratories in Paris, London, Berlin, Munich, and Vienna. Grünewald mostly experimented with psychics Johannsen, Einer Nielsen, Jan Guzyk, and Anna Rasmussen. He also investigated the case of Eleonore Zügun.

Sources:

Grünewald, Fritz. Physikalisch-Mediumis-tische Untersuchungen. N.p., 1920.

Guadalupe Apparitions (of the Virgin Mary)

Guadalupe, Mexico, is the site of a claimed miraculous appearance of the Virgin Mary in 1531 that has become part of the folklore of Central and South America. According to the popular account of the apparition, a young Aztec Indian named Juan Diego was making his way to a Christian church at Tlateloco to study his catechism on December 9, 1531. He was a recent convert to Catholicism, and the church was a few miles from his uncle's home, where the boy lived following the death of his parents.

While taking a shortcut over the hill of Tepeyac, he heard his name called. He also heard music and the songs of birds. He followed the sounds and was confronted by a beautiful Indian girl about 19 years old, dressed in the robes the boy had seen adorning saints in the church. She declared herself to be "the eternal Virgin, holy Mother of the true God" and "merciful Mother" of men. She told the boy to go to the bishop of Mexico, the Spaniard Fray Juan de Zumarraga, and tell him that she wished to have a church built on the hill of Tepeyac.

The boy made his way to the bishop's palace about four miles away and, after some difficulty with the guards, was eventually admitted to the bishop's study and told his story. Zumarraga was sympathetic but not convinced. As the first Catholic bishop of Mexico, he had heard many wild stories from converted Indians. He said he would need time to think about it.

Juan returned to the hill somewhat crestfallen, where he saw the Virgin and suggested that it would be better for some more important person to convince the bishop. The Virgin told him that he was the chosen one and directed him to visit the bishop again the following day.

The next day the bishop listened carefully but said he would need some proof before building a church. He directed the boy to bring back an unmistakable sign of the genuineness of the apparition. After the boy had gone he instructed two of his staff to follow him and report back. After the boy had climbed the hill at Tepeyac the observers lost sight of him. Annoyed at being outwitted by a mere Indian boy, they returned to the bishop and said that the boy was unreliable and should not be believed. Meanwhile Juan had again seen the Virgin, who told him to come back the following day and she would give him a sign for the bishop.

When he returned home Juan found his uncle seriously ill and at the point of death. He nursed him through the night, and in the morning, finding no improvement, decided to fetch a priest from the church at Tlateloco to administer the last rites. Juan was worried that he had failed to keep the appointment with the Virgin and took the longer lower road to Tlateloco instead of the shortcut over the hill of Tepeyac. But the Virgin appeared on the lower path and told him that there was no need to worry about his uncle, who was now cured. Juan was to go back to the top of the hill, where he would find many flowers growing. He was to pick a bunch, wrap them in his cape, and take them to the bishop. The Virgin stressed that the flowers must be concealed and not shown to anyone else.

At the top of the hill the boy found some beautiful and fragrant roses growing, out of season in the frosty weather. He picked a bunch, wrapped them in his cloak, and made his way to the bishop's palace again, where the guards demanded to know what he was carrying in his cape. They could smell the flowers, but when they took hold of the cape and opened it, the roses had become painted flowers on the inside of the cape. They took the boy to the bishop and when Juan opened his cape the fresh roses spilled out onto the floor. The bishop saw that on the inside of the cape, where the painted flowers had been, was now a portrait of the Virgin.

The bishop took the cape to his chapel, where he prayed and thanked God and the Virgin for the miracle. The church was built on the hill at Tepeyac. The miraculous cape survived and more than four centuries later is still venerated in the cathedral at Guadalupe. The Virgin became the patron saint of Mexico.

The cape is made of woven grass, which normally has a lifespan of about 30 years. In November 1921 it survived a gelignite attack from a distance of eight feet. The nearby altar, large crucifix, and candlesticks were damaged and every window in the building blown out, but the image, behind a glass shield, was untouched.

Aside from this relic there is no factual evidence to support the legend. In 1532 Bishop de Zumarraga returned to Spain, where he gave a detailed account of his life in Mexico, but there is no record of any reference by him to Juan Diego and the miraculous cape. The celebrated historian Fray Bernardino de Sahagún was in Mexico at the time and described the Indians and their religious beliefs, but did not report the case of Juan Diego. The story first appeared in print in 1648—127 years after the claimed miracle—in a booklet titled The Image of the Virgin Mary, by Manuel Sánchez.

The Spanish soldier Bernal Diaz del Castillo, who traveled with Cortez, wrote a book, Historia verdadera de la Conquista de la Nueva-España (True History of the Conquest of New Spain, ca. 1632), in which he reports that Mexican Indian painters had been trained by a Franciscan father to copy sacred images and paintings, and that their work compared with the best in Italy and Spain. During the 1930s the Mexican artist Jorge González Camarena was engaged to restore murals at the Hujotingo Convent in Puebla. Hidden under layers of later paint he uncovered a picture of the Virgin Mary that appeared identical to that of the Virgin of Guadalupe.

Skeptics may claim that the story of Juan Diego is a pious legend and that the image on the cape is typical of others of the period by skilled Indian religious artists. However, the cloth has been examined by historians, art experts, and scientists from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and has not been discredited. It is also of great interest that this early account of apparitions of the Virgin Mary has features common to other claimed apparitions even in modern times, such as those at Fatima and Medjugorje: a simple child is chosen to receive the apparitions and messages rather than a sophisticated adult; the messages are often at variance with the opinions of the established ecclesiastical authorities; and a miraculous sign is given to authenticate the visitation.

Although such apparitions are normally within the conventions of the Catholic religion, it is interesting to note that when the Spaniards first arrived at Tepeyac, there was an Aztec temple on the hill honoring Tenotzin, virgin mother of the gods. Each year, on a date equivalent to December 22, Indians came from far and wide to honor this Aztec goddess just as modern Mexicans assemble on December 12 to honor the Virgin of Guadalupe. Every year, some ten million visitors go to see the cape with the portrait of the Virgin of Guadalupe. Among famous visitors were United States President John F. Kennedy and President Charles de Gaulle of France.

Sources:

Demarest, Donald, and Coley Taylor. The Dark Virgin: The Book of Our Lady of Guadalupe. Freeport, Maine: Coley Taylor, 1956.

Johnston, Francis M. The Wonder of Guadalupe. Rockford, Ill.: TAN, 1981.

Smith, Jody Brant. The Image of Guadalupe: Myth or Miracle? Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1983. Reprinted as The Guadalupe Enigma: Myth or Miracle? London: Souvenir Press, 1983.

Watson, Simone. The Cult of Our Lady of Guadalupe: A Historical Study. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1964.

Gualdi, Signor

A Rosicrucian who, according to the book Hermippus Redivivus; or The Sage's Triumph over Old Age and the Grave (1744), by J. H. Cohausen, lived for several hundred years.

Gualdi lived in Venice for several months and was called "the Sober Signor" among the common people because of the regularity of his life, the composed simplicity of his manners, and his simple dress. He always wore dark clothes of a plain, unpretentious style.

Gualdi had a small collection of fine pictures, which he readily showed to anyone who was interested. He was versed in all arts and sciences and spoke with astonishing detail. It was observed that he never sent or received mail. He never desired any credit, paid for everything in ready money, and made no use of bankers, currency, or letters of credit. He always seemed to have enough, and he lived respectably, although with no attempt at splendor or show.

Shortly after his arrival in Venice, Gualdi met—at a coffeehouse he frequented—a Venetian nobleman who was fond of art. This pair had many conversations concerning various objects and pursuits of mutual interest. They became friends and the nobleman, who was a widower, invited Gualdi to his home, where he first met the nobleman's daughter, a beautiful maiden of 18, intelligent and accomplished. Constantly in his company and fascinated by his narratives, the young lady gradually fell in love with the mysterious stranger.

Gualdi was a well-educated gentleman, a thinker rather than a man of action. At times his countenance seemed to glow during conversation, and a strange aura surrounded him when he became more than usually pleased and animated. Altogether he seemed a puzzling person of rare gifts.

The Venetian nobleman was now sufficiently intimate with Gualdi to say to him one evening that he understood that he had a fine collection of pictures, and that if agreeable, he would pay him a visit one day to see them. The nobleman's daughter, looking down at the table and thinking deeply of something Gualdi had just said, raised her eyes eagerly at her father's proposal and showed her desire to go with him to see the pictures.

Gualdi was very polite and readily invited the nobleman to his house. He also extended the invitation to his daughter.

On the day agreed upon, the father and daughter went to Gualdi's home. They were received warmly and Gualdi showed them his rooms graciously. The nobleman viewed Gualdi's pictures with great attention and remarked that he had never seen a finer collection, considering the number of pictures.

They were about to leave Gualdi's own chamber, the last of his set of rooms, when the nobleman by chance noticed over the door a picture evidently of Gualdi himself. The Venetian looked at it suspiciously, but after a while his face cleared, as if with relief. The daughter's gaze was also riveted upon the picture, which was very like Gualdi, but she regarded it with a blush. The Venetian looked from the picture to Gualdi, and back again from Gualdi to the picture. It was some time before he spoke.

"That picture was intended for you, sir," he said at last, hesitatingly, to Gualdi. A slight cold change passed over the latter's eyes, but he only replied by a low bow. "You look a moderately young man—to be candid with you, sir, I should say about forty-five, or thereabouts—and yet I know, by certain means of which I will not now further speak, that this picture is by the hand of Titian who has been dead nearly a couple of hundred years. How is this possible?" he added, with a polite, grave smile.

"It is not easy," replied Gualdi quietly, "to know all things that are possible, for very frequent mistakes are made concerning such, but there is certainly nothing strange in my being like a picture painted by Titian."

The nobleman easily perceived by his manner and his countenance that Gualdi felt offense. The temporary misunderstanding was soon put to an end by Gualdi himself, however, who in a moment or two resumed his ordinary manner and saw the father and daughter downstairs to the entrance of his house with his usual composed politeness. The nobleman, however, could not help feeling uneasy; his daughter experienced a considerable amount of discomfort and could not look at Gualdi for a while. When she did look, she looked too much.

This little occurrence remained in the mind of the nobleman. His daughter felt lonely and dissatisfied afterward, eager for the restoration of friendly feelings with Gualdi. The Venetian went in the evening to the usual coffeehouse and spoke of the incident among the group of people collected there. Their curiosity was roused, and one or two resolved to satisfy themselves by looking at the picture attentively. In order to do so it was necessary to see Gualdi somewhere and be invited to his home. The only likely place to meet him was at the coffeehouse, and the gentlemen went there the next day at the usual time, hoping that Gauldi would stop in as was his habit.

But he did not come—nor had he been heard from since the nobleman's visit to his house the day before. Since they did not meet with him at the coffeehouse, one of their number went to his lodgings to inquire after him. The owner of the house came to the street door and stated that Gauldi had gone, having left Venice early that morning, and that he had locked up his pictures with certain orders and taken the key to his rooms with him.

This affair caused much gossip at the time in Venice, and an account of it found its way into most of the newspapers of the year in which it occurred. Gualdi's story is also found in Les Mémoires historiques for the year 1687.

Hermippus Redivivus, which includes other strange anecdotes of triumph over old age, is not a reliable source and may in fact be a satirical work.

Guardian Angels

More common term for what Spiritualists call guiding spirits, claimed to watch over or inspire individuals and intervene in moments of crisis or danger. (See also Angels)

Guecubu

Among the Araucanians, an Indian tribe of Chile, the guecubu were evil spirits who did all in their power to thwart and annoy the Great Spirit Togin and his ministers.

Guide

A continually benevolent, protective, ethereal influence acting through mediums in Spiritualist séances. The term is more comprehensive than control, as the latter may apply to any chance communicator who gets through. The guide usually delivers lofty philosophical or religious instruction beyond the normal intellectual capacity of the medium. It may operate while the medium is either awake or in trance.

A number of claimed guides have been Native Americans; others have Greek or similarly impressive names, often untraceable. Since the 1950s, some guides have claimed to be from outer space or from planets known to be uninhabited. Some are clearly fictional entities, but acceptance of their claims may result in remarkable and sometimes verifiable communications.

Since the New Age occult revival of the 1980s, there has been a widespread renewal of interest in the teachings of trance personalities under the general term channeling.

Guide to Psi Periodicals

A directory of magazines, newsletters, and journals concerned with parapsychology, occultism, astrology, witchcraft, UFOs, and New Age spiritual studies, edited by Elizabeth M. Werner during the 1970s. Listings included a brief description of each source, U.S. and overseas subscription rates, and addresses. The guide was eventually incorporated into the Whole Again Research Guide, a comprehensive annual resource guide concerned with various New Age topics and issued by Sourcenet in Santa Barbara, California. Only a few issues were published.

Sources:

Werner, Elizabeth, ed. Directory of Psychic Sciences Periodicals. Burbank, Calif.: Inner-Space Interpreters Services, 1973.

Guide to Psi Tape Recordings

A directory of tape recordings dealing with psychic science, meditation, spiritual development, healing, UFOs, yoga, esoteric studies, and related topics edited by Elizabeth M. Werner of Burbank, California.

Guiding Spirits

The claimed existence of guiding spirits or guardian angels escapes experimental verification. According to séance-room communications, everyone has guiding spirits and they are often relatives who have risen to a high spiritual level in the beyond. The daimon of Socrates who forewarned him of dangers is the best historical example of the claimed existence of guiding spirits. In Theages Plato has Socrates say, "By the favor of the Gods I have, since my childhood, been attended by a semi-divine being whose voice, from time to time, dissuades me from some undertaking, but never directs me what I am to do."

In the Apology Socrates further notes, "This prophetic voice has been heard by me throughout my life; it is certainly more trustworthy than omens from the flight or the entrails of birds; I call it a God or a daimon. I have told my friends the warnings I have received, and up to now the voice has never been wrong."

As an instance of the daimon's clairvoyance, F. W. H. Myers declares as follows in Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death (1903): "As the philosopher was in conversation with Eutyphron, he suddenly stopped and warned his friends to turn into another street. They would not listen; but misfortune overtook them—they met a drove of swine that jostled them and threw them down."

"Few facts in history possess such documentary evidence as the Daimon," concludes Dr. Lelut of the Institut de France in Du Démon de Socrate (1836).

Edward Everett Hale, in his book James Russell Lowell and His Friends (1899), writes of Josiah Quincy II (1772–1884), an American statesman:

"It is interesting to know, what I did not know till after his death, that this gallant leader of men believed that he was directed in important crises, by his own 'Daimon,' quite as Socrates believed. In the choice of his wife, which proved indeed to have been made in heaven, he knew he was so led. And in after life, he ascribed some measures of importance and success to his prompt obedience to the wise Daimon's directions."

The novelist Julian Hawthorne writes of his mother, the wife of Nathaniel Hawthorne, in Nathaniel Hawthorne and His Wife (1884): "My mother always affirmed that she was conscious of her mother's presence with her on momentous occasions during the remainder of her life, that is, following her mother's death."

According to Hoole's Life of Tasso, Torquato Tasso ended his career believing that he had a familiar spirit with whom he conversed and from whom he learned things that he had never read or heard of, and that were unknown to other persons. (See also: angels; control; genius; guide)

Guillaume de Carpentras (ca. 15th century)

An astrologer who made for King René of Sicily and for the duke of Milan astrological spheres from which horoscopes were drawn. He made one for Charles VIII of France at a price of twelve hundred crowns. The sphere contained many parts and was designed so that all the movements of the planets, at any hour of the day or night, could be observed within it.

Guillaume de Paris (ca. 1180–1249)

French prelate and philosopher who was rumored by some demonologists to have made talking statues, like those made by Roger Bacon, a thing which, it was believed, could only be done by diabolical agency. Similar legends have been told of other individuals, often as a kind of tribute to their reputation as wise men.

Guinefort, St.

A strange story was recorded by Father Etienne Bourbon, a Dominican who died in 1262. He related that while he was preaching in the diocese of Lyons, many women came to him confessing that they had taken their children to a St. Guinefort. Curious to know what sort of saint it might be whose cult called for confession, Bourbon inquired into the matter and found that Guinefort was a dog!

It was the dog in the well-known fable of the dog and the serpent, wherein a dog is killed under the suspicion that it has slain a child, when in reality it has saved the child from the attack of a serpent. It was this dog-martyr to whose "shrine" the women brought their children.

A similar story was told of a dog named Ganelon whose tomb was in Auvergne, near a fountain. The dog was buried during the reign of Louis le Debonnaire. Two or three centuries later it was found that the waters of the fountain possessed medicinal virtues. Cures were attributed to the unknown occupant of the tomb—until a certain bishop found among the archives of the château the anecdote of the dog Ganelon.

Guirdham, Arthur (1905– ?)

British physician, psychiatrist, novelist, and writer on ESP and reincarnation. He also wrote under the pseudonym "Francis Eaglesfield." Born March 9, 1905, in Workington, Cumberland, England, he was educated at Keble College, Oxford University, and at Charing Cross Hospital, London (B.S., M.A., M.D.). He was senior consulting psychiatrist in the Bath Child Guidance Clinic, retiring from the National Health Service in 1968.

During his adult life Guirdham became increasingly interested in the history and teachings of the Cathar sect of thirteenth-century France. Cathar doctrine regarded the world as a kind of hell for rebellious angels, condemned to human existence until redeemed by unification with Christ. This doctrine was related to Gnosticism and Manichean teachings. The Cathars were persecuted and murdered by the established Church, culminating in their final destruction in 1243 at Montségur, France, when 200 Cathars were burned alive on one day.

Guirdham became convinced that he had been a Cathar priest named Roger de Grisolles in a former incarnation. In his book The Cathars and Reincarnation (1970) he describes the strange circumstances leading to this belief. He had a woman patient who was referred to him for treatment as a possible epileptic. She had vivid nightmares of life in the thirteenth century as a peasant girl in Toulouse, France, in a family that befriended a priest named Roger de Grisolles. Grisolles was arrested and died in prison; the girl was burned at the stake.

Extraordinarily enough Guirdham had also had similar nightmares since childhood, and when he met the patient, a Mrs. Smith, she revealed that he was the priest de Grisolles she had seen in her own dreams. Guirdham was sufficiently impressed with the factual aspects of her narrative to undertake research, in which he was able to confirm events and names in Smith's nightmares. There was a Roger de Grisolles who was murdered in 1242, and the details of the family who befriended him before betrayal were correct. In addition, Smith's own notes, written earlier, contained much background material on the Cathars not then known to scholars and only subsequently verified.

Guirdham also published The Lake and the Castle (1976), which surveys evidence of "far memory" from himself and a group of friends, suggesting various incarnations at different periods of history. His book The Great Heresy: The History and Beliefs of the Cathars (1977) compares his own scholarship on Cathar history with claimed evidence from discarnate entities. In addition to his fascinating works on Cathar reincarnation, Guirdham also published A Theory of Disease (1957), in which diseases are related to a realistic assessment of personality.

Sources:

Guirdham, Arthur. The Cathars and Reincarnation. Wellingborough, England: Turnstone Press, 1982.

———. Christ and Freud. London: Allen & Unwin, 1959.

———. Cosmic Factors in Disease. London: Duckworth, 1963.

———. A Foot in Both Worlds: A Doctor's Autobiography of Psychic Experience. [St. Helier] Jersey, Spearman, 1973.

———. The Great Heresy. St. Helier: Neville Spearman, 1977.

Wilson, Colin. Strange Powers. New York: Random House, 1973.

Guldenstubbe, Baron L(udwig) von (1820–1873)

Prominent nineteenth-century Spiritualist who wrote several influential books on Spiritualistic phenomena. He was a Scandinavian nobleman who appears to have had mediumistic talents himself. Because he spent time in Paris, he is often mentioned as "de Guldenstubbe." He was interested in animal magnetism for many years and was anxious to find evidence of the immortality of the soul. When he heard of the American Spiritualist movement in 1850 he promptly formed a circle at his own house in Paris, and soon obtained phenomena of raps, mysterious noises, and movements of furniture.

In August 1856 he began to experiment in the phenomenon of direct writing without the intervention of a medium. He placed paper and pencil in a small locked box, carrying the key with him. After 13 days he opened the box and found some written characters on the paper; the experiment was repeated successfully ten times on the same day.

Later, with his friend the comte d'Ourches and other acquaintances, Guldenstubbe visited churches, cemeteries, and public galleries and obtained writing on pieces of paper left on tombs or on the pedestals of statues. These writings were in various languages including Latin, Greek, Russian, French, German, and English and claimed to be from illustrious figures such as Mary Stuart, St. Paul, Cicero, Melchisedec, Plato, and Juvenal. Some of these communications were reproduced in the baron's book La Réalité des Esprits (1857). The French and German letters were small, regular, and perfectly legible, but the Latin and Greek characters were large, irregular, and badly formed. Such spirit messages foreshadowed the famous mahatma letters of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky.

Among the distinguished witnesses who repeatedly assisted Guldenstubbe in his experiments were Delamarre, editor of the Patrie; Choisselat, editor of the Univers; Robert Dale Owen; Lacordaire, brother of the great orator; the historian Bonnechose; the Swedish painter Kiorboe; Baron von Rosenberg, German ambassador at the court of Wurttemberg; and Prince Leonide Galitzin.

During 1867 Guldenstubbe had a house in London at which Spiritualist séances were held. The medium was Agnes Nichol (later Agnes Guppy-Volckman). At one of these séances, a sister of the Baron was discovered to have a wreath of flowers and ferns on her head, presumably placed there by spirit hands.

Sources:

Guldenstubbe, Baron Ludwig von. Pensées d'Outre-Tombe. 1858.

Goldenstubbe, Baron Ludwig von, and J. von Guldenstubbe. La Morale Universelle. 1863.

Guppy, Mary Jane (ca. 1860)

The first wife of Spiritualist Samuel Guppy and a medium for physical phenomena, apports, automatic drawings, and psychic lights. Accounts of her phenomena are given in Mary Jane; or Spiritualism chemically explained, with Spirit Drawings, a book published anonymously in 1863. Samuel Guppy was known to be its author.

Sources:

Guppy, Samuel. Mary Jane; or Spiritualism chemically explained, with Spirit Drawings. London, 1863.

Guppy-Volckman, Agnes (1838–1917)

Formerly Miss Agnes Nichol and the second wife of Spiritualist Samuel Guppy. She was originally discovered to be a powerful medium by naturalist Alfred Russel Wallace in the house of his sister, a Mrs. Sim, about a year after he started his investigation into Spiritualism in 1865. The young girl, a professional mesmerist, produced movements without contact. The power was strongest if she and Sim were alone. Remarkable phenomena were observed after a séance in an empty room. The famous naturalist learned that Nichol saw phantoms as a child and, in carefully watching her mediumistic development, had strange experiences. Raps and table movement were followed by levitations.

Nichol was a heavily built woman. In the darkness, while holding the sitters' hands, she was several times lifted on top of the table in her chair. Independent music and apport phenomena came next. On many occasions flowers and fruits, sometimes in large quantities, fell onto the séance table from an unknown source.

The requests of the sitters were often honored. When a friend of Wallace asked for a sunflower, one six feet high with a mass of earth around the roots fell upon the table. In the house of E. W. Cox a mass of snow and hothouse flowers was precipitated. It was sufficient to make a mental request. Princess Marguerite of Naples desired specimens of a prickly cactus. More than 20 dropped on the table and had to be removed with tongs. Stinging nettles and ill-smelling white flowers that had to be burned arrived on other occasions. The duchess d'Arpino wished for sea sand. It soon splashed down with seawater and live starfishes. The sea was about a hundred yards from the house. Not infrequently live eels and lobsters appeared.

Nichol married Samuel Guppy in 1867. For some time afterward they resided on the Continent. More marvels were witnessed on their return. The first spirit photograph of Frederick A. Hudson was obtained in March 1872, through Agnes's mediumship (see also spirit photography). In the same year she produced materializations.

Catherine Berry, in Experiences in Spiritualism (1876), writes of many strange happenings. A white cat and a Maltese dog belonging to Guppy appeared in a séance in Berry's house where Guppy sat. Three ducks prepared for cooking were brought into the circle in Guppy's home. Showers of butterflies descended from the ceiling. On another occasion a shower of feathers fell to the depth of several inches. In a mischievous spirit Guppy asked for tar, whereupon Berry, looking like a magpie in her black dress, rushed out. She became estranged for years from Guppy.

The most incredible incident in Guppy-Volckman's career was her claimed transportation from her house at Highbury, London, to 61 Lamb's Conduit St., a distance of three miles. The most humorous occurred when Frank Herne and Charles Williams, with eight sitters, were holding a séance. On the half-humorous request of a Mr. Harrison to transport Guppy to the room, she was precipitated to the room. Unfortunately, she was half dressed, with her shoes off, and in a state of deep trance.

Samuel Guppy was a very rich man. The complete absence of financial motives in Agnes Guppy's case greatly puzzled Frank Podmore, the skeptical author of Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1902), who considered most mediums frauds out for financial gain. Not understanding the equal appeal of power and fame, he ponders, "But Mrs. Guppy, even during the few months in which, as Miss Nichol, she practised as a professional Mesmerist, can scarcely have found her main incentive in the hope of gain. On the assumption of fraud, the mere cost of the flowers lavished on her sitters must have swallowed up any probable profit from her increased mesmeric clientele. And even such a motive would have ceased with her marriage."

After Samuel Guppy's death, his widow married again and was afterward known as Mrs. Guppy-Volckman. She died in December 1917.

Gurdjieff, Georgei Ivanovitch (1872–1949)

Mystic and spiritual teacher of Greek ancestry, born at Alexandropol, Armenia, near the borders of Russia and Persia. In 1896, at about the age of 20, Gurdjieff left home to spend 20 years searching for the esoteric truths of life in Tibet, India, and the Arabian countries. His quest is described obliquely in his own book Meetings with Remarkable Men (1963), but much of this book must be regarded as parable rather than strict fact or autobiography.

In 1912 Gurdjieff launched his own system of psychophysical culture in Russia. Early disciples included Dr. de Stjoernval, a Finnish physician, composer Thomas de Hartmann and his wife, sculptor Vladimir Pohl, and journalist Peter Demianovitch Ouspensky. It was Ouspensky who later developed his own interpretation of the work of Gurdjieff and became the leading publicist for his system.

In spite of the Russian Revolution, the Gurdjieff group continued to grow, and Gurdjieff established his Institute for the Harmonious Development of Man around 1917 in Tiflis, later moving to Constantinople, then to France, where the group became firmly established at a chateau in Fontainebleau. Many well-known intellectuals spent time with the group, including Katherine Mansfield, Clifford Sharp (editor of the New Statesman), and A. R. Orage (editor of the New Age).

Gurdjieff's system was a flexible one, employing both systematic and variable techniques to break habits of thought and emotion and awaken a higher consciousness. He would often shock his pupils out of routine reactions by a kind of westernized Zen technique. Fastidious intellectuals might be obliged to clean out stables, teetotalers to drink alcohol. In addition Gurdjieff devised psychophysical group exercises, involving breathing techniques, music, and dance. He called his system the Fourth Way, as distinct from that of the fakir, monk, and yogi, and was especially concerned with involvement in everyday life.

In 1924 he visited the United States with his disciples, who gave astonishing demonstrations of physical and mental control. Various writers and editors of the day supported his work, including Hart Crane, Jane Heap, and Margaret Anderson.

His influence has been widespread and survives in modern times through such individuals as Maurice Nicoll and J. G. Bennett and a continuing tradition of Gurdjieff groups that carry on unobtrusively. The books of P. D. Ouspensky have attracted many seekers to the work of Gurdjieff, although Ouspensky himself tended to intellectualize a system that depended upon firsthand experience.

Gurdjieff himself was an enigmatic figure, whose lifestyle often appeared at variance with that of a mystic master. He enjoyed good food and wine and was capable of apparently inconsistent behavior, usually explained away by his disciples as being designed deliberately to shock individuals out of habitual reactions.

His book All and Everything: Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson (1950) can be variously interpreted as turgid writing or a tongue-in-cheek attack on the reader's level of consciousness. Time magazine once aptly described Gurdjieff as a "remarkable blend of P. T. Barnum, Rasputin, Freud, Groucho Marx, and everybody's grandfather."

Sources:

Bennett, John Godolphin. Gurdjieff: Making a New World. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.

———. Is There Life on Earth?—An Introduction to Gurdjieff. New York: Stonehill, 1973. 1st Bennett Books ed., Santa Fe, N. Mex.: Bennett Books, 1989.

De Hartmann, Thomas. Our Life with Gurdjieff. New York: Penguin, 1972.

Driscoll, J. Walter. Gurdjieff: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1985.

Lefort, Rafael. The Teachers of Gurdjieff. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

Ouspensky, P. D. Tertium Organum (the third organ of thought): A key to the enigmas of the world. Rochester, N.Y.: Manas Press, 1920.

Pauwels, Louis. Gurdjieff. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Speeth, Katherine Riodan. The Gurdjieff Work. Berkeley, Calif.: And/Or Press, 1976. Rev. ed., Los Angeles: Jeremy P. Tarcher, 1989.

Webb, James. The Harmonious Circle: The Lives and Work of G. I. Gurdjieff, P. D. Ouspensky, and Their Followers. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1980.

Gurdjieff Foundation of California

Organization devoted to study and practice of the teachings of mystic G. I. Gurdjieff (1872–1949) in transforming inner and outer life. Address: P.O. Box 27901-113, San Francisco, CA 94127.

Gurdjieff Studies Group

The London-based Gurdjieff Studies Group is a Fourth Way group formed in 1994 by British Gurdjieffean teacher James Moore. Georgei Gurdjieff, a mystic and spiritual teacher, believed that there had been three classic ways to awaken the self and encounter spiritual reality, that of the yogi, the monk, and the fakir. The Fourth Way, symbolized in the nine-pointed diagram called the enneagram, was the way of encounter with ordinary life. In his life Gurdjieff used a combination of specific spiritual exercises along with the placement of students in conflict-laden, tension-filled situations to facilitate the awakening of the self. He basically saw people as asleep and in the control of forces outside of themselves.

In 1956 Moore began his pilgrimage into the world of Gurdjieff by joining the group led by Dr. Kenneth Walker, but the following year he went under the tutelage of Mme. Henriette Lannes and stayed in her group until 1979. While continuing his own study and development, in 1980 he began to teach and write, and authored a number of articles on the Gurdjieff teachings. He is also credited with assisting the formation of the work in New Zealand and its revival in Ireland. In 1991 he completed his major book, Gurdjieff: A Biography: Anatomy of a Myth.

The Gurdjieff Studies Group constitutes a community of committed Gurdjieff students who are engaged in both an intellectual and practical guided study of Gurdjieff's teachings. While working closely together as a group, members do not live communally.

The Gurdjieff Studies Group may be contacted at P.O. Box LB220, London WC2N 4EB, United Kingdom. The group is open to residents in London and Southeast England, and has started a reading group in Brighton. It maintains an Internet presence at http://www3.mistral.co.uk/gsg/index.html.

Sources:

Gurdjieff Studies Group. http://www3.mistral.co.uk/gsg/index.html. May 20, 2000.

Moore, James. Gurdjieff: A Biography: Anatomy of a Myth. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element Books, 1991.

Gurney, Edmund (1847–1888)

Distinguished English psychical researcher whose work was one of the mainstays of the early period of the Society for Psychical Research. Gurney was born March 23, 1847, at Hersham, Surrey, England. He was a classical scholar, a musician, and a student of medicine, but he did not definitely adopt any profession. Between 1874 and 1878 he attended a great number of Spiritualist séances. He never discussed what he had seen and learned, but when the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) was founded in 1882 he readily assumed the post of honorary secretary.

It was the discovery of thought-transference that aroused his enduring interest in psychical research, and hypnotism the primary tool. According to F. W. H. Myers, "he was the first Englishman who studied with any kind of adequate skill the psychological side of hypnotism in England." Between 1885 and 1888 Gurney devised a large number of experiments by which he sought to prove that there is sometimes, in the induction of hypnotic phenomena, an agency at work that is neither ordinary nervous stimulation nor suggestion conveyed by any ordinary channel to the subject's mind.

He next attacked the problem of the relation of the memory in one hypnotic state to the memory in another hypnotic state and of both to the normal or waking memory. His research along this line preceded Pierre Janet's similar explorations in France.

Gurney then proceeded to consider hallucinations. His treatise on the telepathic induction of hallucination in Phantasms of the Living (1886) was the first serious discussion of the problem. His investigations were done in consultation with Myers and Frank Podmore. The actual writing of Phantasms of the Living (1886) was done by Gurney, and during the three years of sifting evidence and hearing witnesses he performed an immense amount of work. He was also editor of the SPR's Proceedings, to which he contributed many important papers. He died June 23, 1888.

His work did not, it seems, end with his death. Shortly afterward, communications were received by a lady through automatic writing that purported to come from him. The following year William James obtained similar messages in a sitting with Lenora Piper.

Other messages again pointed to the trance intelligence of the medium. Margaret Verrall also received occasional messages from Gurney, while "Mrs. Forbes" was entirely under a Gurney influence. The Gurney control of "Mrs. Holland" (pseudonym of Alice Kipling Fleming) appeared to be a different type. Edmund Gurney, while alive, knew both Verrall and Forbes, but not Fleming.

Sources:

Gurney, Edmund. "Account of Some Experiments in Mesmerism." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 2, no. 6 (1884).

———. "Hallucinations." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 3, no. 8 (1885).

———. "Hypnotism and Telepathy." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 5, no. 12 (1888–89).

———. "Peculiarities of Certain Post-Hypnotic States." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 4, no. 11 (1886–87).

———. The Power of Sound. 1880. Reprint, New York: Basic Books, 1966.

———. "The Problems of Hypnotism." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 2, no. 7 (1884).

———. "Recent Experiments in Hypnotism." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 5, no. 12 (1888–89).

———. "Some Higher Aspects of Mesmerism." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 3, no. 10 (1885).

———. "Stages of Hypnotic Memory." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 4, no. 11 (1886–87).

———. "The Stages of Hypnotism." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 2 (1884).

———. Tertium Quid: Chapters on Various Disputed Questions. London: K. Paul, Trench & Co., 1887.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. London: Trubner, 1886.

Hall, Trevor H. The Strange Case of Edmund Gurney. London: Duckworth, 1964.

Guru

Though many spiritual teachers from India settled in the West through the twentieth century, during the 1970s, the term "guru" (or "teacher," the Indian equivalent of "rabbi") first became well known in America and Europe through the rapid growth of Indian movements built around such figures as Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, and Guru Mahara Ji who attracted many thousands of young adult followers. In the process of moving to America and Europe, the guru concept underwent a change.

In traditional Indian religious life, the guru-chela (teacher-pupil) relationship is a very personal one, restricted to a few followers and usually involving strict austerities, religious observances, study of scriptures, and/or yoga exercises. And although many gurus (for example, Satya Sai Baba) have been reputed miracle workers and the subject of numerous anecdotal accounts of supernormal feats, the goal of mysticism, union with the divine, was generally regarded as paramount and miracles merely incidental. That relationship remained the case with most Indian teachers in the West. However, many in the West were unfamiliar with the nature of spiritual guidance offered by gurus and were put off by the absolutist language of obedience used in traditional literature to describe that relationship.

In the wake of the unexpected favorable reception of Swami Vivekananda at the World's Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893, many eastern spiritual teachers settled in America and developed relatively small followings. Gurus were often associated in the public mind with miracles, even though their teachings emphasized spiritual development. Following World War II and the declaration of Indian independence from England in 1948, and especially the opening of the United States to Asian immigration in 1965, a number of gurus developed missions in the West. The pop cultures and mass advertising techniques of postwar America and Europe facilitated the spread of large international movements. Some of the more popular leaders presented a Westernized Hinduism with roots in the nineteenth-century Hindu Renaissance developed in reaction to the critique of colonial powers to abhorrent (to westerners) practices in popular Hinduism. Some of these teachers promised world peace, success in life, achievement, personal relaxation and/or spiritual advancement through simple meditation techniques or prayers, while other Hindu gurus like Swami Muktananda and Satya Sai Baba attracted thousands of followers through "demonstrating" paranormal phenomena.

The transition from the Hindu concept of the family type guru, rather like a local priest and psychoanalyst, teaching a few followers, to the charismatic leader of millions adopting Western movements, represented a significant transition of the guru-chela relationship. In such a setting traditional admonitions to sacrifice everything to the guru in return for spiritual instruction took on a different meaning.

Sources:

Greenfield, Robert. The Spiritual Supermarket. New York: Saturday Review Press/E. P. Dutton, 1975.

Murray, Muz. Seeking the Master; A Guide to the Ashrams of India. Jersey, U.K.: Neville Spearman, 1980.

Uban, Sujan Singh. The Gurus of India. London: Fine Books (Oriental)/New Delhi, India: Sterling Publishers, 1977.

Guru Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Fellowship See The Bawa Muhaiyaddeen Fellowship

Gustenhover (17th century)

A goldsmith who resided at Strasbourg, Germany, in 1603. In a period of much danger he gave shelter to one M. Hirschborgen, who was described as "good and religious." In return for the hospitality of his host, Hirschborgen gave Gustenhover some powder of projection and departed on his journey. Gustenhover indiscreetly used the powder to perform alchemical transmutation before many people, and news of this reached Rudolph II, himself an amateur alchemist. He ordered the Strasbourg magistrates to send the goldsmith to him. Gustenhover was accordingly arrested.

On learning that he was to be sent to the emperor at Prague, Gustenhover requested that the magistrates meet after procuring a crucible and charcoal. Without coming near them, he had them melt some lead. When the lead was molten, he then gave them a small quantity of a reddish powder that, when thrown into the crucible, produced a considerable amount of pure gold from the lead. On being brought into the presence of the emperor, Gustenhover confessed that he had not himself prepared the magic powder and that, being but a beginning student of alchemy, was wholly ignorant of the nature of its composition. This the emperor refused to believe in spite of the repeated protests of the goldsmith.

After the powder was exhausted, Gustenhover was set to the now impossible task of making more gold. Still convinced that the alchemist was concealing his secret, the emperor had him imprisoned for the rest of his life.

It is believed that Hirschborgen, who presented Gustenhover with the powder, was none other than the alchemist Alexander Seton, who at that period was traveling through Germany in various disguises.

Guyon, Madame (1648–1717)

Jeanne Marie Bouvières de la Mothe, a celebrated mystic and quietist who suffered persecution at the hands of the Roman Catholic Church. She was born at Montargis on April 13, 1648, and showed an early and passionate interest in martyrdom and religious exercises. At age 16 she was forced into a marriage with the wealthy M. Guyon, more than 20 years her senior, in whose household she was exposed to insult and cruelty. Broken in spirit, she turned to religion and consulted a Franciscan, who advised her to seek God in her heart rather than in outward observances.

From that time on, she became a mystic, aiming at the suppression of all human hopes, fears, and desires and the attainment of a completely disinterested love of God. She embraced every form of suffering, physical and mental, and even eschewed spiritual joys.

In 1680 Guyon's husband died and she was released from bondage. She embraced the doctrine of quietism. "In losing the gifts," she writes in her autobiography, "she had found the Giver, and had reached an ideal state of resignation and self-suppression." She went to Paris, expounded her theories with earnestness and charm, and gathered an illustrious circle about her. There also she made friends with fellow mystic Francois Fénélon.

But the persecutions of the church increased. She requested that a commission be appointed to examine her doctrine and writings. Three commissioners were chosen, among them Bossuet, the champion of the church, her erstwhile friend and now her bitter enemy. Her writings were condemned, and she was incarcerated at Vincennes. For four years she lay in the dungeons of the Bastille, while Bossuet used every means to malign her name and doctrine.

In 1702, her health broken, she was released and sent to Blois, where she died June 9, 1717. Her last years were blessed with peace and resignation and a continued acceptance of her trials.

Sources:

Guyon, Jeanne Marie. Autobiography of Madame Guyon. St. Louis: B. Herder, 1897.

Guzyk, Jan (1875–1928)

Polish materialization medium, the son of a weaver, whose fraudulent production of phenomena fooled several prominent psychical researchers into the conclusion that he possessed strange powers. He first began to show his mediumistic tendencies during his years of apprenticeship in the tanning trade at Warsaw. There were raps, blows on the walls, and a stirring of objects as soon as evening approached. At age 15, under the tutelage of a Mr. Chlopicki, a Spiritualist, he became a professional medium. Russian Spiritualist and psychical researcher Alexander N. Aksakof took him to St. Petersburg, where he achieved great success although he did not impress Julien Ochorowicz.

A systematic study of Guzyk's mediumship, however, did not take place until Gustav Geley had a series of 50 sittings with him in Warsaw in September 1921. Geley became convinced of the reality of the phenomena. He witnessed the perfect materialization of a human face, alive and speaking, and the displacement of heavy objects. He took Guzyk to Paris for further experiments at the Institut Métapsychique International. Since Guzyk's phenomena only took place in complete darkness, the measures to avoid fraud were very strict. He was disrobed and medically examined before the séance, put into a pajama suit without pockets, and his wrists were joined to those of the controllers by sealed ribbons.

After a series of séances during 1922 and 1923 a very cautious report was issued. Among its 34 signatories were Geley, Eugèn Osty, Roux, Moutier, Charles Richet, Rocco Santoliquido, Camille Flammarion, René Sudre, and Sir Oliver Lodge. Only those facts are mentioned that were positively observed by all present and the report concluded, "We simply affirm our conviction that the phenomena obtained with Jan Guzyk are not explicable by individual or collective illusion or hallucination, nor by trickery." Altogether more than 80 highly placed persons attended the séances and, with the exception of three or four, declared themselves convinced of the genuine nature of the occurrences.

Footsteps were heard passing around the circle when everyone's position was accounted for and no confederate could have entered the room. Psychic lights were seen near the sitters; they formed couples and became two eyes, with expressive and mobile pupils that regarded the sitter fixedly. A mass of cloudy matter formed around the eyes and finally took a human shape.

The most noteworthy and convincing, at least to the sitters, were manifestations that occurred toward the end of the séances, at the moment when Guzyk awoke from the trance. René Sudre writes in Psychic Research (1928, p. 605) "At such a moment as he mumbled some unintelligible words, Guzyk brought my hand into contact with a hairy creature, just as somebody turned on the red light. Between the medium and myself I saw a sort of dark nebulous mass, which disappeared rapidly like a melting fog." The apparition was what Geley termed the "Pithecanthropus," an ape-man with a hairy, tough skin who often licked the hands of the sitters. At other times sounds were heard as if of a materialized dog. Sudre further observes, "These phenomena of animal materialisation may appear incredible to those who have not experienced the proof of them, but in all honesty of conscience and in all scientific equanimity it is impossible for me to make any reservation whatever against their actuality."

Sudre was once embraced by a human figure of which he hardly saw anything more than the eyes and lips. The lips were quite cold. His wife, similarly embraced, perceived an odor of alcohol. Guzyk always drank brandy before the séances, but it appeared impossible for him to produce the phenomenon under the conditions of control.

It appears that Guzyk had fooled Geley, Sudre, and their colleagues at the Institut. In November 1923 a series of ten séances was held with Guzyk at the Sorbonne in Paris. The report, signed by four investigators, stated that their conviction of fraud was "complete and without reserve." The phenomena—touches and displacement of objects—were produced by Guzyk's elbows and liberated leg. Yet it does not appear from the report that he was actually caught in fraud, and some observations cannot be explained by the liberation of a leg.

It is well known that Guzyk was often caught in fraud. His powers were highly commercialized, and he gave as many as five séances a day. Harry Price sat with him in August 1923 in Warsaw and found the phenomena childishly fraudulent. Max Dessoir wrote in Von Jenseits der Seele (1920) that he and a colleague repeatedly caught Guzyk using his foot for psychic touches and sounds. At Cracow in December 1924 the Metapsychical Society took a flashlight photograph at an unexpected moment. The picture showed Guzyk with his left hand raised to the height of the curtain, which he seemed to be grasping.

Following these séances M. Szczepansky wrote an article in Psychische Studien (June 1925), "The Career and Exposure of Guzyk." He drew a sharp reply from Baron Schrenck-Notzing who defended him by pointing out that Guzyk's frauds had been well known for years and did not detract from his genuine faculties. In 1927 Walter Franklin Prince sat with Guzyk in Warsaw. In Bulletin VII of the Boston Society for Psychical Research he gave an entirely negative report.

Gwion Bach

In ancient Welsh romance and myth, son of Gwreang. Assigned to stir the magic brew in the cauldron of science and inspiration intended for Ceridwin's son, Gwion tasted the liquid and became gifted with supernatural sight.

He fled, pursued by Ceridwin, and the pair were changed successively into a hare and a greyhound, a fish and an otter, a bird and a hawk, and a grain of wheat and a black hen, which ultimately swallowed the wheat. (Compare the metamorphoses of Ceridwen and Gwion Bach with that of the Queen of Beauty and the Djinn in the Arabian Nights Tale of the Second Calendar).

This pursuit and magical metamorphosis is a recurrent theme in folklore in the Indo-European tradition and survives also in the Scottish ballad "The Two Magicians" (Child No. 44).

Later, Gwion was placed in a bag and flung into the sea by Ceridwin. He was drawn out by Elphin, son of Cwyddus, and was then called Taliesin (Radiant Brow). (See also Wales)

Gypsies

The name Gypsy, an abbreviation of "Egyptian," has been used for centuries by English-speaking people to denote a member of a group of wanderers who traveled Europe during the Middle Ages, and whose descendants are still found in most European countries.

Many other names, such as "Saracen" and "Zigeuner," or "Cigan," have been applied to these people, but "Egyptian" is the most widespread. It does not, however, relate to Egypt, but to the country of "Little Egypt" or "Lesser Egypt," whose identity has never been clearly established. Two Transylvanian references from the years 1417 and 1418 suggested that Palestine is the country in question, but there is some reason to believe that "Little Egypt" included other regions in the East. It is now almost unanimously agreed that the Gypsies came into Europe from India.

There are strong resemblances between Indian and gypsy language. Gypsies speak of themselves as "Romany" and of their language as Romani-tchib (tchib=tongue). Physically they are black-haired and brown-skinned, their appearance, like their language, suggesting affinities with Hindustan.

In recent centuries, if not in earlier times, many of their overlords were not of Gypsy blood, but belonged to the nobility and petite noblesse of Europe, and were formally appointed by the kings and governments of their respective countries to rule over all the Gypsies resident within those countries. The title of baron, count, or regent of the Gypsies was no proof that the official so designated was of Gypsy race.

The appointed rulers, were empowered by Christian princes, and under Papal approval, were necessarily Christian. Moreover, their vassals were at least Christian by profession. Although their behavior was often inconsistent with such a profession, it was in the character of Christian pilgrims that they asked and obtained hospitality from the cities and towns of Medieval Europe.

This twofold character is illustrated in connection with the services held in the crypt of the church of Les Saintes Maries de la Mer, in the Ile de la Camargue, Bouches-du-Rhône. In this church many Gypsies annually celebrate the Festival of the Holy Marys on May 25. The crypt is specially reserved for them, because it contains the shrine of Saint Sara of Egypt, whom they regard as their patron saint. Throughout the night of the 24th-25th May they keep watch over her shrine, and on the 25th they leave. Among the Gypsy votive offerings presented in the crypt, some are believed to date back to about the year 1450.

All this would appear to indicate that the Gypsies were Christians. Another statement, however, tends to qualify such a conclusion. The assertion that the shrine of Saint Sara rests upon an ancient altar dedicated to Mithra, that the Gypsies of that neighborhood who are known as "Calagues," are descended from the Iberians formerly inhabiting the Camargue, and that their cult is really the Mithraic worship of fire and water, upon which the veneration of Saint Sara is superimposed.

Many believe that confirmation of this view is the worship of fire still existing among the Gypsies of Southern Hungary although this is also characteristic of India. There are special ceremonies observed at childbirth, in order to avert evil during the period between birth and baptism. Prior to the birth of the child, the Gypsies light a fire before the mother's tent, and this fire remains until the rite of baptism has been performed. The women who light and feed the fire recite the following chant:

"Burn ye, burn ye fast, O Fire!
And guard the babe from wrathful ire
Of earthy Gnome and Water-Sprite,
Whom with thy dark smoke banish quite!
Kindly Fairies, hither fare,
And let the babe good fortune share,
Let luck attend him ever here,
Throughout his life be luck aye near!
Twigs and branches now in store,
And still of branches many more,
Give we to thy flame, O Fire!
Burn ye, burn ye, fast and high,
Hear the little baby cry!"

It is noted that the spirits of the Earth and Water here are regarded as malevolent, and only to be overcome by the superior aid of fire. These women who are believed to have learned their occult lore from the unseen powers of Earth and Water are held to be the greatest magicians of the tribe.

Moreover, the water-being is not invariably regarded as inimical, but is sometimes directly propitiated. As when a mother, to charm away convulsive crying in her child, goes through the prescribed ceremonial details, including casting a red thread into the stream and repeating the following: "Take this thread, O Water-Spirit, and take with it the crying of my child! If it gets well, I will bring thee apples and eggs!"

The water-spirit appears again in a friendly character when a man, in order to recover a stolen horse, takes his infant to a stream, and, bending over the water, asks the invisible genius to indicate, by means of the baby's hand, the direction in which the horse has been taken. These two instances demonstrate the worship of water and the watery powers. Although these rites may be ascribed to Mithraism in its later stages, they may have an earlier origin.

Joseph Glanville's observation of a young Gypsy inspired Matthew Arnold's poem, "The Scholar-Gypsy." In his Vanity of Dogmatising (1661), Glanville states, "There was lately a lad in the University of Oxford who was, by his poverty, forced to leave his studies there, and at last to join himself to a company of vagabond Gypsies. . . . After he had been a pretty while exercised in the trade," this scholar-gypsy chanced to meet two of his former fellow-students, to whom he stated, "that the people he went with were not such imposters as they were taken for, but that they had a traditional kind of learning among them, and could do wonders by the powers of imagination, their fancy binding that of others; that himself had learned much of their art, and when he had compassed the whole secret, he intended," he said, "to leave their company, and give the world an account of what he had learned."

It is believed that ancient Gypsies had knowledge and exercised hypnotism. Even among modern Gypsies this power is said to be exercised. Col. Eugene De Rochas stated that the Catalan Gypsies were mesmerists and clairvoyants, and the writer Lewis Spence supposedly experienced an attempt on the part of a South Hungarian Gypsy to exert this influence.

The same power, under the name of "glamour," was formerly an attribute of the Scottish Gypsies. Glamour was defined by Sir Walter Scott as "the power of imposing on the eyesight of the spectators, so that the appearance of an object shall be totally different from the reality."

Scott in explanation of a reference to "the Gypsies' glamour'd gang," in one of his ballads, he remarks: "Besides the prophetic powers ascribed to the Gypsies in most European countries, the Scottish peasants believe them possessed of the power of throwing upon bystanders a spell to fascinate their eyes and cause them to see the thing that is not. Thus in the old ballad of 'Johnnie Faa,' the elopement of the Countess of Cassillis with a Gypsy leader is imputed to fascination—

"Sae soon as they saw her weel-faur'd face,
They cast the glamour o'er her."

Scott also relates an incident of a Gypsy who "exercised his glamour over a number of people at Haddington, to whom he exhibited a common dunghill cock, trailing, what appeared to the spectators, a massy oaken trunk. An old man passed with a cart of clover, he stopped and picked out a four-leaved blade; the eyes of the spectators were opened, and the oaken trunk appeared to be a bulrush." Supposedly the quatrefoil, owing to its cruciform shape, acted as an antidote to witchcraft. Moreover, in the face of this sign of the cross, the Gypsy had to stop exercising the unlawful art. As to the possibility of hypnotizing a crowd, or making them "to see the thing that is not," that feat has often been ascribed to African witch doctors. What is required is a dominant will on the one hand and a sufficiently plastic imagination on the other.

Scott introduces these statements among his notes on the ballad of "Christie's Will," in relation to the verse:

"He thought the warlocks o' the rosy cross,
—Had fang'd him in their nets sae fast;
Or that the Gypsies' glamour'd gang
—Had lair'd his learning at the last."

This association of the Rosicrucians with Gypsies is not inapt, for hypnotism appears to have been considered a Rosicrucian art. Scott has other suggestive references including:

"Saxo Grammaticus mentions a particular sect of Mathematicians, as he is pleased to call them, who, 'per summam ludificandorum oculorum peritiam, proprios alienosque vultus, varus rerum imaginibus, adumbraie callebant; illicibusque formis veros obscurare conspectus.' Merlin, the son of Ambrose, was particularly skilled in this art, and displays it often in the old metrical romance of Arthour and Merlin. The jongleurs were also great professors of this mystery, which has in some degree descended, with their name, on the modern jugglers."

Various societies are credited with possession, of the art of hypnotism, during the Middle Ages. Presumably, it was inherited from one common source. How much the Gypsies were associated with this power may be inferred from a Scottish Act of Parliament of the year 1579, which was directed against "the idle people calling themselves Egyptians, or any other that fancy themselves to have knowledge of prophecy, charming, or other abused sciences." For the term "charming," like "glamour" and other kindred words (e.g., "enchantment," "bewitched," "spellbound") bore reference to the mesomeric influence.

The statement made by Glanvill's scholar-gypsy would lead one to believe that the Gypsies inhabiting England in the seventeenth century possessed other branches of learning. They have always been famed for their alleged prophetic power, exercised through the medium of astrology and chiromancy or palmistry, and also by the interpretation of dreams, this last named phase being distinctly specified in Scotland in 1611. It does not appear that any modern Gypsies profess a traditional knowledge of astrology. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that the scholar Francis H. Groome was shown by a Welsh Gypsyman the form of the written charm employed by his mother in her fortune-telling, and that form was unquestionably a survival of the horoscope. Both mother and son were obviously unaware of that fact, and made no profession of astrology, but they had inherited the scheme of the horoscope from ancestors who were astrologers.

The practice of palmistry is still identified with the Gypsies, as it has been for ages. A curious belief was current in medieval times to the effect that the Three Kings or Magi who came to Bethlehem were Gypsies, and in more than one religious play they were represented as telling the fortunes of the Holy Family by means of palmistry. This circumstance evoked the following suggestive remarks from Charles Godfrey Leland.

"As for the connection of the Three Kings with Gypsies, it is plain enough. Gypsies were from the East; Rome and the world abounded in wandering Chaldean magi-priests, and the researches which I am making have led me to a firm conclusion that the Gypsy lore of Hungary and South Slavonia has a very original character as being, firstly, though derived from India, not Aryan, but Shamanic, that is, of an Altaic, or Tartar, or 'Turanian' stock. . . . Secondly, this was the old Chaldean-Accadian 'wisdom' or sorcery. Thirdly—and this deserves serious examination—it was also the old Etruscan religion whose magic formulas were transmitted to the Romans. . . .

"The Venetian witchcraft, as set forth by Bernoni, is evidently of Slavic-Greek origin. That of the Romagna is Etruscan, agreeing very strangely and closely with the Chaldean magic of Lenormant, and marvelously like the Gypsies'. It does not, when carefully sifted, seem to be like that of the Aryans. . . . nor is it Semitic. To what degree some idea of all this, and of Gypsy connection with it, penetrated among the people and filtered down, even into the Middle Ages, no one can say. But it is very probable that through the centuries there came together some report of the common origin of Gypsy and 'Eastern' or Chaldean lore, for since it was the same, there is no reason why a knowledge of the truth should not have been disseminated in a time of a traditions and earnest study in occultism."

These surmises on the part of a keen and accomplished student of every phase of magic, written and unwritten, are deserving of the fullest consideration. By following the line indicated by Leland it may be possible to reach an identification of the "traditional kind of learning" possessed by the Gypsies in the seventeenth century.

Leland also identified the gypsy language Shelta (as distinct from Romany) surviving in Ireland.

Gypsies have also been noted for their folk music, especially for the Flamenco style surviving in Andalucia (Spain).

Sources:

Bercovici, Konrad. The Story of the Gypsies. Cosmopolitan Book Corp., 1928. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1974.

Black, George F. A Gypsy Bibliography. London: Gypsy Lore Society, 1914. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: Gryphon Books, 1971.

Borrow, George. Lavengro; the Scholar, the Gypsy, the Priest. 3 vols. London, 1851.

———. The Romany Rye. London, 1957.

Clébert, Jean-Paul. The Gypsies. London: Vista Books, 1963. Reprint, Harmondsworth, Middlesex, U.K.: Penguin Books, 1967.

Leland, Charles G. The English Gipsies and Their Language. London, 1893.

———. Gypsy Sorcery. New York: Tower, n.d.

Starkie, Walter. Raggle Taggle; Adventures With a Fiddle in Hungary and Roumania. London, 1933.

Trigg, E. B. Gypsy Demons and Divinities: The Magical and Supernatural Practices of the Gypsies. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel Press, 1973. Reprint, London: Sheldon Press, 1975.

Gyromancy

A form of divination performed by going round continually in a circle, the circumference of which was marked by letters. The presage was drawn from the words formed by the letters on which the inquirers stumbled when they became too giddy to stand. This practice has a curious connection with the familiar technique of psychic circles, in which the sitters place a finger on a glass surrounded by letters of the alphabet, when the glass touches letters in turn to give words or messages.

The object of this routine was simply to exclude the interference of the will and reduce the selection of letters to mere chance. In some species of enchantment, however, the art of turning round was to produce a prophetic delirium. The religious dances, and the rotation of certain devotees on one foot, with their arms stretched out (for example, the (see Dervishes), are of this nature. These cases really indicate a kind of mystical secret.

In the phenomenon known as St. Vitus' Dance, and the movements of the convulsionaries, manifestations of spirit intelligence were quite common. The tendency of the spiritual force is to act spirally, rhythmically, whether in the use of language or of the bodily members. (See planchette)

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

H

H.O.O.R. See Holy Order of RaHoorKhuit

Haas, George C(hristian) O(tto) (1883–1964)

Archbishop (primate of Universal Spiritual Church) who took an active interest in psychical science and lectured on the subject. Born March 28, 1883, in New York, New York, he attended Columbia University (B.A., 1902; M.A., 1903; Ph.D., 1909). He worked as a tutor at the College of the City of New York (1904–16) and then went to work for the U.S. Department of Justice as a translator (1917–51). As a member of the American Oriental Society, he served as coeditor of the Journal of the American Society (1916–18).

Throughout his adult life Haas was an active Spiritualist. In 1927 he founded the Universal Spiritual Church. Haas was responsible for the theory of "hyperphysics," intended to reorient science, and was founder and director of the Institute of Hyperphysical Research (IHR). He also directed the Institute of Life, a division of IHR.

During his retirement years he became active in the Fellowship of Faiths, an interfaith organization, and in 1956 was consecrated as archbishop of the Universal Spiritual Church. The church affiliated with the Catholic Apostolic Church, headquartered in England, and in 1959 the synod of the Catholic Apostolic Church named him primate of all the Americas.

Sources:

Haas, George C. O. The Key to Enrichment of Life. N.p., 1949.

———. "The New Orientation of Science." IS 23 (1960).

Ward, Gary. Independent Bishops: An International Directory. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Habondia (or Habundia)

The queen of the witches, presiding over the Sabbat. She was also identified with Diana or Herodias. She was referred to as "Habonde" in the thirteenth-century poem Le Roman de la Rose. In his work Tableau de l'inconstance des mauvais anges (Description of the inconstancy of evil angels, 1612), the demonologist Pierre de Lancre refers to Habondia rather sweepingly as "Queen of the fairies, witches, harpies, furies; and ghosts of the wicked."

Hades

Greek god of the underworld and of wealth, also identified with Pluto. Hades abducted Persephone (daughter of the corn goddess Demeter) and made her his wife. In his intimidating character as lord of death, Hades was mysterious and terrifying, but in his benign aspect he was the generous god of wealth. His attention could be secured by striking the ground, and he could be propitiated by an offering of a black-fleeced sheep.

Entrance to the domain of Hades was through the groves of Persephone, where the gates were guarded by the great dog Cerberus, who admitted visitors without difficulty but would not let them leave. After passing through the gate, one had several rivers to cross, including Lethe, the river of forgetfulness. For a small fee, the ferryman Charon would take the traveler across.

In later history, the domain of Hades became synonymous with hell, although Hades' domain was not referred to as a place of torment.

Hades Base

Hades Base is a flying saucer contactee and channeling group that originated in 1988 in Sedona, Arizona, where Russ Hatfield was introduced to the Ashtar Command. He attended a channeling session one evening at which Korton, described as in charge of communication for the Command, spoke through a trance channel named Roger Pinion. As the evening progressed, a second entity, Omal, the commander of Hades Base, a part of the Command, also spoke. Omal addressed some of his words to Hatfield, whom he explained was a communicator. Fascinated, over the next months Hatfield attended a number of sessions with Pinion. Then Pinion moved on to New Zealand, and Hatfield moved to Lake Tahoe, Nevada.

Five years later, Hatfield met Mark Crocker, who confided the ability he possessed to consciously leave his body in astral travel. On one of his astral flights he attempted to locate Hades Base. Crocker claimed that while following a spacecraft to Mars, he met two female entities known as Tia and Kiri, later learned to be his twin souls. Hatfield also said that he perfected the ability to travel astrally and also met his twin, an entity named Karra. The two, Crocker and Hatfield finally established contact with Omal, who agreed to begin channeling through Crocker. They began weekly channeling sessions that soon included a variety of beings from Hades Base, an underground location on Mars. The channeling described not only the Hades Base operation in great detail, but the whole Ashtar Command. Among its tasks is the protection of Earth from hostile extraterrestrials who wish to study and experiment on earthlings (the source of abduction stories).

According to Hades Base, The Ashtar Command has as its overall purpose the development of planetary beings apart from actually interfering with thier evolution. The Hades Base is dedicated to uplifting the human spirit and assisting individuals to reach their highest potential. The material channeled from the Ashtar Command is posted on Hades Base News, the website found at http://www.Oakweb.com/hades/, through which the earthly center of the base may also be contacted.

Sources:

Hades Base. http://www.Oakweb.com/hades/. February 28, 2000.

Haggadah

The general name for the narrative or fabular portion of rabbinical literature. The most familiar use of the term is in the household service of seder at Passover, dramatizing the Jewish exodus from Egypt led by Moses.

Hag of the Dribble

Welsh banshee named Gwrach y Rbibyn, who was said to carry stones across the mountains in her apron, then untie the string, letting the stones shower down, thus making a "dribble." It was believed that at twilight this hag flapped her raven wing against the windows of those doomed to die, and howled "A-a-a-ui-ui-Anni!"

Haines, Frederick H(enry) (1869–1944)

Prominent British Spiritualist, insurance broker, and author of Chapters on Insurance History and The Insurance Business, which were considered classics in their field. He was converted to Spiritualism during World War I, and after careful investigations, begun in a spirit of skepticism, he developed powers of clairvoyance.

In the mid-1920s he began to receive by automatic writing a large number of scripts that were later published, including He Became Man, an inspirational script on the life of Christ. He also published his autobiography, Nothing But the Truth: The Confessions of a Medium (1931). Haines contributed many articles to British psychic journals and was in demand as a lecturer. He founded the Watford Christian Spiritualist Fellowship and edited a monthly periodical, Spiritual Vision. He died February 6, 1944.

Sources:

Haines, Frederick H. The Book of Spiritual Wisdom. N.p., 1928.

———. A Lamp to the Feet. N.p., 1928.

———. Locusts and Wild Honey. N.p., 1928.

———. Thus Saith Celphra. N.p., 1928.

———. A Voice from Heaven. Watford, England: Pure Thought Press, [1932].

Haining, Peter (1940–)

British novelist, writer on occult subjects, and anthologist of horror stories. Born April 2, 1940, in Enfield, Middlesex, England, Haining was educated in Buckhurst Hill, England. He worked as a journalist and magazine writer (1957–63) and successively as editor, senior editor, and editorial director of New English Library (1963–72) in London. Since 1972 he has been an editorial consultant, writer, and anthologist. He is a member of the International Association of Poets, Playwrights, Editors, Essayists and Novelists (PEN).

Haining's family lived for many generations in Scotland, but he now resides in the "witch county" of Essex, England. His research into witchcraft and black magic resulted in a ritual curse from a group of devil worshipers in London, but that did not interfere with Haining's literary success. He claims that one of his ancestors was burned at the stake for possessing a "book of spells," and his publication The Warlock's Book (1972) is said to include materials based on records of this ancestor.

Haining's investigation of a desecrated graveyard in Essex led to his first book, Devil Worship in England (1964), coauthored with A. V. Sellwood. Since that time he has written or edited several titles annually. His early vampire anthology, The Midnight People (1966), also known as Vampires at Midnight, has been frequently reprinted. His work has covered the fields of occultism, science fiction, fantasy, and horror. Most memorable among Haining's almost 100 titles are Anatomy of Witchcraft (1972), Ghosts: An Illustrated History (1974), The Craft of Terror: Extracts from the Rare and Infamous Gothic "Horror" Novels (1966), A Circle of Witches: An Anthology of Victorian Witchcraft Stories (1971), The Necromancers: The Best of Black Magic and Witchcraft (1971), The Hashish Club (1974), The Sherlock Holmes Scrapbook (1974), The Edgar Allen Poe Bedside Companion (1980), The Vampire Terror (1981), and Shades of Dracula (1982). Haining edited The Complete Ghost Stories of Charles Dickens (1982), Vampire! (1984), The "Doctor Who" File (1986), Elvis in Private (1987), and Supernatural Tales of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (1987).

Sources:

Ashley, Mike. Who's Who in Horror and Fantasy Fiction. London: Elm Tree Books, 1977.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1994.

Reginald, Robert. Science Fiction and Fantasy Literature, 1975–1991. Detroit: Gale Research, 1992.

Hair

Hair has had an occult significance since ancient times. It seems to have a life of its own, since it may continue to grow after the death of the body. It has been regarded as a source of strength and sexuality and has played a part in religion and magical rituals. The Hebrews developed a number of customs relative to hair that served to separate them from their pagan neighbors, a fact which is played out in the story of Samson and Delilah (Judg. 16:4–22)

In various cultures, individuals dedicated to service of the priesthood have undergone ritual cutting of hair, and the tonsure of priests is said to have originated in Egypt (see the writings of Herodotus). In Hinduism, there are hair rituals for youths, and those who become celibates have their heads formally shaven. The association of hair with sexuality has given hair as a symbol remarkable force, and distinctions between male and female hair have emphasized sexual attraction.

Since the hair is believed to be intimately related to the life of an individual, it has magical significance in witchcraft rituals, and people in many civilizations have been at pains to prevent their hair from falling into the hands of an enemy, who might use it for black magic.

There is even a school of character reading from the hair, known as trichsomancy.

Extreme fright or ecstatic states have caused hair to literally "stand on end" in the goose-flesh condition of horripilation.

Sources:

Berg, Charles. The Unconscious Significance of Hair. London: Allen & Unwin, 1951.

Cooper, Wendy. Hair: Sex Society Symbolism. London: Aldus Book, 1971.

Hajoth Hakados

According to the mystical teachings of the Kabala, one of the spheres of angels by whose agency Jehovah's providence is spread. It was believed that these angels inhabited one of the hierarchies named Jehovah, and that the simple essence of the divinity flowed through the Hajoth Hakados to the angel Metatron and to the ministering spirit Reschith Hajalalim.

Hal

A Moslem term meaning "now," given to a condition of mystical ecstasy often involving violent physical activity, such as wild dancing, shouting, or even foaming at the mouth. Hal sometimes ensues when extremely devout and emotional Moslems visit the grave of a famous saint.

Ha-Levi, Judah ben Samuel (ca. 1085–ca. 1140)

Celebrated Jewish theologian and mystic. Born in Tuledo, Spain, Ha-Levi became a prominent physician known for poetry celebrating Jerusalem and the Land of Zion. Ha-Levi seems to have had some conception of elementary spirits, for he said that some angels are "created for the time being, out of the subtle elements of matter." He was chiefly noted for his liturgical hymns, used extensively in Sephardic rites.

Hall, James A(lbert) (1934–)

Medical student who experimented with ESP. Born February 13, 1934, Hall studied at the University of Texas (B.A., 1955) and Southwestern Medical School, University of Texas. He is a member of the American Society for Psychical Research, an associate member of the Parapsychological Association, and an associate of the Society for Psychical Research, London.

In 1958 he experimented with elementary school children in Gladewater, Texas, to ascertain the effect of teacher and pupil attitudes on ESP scores. The results were reported in the Journal of Parapsychology (vol. 22, no. 4, December 1958). He contributed papers to the annual convention of the Parapsychological Association in 1981 ("Unconscious Cultural Influences and Psi: A Jungian Footnote") and 1986 ("Ethical Structure in Clinical Applications of Parapsychology").

Sources:

Hall, James A. "The Works of J. B. Rhine: Implications for Religion." Journal of Parapsychology (1981).

Hall, James A., and H. B. Crasilneck. "Physiological Changes Associated with Hypnosis." International Journal of Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis 7, no. 1 (January 1959).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hall, Manly Palmer (1901–1990)

Writer and lecturer on astrology and the occult. He was born on March 18, 1901, in Peterborough, Ontario, Canada, and moved to the United States in 1904. He had an early interest in matters occult and as a young man joined the Theosophical Society, the Freemasons, the Rosicrucians, and the American Federation of Astrologers.

Hall moved to California in 1923 and was ordained to the ministry in a metaphysical church. He became the pastor of the Church of the People, an independent occult and metaphysical congregation in Los Angeles, California; established the Hall Publishing Company; and began a magazine, The All-Seeing Eye. Hall, though lacking formal higher education, wrote a series of occult titles that became known for their erudition. Possibly the most important book from his early writings is An Encyclopedic Outline of Masonic, Hermetic, Qabalistic, and Rosicrucian Symbolical Philosophy (1928) in which he attempted to correlate the teachings of various alternative occult traditions.

In 1934, Hall, who had harbored a dream of creating a school modeled on the ancient one headed by Pythagoras, founded the Philosophical Research Society, which he hoped would become a major center for the dissemination of ancient wisdom throughout North America. It became the home to a large library, including many rare texts, collected by Hall.

Through the last 60 years of his life Hall lectured and wrote widely, his texts ranging over the broad field of the occult and topics relative to it, including history and comparative religion. He died on August 29, 1990, in Los Angeles, and his work is being continued by the society. Hall avoided writing autobiographical material during his life, and his volume on his grandmother is the only autobiographical information he left.

Sources:

Hall, Manly Palmer. Growing Up with Grandmother. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, 1985.

———. The Little World of PRS. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, 1982.

———. Reincarnation: The Cycle of Necessity. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, 1942.

———. Self-Unfoldment by Disciplines of Realization. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, 1945.

Melton, J. Gordon. Religious Leaders of America. Detroit: Gale Research, 1991.

Hall, Prescott F(arnsworth) (1868–1921)

American lawyer, author, and psychical researcher. Born September 27, 1868, in Boston, Massachusetts, Hall got his B.A. and LL.B. at Harvard (1889 and 1892). He was in law practice in Boston from 1892 to 1921 and was a founder of the Immigration Restriction League and a member of the American Society for Psychical Research. In addition to his various writings on law, immigration, and economics, he took a special interest in mediumship.

Sources:

Hall, Prescott F. "Experiments with Mrs. Caton." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research 8 (1914).

———, ed. "The Harrison Case." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research 13 (1919).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hall, Trevor H(enry) (1910–)

Surveyor and noted British author of books on parapsychological subjects. Hall was born May 28, 1910, at Wakefield, England. He was a major in the British army during World War II (1939–45), was senior partner of V. Walker and Son (chartered surveyors) (1945–80), and became director of the Huddersfield Building Society (1958–80).

Hall was a Perrott student in psychical research at Trinity College, Cambridge (1954–56). He had special interest in conjuring and compiled A Bibliography of Books on Conjuring in English from 1580 to 1850 (1957). His expert knowledge of conjuring was, in part, responsible for the skeptical attitude that became evident as he began to write about physical mediums, many of whom had been caught in fraud. In his early book The Spiritualists (1964), Hall confirmed the belief of many that the phenomena of famous medium Florence Cook were fraudulent and suggested that she was having an affair with Sir William Crookes.

His other books on psychical researchers were equally critical. His book on Edmund Gurney (1964), for example, investigated the claimed trickery of G. A. Smith and Douglas Blackburn, whose second-sight act Gurney investigated. Hall's book, though, on the whole was sympathetic to Gurney. His book Strange Things (1968) ruined the reputation of Ada Goodrich-Freer (known in psychical research literature as "Miss X"), and The Search for Harry Price (1977) effectively denigrates the character and work of the famed psychical researcher.

Hall also contributed articles on the history of psychical research to the International Journal of Parapsychology. He went on to write several texts on ghosts. During the late 1960s an interest in Sherlock Holmes (whose creator, Arthur Conan Doyle, was a confirmed Spiritualist) emerged, and Hall wrote several popular volumes, including Sherlock Holmes: Ten Literary Studies (1969), The Late Mr. Sherlock Holmes (1971), and Sherlock Holmes and His Creator (1974).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hall, Trevor H. The Enigma of Daniel Home. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1984.

———. The Search for Harry Price. Dallas: Southwest Book Services, 1978.

———. The Spiritualists. 1962. Reprinted as The Medium and the Scientist. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1984.

———. The Strange Case of Edmund Gurney. London: Duckworth, 1964.

Hall, Trevor H., and J. L. Campbell. Strange Things. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1968.

Hall, Trevor H., and E. J. Dingwall. Four Modern Ghosts. London: Duckworth, 1958.

Hall, Trevor H., E. J. Dingwall, and K. M. Goldney. The Haunting of Borley Rectory. London: Duckworth, 1956.

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Goldney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54, no. 195 (March 1964).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hallowed Grounds Fellowship of Spiritual Healing and Prayer

The now-defunct Hallowed Grounds Fellowship of Spiritual Healing and Prayer was a Spiritualist Center in Santa Barbara, California, founded in 1961 by British medium Heroge Daisley. An outstanding medium, Daisley traveled widely lecturing and holding séances in the 1950s, during which time he accumulated a large mailing list. After settling in Santa Barbara, his new home became the base from which he traveled the continent and to which he welcomed people who wished to utilize his talents at contacting the spirit world. For many years he also issued a quarterly journal, The Witness (1961–73).

Daisley taught a form of Christian Spiritualism, which emphasized biblical teachings about the nature of the afterlife. He believed that at death, the physical body was discarded and replaced with a spiritual body. The soul then continued to exist on several planes, each invisible to the physical eye. Mediums and certain gifted individuals could contact and communicate with the souls of the dead.

Halloween See All Hallow's Eve

Hallucination

A false perception of sensory vividness arising without the stimulus of a corresponding sense impression. In this it differs from illusion, which is merely the misinterpretation of an actual sense perception. Visual and auditory hallucinations are the most common, but hallucinations of the other senses may also be experienced. Human figures and voices most frequently form the subject of a hallucination, but in certain types other classes of objects may be seen, as, for instance, the rats and insects of delirium tremens.

Although hallucination is often associated with various mental and physical diseases, it may nevertheless occur spontaneously while the agent shows no departure from full vigor of body and mind. It may also be induced (i.e., in hypnotism) in a high percentage of subjects. The essential difference between sane and insane hallucinations is that in the former case the agent can, by reflection, recognize the subjective nature of the impression, even when it has every appearance of objectivity, whereas in the latter case the patient cannot be made to understand that the vision is not real.

Until the early twentieth century, hallucinatory percepts were regarded merely as intensified memory images; however, the most intense of ordinary representations do not possess the sensory vividness of the smallest sensation received from the external world. It follows that other conditions must be present besides the excitement of the brain, which is the correlate of representation. The seat of excitement is the same in actual sense perceptions and in memory images, but in the former the stimulus is peripherally originated in the sensory nerve, whereas in the latter it originates in the brain itself.

When a neural system becomes highly excited—a state which may be brought about by emotion, ill health, drugs, or a number of other causes—it may serve to divert from their proper paths any set of impulses arising from the sense organs. Because any impulse ascending through the sensory nerves produces an effect of sensory vividness—normally, a true perception—the impulses thus diverted gives to the memory image an appearance of actuality not distinguishable from that produced by a corresponding sense impression—a hallucination.

In hypnosis a state of cerebral dissociation is induced, whereby a neural system may be abnormally excited and hallucination thus readily engendered. Drugs, especially hallucinogens, which excite the brain, also induce hallucinations.

In 1901 the British physician Sir Henry Head demonstrated that certain visceral disorders produce hallucinations, such as the appearance of a shrouded human figure. The question of whether there is any relationship between the hallucination and the person it represents is, and has long been, a vexing one. Countless well-authenticated stories of apparitions coinciding with a death or some other crisis are on record and would seem to establish some causal connection between them. In former times apparitions were considered to be the doubles or "ethereal bodies" of real persons, and Spiritualists believe that they are the spirits of the dead (or, in some instances, of the living) temporarily forsaking the physical body.

The dress and appearance of the apparition does not necessarily correspond with the actual dress and appearance of the person it represents. Thus a man at the point of death, in bed and wasted by disease, may appear to a friend miles away as if in ordinary health and wearing familiar clothing. Nevertheless, there are notable instances where some remarkable detail of dress is reproduced in the apparition. It seems clear, however, that it is the agent's general personality that is, as a rule, conveyed to the percipient, and not, except in special cases, his or her actual appearance.

It has been suggested that those images that do not arise in the subliminal consciousness of the agent may be telepathically received by him or her from other minds. A similar explanation has been offered for the hallucinatory images that many people can induce by crystal gazing or staring into a pool of water, a drop of ink, or a magic mirror in search of information about scenes or people they know nothing about.

Collective hallucination is a term applied to hallucinations shared by a number of people. There is no firm evidence, however, of the operation of any agency other than suggestion or telepathy.

Hallucination and Psychical Research

One of the most succinct definitions of hallucination occurs in Phantasms of the Living (2 vols., 1886), by Edmund Gurney, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore: "percepts which lack, but which can only by a distinct reflection be recognised as lacking, the objective basis which they suggest." If the sensory perception coincides with an objective occurrence or counterpart, the hallucination is called veridical, (truth-telling), as in the phantasm of the dying. If the apparition is seen by several people at the same time, the case is called collective veridical hallucination.

In the years following the foundation of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, the hallucination theory of psychic phenomena was in great vogue. If no other explanation was available the person who had had a supernormal experience was told it was a hallucination, and if several people testified to the same occurrence it was said that the hallucination of one was communicated to the others. Sir William Crookes counters that idea in his Researches in the Phenomena of Spiritualism (1870): "The supposition that there is a sort of mania or delusion which suddenly attacks a whole roomful of intelligent persons who are quite sane elsewhere, and that they all concur, to the minutest particulars, in the details of the occurrences of which they suppose themselves to be witnesses, seems to my mind more incredible than even the facts which they attest."

Charles Richet, in Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923), omits hallucination completely in his discussion of metapsychical phenomena (a term for paranormal). He believed that hallucination should be reserved to describe a morbid state when a mental image is exteriorized without any exterior reality. According to Richet,

"It is extremely rare that a person who is neither ill, nor drunk, nor hypnotised should, in the walking state, have an auditory, visual, or tactile illusion of things that in no way exist. The opinion of alienists that hallucination is the chief sign of mental derangement, and the infallible characteristic of insanity seems to me well grounded. With certain exceptions (for every rule there are exceptions) a normal healthy individual when fully awake does not have hallucinations. If he see[s] apparitions these correspond to some external reality or other. In the absence of any external reality there are no hallucinations but those of the insane and of alcoholics."

An instance recounted by Sir John Herschel did not conform to Richet's idea. He had been watching with some anxiety the demolition of a familiar building. On the following evening, in good light, he passed the spot where the building had stood. "Great was my amazement to see it," he wrote, "as if still standing, projected against the dull sky. I walked on, and the perspective of the form and disposition of the parts appeared to change as they would have done if real."

In the case of hauntings where a ghost is seen, Gurney suggests that a person thinking of a given place that is at the time actually experienced in sense perception by others may be imparting into the consciousness of the others a thought existing in his own.

Of course, data provided by a registering apparatus or photography may rule out the hallucination theory as applied to hauntings, provided that there is some proper scientific control. Similarly, if objects are displaced, as in poltergeist cases, the theory of hallucination is no longer tenable. As Andrew Lang writes in Cock Lane and Common Sense (1896), "Hallucinations cannot draw curtains, or open doors, or pick up books, or tuck in bedclothes or cause thumps."

The things seen during a psychic experience of an otherwise normal person should also be distinguished from the hallucinations of the mentally deranged, of the sick, drunk, or drugged. The latter are not veridical, nor telepathic, nor collective. In the "Census of Hallucinations," published in the Proceedings of the SPR (1894), the committee excluded, as far as possible, all pathological subjects. J. G. Piddington (see Proceedings, vol. 19), in testing this census for cases that would show the same nature as hallucinations arising from visceral diseases, concluded that there was not a single case in the census report that fell into line with the visceral type.

In hypnotic hallucinations the hypnotized subject may see apparitions if so suggested and may not see ordinary people who are in the same room. But the subject may hear the noises they make, see the movement of objects they touch, and be frightened by what appears to be poltergeist phenomena. If the suggestion is posthypnotic the subject may also see a phantom shape when given a signal or at a prescribed time.

The visions seen by some people on the verge of sleep were called "hypnagogic hallucinations" by F. W. H. Myers. The afterimages on waking from sleep he named "hypnopompic hallucinations." A comprehensive study of both classes of phenomena was published by G. E. Leaning in the Proceedings of the SPR, (vol. 35, 1926).

The difference between hallucination and illusion is that there is an objective basis for the illusion, which is falsely interpreted. In hallucination, although more than one sense may be affected, there is no external basis for the perception.

Sources:

Besterman, Theodore. Crystal-Gazing. London, 1924. Reprint, New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, 1965.

Bramwell, J. M. Hypnotism: Its History, Practice, and Theory. London, 1903.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. 2 vols. London: Trubner, 1886. Reprint, Gainesville, FL: Scholars Facsimiles Reprints, 1970.

Huxley, Aldous. The Doors of Perception. London, 1954.

Johnson, Fred H. The Anatomy of Hallucinations. Chicago: Nelson Hall, 1978.

MacKenzie, Andrew. Apparitions and Ghosts. London: Barker, 1971. Reprint, New York: Popular Library, 1972.

———. Hauntings and Apparitions. London: Heinemann, 1982.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans Green, 1903. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Podmore, Frank. Apparitions and Thought Transference. London, 1894.

Reed, Graham. The Psychology of Anomalous Experience. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1974.

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research. London: W. Collins, 1923. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Rogo, D. Scott. Mind Beyond the Body: The Mystery of ESP Projection. New York: Penguin, 1978.

Samuels, Mike. Seeing With the Mind's Eye: The History, Techniques, and Uses of Visualization. New York: Bookworks; Random House, 1975.

Tyrrell, G. N. M. Apparitions. London: Duckworth, 1953. Reprint, London: Society for Psychical Research, 1973.

Hallucinogens

Drugs that induce profound changes in consciousness through interference with normal sensory perception. Typical drugs of this kind are mescaline, LSD, and psilocybin. The dissemination of knowledge of hallucinogens and their widespread availability in the 1960s created a significant subculture in the West. The use of LSD and related substances opened many to the spiritual life, even though most soon dropped their use.

The public was first alerted to the possibilities of psychedelics through Aldous Huxley's books The Doors of Perception (1954) and Heaven & Hell (1956), which suggest that drug experience is related to states of mysticism. His insights were developed at great length by numerous writers in the following two decades.

Opponents of the use of psychedelics have noted that their use tends to make individuals dependent upon them for the production of ecstatic experiences, and that they are no substitute for the development of a mature mystical lifestyle.

Sources:

Lewin, L. Phantastica, Narcotic and Stimulating Drugs. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1964.

Masters, R. E. L., and Jean Houston. The Varieties of Psychedelic Experience. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966. Reprint, London: Anthony Blond, 1967.

Wasson, R. G. Soma: The Divine Mushroom. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1971.

Zaehner, R. C. Mysticism Sacred and Profane. London, 1957.

Halomancy

A branch of pyromancy (divination by fire) involving throwing salt into flames. Indications were obtained from the nature of the flames, their color, speed, and direction.

Ham

According to Norwegian legend, Ham was a storm fiend in the shape of an eagle with black wings, sent by Helgi to engulf Frithjof as he sailed for the island of Yarl Angantyr. The story is told in the Saga of Grettir.

Hambaruan

Among the Dayaks of Borneo the hambaruan, or soul of a living man, was believed to be able to leave the body at will and go where it chose; however, it was vulnerable to capture by evil spirits. If this should happen, the man would fall ill, and if his soul was not speedily liberated, he would die. The belief represents an awareness of the experience today termed out-of-the-body travel.

Hamilton, T(homas) Glen(dinning) (1873–1935)

Medical practitioner of Winnipeg and former president of the Winnipeg Society for Psychical Research. Over a period of 15 years, Hamilton carried on systematic research in his own laboratory under scientific conditions and often in the presence of distinguished guests from across Canada and the United States.

He was born in Agincourt, Ontario, Canada, on November 26, 1873, into a farming family. He studied at Manitoba Medical College, after which he spent a year as house surgeon at Winnipeg General Hospital. In 1904 he established a private medical practice in Elmwood, Winnipeg. He took a great interest in community life, serving as chairman of the Winnipeg Playground Commission and in 1915 serving on the Manitoba Legislative Assembly.

His interest in psychical phenomena dated from his days as a medical student, and through the 1920s he studied Pearl L. Curran, the medium of the entity known as "Patience Worth." In Winnipeg he formed a circle consisting of four medical doctors, a lawyer, a civil engineer, and an electrical engineer. His wife, an experienced nurse, also assisted. He secured the services of several nonprofessional mediums known only as Elizabeth M., Mary M., and Mercedes. Through regularly attending the séances, some of the sitters also developed mediumship and fell occasionally into trance. The supposed spirits of author Robert Louis Stevenson, missionary David Livingstone, Spiritualist medium W. T. Stead, Baptist minister Charles H. Spurgeon, and psychical researcher Camille Flammarion acted as regular controls.

Many of the phenomena were simultaneously photographed by a large group of cameras, several stereoscopic, and Hamilton obtained a unique collection of photographs of table levitations, telekinetic movements, teleplasmic structures, and materialized hands, faces, and full figures. The success of the circle was credited to the harmonious conditions that prevailed. It allowed Hamilton to make an important contribution to the study of direct voice and psychic lights. Apart from the photographs, the most valuable contribution was a critical analysis of trance that, in the hands of a competent observer, would be invaluable to researchers in eliminating imposition and fraud, whether deliberate or unintentional.

Hamilton died April 7, 1935.

Sources:

Hamilton, Margaret L. Is Survival a Fact? Studies of Deep-Trance Automatic Scripts. London, 1969.

Hamilton, T. Glen. Intention and Survival: Psychical Research Studies and Bearing of Intentional Acts by Trance Personalities on the Problem of Human Survival. Toronto: Macmillan, 1942. Rev. ed. London: Regency Press, 1977.

———. "A Lecture to the British Medical Association." Psychic Science 9, no. 4 (January 1931).

———. "The Mary M. Teleplasm of Oct. 27, 1929." Psychic Science 10, no. 4 (January 1932).

———. "Teleplasmic Phenomena in Winnipeg." Psychic Science 8, no. 3 (1929); 8, no. 4 (January 1930); 9, no. 2 (July 1930).

Hammurabi, Law of

Hammurabi's famous system of law included an injunction against black magic. It was propounded during the reign of Hammurabi, sixth king of the Amoritic or West Semitic dynasty of Babylonia, 2067–2025 B.C.E. (See Semites)

Hamon

A legendary sacred stone like gold, shaped like a ram's horn. If its possessor was in the posture of contemplation, it was believed to give the mind a representation of all divine things.

Hamon, "Count" Louis See Cheiro

Hand, Robert S. (1942–)

Robert S. Hand, a contemporary astrologer, was born December 5, 1942, in Plainfield, New Jersey. He grew up in Orleans, Massachusetts, a town on Cape Cod, and attended Brandeis University. He graduated in 1965 (B.A., magna cum laude). He later pursued post-graduate studies at the University of California at Berkeley and at Princeton University.

Hand's father had been an astrologer who had discovered the usefulness of astrology in forecasting changes in the stock market. Hand developed an interest in astrology during his high school years and began his formal study in 1960. After completing his college work, in 1972 he opened his practice as an astrologer. The following year he assumed a position on the board of the National Council for Geocosmic Research (NCGR). He was named its director in 1974. In the succeeding quarter of a century he became one of the most productive astrologers in North America.

Through the 1970s Hand prepared a set of works on horoscope interpretation: Planets in Composite (1975), Planets in Transit (1976), Planets in Youth (1977), and Horoscope Symbols (1982). These have become standard reference volumes for astrologers and translated into several languages. Hand also wrote widely for various astrological periodicals. His larger work concentrated on the scientific underpinnings of astrology and, following his father's lead, the prediction of financial and economic cycles. For his work he received numerous honors including the Regulus Award from the United Astrology Congress.

In the mid-1970s Hand became a pioneer in programming computers to do the tedious work of calculating and drawing horoscopes. His work led to the founding of Astro-Graphics Services (now Astrolabe Software). Astro-Graphics was the first company to produce horoscope-reading programs for microcomputers. In 1984, Hand issued his first version of Nova, a refined astrological calculation program that became the centerpiece for the Nova System, a series of interlocking calculation programs. Five years later Nova had transformed into AstroAnalyst produced by Hand and Bill Meridian, currently a program for determining the effect of astronomical cycles on stock, bond and commodities prices.

In 1992 Hand became the center of an informal group dedicated to procure, protect and publish translations of historical astrological works and secondary source material. This effort led to the establishing of the Archive for the Retrieval of Historical Astrological Texts (ARHAT). Its Robert Hand Library currently houses a growing collection of the original texts and translations of over two dozen ancient and medieval astrologers. Meanwhile, Hand has turned to some of the more neglected historical and philosophical problems in astrology. He has focused research on the methodologies and thought world underpinning ancient astrology in an attempt to discover any relevance for contemporary life. In 1990 he was named president of the National Council for Geocosmic Research, a post he held for nine years. He now resides on Cape Cod, where Astrolabe, Inc (P. O. Box 1750, Brewster, MA 02631) is located, and has an astrological practice. Website: http://www.robhand.com/about.htm.

Sources:

Hand, Robert S. The Astrolabe World Ephemeris: 2001–2050 at Noon. West Chester Pa.: Schiffer Publishing, Ltd., 1998.

———. Essays on Astrology. Rockport, Mass.: Para-Research, 1982.

———. Horoscope Symbols. Rockport, Mass.: Para-Research, 1981.

———. Planets in Transit. Rockport, Mass.: Para-Research, 1976.

Hand of Glory

The hand of a dead man (preferably hanged) in which a lighted candle was placed. In Ireland and Mexico it was formerly believed to be an instrument of magic. If the candle with its gruesome candlestick was taken into a house, the sleeping inhabitants were believed to be prevented from waking, and the candle itself remained invisible. To be truly effective, however, both hand and candle had to be prepared in a special manner. The term hand of glory is believed to derive from the French main de gloire or mandragoras and be related to legends of the mandrake. The mandrake plant was believed to grow under the gallows of a hanged man. Belief in the efficacy of the hand of glory to facilitate robbery persisted as late as 1831 in Ireland. (See also Glas Ghairm)

Sources:

Ingoldsby, Thomas. The Ingoldsby Legends or Mirth and Marvels. London: R. Bentley, 1840.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Thompson, C. J. S. The Hand of Destiny. London, 1932. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1970.

Hands of Spirits

There are various instances in occult history where the hand of a spirit has been said to become visible to the human eye. During the reign of James I of England a vision of this kind came to a certain clerk who was writing a will that was to disinherit a son. A fine white hand appeared between the candle and the parchment, casting a shadow on the latter. It came three times, until the clerk, becoming alarmed, threw down his pen and refused to finish the work.

In the biblical book of Daniel (5:5) appears the famous instance of the handwriting on the wall: "In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace: and the king [Belshazzar] saw the part of the hand that wrote." Also in Daniel (10:10), it is recorded that Daniel, after a certain vision, was touched by a hand, which set him upon his knees and the palms of his hands.

There are also other instances of writing being done without human hands, and in his book Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism (1874), N. B. Wolfs stated that he shook hands with spirits, as "substantially" as one man shakes hands with another.

Sir William Crookes described the appearance of a phantom hand, which appeared during a séance with Kate Fox: "A luminous hand came down from the upper part of the room, and after hovering near me for a few seconds, took the pencil from my hand, rapidly wrote on a sheet of paper, threw the pencil down, and then rose up over our heads, gradually fading into darkness."

A similar séance took place with Fox at the home of S. C. Hall, editor of the Art Journal, on September 6, 1876, in the presence of nine individuals. A report in The Spiritualist (October 13, 1876) states: "A luminous, small, beautifully shaped hand then descended from the side at which was sitting, that is to say, at the opposite side to Mrs. Jencken [Fox]. The hand seized a pencil which was lying on the table and wrote the letters 'E.W.E.'&43"

Phantom hands were also reported to have materialized during séances with the medium D. D. Home, in sittings with Napoleon III in 1857, as well as on many other occasions with other sitters, including Crookes.

Sources:

Crookes, William. "Notes of an Enquiry into the Phenomena Called Spiritual." Quarterly Journal of Science (January 1874).

Medhurst, R. G., comp. Crookes and the Spirit World: A Collection of Writings by or Concerning the Works of Sir William Crookes D.M., F.R.S., in the Field of Psychical Research. New York: Taplinger; London: Souvenir Press, 1972.

Moses, W. Stainton. Direct Spirit Writing (Psychography). London, 1878. Reprint, London: Psychic Book Club, 1952.

Hankey, Muriel W(inifred) Arnold (1895–1978)

Prominent British researcher and organizer in the field of psychical science. She was born May 17, 1895, in London. She became secretary to J. Hewat McKenzie, founder of the British College of Psychic Science, and for a period served as principal and secretary of the college (1952–60). Over her long life she investigated psychic phenomena and assisted in the training of mediums in Britain. She cooperated with John F. Thomas of Detroit, Michigan, by acting as a "proxy sitter" in experiments over a period of 16 years. (A proxy sitter substitutes for the individual seeking information from a medium in order to eliminate the possibility of telepathy between the medium and sitter.) Hankey died in April 1978.

Sources:

Hankey, Muriel A. James Hewat McKenzie, Pioneer of Psychical Research. London: Aquarian Press, 1963.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hanon-Tramp

German name for a classical type of nightmare. This particular nightmare took the form of a demon that suffocated people during sleep. It was called "Dianus" by the French peasantry and was believed to be what is referred to in Psalm 91 as "the destruction that wasteth at noon-day," since it was supposed that people were most exposed to its attacks at that time. It suffocated by pressing on the breast and thus restricting the lungs. This kind of nightmare is related to belief in the incubus, a demon having intercourse with human beings during sleep, the Scandinavian mara, and the vampire.

Hansel, C(harles) E(dward) M(ark) (1917–)

British lecturer in psychology who wrote many articles on parapsychology. Hansel was born on October 12, 1917, at Bedford, England. He attended Cambridge University (M.A., 1950) and joined the faculty at the University of Manchester, England, as a lecturer in psychology in 1949.

Hansel emerged as a leading critical voice in parapsychology. Quite outspoken concerning psychical research in general, he concluded from his study of its history that "the first forty years of psychical research produced nothing that could be regarded as scientific evidence for supernatural processes. It was in the main, a history of fraud, imposture, and crass stupidity." In 1966 he published his most important book in the field, ESP: A Scientific Evaluation (1966). He also wrote a number of articles and participated in the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal.

Sources:

Hansel, C. E. M. "A Critical Analysis of the Pearce-Pratt Experiment." Journal of Parapsychology (June 1961).

———. "A Critical Analysis of the Pratt-Woodruff Experiment." Journal of Parapsychology (June 1961).

———. "A Critical Review of the Experiments on Mr. Basil Shackleton and Mrs. Gloria Stewart." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (May 1960).

———. ESP: A Scientific Evaluation. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1966. Rev. ed. as ESP and Parapsychology: A Critical Re-evaluation. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1980.

———. "Experimental Evidence for Extrasensory Perception." Nature (1959–60).

———. "Experiments on Telepathy." New Scientist (February 1959).

———. "Experiments on Telepathy in Children: A Reply to Sir Cyril Burt."

Hansen, F. C. C.

Danish scholar known as the proponent of a theory of "involuntary whispering" to account for apparent thought transference (i.e., telepathy). The theory, originally published as a pamphlet in German, was discussed at some length in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) (vol. 9) and the Proceedings of the SPR (vols. 12 and 14).

Sources:

Hansen, F. C. C., and Alfred Lehmann. "Über unwilkürliches Flüstern: Eine kritische und experimentelle Untersuchung der sogenannten Gedankenübertragung." Philosophische Studien 11, no. 4 (1895).

Hantu Penyardin

Term for a vampire in Malayan superstition.

Hantu Pusaka

Term for a demon in Malayan superstition.

Hanussen, Erik Jan (1889–1933)

Extraordinary stage clairvoyant who made a great reputation in Germany during the 1920s and 1930s, combining blatant trickery with the most astounding mental phenomena. Because of the accuracy of his predictions he became known as "the Devil's Prophet." Born Heinrich Steinschneider on July 2, 1889, he was the son of a synagogue caretaker. At an early age he left school to join a circus, where he became a knife thrower, fire eater, and professional strong man. He served in World War I, and when his company was cut off from water supplies Hanussen demonstrated a weird talent for water witching without apparatus. He was eventually transferred to headquarters to entertain troops.

After the war he built up a reputation as a strong man at the Ronacher Circus in Vienna and demonstrated stage clairvoyance at music halls. During one routine performance he suddenly foretold details of the discovery of a local murderer before they were printed in newspapers. At the same demonstration he privately informed an elegant woman that she was the baroness Prawitz, unhappily married, and that within a month she would leave her husband and become his mistress in Berlin, although the affair would eventually break up.

Meanwhile Hanussen found himself on trial in the Czech town of Leitmeritz, charged with extracting money under false pretenses by claiming to forecast the future. With arrogant poise Hanussen correctly told the state prosecutor the contents of his pockets, the judge the contents of his attache case, and gave other information about court officials. When the judge protested that this was just music hall telepathy, Hanussen retorted that he would give further proof of his powers. He stated that at that moment there was a man standing on platform 2 at the Leitmeritz railway station who had just burgled the Commercial Bank and had the money in his briefcase, and that the train was due in four minutes' time. Police rushed to the station and found that Hanussen was right! The bank robber was arrested and Hanussen acquitted.

This case made Hanussen famous, and he became a star at the Scala Theatre in Berlin during the 1920s. The baroness Prawitz also felt an irresistible compulsion to join him as his mistress and was further humiliated by being obliged to dress in a revealing costume and act as his stage assistant "Jane."

In 1929, at a Scala performance, Hanussen told a banker that there was a short circuit in his strong room, which had 360,000 marks in the safes, and there were just over three minutes left to telephone for the fire engines. It happened just as Hanussen predicted. There was no evidence of fraud or collusion, and an electrical fault in a secure strong room of a securely locked bank would have been difficult to fake.

In spite of such sensationally accurate predictions, Hanussen also cold-bloodedly engaged an assistant to ferret out information and gossip for his regular stage performances to avoid having to rely solely on clairvoyance.

With the Nazi rise to power, Hanussen obtained a favorable status as an honorary Aryan, but overreached himself at a séance for party members at which his medium predicted the burning of a large building as a signal for revolt. With the burning of the Reichstag, Hanussen became an embarrassment to the Nazis, and in March 1933 he was taken for a car ride and murdered by three Nazi party members. As it happens, he had earlier told one of his mistresses that he felt his end was near.

Although little known outside Europe, Hanussen was a celebrity in prewar Germany and Austria, and in 1955 a German film company made a film about his life in which this strange charlatan and clairvoyant was represented as an anti-Nazi martyr. In 1989, he was the subject of another movie in the United States.

Sources:

Hanussen, Erik Jan. Meine Lebenslinie. Berlin, 1930.

Tabori, Paul. Companions of the Unseen. London, 1968.

Haraldsson, Erlendur (1931–)

Icelandic psychologist and parapsychologist, born in 1931 near Reykjavik, Iceland. Haraldsson graduated from Reykjavik Gymnasium in 1954, studied languages and philosophy at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland (1955–56), and completed his studies at the University of Freiburg, Germany (1957–58).

He was a journalist for a few years in Reykjavik, then worked as a freelance writer in Berlin, the Middle East, and India.

After being away from school for a number of years, he returned to college to study psychology at the University of Freiburg (1964–66) and then at the University of Munich (1966–69), where he graduated with an advanced degree in psychology. While completing a doctorate, he spent two years in the United States as first a research fellow at the Institute for Parapsychology in Durham, North Carolina (1969–70), and then as an intern in clinical psychology in the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Virginia Medical School (1970–71). He obtained his Ph.D. from the University of Freiburg (under parapsychologist Hans Bender) in February 1972. His dissertation dealt with vasomotor reactions as indicators of extrasensory perception.

Haraldsson returned to the United States for two years (1972–74) as a research associate at the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) before assuming a position in psychology at the University of Iceland. Over the years he contributed many papers to Journal of the ASPR, the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, and other publications. His interests ranged from the phenomena of Sri Sathya Sai Baba to ESP scores to psychic healing in Iceland and the investigation of mediums. He is best known for his work with Karlis Osis of the ASPR on deathbed observations.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Haraldsson, Erlendur. Miracles Are My Visiting Cards: An Investigative Report on Psychic Phenomena Associated with Sri Sathya Sai Baba. 1978. Reprinted as Modern Miracles. New York: Fawcett Columbine, 1988.

———. "Representative National Surveys of Psychic Phenomena: Iceland, Great Britain, Sweden, USA and Gallup's Multinational Survey." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 53, no. 801.

———. "The Sai Baba Enigma." In Miracles, edited by Martin Ebon. New York: New American Library, 1981.

Haraldsson, Erlendur, and L. R. Gissurarson. "The Icelandic Medium Indridi Indridason." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 57 (1989).

Osis, Karlis, and Erlendur Haraldsson. At the Hour of Death. New York: Avon, 1977. Rev. ed. New York: Hastings House, 1980.

———. "Deathbed Observations by Physicians and Nurses: A Cross-cultural Survey." In Signet Handbook of Parapsychology, edited by Martin Ebon. New York: New American Library, 1978.

Harary, Keith (1953–)

Parapsychologist, born February 9, 1953, best known as a subject in parapsychological experiments in out-of-body experiences. During the early 1970s, under the name Stuart Blue Harary, he worked with the Psychical Research Foundation on experiments during which he seemed to interact with a kitten while out of his body. During these same years, he was research consultant with the American Society for Psychical Research (1970–71) and was a research consultant with the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man (1972). He graduated magna cum laude from Duke University (B.A., 1975) and completed his doctorate at the graduate school of the Union Institute (1986).

Since 1982, when he changed his name to Keith Harary, he has had a dual role as a trained psychologist and a subject of parapsychological research. Following graduation he became a writer and lecturer on parapsychological topics. It has been his hope to promote the practical applications of psi. In the early 1980s he worked with Russell Targ and became known for his predictions concerning silver futures for one of Targ's clients. In 1985 he cowrote The Mind Race with Targ. Through the 1980s he worked to popularize parapsychology and to educate people about their individual abilities to experience psychic events of an uplifting and expansive nature. He believed that if a "higher perceptual, communicative, and thinking capability exists within us, then it cannot be consigned to the psychic and paranormal. It must be understood within the context of normal experience and achievable human potential and considered within the emerging framework of mainstream science." In this endeavor he wrote a series of popular texts with Patricia Weintraub. He has written widely for parapsychological journals as well as for more popular mass-circulation periodicals. In 1984 he was chairman and organizer of the first national "Psychology of Extended Abilities" conference at the Esalen Institute.

Sources:

Harary, Keith, and Patricia Weintraub. The Creative Sleep Program. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

———. The Erotic Fulfillment Program. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990.

———. The Free Flight Program. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

———. Have an Out-of-Body Experience in 30 Days. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990.

Harary, Stuart Blue [Keith Harary]. "A Personal Perspective on Out-of-Body Experiences." In Mind Beyond the Body: The Mystery of ESP Projection, edited by D. Scott Rogo. New York: Penguin Books, 1978.

Targ, Russell, and Keith Harary. The Mind Race: Understanding and Using Psychic Abilities. New York: Villard Books, 1984.

The Harbinger of Light

The first Australian Spiritualist magazine, founded by William Terry in 1870 in Melbourne, published monthly.

Harding, Douglas E. (1909–)

British mystic whose teaching resembles a very practical application of Hindu jnana yoga and Zen Buddhist teachings. Harding was born at Lowestoft, Sussex, England, into a fundamentalist Christian family, his parents being members of the Plymouth Brethren. He studied architecture at University College, London. After breaking with the Plymouth Brethren, he was disowned by his parents and suffered a loss of religious faith until he spontaneously rediscovered the secret of mystical identity taught in various religions.

His own awakening was a matter of patient trial and error, which he went through while still pursuing his profession as an architect in India and Britain, as is described in his books On Having No Head (1971) and Me, The Science of the 1st Person (1975). Harding pursued the method of direct first-person experience of "headlessness," involving exercises in achieving identity and awareness. In this endeavor, Harding recalled the classic Hindu mystical question "Who am I?" expounded by Sri Ramana Maharshi and other sages, but beginning at a pragmatic level of physical awareness and culminating in a kind of Western-style Zen insight.

Harding lived in Suffolk, England, but spent time traveling through Europe and the United States lecturing and conducting experiential workshops.

Sources:

Harding, Douglas E. The Hierarchy of Heaven and Earth. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1979.

———. On Having No Head. 1971. Reprint, Boston: Arkana, 1986.

Hardy, Sir Alister Clavering (1896–1985)

Zoologist who was very active in the field of parapsychology. Hardy was born February 10, 1896, at Nottingham, England. He attended Oundle School and Exeter College, Oxford (M.A., D.Sc.). In 1920 he was a Christopher Welch Biological Research Scholar and Oxford Biological Scholar at Stazione Zoologica, Naples, Italy, after which he became an assistant naturalist with the Fisheries Department, Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, in England (1921–24) and chief zoologist on the Discovery expedition (1924–28).

In 1928 Hardy began his lengthy tenure (1928–42) as professor of zoology and oceanography at University College, Hull. In 1939 he was awarded the Scientific Medal of the Zoological Society of England. He spent three years (1942–45) as regius professor of natural history at the University of Aberdeen, Scotland, and in 1946 settled at Oxford University as Linacre Professor of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy, where he spent the rest of his life. He was knighted in 1957.

In addition to his work on zoology, oceanography, and marine ecology, Hardy took a keen interest in the significance of psychical research for biology, and as a member of the council of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, he sought to bring psychical and biological studies closer together. He made his views clear in his 1953 article "Biology and Psychical Research." He went on to write several important books, including The Living Stream: A Restatement of Evolution Theory and its Relation to the Spirit of Man (1965); The Divine Flame (1966); The Challenge of Chance (with R. Harvie and A. Koestler, 1973); The Biology of God (1975); and The Spiritual Nature of Man (1979). He served as president of the SPR from 1965 to 1969.

In 1969 Hardy founded the Religious Experience Research Unit at Manchester College, Oxford, and as its director he collected and analyzed firsthand accounts of religious experiences. These he specifically distinguished from psychical experiences involving ESP. He held a firm religious belief in "a Power which is greater than, and in part lies beyond the individual self."

Hardy died in Oxford May 23, 1985, at age 89. The Alister Hardy Research Center is located at 29-31 George St., Oxford OX1 2BR, England.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hardy, Sir Alister. "Biology and Psychical Research." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 50, no. 183 (1953).

———. The Biology of God. London: Jonathan Cape, 1975.

———. The Divine Flame. London: Collins, 1966.

———. The Living Stream: A Restatement of Evolution Theory and its Relation to the Spirit of Man. London: Collins, 1965.

———. The Spiritual Nature of Man. Oxford: Clarendon, 1979.

———. "Telepathy and Evolutionary Theory." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 35 (1950).

Hardy, Sir Alister, R. Harvie, and Arthur Koestler. The Challenge of Chance: Experiment and Speculations. London: Hutchinson, 1973.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hardy, Mary M. (ca. 1875)

Boston, Massachusetts, medium through whom, in 1875, the first paraffin casts of hands of spirits were obtained. Hardy gave séances in public halls before hundreds of spectators. On the platform there was a table, the cloth of which reached to the ground. Two vessels, containing liquid paraffin and cold water, were placed under the table. The lights were turned down, but spectators were able to see the medium sitting motionless. After about a quarter of an hour raps were heard and a paraffin mold was found floating on the water.

Hardy was investigated by William Denton, who conducted many careful experiments.

In 1875 Hardy visited Europe and gave séances in England and on the Continent. For an account of a séance in 1876 under rigid test conditions, during which molds of spirit hands were produced, see the British periodical The Spiritualist (1878, p. 168).

Hare, Robert (1781–1858)

Nineteenth-century professor of chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania and early advocate of Spiritualism. Among his scientific discoveries was the oxy-hydrogen blowpipe. He wrote more than 150 scientific papers as well as additional papers on various political and moral questions.

Hare was born in Philadelphia January 17, 1781, and studied at the University of Philadelphia, where he filled the chair of chemistry from 1818 to 1847. As a high-ranking scientist of the day, he was one of the first scientific authorities to denounce early American Spiritualism in the press. In 1853 he wrote that he considered it "an act of duty to his fellow creatures to bring whatever influence he possessed to the attempt to stem the tide of popular madness which, in defiance of reason and science, was fast setting in favour of the gross delusion called spiritualism." So at age 72 he began his investigations and devised a number of instruments that, contrary to his expectations, conclusively proved, he believed, that a power and intelligence other than that of those present was at work.

His first apparatus was a wooden board about four feet long, supported on a fulcrum about a foot from one end, and at the other end attached by a hook to a spring balance. A glass vessel filled with water was placed on the board near the fulcrum; a wire gauze cage attached to an independent support, not touching the glass at any point, was placed in the water. The medium would affect the balance by simply placing his hand into the wire cage. The medium Hare tested was Henry Gordon. The balance showed variations of weight amounting to 18 pounds. This apparatus had similarities to that used later by Sir William Crookes to test the medium D. D. Home.

A second apparatus consisted of a revolving disk attached to a table in such a manner that the movements of the table actuated the pointer, which ran around the letters of the alphabet printed on the circumference of the disk and spelled out messages. The disk was arranged so that the medium could not see the letters. Hare's book Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestation, published in 1855, sums up the results:

"The evidence may be contemplated under various phases; first, those in which rappings or other noises have been made which could not be traced to any mortal agency; secondly, those in which sounds were so made as to indicate letters forming grammatical, well-spelt sentences, affording proof that they were under the guidance of some rational being; thirdly, those in which the nature of the communication has been such as to prove that the being causing them must, agreeably to accompanying allegations, be some known acquaintance, friend, or relative of the inquiry.

"Again, cases in which movements have been made of ponderable bodies of a nature to produce intellectual communications resembling those obtained, as above-mentioned, by sounds.

"Although the apparatus by which these various proofs were attained with the greatest possible precaution and precision, modified them as to the manner, essentially all the evidence which I have obtained tending to the conclusions above mentioned, has likewise been substantially obtained by a great number of observers. Many who never sought any spiritual communications and have not been induced to enrol themselves as Spiritualists, will nevertheless not only affirm the existence of the sounds and movements, but also admit their inscrutability."

The book, the second part of which describes the afterlife as depicted by the communicators, passed through five editions. Reaction was quick to set in against its influence. The professors of Harvard University passed a resolution denouncing Hare and his "insane adherence to a gigantic humbug." He was howled down by the American Association for the Advancement of Science when, in Washington in 1854, he tried to address members on the subject of Spiritualism. He finally paid for his convictions by resigning from his chair.

A. D. Ruggles, a professional medium who often wrote in languages unknown to him, was one of the subjects with whom Hare experimented. Later Hare himself evidently became a medium, as deduced from a letter he wrote to John Worth Edmonds, which contains this paragraph: "Having latterly acquired the powers of a medium in sufficient degree to interchange ideas with my spirit friends, I am no longer under the necessity of defending media from the charge of falsehood and deception. It is now my own character only that can be in question." The revelations Hare believed he received from the otherworld he took at face value. There was no careful sifting or criticism, and the belief that they apparently came from spirits appears to have attested their credibility for Hare. This simplistic acceptance of Spiritualism diminished Hare's reputation, especially among his former colleagues, in his later years. He died in Philadelphia May 15, 1858.

Sources:

Hare, Robert. Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestations. New York: Partridge & Britten, 1855. Reprint, Elk Grove, Wis.: Sycamorte Press, 1963.

Harmonial Society

A Spiritualist organization founded in Benton County, Arkansas, in 1855 by former American Methodist minister T. E. Spencer and his wife. It was called Harmony Springs, and admission to membership was subject to the approval of the controls of the founder. Spencer taught that many spirits perished with the body, and that some languished after death but soon expired. However, those who followed his system, he expounded, would arrive at immortality here on Earth. Part of the price of that immortality was the surrender of the members' property to the founders. In the course of events some initiates began to doubt and made known their intentions to take legal measures to recover their property. The Spencers thereupon disappeared but were soon apprehended and sentenced to imprisonment.

Harodim

A degree of Freemasonry very popular in the north of England, especially in the county of Durham, and probably founded in Gateshead in 1681. It was brought under the Grand Lodge in 1735. Members were the custodians of the Ritual of All Masonry, or the Old York Ritual. There were nine lodges in all. A London version of this society was the Harodim-Rosy-Cross, of Jacobite origin, probably carried to London by the earl of Derwentwater. In 1787 a Grand Chapter of the Ancient and Venerable Order of Harodim was founded by William Preston, author of Illustrations of Masonry (1775).

Sources:

Preston, William. Illustrations of Masonry. London, 1775.

Harris, Alec (1897–1974)

British Spiritualist medium Alexander Frederick Harris was born in Treherbert, Wales. He left school at the age of 14 and soon found himself in the army as World War I (1914–18) began. After the war he settled into a mundane job and in 1928 married. In 1932 his wife's brother became a Spiritualist, which led to her joining him in attempts at spirit contact, though Harris would have nothing to do with it. He was first convinced of the truth of what was occurring after contact with his deceased sister and then gained some idea that he might himself have mediumistic powers. He eventually began to fall into trance states, during which his spirit guides began to manifest. Final confirmation came when he attended some materialization séances conducted by the famous medium Helen Duncan (1898–1956), at which his sister and his wife's father materialized.

Soon afterwards, Harris began to manifest as a physical medium, and in 1940 materializations began to occur. His work blossomed as the deaths during World War II (1939–45) began to mount, and the various Spiritualist journals marveled at the number of materializations that would occur at a single séance, sometimes as many as 15 to 30. In 1956 he moved to South Africa, where he lived for the next five years. In 1961 he suffered from a disturbance at one of his séances attended by two reporters attempting to unmask him as a hoaxer. They did not succeed, but Harris appeared to be harmed both by their grabbing a materialized spirit entity and setting off flash bulbs in the dimly lit room. (It is generally understood that materialized spirits are drawing power from and are connected to the medium and any disturbance will rebound on the medium.)

Harris did a few further séances in South Africa and moved back to Wales the next year. However, he returned to South Africa in 1963 and resumed his career. He continued to conduct séances until his health failed in 1974. He died on February 12, 1974, in Johannesburg. His wife, Louie Harris, wrote a biography of him several years later.

Sources:

Harris, Louie. They Walked Among Us. London: Psychic Press, 1980.

Harris, Bertha (1900?–1981)

Bertha Harris, a leading British Spiritualist medium, was born in Chester, England, around the turn of the twentieth century. There is no record of her birth and the exact date is unknown. What is known is that as a child she experienced her initial spirit contacts and reported seeing auras as nice lights around people. Her brother's death in 1917 became traumatic for her; she claimed he appeared to her. Frantic, she found her way to a medium. In the accepting atmosphere, her own mediumship blossomed. About this time her father died, and she was forced to give up her plans for a career as a pianist. She left school and took a job as a bookkeeper.

Over the next years she continued to develop her mediumship. She also married Robert Harris, who also eventually developed mediumistic abilities. In 1923 she accepted the invitation of Ernest W. Oaten in Manchester and made her first trip outside of Chester to demonstrate her mediumship. Oaten assisted her on her stage presence, and the reports of her appearance led to numerous bookings across northern England. Oaten also introduced her to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, and she toured with him. After Doyle died in 1930, she reported on his visits to her.

Through the 1930s, Harris made regular visits to London and received the valued diploma of the Spiritualist National Union, indicative of its acceptance of her psychic abilities. Just after World War II began, in 1940, she moved to London. Reportedly, a number of important people sought her advice during the war, including Charles deGaulle, King George of Greece, and Winston Churchill.

During the decades after the war, Harris emerged as one of the most prominent of London mediums. In 1949 she became a minister with the Spiritualist National Union and in 1953 was honored by her colleagues with an invitation to demonstrate her mediumship for the annual gatherings of the Marlybone Spiritualist Association (now the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain) held in Albert Hall. In 1956 she took the lead in organizing the Union of Spiritualist Mediums (now the Institute of Spiritualist Mediums), an organization for the training of young mediums. She made her first tour in North America in 1973.

Harris suffered a stroke in 1979 that hobbled her during her last years. She passed away on March 17, 1981, in London.

Sources:

Leonard, Maurice. Battling Bertha: The Story of Bertha Harris. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1974.

Harris, Melvin (1940–)

Contemporary British author, researcher, and radio commentator who has investigated claimed paranormal phenomena. His position is skeptical and has been bolstered by his own personal detailed research. After years of teaching and lecturing, Harris became a full-time broadcaster with BBC Radio, presenting dozens of programs on such topics as the history of the phonograph, unusual inventions, the telephone centenary, magnetic recording, and the story of the bassoon. He actually makes baroque oboes as a hobby, and the Melvin Harris Collection of early recordings of performances on wind instruments, at the University of Washington, Seattle, is the largest in the world.

He was a researcher for the television series Arthur C. Clarke's Mysterious World and Strange Powers, and was described by the producer Simon Welfare as "a great detective of the supernatural." His radio series Strange to Relate dealt with many classic mysteries and bizarre events of history, and his book Sorry, You've Been Duped! (1986) debunks many misconceptions about such well-known mysteries as the Amityville Horror, the Bloxham Tapes, the Angels of Mons, and mediums.

Based on scores of earlier books and articles about the celebrated Jack the Ripper case by other writers, his own book Jack the Ripper: The Bloody Truth (1987) exposes fake documents, doctored quotations, and falsified references on the subject. Harris concludes, in a well-argued presentation, that the probable identity of the Ripper was an occultist with a medical background who committed his grisly crimes as part of a black magic ritual. Harris claims that the Ripper was known to Theosophist Mabel Collins and also to journalist W. T. Stead.

Sources:

Harris, Melvin. Jack the Ripper: The Bloody Truth. London: Columbus Books, 1987.

———. Sorry, You've Been Duped! London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1986.

Harris, Susannah (ca. 1920)

American direct voice medium (later known as Mrs. Harris Kay), pastor of a Spiritualist church in Columbus, Ohio, whose control was a child, "Harmony." The last years of her life were spent in England. After accusations of fraud against Harris, Abraham Wallace applied the water test, filling her mouth with water, which changed color according to the length of time it was affected by saliva. Wallace claimed to have established the independence of the medium's voices.

In 1913 and 1914 the Spiritualist journal Light contained many testimonies in favor of Harris's mediumship. In 1919 at Steinway Hall, London, while blindfolded, she executed a painting in oils upside down and nearly completed another in about two hours. However, in 1920 the Norwegian Society for Psychical Research published a very unfavorable report on 25 sittings held in Christiania. Proof was adduced that the German voice of "Rittmeister Hermann" was a fraud to which "Harmony" was an accomplice (Light, May 1, 1920). Harris was also accused of fraud at séances in Holland in 1914. She was defended by James Coates in Is Spiritualism Based on Facts or Fancy? (1920).

Sources:

Jong, K. H. "The Trumpet Medium Mrs. Harris." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 16 (1914).

Harris, Thomas Lake (1823–1906)

Spiritualist mystic, poet, medium, and religious reformer. He was born at Fenny Stratford, England, May 15, 1823, and moved to the United States as a child. He became a Universalist minister at age 20 and was one of the small band of enthusiasts who gathered around Andrew Jackson Davis after the publication of The Principles of Nature, Her Divine Relations, and a Voice to Mankind in 1847.

In the same year Harris formally withdrew from the Universalist church and went on a lecture tour to spread the knowledge of the new revelation. On his return he broke off relations with Davis over his sexual views and behavior. Davis had associated with a married woman whose husband was still living and taught that if married partners discovered that they were no longer adapted to each other they ought to separate and seek truer affinities. Although Harris and Davis became reconciled after Davis married the woman in question, they never again worked together.

Harris became pastor of the First Independent Christian Society of New York. In 1851 he joined the Apostolic Circle at Auburn, New York, under the leadership of J. L. Scott, a Baptist preacher. Scott, a trance speaker, had come to believe that he was the chosen vessel of St. John. Harris's imagination was fueled by messages coming through a Mrs. Benedict, the official medium of the movement, stating that St. Paul was expected to communicate and that Harris might be the fortunate mouthpiece. He went to Auburn and in joint editorship with Scott published a new periodical, Disclosures from the Interior and Superior Care of Mortals.

The Mountain Cove Community was founded soon afterward. The faithful band of settlers yielded themselves and all their possessions to Scott, the "perfect medium." Harris did not join the community. When dissent arose and a break was threatening, however, Scott went to New York and induced Harris to come to the rescue. Because Harris prevailed upon several men of property to follow them, the crisis was averted. There were now two "perfect mediums," and Harris, as the representative of St. Paul, assumed directing influence. His autocratic rule did not last long, however, and after a revolt developed, he left for New York to preach Spiritualism at Dodworth Hall, then the headquarters of the movement.

During November and December 1853, in a state of trance or inspiration, he dictated his first great poetic composition: An Epic of the Starry Heavens. According to Arthur A. Cuthbert's biography, the poem germinated in Harris's subconscious three years and nine months before its dictation, and its 6,000 lines were delivered in 21 sittings from November 24 to December 8, 1853, in 26 hours and 16 minutes. Cuthbert also recorded that Harris was, from his earliest childhood, a remarkable poetical improvisatore. In proof of this he quotes a letter from Richard M'Cully's The Brotherhood of the New Life (1893), which states: "When in Utica he would come to my sitting room of an evening, and sitting down in a rather high chair, he would compose poetry by the mile; and it was really poetry—exquisite thoughts exquisitely worded."

An Epic of the Starry Heavens was followed by The Lyric of the Morning Land and A Lyric of the Golden Age, both similarly dictated in a state of trance. Of the former, a poem of 5,000 words of great beauty, Harris claimed entire ignorance in his conscious state. He spoke and sang it during parts of 14 days in about 30 hours. It was finished by August 4, 1854. A Lyric of the Golden Age reflects the higher ideals of the British romantics—Lord Byron, Percy Shelley, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and others—whom Harris actually claimed, along with Dante, as his inspirers.

In view of such impressive performances, Harris aspired to be the leader of the Spiritualist movement. Rebuffed, his attitude underwent a singular change. He professed to be the champion of Christianity versus Spiritualistic Pantheism and published his Song of Satan, in which the communicating spirits, with the exception of those who visited Harris's "Sacred Family," are declared to be demons in the worst sense of the word. Yet apparently he himself was not immune to the influence of these demons. In his life work, Arcana of Christianity (1857), he complains of obsession in writing: "It was resolved upon by Evil Spirits that my physical existence should be destroyed, the demon, by name Joseph Balsamo, planned a subtle scheme to bring to bear upon the enfeebled physical system the magic of the Infernal World."

Fairies occupied a large place in Harris's esoteric system. There is a long discussion of them in the Arcana under the title "The Divine Origin of the Fay." He claimed constant intercourse with fairyland and poured forth a number of communications in which the "Little Brothers" playfully called him "Little Yabbit." The publication of Harris's own following, The Herald of Light (1857–61), was called "a journal of the Lord's New Church" and was almost entirely written by Harris.

In 1859 he announced to his congregation in New York that the spirits had entrusted him with the mission of going to England and preaching there. He arrived in May 1859, and, in inspirational addresses of striking eloquence, preached his mystic Christianity in both London and various provincial centers. In his first sermon he presented "in bold relief the danger of Spiritualists giving themselves up to production of physical phenomena, and allowing their minds to be held captive by the teachings of the low forms of Spiritualism." The Morning Advertiser interpreted the sermon as "an extraordinary and triumphant exposure of Spiritualism."

In his History of the Supernatural (1863), William Howitt waxes eloquent in paying great tribute to Harris's oratorical mastery:

"His extempore sermons were the only realisation of my conceptions of eloquence; at once full, unforced, outgushing, unstinted and absorbing. They were triumphant embodiments of sublime poetry, and a stern unsparing, yet loving and burning theology. Never since the days of Fox were the disguises of modern society so unflinchingly rent away, and the awful distance betwixt real Christianity and its present counterfeit made so startlingly apparent. That the preacher was also the prophet was most clearly proclaimed, by his sudden hastening home, declaring that it was revealed to him that the nethermost hells were let loose in America. This was before the public breach betwixt North and South had taken place. But it soon followed, only too deeply to demonstrate the truths of the spiritual intimation."

Laurence Oliphant, a brilliant writer and politician, and Lady Oliphant, his mother, the widow of the former chief justice of Ceylon, came under Harris's influence during his stay in England. Oliphant was a man of varied career. He had been on various diplomatic missions, was private secretary to Lord Elgin during his vice-royalty of India, was secretary of legation in Japan, was special correspondent of The Times in Crimea, and was a member of Parliament for the Stirling Burghs in 1865. During his two years of parliamentary life he observed unbroken silence in obedience to Harris's influence.

In 1867 Harris decided to impose a more severe probation. Oliphant disappeared from London and was not seen until 1870. He was summoned to the United States to work as a manual laborer at "The Use," the theo-socialistic community and the headquarters of Harris's own movement, the Brotherhood of the New Life. Harris had founded the community in 1861 on a small farm near Wassaic, New York. The Holy Ghost (i.e., the "Divine Breath") was expected to descend in seven stages upon the members of this community. It appears, however, that Harris and subsequently his wife were the only ones who attained the seventh stage. The practice of "open breathing," a form of respiration to bring the divine breath into the body, resembles pranayama or yoga breathing.

In 1863 The Use moved to Amenia, about four miles from Wassaic, where a mill was purchased and the First National Bank of Amenia was founded under Harris's presidency. This site was soon given up for a settlement in Brockton, on the shore of Lake Erie, which was bought largely with Lady Oliphant's money. Laurence Oliphant was ordered to report to Brockton, and the first task he was assigned was to clean a stable. According to Frank Podmore, the stable must have been of Augean dimensions, because Oliphant was engaged in it for many days in absolute loneliness, sleeping in a loft that was furnished with only a mattress and empty orange boxes. His meals were brought to him by a silent messenger. He was rarely allowed to see his mother, to whom he was very much attached.

After a period of probation, Harris allowed Oliphant to go out into the world. During the Franco-Prussian war Oliphant acted as correspondent for The Times but always held himself in readiness to return if Harris summoned him. He met his future wife in 1872. Harris withheld his consent to the marriage and only agreed when the woman placed all her property in his hands. After the marriage had taken place, the couple were summoned to Brockton. Oliphant's wife was assigned to housework, and Oliphant was quickly dispatched to New York to labor for the community as director of a cable company. For years husband and wife were kept apart. For a period of three years Oliphant was not even allowed to see his wife. During that time Mrs. Oliphant was sent out of the community penniless and alone to earn her living.

In 1880 Harris permitted their reunion in Europe, after his community had migrated to Santa Rosa, California. The grape and wine culture that they had begun in Amenia was developed to a profitable industry in the new settlement.

In the meantime Oliphant's mother was reported to be dying. Laurence went to bid her farewell. When she died, the spell in which he was held by Harris was broken. He charged Harris with fraud and, with the help of friends, recovered a considerable part of his fortune.

Nevertheless, until the end of his days in December 1888, Oliphant persisted in the belief that Harris had genuine psychic powers. Harris's hold on his followers was very strong. They implicitly believed him when in 1891 he announced that he had discovered the elixir of life and had thereby renewed his youth. Consequently, when he died March 23, 1906, his disciples refused to believe in his death and only acknowledged the fact three months later.

Sources:

Cuthbert, Arthur A. The Life and World Work of Thomas Lake Harris, Written from Direct Personal Knowledge. Glasgow, Scotland, 1908.

Harris, Thomas Lake. Brotherhood of the New Life: Its Fact, Law, Method, and Purpose. Fountain Grove, Calif.: Fountain Grove Press, 1891.

———. An Epic of the Starry Heaven. New York: Partridge & Britten, 1854.

———. A Lyric of the Golden Age. New York: Partridge & Britten, 1856.

———. The New Republic. Santa Rosa, Calif.: Fountain Grove Press, 1891.

Hine, Robert V. California's Utopian Colonies. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1966.

Kagan, Paul. New World Utopias. Baltimore, Md.: Penguin, 1975.

Noyes, John Humphrey. History of American Socialisms. Lippincott, 1870. Reprinted as Strange Cults and Utopias of 19th-Century America. New York: Dover, 1966.

Schneider, Herbert Wallace. A Prophet and a Pilgrim, Being the Incredible History of Thomas Lake Harris and Laurence Oliphant: Their Sexual Mysticisms and Utopian Communities. New York: Columbia University Press, 1942.

Swainson, William P. Thomas Lake Harris and His Occult Teaching. London: William Rider & Son, 1922.

Hart, Hornell (Norris) (1888–1967)

American professor of sociology and parapsychologist. Hart was born August 2, 1888, in St. Paul, Minnesota. He studied at Oberlin College, Ohio (B.A., 1910), the University of Wisconsin (M.A. sociology, 1914), and the State University of Iowa (Ph.D. child welfare and sociology, 1921). He was a faculty member successively at Bryn Mawr College (1924–33), Hartford Theological Seminary (1933–38), Duke University (1938–57), Centre College of Kentucky (1957–60), and Florida Southern College (1960–67). He developed an early interest in parapsychology and was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and a member of the American Society for Psychical Research and the Society for Psychical Research.

Hart was a widely published and respected scholar in sociology. Also, as early as the 1930s he began to publish in parapsychology. His special concerns were apparitions and the evidence for survival, the latter topic being the subject of his major book, The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against an After-Life (1959). He discusses the question of out-of-the-body travel or "astral projection" in his article "Man Outside His Body?" (Tomorrow, winter 1954). His culminating statements about his explorations are presented in his final book, Toward a New Philosophical Basis for Parapsychological Phenomena (1965). He died in 1967.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hart, Hornell N. The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against an After-Life. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1959.

———. "ESP Projection: Spontaneous Cases and the Experimental Method." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (1954).

———. Living Religion. New York: Abingdon Press, 1937.

———. "The Psychic Fifth Dimension." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (1953).

———. "Psychical Research and the Methods of Science." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (1957).

———. "Six Theories About Apparitions." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (May 1956).

———. Skeptic's Quest. New York: Macmillan, 1938.

———. Toward a New Philosophical Basis for Parapsychological Phenomena. New York: Parapsychological Foundation, 1965.

———. "Visions and Apparitions Collectively and Reciprocally Received." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (May 1933).

———. Your Share of God: Spiritual Power for Life Fulfillment. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1958.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hartlaub, Gustav Friedrich (1884–1963)

German museum director and professor of art who studied the relationship of occultism and magic to art. He was born March 12, 1884, at Bremen, Germany, and later obtained his Ph.D. at Heidelberg University. In 1921 he became the director of the Municipal Art Museum in Mannheim, Germany, where he remained until fired by the Nazis in 1933. After World War II, he became a professor of art history at Heidelberg University in 1946. He worked there until his death on April 30, 1963.

Sources:

Hartlaub, Gustav Friedrich. The Inexplicable: Study of the Magic World View. N.p., 1951.

———. Magic of the Mirror. N.p., 1950.

———. The Philosophers' Stone: Character and Image of Alchemy. N.p., 1959.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hartmann, (Carl Robert) Eduard von (1842–1906)

German philosopher and author of The Philosophy of the Unconscious, which laid the groundwork of both modern psychoanalysis and of phenomenology. Born February 23, 1842, in Berlin, Hartmann was originally educated for an army career but later turned to philosophy and was awarded his doctorate by the University of Rostock in 1867.

He was among the first to investigate Spiritualism in Germany. He tried to give a definite place to both physical and mental phenomena in his philosophy. In his book Der Spiritismus (1885), he offers the following analysis of Spirtualistic phenomena:

"A nervous force producing outside the limits of the human body mechanical and plastic effects. Duplicate hallucinations of this same nervous force and producing also physical and plastic effects. A latent, somnambulistic consciousness, capable (the subject being in his normal state) of reading in the intellectual background of another man, his present and his past, and being able to divine the future."

Hartmann died at Grosslichterfelde on June 5, 1906.

Sources:

Hartmann, Eduard von. Der Spiritismus. Translated by C. C. Massey as Spiritism. London: Psychological Press, 1885.

Hartmann, Franz (1838–1912)

Noted Theosophist and writer on occultism. Hartmann was born November 22, 1838, in Bavaria, Germany, though he claimed descent on his mother's side from the old Irish kings of Ulster. He became a physician and immigrated to the United States in 1865, traveling as a doctor to various cities and also visiting Indian tribes and studying their religious beliefs. He became interested in Spiritualism and later corresponded with leading Theosophists after the founding of the Theosophical Society in 1875.

Hartmann was invited to the society's headquarters at Adyar, India, where he lived during the furor over Helena Petrovna Blavatsky's alleged miracle working. He published his own Report of Observations During a Nine Months' Stay at the Headquarters of the Theosophical Society at Adyar (Madras), India (1884).

When Richard Hodgson of the Society for Psychical Research, London, published his devastating exposure of claimed trickery and fraudulent phenomena by Blavatsky in 1885, Hartmann accompanied her to Europe and then returned to his hometown in Bavaria. There he claimed to have encountered a sect of secret Rosicrucians from whom he acquired many mystical insights. He was president of the Theosophical Society in Germany for a brief period, but eventually resigned to found independent societies. During his later years he spent much time in the Untersberg Mountains near Salzburg, Austria, where he believed he encountered gnomes, water nymphs, and other nature spirits and also wrote his more memorable books. He died at Kempten, Bavaria, August 7, 1912.

Sources:

Hartmann, Franz. An Adventure Among the Rosicrucians. Boston: Occult Publishing, 1887.

———. In the Pronaos of the Temple of Wisdom. London: Theosophical Society, 1890. Reprint, Chicago: Aries Press, 1941.

———. Life and Doctrines of Paracelsus. N.p., 1891.

———. Magic, Black and White. 1885. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

———. Occult Science in Medicine. N.p., 1893.

———. The Principles of Astrological Geomancy. Boston: Occult Publishing, 1889. Reprint, Mokulumne Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1965.

———. Report of Observations During a Nine Months' Stay at the Headquarters of the Theosophical Society at Adyar (Madras), India. Madras, India: Scottish Press, 1884.

Haruspicy

Ancient system of divination using the entrails of animals. One method was to sacrifice animals to the gods, then inspect the intestines, spleen, kidneys, lungs, gall bladder, and liver. The shapes, colors, and markings of entrails were interpreted. Skilled haruspices or diviners also claimed to be able to interpret the condition of entrails from the outward appearances of animals, such as colors and shapes of eyes, ears, and other organs.

Haruspicy was practiced by ancient Assyrians, Babylonians, and Etruscans, as well as by African and South American tribes. Alternative terms for haruspicy include aruspicy and extispicy. Divination involving the liver of animals is a special branch of haruspicy called hepatoscopy.

Hasted, John B(arrett) (1921–)

British physicist who conducted important research in parapsychology and paraphysics. Hasted began his professional training as a chemist, then worked in the field of physics at the Clarendon Laboratory, Oxford, England, during World War II. He was responsible for important developments in the microwave region of the electromagnetic spectrum in communications and was a reader in physics at the University College of London. His published works include Physics of Atomic Collisions (1964) and Aqueous Diaelectrics (1973). He was also a professor of experimental physics at Birkbeck College, University of London.

Hasted conducted experiments on psychokinesis with the psychic Uri Geller. These experiments, together with those of colleagues David Bohm, Edward W. Bastin, and Brendan O'Regan, took place between February and September 1974 at Birkbeck College and were designed to investigate Geller's abilities in metal bending, deforming crystals, and activating a Geiger counter without touching it. Witnesses at some of the sessions included authors Arthur Koestler and Arthur C. Clarke. The results, which were largely successful, were reported in the paper "Experiments on Psychokinetic Phenomena," by Bohm, Bastin, Hasted, and O'Regan (1976). Hasted subsequently conducted experiments with many children who claimed to be able to reproduce the Geller effect.

Because there have been frequent criticisms that metal-bending experiments are not properly controlled and that children, in particular, are given to blatant fraud, Hasted took care to experiment under conditions in which touching the targets was ruled out and observers closely watched the experiments, some of which were videotaped.

Hasted also devoted special attention to what happens to metal during paranormal bending. The targets are connected with a strain gauge to register the strength of the deformation. Hasted suggests that children may have special aptitude in paranormal bending in the same way that they are often centers of disturbance in poltergeist phenomena. In contrast to John Taylor, author of Superminds (1975), who discounted the possibility of an electromagnetic phenomenon being involved, Hasted believes there is evidence of an electromagnetic field in paranormal metal bending.

Sources:

Hasted, John B. The Metal-benders. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981.

Hasted, John B., David Bohm, Edward W. Bastin, and Brendan O'Regan. "Experiments on Psychokinetic Phenomena." In The Geller Papers: Scientific Observations on the Paranormal Powers of Uri Geller, edited by Charles Panati. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1976.

Taylor, John. Science and the Supernatural. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1980.

———. Superminds. London: Macmillan, 1975.

Hastings, Arthur Claude (1935–)

Assistant professor of speech and drama who has investigated paranormal phenomena. Born May 23, 1935, at Neosho, Missouri, Hastings studied at Tulane University (B.A., 1957) and Northwestern University (M.A., 1958). In 1960 he became a professor at the Department of Speech and Drama, University of Nevada, and also taught at Stanford University and San Jose State University. He is a member of the Parapsychological Association. In 1960 he investigated poltergeist phenomena in Gutenberg, Iowa, for the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University. In the 1970s he became associated with the Institute of Noetic Sciences and was a professor at the Institute of Transpersonal Psychology. He is president of Hastings Associates Consulting Services, Mountain View, California.

Sources:

Hastings, A. C. "Expectancy Set and 'Poltergeist' Phenomena." ETC 18, no. 3 (October 1961).

Hastings, A. C., James Fadiman, and James B. Gordon. Health for the Whole Person. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1980.

Hastings, A. C., and Stanley Krippner. "Poltergeist Phenomena and Expectancy Set." Northwestern Tri-Quarterly 3, no. 3 (Spring 1961).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hastraun

A small mystical sect of Judaism located in some parts of Palestine and Babylon. Members practiced a form of communism and were also known as "fearers of sin."

Hatha Yoga

One of several yogic traditions, hatha yoga refers to the ancient Hindu practice of static physical exercise used to develop physical, physiological, psychological, and spiritual aspects of the self. Unlike the active movements of Western gymnastics, hatha yoga utilizes stationary postures called asanas. Practice of the asanas is said to encourage physical well being, mental discipline, and spiritual growth.

As hatha yoga has been practiced for at least 5000 years, its actual origins are difficult to determine. Its recent resurgence may have been a reaction to the emergence of modern science in India during British occupation in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The Yoga Research and Education Center proclaims the most important influences on the revival of this practice are Sri Krishnamacharya, teacher of B.K.S. Iyengar, K. Pattabhi Jois, and T.K.V. Desikachar. Still others point to the careers of Yogi Madhavdas and Shyam Sundar Gonswami, who co-founded an ashram near Guzrat in Western India. There, they trained two important students: Sri Yogendra, who introduced hatha yoga to the West, and Swami Kuvalayanand. Most of their students established schools in Bombay, and almost all modern practice of hatha yoga can be traced to people trained by either of these two men.

British scholar Henry Thomas Colebrooke wrote the first essay on yoga in 1805. Yet it took nearly four decades for hatha yoga to enter mainstream America in 1947 through yogini Indra Devi, who is dubbed "The First Lady of Yoga." However, yoga master B.K.S. Iyengar is thought to have trained the majority of current American hatha yoga teachers.

The Sanskrit syllable ha indicates the sun and tha the moon. The "yoga" or union of the sun and the moon is through pranayama, believed to be the subtle vitality of breath. Pranayama is induced by actual practice of the asanas and also by special breathing exercises and cleansing techniques. Hatha yoga is based upon balancing the opposing forces that exist naturally within our bodies. Back bends are followed by forward bends while contractions precede extensions. Through this balance of opposites the sun and moon of hatha yoga are joined in union.

Good physical health, rather than being the goal of hatha yoga, is regarded as one of several important steps toward spiritual development. Thus the traditional hatha yoga treatises insist upon yama (abstinences) and niyama (observances) as an essential companion to yoga practice. Examples of yama and niyama include: non-violence, not stealing, truthfulness, restraint from sexual impropriety and greed, observance of purity, austerity, religious study, and divinity. Without such observances hatha yoga becomes merely a form of physical exercise.

Of the theoretical 84,000,000 asanas, 84 are said to be the best, and 32 the most useful for good health. The asanas often incorporate the postures of animals (cow, peacock, locust, lion, etc.), plants, (tree, lotus), and tools (plow, bow). An asana is considered mastered when the yogi can maintain the position without strain for three hours. Asanas develop flexibility in associated muscle groups, and affect the tone of veins and arteries, particularly through inverted positions such as the yoga shoulderstand or headstand. Many asanas help develop maximum flexibility of the spine through a series of backward and forward bending positions at different points of gravity. Asanas, are also claimed to improve the function of the ductless glands, internal organs and the nervous system through persistent gentle pressure.

The mastery of basic asanas and associated cleansing techniques prepares the yogi for meditative positions, while the ensuing practice of mental concentration invites the desired detachment, which enables the meditation itself. When associated with special breathing techniques, the subtle current of the body (termed prana) flows through the nerve channels, culminating in the arousal of latent energy called kundalini. Kundalini is often depicted as a coiled snake resting at the base of the spine. The task of the yogi is to induce the kundalini energy to flow up the spine to a subtle center in the head, resulting in a mystical or transcendental experience.

There are several schools of hatha yoga which students may follow. They include Iyengar yoga, founded by B.K.S. Iyengar, which is known for precision, of the asanas and the use of props (chairs, belts, weights, etc.). Another school is ashtanga yoga, developed by K. Pattabhi Jois, which might be the most physically demanding school of yoga, focusing on intense vinyasa (a steady flow of connected asanas). Integral yoga, founded by Sri Swami Satchidananda, integrates various forms of yoga to benefit the whole person, emotionally, spiritually and physically. Other schools of yoga and their founders are the Yoga College of India (Bikram Choudhury), and Sivananda Yoga (Swami Vishnu-devananda).

As hatha yoga classes have become widespread and commonplace in the west, yoga practitioners face increased pressure to institutionalize. The Yoga Alliance, for example, is encouraging hatha yoga instructors to standardize training for teachers, in an effort to raise the professional level of the yogic community. The Yoga Alliance can be reached at 234 S. 3rd Ave., West Reading, PA 19611.

Sources:

Bernard, Theos. Hatha Yoga. New York: Columbia University Press, 1944. Reprint, London, 1950. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Budilovsky, Joan and Eve Adamson. The Complete Idiot's Guide to Yoga. New York: Alpha Books, 1998.

Carrico, Mara. "A Guide to Yoga Styles," Yoga Journal, August 1997: 56–66.

Dvivedi, M. N., trans. The Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali. Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1890.

Feuerstein, Georg. The Shambala Guide to Yoga. Boston/London, Shambala Publications, Inc., 1996.

Feuerstein, Georg. "A Short History of Yoga." http://www.yrec.org. May 8, 2000.

Iyangar, Yogi S., trans. Hatha-Yoga-Pradipika of Svatmarama Svamin. Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1893.

Iyengar, B. K. S. Light on Yoga. New York: Schrocken Books, 1977.

Majumdar, S. M. Introduction to Yoga Principles & Practices. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Radha, Swami Sivananda. Hatha Yoga: the Hidden Language. Boston, 1989.

Rosen, Richard. "Georg Feuerstein on Reviving Yoga Research." Yoga International, July 1999: 36–43.

Satchidananda, Sri Swami. The Yoga Sutras of Patanjali. Yogaville, Va., 1990.

Vishnudevananda, Swami. The Complete Illustrated Book of Yoga. New York: Bell, 1960. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1971.

Hauffe, Frederica (1801–1829)

"The Seeress of Prevorst," as described in Die Seherin von Prevorst (1829) by Justinus Kerner. Hauffe was born in the village of Prevorst near Löwenstein, Wüttemburg, Germany, in 1801. She married in 1819, and from that time until her death ten years later she was bedridden, subject to various ailments. She had convulsive fits and became rigid like a corpse; in this state she was possessed by spirits. She saw clairvoyantly, made predictions, and exhibited a wide range of psychic phenomena. At one time she spoke only in verse for three days. Occasionally she reportedly saw her own double, clad in white and seated on a chair, while she was lying in bed.

She drew with tremendous speed perfect geometrical designs in the dark, used the divining rod with great skill, exhibited disturbances of a poltergeist character, and communicated extraordinary revelations from the spirit world. The spirits of the dead were said to be in constant attendance on her and allegedly were occasionally seen by others. Kerner himself once observed in her bedroom a grey pillar of cloud that seemed to have a head. Kerner also recorded an instance of Hauffe's seeing with the stomach, which is related to eyeless sight.

Troubled spirits of the dead came to Hauffe for help and disclosed secrets of the doings on Earth that had made them restless. They made various noises, rapped, threw things about, pulled off Hauffe's boots with violence (in Kerner's presence), extinguished the nightlight, and made the candle glow.

Hauffe's Teachings

Hauffe taught while in a trance state, primarily emphasizing the triune doctrine of body, soul, and spirit. She taught that the soul is clothed by an ethereal body ("Nervengeist") that carries on the vital processes when the body is in trance and the soul wanders about. After death it withdraws with the soul but later decays and leaves the soul free.

The unique part of the spiritual revelations of the Seeress of Prevorst consisted of her description of systems of circles—sun circles and life circles—corresponding to spiritual conditions and the passage of time. They were illustrated by amazing diagrams. The interpretation was furnished partly by ciphers, partly by words of a primeval language written in primitive ideographs. On the basis of these revelations, a mystic circle was founded and members claimed that the teachings disclose analogies with the philosophical ideas of Pythagoras, Plato, and others. They issued a journal, Blätter aus Prevorst, 12 volumes of which were published from 1832 to 1839.

Universal Language

The "universal language" described by the Seeress of Prevorst compares, as in the case of John Dee, with Hebrew. A philologist also discovered in it a resemblance to Coptic and Arabic. Hauffe claimed that it was the language of the inner life. The written characters, preserved by Kerner, were always connected with numbers. Some of them are as complicated as an Egyptian hieroglyph. Hauffe said that the words with numbers had a much deeper significance than those without numbers. In this respect the language had affinity with Hebrew gematria, a forerunner of modern numerology. The names of things in this language expressed the properties and qualities of the things. Hauffe spoke it quite fluently and in time her listeners vaguely understood her. Kerner quoted a few words of the language in his book.

In 1823 Hauffe gave birth to a child who was also seized with spasms and convulsions and died within a few months. In January 1829 Hauffe, in trance state, announced that she had only four months to live, but in spite of severe illness she was still living in May. She stated, "It is hard to know the moment of one's death" and continued to see visions of specters and a coffin. Three days before her death she stated that she could not endure another three days. She died August 5, 1829.

Sources:

Kerner, Justinus. Die Seherin von Prevorst. 1829. Abridged and translated as The Seeress of Prevorst. London, 1845. Reprint, Stuttgart: J. F. Steinkopf, 1963.

Smith, Eleanor Touhey. Psychic People. New York: William Morrow, 1968.

Haunted Houses

About 1919, a number of British newspapers contained an advertisement offering for sale "an ancient Gothic Mansion, known as Beckington Castle, ten miles from Bath and two from Frome." After describing the noble scenery around Beckington and the rare architectural beauty of the house itself, the writer of this advertisement proceeded to say that the place was all the more desirable because it was reported to be haunted.

No doubt there are people who long for a house containing a genuine ghost, and it was sometimes said that the rich tradesman, anxious to turn himself into a squire, used to look for a haunted manor, while humorists declared that ghosts were on sale at department stores and that the demand for them among American millionaires was stupendous.

But if the purchaser of Beckington Castle had to pay an additionally high price because the place had a veritable ghost, in reality anything of the sort used to make a house almost unsalable. At Lossiemouth, on the east coast of Scotland, a fine old mansion stood untenanted for years and was eventually sold for a merely nominal sum. The reason was, simply, that according to popular tradition, the building was visited nightly by a female figure draped in white, her throat bearing an ugly scar, and her hands tied behind her back with chains. Nor was it merely concerning old country mansions that stories of this nature were current. Even in many densely-populated towns there were houses, reputed to be haunted, that could not be sold. Following World War II, the acute housing shortage in Britain made homebuyers less finicky and agents less forthcoming about ghosts.

Royal palaces, closely watched and guarded as they invariably have been, are popular residences of such inhabitants. Legend contends, for example, that Windsor Castle is frequently visited by the ghost of Sir George Villiers, and it is said that in the reign of Charles I, this ghost appeared to one of the king's gentlemen-in-waiting and informed him that the Duke of Buckingham would shortly fall by the hand of an assassin—a prophecy that was duly fulfilled soon after, as all readers of The Three Musketeers will doubtless remember.

At Hackwood House, near Basingstoke Hampshire, there is a room in which no one dares to sleep, all dreading "the grey woman" supposed to appear there nightly, while Wyecoller Hall, near Colne, boasts a specter horseman who visits the place once a year, and rides at full speed through the garden.

Very different is the legend attached to Dilston, in Tyneside, where a bygone Lady Windermere is said to appear from time to time and indulge in loud lamentations for her unfortunate husband, who was executed for his share in the Jacobite rising of 1715. Dilston Hall is now an educational establishment, but permission can be obtained to visit the castle ruins.

At Salmesbury Hall, Blackburn, there is a ghost of yet another kind, neighborhood tradition affirming that a weird ghostly lady and her knight promenade the grounds of the hall, indulging all the while in silken dalliance. At the present time, the hall houses an exhibition center and may be visited by tourists.

There are also more gruesome apparitions and among these is the ghost of Amy Robsart, which haunts the manor of Cumnor, in Oxfordshire. Amy was a real woman, not a mere creation of novelist Sir Walter Scott. She was married in 1550 to the Earl of Leicester and her tragic death is commonly attributed to him, but a tradition exists to the effect that Queen Elizabeth was really the responsible person, and recalling an authentic portrait of Amy, which depicts her as a woman of charm and of no ordinary beauty, it is easy to believe that the ill-favored queen hated her and took strong measures to get her out of the way.

Numerous rectories rejoice in the ghost of a clergyman murdered by his parishioners, while at Holy Trinity Church at York a phantom nun was said to appear occasionally on winter evenings and walk about muttering paternosters. The story concerning her is that, on one occasion during the Civil War, a band of soldiers intended to loot the church. On approaching it with this intention they were confronted by an abbess, who warned them of the divine wrath they would surely incur if they committed such an act of sacrilege. They laughed at her piety, never thinking that she would offer any resistance as they tried to march en masse into the building, but hardly had they commenced the assault when their opponent snatched a sword from one of them and stood bravely on the defensive. A fierce battle ensued, the abbess proving herself a fierce warrior by killing a number of the soldiers. Ultimately she lost her life, and her ghost was supposed to frequent the church she sought to defend.

There are few parts of England so rich in romance as Sherwood Forest in Nottinghamshire, once the scene of Robin Hood's exploits. One place in this region that claims a number of ghosts is Newstead Abbey, the seat of Lord Byron's ancestors. A part of the garden there is popularly known as "the devil's wood," a name which points to the place having been infested once by minions of the foul fiend, while one of the rooms in the house was haunted by a certain "Sir John Byron, the little, of the grey beard," who presumably ended his days in some uncanny fashion. His portrait hung over the hall in the dining room, and a young lady staying at Newstead about the middle of the nineteenth century insisted that once she had entered this room to find the portrait gone, and its subject seated by the fireside reading a black-letter folio volume.

The poet Byron himself cherished very fondly all the ghostly traditions that clung to his home and it is recorded that, on his learning that there were stone coffins underneath the house, he immediately had one of them dug up and then opened. He used some of its gruesome contents to"decorate" his own library, while he had the coffin itself placed in the great hall through which thereafter the servants were afraid to pass by night. He also utilized the supernatural lore of Newstead in one of his poems, and from this we learn that a specter friar used to parade about the mansion whenever some important event was about to occur to one of its owners:

When an heir is born he is heard to mourn,
And when aught is to befall
That ancient line, in the pale moonshine
He walks from hall to hall.
His form you may trace, but not his face,
'Tis shadowed by his cowl;
But his eyes may be seen from the folds between,
And they seem of a parted soul.
Say nought to him as he walks the hall,
And he'll say nought to you:
He sweeps along in his dusky pall,
As o'er the grass the dew.
Then, gramercy! for the black friar;
Heaven sain him, fair or foul,
And whatsoe'er may be his prayer,
Let ours be for his soul.

There are many stories of hauntings at that grim ancient fortress, the Tower of London, but visitors must remember that those were usually reported at night, when the gates were closed to tourists.

Passing from England to Ireland, we find many traditions of haunted houses. For instance, at Dunseverick in Antrim dwells the soul of a bygone chief so wicked in his lifetime that even hell's gates were closed to him. Other haunted houses in Ireland, now open to visitors, include castle Matrix in Limerick, castle Malahide in county Dublin and Springhill Manor in county Londonderry.

Scotland

In Scotland there are also numerous haunted buildings, notably Holyrood Palace and the castles of Hermitage and Glamis. The ghost of Hermitage is considerably addicted to exercise and in truth his story marks him as having been a man of rare activity and ambition. Lord Soulis was his name, and, possibly hearing of the exploits of Faust, he vowed that he too would invoke the devil, who generously made his appearance. "Vast power will be yours on earth," said the devil to Soulis, "if you will but barter your soul therefor," so his lordship signed the requisite compact with his life's blood and from then on his days were given over to the enjoyment of every conceivable pleasure.

Soon, however, he felt that his end was near, and calling some of his vassals around him he told them of the awful fate awaiting him after death. They were thunderstruck, but soon after Soulis was gone it occurred to them that, if they could destroy his mortal remains completely, they might save his soul from the clutches of Beelzebub. So having sheathed the corpse in lead they flung it into a furnace, and (so the story goes) manifestly this cremation saved his lordship from the nether regions, for had he gone there his soul could not have been active still at Hermitage.

The ghost story associated with Glamis Castle, the family seat of the Earl of Strathmore, is quite different from the rank and file of supernatural tales and bears a more naked semblance of veracity than pertains to any of these. It is a matter of tradition that there is a secret chamber at Glamis, a chamber that enshrines a mystery known only to a few members of the Strathmore family, and three or four generations ago a lady, staying as a visitor at Glamis, vowed she would solve the riddle.

Her first difficulty was to locate the actual room, but one afternoon, when all the rest of the household were going out, she feigned a headache and thus contrived to be left completely alone. Her next move was to go from room to room, putting a handkerchief in the window of each, and having done this she went outside and walked around the castle to see whether any room had evaded her search.

Very soon she observed a window that had no handkerchief in it, so she hastened indoors again, thinking that her quest was about to be rewarded. But try as she might she could not find the missing room, and while she was searching the other guests returned to the house, along with them the then Lord Strathmore.

He was fiercely incensed on learning what was going on and that night shrieks were heard in a long corridor in the castle. The guests ran out of their rooms to find out what was wrong, and in the dim light they perceived a curious creature with an inhuman head, wrestling with an aged manservant who eventually managed to carry the monster away. There the story ends, but as remarked before, it bears a semblance of truth, the probability being that some scion of the Glamis castle family was mad or hideously deformed, and was accordingly incarcerated in a room to which access was difficult and secret.

Another explanation was offered by the nineteenth-century writer F. G. Lee, who claimed that strange, weird, and unearthly sounds were regularly heard in the castle. The then head of the family unlocked the haunted room, then swooned away in the arms of his companions. What had he seen? The story goes that there had been a feud between the Ogilvie and Lindsay clans, and that one day a party of fleeing Ogilvies demanded sanctuary in the castle. The lord of the day could not refuse, but feared to offend the Lindsays. He thereupon led the Ogilvies to a remote room and locked them in—forever. What the later head of the family saw was the skeletons of the starved Ogilvies, who still had the bones of their arms clenched in their teeth, having been driven in desperation to eat their own flesh.

Be that as it may, there are traditions of other ghosts at Glamis, including a White Lady, a tall thin man known as "Jack the Runner," and a small black servant. Glamis is Scotland's oldest inhabited castle and has many dark and gloomy legends. As a stately home, it is accessible to visitors at the present time.

Borley Rectory

The reputation of "The Most Haunted House in England" was bestowed upon Borley Rectory in Suffolk by psychical researcher Harry Price in his book "The Most Haunted House in England": Ten Years' Investigation of Borley Rectory (1940). Price rented the rectory for a year and advertised for observers. Over a period of 14 months, 2,000 paranormal phenomena were reported: voices, footsteps, ringing of bells, locking and unlocking of doors, messages on walls, transportation of objects, crashes, breaking of windows, starting of fires, lights in a window, the apparitions of a nun, and a ghost coach with a headless coachman.

Price died in 1948, two years after publication of another book The End of Borley Rectory, following the demolition of the rectory. Seven years later, psychical investigators Eric J. Dingwall, Kathleen M. Goldney, and Trevor H. Hall published another book, The Haunting of Borley (1956), alleging that Price deliberately faked phenomena and distorted the Borley story. Hall later followed this work by The Search for Harry Price (1978) in which he attempted methodically to demolish Price's reputation not only as a psychical researcher but also as an individual, but in the end simply overstated his case against Price. So far as Borley Rectory is concerned, the claimed hauntings stretch back in time to the period of its construction, long before the appearance of Price on the scene.

The study of the phenomenon of haunting was a popular exercise of psychical research, but has dropped out of popularity with the rise of laboratory-based parapsychology.

Visiting Haunted Houses

British ghosts have been well documented in a series of books. Haunted Britain by Antony Hippisley-Coxe (1973) lists the haunts of varied ghosts of the British countryside, including grey ladies, headless horsemen, phantom hounds, healing wells, and witches. The pretty village of Pluckley in Kent has no fewer than 12 phantoms, including a White Lady, a Red Lady, a poltergeist, a monk, the Mistress of Rose Court, a schoolmaster who hanged himself, a miller, a watercress woman who burned to death, a highwayman impaled to a tree by a sword, a screaming man who died in a clay pit, and a coach and horses in the main street. Hippisley-Coxe also conducted a weekend ghost safari in conjunction with Grand Metropolitian Hotels and Boswell and Johnson Travel of New York. A coach trip took tourists to supernatural sites in the West Country frequented by ghosts, witches, and poltergeists. (In the United States, similar ghost tours were organized by Richard T. Crowe in Chicago, Illinois.)

Jack Hallam, former picture editor of the British Sunday Times newspaper, published The Ghost Tour: A Guidebook to Haunted Houses Within Easy Reach of London (1967), and The Ghost Who's Who (1977) which lists some 500 frequently reported apparitions in England and Wales, ranging from a Bronze Age ghost through kings and queens to a man in a bowler hat haunting a runway at London Airport. Hallam claims that Britain is the most haunted country in the world, with 25,000 phantoms in England and Wales as well as thousands more in Scotland and Ireland. He states that the most haunted English village is Bramshott in Hampshire, with 300 living residents and 17 ghosts.

Other useful guides to ghost-ridden Britain include Ghost Over Britain by Peter Moss (1977) and Peter Underwood's Hauntings (1977), Gazetteer of British Ghosts (1975), and Gazetteer of Scottish & Irish Ghosts (1973). Irish ghosts are documented in Haunted Ireland: Her Romantic & Mysterious Ghosts by John J. Dunne (1977), which lists 52 traditional Irish phantoms.

Of course, hauntings are not confined to the stately homes of the British Isles. In the United States there have also been celebrated haunted houses, including the Audubon House of Key West, Florida, San Antonio's Brooks House, Fort Sam Houston's Service Club, the Dakota Apartments in New York City (which inspired the setting of Rosemary's Baby), and the Governor's Mansion in Delaware, right up to modern times with the claimed phenomena of the Amityville Horror. Some of the most famous earlier hauntings, such as the Great Amherst Mystery, are more accurately classified as cases of poltergeist, though most people have trouble distinguishing poltergeists from ghosts.

Sources:

Alexander, Marc. Haunted Houses You May Visit. London: Sphere Books, 1982.

Anson, Jay. The Amityville Horror. New York: Bantam; London: Pan Books, 1978.

Bennett, E. T. Apparitions and Haunted Houses: A Survey of Evidence. London: Faber & Faber, 1939. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Gryphon Books, 1971.

Dunne, John J. Haunted Ireland: Her Romantic & Mysterious Ghosts. Belfast: Appletree Press, 1977.

Dyer, T. F. Thiselton. The Ghost World. London: Ward & Downey, 1893.

Flammarion, Camille. Haunted Houses. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1924. Reprint, Detroit: Tower Books, 1971.

Hallam, Jack. The Ghost Tour: A Guidebook to Haunted Houses Within Easy Reach of London. London: Wolfe Publishing, 1967.

Harper, Charles G. Haunted Houses: Tales of the Supernatural, With Some Account of Hereditary Curses and Family Legends. London: Palmer, 1924. Reprint, Detroit: Tower Books, 1974.

Hippisley-Coxe, A. D. Haunted Britain: A Guide to Supernatural Sites Frequented by Ghosts, Witches, Poltergeists & Other Mysterious Beings. London: Hutchinson; New York: McGraw Hill, 1973. Reprint, London: Pan, 1975.

Holzer, Hans. Hans Holzer's Haunted Houses: A Pictorial Register of the World's Most Interesting Ghost Houses. New York: Crown, 1971.

Lang, Andrew. The Book of Dreams and Ghosts. London: Longmans Green, 1897. Reprint, New York: Causeway, 1974.

Moss, Peter. Ghost Over Britain. U.K.: Elm Tree Books, 1977.

Price, Harry. The End of Borley Rectory. London: George G. Harrap, 1946.

———. "The Most Haunted House in England": Ten Years' Investigation of Borley Rectory. London: Longmans, 1940.

Smith, Susy. Ghosts Around the House. New York: World Publishing, 1970. Reprint, Pocket Books, 1971.

Tabori, Paul, and Peter Underwood. The Ghosts of Borley: Annals of the Haunted Rectory. Newton Abbot, U.K.: David and Charles, 1973.

Underwood, Peter. Gazetteer of British Ghosts. London: Souvenir Press; New York: Walker, 1975.

———. Gazetteer of Scottish and Irish Ghosts. London: Souvenir Press, 1973. Reprint, New York: Walker, 1975.

Haunt Hunters

Founded in 1965 as a division of the Psychic Science Institute to serve as a clearinghouse for experiences and information on ghosts, hauntings, extrasensory perception, and other psychic phenomena. It seeks to improve the image of psychical research through public relations techniques and strives to bring together the qualified psychical researcher and the individual who has had a psychic experience. It maintains a speakers bureau and a file of more than 300 case histories of psychic phenomena. It has published The Haunt Hunters Handbook for the Psychic Investigator. Address: c/o Goodwilling, 2188 Sycamore Hill Ct., Chesterfield, MO 63017.

Haunting

Disturbances of a paranormal character, attributed to the spirits of the dead. Tradition established two main factors in haunting: an old house or other locale and restlessness of a spirit. The first represents an unbroken link with the past, the second is believed to be caused by remorse over an evil life or by the shock of violent death.

The manifestations vary greatly. In most cases, strange noises are heard alone (auditory effects); in some others objects are displaced, and lights are seen (visual effects); also, a chilliness is sometimes felt in the atmosphere, not infrequently unbearable stench pervades the room, and an evil influence imparts feelings of unspeakable horror (sensory effects); and phantoms, both human and animal, appear in various degrees of solidity. The more noise they make the less solid they are.

The phenomena of haunting are often classed as objective and subjective. This classification is rather arbitrary as it does not take count of auditive hyperaesthesia. Sounds below the ordinary limit of audition may be heard objectively although nobody else is aware of a beginning disturbance. The phantoms themselves are often harmless and aimless, sometimes malevolent. "Since the days of ancient Egypt, ghosts have learned, and have forgotten nothing," stated Andrew Lang, noted folklorist and writer on psychical manifestations. The usual type display no intelligence, appear irregularly, and act like sleepwalkers or mechanical recordings.

A. W. Monckton, in his Some Experiences of a New Guinea Resident Magistrate (1927) told the story of ghostly footsteps at Samarai, in the house where he was staying. In brilliant illumination he could see depressions at the spots from which the sound of the footsteps came.

Perhaps the most ancient case of haunting is attributed to the spirit of the traitorous general Pausanias (second century C.E.) who was immured in the Temple of Athene of Sparta to die of starvation. Terrifying noises were heard in the temple until a necromancer finally laid the ghost to rest.

John H. Ingram, in The Haunted Homes and Family Traditions of Great Britain (1890), published many accounts of haunting. According to him there are at least 150 haunted houses in Britain. From one account published in Notes and Queries (1860) Ingram noted that Edmund Lenthal Swifte, who was appointed keeper of the crown jewels in the Tower of London in 1814, experienced various unaccountable disturbances. One night one of the sentries saw a huge phantom bear issue from underneath the jewel room door. The bear dissolved into the air after the sentry thrust at it with his bayonet. The sentry died of fright the next day.

Haunted "B. House"

Sir Oliver Lodge, F. W. H. Myers, L. M. Taylor, the Marquess of Bute, and Miss X. (Ada Goodrich-Freer) did the research for the book The Alleged Haunting of B. House (1899). Goodrich-Freer, who was in charge of the investigation, spent about three months at Ballechin House, Perthshire, Scotland. In her diary she states,

"I was startled by a loud clanging sound which seemed to resound through the house. The mental image it brought to my mind was of a long metal bar, such as I have seen near iron foundries, being struck at intervals with a wooden mallet. The noise was as of metal struck with wood; it seemed to come diagonally across the house. It sounded so loud, though distant, that the idea that any inmate of the house should not hear it seemed ludicrous."

Several phantoms were seen, most often a nun whom the investigators named "Ishbel" and a lay woman dressed in grey who was called "Margaret." The nun was sketched by a member of the party. She often appeared to be talking with the lay woman, who seemed to upbraid or reprove her. The attempt to catch their words was unsuccessful. The phantoms were seen by the dogs, who were terrified.

The clanging sounds sometimes continued for a long time and were succeeded by other sounds.

"It might have been made by a very lively kitten, jumping and pouncing, or even by a very large bird; there was a fluttering noise too. It was close, exactly opposite the bed. . . . We heard noises of pattering in Room No. 8 and Scamp [the dog] got up and sat apparently watching something invisible to us, turning his head slowly as if following the movements of some person or thing across the room from West to East. During the night, Miss Moore had heard footsteps crossing the room, as of an old man or invalid man shuffling in slippers."

Attempts to produce the same noises naturally were unsuccessful.

The phantoms apparently desired to be noticed. Goodrich-Freer, absorbed in writing, was gently, then firmly and more decidedly pushed to make her look up. Nothing was visible, but the dog was gazing intently from the hearth-rug at the place where the phantoms might have been expected.

Once the phantom of a living man, Rev. Father H., was seen. He was supposedly sleeping at the time. Twice the vision of a wooden crucifix presented itself, preceded by an acute chill on the part of someone present. Phantom dogs were heard pattering and bounding in play, and one was seen. Goodrich-Freer and a Miss Moore felt more than once that they were being pushed as if by a dog, and on one occasion two forepaws of a large black dog were seen resting on the edge of a table. Gradually the manifestations died down and finally ceased altogether.

Animal Ghosts

The family history of the owners of this haunted house appears to bear out the theory that the animals seen in haunted houses have also lived there. Major S., who was commonly believed to be one of the haunting spirits, was convinced in his lifetime that the spirits of the dead can enter the bodies of animals, and intended to possess, after his death, the body of a favorite black spaniel from among his many dogs. The family was so distressed by the idea that they had all his dogs shot after his burial. Curiously enough, among the dog apparitions at B. House several witnesses saw a black spaniel.

Elliott O'Donnell suggested that there are as many animal phantasms as human, the most frequent being the cat, as cats meet more often with a sudden and violent end in the house in which they live than any other animal. When investigating a haunted house, he generally used to take a dog with him as a dog seldom fails to give early "notice—either by whining, or growling, or crouching shivering on one's feet, or springing on one's lap and trying to bury its head in one's coat—of the proximity of a ghost." O'Donnell stated that belief in spectral dogs was common all over the British Isles.

Haunted Hampton Court

Goodrich-Freer claimed to have seen ghost manifestations in Hampton Court, the famous London palace built for Cardinal Wolsey but taken over by Henry VIII. "In the darkness before me there began to glow a soft light. I watched it increase in brightness and in extent. It seemed to radiate from a central point, which gradually took form, and became a tall, slight woman, moving slowly across the floor." She asked the phantom whether she could help her. "She then raised her hands, which were long and white, and held them before her as she sank upon her knees and slowly buried the face in her palms, in the attitude of prayer—when, quite suddenly, the light went out, and I was alone in the darkness."

Goodrich-Freer nevertheless did not believe that the visitor in this case was a departed spirit. She conjectured that it was a telepathic impression of the dreams of the dead, "just as the figure which, it may be, sits at my dining-table, is not the friend whose visit a few hours later it announces but only a representation of him, having no objective existence apart from the truth of the information it conveys—a thought which is personal to the brain which thinks it."

A Haunted Chateau

At the Chateau T. in Normandy, near Caen, a resident recorded in a diary various knocking phenomena (later published in Annales des Sciences Psychique, 1892–93).

"One o'clock. Twelve blows followed by a long drumming, then 30 rapid single knocks. One would have thought that the house was shaken; we were rocked in our beds on every storey . . . then a long rush of feet; the whole lasting only five minutes. A minute later the whole house was shaken again from top to bottom; ten tremendous blows on the door of the green room. Twelve cries outside, three bellowings, followed by furious outcries. Very loud drumming in the vestibule, rhythmical up to 50 knocks. 1.30 A.M. The house shaken 20 times; strokes so quick that they could not be counted. Walls and furniture alike quivered; nine heavy blows on the door of the green room, a drumming accompanied by heavy blows. At this moment bellowings like those of a bull were heard, followed by wild nonhuman cries in the corridor. We rang up all the servants and when all were up we again heard two bellowings and one cry."

The Laying to Rest of Uneasy Spirits

There are many cases of hauntings by uneasy spirits that required certain acts to take place before the manifestation ceased. A highly curious mixture of haunting, poltergeist, and obsession phenomena is found in the old case of The Maid of Orlach, told in Justinus Kerner's Geschichten Besessener neurer Zeit (1834). The disturbances began in the cowhouse. The cows were found tied up in unusual ways and places. Sometimes their tails were finely plaited together, as if by a lace weaver. Strange cats and birds came and went and invisible hands boxed the cowmaid Magdalene's ears while she was milking and struck her cap off with violence. Mysterious fires broke out from time to time in the cottage and a contest between a black and a white spirit ensued.

There was a white spirit, a benign influence, a nun born at Orlach in 1412, who was guilty of many crimes. She tried to give protection against the increasing violence of the black spirit and asked for the house to be pulled down. The black spirit threw Magdalene into a cataleptic state and obsessed her. The persecution suddenly stopped when the house was demolished. Under an ancient piece of masonry a mass of human bones, among them the remains of several infants, was discovered. The girl never saw ghosts thereafter.

According to Emma Hardinge Britten's Modern American Spiritualism (1869) the Hydesville phenomena developed into a formal haunting some time after the discovery of the rapping intelligence.

"The furniture was frequently moved about; the girls were often clasped by hard, cold hands; doors were opened and shut with much violence; their beds were so shaken that they were compelled to "camp out" as they termed it, on the ground; their bed-clothes were dragged off from them, and the very floor and house made to rock as in an earthquake. Night after night they would be appalled by hearing a sound like a death struggle, the gurgling of the throat, a sudden rush as of falling blood, the dragging as if of a helpless body across the room, and down the cellar stairs; the digging of a grave, nailing of boards, and the filling in of a new-made grave. These sounds have been subsequently produced by request."

The Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 11, p. 547–549) contains one of the most curious and well-authenticated cases in which a haunting spirit established communication with a living person and was laid to rest after its wishes were carried out. The incident occurred in 1893 to a Mrs. Claughton, a resident of 6 Blake St., a house reputed to have been haunted by the spirit of its former owner, a Mrs. Blackburn.

Claughton was awakened in the night by a female apparition, which was also perceived by her elder child. The apparition bid her "follow me," led her to the drawing room, said "to-morrow" and disappeared. The next night the apparition returned, made a statement to Claughton and asked her to do certain things. To prove to her the reality of her experience, the apparition gave the date of Blackburn's marriage, which, on subsequent inquiry, was found to be correct.

During this period, a second phantom appeared who stated himself to be George Howard, buried in Meresby churchyard, and gave the date of his marriage and death. He asked Claughton to go to Meresby (she had never heard of the place before), verify the dates and wait at Richard Hart's grave in the aisle of the church after midnight. He also said that her railway ticket would not be taken, that Joseph Wright, a dark man to whom she should describe him, would help her, and that she would lodge with a woman who had a drowned child buried in the same churchyard. The rest of the story would be told to her at the churchyard.

A third phantom also appeared. He was in great trouble and stood with his hands on his face, behind Blackburn. Thereafter the three phantoms disappeared. Claughton found that such a place as Meresby existed, went there, and found lodgings with Joseph Wright, who turned out to be the parish clerk. The woman who lost a child was Wright's wife. She spoke to Joseph Wright about George Howard, and he took her to Howard's and Richard Hart's graves. Richard Hart appeared and made a communication that Claughton did not feel at liberty to disclose. She carried out the desires of the dead in full and received no communications from them thereafter.

Justinus Kerner's book The Seeress of Prevorst (1845) includes an account of a poor German family in Weinsberg that was disturbed by a ghost. Kerner brought the women of the house to see Frederica Hauffe. The ghost attached itself to Hauffe and told her that he had lived in about 1700 under the name Belon in the house he haunted, had died at the age of 79, and could not rest because he had defrauded two orphans. After a search in the records it was found that the information tallied with a burgomaster of the town who died in 1740 at the age of 79 and had been guardian of orphans.

Premonitory Haunting

Premonitory haunting, foretelling death or another catastrophe, is in a class by itself. The White Lady of the Royal Palace in Berlin and of the Castle of Schönbrunn, the White Lady of Avenel (in Sir Walter Scott's book The Monastery), the Dark Lady of Norfolk, and the Grey Lady of Windsor are all said to be heralds of death. The White Lady of the Royal Palace of Berlin is supposed to be the ghost of the Countess Agnes of Orlemunde, who murdered her two children. She appeared in 1589, eight days before the death of the Prince Elector John George, in 1619, 23 days before the death of Sigismund, and also in 1688. In 1850 her appearance preceded the attempt on the life of Count Frederick Williams. The White Lady of Schönbrunn was seen in 1867 before the tragic death of Emperor Maximilian of Mexico; in 1889, prior to the Mayerling drama; and before the news arrived that John Orth, the ex-Archduke, was lost at sea.

The forms of premonitory haunting show great variety, from death lights and phantom funeral processions to symbolic sounds, the stopping of clocks, the apparition of banshees, and ominous animals. Deathbed visions are in a different class as there is no periodicity in their occurrence.

Augustus Hare, in his book The Story of My Life (1896), tells of the visit of Sir David Brewster to the Stirling family at Kippenross, in Scotland. Brewster was so terrified by strange noises heard in the night that he fled to his daughter's room. His daughter then saw at the head of the stairs a tall woman leaning against the banisters. She asked her to send her maid. She nodded three times and, pointing to a door in the hall, descended the stairs. When the daughter spoke of the matter to Miss Stirling she became deeply agitated. A Major Wedderburn and his wife were sleeping in the room the spirit had pointed to. The tradition said that whoever was pointed out by the ghost died within the year. Strangely enough, before the year was out both the major and his wife were killed in the Sepoy rebellion in India.

The Vanishing Bread and Other Weird Phenomena

The British Spiritualist publication Light (October 24, 1903), reprinted an account from the Daily Express newspaper of the mystery of the vanishing bread of Raikes Farm, Beverley, Yorkshire. The Websters, a family with seven children, apparently lived in a haunted farmstead. Strange noises, footsteps, and mysterious choir singing were heard in the night but what really disturbed the family was that the bread, from the first week of March 1903, crumbled away during the night. It looked as if it had been gnawed by rats or mice.

All sorts of precautions were taken but nothing could arrest the dwindling of the loaves. They were set in a closed pan, with a rat-trap set inside and another on top of the lid, the floor was sprinkled with flour, two lengths of cotton were stretched across the room, and the doors were locked. In the morning, everything was found intact, but one of the loaves had entirely disappeared, and the other had dwindled to half of its original size. For nearly three months the Websters kept the mystery to themselves. The situation became desperate. Mrs. Webster had seen the end of a loaf waste to nothingness on the kitchen table within an hour.

The family requested the services of a former police constable named Berridge, and he was put in sole charge of the dairy for several days. But Berridge frankly confessed that he was baffled. He came with two loaves of bread to the farm, and locked them in the dairy with his own special lock. The next day they appeared to be all right, but a day after, cutting them open, he found the loaves quite hollow. He suspected faulty baking but the cavity gradually grew wider and wider, and the second loaf began to dwindle before his eyes.

He secreted pieces of bread in other places about the house, but in every instance they wasted away to nothing. Ten leading chemists of Beverley and Hull visited the farm and analyzed the bread. Microscopic examination did not reveal the presence of any microbe or fungus, and the bread was pronounced absolutely pure.

When Mrs. Webster resorted to baking cakes for the household, she was relieved to find that although they lay side by side with the blighted bread they showed no sign of harmful contact. But when the last crumb of bread disappeared, the mysterious destroyer of the loaves attacked the cakes as well. The decay of a loaf was immediately arrested if it was removed from the precincts of the farmhouse. This proved that the blight was local and possibly a bizarre form of haunting.

The gruesome traits of the traditional ghost are well reflected in the story the Earl of Bective told British psychical researcher Harry Price. As reported in Psychic Research (June 1930), the earl was staying with some friends at a Scottish castle and wished to explore a certain wing, which had been closed for generations. In the state ballroom, he saw to his amazement,

"The trunk of a man near the door by which he had just entered and which he had closed after him. No head, arms or legs were visible, and the trunk was dressed in red velvet, with slashings of white across the breast and a good deal of lace. The period was perhaps Elizabethan and the trunk was undoubtedly that of a man. . . .

"The apparition gradually became less distinct and finally vanished, apparently through the closed door. Lord Bective then hurried to the other end of the room with the intention of ascertaining whether the phantom had passed into the next apartment. . . .

"And now comes the most extraordinary part of the story. Although he had a few minutes previously passed through the doorway (the door swinging very easily and with a simple latch), he now found that something was on the other side of the door which prevented his opening it. He could still raise the latch and the door would give a fraction of an inch, with a pronounced resilience, exactly as if someone were on the far side attempting to bar his entry into the room. After two or three good pushes he gave an extra powerful one and the door flew open and he was alone."

The story of the haunted vaults at Barbados sounds like fiction, yet Commander R. T. Gould, R.N., assures us in his book Oddities: A Book of Unexplained Facts (1928) that it is a true tale. Time after time, heavy leaden coffins were found standing on end and tossed about as if by the hand of a giant. Lord Combermere, governor of Barbados, decided to test the matter. The six coffins of the haunted vault were placed in order, a stone weighing five tons was cemented into the doorway and Combermere and others placed their seals on the vault. On April 18, 1820, eight months later, the vault was opened. The sand on the floor bore no mark, yet the six coffins were found thrown all over the vault.

A recurring spectral light, subsequently named the Fire of St. Bernardo, was seen in Italy in Quargnento by Signor Sirembo during the early months of 1895, and afterward by one Professor Garzino, the civil engineer Capello and others. At about half past eight in the evening, a luminous mass, sometimes of a diameter of 24–28 inches, appeared and moved by leaps from the little church of St. Bernardo to the cemetery and about midnight returned to the church. The event took place at all seasons, but it was not seen by everybody. The case was described in Cesare Lombroso's book After Death—What? (1909).

The medium Elizabeth d'Esperance, as a young girl, was greatly frightened on the Mediterranean in 1867 seeing a "strange ship . . . her white sails gleaming rosy red in the light of the setting sun," looming full over the bows of the S.S. Sardinian, on which she was sailing. "One man on her deck was leaning with folded arms against the bulwarks watching the oncoming of our vessel." The strange ship passed through their own. D'Esperance saw the vessel in the wake of her boat, with sails fully set; she saw each rope of the rigging, men moving about on the deck, and the pennant flying at the mast-head. Lieutenant N., standing next to the girl, saw nothing.

To Charles Richet, the idea that nonhuman intelligences might be behind the phenomena of haunting was greatly appealing. However, almost nothing that would amount to evidence is available of such haunting. The German "Berg Geister," (the spirits of mountains and mines) or the "little people" (fairies) would be of this class.

In Nineteenth Century Miracles (1884), Emma Hardinge Britten related that a Mr. Kalozdy, a Hungarian author on mineralogy and teacher in the Hungarian School of Mines, collected many narratives of knockings in Hungarian and Bohemian mines. He and his pupils often heard these knockings. The miners took them for signals from the Kobolds (underground goblins) not to work in the direction against which they were warned. The materialized appearance of these Kobolds was seen by Mrs. Kalozdy, herself an author, in the hut of a peasant, Michael Engelbrecht. Lights the size of a cheese plate suddenly emerged; surrounding each one was the dim outline of a small human figure, black and grotesque. They flitted about in a wavering dance and then vanished one by one. This visit was announced to Engelbrecht by knockings in the mine. The more prosaic explanation of underground knockings is that they are caused by seismic disturbances.

Speculations of the Early Psychical Researchers

Such instances, complemented with poltergeist disturbances and other famous cases (such as the Bealings bells, the Drummer of Tedworth, the Epworth phenomena, the house of Eliakim Phelps, and Willington Mill), give a comprehensive idea of the complexity of haunting. What did psychical researchers make out of it? Early investigation pointed to a disapproval of the general belief that some great crime or catastrophe is always to be sought as the cause of haunting.

The chapter on "Local Apparitions" in the Report on the Census of Hallucinations published by the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1894, concludes:

"The cases we have given, in addition to others of the same kind to be found in previous numbers of the Proceedings, constitute, we think, a strong body of evidence, showing that apparitions are seen in certain places independently by several percipients, under circumstances which make it difficult to suppose that the phenomena are merely subjective, or that they can be explained by telepathy without considerable straining of our general conception of it. It appears, however, that there is in most cases very little ground for attributing the phenomena to the agency of dead persons, but as we have said, in the great majority of cases they are unrecognised; and in these cases, if they really represent any actual person, there is often no more reason to suppose the person dead than living."

Folklorist Andrew Lang objected to the SPR's investigation mainly on the grounds that the committee "neglected to add a seer to their number." This he considered a wanton mistake. He added that ghosts do not have benefit nights, that they are not always on view, and even where they have appeared there are breaks of years without any manifestations. Eleanor Sidgwick, who drew up the report, was the first to make a serious attempt to face the difficulties of the problem of hauntings. In an 1885 paper she offers four hypotheses for consideration:

1. The apparition is something belonging to the external world that, like ordinary matter, it occupies and moves through space, and would be in the room whether the percipient were there to see it or not.

2. The apparition has no relation to the external world but is an hallucination caused in some way by some communication, without the intervention of the senses, between the disembodied spirit and the percipient, its form depending on the mind of either the spirit or of the percipient, or of both. This hypothesis does not account for the apparent dependence of the haunting on the locality.

3. The first appearance in haunted houses is a purely subjective hallucination, and subsequent similar appearances, both to the original percipient and to others, are the result of the first appearance, unconscious expectancy causing them in the case of the original percipient and in the case of others. This hypothesis assumes that a tendency to a particular hallucination is very infectious.

4. There is something in the actual building itself which produces in the brain that effect which, in its turn, becomes the cause of hallucination.

Personally, she did not find any of these hypotheses satisfactory and concludes,

"I can only say that having made every effort—as my paper will, I hope, have shown—to exercise a reasonable scepticism, I yet do not feel equal to the degree of unbelief in human testimony necessary to avoid accepting, at least provisionally, the conclusion that there are in a certain sense, haunted houses, i.e., that there are houses in which similar quasi-human apparitions have occurred at different times to different inhabitants, under circumstances which exclude the hypothesis of suggestion or expectation."

Frank Podmore believed that the story of a haunting was begun by some subjective hallucination on the part of a living person, which lingered on in the atmosphere and was telepathically transmitted to the next occupant of the room or house in question. Ada Goodrich-Freer, in her Essays in Psychical Research, aptly remarks that on this theory the story of her vision in Hampton Court Palace ought to be transmitted to future occupants of her room whether she really saw or only imagined what she saw, or mistook what she saw, or even if she told lies as to what she saw.

F. W. H. Myers defined the ghost as a manifestation of persistent personal energy. He made many interesting suggestions. One was that haunting may be the result of past mental actions that may persist in some perceptible manner, without fresh reinforcement, just as the result of our bodily actions persist. The perception may be retro-cognition owing to some curious relation of supernormal phenomena in haunted houses to time. In another suggestion he attributed the phenomena to the dreams of the dead, which are somehow being made objective and visible to the living. In his Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death (1903) he went much further and offered for consideration his theory of "psychorrhagic diathesis" as applied to a spirit. He defined it as "a special idiosyncrasy which tends to make the phantasm of a person easily perceptible; the breaking loose of a psychical element, definable mainly by its power of producing a phantasm, perceptible by one or more persons in some portion of space."

The theory is a bolder exposition of what Edmund Gurney suggested: that spectral pictures, like the recurring figure of an old woman on the bed where she was murdered, may be veridical after-images impressed we know not how on what we cannot guess by that person's physical organism and perceptible at times to those endowed with some cognate form of sensitiveness. The image is veridical because it contains information regarding the former inhabitant of the haunted place.

Earthbound Spirits?

The same suggestion was contained in Ernesto Bozzano's "psychical infestation" theory. Bozzano made a special study of haunting and compiled statistics that indicated that out of 532 cases of haunting, 374 were caused by ordinary ghosts and 158 by the poltergeist type. Psychometric impressions are frequently referred to as another possibility of explanation. As Longfellow writes, "All houses wherein men have lived and died are haunted houses, through the open doors the harmless phantoms on their errands glide, with feet that make no sound upon the floors."

To explain how psychometric impressions may become intensified, the theory may be combined with the emotional energy of the dreams or the remorse of the dead. Remorse is said to make a spirit earthbound, but additional theories have also been brought forth.

Plato quotes Socrates in Phaedo,

"And in this case [impure life] the soul which survives the body must be wrapped up in a helpless and earthy covering, which makes it heavy and visible, and drags it down to the visible region, away from the invisible region of spirit world, Hades—which it fears. And thus these wandering souls haunt, as we call it, the tombs and monuments of the dead, where such phantoms are sometimes seen. These are apparitions of souls which departed from the body in a state of impurity, and still partake of corruption and the visible world, and therefore are liable to be still seen. And these are not the souls of good men, but of bad, who are thus obliged to wander about suffering punishment for their former manner of life which was evil."

In Per Amica Silentia Lunae (1918), poet W. B. Yeats was less censorious in suggesting that "We carry to Anima Mundi our memory, and that memory is for a time our external world; and all passionate moments recur again and again, for passion desires is own recurrence more than any event."

In the book The Projection of the Astral Body written in collaboration with Hereward Carrington (1929), Sylvan J. Muldoon states, ". . . the most upright earthly being is just as apt to become the victim of an earthbound condition as the most wicked." It is not the moral but the psychic conditions that make a spirit earthbound. "How often do we hear of the murderer haunting a place? No, it is always the victim—the innocent party, who figures in haunted house phenomena." This is not always true, however, as there have been many accounts of hauntings by murderers.

Spirits may be earthbound for four reasons: desire, habit, dreams, and insanity. Revenge may be just as potent a factor in making a spirit earthbound as love. Often the haunter appears to be dreaming, yet occasionally he can be drawn into conversation. According to Muldoon, it is the "crypto-conscious" mind which does the talking, while the conscious mind is engaged in the dream.

The crypto-conscious mind of Muldoon is a department of the unconscious which has a will of its own. Violent death is, however, the most frequent cause of haunting. It results in a stress on the mind that influences the crypto-conscious mind to re-enact the last scene on earth. As an analogy Muldoon pointed to the "very common occurrence during the World War to see soldiers, while dreaming, jump from their beds and re-enact terrors which they had met with and which had left a deep stress in their subconscious minds."

Lombroso investigated many cases of haunting and always found a certain purpose: inflicting punishment for the reoccupation of the house, revenging the honor of the family, or moral or religious warning. The disturbances are especially powerful if the victims of the tragedy, enacted perhaps centuries before, died a violent death in the flower of their life. Lombroso called the haunted houses "necrophanic houses."

Vexed by the problem of how haunting spirits obtain matter for their materializations in uninhabited houses where no human organism is available, he asked for an explanation from the control during a séance and twice received the answer that the haunters derive the material for their incarnations from the animals and plants of the deserted house. Nevertheless, human organisms, if available, may be drawn upon by the haunters.

R. C. Morton, in her record of a haunted house (Proceedings of the SPR, vol. 8, p. 311) states:

"I was conscious of a feeling of loss, as if I had lost power to the figure. Most of the other percipients speak of a feeling of cold wind, but I myself had not experienced this." The ghosts Morton saw sometimes appeared to be so solid that they were mistaken for the living. A dog mistook the phantom for a living man and fled in abject terror after discovering his mistake. However solid the phantoms are, material objects do not apparently impede their progress.

Successful experiments were conducted in haunted houses by crystal gazers to locate the source of the trouble. The picture of the haunter was often disclosed when no materialization took place. J. Grasset recorded a case in the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 18, p. 464) in which a girl saw the haunting spirit in a glass of water.

Experience shows that a decent burial of the remains of the victims of foul deeds, division of an ill-gotten treasure, exorcism, prayer, or mass often lays the ghost to rest. This suggests that the haunters are conscious of causing the disturbance, that the physical effects are not simple repercussions of the spirit's tormented mental state. But, as Andrew Lang remarked, "the ghost can make signs, but not the right signs." They suffer from what he calls "spectral aphasia," imperfect expression on the physical plane. He believed that lights in haunted houses are partial failures of ghosts to appear in form. The possibility of causing physical effects often disappears if the haunted house is rebuilt, or if the furniture is taken out. The psychical researcher Col. Taylor once cured a haunted house by ordering the inhabitants to burn an old, moth-eaten bed he had discovered in the attic. Whether the bed was a focal point of evil or not, the manifestations soon ceased.

Ancient laws made special dispositions in the case of haunting. In Cock Lane and Common Sense (1894) Andrew Lang gave a summary of old cases carried to court. Lawsuits over haunting were started in 1915 at Altavilla (Italy), in 1907 at Naples, and in 1907 at Egham, England, in the latter case by the author Stephen Philips. In November 1930, the question came up before the Berlin courts in Germany whether one had the right to keep his family ghosts on the premises. An eleven-year-old girl, Lucie Regulski, was pursued by poltergeist disturbances that purported to emanate from her dead uncle. As the house acquired the reputation of being haunted, the owner applied for an order of eviction. The court decided in favor of the tenant, stating that Lucie's father could harbor as many ghosts as he pleased and that they did not lessen the value of the house.

Present Position

Cases of haunting are still reported in modern times and old-fashioned apparitions are said to appear occasionally in their traditional locales. However, in spite of the development of scientific apparatus superior to that of the past, such as tape recorders, temperature measurement devices, infra-red photography, etc., investigation of haunting is still difficult. Ghosts do not appear to order, and many individuals do not report their experiences for fear of ridicule. On the other hand, the tendency of the mass media to sensationalize claims of haunting raises doubts about cases that are reported or that become publicized in bestselling paperbacks (such as the fraudulent Amityville Horror).

Apparitions possess a strong subjective aspect, and most informants speak of reactions that suggest energy being drawn from themselves to assist the manifestations in haunting. In this sense those who perceive apparitions appear to function like mediums in séances and such subjective factors do not register on cameras and tape recorders. Moreover spontaneous cases and anecdotal reports are difficult for modern parapsychologists to evaluate.

Much more frequent than traditional hauntings are reports of poltergeist phenomena, which appear to be impersonal, as distinct from the personalities of apparitions. Poltergeist phenomena is more accessible to psychical investigation with cameras and tape recorders.

Although there are many well-authenticated cases of haunting over a long period of time, there is still no evidence to show how apparitions are produced and why they persist. An intriguing aspect of apparitions is the question of those of living individuals, of which there are many reliable reports (see Phantasms of the Living by Gurney, Myers, and Podmore, 1886). It should be mentioned that hypnotists have shown that apparently real apparitions may be evoked in subjects by suggestion and one subject was able to produce such images at will (see The Story of Ruth by Morton Schatzman, 1980). The term "hallucination" (without popular misconceptions of lunacy) still seems a useful scientific description of apparitions until there is decisive evidence of how haunting takes place.

In 1970, a team of sociologists at Birmingham University, England, investigated religious beliefs and behavior in one Shropshire town and found that 15 percent of the 8,000 inhabitants accepted the existence of ghosts, while ten percent claimed to have seen or felt a ghost. Another survey by the Institute of Psychophysical Research in Oxford, England, collated 1,500 first-hand accounts of encounters with ghosts reported by individuals in all walks of life. This report, edited by Celia Green and Charles McGreery under the title Apparitions (1977), emphasized that the majority of ghost sightings are in the familiar surroundings of people's homes rather than at eerie old sites.

Sources:

Anson, Jay. The Amityville Horror. New York: Bantam Books; London: Pan Books, 1978.

Automobile Association of Great Britain. Haunts and Hauntings. Basingstoke, England: Publications Division of the Association, 1974.

Bell, Charles Bailey. The Bell Witch, A Mysterious Spirit. Nashville, Tenn.: Lark Bindery, 1934.

Bord, Janet. Ghosts. Newton Abbot, England: David & Charles, 1974.

Bozzano, Ernesto. Dei Fenomeni d'Infestazione. Rome, 1919.

Cox, Katharine. Haunted Royalties. London: W. Rider, 1916.

Crowe, Catherine. The Night Side of Nature; or Ghosts & Ghost Seers. 2 vols. London, 1848. Reprint, Folcroft, Pa., 1976.

Dingwall, Eric J. Ghosts and Spirits in the Ancient World. London: Kegan Paul, 1930.

Flammarion, Camille. Haunted Houses. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1924. Reprint, Detroit: Tower Books, 1971.

Gauld, Alan, and A. D. Cornell. Poltergeists. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1979.

Green, Andrew M. Ghost Hunting: A Practical Guide. London: Garnstone Press, 1973.

Green, Celia, and Charles McGreery. Apparitions. London: Hamish Hamilton; New York: State Mutual Book, 1977.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. 2 vols. London, 1886. Rev. ed. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962. Reprint, Delmar, NY: Scholars Facsimiles and Reprints, 1970.

Haining, Peter. Ghosts: The Illustrated History. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1974. Reprint, New York: Macmillan, 1975.

Harper, Charles G. Haunted Houses. London: Cecil Palmer, 1927.

Harris, John W. Inferences from Haunted Houses and Haunted Men. London, 1901.

Hubbell, Walter. The Great Amherst Mystery. New York, 1888.

Ingram, John H. Haunted Houses and Family Traditions of Great Britain. London, 1884.

Ingram, M. V. An Authenticated History of the Famous Bell Witch. Clarksville, Tenn.: W. P. Titus, 1894.

Lombroso, Cesare. After Death—What? London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1909.

Mackenzie, Andrew. Apparitions and Ghosts. London: Barker; New York: Popular Library, 1971.

———. Hauntings and Apparitions. London: Heinemann, 1982.

Middleton, Jessie A. The White Ghost Book. London: Cassell, 1918.

Moore, Edward. Bealings Bells. Woodbridge, England, 1841.

O'Donnell, Elliot. The Banshee. London: Sands, 1920.

———. Family Ghosts & Ghostly Phenomena. London: Philip Allan, 1933.

———. Haunted Places in England. London: Sands, 1919.

Podmore, Frank. Apparitions and Thought-Transference. London: Walter Scott Publishing, 1894.

Prince, Walter F. The Psychic in the House. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1926.

Roll, W. G. The Poltergeist. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1976.

Schatzman, Morton. The Story of Ruth. London: Duckworth, 1980.

Smith, Susy. Haunted Houses for the Millions. New York: Bell Publishing, 1967.

———. Prominent American Ghosts. New York: World Publishing, 1967.

Stead, William T. Real Ghost Stories. London, 1891. Reprinted as Borderland: A Casebook of True Supernatural Stories. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Thompson, C. J. S. The Mystery and Lore of Apparitions. London: Shaylor, 1930. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1975.

Tweeddale, Violet C. Ghosts I Have Seen. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1919.

Tyrrell, G. N. M. Apparitions. Rev. ed. London: Duckworth, 1953. Reprint, London: Society for Psychical Research, 1973.

Walter, W. Grey. The Neurophysiological Aspects of Hallucinations and Illusory Experience. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1963.

Wright, Dudley. The Epworth Phenomena. London, 1917.

X, Miss [Ada Goodrich-Freer], and John, Marquess of Bute. The Alleged Haunting of B. House. London, 1899. Rev. ed. 1900.

Zingaropoli, F. Case Infestate degli Spiriti. Naples, 1907.

Hauser, Kaspar (ca. 1812–1833)

Mysterious teenage boy who appeared in the streets of Nuremberg, Germany, on May 26, 1828. He could give no clear account of how he came there or where he was from, and some months later claimed that he had been imprisoned in a small, dark room all his life and fed on bread and water. At the time of his appearance in Nuremberg he appeared to be unstable on his legs and largely incoherent. The boy had a letter in his possession, ostensibly from a poor laborer, which stated that the writer first took charge of the boy as an infant in 1812 and had never let him "take a single step out of my house . . . I have already taught him to read and write, and he writes my handwriting exactly as I do." There was also a note purporting to come from Hauser's mother, stating that the boy was born on April 30, 1812, that his name was Kaspar, and his father, now dead, had been a cavalry officer. Both letters appeared to be fakes.

A citizen took Hauser to the house of a local cavalry captain, where the boy is supposed to have said, "I want to be a horseman, like my father," but speaking in a parrot fashion. His vocabulary was otherwise limited to phrases like "I don't know." He was at first believed to be an imbecile.

Hauser was adopted by the town of Nuremberg and educated by a schoolmaster named Daumer, at whose house he lived. The boy's education progressed rapidly, and he soon wrote his own account of his strange life. He claimed that until age 16 he was kept in a prison, perhaps six or seven feet long, four feet broad, and five feet high. There were two small windows, with closed black wooden shutters. He lay on straw, lived on bread and water, and played with toy horses, confined in darkness. He never saw his captor, but "the man" taught him letters and about nine words, after many years taught him to stand and walk, and finally released him.

Hauser's case was studied by Paul John Anselm von Feuerbach, a legal reformer, who published a passionate and not wholly accurate work about Hauser. Both Feuerbach and Daumer claimed that Hauser was an excellent example of a mediumistic subject, sensitive to animal magnetism and able to see in the dark.

Romantic rumors circulated about Hauser, including one claiming that he was really the crown prince of Baden, a legitimate son of the grand duke Charles, and that he had been kidnaped in 1812 by servants of the countess of Hochberg (morganatic wife of the grand duke) to secure succession by her own offspring.

In 1831, the British Earl Stanhope visited Nuremberg and became interested in Hauser, believing him to be the victim of criminals. He undertook to sponsor the lad's higher education, and in the following year Hauser was sent to Anspach in the charge of a Dr. Meyer, who became his tutor. Hauser eventually became a clerk in the office of Feuerbach, who was then president of the court of appeal. Feuerbach died in May 1833, and rumors circulated that he had been poisoned by mysterious enemies. (Back in 1829, when in the care of Daumer, Hauser had claimed to be the victim of a mysterious assassin who had wounded him on the forehead.)

Hauser became increasingly dissatisfied with his clerical post, believing himself destined for higher things. Like Meyer, he had hopes that Lord Stanhope would take him to England and adopt him into high society. Meanwhile Meyer became increasingly disillusioned with Hauser, finding him incurably untruthful. He had strong misgivings about Stanhope's imminent visit to Anspach.

On December 14, 1833, Hauser suddenly rushed into Meyer's room, clutching his side, and led Meyer to a point about five hundred yards from the house. Hauser was unable to answer questions, but on returning to the house gasped out, "Went court garden . . . man . . . had a knife . . . gave a bag . . . struck . . . I ran as I could . . . bag must lie there." It was found that he had a narrow wound under the center of his left breast, caused by a sharp, double-edged weapon. He claimed that on the morning of the fourteenth, a man brought him a message from the court gardener, asking him to look at some clay from a newly bored well. When he went there, another man came forward, gave him a bag, stabbed him and fled. There was snow in the vicinity of the stabbing, but no footprints beyond a single track, perhaps Hauser's own. The bag contained a note in mirror writing containing vague phrases about coming from the Bavarian frontier. Hauser died within three or four days, his heart having been injured.

Rumors multiplied—that Hauser was once more the victim of a sinister plot connected with the prince of Baden, that Lord Stanhope himself was the ringleader and Meyer was an accomplice. The Countess Albersdorft saw visions and published an accusation. Stanhope himself believed that Hauser might have injured himself deliberately to attract attention and perpetuate romantic legends, and that the weapon may have penetrated farther than intended. Hauser undoubtedly had a neurotic and hysterical temperament, and mysterious attacks seemed to occur after quarrels with his guardians.

Sources:

Lang, Andrew. Historical Mysteries. London: Smith Elder, 1904.

Sampath, Ursula. Kaspar Hauser: A Modern Metaphor. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1991.

Singh, Joseph Amrito Lal. Wolf-children and Feral Man. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1965.

Stanhope, Earl. Tracts Relative to Caspar Hauser. London: James S. Hodson, 1836.

Hawaiian Society for Psychical Research

Nonprofit organization established to promote, encourage, and participate in the scientific study of psi phenomena. Last known address: Gharith Pendragon, Hawaiian Society for Psychical Research, P.O. Box 4620, Honolulu, HI 96813.

Haxby, W. (ca. 1878)

Nineteenth-century English physical medium who was a postal employee. Alfred Russel Wallace writes of Haxby's psychic side in My Life (1902):

"He was a small man, and sat in a small drawing-room on the first floor separated by curtains from a larger one, where the visitors sat in a subdued light. After a few minutes, from between the curtains would appear a tall and stately East Indian figure in white robes, a rich waistband, sandals, and large turban, snowy white, and disposed with elegance. Sometimes this figure would walk round the room outside the circle, would lift up a large and very heavy musical box which he would wind up and then swing around his head with one hand.

"He would often come to each of us in succession, bow and allow us to feel his hands and examine his robes. We asked him to stand against the door-post and marked his height, and on one occasion Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood brought with him a shoe-maker's measuring rule and at our request, Abdullah, as he gave his name, took off a sandal, placed his foot on a chair and allowed it to be accurately measured with the sliding rule. After the séance Mr. Haxby removed his boot and had his foot measured by the same rule, when that of the figure was found to be full one inch and a quarter the longer, while in height it was about half a foot taller. A minute or two after Abdullah had retired into the small room, Haxby was found in a trance in his chair, while no trace of the white-robed stranger was to be seen. The door and window of the back room were securely fastened and often secured with gummed paper which was found intact."

It was recorded in the contemporary Spiritualist press that Haxby materialized dogs that ran about the room. However, Charles Richet in Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923) states: "Haxby cheated impudently."

Sources:

"Alleged Mediumship of W. Haxby." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 4.

Wallace, Alfred Russel. My Life. London: Chapman & Hall, 1905.

Hayden, Maria B. (ca. 1852)

Influential American medium of Boston and wife of W. R. Hayden, editor of the Star Spangled Banner. Maria Hayden was the first American medium to visit England after the beginnings of modern Spiritualism in the United States, and subsequently had a great influence on the development of the Spiritualist movement. She arrived in England in October 1852 in the company of a man named Stone, who professed to be a lecturer on "electro-biology," the art of inducing hypnotism by gazing at metallic disks.

Hayden was an educated woman and possessed a limited type of mediumship consisting mainly of raps; however, they furnished information beyond the knowledge of the sitters. In the British press she was treated as an American adventuress. The magazine Household Words was the first to ridicule her. Blackwood's Magazine, The National Miscellany, and other papers followed. Many disclosures were published claiming that the medium could not give correct answers unless she saw the alphabet.

The first man who confessed he was puzzled and unable to account for the phenomena was Robert Chambers. He describes his visit to Hayden in an unsigned article in Chamber's Journal on May 21, 1853, and admitted to having witnessed correct information when the alphabet was behind the medium's back. The Critic was the next to call attention to the inadequacy of the theory put forward by the skeptics. A Dr. Ashburner, one of the royal physicians, came forward for the defense and so did Sir Charles Isham. Other people of importance admitted that the phenomena were worthy of serious investigation, although they were unwilling to commit themselves.

Hayden's most important conquest was the conversion to Spiritualism of Augustus de Morgan, the famous mathematician and philosopher. The book by Mrs. de Morgan From Matter to Spirit (1863, first edition anonymous), the preface of which was written by her husband, gives a detailed account of Hayden's séances. Additional notes were published in Mrs. de Morgan's Memoir of Augustus de Morgan (1882).

The veteran socialist Robert Owen, age 83 at the time, also had several sittings. As a result he boldly embraced Spiritualism and proclaimed in the Rational Quarterly Review a formal profession of his new faith. The publication of the first English periodical on Spiritualism dates from Hayden's visit. The publisher was W. R. Hayden, who joined his wife in England, and the periodical was titled The Spirit World. The first and last issue appeared in May 1853.

After a year's stay in England Maria Hayden returned to the United States, graduated as a doctor of medicine, and practiced for 15 years with such remarkable healing powers that James Rhodes Buchanan, the famous pioneer in psychometry, declared her to be "one of the most skillful and successful physicians I have ever known." She was later offered a medical professorship in an American college.

The great medium D. D. Home gave one of his first public séances at the Haydens' home in March 1851. It is possible that Hayden's mediumship dated from that visit.

Sources:

De Morgan, Augustus. A Budget of Paradoxes. Chicago: Open Court Publishing, 1915. Reprinted as The Encyclopedia of Eccentrics. La Salle, Ill.: Open Court Publishing, 1974.

Haynes, Renée (Oriana) (1906–1994)

British novelist, historian, and writer on psychical research. Haynes was born on July 23, 1906, in London and was educated at private schools and an open-air establishment run by Theosophists. She then attended St. Hugh's College, Oxford (B.A. honors, 1927), where she majored in law and history. From 1928 to 1930 she worked for the publishers Geoffrey Bles, Ltd., London. Her literary career began in 1928 with her book Neopolitan Ice. Through the 1930s she wrote Immortal John (1932), The Holy Hunger (1935), and Pan, Caesar and God: Who Spake by the Prophets (1938). She worked for over a quarter-century for the British Council, London, becoming director of book reviews (1941–67).

She joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, in 1946, edited the society's Journal and Proceedings for more than a decade (1970–81), and served a tenure as a vice president. She was most interested in spontaneous phenomena and shied away from statistical studies. She argued that the psychic aspect of existence was an integral part of human life, an observation made in part from incidents in her own life, including some vivid precognitive dreams. She wrote a number of books on psychical research, but is most remembered for her centennial history of the society. Haynes died in 1994.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Haynes, Renée. The Hidden Springs: An Enquiry into Extra-Sensory Perception. London: Hollis and Carter, 1961. Rev. ed. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.

———. Philosopher King: The Humanist Pope Benedict XIV. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1970.

———. The Seeing Eye, The Seeing I: Perception, Sensory and Extra-Sensory. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1976.

———. The Society for Psychical Research: A History 1882–1982. London: McDonald, 1982.

Omez, Reginald. Psychical Phenomena. Translated by Renée Haynes. New York: Hawthorn, 1958.

Hazelrigg, John (1860–1941)

American astrologer, born on June 20, 1860. He was the younger of twins, his brother being one hour older. Hazelrigg moved to New York as an actor but later abandoned the stage to become an astrologer. His first book, Metaphysical Astrology, was published in 1900, and in 1901 he launched a magazine, Astro-Herald. In 1916 he led in the formation of the American Academy of Astrologians, an elite group of astrologers who met periodically to discuss the more esoteric aspects of astrology. Hazelrigg edited the proceedings.

Hazelrigg wrote several additional books over the years. He also worked with George J. McCormack in astrometeorological research for 15 years (1917–32).

Sources:

Hazelrigg, John. Astrosophia: Being Metaphysical Astrology. New York: The Author, 1915.

———. Astrosophical Principles. New York: Hermetic Publishing, 1917.

———. Fundamentals of Hermetic Science: Being the Bona Fides of Astrology. New York: Hermetic Publishing, 1925.

———. Metaphysical Astrology. New York: Metaphysical Publishing, 1900.

———. The Sun Book; or, the Philosopher's Vade Mecum. New York: Hermetic Publishing, 1916.

Yearbook of the American Academy of Astrologians. 2 vols. New York: Hermetic Publishing, 1917, 1918.

Hazel Tree

The hazel was dedicated to the god Thor and was esteemed a plant of great virtue for the cure of fevers. Hazel branches were a favorite for use as a divining rod. Cutting a rod on St. John's Day or Good Friday was believed to ensure its success as an instrument of divination. A hazel rod was also a badge of authority, and it was probably this notion that that caused it to be used by schoolmasters. A hazel rod was also a symbol of authority among ancient Romans.

HDI See Human Dimensions Institute

Head of Baphomet

An interesting discovery was made public in 1818 dealing with the history of secret societies. According to Baron Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall (in his essay "Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum" in volume 6 of Fundgruben des Orients), there was found among the antiquities of the Imperial Museum of Vienna some idols named Heads of Baphomet, which the Templars were said to have venerated. These heads represented the divinity of the Gnostics, named Mêté (Wisdom). For a long time one of these gilded heads was preserved at Marseilles. It had been seized during a Templar retreat, at a time when they were pursued by the law.

Healing, Psychic

A popular early theory of psychic healing was that it was effected by a sudden and profound nervous change. The conception of the therapeutic power of such a change we owe to Franz Anton Mesmer (1733–1815). He brought it about by a combination of passes, unconscious suggestion, and supposed metallotherapy in an aparatus called the baquet. The baquet involved an oak tub filled with water, iron filings, and flasks of "magnetized water." Patients were connected to this baquet by holding rods or cords, which supposedly conveyed the "magnetism." The atmosphere was enhanced by music. Mesmer contended that a nervous effluence was passing into the patients.

There are many sensitives even now who claim curative power by such a fluid. But the discovery of magnetic action was put forward long before Mesmer as the basis of the sympathetic system of medicine.

The magnet itself was an illustration of the interaction of living bodies. Every substance was supposed to radiate a force. This force was guided by the in-dwelling spirit of the body from which it proceeded. A dissevered portion of a body retained something of the virtue of the body. This led to the deduction that instead of the wound, the weapon that caused it should be anointed, as the wound cannot heal while a portion of the vital spirit remains in disastrous union with the weapon and exerts an antipathetic influence upon its fellow spirit in the body (see powder of sympathy).

The sway of mesmerism was long and powerful. It yielded place to hypnotism after James Braid proved that somnambulism can be induced without passes by mere suggestion, or moreover that the patients can bring it about by themselves by staring at bright objects.

This discovery threw the nervous effluence theory overboard, although its possibility as a coordinating factor was by no means ruled out. Indeed animal magnetism has often, in one form or another, been rediscovered. A. A. Liébeault (1823–1901), for example, from his work treating children under four and curing some under three, claimed that magnetic healing was not due to suggestion. Similar successes were registered later by psychologist Julien Ochorowicz (1850–1917) on children under two. Liébeault even came to the conclusion that a living being can, merely by his presence, exercise a salutary influence on another living being quite independently of suggestion.

However that may be, the mysterious power that after Braid was ascribed to suggestion did not bring us any closer to understanding the curative process. It is more than likely that the ordinary hypnotizer has no curative power at all, and that his command simply starts a train of self-suggestion from the conscious mind, which otherwise would not have penetrated sufficiently deeply to bring about a nervous change.

It is even legitimate to suppose that the same power may be at work in charms, amulets, and incantations. E. W. Cox may have hit upon the truth when he wrote: "The use of the passes is to direct the attention of the patient to the part of the body then being operated upon. The effect of directing the attention of the mind to any part of the frame is to increase the flow of nerve force [or vital force] to that part."

The healer himself may have no knowledge of the process. The supposition that when he lays his hand on the diseased part of the body a magnetic current passes through may not be correct at all, even if the patients often experience a feeling of warmth, as of an electric shock. The healer's influence appears to be rather a directive one for the patient's own powers, which the healer turns into a more efficient channel. If the hypnotizer is more successful than the average psychic healer, an explanation may be found in the trance state into which the patient is thrown, giving him direct access to the subconscious self to which, to use the words of F. W. H. Myers, "a successful appeal is being made through suggestion." In the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, he suggests,

"Beneath the threshold of waking consciousness there lies, not merely an unconscious complex of organic processes but an intelligent vital control. To incorporate that profound control with our waking will is the great evolutionary end which hypnotism, by its group of empirical artifices, is beginning to help us to attain."

This vital control he believed to be the result of some influx from the unseen world; the efficacy of suggestion was dependent on the quantity of new energy that could be imbibed from the spiritual world by directing subliminal attention to a corporeal function.

The problem of psychic healing, however, is much more complex than it appears. It bristles with interesting and stubborn facts that refuse to be fitted into convenient pigeonholes. Suggestion appears to be ruled out when healers cure animals. The process of healing seems interwoven with psychical manifestations, the success of healing often serving as evidence of the paranormal. Medical clairvoyance, psychometry, and direct and indirect action by spirits are concepts that demand consideration.

The somnambules of the early magnetizers diagnosed their own diseases. This was known later as autoscopy. It is now a rare phenomenon. As an intermediate instance between autoscopy and clairvoyant diagnosis, the curious case in Baron Carl du Prel's Experimental-Psychologie (1890) is worth mention. To a hypnotic subject it was suggested that, in his dream, he would find a certain cure for his ailments. The dream was very vivid, a voice giving medical advice was heard, and when these instructions were followed the patient's health considerably improved.

To the eyes of medical clairvoyants, the human body appears to be transparent. They see and describe in lay terms the seat and appearance of the disease. Some have a more restricted power and diagnose from the changes in the aura of the patient, the color being allegedly affected by illness.

Psychometrists do not require the presence of the patient at all. A lock of hair may be sufficient to put the medium on the right track. Sometimes an index, i.e., the mere mention of the name, will suffice. The medium, however, sometimes suffers sympathetically. Temporarily he or she often assumes the bodily conditions of the afflicted man and vividly experiences his ailments.

The therapeutic services of psychical research are now often acknowledged by psychoanalysts and physicians. Crystal gazing and automatic writing help to explore the subconscious mind. Long forgotten memories may be recalled and events of importance may be traced to their source and enable the psychoanalyst to form conclusions without hypnotic experiments. The divining rod (the diviner holding bacterial cultures in his hand) has also been discovered as a means of successful diagnosis, and the use of the pendulum in place of the rod has developed into the art of radiesthesia.

Spirit Healing

Often diagnosis and cure take place through alleged spirit influence, advice, or direct action. A physician, Josiah A. Gridley of Southampton, Massachusetts, confessed in his Astounding Facts from the Spirit World (1854) to have often known a patient's disease and the treatment to be followed before he ever went to see that patient. He attributed the remarkable success of his practice to his communion with the spirit world.

In England, the first spiritual healer, a lecturer on mesmerism named Hardinge, became convinced through spirit communications that epilepsy was due to demonic possession and undertook to cure such cases by spirit instruction. J. D. Dixon, a homeopathic doctor, was the next English healer who, after being converted to Spiritualism in 1857, treated his patients with prescriptions obtained by raps. Daniel Offord, a nine-year-old English boy, wrote prescriptions in Latin, a language which he did not know. He predicted the 1853 cholera epidemic two months in advance and prescribed a daily dose of half a teaspoonful of carbon as an antidote.

The spirits who assist mediums mostly claim to have been physicians on earth who have attained to a higher knowledge in the beyond. A. H. Jacob ("Jacob the Zouave") actually saw the spirits ministering to his patients. Mrs. J. H. Conant attributed Jacob's curative powers to the knowledge of "Dr. John Dix Fisher" in spirit; similarly "Dr. Lascelles" who worked through C. A. Simpson in the Seekers group in London; and "Dr. Beale," a spirit entity who claimed to have followed the medical profession on Earth and who worked through one Miss Rose, a medium. The strange cure of Mme X. (as recorded in the Proceedings of the SPR, vol. 9) was effected by a spirit doctor; the healing controls were Native Americans who were said to have been medicine men in their tribes.

The methods of Native American controls were quite interesting. As the medium Gladys Osborne Leonard describes in My Life in Two Worlds (1931),

"Mrs. Massey's chair was a wooden rocking one. Suddenly her chair began to rock backwards and forwards gently at first, then gathering speed, till it rocked at a tremendous rate. Then, to our horror, the chair turned a complete somersault. So did Mrs. Massey. She fell right on her head, and lay where she fell. I rushed to her, and before I realised what was happening North Star had taken control of me. A lump, the size of an egg, had come up on Mrs. Massey's head. North Star placed my hands upon it; in a few moments it had gone. North Star then left her head alone and proceeded to make passes over her body, particularly over the heart. He gave loud grunts of satisfaction, and seemed extremely well pleased with something. After about half an hour's hard work he stopped controlling me, and Mrs. Massey then disclosed the fact that she had felt very ill for some days past, and she felt better now than she had for months."

Further on, Leonard states,

"When North Star controlled me for healing, he always appeared to appeal to someone far higher than himself before commencing his treatment. He never spoke, but he used to hold his hands upward and outward as if he expected something to be put, or poured into them. His attitude was so obviously one of prayer, or supplication, though he was usually in a standing position."

The most well-known psychic healer was Edgar Cayce (1877–1945) who diagnosed and prescribed for thousands of ailments in a state of self-induced trance.

Healing at a Distance

Cases of healing at a distance are also on record. When the healer's magnetism is said to be transferred into water, paper, or cloth one may argue for suggestion as an explanation; there are, however, more difficult instances. According to a letter from E. W. Capron, quoted in Leah Underhill's The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism (1885) on the occasion of Capron's first visit to the Fox sisters in Rochester, he mentioned casually that his wife was affected with a severe and troublesome cough. Leah Fox in trance suddenly declared: "I am going to cure Rebecca of the cough." She then gave an accurate description of Rebecca and pronounced her cured. Returning home, Capron found her extremely well and the trouble never returned. Absent healing, through prayer groups, is now a regular activity of healing centers.

Cases are recorded in which an apparition at the bedside of a sick person effects a cure by the laying on of hands or by giving instructions. Materialized spirit hands made passes over the head, throat, chest, and back of Stainton Moses to relieve his bronchitis. While it may have been Stainton Moses's faith in the powers of his guides that effected the cure, this does not, however, explain how the healing took place.

Neurologist J. M. Charcot (1825–1893) notes,

"The faith which was healing power seems to me to be the greatest of medicines, for it may succeed where all other remedies have failed. But why should faith, which works on the soul, be considered more miraculous than a drug, which acts on the body? Has anyone yet understood how a drug can cure?"

St. Bernard, the Abbot of Clairvaux (1090–1153), Valentine Greatrakes (1662), Jacob The Zouave (1828–1913), J. R. Newton (1810–1883), the Earl of Sandwich (1839–1916), author of My Experiences in Spiritual Healing (London, 1915), and such modern healers as the late Harry Edwards (1893–1976) to mention a few names only, put many astonishing cures on record that seem to be authentic.

The Nature of Healing

The mind-cures of Christian Science must also be considered. These are wrought by the perception of God as the sole reality and the belief that neither matter nor evil exist. Reports of spectacular healings come from the records of the Church of Christ Scientist, just as they come from Roman Catholicism, evangelical Christianity, and various Spiritualist, occult, and metaphysical groups. There appears to be little objective difference between spiritual healing, divine healing, mind-cure, and faith-cure (the removal of pain by faith in God's power and by prayer). In this respect, one may go back to the ancient days when sleeping in the temple, after having invoked the help of God, often brought about healing at the shrines of Aesculapius, Isis, and Seraphis.

Astonishing instances of healing are recorded in Carré de Montgeron's book La Verité des Miracles opérés par l'intercession de M. de Paris (Cologne, 1745–47), dedicated to the king of France. Miracles took place at the tomb of the Abbé Paris, the Jansenist, in 1731 and the three or four years following. The cure of Mlle. Coirin was without precedent. Cancer had completely destroyed her left breast, and the case seemed utterly hopeless. A visit to the tomb not only cured her, but restored the breast and nipple without any trace of a scar. She was examined in Paris by the royal physician, M. Gaulard, who declared the restoration of the nipple an actual creation. Other physicians deposed before notaries that the cure was perfect. Other amazing cures followed.

The cemetery of St. Médard became so famous for this occurrence that the ire of the Jesuits was aroused and soon afterward, according to Voltaire, it was inscribed on the churchyard wall:

De par le Roi—défense à Dieu

De faire miracle en ce lieu.

Voltaire said that God obeyed and the miracles stopped. This, however, is contradicted by the cures, which kept on occurring for a space of 25 years. And miraculous cures were effected at Treves in Germany by touching a relic known as the Holy Coat of Treves in 1891. Holywell in Wales was called the Welsh Lourdes for similar occurrences. Lourdes itself has become an established site for miracles in healing.

Recent Developments

The most sensational modern development of psychic healing is psychic surgery, which takes two forms. The first, in which the medium mimes operations, is allegedly guided by the spirit of a dead doctor; in the second, in which psychic healers appear to perform real operations, either with their bare hands or with primitive instruments, wounds heal instantaneously. The latter type of psychic surgery, practiced widely in the Philippines and Brazil, remains highly controversial, with conflicting evidence of authenticity and fraud.

Since the rise of parapsychology, psychic healing has been considered under the general heading of psychokinesis. During the 1960s, some interesting healing research was carried out, as various people who claimed healing powers were put to the test in laboratories in attempts to effect living objects. The most spectacular of these experiments used Oscar Estabany, a Hungarian immigrant, who worked with cancer researcher Bernard Grad of McGill University, Montreal. Through the 1960s, Grad involved Estabany in a set of ever more complicated experiments that had as their object the stimulation of the growth of plants and the increase of the rate of healing in wounds on mice. Biochemist Justa Smith also found that Estabany could stimulate the growth of enzymes. The choice of targets in these carefully controlled experiments was made in each case to take the factor of suggestion away.

In one of the most interesting of experiments, Estabany was not allowed near the plants, but merely held the water used to water the plants in his hands. As with other experiments, the plants watered with Estabany's water grew taller.

The Estabany experiments stand as among the most impressive in psychokinesis and are a demonstration of the healing power inherent in at least some human beings. The understanding of a healing power in some persons underlies the popular practice of therapeutic touch developed by Dolores Krieger, a nursing instructor, during the mid-1970s.

Sources:

Carter, Mary Ellen, and William McGarey. Edgar Cayce on Healing. New York: Warner, 1972.

Dooley, Anne. Every Wall a Door. London: Abelard-Schuman, 1973. Reprint, Bergenfield, N.J.: E. P. Dutton, 1974.

Edwards, Harry. A Guide to the Understanding and Practice of Spiritual Healing. Surrey, England: Spiritual Healing Sanctuary, 1974.

———. Thirty Years a Spiritual Healer. Surrey, England: Spiritual Healing Sanctuary, 1968.

Flammonde, Paris. The Mystic Healers. New York: Stein & Day, 1974.

Guirdham, Arthur. Obsession: Psychic Forces and Evil in the Causation of Disease. London: Neville Spearman, 1972.

Hammond, Sally. We Are All Healers. New York: Harper & Row, 1973. Reprint, New York: Ballantine, 1974.

Hutton, Bernard. Healing Hands. London: W. H. Allen, 1966.

James, R. L. L. The Church and Bodily Healing. Essex, England: C. W. Daniel, 1929.

Kiev, Ari. Magic, Faith and Healing. New York: Macmillan, 1964.

Macmillan, W. J. The Reluctant Healer. London: Victor Gollancz, 1952.

Melton, J. Gordon. A Reader's Guide to the Church's Ministry of Healing. Independence, Mo.: Academy of Religion and Psychical Research, 1977.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Montgomery, Ruth. Born to Heal. New York: Coward, McCaan & Geoghan, 1973.

Nolen, William. Healing: A Doctor in Search of a Miracle. New York: Random House, 1975.

Rose, Louis. Faith Healing. London: Victor Gollancz, 1952.

Sherman, Harold. Wonder Healers of the Philippines. Los Angeles: DeVorss, 1966. Reprint, London: Psychic Press, 1967.

Tenhaeff, W. H. C. Paranormal Healing Powers. Olten, 1957.

Valentine, Tom. Psychic Surgery. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1974.

Healing by Faith

Faith healing, the idea that faith in God is the operative agent in miraculous healings of the body, is in large part a misnomer. Most Christian ministers and evangelists who practice healing understand clearly that God, through the power of the Holy Spirit, is the operative force in healing. In Christian theology, faith is the name given to the trusting relationship the Christian hopefully has with God. Given the omnipotence of God, faith is often seen as the element that allows the believer to receive God's healing power.

The practice of healing in evangelical churches has often received bad press. It has been attacked by those who believe it is an exercise in ignorance. The image of healing ministers has not been helped by those few who have advocated a complete break with doctors, an attitude carried over from the days prior to the scientific medicine of this century. Given the successes of medicine, the miracles reported have not dealt with the question of those who failed to receive any healing. A few have cited lack of faith as a reason why some people are not healed.

Divine healing, the more proper designation of what is popularly called faith healing, emerged in force in the 1870s, contemporaneously with Christian Science and New Thought. Physicians were scarce and their cures still haphazard at best. The leader of the new healing movement was an Episcopal physician, Charles Cullis, who held healing meetings each summer beginning in the 1880s. Among those who were healed at his hand was Rev. Albert Benjamin Simpson, a Presbyterian minister who had responded to the new Holiness movement that had emerged among the Methodists. Members of the Holiness movement saw themselves living in the last days, when God would pour his spirit out anew on his people (Acts 2). They thought they lived in a time of miracles.

Simpson joined hands with G. O. Barnes, also a former Presbyterian minister, who had worked with evangelist Dwight L. Moody and also had been affected by Holiness preachers. In 1876, Barnes traveled through Kentucky, saving souls and healing the sick by laying on hands in the name of the Lord. By 1882, Barnes and A. B. Simpson were working together. Simpson began a magazine, the first step toward founding the Christian and Missionary Alliance, the first modern denomination to advocate healing as a central tenet. Simpson developed an understanding of Christ's fourfold ministry as Saviour, Sanctifier, Healer, and Coming King.

Another influential evangelist healer was John Alexander Dowie, an Australian Congregationist minister who came to the United States from Australia in 1888 as head of the international Divine Healing Asssociation. He eventually settled in Zion, Illinois, north of Chicago, and founded the independent Christian Catholic Church. Dowie was a controversial figure, constantly in conflict with authorities, and lost control of his own movement following an illness in 1906. His community was a frequent stop on the tours of initerant healing evangelists and several of the residents emerged to became evangelists of note.

Healing in the Holiness movement was passed along to the Pentecostal movement. That movement began with Holiness evangelist Charles Fox Parham. Parham opened the Bethel Healing Home and Bible School in Topeka, Kansas, and it was here in 1901 that people began "speaking in tongues," the definitive experience of Pentecostalism. In his revival campaigns, Parham practiced healing through the laying on of hands, and hundreds of cures were claimed. Among Parham's Bible school students was African American Holiness preacher William J. Seymour, who became pastor of a small holiness congregation located on Azusa Street in Los Angeles.

The healing emphasis in Pentecostalism set the stage for the emergence of Aimee Semple McPhearson, one of the most colorful healing evangelists of the 1920s. Unable to find a home in the older denominations, she founded the independent Church of the Foursquare Gospel, drawing her doctrinal perspective from A. B. Simpson. Although MacPherson's following was initially small, a revival campaign in San Diego became immensely successful through claims of miraculous healing under her ministry, and her followers eventually provided funds for a huge Angelus Temple in Los Angeles. A charismatic figure, McPherson had a flair for publicity, and was one of the early evangelists to take advantage of the new communication possibilities provided by radio. She purchased a radio station in Los Angeles, and her services were broadcast to thousands of followers across the United States. In 1926, she was supposed to have been kidnaped for a month, but critics have stated that this story covered a "love-nest" scandal.

During the Great Depression, healing evangelism suffered something of a decline, although there were still many missions and itinerant preachers. There was a great upsurge in evangelism after World War II with the ministry of William Marrion Branham, an independent Baptist preacher who attracted huge crowds with his healing during the 1940s. There were rumors that he had even raised a man from the dead. Amongst those influenced by Branham's gospel campaigns were Oral Roberts, O. L. Jaggers, Gayle Jackson, T. L. Osborn, and Gordon Lindsay, all of whom developed their own ministries. In spite of a great expansion of such evangelism during the 1950s, there was again some decline through the 1960s, largely attributed to the development of air conditioning, which virtually killed independent itinerant evangelism of all kinds until the emergence of large air conditioned facilities in the 1980s.

Marjoe Gortner, a healing evangelist as a teenage preacher, left the field and appeared in a documentary film (Marjoe, 1972) in which he exposed the tricks used by some evangelists to support their highly competitive work. His exposure of the underbelly of healing ministries, and the disgusting practices of some ministers, disillusioned thousands of would-be followers and threw doubt on other evangelists.

By 1970, the end of the traveling tents was in sight, as increasingly sophisticated audiences expected comfortable seats and air conditioning. However, a recovery was seen as revival services were shifted to hotel auditoriums and the new civic centers built to house seasonal sports events. Experienced evangelists such as Oral Roberts, W. V. Grant, and Rex Humbard found a new life.

New life for the healing evangelists also came from the emergence of the charismatic movement, a new spread of Pentecostalism within the older mainline denominations. As Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians found the baptism of the Holy Spirit and spoke in tongues, they became open to the Pentecostal message of healing. A new generation of healers emerged, including Don Stewart, Kathryn Kuhlman, Roxanne Brandt, and many others. Included among them was Ruth Carter Stapleton, sister of former president Jimmy Carter. One notable evangelist healer is Willard Fuller, who specializes in dental healing. An eyewitness reported: "He prays for people and God fills their teeth. I have actually seen fillings appear in teeth that had cavities; some gold, some silver, some white enamel-like substances, and some are completely restored to their original condition."

Is Faith Healing Genuine?

Healing as practiced by the Pentecostal and Charismatic evangelists raises all of the questions that any form of nonconventional or psychic healing does. Do healings occur? If paranormal healings occur, do they happen because of some psychokinetic force? By definition, consideration of God and the Holy Spirit stands outside of any scientific discourse, but might it be that the results of any divine intervention in the life of an individual have measurable consequences that could be documented? Could it be that subtle psychokinetic forces are active but misunderstood as miraculous or divine?

Given current knowledge of the mundane healing forces, quite apart from drugs, available to the average individual, from placebos to the body's own healing capacity, those skeptical of divine healing have made a strong case that all religious healing can be ascribed to natural forces—the placebo effect (operative in most cases of fraud), delayed action by medications, temporary or spontaneous remission, or, as often as not, misdiagnosis of the person's condition. On such grounds, for example, physician William Nolan attacked the ministry of Kathryn Kuhlman.

The most recent attack upon the legitimacy of healing ministries followed the discovery and exposure in the mid-1980s of several healers, most notably Peter Popoff and W. V. Grant, Jr., who were using fraudulent techniques derived from Spiritualism to bolster their appearance as people possessed of unusual powers. Magician James Randi surveyed the activities of numerous evangelists. He found most of them to be naive people of integrity, but discovered several engaged in fraud.

Defenders have countered with reports, complete with medical records, of people who have been healed in their meetings. These are, however, relatively few in number given the amount of effort required to properly document a case. Also, in most cases today, the proper records do not exist, the condition is largely stress related (psychosomatic), or the causes operative in the healings are not clear.

Many who defend healing in the religious context no longer argue that such healing is miraculous. Rather they cite the value of a life in which community, intimacy, fellowship, forgiveness, order, and compassion operate to destroy the guilt, alienation, and chaos that contributes to diseased conditions.

Sources:

Allen, A. A. Bound to Lose, Bound to Win. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Harrell, David Edwin, Jr. All Things Are Possible With God. Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University Press, 1975.

Hart, Ralph. Doctors Pronounced Me Dead in Dallas. Detroit: The Author, n.d.

Lindsay, Gordon. William Branham, A Man Sent From God. Dallas: Voice of Healing Publishing, 1950.

Melton, J. Gordon. A Reader's Guide to the Church's Ministry of Healing. Independence, Mo.: Academy of Religion and Psychical Research, 1977.

Randi, James. The Faith Healers. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1987.

Roberts, Oral. My Story. Tulsa, Okla.: Oral Roberts Evangelistic Association, 1961.

Rose, Louis. Faith Healing. London: Victor Gollancz, 1968.

Simpson, Eve. The Faith Healer: Deliverance Evangelism in North America. St. Louis, Mo.: Concordia, 1977. Reprint, New York: Pyramid, 1977.

Spraggett, Allen. Kathryn Kuhlman: The Woman Who Believes in Miracles. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1970. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1971.

Stegall, C., and C. C. Harwood. The Modern Tongues and Healing Movement. Western Bible Institute, n.d.

Tenhaeff, W. H. C. Paranormal Healing Powers. Olten, 1957.

Healing by Touch

In England, Scotland, and also in France, the idea that a touch of the royal hand was a sure remedy for scrofula was long prevalent, and consequently this complaint acquired the now familiar name "king's evil." In France, so far as can be ascertained, this interesting practice dates from the reign of Louis IX, and in England from that of Edward III, who is recorded to have performed a considerable number of cures. He initially would wash the affected part of the sufferer, but gradually the actual bathing was discontinued, and most subsequent kings merely touched while offering prayers on behalf of the patient.

Eventually the religious ceremony used on such occasions grew more elaborate, and during the reign of Henry VII a special "king's evil" petition was drawn up. It is found in some editions of the Service Book printed as late as the beginning of the eighteenth century.

The belief that kings ruled by divine right was strong in Scotland, and so it is natural to assume that the early inhabitants of that land regarded their sovereigns as capable of miracles. There is little or no evidence, nevertheless, that the Stuarts, prior to the union of the Crowns, practiced touching for king's evil. Scarcely was Charles I on the British throne, however, before he began to demonstrate his powers, and scrofulous persons flocked from far and near accordingly. They came in such numbers that early in the fifth year of his reign Charles found it essential to specify certain times for their reception at court; the proclamation that he issued on the subject is found in the Historical Collections of John Rushworth, sometime secretary to Oliver Cromwell.

In the proclamation the king spoke at length of the many cures wrought by his "royal predecessors." This may allude purely to the Plantagenets or Tudors, but it is equally possible that these references indicate touching for scrofula on the part of the early Stuarts.

John Evelyn, in his Diary, writes repeatedly of Charles II's activities in this relation, while Samuel Pepys refers to the same thing, and in one passage states that the sight failed to interest him in the least, for he had seen it often before. The practice of healing by the royal touch did not end with the ousting of the Stuarts in 1689. The lexicographer Dr. Samuel Johnson was taken by his father when a boy to London from Litchfield to be touched "for the evil" by Queen Anne, in 1712. The Chevalier de St. George attempted healing by touch on several occasions, and his son Prince Charles, when in Scotland in 1745, made at least one attempt.

At a late period, coins that had been touched by the king were believed to ward off evil or scrofula. These were known as "royal touch-pieces" and specimens of several are preserved in the British Museum, London.

Healing by Touch in Ancient Times

The natural process of healing was thought by early peoples to be effected by a mysterious power possessed only by God and his servants—emperors, kings, priests, and saints. The common man believed he must have faith in order to be healed, and great ceremony often accompanied healing "miracles." Healers used the laying on of hands and special words and prayers, as well as objects like talismans, amulets, rings, and images of saints.

The healing of the sick by touch and the laying on of hands was found among the people of India and Egypt, and especially among the Jews. Egyptian sculptures depict healers placing one hand on the patient's stomach and the other on his back. The Chinese, according to the accounts of early missionaries such as Athanasius Kircher, in China . . . Illustrata (1667), healed sickness by the laying on of hands. In the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament) are numerous examples of healing by touch.

One instance is the healing of a seemingly dead child by Elisha, who stretched himself three times upon the child and prayed. The manner in which Elisha raised the dead son of a Shunamite woman was even more remarkable. He told Gehazi to go before him and lay his staff upon the face of the child. When that failed, Elisha laid himself upon the child, placing his hands upon the child's hands so that the child's body became warm again and he opened his eyes.

Elisha's healing powers survived his death:

"And Elisha died, and they buried him, and the bands of the Moabites invaded the land in the coming of the year. And it came to pass, as they were burying a man that, behold, they spied a band of men; and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha, and when the man was let down, and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived and stood upon his feet" (2 Kings 13:20, 21).

Naaman the leper, when he stood before Elisha's house with his horses and chariots, having been told to wash seven times in the Jordan said, "Behold I thought, he will surely come out to me, and stand, and call upon the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper" (2 Kings 5:11).

The Christian New Testament is particularly rich in examples of the efficacy of the laying on of hands, healing by this method being a major theme in the early Christian church. "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery" (1 Tim. 4:14) was the principal maxim of the apostles, for the practical use of their powers for the good of their brethren in Christ.

St. Paul was remarkable for his powers: "And it came to pass that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux; to whom Paul entered in, and prayed and laid his hands on him and healed him" (Acts 28:8). And again:

"And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house, and putting his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me that thou mayest receive thy sight and be filled with the Holy Ghost. And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales, and he received sight" (Acts 9:17–8).

Among the many stories of Jesus' healings are several from the Gospel of Mark:

"And they brought young children to him, that he might touch them, and his disciples rebuked those who brought them. But Jesus said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' And he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them'' (Mark 10:13–14,16).

Also:

''. . . they brought unto him one that was deaf and had an impediment in his speech, and they besought him to put his hand upon him. And he took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spit and touched his tongue and, looking up to heaven, he sighed, and said unto him, 'Ephphatha'—that is, Be opened. And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain'' (Mark 7:32–35).

Other passages on healing are scattered throughout the four gospels. In the histories of the saints, innumerable examples are recorded. They took their lead from Jesus' words: ''In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay their hands on the sick and they shall recover'' (Mark 16:17–18).

The saints are said to have accomplished everything through absolute faith in Christ, and were therefore able to perform miracles. St. Patrick, the Irish apostle, healed the blind by laying on his hands. St. Bernard is said to have restored 11 blind persons to sight and 18 lame persons to the use of their limbs in one day at Constance. At Cologne he healed 12 lame individuals, caused 3 dumb persons to speak, and made 10 who were deaf to hear; when he himself was ill, St. Lawrence and St. Benedict appeared to him and cured him by touching the affected part. Even his plates and dishes were said to have cured sickness after his death.

The miracles of Saints Margaret, Katherine, Elizabeth, and Hildegarde, and especially the miraculous cures of the two holy martyrs Cosmas and Damianus, belong to this class. They were said to have freed the emperor Justinian from an incurable sickness. St. Odilia embraced a leper who was shunned by all, warmed him, and restored him to health.

Remarkable above all others are those cases where persons who were at the point of death have recovered by holy baptism or extreme religious fervor. The emperor Constantine is one of the best examples. Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, was reputed to have the power of assuaging colic and afflictions of the spleen by laying the patients on their backs and passing his big toe over them (Plutarch, Vita Pyrrhi). The emperor Vespasian cured nervous conditions, lameness, and blindness solely by the laying on of his hands (Suelin, Vita Vespas). According to Coelius Spartianus, Hadrian cured those afflicted with dropsy by touching them with the points of his fingers, and recovered himself from a violent fever by similar treatment. King Olaf healed Egill on the spot by merely laying his hands upon him and singing proverbs, according to the Edda.

The kings of England and France cured diseases of the throat by touch. It is said that the pious Edward the Confessor of England and Philip I of France were the first who possessed this power. The French formula used on such occasions was ''the King touches you, go and be healed,'' and the phrase was spoken with the act of touching. In France this power was retained until the time of the Revolution, and it is said that at the coronation the exact manner of touching and the formula ''the King touches you, God heals you'' were imparted to the new monarch.

Among German princes this curative power was ascribed to the counts of Hapsburg, and it was also believed that they were able to cure stammering by a kiss. According to Pliny, ''There are men whose whole bodies possess medicinal properties, as the Marsi, the Psyli, and others, who cure the bite of serpents merely by the touch.'' He claimed this was especially true of the island of Cyprus, and later travelers confirmed these cures. In later times the Salmadores and Ensalmadores of Spain became famous for healing almost all diseases by prayer, laying on of hands, and by breathing upon the sick.

In Ireland, Valentine Greatrakes cured king's evil and other diseases by touch. One Richter, a nineteenth-century innkeeper at Royen, in Silicia, cured many thousands of sick persons in the open fields by touching them with his hands. Under the popes, laying on of hands was called chirothesy. Franz Anton Mesmer and his assistants also employed touch for healing purposes.

Sources:

Greatrakes, Valentine. A Brief Account of Mr. Valentine Greatrake's, and Divers of the Strange Cures by Him Lately Performed. London, 1666.

Hocart, A. M. Kingship. London: Humphrey Milford, 1927.

Rose, Louis. Faith Healing. London: Victor Gollancz, 1968.

Thompson, C. J. S. Magic and Healing. London: Rider, 1947. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1973.

Healing Center for the Whole Person

The project during the 1970s of a religious corporation that met at the International Cooperation Council (now the Unity-in-Diversity Council) world headquarters, Northridge, California. The Healing Center for the Whole Person was directed by various types of professional people who specialized in healing and sought to transcend traditional disciplines, incorporating all valid methods of healing the whole person ''in the spirit of the emerging new age.'' The center grew out of the conference ''Healing the Whole Person,'' held in Los Angeles in May 1974. The center functioned for several years and then dissolved.

Healing Our World (Organization)

Organization devoted to linking groups and individuals all over the world in contemplation and cultural celebration in order to liberate love and healing energies. Healing Our World (HOW) created ''high games,'' celebrations, and other positive experiences that allow individuals to remember ''the source,'' love unconditionally, and connect with others.

Activities included ''global healing events'' (celebrating the connectedness of all life); ''resonating cores'' (effective technologies for bonding in small groups); a ''love corps'' (providing opportunities for meaningful service to others); local celebrations and events (celebrating the family and supporting one another); and communication vehicles (a newsletter, computer network, and speakers bureau).

Leaders of the organization affirmed, ''We know that each of us has a deep mission to experience wholeness and to heal our world. We can best do this by accessing the Source within, opening ourselves to unconditional love, and linking up with other members of our Global Family, wherever they may be.''

Last known address: 540 University Ave., Ste. 225, Palo Alto, CA 94301.

Heard, Gerald (1889–1971)

Gerald Heard, a mystic, counterculture theoretician, and pioneer in consciousness studies, was born Henry Fitzgerald Heard in London. As a youth he decided to become a priest in the Church of England and to that end entered Cambridge University. However, during his college years he discovered that he was no longer a Christian. He dropped out and moved to Ireland to work with the Irish Agricultural Cooperative community. While there he came into contact with the Irish theosophists A. E. Russell and magician/poet William Butler Yeats. When he returned to London several years later he became active in the Society for Psychical Research and acquainted with Julius and Aldous Huxley. Through Aldous Huxley, he met Swami Prabhavananda, a swami of the Vedanta Society, and became his disciple. In 1937 he moved to New York and then on to California where the Swami lived.

In Los Angeles, Heard opened Trabuco College, an experimental school built around a curriculum in comparative religion and emphasizing spiritual practice. The experiment failed. Through the 1950s he explored a variety of subjects on the cultural fringe. He wrote one of the first books on the new phenomenon of flying saucers and explored his own homosexuality as a member of the Mattachine Society. He speculated on what he considered the unique spiritual and cultural reality of gayness and developed the concept of the "isophyl," an individual who was biologically, psychologically, and spiritually distinct from the majority, and explored the unique social life that would be suitable for them, eventually suggesting some form of communal life. While initially developing the concept to explain his own gay orientation, he later expanded it to include others.

In the 1950s, along with his friend Aldous Huxley, Heard also became one of the first to explore the spiritual potentials of LSD and for many years served as a spiritual guide to people who began experimenting with it. He introduced LSD to psychiatrist Oscar Janiger, who pioneered LSD research in the United States and introduced the drug into the Hollywood community. Heard was instrumental in introducing LSD to a number of intellectuals including philosopher William Ernest Hocking and Jesuit scholar John Courtney Murray. He believed that the LSD experience heralded a new revolution in consciousness that was coming to save the West from its dead mechanistic culture.

Heard came to believe that consciousness interacted with reality to create our map of reality. LSD was a means of making us conscious of that process and then reconstructing the map (or maps) we used to put together our worldview, an idea later championed by Timothy Leary. Heard also came to identify the Greek god Pan as the symbol of the new world of consciousness into which humanity was entering.

Heard left behind a vast literature exploring his many interests. Many who have encountered his work on a single subject are quite unaware of the vast spectrum of his contributions.

Sources:

Heard, Gerald. Is Another World Watching: The Riddle of the Flying Saucers. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1951.

———. Mysticism for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1965.

———. The Recollection. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University/J. L. Riddle, 1944.

———. Third Morality. London: Cassell & Co., 1937.

———. Training for a Life of Growth. San Jacinto, Calif.: Wayfarer Press, 1959.

Heart

Belief in the heart as a psychic structure dates to ancient times and stems from the characteristic responses of that organ to emotional crises. Some mystical writers have posited the idea of a subtle or spiritual heart center located slightly to the right of the physical heart.

In the Bible (Eccles. 10:2) it is said that the heart of the wise is at the right side and the heart of the foolish at the left. This proverb parallels the ancient Hindu yoga concept of the anahata chakra, or subtle heart center, which yogis have experienced as slightly to the right side in the body.

Heat and Light (Journal)

American Spiritualist journal published in Boston in the 1850s.

The Heavenly Man

A concept of the Jewish mysticism of the Kabala. According to the Zohar, the "heavenly man" was the first of the sephiroth or divine emanations. Before the creation, God was without form, above and beyond all attributes. But after he created the heavenly man, he used him as a chariot in which to descend. And desiring to make himself known by his attributes, "He let Himself be styled as the God of pardon, the God of Justice, the God Omnipotent, the God of Hosts and He Who Is (Jahveh)."

The heavenly man is to be distinguished from the "earthly man." The creation of the earthly man was, indeed, the work of the heavenly man—that is, of the first emanation from God.

Sources:

Halevi, Z'ev ben Shimon. AAM and the Kabbalistic Tree. London: Rider, 1974.

Heaven's Gate

Heaven's Gate is the popular name given to a small UFO contactee group that gained international notoriety in March of 1997 when 39 of its members committed suicide in an effort to ascend to a higher level of consciousness. The group had been in the news in the 1970s when the founders, Marshall Herff Applewhite (1931–1997) and Bonnie Lu Truesdale Nettles (1924–1985), had made a widely reported tour across the United States in their initial recruitment drive to gather people in the expectation that they would soon be taken from Earth in a flying saucer. However, they had dropped out of sight for several years and their continued existence through the mid-1990s remained known to a relative few.

Heaven's Gate appears to have been born on the minds of Applewhite and Nettles in the years following their meeting in March of 1972. They operated a metaphysical center called the Know Place in Houston, Texas, for a while during which time Nettles, who was quite knowledgeable of occult lore, introduced Applewhite to theosophy. They closed the center at the end of the year and left Houston for the West Coast in January of 1973. As they began to speculate on their role in life, they concluded that they were the Two Witnesses mentioned in the biblical Book of Revelation, chapter 11, who would appear at the endtime and be murdered and then resurrected. This self-understanding would be the source of the names by which they would be popularly known, "The Two" and "Bo and Peep." They believed that the Earth was about to undergo a renovation and that their job would be to locate a select few who would be taken off the Earth to The Level Above the Human (T.E.L.A.H.) in a flying saucer.

In 1975 and 1976, the group recruited more than one hundred people, mostly young adults, but ceased to recruit more as of April 21, 1976. During this period Applewhite and Nettles were the subject of intense media coverage and one book. They then turned inward and began to train the members of the group in the disciplines that would prepare them to transcend their earthly situation. They were quite mobile for several years but then settled in Texas where they remained through the 1980s. The group's number slowly dwindled, and Nettles died of cancer in 1985.

At the beginning of the 1990s, the group began new efforts at recruitment by producing a video that was shown on community access television. Then in 1993 it ran an ad in USA Today with a "Final Offer." In 1994, Applewhite introduced the idea that transcending the earthly situation might come by way of suicide. The group was on the move again, this time making its way westward. Members finally settled in Rancho Santa Fe, a suburb of San Diego, California. By now their numbers had dwindled to fewer than 50 people.

During the time in Rancho Santa Fe, the group searched for a new home, in a land that would be more hospitable to their monastic lifestyle. They had developed an ordered life that resembled that of a monastic group with its disciplines of poverty, celibacy, and obedience. Some of the men had been castrated as a means of quelling their sexual urges.

The beginning of the end came early in 1997 when a new comet was spotted and rumors were circulated that something was following it as it approached. The group began to think that the spaceship, piloted by Nettles, was on the way. As the Hale-Bopp Comet reached the point in its orbit closest to Earth, which happened to coincide with the spring equinox, the 39 remaining members of the group, including Applewhite, committed suicide. Their bodies were found on March 26, 1997. The group was dressed in black shirts and pants and Nike sneakers. Each member was lying in a bunk bed with a purple cloth over him/her. They had died over a three-day period.

Fifteen died the first day, 15 the second, and the last nine on the third. Of these, eight had been relatively new recruits who had joined in the early 1990s. A month later one additional member, Wayne Cooke, committed suicide. Another member, Chuck Humphrey, spent a year trying to make sure that accurate information about the group was made available and archived, and then in February of 1998, he joined his colleagues in death. He set up a website that is still available (as of June 2000) in several mirror sites on the Internet. It contains the major book published by the group, How and When "Heaven's Gate" May Be Entered.

Of several groups that have experienced multiple violent deaths among its members, Heaven's Gate is unique in that all who died appeared to have been consenting adults who had thought out their act of suicide. Since its end, the group has become an important topic of study for those interested in new religions and violence.

Sources:

Heaven's Gate. http://www5.zdnet.com/yil/higher/heavensgate/index.html. June 14, 2000.

Hewes, Hayden, and Brad Steiger. UFO Missionaries Extraordinary. New York: Pocket Books, 1976. Rev. ed. as: Inside Heaven's Gate; The UFO Cult Leaders Tell Their Story in Their Own Words. New York Signet, 1997.

Wessinger, Catherine. How the Millennium Comes Violently. New York: Seven Bridges Press, 2000.

Hecate

A Greek goddess, daughter of Zeus and Demeter, but of uncertain origin. She appears to have been one of the original Titans, who ruled the heavens, earth, and sea and could bestow gifts on mortals as they pleased. Later she was confused with other goddesses until she became known as a mystic goddess having all the magic powers of nature at her command. Magicians and witches sought her aid, and sacrifices of dogs, honey, and female black lambs were offered to her where three ways met, at crossroads, or in graveyards. Festivals were held in her honor annually at Egina.

In appearance she was frightful, and serpents hung hissing around her shoulders. As a dark goddess of ghosts and moonlight, her propitiation was an early form of black magic and witchcraft. In Shakespeare's play Macbeth, Hecate is the leader of three witches who plot Macbeth's downfall.

Sources:

Valiente, Doreen. An ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1973.

Hefferlin, Gladys

Along with her husband, promoter of a story of a mysterious underground world culminating in an Antarctic kingdom called Rainbow City, supposed to have been constructed two and a half million years ago of plastic. It is warmed by hot springs and has eluded discovery by polar explorers because it is surrounded by ice walls 10,000 feet high, according to the story.

As distinct from the evil deros of the Shaver mystery, Rainbow City and its subterranean world are said to be ruled by "the Ancient Three," originally from the planet Mars, who take a benevolent interest in world politics and use their occult influence on behalf of humanity.

Sources:

Barton, Michael X. Rainbow City and The Inner Earth Story. Los Angeles: Futura Press, 1960. Reprint, Clarksburg, W. Va.: Saucerian Press, 1969.

The Hefley Report

Former psychic newspaper edited by Carl D. Hefley. It reported on and discussed a wide range of paranormal topics for popular readership. It was published in the 1970s by U.S. Research, Inc., in Burbank, California. (See also Hefley's Secret Journal)

Hefley's Secret Journal

Publication edited by Carl D. Hefley. It supplemented his now-defunct newspaper The Hefley Report with in-depth stories and research on paranormal topics.

Heim, Roger (1900–)

French botanist who specialized in cryptogamy and contributed to knowledge of the hallucinogenic properties of mushrooms. He was born on February 12, 1900, in Paris. He studied at the University of Paris (D.Sc., 1931) and Uppsala University, Sweden (Hon. Ph.D.). Heim was appointed director of the French National Museum of Natural History, and also served as director of the laboratory for the study of mycology and tropical phytopathology at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes. His interest in parapsychology was stimulated by his studies of psychedelic drugs, especially those to be found in mushrooms. He wrote scholarly articles on the sacred mushroom rites of Mexican Indians.

Sources:

Heim, Roger, and R. B. Wasson. Les champignons hallucinogens du Mexique. Paris: Editions du Museum National d'Histoire Naturelle, 1958.

———. Les champignons toxiques et hallucinogens. Paris: Boubee, 1978.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Heindel, Max (1865–1919)

Public name of Carl Louis van Grasshoff. He was born in Germany to an aristocratic family. He became a maritime engineer and immigrated to the United States in 1895. Settling in Los Angeles in 1903, he joined the Theosophical Society and became vice president of the Los Angeles lodge in 1904. Through Theosophy he learned of astrology, a continuing interest throughout the rest of his life.

While visiting Europe in 1907, Heindel claimed that he encountered a mysterious Rosicrucian who took him to a Rose Cross temple on the border of Germany and Bohemia. There he was initiated into the order. He soon publicized the secret wisdom in his book The Rosicrucian Cosmo-Conception (1909).

However, his basic concepts were drawn from Theosophy in general and from Rudolf Steiner in particular. Steiner might have been his real "Rosicrucian" mentor. After publication of his book, Heindel founded various centers and created a headquarters and temple of what became known as the Rosicrucian Fellowship at Mount Ecclesia, Oceanside, California. Integral to his Rosicrucian work was astrology, and through his books Heindel became one of the early popularizers of the wisdom of the stars in the United States. He died in 1919. His two main books, The Message of the Stars (1919) and Simplified Scientific Astrology (1928), were published posthumously and remain in print. His wife, Augusta Foss Heindel, was also an editor and writer on Rosicrucian subjects and succeeded her husband as head of the organization. She died in 1938.

The Mount Ecclesia temple was the subject of a 50-year lawsuit by various factions, resolved only by the deaths of the principals.

Sources:

Heindel, Augusta Foss. The Birth of the Rosicrucian Fellowship. Oceanside, Calif.: Rosicrucian Fellowship, n.d.

Heindel, Max. The Rosicrucian Cosmo-Conception. Oceanside, Calif.: Rosicrucian Fellowship, 1909.

———. The Rosicrucian Mysteries. Oceanside, Calif.: Rosicrucian Fellowship, 1911.

———. The Rosicrucian Philosophy, Questions and Answers. Oceanside, Calif.: Rosicrucian Fellowship, 1922.

———. Simplified Scientific Astrology. Oceanside, Calif.: Rosicrucian Fellowship, 1928.

Hekalot

According to the Jewish mysticism of the Kabala, the Zohar, the seven halls of the world of Yetsirah, the divine halls into which the seekers for the chariot (“merkabah”) strive to enter. Here dwell the angels, presided over by the angel Metatron, as well as the souls of men not especially noted for their piety. (The souls of the pious dwell in the world of Beriah.)

Hel (or Hela)

In Teutonic mythology, the goddess of death, one of the offspring of Loki and the giantess Angurbodi. The gods became alarmed at her and the other monsters that were coming to life in Jotunheim, so All-father advised that they be brought before him. Hel was cast into Niflheim, the realm beneath the roots of the world tree Yggdrasil, reserved for all those who die of sickness or old age. According to the myth, Hel governs this world, which is composed of nine regions into which she distributes those who come to her and in which she inhabits a strongly protected abode.

Niflheim is said to be “a dark abode far from the sun,” its gates open to the “cutting north;” its walls “are formed of wreathed snakes and their venom is ever falling like rain,” and it is surrounded by dark and poisonous streams. “Nidhog, the great dragon, who dwells beneath the central root of Yggdrasil, torments and gnaws the dead.”

It is said that one-half of Hel’s body is livid and the other half flesh-colored. Hunger is her table, starvation her knife, delay her man, slowness her maid, precipice her threshold, care her bed, and burning anguish forms the hangings of her apartments.

Heliocentric Astrologers of North America

Practitioners of astrology in the twentieth century face a common problem. Astrology is predicated on Earth as the center of the solar system, when in fact the planets, including Earth, revolve around the sun. Most astrologers have made some adjustment for this fact, but a small number have been working on a new astrological system based on the sun’s central position in the solar system. Some of these astrologers, largely from Detroit and Windsor, Ontario, came together in 1982 and founded the Heliocentric Astrologers of North America.

The organization believed in promoting heliocentric astrology and reestablishing lines of communication between astrologers and members of the scientific community, especially astrophysicists and astronomers. It also published a newsletter. Last known address: 4115 Echo Dr., West Bloomfield, MI 48033.

Heliotrope

A plant that follows the sun with its flowers and leaves and is popularly known as “turnsole.” Heliotrope was believed to render its possessor invisible if the body was rubbed all over with the juice of this herb, which was also reputed to stop bleeding and avert danger from poison.

Hell

This word is believed to be from the Teutonic root helan (to cover), designating a subterranean or hidden place. It is sometimes used in the form of Hel to mean simply a place of the dead, with no mention of punishment. “Hel” or “Hela” is also the name of the mythical Teutonic goddess who was guardian of the dead.

This concept has a somewhat clear train of evolution. The Christian idea of a place of punishment was directly colored by the Jewish concept of “Sheol,” which in turn took shape from Babylonian sources. When exactly hell began to be perceived as a place of punishment is not clear, as among the ancient Semites, Egyptians, and Greeks the underworld was regarded only as a place of the dead.

In Egypt “Amenti” is distinctly a place of the dead, one in which the tasks of life are for the most part duplicated. This was also the case among primitive people, who merely regarded the land of the dead as an extension of human existence in which people led a more or less shadowy life. The primitives did not generally believe in punishment after death and conceived that any breach of moral rule was summarily dealt with in this life. It was usually when a higher moral code emerged from totemic or similar beliefs that the idea of a place of punishment was invented by a priesthood.

However, this was not always the case. In Greece, Rome, and Scandinavia, Hades was merely looked upon as a place of the dead, where shadowy ghosts flitted to and fro, gibbering and squeaking as phantoms were believed to do. According to the Greeks, Hades was only some twelve feet under the surface of the ground, so Orpheus would not have had a long journey from the subterranean sphere to reach Earth once more. Hell was generally regarded as a sovereignty, a place ruled in an ordinary manner by a monarch set there for that purpose by the celestial powers.

Thus the Greek Hades ruled the Sad Sphere of the Dead, Osiris was lord and governor of the Egyptian Amenti, while in Central America there were twin rulers in the Kiche Hades, Xibalba, whose names were given as Hun-came and Vukub-came. The latter were malignant, unlike the Mictlán of Mexico, whose empire was for the generality of the people. These could only exist for four years, after which they became extinct.

The Mexicans represented Mictlán as a huge monster with open mouth ready to devour his victims; this was paralleled in the Babylonian Tiawith. It seems that at a certain stage in all mythologies the concept of a place of the dead was confounded with the idea of a place of punishment.

The Greeks generally bewailed the tragedy of humanity, being condemned to dwell forever in semidarkness after death. The possibility of the existence of a place of reward seems never to have appealed to them. To the Greek mind, life was everything; it was left to the Semitic conscience to evolve in the near East the concept of a place of punishment. Thus Sheol, a place of the dead, became a fiery abyss into which the wicked and unjust were thrust for their sins.

This was foreshadowed by Babylonian and Egyptian ideas, for Egyptians believed that those unable to pass a test of justification were simply refused admittance to Amenti. From the idea of rejection sprang the idea of active punishment. The Semitic concept of hell was probably reinforced with the introduction of Christianity into Europe, and colored by concepts of the underworld belonging to European mythologies.

"Hela" (Death) in Teutonic mythology was cast into the underground realm of Niflheim and given power over nine regions into which she distributed all who died through sickness or old age.

The ideas concerning the Celtic otherworld probably played only a small part in forming the British concept of hell. The Brythonic "Annwyl" was certainly subterranean, but it was by no means a place of punishment; rather, it was merely a microcosm of the world above, where folk hunted, ate, and drank, as in early Britain. The Irish otherworld was much the same.

In southern Europe the idea of hell appears to have been strongly influenced by both classical and Jewish concepts. The best picture of the medieval idea of the place of punishment is undoubtedly found in Dante's Inferno. Basing his description on the teachings of contemporary schoolmen, Dante also acknowledged Virgil as his master and followed him in many descriptions of Tartarus. The Semitic idea crops up here and there, however, such as in the beginning of one of the cantos, where what looks suspiciously like a Hebrew incantation is recorded.

In later medieval times the ingenuity of the monkish mind introduced many apparently original concepts. For instance, hell obtained an annex: purgatory. Its inhabitants took on a form that may be alluded to as European, in contrast to the more satyrlike shape of the earlier hierarchy of Hades. It featured grizzly forms of birdlike shape, with exaggerated beaks and claws, and the animal forms and faces of later medieval gargoyles could well be what the denizens of Hades seemed like in the eyes of the superstitious of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

A modified version of these ideas was passed to later generations, and one may suspect that such superstitions were not altogether disbelieved by our forefathers.

Most Eastern mythological systems possess a hell that does not differ in any fundamental respect from that of most barbarian races, except that it is perhaps more specialized and involved. Many later writers, such as Emanuel Swedenborg, Jakob Boehme, William Blake, and others (including John Milton), have given us vivid pictures of the hierarchy and general condition of hell. For the most part these are based on patristic writings. In the Middle Ages endless controversy took place as to the nature and offices of the various inhabitants of the place of punishment (see Demonology), and the descriptions of later visionaries are practically mere repetitions of the conclusions arrived at then.

The locality of hell has also been a question of endless speculation. Some believed it to be in the sun, because the Greek name for the luminary is "Helios," but such etymologies have been in disfavor with most writers on the subject, and the popular idea that hell is subterranean has had no real rival.

Sources:

Bernstein, Alan E. The Formation of Hell: Death and Retribution in the Ancient and Early Christian Worlds. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1993.

Fox, Samuel J. Hell in Jewish Literature. Wheeling, Ill.: Whitehall, 1969.

Kohler, Kaufmann. Heaven and Hell in Comparative Literature. Folcroft, Pa., 1923.

Kvanvig, Jonathan L. The Problem of Hell. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Lehner, Ernest, and J. Lehner. Picture Book of Devils, Demons, and Witchcraft. New York: Dover Publications, 1972.

MacCullough, John A. The Harrowing of Hell: A Comparative Study of an Early Christian Doctrine. London: T. & T. Clark, 1930. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1981.

Mew, James. Traditional Aspects of Hell. London: Swan, Sonnenschein, 1903. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1971.

Swedenborg, Emanuel. Heaven and Hell. 1758. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1931.

Walker, Daniel P. Decline of Hell: Seventeenth Century Discussions of Eternal Torment. London: Routledge, 1964.

Hellawes

A medieval sorceress, lady of the castle Nigramous. She attempted to win the love of Lancelot, but being unable to do so, she perished. Her story is told in Sir Thomas Mallory's Morte d'Arthur, first published in 1485.

Hellenbach, Baron Lazar De Baczolay (1827–1887)

Hungarian philosopher whose numerous important works, including Birth and Death and The Philosophy of Sound Common Sense closely concern psychical research. In Birth and Death, which was translated into English in 1886, Hellenbach proposes the original idea that no change of world occurs at the moment of birth and death, except in the method of perception. In The Philosophy of Sound Common Sense, published in 1876, he tells the story of his psychical investigations.

Hellenbach's first convincing mediumistic experience was in 1857 at a Countess D.'s castle in Croatia. For six years thereafter, he engaged the services of two women as mediums. Through one of them he supposedly communicated with the philosopher Schopenhauer.

In 1870 he made the acquaintance of Baroness Adelma Vay, whose powers as a seeress opened up new fields of research for him.

In 1875 Hellenbach witnessed impressive physical manifestations with Lottie Fowler. Following these he invited many well-known mediums to Vienna. Henry Slade visited in 1878, and the results of the sittings were published in a pamphlet, Mr. Slade's Residence in Vienna: An Open Letter to My Friend. In February 1880 Karl Hansen, the famous hypnotist, went to Vienna. In response to the controversy that arose in the press, Baron Hellenbach contributed another pamphlet, Is Hansen a Swindler? A Study of Animal Magnetism. In the same year he stood up with similar vigor for the medium William Eglinton, who had been charged with fraud.

The medium Harry Bastian paid Hellenbach two visits, of which he gives an account in a leaflet entitled The Latest Communications from the "Intelligible" World. In 1884 Bastian went to Vienna for the third time. The sitters were Crown Prince Rudolph and Archduke John. The archduke seized the "materialized spirit," and it was found to be the medium. The archduke himself published a pamphlet about this exposure, A Glimpse into Spiritism. Hellenbach countered with another, The Logic of Facts, in which he attempted a defense of the medium.

In 1885, after a second visit from Eglinton, Hellenbach gave up his residence in Vienna and returned to his second home in Croatia, where he began another book. However, he only completed a series of essays, published in the periodical The Sphynx under the title "Ether as a Solution of the Mystic Problem."

Hell-Fire Club

An eighteenth-century British Satanist society of rich men, politicians, and eccentrics based at Medmenham Abbey in Buckinghamshire and later in caves at High Wycombe. The founder was the notorious profligate Sir Francis Dashwood (1708–1781), a member of parliament who was appointed chancellor of the exchequer in 1762. His ignorance and incapacity for the latter post resulted in his resignation a few months later.

As a young man Dashwood plunged into a life of pleasure and dissipation. When only 17, he became a member of one of the earlier Hell-Fire clubs, which conducted secret orgies in a cellar. There were rumors that during Dashwood's subsequent European travels he was initiated into a diabolic cult in Venice and brought back to England various magical grimoires and manuals.

About 1745, Dashwood founded the brotherhood known as the Knights of St. Francis of Wycombe or the Franciscans of Medmenham, more popularly known as the Hell-Fire Club. In 1750 Dashwood rented the old Cistercian abbey of Medmenham on the river Thames, near Marlow, originally founded in 1201. He made costly renovations to the premises, which he furnished with an altar in the chapel, candlesticks, and pornographic pictures. The entrance to the abbey bore the inscription Fay ce que voudras (Do what thou wilt), derived from the Abbey of Thelema in Rabelais's Gargantua. The same motto was adopted by Aleister Crowley for his own Abbey of Thelema nearly two centuries later.

Although it has been claimed that Dashwood's "Franciscans" (derived from his own forename) were largely rakes of the period seeking drunken sex orgies, there was an inner circle or "superior order" of 12 members who held obscene parodies of Catholic ritual in the chapel as an elementary form of Satanism. As grand master, Dashwood used a communion cup to pour libations to pagan gods, and even administered the sacrament to a baboon in a contemptuous mockery of sacred ritual. Members of this superior order included Lord Sandwich, the libertine Paul Whitehead, the debauchee George Selwyn, and Thomas Potter (son of the archbishop of Canterbury). A fictionalized account of the Franciscans was published in Charles Johnston's novel Chrysal (1760).

The brotherhood flourished at Medmenham for 12 years, until it was exposed by John Wilkes, who had joined in 1762 but was later expelled, probably through political quarrels. At one of the Satanic rituals, Wilkes secretly brought an ape with horns tied on its head, dressed in a long black cloak. The creature was released at the height of the ceremony and sprang upon the Satanists, who screamed with fear at the devil they thought they had raised by their mockery. Wilkes and the politician Charles Churchill exposed the brotherhood in an issue of the North Briton newspaper, and a satirical print appeared entitled "The Saint of the Convent."

In the face of public exposure, the Medmenham chapel was hastily stripped and its contents taken away to West Wycombe, where Dashwood attempted to revive his ceremonies. He built a church on Wycombe Hill, where he and his companions drank heavily and blasphemed the Psalms. In the caves underneath the hill, they attempted to revive the orgies and rituals of Medmenham, but some of Dashwood's friends had died and others tired of their activities.

After resigning from the post of chancellor of the exchequer, Dashwood retired from the ministry, and in 1763 became the fifteenth Baron Le Despencer, premier baron of England. In 1763 he became lord-lieutenant of Buckinghamshire. He died at West Wycombe after a prolonged illness on December 11, 1781, and was buried in the mausoleum he had built there.

Other Hell-Fire clubs existed in eighteenth-century England at Oxford and Cambridge, as well as in Scotland (Edinburgh) and Ireland (Dublin). The contemporary influences that brought about such societies were an increasing religious skepticism, the growth of free thought, romantic Gothic literature with mad monks and devils, and male chauvinism in an atmosphere of class privilege and debauchery.

Sources:

Mannix, Daniel P. The Hell Fire Club. New York: Ballantine Books, 1959.

McCormick, Donald. The Hell-Fire Club. London: Jarrolds Publishers, 1958. Reprint, London: Sphere Books, 1975.

Towers, Eric. Dashwood: The Man and the Myth. U.K.: Crucible, 1986.

Hellström, Eva Backström (1898– ?)

Founder of Sällskapet för Parapsykologisk Forskning, the Swedish psychical research organization, in 1947. Hellström also served as secretary of the society. She was born on September 26, 1898, at Stockholm. She was educated at Djursholm College, Sweden.

Hellström became a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and a charter member of the Parapsychological Association. Her interests included mediumship, psychokinesis, and psychometry, and she studied the work of various Swedish, Dutch, and Danish mediums. She was herself a clairvoyant and manifested faculties of precognition.

Sources:

Hellström, Eva Backström. "Collection of Spontaneous Cases." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43.

———. "Precognition of Girls Dancing." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 41; 44.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Helvetius, John Friedrich (1625–1709)

A physician of the Hague, Holland, who in 1667 published a work concerning a strange adventure in which he claims to have taken part in a veritable act of metallic transmutation by alchemy. The book was translated into English and published in London in 1670 under the title The Golden Cult Which the World Adores and Desires: In Which is Handled the Most Rare and Incomparable Wonder of Nature, in Transmuting Metals. It is one of the few exact descriptions of such an experiment.

"On the 27th December, 1666, in the afternoon, a stranger, in a plain, rustic dress, came to my house at the Hague. His manner of address was honest, grave authoritative; his stature was low, with a long face and hair black, his chin smooth. He seemed like a native of the north of Scotland, and I guessed he was about 44 years old. After saluting me he requested me most respectfully to pardon his rude intrusion, but that his love of the pyrotechnic art made him visit me. Having read some of my small treatises, particularly that against the sympathetic powder of Sir Kenelm Digby (see Powder of Sympathy) and observed therein my doubt of the Hermetic mystery, it caused him to request this interview. He asked me if I still thought there was no medicine in Nature which could cure all diseases, unless the principal parts, as the lungs, liver, etc. were perished, or the time of death were come. To which I replied I never met with an adept, or saw such a medicine, though I read of much of it and often wished for it. Then I asked if he was a physician. He said he was a founder of brass, yet from his youth learned many rare things in chemistry, particularly of a friend—the manner to extract out of metals many medicinal arcana by the use of fire.

"After discoursing of experiments in metals, he asked me, would I know the philosophers' stone if I saw it? I answered, I would not, though I read much of it in Paracelsus, Helmont, Basil, and others, yet I dare not say I could know the philosophers' matter. In the interim he drew from his breast pocket a neat ivory box, and out of it took three ponderous lumps of the stone, each about the size of a small walnut. They were transparent and of a pale brimstone color, whereto some scales of the crucible adhered when this most noble substance was melted. . . . When I had greedily examined and handled the stone almost a quarter of an hour, and heard from the owner many rare secrets of its admirable effects in human and metallic bodies, also its other wonderful properties, I returned him this treasure of treasures, truly with a most sorrowful mind, like those who conquer themselves, yet, as was just, very thankfully and humbly.

"He asked me for a little piece of gold, and, pulling off his cloak, opened his vest, under which he had five pieces of gold.

They were hanging to a green silk ribbon, and were of the size of breakfast plates. . . . I was in great admiration, and desired to know where and how he obtained them. He answered, 'A foreigner, who dwelt some days in my house, said he was a lover of this science, and came to reveal it to me. He taught me various arts—first, of ordinary stones and chrystals, to make rubies, chrysolites, sapphires, etc., much more valuable than those of the mine; and how in a quarter of an hour to make oxide of iron, one dose of which would infallibly cure the pestilential dysentery, or bloody flux; also how to make a metallic liquor to cure all kinds of dropsies, most certainly and in four days; as also a limpid, clear water, sweeter than honey, to which in two hours of itself, in hot sand, it would extract the tincture of garnets, corals, glasses, and such like.' He said more, which I Helvetius did not observe, my mind being occupied to understand how a noble juice could be drawn out of minerals to transmute metals. He told me his said master caused him to bring a glass of rain-water, and to put some silver leaf into it, which was dissolved therein within a quarter of an hour, like ice when heated. 'Presently he drank to me the half, and I pledged him the other half, which had not so much taste as sweet milk, but whereby, methought, I became very light-headed. I thereupon asked if this were a philosophical drink, and wherefore we drank this potion; but he replied, I ought not to be so curious.' By the said masters directions, a piece of a leaden pipe being melted, he took a little sulphureous powder out of his pocket, put a little of it on the point of a knife into the melted lead, and after a great blast of the bellows, in a short time he poured it on the red stones of the kitchen chimney. It proved most excellent pure gold, which the stranger said brought him into such trembling amazement that he could hardly speak; but his master encouraged him saying, 'Cut for thyself the sixteenth part of this as a memorial and give the rest away among the poor,' which the stranger did, distributing this alms, as he affirmed if my memory fail not, at the Church of Sparenda. 'At last,' said he, 'the generous foreigner taught me thoroughly this divine art.'

"As soon as his relation was finished, I asked my visitor to show me the effect of transmutation and so confirm my faith; but he declined it for that time in such a discreet manner that I was satisfied, he promising to come again in three weeks, to show me some curious arts in the fire, provided it were then lawful without prohibition. At the three weeks end he came, and invited me abroad for an hour or too. In our walk we discoursed of Nature's secrets, but he was very silent on the subject of the great elixir, gravely asserted that it was only to magnify the sweet fame and mercy of the most glorious God; that few men endeavoured to serve Him, and this he expressed as a pastor or minister of a church; but I recalled his attention, entreating him to show me the metallic mystery, desiring also that he would eat, drink, and lodge at my house, which I pressed, but he was of so fixed a determination that all my endeavours were frustrated. I could not forbear to tell him that I had a laboratory ready for an experiment, and that a promised favour was a kind of debt. 'Yes, true,' said he, 'but I promised to teach thee at my return, with this proviso, if it were not forbidden.'

"When I perceived that all this was in vain, I earnestly requested a small crumb of his powder, sufficient to transmute a few grains of lead to gold, and at last, out of his philosophical commiseration, he gave me as much as a turnip seed in size, saying, 'Receive this small parcel of the greatest treasure of the world, which truly few kings or princes have ever seen or known.' 'But,' I said, 'this perhaps will not transmute four grains of lead,' whereupon he bid me deliver it back to him, which, in hopes of a greater parcel, I did, but he, cutting half off with his nail, flung it into the fire, and gave me the rest wrapped neatly up in blue paper, saying, 'It is yet sufficient for thee.' I answered him, indeed with a most dejected countenance, 'Sir, what means this? The other being too little, you give me now less.'

"He told me to put into the crucible half an ounce of lead, for there ought to be no more lead put in than the medicine can transmute. I gave him great thanks for my diminished treasure, concentrated truly in the superlative degree, and put it charily up into my little box, saying I meant to try it the next day, nor would I reveal it to any. 'Not so, not so,' said he, 'for we ought to divulge all things to the children of art which may tend alone to the honour of God, that so they may live in the theosophical truth.' I now made a confession to him, that while the mass of his medicine was in my hands, I endeavoured to scrape away a little of it with my nail, and could not forbear; but scratched off so very little, that, it being picked from my nail, wrapped in paper, and projected on melted lead, I found no transmutation, but almost the whole mass sublimed, while the remainder was a glassy earth.

"At this unexpected account he immediately said, 'You are more dexterous to commit theft than to apply the medicine, for if you had only wrapped up the stolen prey in yellow wax, to preserve it from the fumes of the lead, it would have sunk to the bottom, and transmuted it to gold; but having cast it into the fumes, the violence of the vapour, partly by its sympathetic alliance, carried the medicine quite away.' I brought him the crucible, and he perceived a most beautiful saffron-like tincture sticking to the sides. He promised to come next morning at nine o'clock, to show me that this tincture would transmute the lead into gold. Having taken his leave, I impatiently awaited his return, but the next day he came not, nor ever since. He sent an excuse at half-past nine that morning, and promised to come at three in the afternoon, but I never heard of him since.

"I soon began to doubt the whole matter. Late that night my wife, who was a most curious student and inquirer after the art, came soliciting me to make an experiment of the little grain of the stone, to be assured of the truth. 'Unless this be done,' said she, 'I shall have no rest or sleep this night.' She being so earnest, I commanded a fire to be made, saying to myself, 'I fear, I fear indeed, this man hath deluded me.' My wife wrapped the said matter in wax, and I cut half an ounce of lead, and put it into a crucible in the fire. Being melted, my wife put in the medicine, made into a small pill with the wax, which presently made a hissing noise, and in a quarter of an hour the mass of lead was totally transmuted into the best and finest gold, which amazed us exceedingly. . . . I ran with this aurified lead, being yet hot, to the goldsmith, who wondered at the fineness, and after a short trial by the test, said it was the most excellent gold in the world.

"The next day a rumour of this prodigy went about the Hague and spread abroad, so that many illustrious and learned persons gave me their friendly visits for its sake. . . . We went to Mr. Brectel, a silversmith, who first mixed four parts of silver with one part of the gold, then he filled it, put aquafortis to it, dissolved the silver, and let the gold precipitate to the bottom; the solution being poured off and the calx of gold washed with water, then reduced and melted, it appeared excellent gold, and instead of a loss in weight, we found the gold was increased, and had transmuted a scruple of the silver into gold by its abounding tincture.

"Doubting whether the silver was now sufficiently separated from the gold, we mingled it with seven parts of antimony, which we melted and poured out into a cone, and blew off the regulus on a test, where we missed eight grains of our gold; but after we blew away the red of the antimony, or superfluous scoria, we found nine grains of gold for our eight grains missing, yet it was pale and silverlike but recovered its full colour afterwards, so that in the best proof of fire we lost nothing at all of this gold, but gained, as aforesaid. These tests I repeated four times and found it still alike, and the silver remaining out of the aquafortis was of the very best flexible silver that could be, so that in the total the said medicine or elixir had transmuted six drams and two scruples of the lead and silver into most pure gold."

Helvetius died at the Hague August 29, 1709.

Henge of Keltria

The Henge of Keltria is a Druid organization founded in 1987 by Tony and Sable Taylor, who had developed their Druid perspectives as members of ArnDraiocht Fein, the organization founded by Archdruid Isaac Bonewits. Bonewits had moved to develop a neo-Druidism that was not limited to Celtic traditions. The Taylors disagreed and their new work emphasized the Celtic ties with Druidic practice. The Taylors had first learned of Druidism from their readings, but met Bonewits in 1985.

The Henge members revere Mother Earth and seek to preserve and protect it. This reverence occurs within a context of the worship of the Celtic deities, the honoring of ancestors, and attunement with the spirits of nature. They practice Druidic arts and magick as a means of spiritual development.

Members are organized into small groups called groves. Within the larger framework of the Henge, they have a great deal of autonomy in creating their own rituals and pursuing their own magical work. Individuals progress in their work through three degrees termed rings (an analogy developed from tree rings). The three rings are named for the Birch, Yew, and Oak. Within the highest ring there are three tiers termed the Hawthorn, Rowan, and Mistletoe. Advancement is awarded based upon time spent, knowledge attained, and service rendered to the Henge (at either the local or national level). Both men and women are accepted into leadership at all levels.

The Henge of Keltria is headquartered at P.O. Box 48369, Minneapolis, MN 55448-0369, and its website is at http://www.keltria.org/. The group publishes a periodical, Henge Happenings.

Sources:

Hopman, Ellen Evert, and Lawrence Bond. People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out. Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 1996.

Henslow, George (1834–1925)

A clergyman of the Church of England and noted scholar. Henslow was a medalist of Christ College, Cambridge, vice president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science (1919), and a celebrated authority on botany, on which he wrote 16 learned works. He was also a dedicated Spiritualist. In his research he was closely associated with Archdeacon Thomas Colley and took much interest in psychic photography. He died December 20, 1925, at age 92.

Sources:

Henslow, George. The Proofs of the Truth of Spiritualism. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1919.

———. The Religion of the Spirit World. Chicago: Marlow Press, 1920.

Henslow, George, and D. J. D'Aute Hooper. Spirit Psychometry. London: W. Rider, 1914.

Hepatoscopy

A branch of haruspicy or extispicy (divination from the entrails of animals). In ancient times the liver was regarded as the focal point of life and thus of special occult significance. It was studied in detail, being divided into a number of zones, each associated with particular deities. The markings in these zones were considered to have special significance.

Herbert, Benson (1912–1991)

British psychical researcher and director of the Paraphysical Laboratory, London. He joined the Society for Psychical Research before World War II and with friends took part in séances for mental and physical phenomena at his house in Chelsea, London. It transpired that he had mediumistic talent himself, and for a time he manifested a Chinese spirit entity with healing powers.

Herbert founded the Paraphysical Laboratory in Wiltshire, with his friend Manfred Cassirer as the honorary research officer. The laboratory investigates paranormal phenomena of all kinds but has specialized in physical phenomena. In addition to conducting many original experiments, Herbert and Cassirer traveled in eastern Europe for further investigations, becoming founder members of the International Association for Psychotronic Research in Prague. Herbert also visited Russia and conducted important tests with the famous psychic Nina Kulagina.

He died April 21, 1991.

Hereburge

Frankish title for a witch. (See France)

Hermann, William J.

William J. Hermann, flying saucer contactee and channeler, emerged out of obscurity in 1978 after claiming to have had a series of sightings of a UFO over Charleston, South Carolina, beginning in November of 1977. On January 22, 1978, he was able to take nine photographs of the object. Two months later as he was out looking for more UFOs, the disc he had sighted earlier reappeared and came toward him. According to Hermann, it sent out a light beam that paralyzed him. He lost consciousness and awakened three hours later 15 miles away. He watched the UFO depart.

He called the police, who took him home. Several days later, after suffering from insomnia and general nervousness and unrest, he submitted to hypnosis under the guidance of James A. Harder, a UFO researcher associated with the Aerial Phenomena Research Organization, one of the prominent UFO research groups of the time. Under the hypnosis, he talked of being aboard the UFO. He was on an examination table being looked at by three humanoid creatures. They had large hairless heads, oversized eyes, pale skin, and red clothing.

One of the three spoke to him, but his mouth did not appear to move. He was given a brief tour of the spacecraft and then lost consciousness. He had learned that the beings were from Zeta Reticuli. They had been observing Earth for half a century. They were concerned about humanity's tendencies toward war and warned that our violent natures would destroy human civilization.

In the weeks following the hypnosis session, Hermann had other sightings and began channeling messages from the people who had abducted him. He also produced a metal bar that he claimed came from the aliens. It proved to be made of lead and antimony, similar in content to the material in an automobile battery. In May of 1979 Hermann claimed to have had a final contact with the saucer beings, who took him for a ride.

As his story was publicized, Hermann contacted Wendelle Stevens, a publisher of UFO contactee material, who coauthored a more complete account of his story, which was published in 1981. The volume circulated in the contactee subculture but was generally dismissed by ufologists as lacking any collaboration.

Sources:

Stevens, Wendelle C., and William James Hermann. UFO. . .Contact from Reticulum: A Report of the Investigation. Tucson, Ariz.: Wendelle Stevens, 1981.

Hermes Trismegistus

"The thrice greatest Hermes," the name given by the Greeks to the Egyptian god Thoth or Tehuti, the god of wisdom, learning, and literature. Thoth was alluded to in later Egyptian writings as "twice very great" and even as "five times very great" in some demotic or popular scripts (ca. third century B.C.E.).

As "scribe of the gods," Hermes was credited with the authorship of all Greek sacred books, which were thus called "hermetic." There were 42 of these, according to Clemens Alexandrinus, and they were subdivided into six portions, the first dealing with priestly education, the second with temple rituals and the third with geographical matters. The fourth division treated astrology, the fifth recorded hymns in honor of the gods and was a textbook for the guidance of kings, and the sixth was a medical text.

It is unlikely that these books were all the work of one individual; more likely they represent the accumulated wisdom of Egypt, attributed in the course of ages to the great god of wisdom.

As "scribe of the gods," Hermes was also the author of all strictly sacred writings. For convenience the name of Hermes was placed at the head of an extensive cycle of mystic literature produced in post-Christian times. Most of this hermetic or trismegistic literature has perished, but all that remains of it has been gathered and translated into English. It includes the Poimandres, (Shepherd of Men), the Perfect Sermon, or the Asclepius, excerpts by Stobacus, as well as fragments from the church fathers and from the philosophers Zosimus and Fulgentius.

These writings were neglected by theologians, who dismissed them as the offspring of third-century Neoplatonism. According to the generally accepted view, they are eclectic compilations, combining Neoplatonic philosophy, Philonic Judaism, and Kabalistic Theosophy in an attempt to supply a philosophic substitute for Christianity. The many Christian elements to be found in these mystic scriptures were ascribed to plagiarism.

Examination of early mystery writings and traditions has shown that the main source of the Trismegistic tractates is probably the wisdom of Egypt and that they "go back in an unbroken tradition of type and form and context to the earliest Ptolemaic times."

Sources:

Bell, H. Idris. Cults and Creeds in Graeco-Roman Egypt. Liverpool, England: Liverpool University Press, 1957.

Faivre, Antoine. The Eternal Hermes: From Greek God to Alchemical Magus. Trans. by Joceyn Godwin. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Phanes Press, 1995.

Hermes Trismegistus. Hermetica. Edited by Brian Copenhaver. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

———. Hermetica. Edited by Walter Scott. Vol. I. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1924. Reprint, Boston: Shambhala, 1985.

———. Theological & Philosophical Works. Edited by J. D. Chambers. 2 vols. London, 1882.

Mead, G. R. S. Thrice-Greatest Hermes. London, 1906. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Hermetica

The body of secret mystical wisdom that honored Hermes Trismegistus ("Thrice-Greatest Hermes") between the third century B.C.E. and first century C.E., identifying the Greek god Hermes with the Egyptian god Thoth. This wisdom literature involved two levels of writing: a popular Hermetic teaching of astrology, magic, and alchemy, and a later higher religious philosophy. The Hermes-Thoth literature had a profound effect on the development of Western magic. Hermetic works include Poimandres (Shepherd of Men), Asclepius, and The Secret Discourse on the Mountain.

Sources:

Atwood, M. A. A Suggestive Inquiry into the Hermetic Mystery. Belfast, Ireland, 1918. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Hermes Trismegistus. The Divine Pymander. Translated by Dr. Everard. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1894.

———. Hermetica. Edited by Brian Copenhaver. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

———. Hermetica. Edited by Walter Scott. Vol. 1. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1924. Reprint, Boston: Shambhala, 1985.

———. Theological and Philosophical Works. Edited by J. D. Chambers. 2 vols. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 1882.

Hermetic Alchemical Order of QBLH

The Hermetic Alchemical Order of QBLH is a magical order in the thelemic tradition initiated by Aleister Crowley early in the twentieth century. The tradition (named for thelema, the Greek word for will) emphasizes the role of the individual in moving toward union with his/her higher self. It recognizes the basic thelemic affirmation of individualism, "Every man and woman is a Star." The average person is considered by the order as a veiled star, in a state of sleep. The individual must awaken. To assist the process of awakening, the order provides the wisdom of the Qabala (also spelled Kabbalah or Qabalah), ceremonial magic, and esoteric psychology. It also draws on Eastern teachings, especially Tantra.

To follow the path and become an awakened self requires an act of will on the part of the individual. Once the individual begins the path, members of the order begin to share the keys of wisdom which were given to the three founders of the order in the early 1960s. Individual members work alone in developing their magical skills and report back to the other members. The order confers no grades and extracts no dues.

In the 1970s, two order members, Frater Damon and Soror Ishtaria, were among the first to receive the information developed in England by Jim Lees, Jake Stratton-Kent, and Carol Smith, which appeared to finally break the code needed for the interpretation of The Book of the Law. The Book of the Law is the holy book for thelemites that was received via channeling by Aleister Crowley in 1904. Lees discovered a means of assigning numerical values to the letters of the English alphabet that has allowed a meaningful set of magical correlations to be derived from The Book of the Law. These correlations and the system that produced them are now known as the English Qabala, still developing as an open-ended search of The Book of the Law. Soror Ishtaria developed a computer program that is widely used by people doing further research on the English Qabala.

The order maintains an extensive webpage through which it invites people to contact it either with questions or seeking information about membership. The page is located at http://www.qblh.org/.

Sources:

The Hermetic Alchemical Order of QBLH. http://www.qblh.org/. May 20, 2000.

Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor

The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor (HBL), a British occult society, was founded in 1884 by Thomas H. Burgoyne (1855–1894) and Peter Davidson (1842–1916). Burgoyne, born Thomas Dalton, was a grocer in Leeds who as a student of the occult came into contact with Max Theon (1850–1927), a Polish immigrant working in London as a psychic healer. Theon was also an occult teacher specializing in teaching his students the means of contacting various preternatural beings, higher adepts similar to the theosophical mahatmas. Burgoyne began to channel material from these beings, known as the Interior Circle. Davidson grew up in northern Scotland near Inverness and had become a student of all things occult. He became a violin maker and later moved to Banchory, near Aberdeen.

At some point Davidson and Burgoyne met and with Theon decided to found the HBL, the first announcement of which appeared in 1884. The following year they began to issue The Occult Magazine, through which the brotherhood began to grow, both in Britain and France. The Rev. William Alexander Ayton provided additional leadership in England, and the head of the work in Paris was Albert Farcheux (better known by his pen name F.Ch. Barlet). Offering itself as a school of Practical Occultism best suited to Westerners, it contrasted itself to the Eastern perspective of the Theosophical Society which by then had moved its headquarters to India. Much of its teaching came from the clairvoyant contacts Burgoyne had with the Interior Circle, and aimed at placing members in direct contact with the same.

The HBL also quickly grew into the chief rival of the Theosophical Society. Thus it was that in the spring of 1886, when theosophical leaders discovered that Burgoyne was the same Thomas Dalton who had been convicted of mail fraud in 1883, they freely circulated the information. Prompted in part by a desire to escape the scandal, but also fostering a desire to start a communal experiment in America, Davidson moved to Loudsville, Georgia. The Davidson farm never evolved into the colony he had desired, but it did function as the international headquarters of the brotherhood for many years. The largest membership was in the United States and France. The HBL gradually ceased to exist as it was superseded by other occult groups, especially the Martinist groups in France, as Davidson shifted his interest into alternative medicine.

Burgoyne also moved to the United States, but he soon separated from Davidson and moved to the West Coast. There, he operated what amounted to a distinct HBL. In 1889, he published a summary of the HBL teachings in a book, The Light of Egypt, issued under his pen name, Zanoni. A short time later, Dr. Henry Wagner and his wife Belle Wagner put up $100,000, a truly massive sum at the time, to create an organization to perpetuate the teachings of The Light of Egypt. The money led to the founding of two organizations, the Astro-Philosophical Publishing Company (which would publish Burgoyne's subsequent title, The Language of the Stars and Celestial Dynamics) and the Church of Light. Building on Burgoyne's base, the Church of Light would become a major occult teaching center and a pioneer structure in the revival of astrology. In 1900, some years after Burgoyne's death, the Astro-Philosophical Publishing Company issued a second volume of The Light of Egypt, reputedly channeled from Burgoyne through Belle Wagner.

Sources:

Burgoyne, Thomas H. Celestial Dynamics. Denver: Astro-Philosophical Publishing Co., 1896.

———. The Language of the Stars. Denver: Astro-Philosophical Publishing Co., 1892.

———. The Light of Egypt. 2 vols. Denver: Astro-Philosophical Publishing Co., 1889, 1900.

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Godwin, Joscelyn, Christian Chanel, and John P. Deveney. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor: Initiatic and Historical Documents of an Order of Practical Occultism. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1995.

Hermetic Society (Dublin)

Founded in 1898 by mystical poet "AE" (George W. Russell) in Dublin, Ireland, after he left the Theosophical Society. The Hermetic Society placed great emphasis on meditation. It was not connected with the Hermetic Society (London).

Hermetic Society (London)

Founded by Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland in London, England, in 1884, connected with the Theosophical Society of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Occultists S. L. MacGregor Mathers and W. Wynn Westcott lectured to the society before launching the famous Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

Sources:

Mitland, Edward. The Story of Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland and of the New Gospel of Interpretation. Birmingham, England: Ruskin Press, 1905.

Hernandez Montis, Vicente (1925–)

Associate professor of physics, University of Seville, who published papers on parapsychology. Montis was born April 23, 1925, at Seville, Spain. He studied at the University of Seville and the University of Madrid. He was a member of Colegio Official de Doctores y Licenciados en Letras y Ciencias, Seville, and the Parapsychological Association. He studied ESP in relation to the hypnotic state, as well as dowsing or water witching.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Herne, Frank (ca. 1870)

Famous nineteenth-century English medium. His first séances were given in January 1869. He began with clairvoyant descriptions of spirits and of the sitter's aura, but physical manifestations soon developed. In 1870 at the house of a Dr. Dixon he was said to have manifested elongation of the human body. Florence Cook held her first sittings with Herne, from whom she may have learned some of the techniques of physical mediumship.

In 1871 Herne joined partnership with Charles Williams. Their séances at 61 Lamb's Conduit Street, London, were very impressive. Voices, psychic lights, independent music, apports, and levitations were often allegedly witnessed. Agnes Guppy-Volckman's famous transportation occurred in one of these joint sittings. In 1875 St. George Stock made an attempt to expose Herne as a fraud but did not succeed, and two years later in The Spiritualist apologized for the attempt.

Much suspicion surrounded the mediumship of Herne and Williams. Williams, who worked closely with Herne, was caught cheating in séances in Paris in 1874 and in Amsterdam in 1879.

Sources:

"Alleged Mediumship of F. Herne." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 7; Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 10.

Hesse, Hermann (1877–1962)

Famous German novelist (he later acquired Swiss nationality) whose books on mystical themes were quite influential in the spiritual and occult revival among young adults in the 1960s and 1970s. The influence of Oriental philosophy is reflected in his novel Siddhartha, which deals with the relationship between father and son and the quest for self-discovery through a journey to India. His novel Das Glasperlenspiel (1943, translated as Magister Ludi, 1950) resolves world disorder through a religious game played by rulers.

Sources:

Hesse, Herman. Siddhartha. New York: New Directions, 1951

Hettinger, J(ohn)

Pioneer British psychical researcher with special interest in telepathy. Hettinger was active in the physical sciences and electrical engineering. He was one of the first individuals in Britain to receive a Ph.D. degree for a dissertation concerned with paranormal phenomena. He studied psychology at Kings College, London University (1933–38), exploring what he named the "ultra-perceptive faculty" of telepathy, employing a pictorial method.

He devoted much time to "object reading," in which a subject is given some object, concentrates on it, and describes impressions received that relate to it or to the owner. Object reading is more popularly known as psychometry. Hettinger conducted psychometric tests to discover the sealed message left by Sir Oliver Lodge before his death, and pieced together the purported message in 17 test sittings (described in his book Telepathy and Spiritualism). His work received mixed reviews from his colleagues.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hettinger, John. Exploring the Ultra-Perceptive Faculty. London: Rider, 1941.

———. Telepathy and Spiritualism. London: Rider, 1952.

———. The Ultra-Perceptive Faculty. London: Rider, 1938.

Scott, Christopher. "Experimental Object-Reading: A Critical Review of the Work of Dr. J. Hettinger." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 49 (1949).

Hex (or Hexerai)

General term for witchcraft spells among the Pennsylvania Dutch settlers of America, especially those of southeastern Pennsylvania. Beliefs in magic were brought to the area in the later seventeenth century and given focus in the Rosicrucian group that settled on Wissahikon Creek in Germantown. The group, generally referred to as the Woman in the Wilderness, dissolved in the early eighteenth century, but its members became practitioners of magic, astrology, and healing in the area and were the forerunners of the later hex meisters.

The standard textbook of hex spells and folk remedies used by hex meisters, The Long Lost Friend or Pow-Wows, was published by John George Hohman of Berks County, Pennsylvania, in 1820. The book includes instruction for a variety of magic formulas to accomplish practical tasks, as indicated by some of the topics covered: "Against Mishaps and Dangers in the House," "Treating a Sick Cow," "To Stop Bleeding at Any Time," and "To Charm Enemies, Robbers, and Murderers." Many Pennsylvania barns are still decorated with "hex signs," known as hexafoos, originally placed to keep away evil spirits, but today largely a decorative addition.

Sources:

Hark, Ann. Hex Marks the Spot in Pennsylvania Dutch Country. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1938.

Hohman, John George. The Long Lost Friend or Pow-Wows. N.p., 1820.

Lewis, Arthur H. Hex. New York: Pocket Books, 1972.

Sachse, Julius F. The German Pietists of Provencial Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, 1895. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1970.

Hexenhaus

A prison for witches built in Bambert, Germany, in 1627 during the rule of the "witch-bishop" Prince Gottfried Johann George II Fuchs von Dornheim. It contained two chapels, a torture chamber, and cells to accommodate 26 witches.

Heyd

A Norwegian sea witch or storm fiend in the shape of a white bear, alluded to in the Frithjof Saga. With the other storm fiend Ham, she was sent by Helgi to engulf Frithjof as he sailed for the island of Yarl Angantyr.

Heydon, John (1629–ca. 1668)

English astrologer, Rosicrucian, and attorney. He was born in London on September 10, 1629, and was educated at Tardebigg in Worcestershire. Because of the outbreak of the Civil War, he did not go on to the university, but joined the king's army. He is said to have been successful as a soldier, but after the triumph of the Roundhead party he left England and for some years lived in various countries on the Continent, notably Spain and Turkey. He is said to have visited Zante, the island in the Levant praised by Edgar Allan Poe, but by 1652 Heydon was back in England. In 1655 he studied law and later established a practice.

Law was not his only study, however, for he became deeply involved in astrology. According to Thomas Carte in his biography of the marquis of Ormonde, Heydon was imprisoned for two years for his prophecy that one Cornwell would die by hanging.

In 1656 Heydon married the widow of Nicolas Culpepper, who, after fighting for Parliament in the Civil War, had devoted a wealth of energy to compiling elaborate treatises on astrology and pharmacopia, arts which went hand in hand in the seventeenth century.

Heydon became intimate with many of the great scientists of the Restoration but quarreled with a number of them, and although he always maintained that he was not actually affiliated with the Rosicrucians, he explained their theories publicly. In 1667 he was imprisoned for "treasonable practices in sowing sedition in the navy, and engaging persons in a conspiracy to seize The Tower [of London]." He died the following year.

In spite of the ups and downs of Heydon's life, while out of jail he wrote a number of books and pamphlets, those on Rosicrucian themes dominating any contributions to astrology. Among his Rosicrucian texts are A New Method of Rosie-Crucian Physick (1658), The Rosie-Crucian Infallible Axiomata (1660), The Wise Man's Crown, The Glory of the Rosie-Cross (1664), and The Rosie-Cross Uncovered (1662). In addition he was author of Theomagia or The Temple of Wisdom (1664) and The Prophetic Trumpeter, Sounding an Allarum to England (1655), the latter being dedicated to Henry Cromwell. According to Wood's Athenœ Oxonicsis, Heydon was also the compiler of A Rosiecrucian Theological Dictionary.

Sources:

Heydon, John. Eugenius Theodidactus. London, 1655.

Heym, Gerard (d. ca. 1974)

Scholar, bibliophile, and student of the occult during the 1930s in Britain. Although Heym was a close associate of S. L. MacGregor Mathers and other members of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, he does not appear to have been a member himself.

Heym had a special interest in alchemy and in 1937 became a founding member of the Society for the Study of Alchemy and Early Chemistry, established for "the scientific and historical study of the branches of learning named in its title." Heym contributed to the society's journal, Ambix.

Heymans, Gerardus (1857–1930)

Psychologist, philosopher, and pioneer of parapsychology in the Netherlands. Heymans established a laboratory for research in 1892 and led in the spread of experimental parapsychology in Holland in the years immediately after World War I. He was one of the founders of the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (SPR), inaugurated on April 1, 1920, and served as its first president. The Dutch SPR served as a meeting ground for scientists, scholars, Spiritualists, and Theosophists.

Heymans followed the philosophy of psychic monism, according to which the universe consists of one stuff, consciousness of which each individual partakes. Having discovered a psychically gifted student, Heymans conducted telepathy experiments at the University of Groningen, tests widely cited for both design and positive results.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Heymans, Gerardus. "Psychische Monismus und 'Psychical Research.' " In Zeitschrift für Psychologie. Leipzig: J. A. Barth, 1912.

Heymans, Gerardus, Henry J. F. W. Brugmans, and A. Weinberg. "Une communication sur des expériences télépathiques au laboratorie de psychologie a Groningue." In Compte Rendu Officiel du Primier Congres International des Recherches Psychiques. Copenhagen, 1922.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Heyn, F(rans) A(driaan) (1910–)

Dutch professor of nuclear physics who studied telepathy. Heyn was born November 2, 1910, at Delft, Netherlands, and studied science at the University of Delft. In 1947 he joined the faculty of the University of Delft, where he taught in the area of nuclear physics and electrical engineering. He had a strong interest in psychical research and became a charter member of the Parapsychological Association. He was coauthor with S. Mulchuyse of Vorderingen en Problemen van de Parapsychologie (Progress and Problems in Parapsychology, 1950).

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Heywood, Rosalind (Hedley) (1895–1980)

Prominent British researcher in the field of psychical science. She was born February 2, 1895, at Gibraltar, and she attended London University. During World War I, as a nurse's aide, she had some initial and intense psychic experiences. She would be given an "order" for unusual treatments for dying patients that would lead to their recovery. She had several deathbed visions and began to experience telepathic contact with a man, Frank Heywood, whom she married during the war.

It was not until 1938 that Heywood joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), but she was an active member for the rest of her life, including a tenure on the council. She experimented with Whateley Carington on ESP, and was also a subject for physicians studying the effects of mescaline. She contributed a number of articles to the Journal of the SPR, including many memoirs of deceased members, but is most remembered for her two books, The Sixth Sense (1959) and her autobiography, The Infinite Hive (1964). She died June 27, 1980, in England.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Heywood, Rosalind. The Infinite Hive. London: Chatto & Windus, 1964. Reprinted as ESP: A Personal Memoir. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1972.

———. The Sixth Sense: An Enquiry into Extrasensory Perception. London: Chatto & Windus, 1959. Reprint, London: Pan Books, 1971. Reprinted as Beyond the Reach of Sense. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hickling, Alan Micklem (1936–)

British aeronautical engineer who has experimented in the field of ESP. He was born on February 22, 1936, in London. He studied at Cambridge University (B.A. honors, mechanical sciences, 1958) and joined the Royal Navy as a pilot in 1959. He became a charter member of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hieroglyphs

This term, normally applied to ancient Egyptian picture writing, is also used for the symbolic illustrations in astrological almanacs and for symbols produced by automatic and direct writing through mediumship. Direct writing (i.e., messages produced without contact between mediums and writing materials), although sometimes produced at séances, has also occurred during outbreaks of poltergeist phenomena, when the poltergeist distributes messages throughout a house. For example, in a disturbance in the house of Eliakim Phelps, in Stratford, Connecticut (1850–51), hieroglyphs were found on the walls and ceilings. The matter was investigated by Spiritualist medium Andrew Jackson Davis, who claimed to recognize the hieroglyphs as spiritual symbols. He interpreted them as friendly messages from spiritual powers.

Sources:

Capron, E. W. Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticisms. Boston: B. Marsh; New York: Patridge and Brittan, 1855.

Higgins, Godfrey (1772–1833)

Godfrey Higgins, a British writer in the Western esoteric tradition, was born in rural Yorkshire, England. His father, a country gentleman, owned Skellow Grange, an estate near Doncaster. He attended Trinity Hall, at Cambridge University and the Temple in London, but due to a shortage of funds was unable to complete his course of study at either institution. His father died in 1799 and he became the squire of Skellow Grange. He married a short time later. As Napoleon's power grew and threatened an invasion of England, Higgins joined the Yorkshire militia and rose to the rank of major before illness forced his retirement. He remained active in local affairs, and joined the campaign for more humane treatment of mental patients. As he regained his health, he traveled widely, including several trips to Italy.

Higgins is remembered today primarily for two books he authored. One, Apolcalypsis is a 1,500 page volume that became a major source used by Madame Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society, in the preparation of her early work, Isis Unveiled. The subtitle to Higgins' book read, An Attempt to Draw Aside the Veil of the Saitic Isis. An earlier volume, The Celtic Druids, became a building block of the contemporary revival of Druidism.

In his magnum opus, Higgins demonstrated his assimilation of a vast amount of eclectic material assembled through his reading and travels. Apocalypsis presents a history of the human race from a Gnostic esoteric perspective. God, The unknowable One, produced the universe through a process of emanation. The One emanates Wisdom, the divine plan of creation. Further emanations lead to the appearance of a deific Trinity of Creator, Preserver and Regenerator. Still further emanations lead to the appearance of lesser deities and humans, all possessed of a spark of divinity. The earliest race of humans were a people of one language, one color (black), and one religion. That religion was Buddhism, which Higgins understood to date to far ancient times. There was a true Golden Age in these ancient times. Inherent in the truths known as this time were immortality of the soul, metempsychosis (reincarnation), the final reabsorption of all things in the One, and the periodic renewal of the worlds.

The Golden Age, during which time the earth's axis was 90 degrees from its orbit was ultimately destroyed by the collision of the earth with three comets, each of which caused a significant but partial deluge. The earth's axis tilted, producing the present day seasons and 365 day year. Two astrological cycles have subsequently become important, the astrological age of 2160 years and the Neros cycle marked by the conjunction of the Sun and moon at the spring equinox that occurs approximately every 600 years. Changes of cycles are marked by social disruptions and messianic expectations. A Neros cycle was coming to an end as Higgins wrote and he noted the existence of various millennial teachers claiming special insight in his day such as Joanna Southcott and Richard Brothers. He also set the beginning of the Piscean Age in 350 B.C.E., thus dating the emergence of the Aquarian Age in 1801.

Higgins believed that all religions had their bases in solar worship as the sun was the most universal symbol of The One. Jesus is seen as a solar Christ and his crucifixion symbolizing the sun crossing the celestial equator at the vernal equinox, between two astrological ages. He described himself as a Christian, but had little attachment to the church and denounced the teaching of Paul the Apostle.

Higgins completed volume one of Apocalypsis in 1830 and it was printed in parts over the next three years. While working on volume two, he died on August 9, 1833; it was published in 1836. The publication was pursued by his son.

Sources:

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Higgins, Godfrey. Apocalypsis, an Attempt to Draw aside the Veil of the Saitic Isis; or an Inquiry into the Origin of Languages, Nations and Religions. 2 vols. London, 1933, 1836.

———. The Celtic Druids. London: Rowland Hunter, 1829.

Higginson, Gordon (1918–1993)

President of the Spiritualists' National Union (SNU) in Britain for 23 years and one of the country's leading mediums. In Spiritualist circles he was popularly known as "Mr. Mediumship."

Higginson first sat in a Spiritualist circle with his mother at age 3. He manifested mediumship at age 12. His mother, Fanny Higginson, demonstrated clairvoyant mediumship for some seventy years. At age 14, she had been told by the trance medium Annie Brittain that she would become a medium, that she would bear a son, and that mother and son would span two lifetimes in the service of the Spiritualist Church. Gordon Higginson took his first Spiritualist service at age 14 in Nantwich, Cheshire.

During World War II he served as a lance corporal and took part in the Dunkirk landings. Although at that time the British army did not recognize Spiritualism as a religion, Higginson fought for such recognition.

He became president of the SNU in 1970 and came to be its longest-serving president, holding that office for more than 23 years. He was a tireless worker in the cause to "put the spirit back into Spiritualism."

Higginson died in January 1993 at age 74. His place as president of the SNU was filled by Eric Hatton.

Hilarion, Master

One of the masters originally contacted by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society. According to theosophical teachings, there exists a spiritual hierarchy composed of individuals who have finished their round of earthly reincarnations and have evolved to the spiritual planes, from which they guide the affairs of humanity. Those members of the hierarchy closest to humanity are the "lords of the seven rays" (of the light spectrum). Each ray represents a particular virtue, which the lord of that ray exemplifies.

Master Hilarion is the lord of the fifth ray and an exemplar of science, or detailed knowledge. He influences scientists, and those who identify with him are known for their ability at research and scientific investigation. During the first decades of the Theosophical Society he channeled The Voice of Silence through Blavatsky and Light on the Path through Mabel Collins. In a former life he is believed to have been Iamblichus, the Neoplatonic philosopher. Today he supposedly inhabits a Greek body but resides in Egypt. Blavatsky claimed to have first met him in 1860 and said he helped her with some of her short stories.

Francis A. LaDue and William H. Dower, cofounders of the Temple (which grew out of the Syracuse, New York, Lodge of the Theosophical Society), claimed Master Hilarion as the primary member of the hierarchy with whom they were in contact. In 1968 Rev. Wayne Taylor claimed that Master Hilarion had guided him in the founding of the City of the Sun Foundation in Columbus, New Mexico. Most recently, Maurice B. Cooke has channeled a set of books allegedly from Master Hilarion.

Sources:

Hilarion, Master [through Maurice B. Cooke]. The Nature of Reality. Toronto: Marcus Books, 1978.

Pallas Athena and the Master Hilarion Speak. Part I: The Master Hilarion. Kings Park, N.Y.: Bridge to Freedom, 1975.

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Taylor, Wayne. Pillars of Light. Columbus, NM: The Author, 1965.

Temple Messages. Halcyon, Calif.: Temple of the People, 1983.

Theogenesis. Halcyon, Calif.: Temple of the People, 1981.

Hill, J(ohn) Arthur (1872–1951)

British psychical researcher and author. Hill was born on December 4, 1872, at Halifax, England. He attended Thornton Grammar School, Bradford, and worked as a business manager until 1898, when he suffered a heart ailment and was unable to work full time. He then spent his time studying the literature of psychical research and also sat with various mediums.

Hill joined the Society for Psychical Research, London, and served on the council between 1927 and 1935. He assisted Sir Oliver Lodge in his work but is most remembered for his many writings. Hill wrote both books and articles on psychical research and Spiritualism. He died March 22, 1951.

Sources:

Hill, J. Arthur. Emerson and His Philosophy. 1919. Reprint, Folcroft, PA: Folcroft Library Editions, 1971.

———. From Agnosticism to Belief. London: Methuen, 1924.

———. Man Is a Spirit. New York: George H. Doran, 1918.

———. New Evidences in Psychical Research. London: W. Rider and Son, 1911.

———. Psychical Investigations. New York: George H. Doran, 1917.
———. Psychical Miscellanea. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Howe, 1919.
———. Psychical Science and Religious Belief. London: Rider, 1929.
———. Religion and Modern Psychology. N.p., 1911.
———. Spiritualism: Its History, Phenomena and Doctrine. New York: George H. Doran, 1919.
———. Spiritualism and Psychical Research. London: T. C. and E. C. Jack; New York: Dodge Publishing, 1913.
Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hillman, James (1926–)

Analytical psychologist who studied the relationship of parapsychology to depth psychology. Hillman was born on April 12, 1926, at Atlantic City, New Jersey. He studied at Georgetown University (1943); Sorbonne, University of Paris (1943); and Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland (B.A., 1950; M.A., 1953), and at the University of Zurich (Ph.D. summa cum laude, 1958). After graduation he became an analytical psychologist and director of studies at the C. G. Jung Institute, Zurich. He returned to the United States in 1970 as an editor for Spring Publications in New York (1970–78). He became a professor at the University of Dallas in 1979.

Hillman was the founding associate editor of Envoy: An Irish Review of Literature and Art (1949–51), and wrote a number of books on psychology. His ongoing project, however, is applying psychoanalytic theory to spiritual matters in his writing. His most famous work, however, was initiated during a visit to India when he met the Hindu teacher Gopi Krishna. Gopi Krishna was a retired civil servant from Srinagar who attained a condition of higher consciousness through arousing the legendary kundalini energy of Hindu mysticism. Hillman was favorably impressed and contributed a psychological commentary for Gopi Krishna's book Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. The commentary interprets the experiences of Gopi Krishna in relation to Jungian psychology.

Sources:

Gopi Krishna. Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. New Dehli: Ramadhar and Hopman, 1967. Reprint, Boulder, Colo.: Shambala, 1970.
Hillman, James. A Blue Fire: Selected Writings. New York: Harper & Row, 1989.
———. The Dream and the Underworld. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.
———. Emotion: A Comprehensive Phenomenology of Theories and their Meanings for Therapy. 1960. Reprint, Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1961.
———. The Feeling of Function. N.p., 1971.
———. Insearch: Psychology and Religion. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1967.
———. Loose Ends. Dallas: Springhill Publications, 1975.
———. The Myth of Analysis. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1972.
———. Pan and The Nightmare. New York: Spring Publications, 1972.
———. Re-visioning Psychology. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.
———. Suicide and the Soul. New York: Harper & Row, 1964.
Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hills, Christopher (1926–)

New Age teacher and director of the University of the Trees. Born in England, he left home at an early age and attended a naval school, serving in World War II. By age 30, Hills had become a businessman in the West Indies with an international organization of ten companies, but in 1957 he became concerned with psychic and spiritual life after his son was miraculously healed through prayer. Hills retired from his business practice and spent two years in India, studying yoga and Hindu philosophy.

In 1960 he became honorary director of research at the Indian Institute of Philosophy, Psychology and Psychical Research and was elected president of the World Conference on Scientific Yoga, attended by 800 yogis and 50 Western scientists. In 1962 he formed the Commission for Research into the Creative Faculties of Man, bringing together the work of scientists, psychical researchers, philosophers, holy men, educationalists, and politicians.

One aspect of this project was the formation in 1965, with Professor Hiroshi Nakamura, of the International Union of Leading Microbiologists, advising on production of edible algae as a means of solving world food problems. During 1966 Hills founded the Centre House community in England, a free fellowship for those interested in spiritual development, serving a social and educational program aimed at "a conscious evolution towards a society based on love and peace." Training was given in yoga, meditation, awareness, sensitivity development, and related subjects. Hills left Centre House after a few years and spent some time as a lecturer. Then in 1973 he established the University of the Trees in Boulder Creek, California, an institution offering a comprehensive program of New Age teachings and granting degrees in consciousness research. The university has also formed the Research Institute for Supersensonic Healing Energies for practical research into subtle energy therapeutics.

Sources:

Hills, Christopher. The Christ Book. Boulder Creek, Calif.: University of the Trees, 1980.
———. Christ Yoga of Peace: Proposal for a World Peace Center. 1970. Rev. ed. as Universal Government by Nature's Laws. N.p., 1978.
———. Creative Conflict. Boulder Creek, Calif: University of the Trees, 1980.
———. Exploring Inner Space. Boulder Creek, Calif.: University of the Trees, 1978.
———. The Golden Egg. Boulder Creek, Calif.: University of the Trees, 1979.
———. Nuclear Evolution: A Guide to Cosmic Enlightenment. London: Centre Community Publications, 1968.
———. Rays from the Capstone. Boulder Creek, Calif.: University of the Trees, 1976.
———. Rejuvenating the Body Through Fasting With Spirulina Plankton. Boulder Creek, Calif.: University of the Trees, 1980.
———. The Secrets of Spirulina. Boulder Creek, Calif.: University of the Trees, 1980.

HIM See Human Individual Metamorphosis

Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy of the U.S.A.

Organization teaching the yoga-centered Hinduism espousedby Sri Swami Rama (1925–1996), a Indian spiritual leader. Swami Rama was at one time a monk, but left that life behind in order to pursue his teaching. In 1971 he founded the institute in India and brought the organization with him to the United States.

The reason Swami Rama came to the United States was the work of Elmer E. and Alyce M. Green in the Voluntary Controls Research Project at the Menninger Foundation of Topeka, Kansas. The project conducted experiments with autogenic training, involving the use of biofeedback instrumentation.

Swami Rama cooperated with them on psychophysiological programs. Swami Rama's spiritual work received a significant boost from his spectacular success in the Greens' experiments.

At the institute, yoga, meditation, and holistic health are taught with a special emphasis on hatha yoga as a means of balancing the body-spirit dichotomy. The practice of yoga, it is believed, will lead to a spiritual worldview. The institute sponsors seminars on a wide range of personal growth topics, maintains a speakers bureau, operates a children's school, and runs a program in Eastern studies and comparative psychology in affiliation with the University of Scranton Graduate School. The program culminates in a Master of Science degree. The institute has established the Eleanor N. Dana Research Laboratory and the Himalayan Institute Teachers Association, which certifies yoga teachers. The Honesdale Institute maintains a library of 20,000 volumes. Publications include: Dawn magazine, quarterly; Himalayan Institute Quarterly, bimonthly; Research Bulletin of the Himalayan International Institute/Eleanor N. Dana Laboratory, annual; and Yoga International, bimonthly. The institute also publishes a large number of books and audiotapes on all aspects of yoga, meditation, and holistic health.

The address of the 422-acre campus of the Himalayan International Institute is R.R. 1, Box 400, Honesdale, PA 18431-9706. Website: http://www.himalayaninstitute.org/.

Sources:

Green, Elmer M. "How to Make Use of the Field of Mind Theory." In The Dimensions of Healing: A Symposium. Los Altos, Calif.: Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine, 1972.

Rama, Swami. Lectures on Yoga. Arlington Heights, Ill.: Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy, 1972.

———. Path of Fire and Light. Honesdale, Pa.: Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy, 1986.

Himalayan News

Former bimonthly publication of the Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy, which has been superseded by the Himalayan Institute Quarterly.

Hindmarsh, Robert (1759–1835)

Robert Hindmarsh, a disciple of Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772) and the founder of the first group of his followers, began his adult life among the Methodists (the followers of evangelical minister John Wesley) and became a Methodist preacher. Wesley had been intrigued with Swedenborg's teachings and tried to arrange a meeting with him. However, Swedenborg declined, citing his now-famous prediction of his own death prior to the time Wesley had suggested for their gathering. A decade after Swedenborg's death, Hindmarsh read his book, Heaven and Hell, and in 1783 placed an ad in the newspaper inviting people interested in Swedenborg to begin meeting in a local coffeehouse. That meeting grew to the point that the group was able to rent a chapel in the Eastcheap section of London. Worship sevices were initiated on January 27, 1788, with Hindmarsh's father preaching the first sermon.

In 1790 Hindmarsh began a short-lived journal, The New Magazine of Knowledge concerning Heaven and Hell, and the Universal World of Nature. In its pages he discussed his views on Swedenborg, the general world of occultism, and the emerging natural sciences. He advised readers to stay away from the occult and divinatory arts, especially astrology and magic, both unreliable tools. He also did not favor palmistry. He advocated the spiritual philosophy that Swedenborg had learned by his communication with the angels in place of the esoteric philosophies based upon observation of the natural world, especially the then-popular theosophical wisdom of Jakob Boehme (1575–1624).

He also held Swedenborg's visions of the spiritual world over against the teachings of transmigration (the belief that human souls can, after death, be reembodied as animals). He believed that transmigration was a corruption of the truth, that Swedenborg had seen in his visions of the spiritual world, human souls sometimes appeared as various animals.

As the head of the Society for Promoting the Heavenly Doctrines of the New Jerusalem, Hindmarsh copied many of the forms from Methodism and tried to model it on Protestant lines in order to make it as acceptable as possible. Within a short time, Hindmarsh's effort was joined by two others—the London Theosophical Society, a Swedenborgian group headed by Jacob Duché, and an independent church founded in 1803 by Manoah Sibley, a former member of Hindmarsh's church.

During Hindmarsh's life, the Swedenborgian movement grew into a substantial minority religious community and sent a set of missionaries to the United States to found a work that enjoyed considerable support through the nineteenth century. Hindmarsh wrote a history of the first generation of Swedenborgians, but it was not published until the middle of the nineteenth century.

Sources:

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Hindmarsh, Robert. Rise and Progress of the New Jerusalem Church in England, America, and Other Parts. . . . Edited by Edward Madeley. London: Hodson & Son, 1861.

Sigstedt, Cyriel Odhner. The Swedenborg Epic: The Life and Work of Emanuel Swedenborg. London: The Swedenborg Society, 1981.

Hindu Spiritual Magazine

A Spiritualist journal founded in Calcutta, India, March 1906. The Hindu Spiritual Magazine was edited by Babu Shishir Kumar Ghose (1840–1911), a Bengali scholar, until his death. It continued to appear through July 1916.

Hippomancy

A method of divination practiced by the ancient Celts, who kept certain white horses in consecrated groves. The horses were made to walk immediately behind sacred carts and auguries were drawn from their movements. The ancient Germans kept similar steeds in their temples. If the horses crossed the threshold with the left forefoot first on leaving the temples at the outbreak of hostilities, it was regarded as an evil omen and the war was abandoned.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Hmana Zena

Slavonic name for a witch in Dalmatia (present-day Croatia). The term means "common woman."

Hmin Nat

A Burmese evil spirit.

Hobgoblins

British domestic fairies or brownies of nocturnal habits. In past centuries they were said to be the most populous species of elves in England and were said to stay in houses close to warm fires. Each section of the land had its own name for them—Hob-Gob, Robin Round Cap, and Hob-Thrush, for example. Today they are best known from their appearance in literary works, the most famous hobgoblin being Puck, of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream. Puck has a merry disposition, and he says he is a jester at the court of Oberon, king of the fairies.

In Discovery of Witchcraft (1584) Reginald Scot states, "Your grandames maids were wont to set a bowl of milk for him for his pains in grinding of malt and mustard, and sweeping the house at midnight. This white bread, and bread and milk, was his standard fee."

In some folklore traditions hobgoblins were malicious rather than mischievous, and in medieval times they were associated with the devil. The hobgoblin was believed by some to be a demon who led men astray during the night. Sometimes he was represented as clothed in a suit of leather, and sometimes he wore green. He was usually considered to be full of tricks and mischief.

Sources:

Arrowsmith, Nancy, with George Moorse. A Field Guide to the Little People. New York: Wallaby, 1977.

Hockley, Frederick (1809–1885)

British occultist who was a member of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia. Hockley collected some important occult texts, including a Rosicrucian manuscript belonging to Sigismond Bacstrom, who was initiated into an occult society in Mauritius in 1794. This text had a great influence on British occultism. Hockley had some gift of crystal gazing and was a close friend of Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie and other British Rosicrucians and occultists of his period. He was a pupil of Francis Barrett, author of The Magus (1801). Hockley died November 10, 1885.

Sources:

Hockley, Frederick. The Rosicrucian Seer: Magical Writings of Frederick Hockley. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1986.

King, Francis. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Hocus Pocus

Words of pseudomagical import. According to Sharon Turner in The History of the Anglo-Saxons (4 vols., 1799–1805), they were believed to be derived from "Ochus Bochus," a magician and demon of the north. It is more probable, however, that they are a corruption of the Latin hoc est corpus (this is my body), words spoken during the act of transubstantiation in the Roman Catholic Mass. The term has been used since the seventeenth century as a preface to the tricks of conjuring magicians. Conjurers used to introduce tricks with the sham Latin formula, "Hocus pocus, tontus talontus, rade celeriter jubeo."

Hod

The name assigned in the Jewish mysticism of the Kabala to the number eight. It means "eternity"—that is, the eternity of the conquest achieved by mind over matter, active over passive, or life over death.

Hodgson, Richard (1855–1905)

One of the leading members of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London. Hodgson was born September 24, 1855, in West Melbourne, Australia. He studied at the University of Melbourne (B.A., 1874; L.L.B., 1875; M.A., 1876; L.L.D., 1878). His interest in psychical research began in Australia during his college years. He moved to England in 1878 to continue his legal studies at Cambridge University, where he took an active part in the undergraduate Ghost Society, which investigated psychical phenomena. His name appears in the first published list of the members of the SPR (1882–83), and in 1885 he was a council member. His legal training and personal attainments made him especially qualified for the detection of fraud.

In November 1884, as a member of the SPR committee, he was sent to India to investigate the paranormal phenomena being reported from the heart of the theosophical movement, especially that initiated by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. His "Report on Phenomena Connected with Theosophy," published in the Proceedings of the SPR in December 1885 charged Blavatsky with widespread fraud. The report created a pubic scandal for Theosophy and ensured Hodgson's place in the history of psychical research. (The report continues to embarrass Theosophists, and there were unsuccessful attempts to discredit it as recently as the mid-1980s.)

A short time later, in conjunction with S. T. Davey, Hodgson undertook important experiments into the possibilities of malobservation and lapse of memory in connection with séance phenomena. While not well known, this paper is actually his most original work in the field. He developed an extremely skeptical attitude toward all physical phenomena. He remarked that "nearly all professional mediums form a gang of vulgar tricksters, who are more or less in league with one another." All his early investigations ended with a negative opinion.

Hodgson was among the first to become convinced that Eusapia Palladino, whose sittings he attended at Cambridge in 1895, was an impostor, although investigations by other psychical researchers indicated that she produced genuine phenomena when properly controlled, but cheated on other occasions. He was sent to the United States in 1887 to act as secretary to the American Society for Psychical Research in Boston. (He would continue in this capacity until his sudden death of heart failure while playing a game of handball at the Boat Club in Boston on December 20, 1905.) A change in Hodgson's general attitude toward the phenomenal side of Spiritualism was brought about—very slowly and after much resistance—by his unparalleled opportunities to investigate the mediumship of Leonora Piper for a period of 15 years. His systematic study of the Piper mediumship cannot be overestimated in importance.

Piper was introduced to the SPR by William James, a lifelong friend of Hodgson's. Hodgson, being extremely skeptical, had Piper watched by detectives to learn whether she attempted to collect information by normal means. He took every precaution to prevent such acquisition of knowledge and finally became convinced not only of the genuineness of her mediumship, but also of spirit return.

His first report on the Piper phenomena was published in 1892 in the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 8). In it no definite conclusions were announced. Yet at this time Hodgson had already obtained convincing evidence of Piper's genuineness. It was of a private character, however, and since he did not include the incident in his report he did not consider it fair to point out its import. As he later told Hereward Carrington (who later printed the account in his The Story of Psychic Science), Hodgson, when still a young man in Australia, had fallen in love with a girl and wished to marry her. Her parents objected on religious grounds. Hodgson left for England and never married. One day, in a sitting with Piper, the girl suddenly communicated, informing Hodgson that she had died shortly before. This incident, the truth of which was verified, made a deep impression on Hodgson.

In his second report, published in the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 13, 1897), his tone is definite in stating:

"At the present time I cannot profess to have any doubt that the chief communicators to whom I have referred in the foregoing pages are veritably the personages that they claim to be, that they have survived the change we call death, and that they have directly communicated with us whom we call living, through Mrs. Piper's entranced organism."

After ten years spent in these investigations Hodgson returned to England for one year and became editor of the SPR Journal and Proceedings. Then he went back to the United States and resumed his Piper studies. He intended to publish a third report but he did not live to do so.

His personal experiences changed his whole outlook on life. He lived in one room in Boston, dependent on an inadequate salary. Nevertheless, in order to devote all his time to psychical research, he refused remunerative offers from colleges and universities. In his latter years he lived an austere life and eagerly anticipated his own death.

It appears from the revelations of Carrington that, like so many other famous psychic investigators, Hodgson developed mediumship at the end. In the last years of his life he allowed no one to enter his room at 15 Charles Street. In the evenings when alone there, he received direct communications from "Imperator," "Rector," and Piper's other controls. These communications were convincing, but he told few people about them. The room was closed to everyone so as not to disturb the "magnetic atmosphere."

The Hodgson Memorial Fund was created at Harvard University in 1912 and was used to fund research by such investigators as Gardner Murphy.

Hodgson in the Afterlife

After Hodgson's death, alleged communications from him were received in England by Alice Kipling Fleming (then known under her pseudonym, "Mrs. Holland"). They contained a cipher similar to entries found in Hodgson's notebook, but it could not be solved. Not even by the dramatic and very lifelike "Hodgson" control of Mrs. Piper was the key ever given. Through Piper he first communicated eight days after his death and delivered many messages claimed to be from his surviving self.

However, many test questions were left unanswered. "If we could suppose," writes Frank Podmore, "that sometimes the real Hodgson communicated through the medium's hand, and that sometimes, more often, when he was inaccessible, the medium's secondary personality played the part as best it could, these difficulties would, no doubt, be lessened."

Many evidential messages bearing on the continued identity of Hodgson were received by James Hyslop. One of the first came through a friend who asked Hodgson, the communicator, if he would get in touch with him through another "light." The reply was, "No, I will not, except through the young light. She is all right." Later in the sitting, one of the other controls remarked that Hyslop would know what the statement meant. It referred to a young, nonprofessional medium whose powers were a subject of discussion between the living Hodgson and Hyslop. It appears that the surviving Hodgson investigated her case from "the other side," since the young lady's control about the time of the incident remarked that he had seen Hodgson. The news of his death was carefully kept from the medium at the time.

The detailed records of these séances, held from the time of Hodgson's death until January 1, 1908, were handed over to William James for examination. In his paper "Report on Mrs. Piper's Hodgson Control," he says,

"I myself feel as if an external will to communicate were probably there, that is, I find myself doubting . . . that Mrs. Piper's dreamlife, even equipped with 'telepathic' powers, accounts for all the results found. But if asked whether the will to communicate be Hodgson's or be some mere spirit-counterfeit of Hodgson, I remain uncertain and await more facts, facts which may not point clearly to a conclusion for fifty or a hundred years."

In England the Hodgson messages were studied by Eleanor Sidgwick, J. G. Piddington, and Sir Oliver Lodge during Piper's visit to England. They did not find them authentic.

Sources:

Baird, A. T. Richard Hodgson: The Story of a Psychical Researcher and His Times. London: Psychic Press, 1949.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Harrison, Vernon. "J'Accuse. An Examination of the Hodgson Report." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 53 (1986).

Hodgson, Richard. "An Account of Personal Investigations in India, and Discussion of the Authorship of the 'Koot Hoomi' Letters." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 3 (1885).

Hodgson, Richard, and S. J. Davey. "The Possibilities of Malobservation and Lapse of Memory from a Practical Point of View." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 4 (1887).

James, William. "Report on Mrs. Piper's Hodgson Control." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 23 (1909).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hoebens, Piet Hein (1948–1984)

Dutch journalist who wrote a number of skeptical reports on parapsychological phenomena. He was a staff member of the Amsterdam newspaper De Telegraaf for 13 years and served as the Dutch representative on the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal.

In spite of his skepticism about parapsychology, Hoebens took a keen interest in the subject and was regarded as a fair-minded critic. In the early 1980s, he contributed to Zetetic Scholar a valuable series of articles, "The Mystery Men From Holland," concerning the phenomena claimed for Peter Hurkos, Gerard Croiset, and Marinus Dykshoorn. Hoebens died in the Netherlands, October 22, 1984.

Sources:

Hoebens, Piet Hein. "The Mystery Men From Holland." Zetetic Scholar 8 (July 1981); 9 (March 1982); 10 (December 1982).

Hoene-Wronski, Jozef Maria (1776–1853)

Polish mathematician and inventor who developed a philosophy of messianism, derived from the Kabala and Gnosticism. He claimed to have discovered "the secret of the Absolute," which he revealed for 150,000 francs to Pierre Arson, a businessman who agreed to publish Hoene-Wronski's messianic works. When Arson backed out of the deal, Hoene-Wronski declared him to be the beast of the Apocalypse and published a pamphlet with the immortal title Yes or No—that is to say, have you or have you not, yes or no, purchased from me for 150,000 francs my discovery of the Absolute? Not surprisingly, Hoene-Wronski lost his court battle to obtain the remainder of the money, but the unfortunate Arson had already expended some 40,000 francs on the works of Hoene-Wronski.

About 1850 Hoene-Wronski became the occult teacher of Alphonse Louis Constant, who later wrote many books on the occult under the pseudonym Éliphas Lévi.

Sources:

Hoene-Wronski, Jozef Maria. Hoene-Wronski: Une philosopie de la creation. Paris: Seghers, 1970.

Hoffer, Abram (1917–)

Psychiatrist who studied the effect of psychedelic drugs on human consciousness. Hoffer was born on November 11, 1917, in Saskatchewan, Canada. He studied successively at the University of Saskatchewan (B.S., 1938; M.S., 1940), the University of Minnesota (Ph.D., 1944), and the University of Toronto (M.D., 1945). After graduation he took a position as director of psychiatric research in the Psychiatric Services Branch, Department of Public Health, Saskatchewan.

Hoffer began work on the effects of hallucinogens in the 1950s. In 1959 he addressed the Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics in New York, and in the following year published, with Humphrey Osmond, the Chemical Concepts of Psychiatry (1960). He and Osmond also worked together on Hallucinogens (1967) and both contributed to Clinical and Other Uses of the Hoffer-Osmond Diagnostic Test (1975).

In the 1970s he concentrated his research on problems of nutrition. His books include How to Live with Schizophrenia (1978), Orthomolecular Nutrition (with Morton Walker, 1978), Nutrients to Age Without Senility (1980), and Ortho-Molecular Nutrition (with Morton Walker, 1981).

Sources:

Hoffer, Abram, and Humphrey Osmond. Megavitamin Therapy: In Reply to the American Psychiatric Association Task Force Report on Megavitamins and Orthomolecular Psychiatry. Regina, Sask., Canada: Canadian Schizophrenia Foundation, 1976.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hohenlohe, Prince (1794–1849)

A priest and claimed miracle healer whose full title was Alexander Leopold Franz Emmerick, Prince of Hohenlohe-Waldenburg-Schillings-Furst. He was born at Kupferzell, near Waldenburg, now in Bavaria, on August 17, 1794. He was ordained as a Catholic priest in 1815 and went to Rome, where he entered the Society of the Fathers of the Sacred Heart.

Prince Hohenlohe gained a great reputation as a miraculous healer at Bamberg and Munich and attracted large crowds. Eventually the authorities intervened to prevent his healing work. He traveled to Vienna and Hungary, becoming titular bishop of Sardica in 1844. He died at Vöslau, near Vienna, November 17, 1849.

Sources:

Baur, F. N. A Short and Faithful Description of the Remarkable Occurrences and . . . Conduct of . . . Prince Alexander of Hohenlohe. N.p., 1822.

Brunner, S. Aus dem Nachlasse des Furstein Aloysius von Hehenlohe. Regensburg: G. J. Manz, 1851.

Doyle, J. Miracles Said to Have Been Wrought by the Prince Hohenlohe. N.p., 1823.

Hohenwarter, Peter (1894– ?)

Theologian who conducted important research into mediumistic phenomena. He was born May 18, 1894, at Obervellach, Austria, and studied at Graz University, Austria (Theol.D., 1924). He worked as a professor of mathematics, physics, and philosophy at Klagenfurt until removed by the Nazis in 1938.

After the war Hohenwarter became vice president of Imago Mundi, the International Society of Catholic Parapsychologists, and joined the Austrian Society for Psychical Research. He organized a great many sittings with the Viennese medium Maria Silbert and with the Danish medium Einer Nielsen, whose phenomena he endorsed in lectures.

Sources:

Hohenwarter, Peter. "The Experiments of Astro-Physicist Dr. Alois Gatterer, S. J., with Maria Silbert." Vergorgene Welt 2, no. 3 (1957).

———. "Germany's Leading Parapsychologist: The 100th Anniversary of Schrenck-Notzing's Birth." Vergorgene Welt. 3–5 (1959).

———. "Hauntings at Schwarzach in the Voralberg Region." Neue Wissenschaft (July 1954).

———. "Our Experiments with Maria Silbert." Schweizer Rundschau (February 1954).

———. "Should We Study Parapsychology?" Der Seelsorger (March 1958).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Holistic

A term describing an integral, inclusive approach, which regards each being, system, or object as more than the sum of its parts. Holism is often associated with medicine, nutrition, and lifestyle. The term can imply a pretechnological lifestyle which uses alternative healing practices vs. contemporary established western practices. Holistic practices deal with the whole person, in which one's entire well-being is analyzed—his/her physical, emotional, spiritual, mental, social, environmental factors, etc.

Although often described as a New Age concept, Eastern, earth-centric, and indigenous peoples have practiced holism for many centuries. The term holism derives from the Greek holos (whole), and was first used by Jan Christian Smuts in his book Holism and Evolution (1926). Smuts states, "Both matter and life consist of unit structures whose ordered grouping produced natural wholes. . .The rise and self-perfection of wholes in the Whole is the slow but unerring process and goal of this Holistic universe."

The notion prefigures theologian Teilhard de Chardin's theory that the human race is "evolving mentally and socially, towards a final spiritual unity."

Holism is primarily associated with healing processes and advocates patient-centered medicine in which the physician treats the person as a whole being, rather than focusing on a set of symptoms. It promotes preventative medicine by maintaining the health of all aspects of the self—physical, mental, emotional, spiritual. Generally, however, holistic medicine is simply a generic phrase referring to a variety of healing practices, some beneficial and some questionable.

Alternative therapies normally associated with holistic medicine include:

Acupuncture/acupressure—alleviating pain and increasing immune responses by balancing the flow of vital life energy through twelve major body energy pathways called meridians.

Aromatherapy—the use of essential oil extracts from herbs and plants to treat a wide range of conditions and disorders.

Ayurvedic medicine—an ancient Indian medical practice which treats disease by providing natural therapies designed for particular metabolic types.

Craniosacral therapy—manipulates bones in the skull to treat disorders and improve overall body functioning.

Herbal medicine—including Western, ayurvedic, or Chinese, employs naturally occuring herbal remedies for disorders and diseases.

Homeopathy—the use of non-toxic, extremely diluted, low-cost medicines to treat chronic illness and maintain self-care. Used by hundreds of millions of people worldwide, homeopathy entails a "like curing like" approach to healing.

Osteopathy—treatment of bodily disorders by restoring the structural balance of the musculoskeletal system.

Reiki—the channeling of universal energy to aid in the healing process.

As we enter the 21st century an increasing number of physicians are advocating a holistic approach to health care, emphasizing prevention as well as treatment. Noted published practitioners (and their specialties) include Dean Ornish (reversing heart disease), Deepak Chopra (ayurveda/mind-body), Christiane Northrup (women's health), and Andrew Weil (overall health and preventative medicine).

Sources:

Brown, Chip, "The New Age Comes of Age," New Age: The Journal for Holistic Living (Nov./Dec. 1999): 66–70.

The Burton Goldberg Group. Alternative Medicine: The Definitive Guide. Tiburon, Calif.: Future Medicine Publishing, Inc., 1997.

Chopra, Deepak. Boundless Energy. New York: Harmony Books, 1995.

Hastings, Arthur C., James Fadiman, and James S. Gordon. Health for the Whole Person. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1980.

Miller, Don Ethan. Bodymind: The Whole Person Health Book. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1974.

Natural Therapy.com. http://www.naturaltherapy.com. February 25, 2000.

The New Holistic Health Handbook. Lexington, Mass.: The Stephen Greene Press, 1985.

Northrup, Christiane. Women's Bodies, Women's Wisdom. New York: Bantam Books, 1994.

Ornish, Dean. Everyday Cooking with Dr. Dean Ornish. New York: Harper Collins Publishers, 1995.

Pathways to Wholeness: A Healing Guide. Berkeley, Calif.: Clear Light Publications, 1975.

Pelletier, Kenneth R. Mind as Healer/Mind as Slayer: A Holistic Approach to Preventing Stress Disorder. New York: Delta, 1977.

St. Aubyn, Lorna, ed. Healing. London: Heineman, 1983.

HOLLAND

For general early occultism among German peoples, see the entry Teutons.

Spiritualism

Spiritualism was introduced into Holland in about 1857. The first Dutch Spiritualist on record is J. N. T. Marthese, who, after studying psychic phenomena in foreign countries, finally returned to his native Holland, taking with him the American medium D. D. Home. The latter held séances at The Hague before several learned societies, and by command of Queen Sophia a séance was given in her presence. The medium himself, in an account of the performance, stated that the royal lady was obliged to sit seven séances on consecutive evenings before any results were obtained. These results, however, were apparently satisfactory, for the queen was thereafter a staunch supporter of the movement.

During Home's visit Spiritualism gained a considerable following in Holland and the practice of giving small private séances became fairly widespread. Allegedly, spirit voices were heard at these gatherings, the touch of spirit hands was felt, and musical instruments were played by invisible performers.

Séances held at the house of J. D. van Herwerden in The Hague were particularly notable and were attended by many enthusiastic students of the phenomena. Van Herwerden recruited a 14-year-old Javanese boy of his household as the medium. The manifestations ranged from spirit rapping and table turning in the earlier séances to direct voice, direct writing, levitation, and materializations in later ones. The séances were described in van Herwerden's book Ervaringen en Mededeeling op een nog Geheimzinnig Gebied and took place between 1858 and 1862. One of the principal spirits purported to be a monk, Paurellus, who was assassinated some 300 years previously in that city. Afterward van Herwerden was induced by his friends to publish his diary, under the title Experiences and Communications on a Still Mysterious Territory.

For a time Spiritualist séances were conducted only in family circles and were of a private nature. But as the attention of intellectuals became more and more directed to the new phenomenon, societies were formed to promote research. Oromase, or Ormuzd, the first of these societies, was founded in 1859 by Major J. Revius, a friend of Marthese's, and included among its members many people of high repute. They met at The Hague, and the records of their transactions were carefully preserved. Revius was president until his death in 1871. He was assisted by the society's secretary, A. Rita. They assembled a fine collection of works on Spiritualism, mesmerism, and kindred subjects.

Another society, the Veritas, was founded in Amsterdam in 1869. The studies of this association were conducted in a somewhat less searching and scientific spirit than those of the Oromase. Its mediums specialized in trance utterances and written communications from the spirits, and its members inclined to a belief in reincarnation, an opinion at variance with that of the older society. Rotterdam had for a time a society known as the Research after Truth, which had similar manifestations and tenets, but it soon came to an end, although its members continued to devote themselves privately to the investigation of spirit phenomena.

Other equally short-lived societies were formed in Haarlem and other towns. In all of these, however, there was a shortage of mediums able to produce form materializations. To supply this demand a number of foreign mediums hastened to Holland, including Margaret Fox Kane (of the Fox sisters), the Davenport brothers, Florence Cook, and Henry Slade.

Before this the comparatively private nature of the séances and the high standing of those who took part in them had prevented the periodicals from making any but the most cautious comments on the séances. The appearance of professional mediums on the scene, however, swept away the barrier and let loose a flood of journalistic ridicule and criticism. This in turn provoked the supporters of Spiritualism to retort, and soon a lively battle was in progress between the Spiritualists and the skeptics. The consequence was that "the cause" was promoted as much by the articles that derided it as by those that were in favor of it.

Among the defenders of Spiritualism was Madame Elise van Calcar, who not only wrote a novel expounding Spiritualist principles but also published a monthly journal, On the Boundaries of Two Worlds, and held a sort of Spiritualist salon where enthusiasts could meet and discuss their favorite subjects. Dutch intellectuals, such as Drs. H. de Grood, J. Van Velzen, Van der Loef, and Herr Schimmel, were among authors who wrote in defense of the same opinions, and the writings of C. F. Varley, Sir William Crookes, and Alfred Russel Wallace were translated into Dutch.

A mesmerist, Signor Donata, carried on the practice of animal magnetism in Holland and endeavored to identify the magnetic force emanating from the operator with the substance of which disembodied spirits were believed to be composed. Progress of the movement was hampered by the many exposures of unscrupulous mediums, but on the whole the mediums, professional or otherwise, were well received. Haunted houses and poltergeists were also noted.

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

Some of the pioneers of psychical research in Holland were Frederik van Eeden (1860–1932), K. H. E. de Jong (1872–1960), P. A. Dietz (1878–1953), and Florentin J. L. Jansen (b. 1881). Van Eeden was an author and physician who sat with the English medium Rosina Thompson and was also acquainted with F. W. H. Myers. Van Eeden contributed "A Study of Dreams" to the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 26, p. 431), in which he used the term lucid dream to indicate those conditions in which the dreamer is aware that he is dreaming. This condition of consciousness in the dream state was emphasized by the British writer Oliver Fox as a frequent preliminary to astral projection.

Jong was a classical student whose doctoral thesis dealt with the mysteries of Isis. As World War II began, he was a lecturer in parapsychology at the University of Leiden and was responsible for a number of books and articles dealing with psi faculty.

Dietz attempted to organize a student social group for psychical research when studying biology at the University of Groningen. Although this was short-lived, Dietz went on to investigate parapsychological card tests, using himself as the subject. After qualifying as a medical doctor in 1924, he became a neurologist in The Hague. A few years later he and W. H. C. Tenhaeff founded the periodical Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie. In his book Wereldzicht der Parapsychologie (Parapsychological View of the Universe) Dietz coined the terms paragnosy for psychical phenomena and parergy for physical phenomena. He became a lecturer in parapsychology at the University of Leiden in 1931 and had a reputation as an excellent speaker.

Jansen seems to have established a parapsychological laboratory as early as 1907, while still a medical student. He founded the quarterly periodical Driemaandelijkse verslagen van het Psychophysisch Laboratorium te Amsterdam. He took a special interest in experiments with Paul Joire's sthenometer and conducted a number of experiments to verify the od force proposed by Baron von Reichenbach. In 1912 he immigrated to Buenos Aires, where he worked as a physician.

Other pioneers included Marcellus Emants (1848–1932), a novelist who experimented with the famous medium Eusapia Palladino; engineer Felix Ortt (1866–1959), who published articles on parapsychology and a book on the philosophy of occultism and Spiritualism; and Captain H. N. de Fremery, who published a manual of Spiritualism and also contributed to Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie.

In 1920 the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research, the Dutch Society for Psychical Research, was founded in Amsterdam through the enterprise of Gerardus Heymans (1857–1930) of Groningen University. Although the society began well, it was soon criticized for an unsympathetic atmosphere for mediums, but in 1927 it received a new impetus from the psychologist W. H. C. Tenhaeff and the journal Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie. Some notable investigations over the years included studies of dowsing (water witching), physics and parapsychology, and precognitive elements in dreams.

The society was suppressed during World War II, and the Germans took the library to Germany and destroyed it. After the war the society was reconstructed and soon numbered a thousand members, including Javanese parapsychologist George Zorab. Some of the work in this period included observations on the noted psychic Gerard Croiset, an attempt to replicate the Whately Carington tests with Zener cards, and the investigation of "objective clairvoyance." Meanwhile, in 1933 Tenhaeff founded the Parapsychology Institute of the State University of Utrecht, later known as the Parapsychological Division of the Psychological Laboratory, Utrecht.

In 1953 the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies, sponsored by the Parapsychology Foundation, New York, was held in Utrecht. In 1959 the Amsterdam Foundation for Parapsychological Research was established and began an investigation of the influence of psychedelics on ESP. Another investigation was a widely conducted inquiry into the occurrence of spontaneous phenomena.

In 1960 a controversy erupted in the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research over Tenhaeff's authoritarian control of the organization. Some members withdrew and founded the Nederlandse Vereniging voor Parapsychologie, which now provides the primary focus for parapsychological research in the country. By 1967 there was growing interest in parapsychology among students of five major universities, and various societies were set up. These were later grouped into the Study Center for Experimental Parapsychology.

The Federation of Parapsychological Circles of the Netherlands emerged as an umbrella for several small local parapsychological groups, including the Amsterdamse Parapsychologische Studiekring, the Haarlemse Parapsychologische Studiekring, the Haagse Parapsychologische Studiekring, and the Rottendamse Parapsychologische Studiekring.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Dykshoorn, M. B., with Russell H. Felton. My Passport Says Clairvoyant. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1974.

Hurkos, Peter. Psychic. London: Arthur Baker, 1962.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Pollack, Jack Harrison. Croiset the Clairvoyant. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1964. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1965.

"Holland, Mrs." (1868–1948)

Pseudonym of Alice Kipling Fleming, who took part in famous "cross correspondence" tests of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and produced significant automatic writing scripts.

Holleran, Eugene M(artin) (1922–)

Professor of chemistry who investigated psychokinesis. Holleran was born June 25, 1922, in Kingston, Pennsylvania. He attended Scranton University (B.S., 1943) and Catholic University, Washington D.C. (Ph.D. chemistry, 1949). In 1950 he became a professor of chemistry at St. John's University, Jamaica, New York. He joined the Parapsychological Association, and during the 1960–61 school year Holleran worked on a Parapsychology Foundation grant on tests to establish psychokinetic ability.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hollis, Mary J. (Mrs. Hollis-Billing) (1837– ?)

American direct voice and materialization medium of the nineteenth century, controlled by spirit guides "James Nolan" and "Skiwaukee" (a Native American). In 1874 and 1880 she visited England, where she demonstrated slate writing, the script frequently said to be produced by a materialized hand in full view. Hollis was born April 24, 1837, in Jeffersonville, Indiana, into a wealthy family. She was an exemplary member of the Episcopal Church until she began to see and talk with spirits.

During the years 1871 to 1873 N. B. Wolfe of Chicago made exhaustive investigations into her phenomena. The account is included in his Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism (1873). According to Wolfe, Hollis's direct voice mediumship was well developed. As many as 30 or 40 spirits were said to have come in a single sitting. They spoke only in the dark, but they could sing along with the sitters. Sometimes the sitters were given the Freemasonry challenge. Objects frequently moved. Sometimes the medium was levitated to the ceiling and left a pencil mark there. One of her manifesting spirits was fond of making dolls and rosettes from the material provided for this purpose, and the sewing was done accurately in the dark.

Hollis produced materialized forms from a cabinet without going into trance. Phantom hands quickly appeared. As a test the medium's right hand was blackened with cork. The spirit hand was clean. The faces were often flat, and the sitters looked at them through opera glasses. On one occasion six heads materialized simultaneously. Famous people were claimed to have manifested at the Hollis séances, including Napoleon and Empress Josephine, who wore a jeweled crown and strings of pearls.

Hollow Earth

Many occult speculations revolve around variant cosmologies in which the Earth is not simply a solid sphere in a universe of other celestial bodies. One of them is the idea that the Earth is to some degree hollow. This theory takes two basic forms. The first, "the cellular cosmogony," proposes that we live on the inside of a sphere or oval, with sun, moon, and planets in the center. The second suggests that we live on the outside of a hollow sphere with a mysterious inner kingdom known only to a few initiates or intrepid travelers.

An early hollow Earth theory was proposed by the English astronomer Edmund Halley (of comet fame) in 1692. He suggested that the Earth is a shell 500 miles thick with two inner shells and a solid inner sphere, all capable of sustaining life. In 1721 Congregationalist minister Cotton Mather put forward a similar theory.

In 1818 Captain John Cleves Symmes, a retired army officer, spent the last years of his life trying to prove that the Earth consisted of five concentric spheres with holes several thousand miles in diameter at the poles. His theories are explained in detail in the books Symmes' Theory of Concentric Spheres (1826), by James McBridge, and The Symmes' Theory of Concentric Spheres (1878), by Americus Symmes, son of the captain.

In 1820 a writer with the probably pseudonymous name "Captain Seaborn" published a fictional narrative about a hollow Earth under the title Symzonia. In the book Seaborn finds his steamship drawn by strong currents to a southern polar opening, where he finds an inner world of happy utopiates. Edgar Allan Poe's "Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym" develops a similar theme.

A later development of the Symmes theories was propounded with messianic zeal by Cyrus Reed Teed (1839–1908), who spent 38 years lecturing and writing on the hollow Earth theme. He had a laboratory for the study of alchemy, and claimed that in 1869 he had a vision of a beautiful woman who revealed to him the secret of the hollow Earth. This discovery was given to the world in a pamphlet titled The Illumination of Koresh: Marvelous Experience of the Great Alchemist at Utica, N.Y. In 1870 he published The Cellular Cosmogony under his religious name "Koresh" (Cyrus) and after many years of enthusiastic lecturing established a College of Life in Chicago in 1886. This was the beginning of a communal society called the Koreshan Unity. By the 1890s this had blossomed into the town of Estero, near Fort Myers, Florida, under the name The New Jerusalem.

In the 1930s, long after Teed's death and the decline of his Koreshan communities in the United States, his ideas were merged with theosophical and occult notions and also became part of some eccentric Nazi cosmologies. Remnants of the Hohlweltlehre (hollow Earth teaching) still have some following in Germany. Teed's ideas were later exploited by two famous occult swindlers, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Jackson, operating under the names Theodore and Laura Theodore Horos. The name "Horos" was taken from the writings of Cyrus Reed Teed. Mrs. Jackson (also known as "Mrs. Diss Debar," "Angel Anna," and "Editha Gilbert Montez") appears to have been born as Editha Salomon. In addition to representing herself as a founder of "Koreshan Unity," she stole the rituals of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

Another hollow Earth theorist was Marshall B. Gardner, an Illinois maintenance engineer who worked for a corset manufacturer. His book Journey to the Earth's Interior (1906) might have been influenced by Jules Verne's story Journey to the Center of the Earth (1864). It rejects the theory of several concentric spheres and claims that there is only one hollow Earth and that we live on the outside of it. Gardner's "Earth" is 800 miles thick, and the interior has its own sun. There are openings at the poles, each 1,400 miles wide, through which the mammoths of Siberia and the Eskimoan people came. An enlarged edition of Gardner's book was published in 1920, with many impressive illustrations showing the everlasting summer of the interior.

Six years after the publication of the second edition of Gardner's book, Admiral Richard E. Byrd flew over the North Pole. Three years later Byrd flew over the South Pole, but he found no holes in either of the poles. Incredibly enough, however, his statements about his explorations have since been quoted out of context to make it seem as if he actually endorsed the hollow Earth myth. Claims that flying saucers really come from inside the Earth through the polar openings are made by, among others, Raymond Bernard in his book The Hollow Earth (1969).

A persistent variant of the hollow Earth cosmology is the idea that the Earth is honeycombed with a network of secret subterranean cities and caverns, the home of underground kingdoms. Such notions have been articulated by Richard Shaver. These are modern versions of older folklore about fairies and gnomes.

Sources:

Gardner, Marshall B. A Journey to the Earth's Interior; or, Have the Poles Really Been Discovered? Aurora, Ill.: The Author, 1913.

Lang, Johannes. Die Hohlwelttheorie. Franfurt am Main, Germany: Goethe Verlag, 1938.

Teed, Cyrus Reed. The Cellular Cosmogony; or, the Earth, a Concave Sphere. Chicago: Guiding Star, 1899.

Walton, Bruce A. A Guide to the Inner Earth. Jane Lew, W. Va.: New Age Books, 1983.

Holly

This name is probably a corruption of the word holy since this plant has been used from time immemorial as a protection against evil influence. It was hung around or planted near houses as a protection against lightning. Its common use at Christmas apparently originated in an ancient Roman festival in which holly was dedicated to the god Saturn. While the Romans were holding this feast—which occurred about the time of the winter solstice—they decked the outsides of their houses with holly. At the same time the Christians were quietly celebrating the birth of Christ, and to avoid detection they outwardly followed the custom of their heathen neighbors and decked their houses with holly as well. In this way holly came to be connected with Christmas customs. The plant was also regarded as a symbol of the Resurrection.

The use of mistletoe along with holly probably came from the notion that in winter the fairies took shelter under its leaves and that they protected all who sheltered the plant. The origin of kissing under the mistletoe is considered to have come from Saxon ancestors of the British, who regarded this plant as dedicated to Freya, the goddess of love.

Holmes, Ernest Shurtlett (1887–1960)

Ernest S. Holmes, the founder of Religious Science, was born January 21, 1887, in Lincoln, Maine. His poor family provided little incentive for education, and at the age of 15 he left home for Boston to make his way in the world. He pursued a course in public speaking and discovered that one of his instructors was a Christian Scientist. He was given a copy of Mary Baker Eddy's Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. This basic Christian Science textbook fit easily into Holmes's reading of philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson.

In 1912 Holmes moved to Southern California where his brother Fenwicke had become the pastor of a Congregational church. Shortly after his arrival he discovered the Metaphysical Library in Los Angeles, which had become the center for the distribution of New Thought metaphysical literature. He avidly devoured the works of writers such as Thomas Troward, William Walker Atkinson, and Christian Larsen. In 1916 he gave his first public lecture at the Metaphysical Library, and the following year he and his brother opened the Metaphysical Institute and began issuing a magazine, Uplift. Within a short time he was lecturing regularly in Los Angeles and Long Beach, California, and began to travel nationally. His first book, Creative Mind, appeared in 1919. A final step in his mature development occurred in 1924 when he briefly settled in New York City and became the last student to be accepted by Emma Curtis Hopkins, the founder of New Thought.

In 1925 Holmes returned to Los Angeles and finished writing his major work, The Science of Mind (1925), a summary of his thought and the textbook embodying his own perspective on New Thought. The "Science of Mind" was the study of spirit, the reality underlying the visible cosmos. Mastery of the Science of Mind led to happiness, health, and prosperity. He also developed a simple technique of healing prayer. In 1927 he founded the Institute of Religious Science and School of Philosophy and began to train people in his methods. They in turn established themselves as Science of Mind practitioners in a manner similar to Christian Science practitioners.

The movement Holmes began prospered over the next several decades. He continually had to move his Sunday lectures into larger facilities. In 1949 he began a radio show, "This Thing Called Life." New books appeared regularly.

Holmes resisted attempts to see Religious Science as a church movement. However, in 1949, giving in to requests from some of his closest associates, he oversaw the formation of the International Association of Religious Science Churches. In 1954 Holmes moved to reorganize the very loosely organized association directly under the institute, whose name was changed to the Church of Religious Science. While most congregations went along with the plan, some, including those led by several of Holmes's closest colleagues, saw the move as a power grab and continued the association as a separate movement.

Holmes died April 7, 1960, in Los Angeles. The Church of Religious Science continues as the United Church of Religious Science and the association continues as Religious Science International.

Sources:

Armor, Reginald C. Ernest Holmes: The Man. Los Angeles: Science of Mind Publications, 1977.

Holmes, Ernest S. How to Use the Science of Mind. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1948.

———. The Science of Mind. 1925. Rev. ed. New York: R. M. McBride, 1938.

———. This Thing Called Life. Los Angeles: Institute of Religious Science and Philosophy, 1943.

———. What Religious Science Teaches. Los Angeles: Church of Religious Science, 1944.

Holmes, Fenwicke L. Ernest Holmes: His Life and Times. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1970.

Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson (ca. 1874)

Materialization mediums of Philadelphia who claimed "Katie King" and "John King" as their controls. The claim was supported by Henry T. Child, another medium, who published particulars of the two controls' corporeal lives as privately communicated to him in his study.

In 1873 the Holmeses—of longstanding good reputation—traveled to England, where they were charged with dishonorable attempts to raise money. The accounts of their powers of mediumship varied between séances. One family recognized a spirit face as that of a departed relative; in an account of that experience in The Spiritualist, the Reverend Stainton Moses, stated that the light was good and the face was only a few feet away from the sitters. After their return to the United States, a General Lippitt publicly endorsed the Holmeses' mediumship in The Galaxy in December 1874.

The Holmeses' fall from grace is amply demonstrated in the change undergone by their once-powerful advocate, Robert Dale Owen, who initially wrote:

"I have seen Katie on seven or eight different occasions, suspended, in full form, about two feet from the ground for ten or fifteen seconds. It was within the cabinet, but in full view; and she moved her arms and feet gently, as a swimmer upright in the water might. I have seen her, on five different evenings, disappear and reappear before my eyes, and not more than eight or nine feet distant. On one occasion, when I had given her a calla lily, she gradually vanished, holding it in her hand; and the lily remained visible after the hand which held it was gone; the flower, however, finally disappearing also. When she reappeared the lily came back also, at first a bright spot only, which gradually expanded into a flower."

On November 2, 1874, Owen additionally affirmed: "I stake whatever reputation I may have acquired, after eighteen years' study of spiritualism, as a dispassionate observer upon the genuine character of these phenomena."

Nevertheless, a month later, on December 6, 1874, he declared in The Banner of Light: "Circumstantial evidence, which I have just obtained, induces me to withdraw the assurances which I have heretofore given of my confidence in the genuine character of certain manifestations presented last summer, in my presence, through Mrs. and Mr. Nelson Holmes."

A similar notice was published by Henry T. Child.

The reason for the sudden change was the revelation that Eliza White, the Holmeses' landlady, claimed that she had impersonated Katie King by slipping in through a false panel of the cabinet. A demonstration of the impersonation was given to Owen and Child. The newspapers made a great sensation of the exposure. The Holmeses appeared to have been ruined.

Then Henry Olcott came to the rescue. He investigated and soon discovered very serious discrepancies in White's story. Affidavits were given to him alleging White's bad moral reputation and dishonest nature. A New Jersey justice of the peace testified to having heard White singing in another room while "Katie King" appeared before Owen and Child.

General Lippitt told of a thorough investigation of the cabinet with a professional magician who was satisfied that there was no chance of any trick. Letters were produced by the Holmeses that spoke against the probability of any conspiracy between them and Eliza White. On the contrary, they proved that White tried to blackmail them much earlier by threatening to claim that she impersonated "Katie King."

Additional evidence also seemed to vindicate the Holmeses: At the time of the mock séance before Child and Owen, the Holmeses had a real séance with 20 people at which the spirits appeared.

On the basis of these facts, and allowing for the dubious part that Child appeared to have played in the affair, Olcott concluded that the Holmeses should be tested again without reference to the past. This he did. He netted a cabinet to proof it against surreptitious entry and put Mrs. Holmes into a bag tied around her neck. The experiments were repeated in his own room. Olcott became satisfied that Mrs. Holmes was a genuine and powerful medium for materializations, an opinion he affirms in his book People from the Other World (1875). General Lippitt shared his conclusions.

Sources:

Olcott, Henry Steele. People from the Other World. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1875.

Holms, A(rchibald) Campbell (1861–1954)

Scottish expert on shipbuilding who also studied Spiritualism and psychic science. In addition to his classic work Practical Shipbuilding (1904), he also compiled one of the most valuable and comprehensive encyclopedias of psychical phenomena ever published: The Facts of Psychic Science (1925). Although not a critical study, it analyzed and classified every major phenomenon of psychic science, with detailed indexes.

Sources:

Holms, A. Campbell. The Facts of Psychic Science. 1925. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Holonomics

Term coined by the Holonomics Group, founded in England in 1977, to denote "the unified and impartial study of the pattern of law and purpose of the universe as a whole," deriving from the ancient Greek words holon (whole) and nomos (law). Holonomics, a holistic theory, is considered "a new approach to fundamental knowledge, adopting a holistic mode of thinking and action, and aiming to coordinate and integrate the approaches of science, philosophy, religion, personal experience, ethics, and the arts, and to have direct applications to the human situation."

The Holonomics Group

Founded in November 1977 by Alan J. Mayne and others to help promote a unified approach to science, parascience, philosophy, religion, the arts, human development, and human affairs and to provide a forum for the discussion of ideas relevant to this theme. The group issued a newsletter, Holon, presenting concepts and principles of Holonomics, as well as notices of relevant societies, meetings, reports, and projects. The group maintained a register of interests and personal statements of members to assist them in contacting each other on related interests and experiences and to stimulate the exchange of ideas. A communication network allowed members and other interested individuals to arrange informal discussions and meetings.

The group also aimed to provide an environment that encourages relevant interdisciplinary research. Last known address: The Holonomics Group, c/o Alan Mayne, 63A Muswell Ave., London, N10 2EH, England.

Holt, Henry (1840–1926)

American publisher who encouraged the publication of books on psychic phenomena. Holt was born on January 3, 1840, in Baltimore, Maryland. He attended Yale University (B.S., 1862) and the Columbia University Law School (LL.B., 1864). In 1866 Holt became a partner in the publishing company of George P. Putnam, and later founded Henry Holt and Company. He also became a council member of the American Society for Psychical Research.

Holt's interest in psychic phenomena led him to promote research and to publish books on the subject, including his own work On the Cosmic Relations (2 vols., 1914). A revised edition was issued after World War I with additional matter on immortality, under the title The Cosmic Relations and Immortality (1918). He died February 13, 1926.

The company continued in existence, and in 1941 published the important one-volume edition of The Books of Charles Fort, dealing with bizarre, inexplicable, and mysterious phenomena. (See also Charles Fort)

Sources:

Holt, Henry. Calmire. New York: Macmillan, 1892.

———. Garrulities of an Octogenarian Editor. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1923.

———. Man and Man. N.p., 1905.

———. Man and Nature. N.p., 1892.

———. On the Cosmic Relations. 1914. Rev. ed. as The Cosmic Relations and Immortality. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1919.

Holy Coat of Treves

Sacred relic believed to be the seamless robe worn by Jesus Christ at the time of crucifixion. It is displayed in the cathedral at Treves, on the river Moselle in the Rhineland of Germany. The coat has been venerated by many thousands of pilgrims. For details of a similar but more famous reputed relic, see Turin Shroud.

Sources:

Clark, Richard J., S.J. The Holy Coat of Treves. London, 1892.

Holy Order of MANS

The Holy Order of MANS was an esoteric Christian group that grew out of the vision of Fr. Earl W. Blighton, who in 1930 had experienced a divine revelation in which he was told to work for the unity of science and Christian teachings. An electrical engineer, he ruminated on the idea for several decades before assuming the role of a clergyman and in 1960 called together a small group of people who would become the core of the new order. The group accepted the task of considering what could be done for humanity and the world in light of the 2,000 years of dogmatism that had been inflicted upon them. Out of their next years of discussions, the Holy Order of MANS was formally incorporated in 1968.

The Holy Order combined Christian teachings with insights from the Western esoteric tradition. The acronym MANS stood for "Mysterion, Agape, Nous, Sophia," Greek for mystery, love, mind, and wisdom. It considered itself a Pauline Christian group in that it adopted Paul's work as its own. Its motto was service to the creator through service to man. It considered the Master Jesus as the master of the order.

The group was modeled on Roman Catholic orders, except that both men and women were invited into membership. Prospective members were accepted following a three-month novitiate. They took their first vows and six months later they took their second vows. These were considered vows for life, which committed members to a list of humility, service, obedience, purity, and poverty. Members worked in regular jobs and in addition attend some 19 hours of class work. The money earned was turned over to the order and the order assumed responsibility for the members' needs. Members donned clerical clothing though only a few began training for the priesthood. An Outer Order of Discipleship was created by those who wanted to work with the group but felt unable to follow the full ordered list.

Fr. Blighton and the ruling Esoteric Council developed their teachings out of the Hermetic teachings, beginning with the foundational principle, "As above, so below," the statement of human correspondence with divine reality. The universe was seen as a manifestation of the great creative mind. Each individual built his/her own personal universe in the form of an atmosphere that surrounded him/her. This atmosphere is created in the individual's thinking and reacting, and serves as a protector and projection of the individual. Becoming master of their personal universe was a primary goal of members.

Order members believed that personal growth took place as one came into attunement with the harmonious vibrations of the universe. Attunement occurs primarily through meditation, which also leads to psychic unfoldment. As one unfolds, it was believed that he/she comes into contact with God, the golden force, and can use that force for various self-determined ends. The flow of the golden force was manifested in the active love.

Blighton established the Holy Order in San Francisco, California, but it soon spread to cities across the United States and into Canada and Europe. One center opened in Japan and seminaries were established in Chicago, Illinois, and Boston, Massachusetts. Blighton died in 1974 and left the leadership to his wife, Ruth Blighton, and to Rt. Rev. Andrew Rossi, the steward of the Esoteric Council. Rossi steadily pushed the order toward Eastern Orthodoxy and its rich mystical tradition. In 1986, he led the order to merge into the Greek Orthodox Missionary Diocese of Vasiloupolis, a small independent conservative Orthodox jurisdiction. With that merger, the Holy Order of MANS effectively ceased to exist as a separate organization.

While most of the members went into the Greek Church, not all agreed with that action, including Ruth Blighton. Over the next decade a number of former Holy Order members withdrew and several moved to found new organizations based on the former order beliefs and structures. These include the Science of Man (the name under which the Holy Order originally existed), now headed by Ruth Blighton, and the Gnostic Order of Christ.

Sources:

The Golden Force. N.p.: Holy Order of MANS, 1967.

Holy Order of MANS. San Francisco: Holy Order of MANS, n.d. An 18-page pamphlet.

Holy Order of RaHoorKhuit (H.O.O.R.)

The Holy Order of RaHoorKhuit (H.O.O.R.) is an outer magical order for teaching the thelemic magic as developed by Aleister Crowley (1875–1947) and initially presented in The Book of the Law, the brief volume channeled by Crowley in 1904. Though only founded in 1991, H.O.O.R. had been conceived as early as 1978. The order is headed by Ray Eales (b. 1958), who took the lead in its establishment.

According to Thelema (derived from the Greek word for will), each individual is a separate and unique person (a star) whose task is to discover his/her True Will (or destiny). Once having discovered their true course in life, individuals can do no other than follow it. Magic is the great tool for initially discovering and then realizing one's True Will. The order teaches a form of theurgy (magic) that it believes to be particularly effective in discovering one's True Will.

Thelema is antiauthoritarian. It places particular emphasis upon the individual's self discovery through listening to his/her own internal wisdom. Magic empowers individuals to make their own choices concerning both the direction that their life will take and with whom they will associate.

H.O.O.R. is an open membership organization. Members follow a graded initiatory system with progress measured by one's study of material and magical accomplishments. Members may also participate in lodges located near to their residence. The order is headquartered at Box 24691, Tampa, FL 33623. It may also be contacted through its website at http://hoor.org. HOOR is closely associated with the Abbey of Thelema headed by Gregory von Seewald in Connecticut.

Sources:

Preliminary Thoughts on H.O.O.R. Greenwich, Conn.: Holy Order of RaHoorKhuit, 1994.

Holy Rosicrucian Church

The Holy Rosicrucian Church was a small, short-lived Rosicrucian group that functioned briefly early in the twentieth century in the western United States. It was founded and headed by a man known as Sergius Rosenkruz. The church taught a method of liberation, the awakening of knowledge of unity with the One. As a means to liberation, Rosenkruz advocated a series of practices that included study, two daily baths, charitable works, the avoidance of frivolous activities, and meditation.

The order was headquartered in Los Angeles. It was associated with the Order of the Knights of the Golden Circle, which offered a series of ceremonies aimed at preparing members for either a favorable reincarnation or safety in the life beyond death. The church is known primarily through one pamphlet, Rosikrucinism, issued in 1915.

Sources:

Rosenkruz, Sergius. Rosikrucinism. Los Angeles: The Author, 1915.

Holzer, Hans W. (1920–   )

Popular writer on paranormal topics. Holzer was born on January 26, 1920, in Vienna, Austria, and later attended Vienna University, Columbia University, and the College of Applied Science, London (M.A. and Ph.D.). In 1945 he became a freelance writer. He was also a playwright and composer, a drama critic for the London Weekly Sporting Review (1949–60), and a television consultant. He was a member of the American Society for Psychical Research, the Society for Psychical Research, London, the British College for Psychic Science, the Center for Paranormal Studies (executive vice president), American Society for the Occult (research director), the Authors Guild, and the Dramatists Guild, and was research director of the New York Committee for the Investigation of Paranormal Occurrences.

Holzer wrote hundreds of newspaper and magazine articles on psychic phenomena, the occult, and related subjects. Through the 1970s he turned out numerous books on ghosts, the occult, and psychical topics that reached a popular audience despite continual complaints by reviewers and some people that his work contained numerous errors. At his peak he wrote three to four books a year. Several books in the 1970s helped promote the spread of witchcraft and neopaganism. In the early 1980s Holzer wrote two books that perpetuated the Amityville hoax, The Secret of Amityville and The Amityville Curse.

Sources:

Holzer, Hans. The Directory of the Occult. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1974.

———. The Great British Ghost Hunt. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1975.

———. The New Pagans. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

———. Pagans and Witches. New York: Manor Books, 1979.

———. The Prophets Speak. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971.

———. The Truth about Witchcraft. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1969.

———. Wicca: The Way of the Witches. New York: Manor Books, 1979.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Home, Daniel Dunglas (1833–1886)

The most notable physical medium in the history of Spiritualism. There was a certain mystery about Home's parentage. According to a footnote in his Incidents in My Life (1863), his father was a natural son of Alexander, the tenth earl of Home. Through his mother he was descended from a Highland family in which the traditional gift of second sight had been preserved. He was born on March 20, 1833, in Scotland.

Home was a sensitive, delicate child of a highly nervous temperament and of such weak health that he was not expected to live. Adopted by Mrs. McNeill Cook, a childless aunt, he passed his infancy at Portobello, Scotland, and was taken to the United States at the age of nine, growing up in Greeneville, Connecticut, and Troy, New York. It was noticed that he had keen powers of observation and a prodigious memory. He saw his first vision at age 13. A schoolfellow, Edwin, died in Greeneville and appeared to him in a bright cloud at night in Troy, thus keeping a childish promise with which they had bound themselves that he who died first would appear to the other. Home's second vision came four years later. It announced the death of his mother to the hour.

From that time on his thoughts turned more and more to the life beyond. One night he heard loud, unaccountable blows, the next morning a volley of raps. His aunt, remembering the Hydesville rappings that had occurred two years before, believed him to be possessed by the devil and called for a Congregationalist, a Baptist, and a Methodist minister for exorcism. This being unsuccessful, she turned him out of doors. Thenceforth, although he never asked for or received direct payment, Home appears to have lived on the hospitality of friends attracted by his curious gift.

The first scientist to investigate Home's phenomena was George Bush, a distinguished theologian and Oriental scholar from New York. The celebrated American poet William Cullen Bryant and a Professor Wells of Harvard University testified in a written statement to the reality of the phenomena. Professors Robert Hare and James Mapes, both famous chemists, and John Worth Edmonds of the United States Supreme Court owed much of their conversion to Spiritualism to this young man of frail health.

Home's first levitation occurred in the South Manchester house of Ward Cheney, an eminent American manufacturer. Strains of music were heard when no instrument was near.

Nobody understood at that time the part the physical organism plays in the production of the phenomena. The demands made on Home were very heavy and the drain of nervous energy excessive. His intended medical studies had to be broken off because of illness; a trip to Europe being advised, Home went to England in April 1855. He first stayed at Cox's Hotel in Jermyn Street, London, and was later the guest of J. S. Rymer, an Ealing solicitor.

The conversion of many of the later leaders of the Spiritualist movement in England was attributed to Home's phenomena. When these phenomena attracted public attention Home found himself in the midst of a press war. Among the first who asked Home to attend a séance was Lord Brougham, who came to the sitting with Sir David Brewster. Home was proud of the impression he made upon these two distinguished men and wrote about it to a friend in the United States. The letter was published in the United States and found its way to the London press, whereupon Brewster at once disclaimed all belief in Spiritualism and set down the phenomena to imposture. At the same time his statements in private supported Home, and they too found their way into the newspapers.

More lasting harm was done to Home's reputation by Robert Browning's poem, "Mr. Sludge, the Medium," which was generally taken to refer to Home. Browning and his wife, who accepted Spiritualism, had attended séances with Home. The poem was a malignant attack, since Browning had never claimed in public to have caught Home at trickery and in private admitted that imposture was out of the question. The reason for this vicious attack may have been jealousy over his wife's enthusiasm for Home's phenomena.

Other famous men of the day, such as Bulwer Lytton and William Thackeray, never spoke of their experiences in public. Thackeray made Home's acquaintance in the United States when he lectured there. Both there and in London Thackeray availed himself of every opportunity of sitting with Home. He admitted to have found a genuine mystery and warmly endorsed Robert Bell's anonymous article "Stranger than Fiction," published in the Cornhill Magazine, which Thackeray then edited.

Bell's account of a séance with Home starts with a quotation of a Dr. Treviranus to Coleridge: "I have seen what I would not have believed on your testimony, and what I cannot therefore, expect you to believe upon mine." Thackeray was bitterly attacked for the publication of the article and it was said that the Cornhill Magazine dropped considerably in circulation as a consequence.

In the early autumn of 1855 Home went to Florence to visit Thomas A. Trollope. His name and fame soon spread there, too. False rumors arose among the peasants that he was a necromancer and administered the sacraments of the church to toads in order to raise the dead by spells and incantations. This rumor may explain an attempt against his life on December 5, 1855, when a man ambushed him late at night and stabbed him three times with a dagger. Home had a narrow escape. The attacker was never arrested, but Home was warned the following month by Signor Lan Ducci, minister of the interior to the grand duke of Tuscany, of his sinister reputation among the populace.

About this time he was told by the spirits that his power would leave him for a year. In Home's state of seclusion from supernormal contact, Catholic influences found an easy inroad into his religious ideas. He converted to Catholicism and decided to enter a monastery. He was received by Pius IX and treated with favor. Home changed his mind, however, and left Italy for Paris, where, to the day from the announced suspension, his powers returned. The news reached the French court and Napoleon III summoned him to the Tuilleries.

The story of Home's séance with Napoleon was not made public. The curiosity of the press was aroused, however, when the first séance was followed by many others.

An account of the first séance in Home's autobiography, Incidents in My Life, tells how Napoleon followed every manifestation with keen and skeptical attention and satisfied himself by the closest scrutiny that neither deception nor delusion was possible. His and the empress's unspoken thoughts were replied to, and the empress was touched by a materialized hand that, from a defect in one of the fingers, she recognized to be the hand of her late father.

The second séance was more forceful. The room was shaken; heavy tables were lifted and then held down to the floor by an alteration of their weight. At the third séance a phantom hand appeared above the table, lifted a pencil, and wrote the single word Napoleon in the handwriting of Napoleon I.

Prince Murat later related to Home that the Duke de Morny told Napoleon III that he felt it a duty to contradict the report that the emperor believed in Spiritualism. The emperor replied, "Quite right, but you may add when you speak on the subject again that there is a difference between believing a thing and having proof of it, and that I am certain of what I have seen."

When, soon after these séances, Home left Paris for the United States, rumors were rife that his departure was compulsory. On his return to Paris, however, he was speedily summoned to Fontainebleau, where the king of Bavaria was interested in a séance. Home was in great power at the time and so much sought after that the Union Club, where fashionable sophisticates congregated, offered him 50,000 francs for a single séance. Home refused. A book, privately printed in France, recorded the strange experiences of the high society with Home's mediumship.

Earlier, in Italy, Home had been introduced to the king of Naples. The German emperor and the queen of Holland soon joined the ranks of the curious who were besieging Home with requests for séances.

While enjoying the benevolence of crowned heads and the highest members of the aristocracy, Home had to wage a desperate struggle against the scandalmongers. Fantastic stories began to circulate as soon as he left Paris, and while he was regaining his shattered health in Italy it was even rumored that he was in the prison of Mazas.

In Rome during the spring of 1858 Home was introduced to Count Koucheleff-Besborodka and his wife. Soon after he became engaged to Alexandrina de Kroll, the count's sister-in-law. The wedding took place in St. Petersburg. It was a great society affair. Count Alexis Tolstoy, the poet, and Count Bobrinsky, a chamberlain to the emperor, acted as groomsmen. Alexandre Dumas, a guest of Count Koucheleff-Besborodka, was one of the witnesses.

Many of Dumas's fantastic stories about spirits entering into inanimate objects were derived from Home's mediumship. In Russia, as well as in many other countries, rumors circulated regarding Home's mysterious powers. For instance, it was said that a great number of cats slept with him and by this means his body became so charged with electricity that he could produce raps at pleasure! In Paris the favorite story was that he carried a trained monkey in his pocket to twitch dresses and shake hands during the séances. From chloroforming and magnetizing the sitters, to possessing a magic lantern, to hiring secret police to obtain information for the sittings—every sort of wild explanation was attempted. Yet none of them could match the inspired inanity of one woman who was reported to have said, "Lor, sirs, it's easy enough, he only rubs himself all over with a gold pencil first."

From Home's marriage to Alexandrina de Kroll a son was born. Shortly after Home returned to England, friends tried to bring about a meeting between him and Michael Faraday, the famous scientist and proponent of the involuntary muscular action theory to explain table movement. As the Morning Star reported, Faraday was not satisfied with demanding an open and complete examination, but wished Home to acknowledge that the phenomena, however produced, were ridiculous and contemptible. Thereafter, the idea of giving him a sitting was abandoned.

Home derived more satisfaction from his experiences with Dr. Ashburner, a royal physician, and John Elliotson, sometime president of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London, a character study of whom, as "Dr. Goodenough," was drawn by Thackeray in Pendennis, and to whom the work was dedicated. When Ashburner became a believer in Spiritualism, Elliotson, who was one of the hardest materialists, became estranged from him and publicly attacked him for his folly. A few years later, however, Home and Elliotson met in Dieppe. The result was a séance, a strict investigation, and the conversion of Elliotson. On his return to London he hastened to seek reconciliation with Ashburner and publicly declared that he was satisfied of the reality of the phenomena and that they were tending to revolutionize his thoughts and feelings.

Home's phenomena also radically changed Robert Chambers, coauthor, with Leitch Ritchie, of the anonymous Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation (1844), which startled the public by its outspoken skepticism. Chambers attended the séance Robert Bell wrote about in Cornhill Magazine. He was too afraid of losing his reputation to make a public statement, although he allegedly received startling evidence of continued personal identity from his deceased father and daughter. Nevertheless, Chambers anonymously wrote the preface to Home's autobiography in 1862. Eight years later, during the Lyon-Home trial, he abandoned his attitude of reserve and gave an affidavit in Home's favor.

For a time during 1859 to 1860, Home gave frequent joint séances with the American medium J. R. M. Squire, an editor of the Boston Banner of Light. Squire was introduced to London society under Home's auspices and later in the year he was presented at court.

Home's wife died in July 1862. Six months later his book Incidents in My Life was published. It attracted widespread notice in the press. The Morning Herald remarked, "We must note also the strangeness of the fact that Mr. Home has never been detected, if indeed he is an imposter." The book sold very well and a second edition was published in a few months. This, however, did not relieve the money problems Home began to experience. Relatives disputed his right of inheritance to the fortune of his wife, and, looking about for a means of livelihood, he decided to develop his keen artistic perception. He hoped to become a sculptor and went to Rome to study.

The papal government, however, had not forgiven the breaking of his promise to enter a monastery. In January 1864 he was summoned before the chief of the Roman police and ordered, on the grounds of "sorcery," to leave Rome within three days. Home claimed the protection of the English consul, and the order of expulsion was suspended on his promise that, during his stay in Rome, he would have no séance and would avoid—as much as possible—all conversations about Spiritualism. Because the manifestations were beyond his control, however, he was soon ordered to quit the papal territory. He left for Naples, where he was received by Prince Humbert, and returned in April to London to demand diplomatic representations on the subject of his expulsion. There was a debate in the House of Commons, but no representation was agreed upon.

Soon after, Home made another trip to the United States, hoping to achieve success as a reader because he had talent as a stage reciter. His public rendering of Henry Howard Brownell's poems was very well received; on returning to Europe he continued this new career with a lecture on Spiritualism in London.

His health, however, could not stand the strain. Friends came to the rescue with the post of residential secretary at the foundation of the Spiritual Athenaeum, a kind of headquarters for London Spiritualists.

Then came the disastrous proposition of Jane Lyon, a wealthy widow, that she adopt Home, with the intention of securing his financial stability. Lyon took a fancy to Home and proposed to adopt him if he added her name to his own, in which case she was prepared to give him substantial wealth. Home assented and changed his name to Home-Lyon. Lyon transferred £60,000 to Home's account and drew up a will in his favor. Later she repented her action and sued him for the recovery of her money on the basis that she was influenced by spirit communications coming through Home from her late husband.

While the suit was in progress, an attempt was made against Home's life. He parried the blow of the assassin's stiletto with his hand, which was pierced. The fantastic stories that were circulated around this incident are best illustrated by a reminiscence in the New York World on the report of his death, in which the paper stated that Lyon had a false left hand and Home actually made her believe that by mediumistic power he could create life in the artificial limb.

Lord Adare, in his privately published Experiences in Spiritualism with D.D. Home (1869), covers most of Home's work for the period 1867 to 1869, including some 80 séances. In 1869 the London Dialectical Society appointed a committee for the investigation of Spiritualistic phenomena. The committee, before which Home appeared, had some of the most skeptical members of the society on its list, including atheist spokesman Charles Bradlaugh. Four séances were held, but because of Home's illness the manifestations did not extend beyond slight raps and movements of the table. The committee reported that nothing material had occurred, but added that "during the inquiry Mr. Home afforded every facility for examination."

In May 1871 Sir William Crookes began an investigation of Home and reached a very favorable opinion of what he saw. Before this investigation other important events took place in Home's life. He won the lawsuit for his deceased wife's fortune, became engaged to an aristocratic lady of wealth, and gave several séances in the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg. During a lecture on Spiritualism he referred to some particulars of a séance held in the presence of a distinguished professor at the University of St. Petersburg. At the end of the lecture a Professor Boutlerof rose from his place and announced that he was the investigator to whom Home had referred. This dramatic scene was followed by an investigation by a committee from the university. The results were negative, since Home's powers were allegedly at an ebb because of recurring illness.

In 1872 Home published the second series of his Incidents in My Life, including the principal affidavits in the Lyon lawsuit, and in 1873 he published his Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism. His opinions on fraudulent mediumship and his protest against holding séances in the dark were bitterly resented by other mediums. They said that he had little experience of the powers of others.

Kate Fox Jencken, of the Fox sisters, was the only medium with whom he was friendly. On a few occasions he sat jointly with William Stainton Moses. After the first such sitting, on December 22, 1872, Moses wrote in his notebook:

"Mr. D. D. Home is a striking-looking man. His head is a good one. He shaves his face with the exception of a moustache, and his hair is bushy and curly. He gives me the impression of an honest, good person whose intellect is not of high order. I had some talk with him, and the impression that I have formed of his intellectual ability is not high. He resolutely refuses to believe in anything that he has not seen for himself. For instance, he refuses to believe in the passage of matter through matter, and when pressed concludes the argument by saying 'I have never seen it.' He has seen the ring test, but oddly enough, does not see how it bears on the question. He accepts the theory of the return in rare instances of the departed, but believes with me that most of the manifestations proceed from a low order of spirits who hover near the earth sphere. He does not believe in Mrs. Guppy's passage through matter, nor in her honesty. He thinks that regular manifestations are not possible. Consequently he disbelieves in public mediums generally. He said he was thankful to know that his mantle had fallen on me, and urged me to prosecute the inquiry and defend the faith. He is a thoroughly good, honest, weak and very vain man, with little intellect, and no ability to argue, or defend his faith."

Home slowly broke with nearly all of his friends and spent most of his time on the Continent. In 1876 his death was falsely reported in the French press. He lived in declining health for ten more years and died on June 21, 1886. His grave is at St. Germain, Paris, and his tombstone is inscribed "To another discerning of Spirits." In the Canongate of Edinburgh there is a fountain erected to his memory. It is not known who erected it nor why it was placed opposite the Canongate Parish Church.

Evaluating Home's Work

Home demonstrated every known physical phenomenon of Spiritualism except apports and direct voice. He even possessed a latent faculty of direct voice. Faint whisperings were sometimes heard in his séances, but only of single words. He was mostly in a normal state during the phenomena but went into trance during the fire test, elongations, and occasionally during levitations.

The spirit teachings delivered through Home's mouth by his control were sometimes absurd. The control, criticizing the knowledge of scientists, said that the sun was covered with beautiful vegetation and was full of organic life. When Lord Adare asked, "Is not the sun hot?" the control answered "No, the sun is cold; the heat is produced and transmitted to the earth by the rays of light passing through various atmospheres."

Lord Adare, then earl of Dunraven, describes Home's character in the 1924 edition of Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home:

"He had the defects of an emotional character, with vanity highly developed (perhaps wisely to enable him to hold his own against the ridicule and obloquy that was then poured out upon spiritualism and everyone connected with it). He was liable to fits of great depression and to nervous crisis difficult at first to understand; but he was withal of a simple, kindly, humorous, lovable disposition that appealed to me. . . . He never took money for séances, and séances failed as often as not. He was proud of his gift but not happy in it. He could not control it and it placed him sometimes in very unpleasant positions. I think he would have been pleased to have been relieved of it, but I believe he was subject to these manifestations as long as he lived."

Sir William Crookes summed up his opinion as follows:

"During the whole of my knowledge of D. D. Home, extending for several years, I never once saw the slightest occurrence that would make me suspicious that he was attempting to play tricks. He was scrupulously sensitive on this point, and never felt hurt at anyone taking precautions against deception. . . . To those who knew him Home was one of the most lovable of men and his perfect genuineness and uprightness were beyond suspicion. . . ."

Frank Podmore, a most skeptical psychical researcher, said of Home:

"A remarkable testimony to Home's ability whether as medium or simply as conjurer, is the position which he succeeded in maintaining in society at this time [1861] and indeed throughout his later life, and the respectful treatment accorded to him by many leading organs of the Press. No money was ever taken by him as the price of a sitting; and he seemed to have had the entree to some of the most aristocratic circles in Europe. He was welcomed in the houses of our own and of foreign nobility, was a frequent guest at the Tuilleries, and had been received by the King of Prussia and the Czar. So strong, indeed, was his position that he was able to compel an ample apology from a gentleman who had publicly expressed doubts of his mediumistic performance (Capt. Noble in the Sussex Advertiser of March 23, 1864) and to publish a violent and spiteful attack upon Browning on the occasion of the publication of Sludge (Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 315). His expulsion from Rome in 1864 on the charge of sorcery gave to Home for the time an international importance."

Podmore added: "Home was never publicly exposed as an imposter; there is no evidence of any weight that he was even privately detected in trickery."

Between the publication of his Modern Spiritualism in 1902 and The Newer Spiritualism in 1910, Podmore nevertheless succeeded in unearthing a single piece of so-called evidence of imposture in a letter from a Mr. Merrifield, dated August 1855 and printed in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (1903), in which the writer claims to have noticed that the medium's body or shoulder sank or rose in concordance with the movements of a spirit hand and to have seen afterward "the whole connection between the medium's shoulder and arm and the spirit hand dressed out on the end of his own." This highly speculative statement was sufficient for Podmore to proceed to talk of Home as a practiced conjurer who dictated his own conditions in the experiments and produced his feats by trickery. The only admission Podmore made was that "we don't quite see how some of the things were done and we leave the subject with an almost painful sense of bewilderment."

Long after Home's death various writers speculated on how Home's feats might have been achieved by trickery, imputing that there must have been trickery. It is generally conceded that Home was never detected in trickery.

Attempts were also made to discredit Home's unfortunate association with Jane Lyon and to suggest that Home tried to take advantage of a wealthy widow. But the evidence suggests that Home was pressured by a foolish and unstable woman. Her claim that Home used undue influence "from the spirit world" is refuted by her transferring allegiance to a Miss Nicholls, another medium, at the time she reneged on her commitment to Home. It was also claimed that Lyon wanted Home to be "something nearer than an adopted son," and her change of heart stemmed from his repulsing her advances.

As far as Browning's spiteful attack in "Mr. Sludge, the Medium" is concerned, the veteran psychical researcher E. J. Dingwall suggests in his book Some Human Oddities (1947) that Home might have given the impression of latent homosexual tendencies, which might have incensed Browning.

Home remains an enigma. He was never caught in fraud but accomplished things far beyond that which even contemporary scientific opinion admits are possible. He operated at a time when numerous others where doing similar things and were caught in fraud, often after successfully deceiving many learned and seemingly competent observers. There are two possibilities: he was either a very unusual person, capable of doing the phenomenal things reported of him, or he was one of the most clever frauds in the history of humanity. We may never know which one he was.

Sources:

Adare, Viscount. Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home. U.K.: Privately printed, 1869. Reprint, London: Society for Psychical Research, 1924.

Alexander, Patrick P. Spiritualism: A Narrative with a Discussion. Edinburgh, Scotland, 1871.

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett. Letters to her Sister, 1846–1859. Edited by Laura Huxley. London: John Murray, 1929. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1930.

Burton, Jean. Heyday of a Wizard: Daniel Home the Medium. London: George G. Harrap, 1948.

Chevalier, J. C. Experiments in Spiritualism; or, The Adjuration of Spirits, by a late member of Mr. Home's Spiritual Athenaeum. London, 1867.

Cox, Edward W. Spiritualism Answered by Science. London, 1871.

Crookes, William. Research in the Phenomena of Spiritualism. London: J. Burns, 1874. Reprint, London and Manchester, 1926.

Dingwall, E. J. Some Human Oddities. London: Home and Van Thal, 1947. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Gordon, Mrs. M. M. The Home Life of Sir David Brewster. Edinburgh, Scotland, 1869, 1870.

Home, D. D. Incidents in My Life. London: Longman, Green, 1863. 2nd series. New York: A. K. Butts, 1874. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Jenkins, Elizabeth. The Shadow and the Light: A Defence of Daniel Dunglas Home, the Medium. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1982.

Medhurst, R. G., ed. Crookes and the Spirit World. London: Souvenir Press; New York; Taplinger, 1972.

Molloy, J. Fitzgerald. The Romance of Royalty. London, 1904.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Porter, Katherine H. Through a Glass Darkly: Spiritualism in the Browning Circle. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1958.

Rymer, J. Snaith. "Spirit Manifestations." A lecture presented in London, 1857.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Verax [J. J. Garth Wilkinson]. Evenings with Mr. Hume and the Spirits. Keighley, England, 1855.

Wyndham, Horace. Mr. Sludge: The Medium. London: G. Bles, 1937.

Home Temple Movement

The Home Temple Movement emerged in the 1990s within the esoteric/theosophical tradition as an alternative to the standard Liberal Catholic Church format of institutional church and priesthood. The Home Temple Movement is similar to the house church movement that has existed for several decades among Protestants. Cofounders of the movement are Louis S. Keizer and his wife Willa Esterson Keizer, both bishops of the Independent Church of Antioch. Louis Keizer left the Episcopal Church in 1975 and was consecrated by Archbishop Adrian Spruit of the Church of Antioch. He subsequently exchanged consecrations with Bishop George Boyer of the Sanctuary of the Gnosis in London. Together, they founded the International Federation of Gnostic Bishops.

Willa Esterton Keizer is a homeopathist and hypnotherapist. She studied with Indonesian martial arts master Bapak Subur Rahadja and became an instructor and lineage holder in his White Crane Association. She was consecrated as a bishop by her husband in 1997.

As leaders of the Home Temple Movement, the Keizers have developed a correspondence training program to assist men and women in becoming priests for a home-based spiritual ministry. The course integrates information on the spiritual teachings of Jesus drawn from the mystical, esoteric, and Gnostic writings of the centuries with a program of spiritual exercises and communication with experienced Gnostic leaders around the world. Much of the teaching material has been placed on videotapes or is made available online for use by the students. Instructions are also provided for those who wish to progress beyond the priesthood to the episcopacy. Students in the San Francisco Bay area may also take advantage of the classes that Bishop Keizer teaches at the University of California-Santa Cruz Extension program on its Cupertino campus.

The Home Temple program is supplemented with the training offered by the Temple of the Holy Grail with which the Keizers cooperate. The Temple offers training in a system of theurgy. The Home Temple Movement may be contacted c/o the Keizers at P.O. Box 3816, Santa Cruz, CA 95062. It has a website at http://www.hometemple.org/.

Sources:

Home Temple Movement. http://www.hometemple.org/. May 16, 2000.

Homunculus

An artificial man supposedly made by the alchemists, and especially by Paracelsus. To manufacture one, Paracelsus stated that the needed spagyric (a term probably coined by Paracelsus implying an alchemical process using semen) substances should be sealed in a glass vial and placed in horse dung to digest for 40 days. At the end of this time something will begin to live and move in the bottle. This is sometimes a man, said Paracelsus, but a man who has no body and is transparent.

Nevertheless, he exists, and nothing remains but to bring him up—which is not more difficult than making him. This may be accomplished by feeding him daily (over a period of 40 weeks, and without extricating him from his dung hill) with the arcanum of human blood. At the end of this time there should be a living child, having every member as well proportioned as any infant born of a woman. He will be much smaller than an ordinary child, though, and his physical education will require more care and attention.

Early in the twentieth century, magician Aleister Crowley wrote a novel that deals with the production of a kind of homunculus he terms a Moonchild, the name under which the novel was eventually published. Crowley wrote of a magic rite to induce a particular type of spirit to incarnate in an embryo, which a woman would then carry until birth.

During the 1940s, Jack Parsons, head of the OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis) lodge in Pasadena, California, carried out this sexual ritual with Marjorie Cameron and a third person who acted as a seer for the process. Crowley, angered by reports of what Parsons had done, ordered an investigation of the lodge, by which time the operation had been completed.

Sources:

King, Francis. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Hone, Margaret (1892–1969)

British astrologer, born October 2, 1892. Hone was associated with the Astrological Lodge of the Theosophical Society (now the Astrological Lodge of London) in the 1930s and was associated with Charles E. O. Carter for many years. She assisted him in founding the Faculty of Astrological Studies (FAS) in 1948 and in 1954 succeeded him as dean, a post she held for the rest of her life. She also wrote The Modern Textbook of Astrology (1951), adopted as the basic text by the FAS. It has now become a widely used textbook in astrology throughout the English-speaking world. She followed it with a companion volume, Applied Astrology, in 1953.

Sources:

Hone, Margaret. Applied Astrology. London: L. N. Fowler, 1953.

———. The Modern Textbook of Astrology. Rev. ed., London: L. N. Fowler, 1967.

Honorton, Charles (1946–1992)

Parapsychologist. Born at Deer River, Minnesota, in 1946, Honorton studied at the University of Minnesota from 1965 to 1966, during which time he was research coordinator for the Minnesota Society for Psychic Research. In 1966 he became a research fellow at the Institute for Parapsychology, Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man, and the following year was named a senior research associate at the Maimonides Medical Center Dream Laboratory. A short time later he became the director of research and joined with Stanley Krippner and Montague Ullman in receiving the first federal grant for research in parapsychology, from the Public Health Service, National Institute of Mental Health. In 1979 Honorton became director of the Psychophysical Research Laboratories in Princeton, New Jersey.

Honorton has written widely on parapsychological subjects but is best known for his experiments with the Ganzfeld setting, a procedure that establishes an environment of reduced sensory alertness. (Strong sensory input is believed to impede ESP.) Honorton has argued that the Ganzfeld procedure is the most effective way to produce the kind of repeated ESP results parapsychology seeks. The Parapsychology Association awarded Honorton its Exceptional Contribution Award in 1988. In 1990 however, the published results of extensive tests of an automated nature met with continued criticism by Dr. Ray Hyman.

Honorton was a longtime member of the Parapsychological Association. He served on its council and held the offices of secretary, vice president, and president (1975). He was also a member of the Board of Trustees of the American Society for Psychical Research. Honorton died in 1992.

Sources:

Honorton, Charles. "Has Science Developed the Competence to Confront Claims of the Paranormal?" In Research in Parapsychology 1975, edited by J. D. Morris, W. G. Roll, and R. L. Morris. New York: Parapsychological Association, 1976.

———. "Meta-Analysis of Psi Ganzfield Research: A Response to Hyman. Journal of Parapsychology 49 (1981).

———. "Psi-Mediated Imagery and Ideation in an Experimental Procedure for Regulating Perceptual Input." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 68 (1974).

———. "Separation of High- and Low-Scoring ESP Subjects Through Hypnotic Preparation." Journal of Parapsychology 28 (1964).

———. "Significant Factors in Hypnotically-Induced Clairvoyant Dreams." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 66 (1972).

———. "State of Awareness Factors in Psi Activation." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 68 (1974).

Hoodoo Sea

One of many terms for an area of the western Atlantic between Bermuda and Florida where ships and planes are said to have vanished without a trace. (See Bermuda Triangle)

Hooper, T. d'Aute (ca. 1910)

Extraordinary British medium of the early twentieth century. Although a busy physician in Birmingham, England, Hooper was also credited with a wide range of psychic phenomena, physical and mental.

Hooper's Indian control, "Segaske" (Rising Sun), produced scents and apports. An Indian fakir demonstrated the fire test, made articles appear and vanish in daylight, and spoke in Hindustani. A deceased Chicago preacher, calling himself "Ajax," and many other frequent spirit visitors produced direct voice manifestations and psychic photography.

In the anonymously published Spirit Psychometry and Trance Communications by Unseen Agencies through a Welsh Woman and Dr. T. d'Aute Hooper (1914) the medium recorded important investigations in psychometry.

Sources:

Henslow, George. The Proofs of the Truths of Spiritualism. London: K. Paul, Trench, Trubner; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1919.

Hope, William (1863–1933)

A carpenter of Crewe, England, and famous spirit photographer, whose abilities were discovered accidentally about 1905. Hope and a friend photographed each other on a Saturday afternoon. The plate that Hope exposed showed an extra figure, a transparent woman, behind whom a brick wall was visible. It was the sister of Hope's comrade, dead for many years. With the help of a Mr. Buxton, the organist at the Spiritualist Hall at Crewe, a circle of six friends was formed to sit for spirit photography.

Fearful of being accused by devout Catholics of being in league with the devil, the circle destroyed all the original negatives until Archdeacon Thomas Colley came on the scene. He tested Hope's powers, endorsed them, and gave him his first stand camera, which Hope refused to give up long after it had become old-fashioned, its box battered and its leg broken.

The first controversy about Hope and his psychic photographs arose in 1908 in connection with Colley's first sitting. He recognized his mother in the psychic "extra." Hope thought it was more like a picture he had copied two years earlier. A Mrs. Spencer, of Nantwich, recognized her grandmother in the image. Hope informed Colley of his mistake. Colley said it was madness to think that a man did not know his own mother and advertised in the Leamington paper asking all who remembered his mother to meet him at the rectory. Eighteen persons selected the photograph from a group of several others and testified in writing that the picture was a portrait of the late Mrs. Colley, who had never been photographed.

The second case of public controversy arose in 1922 and was, on the surface, damning for Hope. In a report published in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 20, pp. 271–283), Hope was accused of imposture by Harry Price. The accusations were later published in a sixpenny pamphlet. The basis of the revelation was that Price, in a sitting at the British College of Psychic Science, caught Hope in the act of replacing the dark slide holding the exposed plates with another. Price also said that Hope handed him two negatives (one of which contained a psychic extra) that did not bear the secret mark of the Imperial Dry Plate Company (impressed on the packet of film by X-rays) and that were different in color and thickness from the original plates.

Subsequent investigation proved that the counteraccusation by Spiritualists claiming an organized conspiracy against Hope deserved examination. The wrapper of the packet was found, and it bore marks of tampering. Moreover, one of the original marked plates was returned anonymously and undeveloped to the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) a week after the experiment and three weeks before the revelation. On being developed, it showed an image. Since the packet of marked plates had been lying about for four weeks in the office of SPR it was open to tampering and substitution. It was also likely, in the view of the Hope apologists, that the missing plate was sent back out of pure mischief.

Immediately after the accusation of fraud Hope offered new sittings and declared his willingness to submit to stringent tests. The offer was refused. Harry Price, however, signed a statement to the effect that the test of February 24, 1922, "does not rule out the possibility that Hope has other than normal means."

Many prominent people supported Hope. For example, Sir William Crookes gave an authorized interview published in the Christian Commonwealth on December 4, 1918. On his own marked plates, under his own conditions, Crookes obtained a likeness of his wife different from any he possessed. Sir William Barrett claims to have received with Hope "indubitable evidence of supernormal photography" in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 34, 1924). After the exposure by Harry Price, Allerton F. Cushman of Washington also claimed to have obtained psychic extras on his own plates, similarly marked by the Imperial Dry Plate Company, and also on plates purchased before the sitting by Hereward Carrington.

Sir Oliver Lodge, however, was emphatic concerning a test of his own with a sealed packet sent to Hope: "I have not the slightest doubt that the envelope including the plates had been opened." The most signifcant charges of fraud were advanced by Fred Barlow and Major W. Rampling Rose in an article in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 41, 1933). Previously, on January 21, 1921, in Budget No. 58 of the Society for the Study of Supernormal Pictures, Barlow had asserted that he "got results with Mr. Hope here in my own home under conditions where fraud was absolutely impossible. I have loaded my dark slides in Birmingham and taken them to Crewe with my own camera and apparatus, have carried out the whole of the operation myself (even to the taking of the photograph) and have secured supernormal results."

Then, in 1923, Barlow had associated with Sir Arthur Conan Doyle in the publication of The Case for Spirit Photography (1923), a book written in answer to the Hope exposure. At that time, he says, he could not "get away from the fact that many of these photographic effects are produced by discarnate intelligences."

But in 1933 Barlow asserted that "a further ten years of careful continuous experimenting has enabled me to say quite definitely that I was mistaken. During the whole of this period no single instance has occurred, in my experience, that would in any way suggest that Hope has genuine gifts" (Light, April 14, 1933).

Hope never commercialized his gift. He charged about 50 cents for a dozen prints. This was calculated on the basis of his hourly earnings as a carpenter. He was very devout—almost fanatical—and relied blindly on the advice of his spirit guides. "During all his career as a medium," writes David Gow in Light, March 17, 1933, "he had become so accustomed to accusation and abuse that he had grown case-hardened. His attitude seemed to be that, knowing himself to be honest, it did not matter how many people thought otherwise. I found, too, that in his almost cynical indifference, he was given to playing tricks on skeptical inquirers by pretending to cheat and then boasting that he had scored over his enemies in that way. . . . Mr. Hope, in my view, was a genuine medium, but of a type of mentality which might easily lead to the opposite conclusion on the part of an unsympathetic observer."

During his lifetime Hope obtained more than 2,500 claimed spirit photographs. He died March 7, 1933.

Hopedale Community

A Spiritualist community founded by Rev. Adin Ballou (1828–1886) in 1841 near Milford, Massachusetts. From 1850 on, this religious and socialistic community was the scene of various spirit manifestations and helped spread Spiritualism in the United States. Ballou proclaimed his new faith in Modern Spirit Manifestations, published in 1852, the year in which he first received communications from his deceased son.

Hopedale was a remarkable experiment in social engineering, a community with admirable ideals of religious, moral, and social cooperation: total abstinence, opposition to slavery, war, and violence; it was dedicated to liberty, equality, and fraternity. It flourished until 1857 but eventually failed through its structure as a joint stock company.

Ballou's presidency was superseded by that of E. D. Draper, an enterprising businessman who, with his brother, made successful investments outside the community. As the community capital dwindled, Draper bought up three quarters of the joint stock, obtaining legal control. He expressed dissatisfaction with the management of the community, and some time around 1858 informed Ballou that the community must come to an end. With the stipulation that Draper would pay off its debts, the Hopedale experiment was terminated.

Sources:

Holloway, Mark. Heavens on Earth: Utopian Communities in America, 1680–1880. London: Turnstile Press, 1951.

Noyes, John Humphrey. History of American Socialisms. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1870. Reprinted as Strange Cults and Utopias of 19th-century America. New York: Dover Publications, 1966.

Perry, Lewis. "Adin Ballou's Hopedale Community and the Theology of Anti-slavery." Church History 39 (September 1970): 372–389.

Hope Diamond

Famous precious stone with a reputation of bringing disaster to its owners. The Hope diamond is one of the largest colored diamonds known, a vivid blue and weighing 44.4 carats. It is believed to have been cut from an even larger stone of more than 67 carats. The name is derived from Henry Thomas Hope, a former owner who bought it for £18,000.

Fact and legend are inextricably tangled in the story of this unlucky diamond. The known history begins in the seventeenth century with the explorer Jean Baptiste Tavernier (1605–1689), who is reputed to have acquired the stone from the Indian mines of Killur, Golconda, around 1642. He sold the stone to Louis XIV in 1668 and subsequently lost all his money through his son's speculations.

The diamond was worn by Madame de Montespan at a court ball, and she fell from favor soon afterward. From this time on, the diamond had a sinister reputation. It was worn by Marie Antoinette, who had misfortune in connection with diamonds when the celebrated Affair of the Diamond Necklace preceded the French Revolution.

Princess de Lamballe, who was lent the diamond, was executed on the guillotine and her head was paraded on a pike under the windows of the prison in which Louis XVI and his family were imprisoned.

The diamond disappeared for 30 years, reappearing in the possession of a Dutch lapidary named Fals. As in the case of Tavernier, a son brought Fals misfortune. He stole the diamond and left his father to die in poverty. The son entrusted the diamond to a Frenchman named Beaulieu, who committed suicide after selling it to London dealer Daniel Eliason, who died under mysterious circumstances. It was then that the diamond was acquired by Henry Thomas Hope, and it remained in the Hope family for 70 years.

Lord Francis Hope, last of the line, married an actress but divorced her and lost all his money. The diamond disappeared for a time, but was later acquired by an American who went bankrupt, a Russian who was stabbed, and a French dealer who committed suicide. A Greek merchant sold it to Abdul Hamid II, sultan of Turkey, who lost his throne. In 1908 the diamond was bought by Habib Bey for £80,000 but was auctioned the following year at a fifth of the price.

The diamond got to the United States through a New York jeweler who was said to have arranged a sale to a man who was a passenger on the ill-fated Titanic.

The next owner was a millionaire named McLean. His wife, Evalyn, published a book, Father Struck It Rich (1938), in which she describes the misfortunes that befell the family in spite of having the diamond blessed by a priest.

The diamond was finally bought by Harry Winston, a jeweler in New York. He displayed it for several years and donated it in November 1958 to the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. Interestingly enough, Winston sent it through the U.S. mail system and it arrived without incident at the Smithsonian.

Sources:

Cohen, Daniel. Encyclopedia of the Strange. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1985.

Hopkins, Budd (1931–)

Budd Hopkins, the major exponent of the importance of the abduction phenomenon within ufology, was born June 15, 1931, in Wheeling, West Virginia. He graduated from Oberlin College in 1953 and moved to New York City, where he began a successful career as an artist. His paintings now hang in many outstanding museums, and he has been a frequent contributor to art magazines and an art lecturer at colleges.

Hopkins became interested in UFOs in 1964 when he and two other people observed for several minutes a disc flying in broad daylight. He joined the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomenona and began reading about ufology. He published an initial article in 1975 in the Village Voice on the case of a UFO landing in New Jersey. This led to his receiving additional reports, and he began studying incidents of claimed UFO contact with other UFO investigators and several psychologists. His first book, Missing Time: A Documented Study of UFO Abductions, published in 1981, placed the issue of abductions before the ufological community. He had become convinced by the sheer number of people who reported such abductions; he found it entirely credible that their stories of being abducted by visitants from outer space were accounts of actual events.

As described by Hopkins, many people, now in their middle years, have experienced one or more abductions earlier in their lives, the first occurrence often happening in childhood. These early abductions have been forgotten and are recovered only through hypnosis or dream recall techniques over a period of time. These abductions occurred for the purpose of medical experimentation and study. The victim of an abduction frequently reports a "cell sampling," in which tissue is removed and he or she is left with an identifying scar. The aim of the abductions might be to produce a hybrid alien-human race, considering that human female abductees supposedly have become pregnant as a result of their encounters.

Hopkins's first book not only sparked popular interest in the field but led to further research by ufologists that tended to confirm Hopkins's data, the most important being that of T. Eddie Bullard, a folklorist who conducted a comparative study of abduction stories and confirmed their high level of similarity in spite of the abductees' lack of contact with each other. By the time Hopkins published his second book, Intruders: The Incredible Visitations at Copley Woods (1987), abductions had become the central focus of ufology. He has found strong support from such leading UFO figures as David M. Jacobs, and his work has prompted studies by psychiatrists such as Rima E. Laibow (who founded an organization, Treatment and Research on Experienced Anomalous Trauma, to study abductions). Popular attention to Hopkins's work was provided by author Whitley Strieber, whose 1987 account of his own abduction, Communion, became a best seller and was made into a movie.

Hopkins has not, of course, been without his critics. Included are milder critics such as ufologist Michael D. Swords, who argued that UFO abduction accounts are shield fantasies, which hide traumatic experiences from the abductee's earlier life that are too painful to discuss directly. Hopkins' third book Witnessed recounts people's abduction stories, which continues to be a controversial subject in ufology.

Sources:

Hopkins, Budd. Intruders: The Incredible Visitations at Copley Woods. New York: Random House, 1987.

———. Missing Time: A Documented Study of UFO Abductions. New York: Richard Marek, 1981.

———. Witnessed: The True Story of the Brooklyn Bridge UFO Abductions. New York: Pocket Books, 1996.

Hopkins, Emma Curtis (1849–1925)

Emma Curtis Hopkins, founder of the popular metaphysical movement known as New Thought, was born September 2, 1849, in Killingly, Connecticut, of an old New England family. She received a good education and became a schoolteacher. Attracted by reading Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, the Christian Science textbook, she traveled to Boston in 1883 to attend a class under Mary Baker Eddy. She established herself as a practitioner and the following year was made editor of the Christian Science Journal. However, by fall 1885, Hopkins and Eddy were in conflict over several of Hopkins's ideas, including her opinion that Christian Science was not so much a new revelation as it was a new expression of a perennial philosophy that had been stated many times previously.

Late in 1885 Hopkins moved to Chicago and established an independent Christian Science practitioner's office. The next year, in spite of her never having taken the advanced course under Eddy, Hopkins began to teach classes, and her students began establishing offices as practitioners. Hopkins also began to hold Sunday services at what became known as the Hopkins Metaphysical Institute. Her students were organized into an association similar to that joined by Eddy's students. Students were attracted to her from around the country, and Hopkins traveled to San Francisco and New York in 1887 to teach. By the end of 1887, branches of her institute could be found across the United States from Maine to California. As the work matured, the institute in Chicago was reorganized as the Christian Science Theological Seminary.

Hopkins began her work as an independent Christian Science practitioner and teacher. Her several original deviations from Eddy's thought led to the development of her own system, which centered upon mysticism and dropped many particularly Christian elements. She was intensely antiorganization, a stance held by many who had come out of the very hierarchically organized Church of Christ, Scientist. Over the years she attracted a number of outstanding students, whom she encouraged to establish independent movements. As independent Christian Science matured into New Thought, these movements founded by her students became the leading organizations of New Thought. Among her students were Malinda Cramer (founder of Divine Science); Charles and Myrtle Fillmore (founders of the Unity School of Christianity); Annie Rix Militz (founder of the Homes of Truth); and Ernest Holmes (founder of Religious Science).

After a decade in Chicago as an elder of a school and church, Hopkins turned the work over to her students and in 1894 retired to New York City and lived quietly as a private tutor to those who wished to study with her one-on-one. During this period of her life she wrote her mature work, High Mysticism, which she circulated informally to her students then published as a series of booklets and as a book.

Because of her withdrawal from the public spotlight and the desire of several of the founders of the International New Thought Alliance to project the image that New Thought was not the offshoot of Christian Science, Hopkins's role was largely pushed aside. Phineas Parkhurst Quimby, who had taught Mary Baker Eddy for a period, was assigned the role of founder of New Thought, in spite of his lack of association with the movement. Only in the 1980s was Hopkins's role rediscovered and her place in New Thought history recovered.

Hopkins died April 8, 1925, at her home in Connecticut. Her work was continued by her sister Estelle Carpenter under the name High Watch Fellowship. Hopkins's writings are now again in print.

Sources:

Harley, Gail. "Emma Curtis Hopkins: 'Forgotten Founder' of New Thought." Ph.D. diss., Florida State University, 1991.

Hopkins, Emma Curtis. Class Lessons, 1888. Marina del Rey, Calif.: DeVorss, 1977.

———. High Mysticism. Cornwall Bridge, Conn.: High Watch Fellowship, n.d.

———. Scientific Christian Mental Practice. Cornwall Bridge, Conn.: High Watch Fellowship, 1958.

Hopkins, Matthew (d. 1647)

The infamous English "witchfinder" who, with his accomplices, persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, or killed hundreds of unfortunate individuals he believed to be involved in the horrors of witchcraft. Given the amount of damage he accomplished, it is difficult to realize he operated for only 14 months. The English philosopher and writer William Godwin commented:

"Nothing can place the credulity of the English nation on the subject of witchcraft in a more striking point of view, than the history of Matthew Hopkins, who, in a pamphlet published in 1647 in his own vindication, assumes to himself the surname of the Witchfinder. He fell by accident, in his native county of Suffolk, into contact with one or two reputed witches, and, being a man of an observing turn and an ingenious invention, struck out for himself a trade, which brought him such moderate returns as sufficed to maintain him, and at the same time gratified his ambition by making him a terror to many, and the object of admiration and gratitude to more, who felt themselves indebted to him for ridding them of secret and intestine enemies, against whom, as long as they proceeded in ways that left no footsteps behind, they felt they had no possibility of guarding themselves."

Hopkins began to operate as a witchfinder in March 1645. He had as a text King James I's book Demonology. After two or three successful experiments, Hopkins engaged in a regular tour of the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Huntingdonshire. One of his confederates was a man named John Stern. They visited every town in their route that invited them and were paid 20 shillings and their expenses, as well as whatever they received from the spontaneous gratitude of those who deemed themselves indebted to Hopkins and his gang.

By this expedient they won a favorable reception and a set of credulous persons who would listen to their dictates as if they were oracles. They were able to play the game into one another's hands and were sufficiently strong to overcome all timid and irresolute opposition. In every town they visited they inquired for reputed witches. Having taken them into custody the witchfinders could be sure of a certain number of zealous abettors and obtained a clear stage for their experiments.

They subdued their victims with a certain air of authority, as if they had received a commission from heaven for the discovery of misdeeds. They assailed them with a multitude of artfully constructed questions. They stripped them naked in search of the "devil's marks" on different parts of their bodies, which they ascertained by running pins into those parts, saying that if they were genuine marks the "witches" would feel no pain.

They threw their victims into rivers and ponds, declaring that, if the persons accused were true witches, the water (which was the symbol of admission into the Christian Church) would not receive them.

If the persons examined remained obstinate, Hopkins and his men seated them in constrained and uncomfortable positions, occasionally binding them with cords, and compelled them to remain so without food or sleep for 24 hours. They walked the person up and down a room, one taking him or her under each arm, till the accused dropped down with fatigue. They carefully swept the room in which the experiment was made so that they might keep away spiders and flies, which were supposed to be devils or their imps in disguise.

The inquisition of Hopkins and his confederates culminated in 1646. So many persons had been committed to prison on suspicion of witchcraft that the government was compelled to take the affair in hand. The rural magistrates before whom Hopkins and his confederates brought their victims were obliged, willingly or unwillingly, to commit those accused for trial. To defend himself, Hopkins published and wrote The Discovery of Witches, which detailed the symptoms of witchery and the techniques to find them.

A commission was granted to the earl of Warwick and others to hold a session of jail delivery against them. Lord Warwick was, at the time, the most popular nobleman in England. Dr. Calamy, the most eminent divine of the period of the Commonwealth, was sent with him to see (according to Richard Baxter) that no fraud was committed or wrong done to the parties accused.

Warwick sat on the bench with the judges and participated in their deliberations. As a result of this inquisition, 16 persons were hanged at Yarmouth in Norfolk, 15 at Chelmsford, and 60 at various places in the county of Suffolk. Bulstrode Whitelocke in his Memorials of English Affairs (1649) writes of many witches being apprehended around Newcastle on information from a person he calls "the Witch-finder"—very likely Hopkins. In 1652 and 1653 the same author spoke of women in Scotland who were put to incredible torture to extort from them confessions of witchcraft.

The fate of Hopkins was such as might be expected. The multitude were at first horrified at the monstrous charges that were advanced against him. But, after a time, they began to reflect and saw that they had acted with too much haste. The man who they at first hailed as a public benefactor they came to regard as a cunning impostor, dealing in cold blood for personal gain and the lure of short-lived fame. The multitude rose up against Hopkins and resolved to subject him to one of his own tests, which were detailed in his own book, The Discovery of Witches. They dragged him to a pond and threw him into the water as a witch. It seems he floated on the surface, as a witch ought to do. They then pursued him and drove him into obscurity and disgrace. Whether this story is true or not, Hopkins retired to Manningtree, Essex, in 1646 and died of tuberculosis within a year.

Sources:

Kittredge, George Lyman. Witchcraft in Old and New England. New York: Atheneum, 1972.

Robbins, Russell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Horbehutet

The ancient Egyptian winged disk, symbol of a solar deity who accompanied the sun god Ra on his daily journey across Egypt to protect him from evil. His symbol was placed over the gates and doors of temples to protect them from malign influences.

Hörbiger, Hans (1860–1931)

German engineer who developed an eccentric cosmology of "cosmic ice." According to Hörbiger, space is filled with cosmic ice, a basic material from which stellar systems are generated when a large block of cosmic ice collides with a hot star. Stellar systems are governed by a law of spiral motion and propelled toward a central sun and smaller planets, eventually being captured by larger ones and becoming moons, Hörbiger said. Earth is supposed to have had several previous moons that were drawn to it, according to his theory. These earlier moons caused geological upheavals when they spiraled to Earth, and myths and legends are said to preserve race memories of such cataclysms. When a former moon circled the earth with ever-increasing rapidity during such a capture, its appearance generated legends of the Judeo-Christian devil, as well as of dragons and other monsters.

Hörbiger's complex theories included occult concepts of a "platonic world soul." With Phillipp Fauth, he published Glazialcosmogonie in 1912. In the 1920s, a Hörbiger cult called WEL (Welt Eis Lehre) sprang up, attracting millions of supporters. Hörbiger was intolerant of all opposition to his theories and once wrote to rocket expert Willy Ley: ". . . either you believe in me and learn, or you must be treated as an enemy." After the death of Hörbiger, Hans Schindler Bellamy, a British mythologist, continued the propaganda for WEL in his book Moons, Myths and Man (1936) and in further books on the subject.

Hörbiger's ideas provoked enraged opposition from German astronomers, but during the 1930s Nazi sympathizers associated it with ideas of the lost Atlantis and a master Aryan race. Adopted by Nazi occultists, Hörbiger's ideas eventually attained the sponsorship of none other than Heinrich Himmler. During the height of the Nazi rule in Europe, the teachings of Hörbiger and Bellamy were combined with paranoid propaganda and anti-Semitism.

Sources:

Gardner, Martin. Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science. New York: Dover Publications, 1957.

Horniman, Annie (1860–1937)

Annie Horniman, a British dramatist and student of magic, was born on October 3, 1860, in Forest Hill, England, and grew up in Surrey. Her grandfather, a wealthy Quaker tea merchant, invented the tea bag. Her father made the pilgrimage from Quakerism to Congregationalism to the Church of England. He served for a number of years as a Member of Parliament. His inherited wealth allowed him to travel widely and he assembled a large collection of artifacts from around the world that he housed in a private museum.

In 1882 Horniman entered Slade School of Art (an affiliate of the University of London), where she met Mina Bergson (later Moina Mathers). She was eventually led to the magical order founded by Mina's husband, Samuel L. MacGregor Mathers, the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (HOGD). She was initiated in 1890 and took the magical name/motto Fortiter et Rocte. She progressed rapidly, and the following year was the first initiate in the more advanced Second Order. In 1893 she became the subPraemonstrator of the Isis Urania Temple.

That same year, Horniman received a substantial inheritance from her grandfather that allowed her to enter into the world of the theater by backing the production of a series of dramas staged by Florence Farr, another HOGD member. She also became a major financial backer of Mathers as he continued to develop the Golden Dawn.

In 1896 Horniman emerged as the opponent within the Golden Dawn of Dr. Edward Beveridge, who advocated the occult sexual theories of Thomas Lake Harris, the American communal leader. Horniman felt that Harris' teachings were immoral. When Mathers sided with Beveridge, she resigned as subPraemonstrator of Isis Urania. She continued as scribe for several years, but in 1903 had a final break with Mathers. Before the end of the year, she was expelled from the order. In the following years she threw herself into theater work and in the 1930s would be honored for her contributions to the British stage.

After many years away from the occult, in 1921 Horniman joined the Quest Society formed by theosophist George R. S. Mead. She died on August 6, 1937.

Sources:

Greer, Mary K. Women of the Golden Dawn: Rebels and Priestesses. Rochester, Vt.: Park Street Press, 1995.

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England. London: Neville Spearman, 1970.

Horos, Theodore (ca. 1866– ?) and Laura (1849–ca. 1906)

A notorious man-and-wife team of occult swindlers who were sentenced for fraud in Britain on December 20, 1901. Mrs. Horos—also known as "Ellora," "Madame Helana," "Swami Viva Ananda," "Mrs. Diss Debar," "Angel Anna," "Claudia D'Arvie," "Editha Gilbert Montez," and "Blanche Solomons"—appeared to have been born in Harrodsburg, Kentucky, on February 9, 1849, daughter of "Professor John C. F. R. Salomon."

In 1870, under the name Editha Gilbert Montez, she collected money by representing herself as the daughter of famous adventuress Lola Montez. In the 1880s she became a fraudulent Spiritualist medium in partnership with "General" Joseph H. Diss Debar. In 1888 she was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for fraud.

In 1898 she married Frank Dutton Jackson in New Orleans. The couple engaged in a fake mediumship partnership in Bucktown, Jefferson Parish, and, after complaints, were arrested and served a short prison sentence. At that time there were rumors of unsavory sexual practices in their "Orders of the Crystal Star."

The Jacksons reappeared in Europe in 1899 as "Mr. and Mrs. Horos," and in Paris became acquainted with S. L. MacGregor Mathers, from whom they stole some of the rituals of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. At that time they variously represented themselves as being principals of the Koreshan Unity, a communal group located in Estero, Florida, or of the Theocratic Unity.

They moved to South Africa in 1890 and opened the College of Occult Science in Cape Town. Mrs. Horos lectured and gave clairvoyant readings under the names Madame Helena and Swami Viva Ananda, assisted by her husband, who called himself Theodore Horos. The swami issued to students certificates of occult proficiency, modeled on the stolen teachings of the Golden Dawn.

In October 1900 the pair set up headquarters in Britain. Their College of Life and Occult Sciences was established in London, teaching mental and magnetic therapeutics, psychology, clairvoyance, mediumship, materialization, thaumaturgic power, and divine healing. Under this cover they operated an esoteric order using the Golden Dawn rituals, with secret mysteries of their own in which gullible young women were raped as well as swindled. Their odd career seems to have come to an end in September 1901 when the couple was arrested for fraud. Jackson was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment and his wife to seven.

Sources:

Dingwall, Eric J. Some Human Oddities. London, 1947. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

King, Francis. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Horoscope (Magazine)

Monthly magazine for popular readership, published since 1935. It includes articles, self-guidance charts, and a daily guide for horoscope signs. Address: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1540 Broadway, New York, NY 10036-4094.

Horoscope Guide

Monthly popular magazine featuring a yearly forecast for each astrological sign. Last known address: J. B. H. Publishing Co., 201 E. 57th St., New York, NY 10022.

Horoscope Yearbook

Popular publication presenting world predictions, astro-trends, forecasts, solar-lunar calendar, and planetary configurations. Last known address: Dell Publishing Co., 245 East 47th St., New York, NY 10017.

Horseman's Word

A persistent theme in British folklore is the magic word or phrase that can tame an unruly horse. Gypsies were reputed to have this secret, and it was also known to members of a mysterious group of individuals known as the Brotherhood of the Horseman's Word. In other parts of Britain, horse handlers with the secret were said to practice horse-whispering. It has been suggested that the secret was in substances with an attractive smell for the horse, and that the whispering was simply a blowing in the ear of the animal.

Horseshoes

In the Middle Ages horseshoes were nailed on the thresholds of homes to keep out witches. The significance of the horseshoe, however, is probably of more ancient origin, possibly being related to the two-horn shape that was believed to repel the evil eye in more ancient civilizations. This shape may have derived from a belief in animal horns as a symbol of good fortune. Iron as a metal is also traditionally believed to repel witches, fairies, and evil spirits, and the horseshoe combined both the shape and the metal that would ensure good fortune and avert evil.

For protection the horseshoe charm was placed outside buildings with the prongs pointing upward, so that the luck would not "run out," but in many buildings the horseshoe was used indoors with the prongs pointing down, so that good luck would be diffused inside the house.

Gypsies, who have a special relationship to horses, saw the horseshoe as a charm against the demons of unhappiness, bad luck, bad health, and death.

Sources:

Trigg, E. B. Gypsy Demons and Divinities: The Magical and Supernatural Practices of the Gypsies. London: Sheldon Press, 1973.

Horse-Whispering

A secret method by which certain persons are supposed to be able to acquire power over hard-to-manage horses. As is well known to students of Gypsy lore, Gypsies are reputed to be in possession of some secret by which they can render vicious horses entirely tame.

Opinions are divided as to whether this secret consists of the application of a certain odor or balm to the horse's muzzle, or whispering into its ear a spell or incantation. It has been claimed that the Gypsy horse-charmer applies anise seed to the nose of the animal.

Horse-whispering has also been in vogue among many other peoples. The antiquary William Camden, in his recital of Irish superstitions, states, "It is by no means allowable to praise a horse or any other animal unless you say 'God save him.' If any mischance befalls a horse in three days after, they find out the person who commended him, that he may whisper the Lord's Prayer in his right ear."

It was said by Con Sullivan, a famous Irish horse-whisperer of the eighteenth century, that practitioners of the art could not explain their power. This was affirmed by those who practiced it in South America, where a couple of men could tame half a dozen wild horses in three days. The same art was widely practiced in Hungary and Bohemia, and it was from a Bohemian Gypsy that a family in the county of Cork claimed to hold a secret by which the wildest or most vicious horse could be tamed. For generations this secret was regularly transmitted as a parting legacy at the time of death from the father to the eldest son.

Throughout the north of Scotland there are members of a secret society for breaking in difficult horses, which is believed to be called the Horseman's Society and which purports to trace its origin to the Dark Ages. Only those who gain their livelihood by the care and management of horses are admitted, and the more affluent and better educated are jealously excluded. Many farmers entertain a prejudice against the members of the society, but they are forced to admit that they are always very capable in managing their teams and can perform services that would otherwise require calling in a veterinary surgeon. They are usually skilled in the knowledge of herbs and medicinal plants, and a great deal of folklore surrounds them. It is stated that they hold their meetings at night in the clear moonlight, going through various equestrian performances with horses borrowed for the occasion from their masters' stables.

There is also said to be an inner circle in the society in which the black art and all the spells and charms of witchcraft are studied. Members of the inner circle are said to be able to smite horses and cattle with mysterious sickness, and even cast spells over human beings. One local writer stated that the inner circle of the horsemen employ hypnotic influence both on men and animals, as it is said certain North American Indians and some of the jungle tribes of Hindustan do.

On one occasion the services of the famous Con Sullivan were requisitioned by Colonel Westenra (afterward earl of Rosmore), who possessed a racehorse called Rainbow. The horse was savage and would attack any jockey courageous enough to mount him by seizing him by the leg with his teeth and dragging him from the saddle. A friend of the colonel's told him that he knew a person who could cure Rainbow, and a wager of £1,000 was laid on the matter. Sullivan, who was known throughout the countryside as "the Whisperer," was sent for. After being shut up alone with the animal for a quarter of an hour, he gave the signal to admit those who had been waiting on the result. When they entered, they found the horse extended on his back, playing like a kitten with Sullivan, who was quietly sitting by him, but both horse and operator appeared exhausted, and the latter had to be revived with brandy. The horse was perfectly tame and gentle from that day on.

Another savage steed, named King Pippin, took an entire night to cure, but in the morning he was seen following Sullivan like a dog, lying down at the word of command, and permitting any person to put his hand into his mouth. Shortly afterward he won a race at the Curragh.

Sullivan's statement that the successful whisperer is not acquainted with the secret of his own power may well be true. As Elihu Rich (in E. Smedley's The Occult Sciences, 1855) states:

"The reason is obvious. A force proceeding immediately from the will or the instinctive life would be impaired by reflection in the understanding and broken up or at least diminished by one half. The violent trembling of the animal under this operation is like the creaking and shivering of the tables before they begin to 'tip,' and indicates a moral or nervous force acting physically, by projection perhaps from the spirit of the operator. None of these cases are, after all, more wonderful than the movement of our own limbs and bodies by mental force, for how does it move them with such ease? And may not the same power that places its strong but invisible little fingers on every point of our muscular frames, stretch its myriad arms a little further into the sphere around us, and operate by the same laws, and with as much ease, on the stalwart frame of a horse?''

Sources:

Trigg, E. B. Gypsy Demons and Divinities: The Magical and Supernatural Practices of the Gypsies. London: Sheldon Press, 1973.

Hot Cross Buns

A surviving British Easter custom is the eating of ''hot cross buns''—spiced currant cakes with a cross marked on the top. In former times, the bun vendors were a familiar feature of street life on Good Friday, with their cry of ''Hot cross buns, one a penny, two a penny, hot cross buns!'' In modern times, the buns are sold from bakeries well before the Easter holiday.

Although the cross symbolized the Crucifixion, it had a more ancient origin. The cross was also a pagan symbol, and it was used by the Anglo-Saxons to indicate the four seasons on loaves baked for the vernal equinox and to discourage evil spirits that might prevent bread from rising.

As a Christian symbol, the buns derive from the ecclesiastical consecrated loaves given in churches as alms and to those who could not take communion. They were given by the priest to the people after the Mass, before the congregation was dismissed. They were to be kissed before being eaten.

In the 1660s, the spiced loaves were prohibited as ''popish,'' but allowed on Good Friday for the Easter celebrations. Spiced buns replaced the loaves after the Restoration.

Houdini, Harry (1874–1926)

Escape artist and investigator of claims of Spiritualist mediums. Houdini was born Ehrich Weiss on March 24, 1874, in Budapest, Hungary, and taken to Appleton, Wisconsin, as a child, although he later claimed to have been born on April 6, 1874 (eastern Europe still being on the Julian calendar at that time). Weiss began his professional life as a trapeze performer. He went on to become the foremost conjuring magician and escape artist of his day.

Weiss derived the name Houdini from Jean Eugene Robert Houdin (1805–1871), a famous French illusionist who took pride in exposing fake performers of religious marvels. Houdini was similarly very proud of his amazing feats and spent many years exposing so-called Spiritualist frauds. The story of his many adventures are recounted in his 1924 book A Magician Among the Spirits. That same year he served as a member of the committee appointed by Scientific American to investigate the mediumship phenomena of ''Margery'' (i.e., Mina Crandon). He was later accused of allowing his eagerness to prove fraud to lead him to tampering with the experiments.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, an enthusiastic Spiritualist, claimed that some of Houdini's own incredible feats were accomplished through psychic or supernatural powers. This infuriated Houdini, and at one time caused a break in his longstanding friendship with Doyle.

Houdini's death was precipitated by a reckless blow to the stomach from a student who visited him in his dressing room at the Princess Theater in Montreal on October 22, 1926. The student, J. Gordon Whitehead, had asked if it was true that Houdini could sustain punches to his midsection without injury. When Whitehead punched him, Houdini had been sorting his mail and was somewhat distracted.

Given permission to take a few trial punches, the student struck Houdini several times with powerful blows, and Houdini was clearly unprepared. That evening he suffered severe abdominal pains but completed his stage shows and took the train to Detroit, where he was booked for two weeks.

The train stopped at London, Ontario, where a telegram was sent to Detroit to request a medical examination. The doctor diagnosed acute appendicitis and ordered an ambulance, but Houdini refused and completed his show at the theater. After the show, his wife Bess pleaded with him to go to the hospital, and eventually, on the morning of October 25, he went to Grace Hospital, where he was found to be suffering from advanced peritonitis. He died on October 31, 1926.

The Houdini Code

Houdini's uneasy feud with Spiritualism persisted after his death, when various mediums claimed to convey messages from him lamenting his arrogant denunciation of Spiritualism. But one message was quite different. Among the challenges Houdini continuously issued to mediums was one that could be met only after his death. He stated that if spirit survival was possible, he would communicate with his wife, Bess, in a secret two-word code message known to no one else. A reward of $10,000 was offered for successfully communicating this code message.

Three years after Houdini's death, the medium Arthur Ford gave Bess Houdini a two-word message, ''Rosabelle believe,'' in the special code used by the Houdinis in an early mind-reading act. Rosabelle had been a pet name used by Houdini for his wife. Bess Houdini signed a statement that Ford was correct. This was witnessed by a United Press reporter and an associate editor of the Scientific American, but 48 hours later the New York Graphic stated that the story was untrue, that a reporter had perpetrated a hoax, possibly with the connivance of Ford and Bess Houdini.

The original scoop story evaporated in a confusion of charges, countercharges, and denials, and Bess Houdini did not refer to the matter again in public. Many believe the evidence favors the original claim that Ford really did break the Houdini code by a mediumistic message from the beyond. Bess Houdini died February 11, 1943.

Sources:

Cannell, J. C. The Secrets of Houdini. London, 1931. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1976.

Christopher, Milbourne. Houdini: The Untold Story. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1969. Reprint, New York: Pocket Books, 1970.

———. Mediums, Mystics, and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.

Ernst, Bernard M. L., and Hereward Carrington. Houdini and Conan Doyle: The Story of a Strange Friendship. Albert and Charles Boni, 1932. London: Hutchinson, 1933.

Fitzsimons, Raymund. Death and the Magician: The Mystery of Houdini. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1980.

Ford, Arthur, and Margueritte Harmon Bro. Nothing So Strange. New York: Harper & Row, 1958.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1924. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1972.

———. The Right Way to Do Wrong. Boston: H. Houdini, 1906.

———. The Unmasking of Robert Houdin. New York: Publishers Printing, 1908.

Kellock, Harold. Houdini: His Life-Story. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1928.

Pressing, R. G., comp. Houdini Unmasked. Lily Dale, N.Y.: Dale News, 1947.

Silverman, Kenneth. Houdini!!! The Career of Ehrich Weiss. New York: HarperCollins, 1996.

Spraggett, Allen, with William V. Rauscher. Arthur Ford: The Man Who Talked with the Dead. New York: New American Library, 1973.

Houghton, Georgina (d. 1887)

Nineteenth-century English private medium, author of Evenings at Home in Spiritual Séance (1882) and Chronicles of the Pho- tographs of Spiritual Beings and Phenomena Invisible to the Material Eye (1882). Houghton never sat for research and knew nothing of test conditions. Her mediumship, which developed after a visit to Mary Marshall, appears to have consisted of automatic drawing, other acts of automatism, minor telekinetic phenomena, unconfirmed cases of levitation or floating above the ground while apparently walking like anyone else, apports, and the ability to see colored auras about the heads of others.

She claimed a band of 70 archangels as her guardian spirits and implicitly believed and obeyed every subconscious impulse, even to the extent of leaving it to the spirits to choose the wallpapers and carpets in her house.

The spirit photographs in her book Chronicles of the Photographs of Spiritual Beings were taken at the studio of Frederick Hudson, the first in England to practice spirit photography, but who was later exposed as a fraud. The pictures themselves—which include spirit forms of Joan of Arc, the wife of Manoah (mother of Samson), and St. John the Evangelist—are for the most part obvious fakes but have a certain nineteenth-century charm.

Houghton, Michael (d. ca. 1956)

British poet and occultist, associate of Aleister Crowley. Houghton was proprietor of the famous Atlantis Book Shop in London, specializing in occultism, and also edited the journal Occult Observer (1945–50), with contributions from leading occultists of the period. Under the pseudonym Michael Juste, Houghton published several volumes of poetry and a volume he described as an occult biography, The White Brother (1927).

Sources:

Juste, Michael [Michael Houghton]. Escape, and Other Verse. Leeds, 1924.

———. Many Brightnesses, and Other Verse. London, 1954.

———. Shoot—and Be Damned. London, 1935.

———. The White Brother. London, 1927.

House of Wisdom

The tarik (path) of the House of Wisdom, founded by Moslem mystics at Cairo in the ninth century, had seven initiatory degrees. The original founder appears to have been Abdallah, a Persian, who, believing in the Gnostic doctrine of the aeons or sephiroths, applied the system to the successors of Mohammed, stating that Ismael was the founder of his tarik and naming one of his descendants as the seventh imam (ruler).

Abdallah established an active system of propaganda and sent missionaries far and wide. He was succeeded in his office as chief of the society by his son. After the institution had been in existence for some time it was transferred to Cairo, and assemblies were held twice a week, when all the members appeared clothed in white. They were gradually advanced through the seven degrees of the tarik over which a dia-al-doat (missionary of missionaries) presided. A later chief, Hakem-bi-emir-Illah, increased the degrees to nine, and in 1004 erected a stately home for the society, which he elaborately furnished with mathematical instruments.

Because the institution did not meet the approval of the authorities, it was destroyed in 1123 by the then grand vizier, but meetings continued elsewhere. The officers of the society were sheik, dai-el-keber (deputy), dai (master), refik (fellow), fedavie (agent), lassik (aspirant), and muemini (believer). The tarik taught that there had been seven holy imams, that God had sent seven lawgivers, who each had seven helpers, who in turn had 12 apostles. (See also Assassins)

Houston, Jean (1939–)

Professor of psychology, formerly an actress and New York City Drama Critics award-winning playwright. She was born May 10, 1939. Houston taught at Columbia University and the New York School of Social Research. She collaborated with her husband, Robert E. L. Masters, on the book The Varieties of Psychedelic Experience (1966). Together the couple organized the Foundation for Mind Research in New York in 1964 to conduct experiments on the borderland between mental and psychical experiences.

Jean Houston received negative media attention in 1996 for her work with Hillary Clinton. She was attacked by her contemporaries as a medium attempting to channel the likes of Eleanor Roosevelt and Ghandi, when in fact Houston's technique resembled more a brainstorming session. This is a session in which the patient explores the inner self through various exercises. Clinton was merely creating imaginary conversations with such individuals. Bob Woodward in his 1996 book, The Choice, brought the sessions to the attention of the general public. In the wake of the Clinton scandal, Houston continued to author books (A Passion for the Possible: A Guide to Realizing Your Full Potential, 1997) while reclaiming her position as a respected psychologist in the field of human potential.

Sources:

Houston, Jean. Lifeforce. New York: Delacorte Press, 1980.

———. The Search for the Beloved: Journeys in Sacred Psychology. Los Angeles: Jeremy P. Tarcher, 1987.

Masters, Robert E. L., and Jean Houston. Listening to the Body. New York, Delacorte Press, 1978.

———. Mind Games: The Guide to Inner Space. New York: Viking, 1972.

———. A Passion for the Possible. San Franciso: Harper San Francisco, 1998.

———. Passion of Isis and Osiris. New York: Ballantine Publishing Group, 1998.

———. The Possible Human. Upland, Penn.: DIANE Publishing Co., 1998.

———. The Varieties of Psychedelic Experience. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966.

Howe, Ellic (Paul) (1910–1991)

British authority on printing history who also wrote on occult subjects. Howe was born on September 20, 1910, in London. He attended Hertford College, Oxford (1929–31). During World War II he served with the British army (1939–41) and was promoted to the Foreign Office (1941–45). After the war he became a director of printing companies (1947–62).

In addition to his comprehensive studies of the history of British printing, he wrote and edited several important books on the occult and the history of magic, including Urania's Children: The Strange World of the Astrologers (1967; U.S. title, Astrology: A Recent History Including the Untold Story of its Role in World War II, 1968) and The Magicians of the Golden Dawn (1972). The former discusses how astrology was used in psychological warfare in WWII. The latter work is a comprehensive study of the history and membership of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the fountainhead of most contemporary ceremonial magic.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic, ed. The Alchemist of the Golden Dawn: The Letters of the Revd W. A. Ayton to F. L. Gardner and Others, 1886–1905. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1985.

———. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

———. Urania's Children: The Strange World of the Astrologers. London, 1967. Reprinted as Astrology: A Recent History Including the Untold Story of its Role in World War II. New York: Walker, 1968.

Howitt, William (1792–1879)

Author and pioneer British Spiritualist. Howitt was born on December 18, 1792, at Heanor, Derbyshire, England, the son of a Quaker. He published his first poem at age 13. He studied chemistry and natural philosophy at Tamworth and expanded his education by reading widely. He married Mary Botham in 1821, and they cowrote a number of works. Howitt traveled through England and Germany, extending his knowledge of foreign languages. He wrote several books during his early adulthood, including Popular History of Priestcraft in All Ages and Nations (1833) and Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets (1847). He edited Howitt's Journal of Literature and Popular Progress (3 vols., 1847–49) and published a translation of J. Ennemoser, The History of the Supernatural (2 vols., 1854; reissued in 1970).

In 1852 Howitt went to Australia, and while there first learned of the outbreak of Spiritualism when digging for gold in the Australian bush. In his novel Tallangetta or the Squatters' Home, which he conceived there, he included many incidents of a Spiritualist or supernatural nature. Before the novel was published (two and a half years after his return to England) he had some interesting experiences.

His wife attended a séance in April 1856 in the home of a Mrs. de Morgan (see Augustus de Morgan), and within a month mediumship developed in the Howitt family. It started with automatic writing and automatic drawing and continued with clairvoyance and spirit vision. There may have been some inherited tendency, because William Howitt's mother was a seeress and he himself was a sleepwalker in early youth. The phenomena started with his son and daughter. In January 1858 Howitt himself gained the power to write and draw automatically. It suddenly began after a visit to a Mrs. Wilkinson, who was a good drawing medium.

William Howitt's debut as a champion of Spiritualism occurred with a lively exchange of letters in The Critic regarding a haunted house and ghosts in general. Charles Dickens desired to visit some well-known haunted houses and asked for information. Howitt told him of Willington Mill, which he had visited, and of a house at Cheshunt, near London, of which he had read in Catharine Crowe's Night Side of Nature (2 vols., 1848). But the house at Cheshnut was partly pulled down, and Dickens could not find it.

When William Wilkinson's Spiritual Magazine was started in 1860, Howitt became a regular contributor and in the 13 years of its existence he wrote more than a hundred articles on the supernatural in the lives of men and nations, on the religious and philosophical aspects of the manifestations, and on personal experiences. In his leisure time he arranged séances with the famous medium D. D. Home.

His most important work was a book of two volumes, The History of the Supernatural in All Ages and Nations and in All Churches, Christian and Pagan, Demonstrating a Universal Faith, published in 1863. Howitt died in Rome on March 3, 1879.

Sources:

Ennemoser, Joseph. The History of the Supernatural. Translated by William Howitt. 2 vols. 1854. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Howitt, William. The History of the Supernatural in All Ages and Nations and in All Churches, Christian and Pagan, Demonstrating a Universal Faith. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1863. Reprinted as The History of Magic. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

———. Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1847.

Howitt-Watts, Mrs. Pioneers of the Spiritual Reform. London: Psychological Press Association, 1883.

Howling of Dogs

It was a common superstition in Europe and Asia that the howling of dogs at night presaged death to someone in the vicinity.

HPR See Human Potential Resources, Inc.

Huaca

Peruvian oracle.

Hubbard, L(afayette) Ron(ald) (1911–1986)

Founder of the Church of Scientology. Hubbard was born in Tilden, Nebraska, on March 13, 1911. He spent much of his childhood in Montana on his grandfather's ranch. His father was a naval officer, and as Hubbard matured, he traveled through the Pacific and to Asia. In 1930 he enrolled in the Engineering School of George Washington University, Washington, D.C., where he studied for the next two years. During the remainder of the decade he roamed the world as a participant in various explorations and wrote over 150 articles and short stories. His first book, Buckskin Brigades, appeared in 1937. In 1940 he was elected a member of the Explorers Club in New York. During World War II he served in the U.S. Navy with the rank of lieutenant. He also worked briefly in naval intelligence.

After the war, he returned to writing as a career. As a writer, Hubbard had a prodigious output and was remembered for the amazing speed at which he could produce copy. Often several stories would be published in the same issue of a magazine and thus many appeared under pseudonyms. No one systematically recorded his output, and reassembling a bibliography was a tedious process, carried out through the 1980s. In the 1930s he turned out Westerns for pulp magazines under the pseudonym "Winchester Remington Colt." His early science-fiction pulp stories were under the pseudonyms "Kurt von Rachen" and "René Lafayette." He wrote for Columbia Pictures in Hollywood in 1935.

Through the 1940s, partly based upon his experiences in the war, Hubbard began to develop a new philosophy of human nature and a new approach to dealing with basic human ills. The first public notice of his thinking appeared in an article in Astounding Science Fiction (May 1950), later to prove an unfortunate debut. As Dianetics, the name he gave his new approach, developed into the Church of Scientology and proved both controversial and successful, it would be demeaned as a "science fiction" religion and Hubbard dismissed as just a hack science fiction writer.

Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health appeared a few weeks after the Astounding Science Fiction article. The book created a sensation and launched a vast new industry of do-it-yourself psychotherapy. Hubbard created the Hubbard Dianetics Research Foundation and local Dianetics centers began to emerge based upon Hubbard's technique for ridding individuals of the causes of aberrant behavior patterns and leading them to a state of "clear."

As Hubbard continued to expand his thought and work out the implications of his theories, Dianetics grew into a comprehensive philosophical-religious system, Scientology. In 1954 the first Church of Scientology was opened in Los Angeles. The rest of Hubbard's life would be spent in developing and perfecting Scientology. In 1966 he resigned from any official position in the church, but he continued his research and writing for a number of years. He developed guidelines for the church and left behind writing that focused on the implications of his thought for education and business.

During the last years of his life he dropped out of public sight and remained in contact with only a few church leaders. In the years prior to his death on January 24, 1986, he returned to his love for storytelling and wrote one major novel, Battlefield Earth, and a ten-volume science fiction series, Mission Earth.

As his church became a prosperous international movement, it and Hubbard became the center of controversies involving people who left the movement to found competing organizations, former members who turned upon the church for real or imagined grievances, and the anti-cult movement, which branded the church a cult. In retrospect, early controversy with the American Medical Association, which disapproved of Dianetics, seems to have spilled over into federal government departments and covert actions against the church were instigated. Rumors of illicit actions by the church, many of which led to problems with different governments, began to emerge around the world. Legal actions, most of which were eventually resolved, became the justification for action against the church in additional countries. Some high church officials authorized the infiltration of several government agencies, and this became a major source of embarrassment for the church when the people responsible were arrested and convicted for theft of government documents.

For the Church of Scientology, the years since 1985 have been marked by intense polemics and court action between members of the church and the Cult Awareness Network, which emerged in the mid-1980s as the chief organizational expression of the anti-cult movement. These legal battles continue. However, a several-decades-old controversy with the Internal Revenue Service came to an end.

Hubbard and the OTO

During the 1940s, Hubbard became involved in one of the more bizarre happenings in the world of the occult. In the 1930s, a lodge of the Ordo Templi Orientis, the magical group headed by magician Aleister Crowley, had opened in Pasadena, California. Among its members was John W. ''Jack'' Parsons, a research scientist at the California Institute of Technology. At some point in 1945, Parsons decided to try a magical experiment to produce a magical child. At this point Hubbard showed up at Parson's house and was eventually invited by Parsons to become the necessary third person in the magical experiment.

The experiment consisted of Parsons and his female partner engaging in sexual intercourse while a third person, a clairvoyant, would tell them what was occurring in the invisible astral realm. The ritual would climax at what the clairvoyant seer suggested was the proper moment. Hopefully the act would result in the pregnancy of the woman and the induction of a spirit in the resulting child.

While Parsons and Hubbard seemed to have developed a strong friendship, early in 1946 they parted ways and Hubbard moved to Miami. Parsons claimed that Hubbard had skipped town with OTO funds and went to Miami to confront him. The present Church of Scientology claims that Hubbard had no attachment to either Parsons or the OTO, and that in spite of Hubbard's work with Parsons, Hubbard was never initiated into the organization. Rather, they suggest that he was acting as an undercover agent to investigate Parsons and other people associated with Cal Tech who were living in Parsons's house and working on sensitive government projects. Several of these physicists were later dismissed from government service as security risks. Hubbard did work for a period after the war as an undercover agent for the Los Angeles Police Department.

Hubbard died January 24, 1986, after years of living as a recluse.

Sources:

Hubbard, L. Ron. Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health. New York: Hermitage House, 1950.

———. Scientology: A New Slant on Life. Los Angeles: Publications Organization, United States, 1965.

———. Scientology: The Fundamentals of Thought. Los Angeles: Publications Organization, United States, 1956.

Miller, Russell. Bare-Faced Messiah: The True Story of L. Ron Hubbard. New York: Henry Holt, 1987.

Huby, Pamela M(argaret) Clark (1922–)

British university lecturer in philosophy who experimented in parapsychology. She was born on April 21, 1922, in London and attended Oxford University (B.A., 1944; M.A., 1947). After graduation Huby was a lecturer in philosophy at St. Anne's College, Oxford (1947–49). She then joined the faculty at Liverpool University, where she was named a senior lecturer in 1971. Her philosophical works include Greek Ethics (1967) and Plato and Modern Morality (1972).

A member of both the Parapsychological Association, and the Society for Psychical Research, London, Huby conducted experiments in group telepathy and clairvoyance (some in collaboration with C. W. M. Wilson), about which she wrote several papers. She also contributed a paper to Philosophical Foundations of Psychical Research, edited by S. C. Thakur.

Sources:

Huby, Pamela M. C. ''Case of Xenoglossy.'' Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 44.

———. ''Effects of Centrally Acting Drugs on ESP Ability.'' Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 41.

———. ''New Evidence About 'Rose Morton.' '' Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 45.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hudson, Frederick A. (ca. 1877)

The first British exponent of spirit photography. In March 1872 Samuel Guppy and his wife, Agnes Guppy-Volckman, who made several unsuccessful experiments to obtain psychic photographs in their own home, went on an impulse to Hudson's studio, which was nearby. A white patch resembling the outline of a draped figure was obtained behind Mr. Guppy's portrait. The experiment was repeated with increasing success.

After report of these pictures spread, the accusation of imposture soon arose, but, according to Alfred Russel Wallace, even those who were most emphatic about fraud believed that a large number of genuine pictures were taken. Wallace obtained two different portraits of his mother, representing two different periods and unlike any photograph taken during her life.

William Howitt obtained the likeness of two deceased sons, one of whom even the friend who accompanied him was ignorant. A Dr. Thompson obtained the extra of a lady whom his uncle in Scotland identified as the likeness of Thompson's mother. She had died in childbirth and no picture of her remained.

The editor of the British Journal of Photography investigated, using his own collodion and new plates. He found abnormal appearances on the pictures. Nevertheless, from time to time Hudson was caught cheating. Once he was exposed by Stainton Moses, for whom he produced many spirit photographs that agreed with his clairvoyant visions. To play the part of the ghost, Hudson occasionally dressed up or made double exposures. The duplication of the pattern of the carpet and other parts of the background showing through the legs of the sitter and of the ghost was ingeniously explained by refraction—the spirits being quoted as saying that the spirit aura differs in density and refracting power from the ordinary terrestrial atmosphere. Such resourceful explanations, coupled with the belief that Hudson produced many genuine spirit photographs, helped to reestablish his shaken credibility.

However, according to psychical researcher Harry Price, in his book Confessions of a Ghost-Hunter (1936; reprinted in 1974), Hudson used an ingenious camera manufactured by Howell, a famous London maker of conjuring apparatus. This camera was of the old square wooden type and contained a light metal frame that in its normal position rested on the bottom of the smaller of the camera's two telescopic portions. This frame held a waxed paper positive of the desired ghostly "extra." When the dark slide was pushed into the camera, it actuated a lever, raising the frame to a vertical position in contact with the photographic plate. When the picture was taken, the extra image was also printed on the plate. When the plate was drawn out of the camera the frame automatically fell back to its hidden position.

Fifty-four "spirit photographs" taken in this way are reproduced in the book Chronicles of the Photographs of Spiritual Beings, by Georgina Houghton (1882).

Sources:

Price, Harry. Confessions of a Ghost-Hunter. London: Putnam, 1936. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Hudson, Thomson Jay (1834–1903)

American author and lecturer who attained prominence by an ingenious anti-Spiritualist theory expounded in his books. He was born on February 22, 1834, in Windham, Ohio. He attended public schools in Windham and later studied law. He was admitted to the bar at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1857 and practiced for a time in Michigan before entering a journalistic career, culminating in the editorship of the Detroit Evening News. In 1880 he left journalism to enter the U.S. Patent Office, becoming principal examiner. In 1893 he resigned and devoted his time to the study of experimental psychology. Hudson was awarded an honorary LL.D. by St. John's College, Annapolis, in 1896.

The essence of his special theory of psychic phenomena, developed from studies in hypnotism, was that man has within him two distinct minds: the objective, with which he carries on his practical daily life; and the subjective, which is dormant but is infallible as a record, registering every single impression of life. The objective mind is capable of both inductive and deductive reasoning, the subjective mind of deductive only, according to Hudson's theory.

The change of death is survival in another state of consciousness, with which, however, communication is impossible. Any attempt is simply playing the fool with the subjective mind, which presents reflections of the experimenter's complete life record and lures him on to believe that he is communicating with his departed friends, Hudson said.

The Law of Psychic Phenomena (1893), in which this theory is expounded, became very popular and made a deep impression. It was followed by Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life (1896), Divine Pedigree of Man (1900), Law of Mental Medicine (1903), and Evolution of the Soul and Other Essays (1904).

Hudson's theories attained an even greater popularity after they were picked up by Thomas Troward and became the basis of his famous Edinburgh Lectures on Mental Science (1909). Troward fed the notion of two minds into New Thought, where it was eventually picked up by Ernest Holmes and became the basic insight upon which Religious Science was based.

Hudson died in Detroit on May 26, 1903. Admiral Usborne Moore writes in Glimpses of the Next State (1911) that through Mrs. Georgie, a young dramatist of Rochester who wrote automatically in mirror writing, he received manifestations of Hudson's spirit. Details of his life, unknown to both of them, were given, and he communicated through different mediums in Detroit and Chicago, carrying as a test messages of the admiral from one medium to another and describing his activities to them.

Sources:

Hudson, Thomson Jay. Divine Pedigree of Man. Chicago: A. C. McClure, 1900.

———. Evolution of the Soul and Other Essays. Chicago: A. C. McClure, 1904.

———. The Law of Psychic Phenomena. London: G. P. Putnam; Chicago: A. C. McClurg, 1893. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1969.

———. Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life. Chicago: A. C. McClure, 1896.

Melton, J. Gordon. New Thought: A Reader. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Institute for the Study of American Religion, 1990.

Huebner, Louise

Psychic and astrologer who enjoyed brief fame as the Official Witch of Los Angeles County, a title she was given in 1968. Her career as a psychic began when she was only ten years old, when she began to give palm readings at a children's carnival. She later moved to Los Angeles and opened an office as an astrologer. Through the 1960s she gained local fame as a psychic and was a frequent guest on radio and television shows. She appeared regularly on a talk show on radio station KLAC for four years (1965–69). Occasionally she was invited to assist in crime detection.

On July 21, 1968, she was presented with a scroll naming her the Official Witch of Los Angeles County. At the time of the presentation, she performed a spell to ensure the continued sexual vitality of Los Angeles. The act had some immediate consequences. Some in the county were embarrassed when Huebner began to use the title to promote her writings on witchcraft and attempted to stop her. The effort ended after Huebner threatened to undo the spell. Second, members of the emerging neo-pagan Wiccan movement were somewhat upset by Huebner, who was not a part of their movement and tended to perpetuate what they felt were negative stereotypes of witches.

Huebner continued to operate as a public psychic and witch for several years. In 1970 she traveled to Salem, Massachusetts, where the mayor presented her with a broom. She produced one record album, two books, and a series of mini-books for Hallmark Cards. By the mid-1970s, however, she had largely retired from public life, and for a period she operated an antique shop in Pasadena, California.

Sources:

Guiley, Rosemary. The Encyclopedia of Witches and Witchcraft. New York: Facts on File, 1989.

Huebner, Louise. Magic Sleep. Kansas City, Mo.: Springbok Editions, 1972.

———. Magical Creatures. Kansas City, Mo.: Springbok Editions, 1972.

———. Never Strike a Happy Medium. Los Angeles: Nash Publishing, 1971.

———. Power through Witchcraft. Los Angeles: Nash Publishing, 1969. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1972.

———. Your Lucky Numbers. Kansas City, Mo.: Springbok Editions, 1972.

Huet, Pierre-Daniel (1630–1721)

A celebrated French bishop of Avranches who collected some early reports of vampires. Huet was born on February 8, 1630, at Caen. He was educated at a Jesuit school and by a Protestant pastor and became a great classical scholar. In addition to editing Origen's Commentary on St. Matthew, he studied mathematics, astronomy, anatomy, ocular research, and chemistry and learned Syriac and Arabic. With Ann Lefèvre, he edited 60 volumes of Latin classics.

Huet took holy orders in 1676 and became bishop of Soissons in 1685 and later bishop of Avranches. He died on February 26, 1721. In his Memoirs (translated, 2 vols., 1810) there are many interesting passages relating to the vampires of the Greek archipelago. ''Many strange things,'' he states, ''are told of the broucolagnes, or vampires of the Archipelago. It is said in that country that if one leads a wicked life, and dies in sin, he will appear again after death as he was wont in his lifetime, and that such a person will cause great affright among the living.'' Huet believed that the bodies of such people were abandoned to the power of the devil, who retained the soul within them for the vexation of mankind.

Father François Richard, a Jesuit employed on a mission in the islands, provided Huet with details of many cases of vampirism. On the island of St. Erini (the Thera of the ancients) occurred one of the greatest chapters in the history of vampirism. Huet states that the people of St. Erini were tormented by vampires, and were always disinterring corpses to burn them. Huet states that this evidence is worthy of credence, having come from a witness of unimpeachable honesty who saw what he wrote about. He further says that the inhabitants of these islands cut off a person's feet, hands, nose, and ears after death, and they called this act acroteriazein. They hung the severed parts around the elbow of the dead.

The bishop appears to have thought that the modern Greeks might have inherited the practice of burning bodies from their forebears in classical times, and that they imagined that unless the corpse was burned the soul of the deceased could not rest.

Huet died February 26, 1721.

Hughes, Irene (Finger)

Chicago psychic who attained fame in the 1960s with her predictions. Born Irene Finger in a log cabin at Saulsbury, Tennessee, Hughes claimed Cherokee Indian and Scotch-Irish ancestry. She worked in a hospital in New Orleans and married William Hughes in 1945. After the war she moved to Chicago and became a reporter. Hughes used her psychic abilities to pay for the move to Chicago by correctly forecasting horserace winners.

Following a major operation in 1961, Hughes became aware of a Japanese spirit guide. She became more intensely interested in psychic phenomena and went on to become a professional psychic reader. She wrote and lectured on psychic subjects and began offering private consultations. In 1963 she founded the Golden Path in Chicago, an organization devoted to teaching students to develop their psychic talents. In 1967 she visited the Psychical Research Foundation in Durham, North Carolina, where her psychic abilities were tested by parapsychologist William Roll.

Among her many psychic predictions was one concerning the assassination of Robert Kennedy. In 1962 she predicted the exact date of death of former Illinois governor Adlai Stevenson in 1965. Her growing reputation was enhanced in 1967 when some six months in advance she predicted the massive snowstorm to hit Chicago in January of that year. She filed other predictions with the Central Premonitions Registry.

During the 1970s Hughes emerged as one of the top psychics in the Chicago area. Several books by and about her appeared. She was a frequent guest on radio and television talk shows, and for several years she hosted a local television show on Chicago's WSNS. After a fruitful career, she retired from the public scene.

Sources:

Defano, M. M. The Living Prophets. New York: Dell, 1972.

Hughes, Irene. ESPecially Irene: A Guide to Psychic Awareness. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolph Steiner Publications, 1972.

———. Know Your Future Today. New York: Paperback Library, 1970.

Psychic magazine, editors of. Psychics. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Steiger, Brad. Irene Hughes on Psychic Safari. New York: Warner Paperback Library, 1972.

Hugo, Victor (1802–1885)

The great French romantic novelist. He was keenly interested in Spiritism. He wrote, ''To avoid phenomena, to make them bankrupt of the attention to which they have a right, is to make bankrupt truth itself.'' Hugo left an unpublished manuscript on Spiritism in the possession of Paul Meurice, who died in 1905. It appears that he had his first experiences in table turning in September 1853 at the home of a Mme. de Girardin during his period on the island of Jersey after he was exiled from France by Napoleon III in 1852. Hugo at first refused to attend the séance but was greatly moved when the table spelled out the name of his lost daughter Leopoldine. Soon regular communications were established.

The sitters included General Le Flo, Count Paul Teleki, Charles Hugo, one Vacquerie, and Mme. Hugo. Victor Hugo himself was never at the table, sometimes not even in the room. Many symbolical personages came through, including ''the Lion of Androcles,'' ''the Ass of Balaam,'' and ''the Dove of Noah.'' ''The Shadow of the Tomb'' expressed itself in verse in the style and language of Victor Hugo, with all the grandiloquence of romantic poetry. Sometimes verse in the same style was signed by ''Aeschylus.'' ''Shakespeare'' challenged Hugo to a poetic competition. ''André Chenier,'' the guillotined poet, finished the fragmentary poem that was interrupted by his execution. Charles Hugo was the principal medium in all these experiments.

In 1892, seven years after Victor Hugo's death, the spirit of Victor Hugo, or a secondary personality assuming the name, appeared as the control of Hélène Smith, the medium, famous for her pseudo-Martian communication. ''Victor'' was in exclusive control for five months. After a struggle lasting for a year he was ousted by another control, ''Leopold,'' the so-called spirit of Cagliostro.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Ebon, Martin. They Knew the Unknown. New York: New American Library, 1971.

Flournoy, Theodor. From India to the Planet Mars. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Grillet, Claudius Victor Hugo Spirite. Paris, 1929.

Malo, Henry. Life of Delphine Gray. N.p., 1925.

Sudre, René. ''The Case of Victor Hugo and the Collective Psychism.'' Psychic Research 23 (1971).

Huineng (638–713 C.E.)

Huineng is a legendary master of Zen or Chan Buddhism to whom the doctrine of sudden enlightenment is attributed. He is believed to be author of The Platform Scripture of the Sixth Patriarch, a classic statement of the Zen position.

Huineng was born in what is now Guangdong Province, China, to a working class family. He began adult life as a peddler of firewood. He was in his early twenties when he read the Diamond Sutra, a Buddhist scripture and left his home in southern China to study with the Fifth Patriarch, known for his teaching activity on the Diamond Sutra, who resided in the north. According to legend, the Patriarch had his new students compose a poem for him. Both Huineug and another student composed a poem. The other student, Shenxiu (605–706 C.E.) voiced a doctrine of gradual enlightenment, while Huineng's poem suggested sudden enlightenment. The Fifth Patriarch favored Huineng, and in 661 C.E. he was given the robe as the Sixth Patriarch. Huineng returned to southern China to teach and is revered as the founder of the Southern School of Chan. Shenxiu remained in the north and is recognized as the founder of the Northern School of Chan. The Southern School was by far the more influential.

In 676 C.E. Huineng settled in Canton. At the age of 39 he became a Buddhist monk. The following year he was invited to lecture at Dafan Temple in Shaozhou. The lectures were recorded by his disciple Fahai, and published as The Platform Scripture. The essence of the teaching is that everyone shares the Buddha-nature (or wisdom). It was believed if one turned their mind inward and are able to keep from distractions, they can receive enlightenment. Meditation and wisdom are identified. Meditation is the function of the original nature. By implication, Huineng stresses the necessity of practice to attain an undistracted or direct mind. During practice one intuits the unity of nature and knows that all dharmas are the same. Meditation is not a matter of making the mind inactive, it is a freeing of the mind from all things. Huineng continued to teach until his death in 713 C.E..

Sources:

de Bary, William Theodore, Wing-tsit Chan, and Barry Watson, comps. Sources of Chinese Tradition. New York: Columbia University Press, 1960.

Dumoulin, Heinrich. Zen Buddhism: a History. New York: Macmillan Co., 1994.

The Platform Scripture. Ed. by Wing-tsit Chan. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1963.

Hull, Moses (1836–1906)

Moses Hull, a prominent American Spiritualist lecturer and teacher, was born in Waldo, Ohio, in 1836. As a teenager, he joined the Church of the United Brethren, a Methodist body serving primarily German-Americans. He seemed destined to be a Brethren minister, but along the way became interested in Adventism, and joined the newly formed Seventh-day Adventist Church (organized in 1865). In his interaction with an Adventist minister over doubts about life after death, he was led to Spiritualism, and there he found his home. For the last quarter of a century of his life he was a dedicated Spiritualist.

Though not a medium himself, Hull became a forceful orator in the Spiritualist cause and is remembered for two debates he held with orthodox Christian ministers, the lectures being published as the Jamieson-Hull Debate and the Hull-Covert Debate. Hull also authored The Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism (2 vols., 1895). He emerged as an advocate of a Christian Spiritualism, as opposed to many of the movement's leaders who eschewed any connection with Western religious traditions. He used his prior training among the Brethren and Adventists to teach the Bible from a Spiritualist perspective and argued that many events in the Bible, such as the appearance of the long-dead Moses and Elijah with Jesus at the Transfiguration, should be interpreted in a Spiritualist context.

During the 1890s, following the organization of the National Spiritualist Association (now the National Spiritualist Association of Churches), Hull became increasingly aware of the passing of the first generation of Spiritualist leaders and the need for a school at which all that had been learned could be passed on. He organized a ''Training School'' at Maple dell Park, Mantua, Ohio. He enlisted the help of his wife, Mattie Hull, and his daughter, Alfaretta Jahnke, to assist him. He operated the school for several years, but it eventually failed. Then in 1901 Morris Pratt, who had built a large mansion in Whitewater, Wisconsin, that he wished to be used as an educational facility for Spiritualism, passed away. Hull moved to Whitewater in 1903 and opened the Morris Pratt Institute which he headed for the several years remaining in his life. He died in January of 1906. The institute survived his passing and is now the educational arm of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches.

Sources:

Hull, Moses. The Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism. 2 vols. Chicago: M. Hull, 1895.

Human Dimensions Institute (HDI)

New Age educational organization in Buffalo, New York, that in the 1970s pioneered research on the ''whole'' person—physical, emotional, mental, and spiritual. The institute operated through scientific research, publications, lectures, seminars, experience groups, and continuing courses at Rosary Hill, Buffalo, and surrounding colleges and institutions. Seminars were held at Swen-i-o, the new HDI Retreat Center at Canandaigua, New York. International authorities discussed such areas as parapsychology, consciousness expansion, nutrition, unorthodox healing, holistic philosophy, and spiritual experience. The institute published the Human Dimensions Magazine, a quarterly publication of articles and professional papers on new frontiers of human experience.

Human Dimensions Institute, West

Research center and forum concerned with scientific and metaphysical disciplines. Advisors included Stanley Krippner, Charles Muses, Elizabeth Rauscher, David Spangler, and Fred Wolfe. The center is related to the Human Dimensions Institute of Buffalo, New York, and provides classes, lectures, and workshops. Last known address: P.O. Box 5037 or 10773 Hwy. 150, Ojai, CA 93023.

Human Individual Metamorphosis (HIM)

A flying saucer cult founded in the American West by two individuals calling themselves Bo and Peep, who claimed they would lead their followers to literal ascension to heaven in a spacecraft.

Human Information Processing Group

Organized at Princeton University, New Jersey, as an interdisciplinary study of all aspects of the interaction between humans and machines. Programs include such topics as consciousness-related anomalous phenomena.

Human Nature (Journal)

Early Spiritualist monthly journal founded by James Burns in 1867. It was published in London for a decade as a major forum for non-Christian or ''progressive'' Spiritualism.

Human Potential Resources (Journal)

British quarterly journal with a wide range of subjects—spiritual pathways, environmental issues, health and therapies, education, and humanistic psychology. It included a comprehensive resource directory and calendar of events in Britain. Last known address: LSG Plc., HRP Subscription Dept., P.O. Box 10, Lincoln, LN5 7JA, England.

Human Potential Resources, Inc. (HPR)

Organization founded by Michael Lach in July 1986 to publish a networking catalog of the New Age movement titled Choices and Connections, the first issue of which appeared in 1987. This large publication presented some 2,400 alternative lifestyle items in 60 categories, covering everything from solar-powered equipment to Eastern philosophy. Lach claimed that there was a real demand for information on New Age philosophies and products, stressing the need for personal development and commitment to global peace. Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Cott-MacPhail, Carolyn. Choices and Connections: The First Catalog of the Global Family. Boulder, Colo.: Human Potential Resources, 1987.

Humpfner, Winfried G(oswin) (1889–1962)

German priest who was actively interested in parapsychological studies. Humpfner was born on August 4, 1889, at Aidhausen, Bavaria, Germany, and he studied at the University of Würsburg (D. Theol., 1930). He entered the Augustinian Order in 1909 and was ordained as a priest in 1914. He studied in Rome and became the order's general archivist and subsecretary general in 1931 and was later assistant general (1936–47).

Humpfner pursued his interest in psychical research throughout his adult life. He was a life member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and an associate member of the American Society for Psychical Research. He also joined the Societá Italiana di Parapscicologia, Association Italiana Scientifica de Metapsichica, and Imago Mundi, the international organization of Roman Catholic parapsychologists. He died on November 3, 1962.

Sources:

Humpfner, Winfried G. L'Interpretazione di Fenomeni Metapsichici; ovvero, L'Anima in Metapsichica, in Psicologia, ecc. (The Interpretation of Metapsychical Phenomena; or, The Soul in Metapsychics, Psychology, etc.). N.p., 1951.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Humphrey, Betty N. See Betty Humphrey Nicol

Humphreys, Eliza M. Y. (Mrs. W. Desmond) (d. 1938)

Popular British novelist and Spiritualist who wrote under the pseudonym Rita. She was a daughter of John Gilbert Gollan of Inverness-shire, Scotland. She was educated in Sydney, Australia, later returning to England. She was married twice; her second husband was W. Desmond Humphreys of Ballin, county Cork, Ireland.

She began writing at an early age and during her lifetime published more than 60 popular novels as well as several nonfiction works, including her own autobiographical Recollections of a Literary Life (1936). She was a convinced Spiritualist and in her book The Truth of Spiritualism (1918) she states that her interest began in her girlhood, "when, owing to my father's interest in the subject, we used to try for communications sitting at a table with joined hands in dim light, and received messages by means of the alphabet and raps . . . and my father used to keep a written record of communications." She died January 1, 1938.

Huna

The secret knowledge of Hawaiian-priest sorcerers known as kahunas, or keepers of the secret. This knowledge includes healing, weather control, and mastery of fire walking on red-hot lava.

An important aspect of Huna miracles is the concept of mana, a vitalistic force with close parallels to the Odic force of Baron von Reichenbach, the animal magnetism of nineteenth-century Europe, and the orgone energy of Wilhelm Reich, as well as the kundalini of Hindu tradition.

According to Max Freedom Long, who studied Huna magic in Hawaii, the kahunas recognize three entities of aka (bodies of the human being): a low, middle, and higher self. The low self generates mana through food and other vital processes and is concerned with the physical body and the emotions. The middle self is a reasoning entity, while the higher self transcends memory and reason.

Long later established Huna Research. Serge King has since founded a second Huna-based organization, Huna International, an organization for research and teaching in the field of Huna magic.

Sources:

King, Serge. Kahuna Healing. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1983.

———. Mastering Your Hidden Self. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1983.

———. Urban Shaman. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1990.

Long, Max Freedom. Introduction to Huna. Sedona, Ariz.: Esoteric Publications, 1975.

———. The Secret Science Behind Miracles. Vista, Calif.: Huna Research Publications, 1954.

Steiger, Brad. Kahuna Magic. Rockport, Mass.: Para Research, 1971.

Wingo, E. Ortha. The Story of the Huna Work. Cape Girardeau, Mo.: Huna Research, 1981.

Hundredth Monkey

Crucial to the New Age movement was the positing of a means or agent to bring it into existence. Some saw the New Age as due to astrological forces released by the changing movement of the stars or due to energy coming from the spiritual hierarchy. The concept of the Hundredth Monkey was an alternative to both astrological and spiritualist concepts. It suggested that when a certain number of people gave their consent and commitment to a new idea, it would spread through the population somewhat mysteriously. Thus as the number of people attuned to the New Age grew, at some point New Age consciousness would spontaneously sweep through the general population, and the New Age would arrive.

The basis for this idea was derived from a story in the 1979 book Lifetide: A Biology of the Unconscious by Lyall Watson. He reported on research conducted by several anthropologists on the macaques (a species of monkey) in the islands off Japan. According to the story, in 1953 one of the anthropologists observed an aged macaque female wash a potato to get the sand and grit off of it before eating. She, in turn, taught another to do the same thing. The pair taught others, and soon a number of the adult macaques were washing their potatoes. In the fall of 1958, almost every macaque was doing it. Then macaques who had had no contact with the potato-washing monkeys began to wash their food. It appeared, concluded Watson, that as the practice spread through the monkey communities, a critical mass was approached when 98 and then 99 monkeys washed their food. Then, when the hundredth monkey adopted the practice, critical mass was reached, and the practice exploded through the monkey population.

Watson's story was seized upon by New Age spokesperson Ken Keyes, founder of the Living Love Seminars. In 1982 he published the book The Hundredth Monkey and within a year had distributed 300,000 copies. His subject was peace, and he argued that peace consciousness could spread throughout the human race only if a sufficient number of people adopted a commitment to peace. Once a critical mass was reached, love of peace would suddenly move quickly through the race. As the idea became a well-known concept within the New Age community, other writers, such as Rupert Sheldrake, Peter Russell, and Stanislav Grof, picked up the discussion.

However, the idea of the hundredth monkey did not go unchallenged within the New Age community. As early as 1983, psychologist Maureen O'Hara confronted it in the Journal of Humanistic Psychology. Her article was followed two years later by another writer protesting Watson's claims, arguing that all the monkeys who washed their food had learned it from another. There was no evidence of a magical mysterious spread of the practice. Watson accepted Amundson's analysis of the situation and admitted that he had developed the hundredth monkey concept as a metaphor based on slim evidence and a great deal of hearsay. While the concept retained some supporters through the 1980s, it slowly disappeared from New Age thinking.

Sources:

Keyes, Ken, Jr., The Hundredth Monkey. Coos Bay, Ore.: Vision Books, 1982.

Watson, Lyall. Lifetide: A Biology of the Unconscious. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979.

Huns

The people who invaded the eastern Roman Empire around 372–453 C.E. and were particularly ruthless and effective in their war campaigns under the leadership of Attila. Modern day Hungarians claim ancestry dating back to the Huns.

Ancient historians recorded legends that grew out of the severe stress the Huns created in all those whom they fought against. They credited the Huns with a supernatural origin. The Huns were referred to as "children of the devil," because it was said that they were born of a union between demons and hideous witches, the latter cast out of their own country by Philimer, king of the Goths, and his army. The old writers state that the Huns were of horrible deformity and could not be mistaken for anything but the children of demons. The German historian C. Besoldus (1577–1638) claimed that their name came from a Celtic or barbaric word signifying "great magicians." Many stories are told of their magic prowess and of their raising specters to assist them in battle.

Sources:

Manchen-Helfen, Otto. The World of the Huns: Studies in Their History and Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.

Hunt, Ernest (1878–1967)

Ernest Hunt, founder of the Western Buddhist Order and a leading figure in the introduction of Buddhism to non-Asian Americans, was born August 16, 1878, in Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, England. He went to sea as a young man, but returned home and studied for the Anglican priesthood. As he was making preparation for his ordination, he converted to Buddhism. In 1915 he moved with his wife, Dorothy, to Hawaii (where Buddhism had its strongest presence in the West) and worked on a plantation. In the early 1920s he moved to the big island and began teaching classes in English for the children of Japanese plantation workers. His work was recognized in 1924 when he was ordained by the Honpa Hongwanji, the largest of the Buddhist groups operating in Hawaii.

In 1926, Hunt, in cooperation with the Bishop Yemyo Imamura, became head of the Honpa Hongwanji's English-language department. The school was originally established to serve Japanese youth, many of whom had begun to drop the Japanese language, but Hunt also used it to reach out to the Caucasian population and teach Buddhism. He wrote a book of Buddhist ceremonies in English, and Dorothy Hunt composed a number of poems that were adapted as hymns. By 1928 some 60 converts formed the Western Buddhist Order, a nonsectarian branch of Buddhism attached to the Honpa Hongwanji.

Hunt's ideal of a nonsectarian Buddhism found an ally in 1929 in the International Buddhist Institute founded by Chinese Buddhist abbot Tai Hsu. Tai Hsu came to Hawaii and convinced Hunt to found a branch of the institute. Hunt saw it as a perfect means of spreading his notion that the surest way to Nirvana was through metta, active goodwill. He was able to bring Buddhists of all persuasions together in the institute and set them to doing good deeds, from visiting the sick and imprisoned to building schools.

The late 1920s proved the period of Hunt's prime literary production, beginning with his often-reprinted pamphlet, An Outline of Buddhism: The Religion of Wisdom and Compassion. He edited four volumes of the Hawaiian Buddhist Annual as well as the institute's magazine, Navayana. All came to an end, however, in 1932 with the death of Bishop Imamura. His successor was both a strong sectarian Buddhist and a Japanese nationalist. He rejected Hunt's approach and in 1935 removed Hunt from the Honpa Hongwanji and disbanded the English department. Hunt moved his membership to the Soto Temple, a branch of the Japanese Zen Buddhist movement, and continued much as before. He was eventually ordained as a Soto priest (1953). He was also honored as the first Westerner to be given the title Osho, a rank acknowledging his accomplishments.

During the 1950s, Hunt produced his last two publications, Gleanings from Soto-Zen and Essentials and Symbols of the Buddhist Faith. He spent much time in his last years in the Soto Temple, where he greeted the increasing number of tourists who were coming to the islands. He died in Honolulu on February 7, 1967.

Sources:

Hunt, Ernest. Essentials and Symbols of the Buddhist Faith. Honolulu: The Author, 1955.

———. Gleanings from Soto-Zen. Honolulu: The Author, 1953.

———. An Outline of Buddhism. Honolulu: Hongwanji Buddhist Temple, 1929.

Hunter, Louise. Buddhism in Hawaii. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1971.

Peiris, William. The Western Contribution to Buddhism. Delhi, India: Motilal Banarsidass, 1953.

Hunt, H(arry) Ernest (d. 1946)

British Spiritualist, lecturer, and author. A tutor at St. Paul's School, London, Hunt resigned to devote his attention to the study of practical psychology. He wrote a number of books. He died January 6, 1946.

Sources:

Hunt, H. Ernest. A Book of Auto-Suggestion. N.p., 1923.

———. Hidden Self and Its Mental Processes. London: W. Rider and Son, 1921.

———. Manual of Hypnotism. London: W. Rider, 1917.

———. Nerve Control. N.p., 1923.

———. Self Training. Philadelphia: D. McKay, 1918.

———. Spirit and Music. N.p., 1922.

———. Spiritualism For the Enquirer. N.p., 1931.

———. Why We Survive. N.p., 1928.

Hurkos, Peter (1911–1988)

Prominent psychic born on May 21, 1911, as Peter Van der Hurk in Dordrecht, Holland. He worked as a merchant seaman before becoming a member of the Dutch underground movement in occupied Holland during World War II. He claimed that as a result of a fall from a ladder in 1941 he discovered a psychic faculty.

Hurkos was not able to make use of the new ability immediately, because he was arrested and imprisoned in Buchenwald, Germany, for the duration of World War II. Upon his return to Holland he found his psychic abilities too distracting for him to follow a normal occupation, and he began to appear on stage and television shows, demonstrating feats of ESP. In 1947 he began work as a psychic detective, his fame being derived from his abilities in tracing missing persons and objects and identifying criminals. While having some success, he also had his notable failures. For example, when he was brought in to assist the police in tracing the Boston Strangler, his psychic description had no relevance to Albert DeSalvo, who confessed to the crimes. Hurkos cooperated with police departments throughout Europe and the United States.

Hurkos was a controversial psychic. He promoted himself and his successes. He was brought to the United States in 1965 by Andrija Puharich, who tested his abilities over a two-and-a-half-year period. He was praised by police in New Jersey for his assistance in solving a murder case. However, various parapsychologists had different experiences with him. Tests by Charles T. Tart were negative, and Hurkos refused the invitations of J. B. Rhine to be tested at Duke University.

Hurkos died in Los Angeles, California, on May 25, 1988.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Browning, Norma Lee. The Psychic World of Peter Hurkos. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Hoebens, Piet Hein. ''The Mystery Men From Holland, I: Peter Hurkos' Dutch Cases.'' Zetetic Scholar 8 (July 1981).

Hurkos, Peter. Psychic: The Story of Peter Hurkos. London: Arthur Barker, 1961.

Lyons, Arthur, and Marcello Truzzi. The Blue Sense: Psychic Detectives and Crime. New York: Mysterious Press, 1991.

Puharich, Andrija. Beyond Telepathy. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1962.

Hurley, George Willie (1884–1943)

George Willie Hurley, the founder of Universal Hagar's Spiritual Church, a prominent Spiritual denomination functioning in the African American community, was born in rural Georgia near the town of Reynolds on February 17, 1884. He was raised as a Baptist and as a young man became a preacher, though he soon switched his affiliation to Methodist. In 1919 he moved to Detroit and soon affiliated with the Triumph the Church and Kingdom of God in Christ, a holiness church functioning primarily within the African American community. Hurley became the Prince of the State of Michigan.

His life was changed by a visit to a Spiritualist church. He was converted and he soon resigned his position and became a minister for an independent Spiritual congregation. Shortly thereafter, in 1923, he had a vision of a brown-skinned damsel who was transformed into an eagle. He interpreted the vision as a prophecy concerning a church he was to found. Thus on September 23, 1923, he founded Universal Hagar's Spiritual Church. He opened the church's School of Mediumship and Psychology the next year.

Along with his traditional Spiritualist ideals, Hurley taught a form of black Judaism. He believed that blacks were God's original Hebrew people and that the mark of Cain (God's curse) was the pale skin of white people. Hurley also suggested that he was the bearer of God's spirit on earth for the emerging Aquarian Age, just as Jesus was the spirit bearer for the Piscean Age, and Moses and Adam had been for prior astrological ages. He believed that the Aquarian Age had begun with the signing of the armistice following World War I, that it would last 7,000 years, and that it would see the end of Protestantism, segregation, and injustice.

Hurley died on June 23, 1943. He was succeeded by his wife, who led the church until her death in 1960.

Sources:

Baer, Hans A. The Black Spiritual Movement: A Religious Response to Racism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.

Husk, Cecil (1847–1920)

British professional singer and member of the Carl Rosa Opera Company. Because of failing eyesight, Husk abandoned his vocation and—having been strongly psychic from early childhood—replaced it with professional mediumship.

Husk's materialization séances began about 1875 and were well known for the number and varied nature of the phenomena. ''John King'' was claimed as his chief control and had five subordinates: ''Uncle,'' ''Christopher,'' ''Ebenezer,'' ''Tom Hall,'' and ''Joey'' (the latter apparently the same control as manifesting through medium William Eglinton). Their voices, according to Florence Marryat, were heard as soon as the medium entered the cabinet. The subordinates prepared the manifestations for ''John King.''

One of ''King's'' favorite phenomena was the demonstration of matter passing through matter. The threading of chairs or iron rings on the medium's arms while the sitters held his hands was a frequently observed manifestation.

One experiment was carried out by George Wyld of Edinburgh and is described in his book Theosophy, or Spiritual Dynamics and the Divine and Miraculous Man (1884). For four years, Wyld had carried with him a specially made oval-shaped iron ring of five to six inches in diameter. Wyld hoped that it would be placed on his arm or on a medium's while he held the medium's hand. The size of the ring did not allow its passage over the hand. Wyld's wish was finally satisfied by Cecil Husk in 1884. While Wyld held the left hand of the medium, the ring was taken from his right; the medium cried out in pain, and when the light was turned on it was found on Husk's left wrist. An hour later it fell onto the floor.

Encouraged by this success, Wyld had a smaller ring made. This was also put on Husk's wrist while his hand was held by a friend. The ring was identified by microscopic markings. The Society for Psychical Research examined the ring and undertook to force it off if the medium permitted himself to be chloroformed. When he refused they brought the verdict: ''We cannot infer that it is impossible that the ring should have come into the position in which we found it by known natural means.'' This verdict was based on experiments conducted on three other men by etherizing them and compressing their hands with metallic tape. The ring could not be passed over. Still the investigators concluded that they might have been successful in the case of Husk.

In 1890, through Cecil Husk's mediumship, Stanley de Brath made his first acquaintance with psychic phenomena. During the following year, at a public séance with about 20 sitters, Husk was exposed. In the light of an electric tie-pin he was seen leaning over the table and illuminating his face with a phosphorized slate. The ''spirit drapery'' that enveloped his head did not disappear. The attempt at an apology by Spiritualists who suggested that a case of transfiguration was taking place and that the drapery was apported instead of being materialized proved unacceptable.

In an article in the July 1906 issue of the Annals of Psychic Science, Henry A. Fotherby describes an interesting materialization séance with Husk in which the phantasms appeared to develop from a sort of phosphorescent vapor in the air, dotted all over with countless minute points of bright light, like little glow lamps. They were rendered visible by luminous slates that rose by themselves from the table and cast a weird bluish light on the phantom faces.

Gambier Bolton recounted an instance when, in his own house in the presence of 14 investigators, the medium, while tightly held, was levitated in his chair onto the top of the table. When Admiral Usborne Moore sat in an initial séance with Husk in 1904 a zither rose from the table and soared above the circle. Its movements could be seen by the phosphorescent spots on its underside. After two or three swirls it dashed onto the floor and apparently went through, for faint music could be heard from underneath.

In the light of illuminated cards Moore witnessed the materialization of about 15 spirits. He later recounted that the faces were about two-thirds life size. "John King" always spoke in an extremely loud voice. This was not exceptional. When a sitter asked the control "Uncle," "Are you using the medium's throat?" the answer came in a bellowing voice close to him: "Do you think that this is the medium's throat? If so, he must have a long neck." The voices spoke in many languages. The singing—tenor, bass, and all the shades between—went on in astonishing volume even when Husk had a cold.

Moore sat more than 40 times with Husk and only once suspected fraud. On that occasion conditions were poor and he was by no means sure that his doubts were reasonable.

Sources:

Bolton, Gambier. Psychic Force. N.p., 1904.

Moore, Usborne. Glimpses of the Next State. London: Watts, 1911.

Hutin, Serge Roger Jean (1929–)

French author who wrote extensively on occult subjects. He was born on April 2, 1929, in Paris, and he studied at the Sorbonne. Hutin joined a variety of psychic and occult organizations, including the Institut Métapsychique International, Paris; the Association Francaise d'Etudes Métapsychiques, Paris; the Jacob Boehme Society, New York; the Swedenborg Institute, Basel; and the Rosicrucian Order.

He is most remembered for his work on the history of the occult, especially alchemy, Freemasonry, and the Rosicrucians. He also wrote a number of articles on parapsychological topics, especially retrocognition and reincarnation. Many were published in Revue Métapsychique.

Sources:

Caron, M., and Serge Hutin. Les Alchimistes. 1959. Translated as The Alchemists. New York: Grove Press, 1961.

Hutin, Serge. Les Civilisations inconnues (Unknown Civilizations). N.p., 1961.

———. Les Disciples anglais de Jacob Boehme. Paris; n.p., 1960.

———. Les Francs-Macons (The Freemasons). Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1960.

———. Histoire des Rose-Croix (History of the Rosicrucians). Paris: G. Nizet, 1955.

———. Histoire mondiale des sociétés secrétes (World History of Secret Societies). N.p., 1959.

———. A History of Alchemy. New York: Walker, 1963.

———. Voyages vers Ailleurs (Travels to Elsewhere). Paris: Fayard, 1962.

Huxley, Aldous (Leonard) (1894–1963)

Eminent British novelist whose brief volumes The Doors of Perception (1954) and Heaven and Hell (1956) pioneered discussions on the relationship between drug experience and mysticism. Huxley was born in Godalming, England, on July 27, 1894, grandson of a famous biologist. He was educated at Eton and at Balliol College, Oxford University (B.A., 1916). He suffered from defective vision and about 1935 began special eye-training exercises according to the system of W. H. Bates. These involved special visualization techniques. Huxley found a remarkable improvement in vision and describes his experiences in his book The Art of Seeing (1942).

He went on to write a number of critically hailed novels, short stories, and essays, including Crome Yellow (1921), Antic Hay (1923), Point Counter Point (1928), Eyeless in Gaza (1936), and Ape and Essence (1949). His prophetic novel Brave New World (1932) rose above all his writings as a particularly effective statement against modern forms of totalitarianism and of the threat posed to individual liberty by technology.

Through Huxley's early friendship with novelist D. H. Lawrence he began to be interested in mystical perception, and toward the end of his life this interest deepened and mellowed his later writings. After a period of living in southern France the Huxleys eventually settled in Los Angeles. After Huxley's wife Maria died in 1955, he married Laura Archera. Huxley himself died on November 22, 1963 (the same day President Kennedy was assassinated).

Huxley's developing interest in occult themes is indicated by his books The Devils of Loudon (1952), The Doors of Perception (1954), and Heaven and Hell (1956). Huxley had met occultist Aleister Crowley in Berlin in 1930 and through him was familiar with the effects of mescaline, but it was not until summer 1953 that Huxley took the four-tenths of a gram of mescaline that resulted in his own enthusiasm for the possibilities of hallucinogens. Huxley's discussions of consciousness-expanding drugs were drawn upon by such apostles of the psychedelic revolution as Timothy Leary and Richard Alpert, but Huxley himself opposed indiscriminate drug-taking. According to his brother, the famous biologist Sir Julian Huxley, he realized "that LSD would not bring liberation and understanding to everyone, and in his last book, Island, he points out its potential danger . . . though his warnings were not heeded."

Sources:

Huxley, Aldous. Aldous Huxley's Hearst Essays. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.

———. The Devils of Loudon. London: Chatto & Windus, 1952.

———. The Doors of Perception. New York: Harper, 1954.

———. Heaven and Hell. New York: Harper, 1956.

———. Island. London: Chatto & Windus, 1962.

———. Moksha: Writings on Psychedelics and the Visionary Experience. New York: Stonehill, 1977.

Hwyl

A special characteristic of traditional Welsh revivalist preaching, indicating a surge of intense emotional and spiritual fervor released by chanting. Hwyl is also Welsh for "the sails of a ship," and a possible derivation is that as a breeze (awel) fills the sails and transports the vessel, so a strong current of emotion lifts the spiritual awareness of the preacher and his congregation.

Traditional Welsh revivalism is comparable with the fervor of Kentucky backwoods preaching. The congregation catches the spirit of the preacher and shouts deeply felt responses of Bendigedig! (Praise the Lord!) or Diolch byth! (Amen!). The hwyl is sometimes induced by chanting the attributes of God in a rhythmic sequence.

Hydesville

A little hamlet in New York State, in the township of Arcadia 30 miles east of Rochester, New York. Hydesville is considered the birthplace of nineteenth-century Spiritualism. There—in the house of John D. Fox, his wife Margaret, and their daughters—mysterious rappings first took place on March 31, 1848. The two Fox sisters, eventually joined by a third older sister living in Rochester, asked questions to which the raps responded intelligently. Various neighbors were called in and one displayed great ingenuity in reciting letters of the alphabet and eliciting responses by raps associated with letters. The raps were a forerunner of the technique of "spirit communication" in the development of Spiritualism.

In 1915 the old Fox house was purchased by B. F. Bartlett of Cambridge, Pennsylvania, who had it dismantled and removed to the Lily Dale Spiritualist camp in western New York. In 1955 the building was totally destroyed by fire.

During the week of December 4–7, 1927, an International Hydesville Memorial and Spiritualist Congress was held at Rochester, and it was resolved to erect a 25-foot monument to commemorate the advent of Spiritualism at Hydesville.

In 1948 a centennial celebration of the Hydesville events was held at Lily Dale.

Sources:

Cadwallader, M. E. Hydesville in History. Chicago: Progressive Thinker Publishing House, 1922.

The Centennial Memorial of Modern Spiritualism Records, 1848–1948. Lily Dale, N.Y.: National Spiritualist Association of the U.S.A., 1988.

Hydromancy

Divination by water, said by Natalis Comes (d. 1582) to have been the invention of Nereus, ancient god of the sea. However, the term covers various methods of divination, ranging from forms of crystal gazing (using a large or small pool of water) to what is now known as radiesthesia—using as a pendulum a wedding ring suspended on a thread and held over a glass of water.

Hydromancy is, in principal, the same thing as divination by the crystal or mirror, and in ancient times a natural basin of rock kept constantly full by a running stream was a favorite medium.

The Jesuit scholar M. A. Del Rio (1551–1608) described one example of hydromancy in which the sucessor of Emperor Andronicus Comnenus was revealed.

The letters S.I. showed upon the water and the prediction was verified, for, within the time named, Isaac Angelus had thrown Andronicus to be torn to pieces by the infuriated populace of Constantinople. Since the devil spells backward, S.I., when inverted, would fairly enough represent Isaac, according to all laws of magic.

Del Rio cited several kinds of hydromancy. In one, a ring was suspended by a thread in a vessel of water. When the vessel was shaken, a judgment was formed according to the strokes of the ring against its sides.

In a second method, three pebbles were thrown into standing water and observations were drawn from the circles they formed. A third method depended upon the agitations of the sea.

A fourth divination was taken from the color of water and certain figures appearing in it. There arose a method of divination by fountains, since these were the waters most frequently consulted. Among the most celebrated fountains for this purpose were those of Palicorus in Sicily, which invariably destroyed the criminal who ventured to adjure them falsely in testimony of his innocence. A full account of their use and virtue is given by the Roman philosopher Macrobius (ca. 345–423 C.E.).

Pausanias (second century C.E.) described a fountain near Epidaurus, dedicated to Ino. On her festival certain loaves were thrown into the fountain. It was a favorable omen to the applicant if these offerings were retained; unlucky if they were washed up again. So, also, Tiberius cast golden dice into the fountain of Apomus, near Padua, where they long remained as a proof of the imperial monster's good fortune in making the highest throw.

Several other instances of divining springs were collected by the antiquary J. J. Boissard (1528–1602), and Del Rio ascribed to them the origin of a custom of the ancient Germans, who threw their newborn children into the Rhine, with a conviction that if they were spurious they would sink, if legitimate they would swim. This custom also sounds like a precursor of the seventeenth-century custom of "swimming witches," perhaps related to the Anglo-Saxon law, created by King Athelstan, of trial by water.

In a fifth method of hydromancy, certain mysterious words were pronounced over a cupful of water and observations were made upon its spontaneously bubbling. In a sixth method, a drop of oil on water in a glass vessel furnished a kind of mirror upon which many wonderful objects were said to become visible.

Clemens Alexandrinus mentioned a seventh kind of hydromancy in which the women of Germany watched the sources, whirls, and courses of rivers with a view to prophetic interpretation.

In modern Italy, acording to Del Rio, diviners were still to be found who wrote the names of any three persons suspected of theft upon a like number of little balls, which they threw into the water to determine the guilty party.

E. W. Lane, in his work An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians (1836), testifies to the success of divination by a pool of water as practiced in Egypt and Hindustan. Lane witnessed the performance of this type of sorcery. The magician began by writing forms of invocation to his familiar spirits on six slips of paper. A chafing dish with some live charcoal in it was then procured and a boy summoned who had not yet reached puberty.

When all was prepared, the sorcerer threw some incense and one of the strips of paper into the chafing dish; he then took the boy's right hand and drew a square with some mystical marks on the palm. In the center of the square he poured a little ink, which formed the magic mirror, and told the boy to look steadily into it without raising his head. In this mirror the boy declared that he saw, successively, a man sweeping, seven men with flags, an army pitching its tents, and the various officers of state attending on the sultan. The rest is told by Lane himself:

"The sorcerer now addressed himself to me, and asked me if I wished the boy to see any person who was absent or dead. I named Lord Nelson, of whom the boy had evidently never heard, for it was with much difficulty that he pronounced the name after several trials. The magician desired the boy to say to the Sultan: 'My master salutes thee and desires thee to bring Lord Nelson; bring him before my eyes that I may see him speedily.' The boy then said so, and almost immediately added, 'A messenger has gone and brought back a man dressed in a black (or rather, dark blue) suit of European clothes; the man has lost his left arm.' He then paused for a moment or two, and looking more intently and more closely into the ink, said 'No, he has not lost his left arm, but it is placed on his breast.'

"This correction made his description more striking than it had been without it; since Lord Nelson generally had his empty sleeve attached to the breast of his coat; but it was the right arm that he had lost. Without saying that I suspected the boy had made a mistake, I asked the magician whether the objects appeared in the ink as if actually before the eyes, or as if in a glass, which makes the right appear left. He answered that they appeared as in a mirror. This rendered the boy's description faultless.

"On another occasion Shakespeare was described with the most minute exactness, both as to person and dress, and I might add several other cases in which the same magician has excited astonishment in the sober minds of several Englishmen of my acquaintance."

Lane's account may be compared with a similar one given by A. W. Kinglake, the author of Eöthen (1844).

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Hyena

A fabled many-colored stone taken from the eye of the animal so called. Put under the tongue, the hyena stone was said to enable its possessor to foretell future events. It was also supposed to cure gout and intermittent fever.

Hyle

The primordial matter of the universe; also the name used in Gnosticism to denote one of the three degrees in the progress of spirits.

Hynek, J(oseph) Allen (1910–1986)

Prominent astrophysicist and authority on UFOs. Hynek was born on May 1, 1910, in Chicago, Illinois. He attended the University of Chicago, from which he received both his B.S. (1931) and Ph.D. degrees (1935). In 1942 he married Miriam Curtis.

Following graduation he took a position on the faculty at Ohio State University, where he remained until 1956. He worked for four years with the Smithsonian Astrophysics Observatory (1956–60) and then became the director of the Dearborn Observatory at Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, where he served until his retirement in 1980. In 1964 he also assumed duties as director of Northwestern University's Lindheimer Astronomical Research Center.

Hynek approached the UFO question as a skeptic but eventually became convinced that some of the reports could not be explained away by conventional means. During his early days at Northwestern, several graduate students, including Jacques Vallee, encouraged his interest in the question. In 1965 he was quoted as suggesting that UFOs might be extraterrestrial craft and calling for more scientific attention. When in 1966 Hynek was asked to speak on the subject of a flurry of UFO sightings in Michigan, he dismissed them as "swamp gas." The humor provoked by that incident led to his speaking out on the need for UFO studies at a congressional hearing several weeks later.

Several years later a civilian review committee was formed. The Condon Report, however, was trapped in controversy and internal bickering and Hynek was among a number of scholars who rejected its final negative report. In 1972, in The UFO Experience, Hynek charged the air force with laxity and incompetence in its research on UFOs, and the following year he led in the founding of the Center for UFO Studies. From that time forward he took the lead in championing the cause of UFO research and nurturing scientists and other researchers around the country. The center's work peaked during the late 1970s. In 1977 Hynek served as a technical consultant on the Steven Spielberg movie Close Encounters of the Third Kind, which drew its name from a term coined by Hynek.

Hynek went on to write several additional books prior to his move to Arizona in 1985. Believing he had found a major source of money for UFO research, in 1984 he resigned from the center in Evanston and early in 1985 established the International Center for UFO Research in Phoenix. The financial support he had hoped for, however, proved to be dedicated more to metaphysical than scientific study, and Hynek dropped his association. Before he could recover from his mistake, he was diagnosed as having a brain tumor. The tumor took his life on April 27, 1986.

He was survived by his wife Mimi, who had been a diligent and often unheralded editor and worker behind the scenes. The Center for UFO Studies was renamed the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies.

Hynek's own career awaits final evaluation when the UFO question is finally laid to rest. In 1973 he was interviewed by Ian Ridpath for the May 17 issue of the journal New Scientist. Hynek modestly reflected, "I've never launched any new theories, I've never made any outstanding discoveries." When Ridpath stated that Hynek would be remembered "not as an astronomer but as the man who made UFOs respectable," Hynek replied, ". . . I wouldn't mind it. It's always nice to add one stone to the total structure of science. If I can succeed in making the study of UFOs scientifically respectable and do something constructive in it, then I would think that would be a real contribution."

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s. Vol. 1 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Hynek, J. Allen. The Hynek UFO Report. New York: Dell, 1977.

———. The UFO Experience: A Scientific Inquiry. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1972.

Hynek, J. Allen, and Jacques Vallee. The Edge of Reality: A Progress Report on Unidentified Flying Objects. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1975.

Jacobs, David M. "J. Allen Hynek and the UFO Phenomenon." International UFO Reporter 11, no. 3 (May/June 1986): 4–8, 23.

Hyperesthesia

An actual or apparent exaltation of the perceptive faculties, or superacuity of the normal senses, characteristic of the hypnotic state. It has been observed frequently in hysterics. They may feel a piece of wire on their hands as heavy as a bar of iron. The smallest suggestion—whether given by word, look, gesture, or even breathing or unconscious movement—is instantly seized upon and interpreted by the entranced subject, who for this reason is often called "sensitive."

The phenomenon of hyperesthesia, observed but wrongly interpreted by the early magnetists and mesmerists, was largely responsible for the so-called clairvoyance, thought reading, community of sensation, and other kindred phenomena. In its manifestation, hyperesthesia is often difficult to distinguish from telepathy or clairvoyance. Theoretically the dividing line is that hyperesthesia is a peripheral perception. Telepathy or clairvoyance is a central perception that does not reach us through the sensory organs. In practice it is difficult to decide whether the perception takes place through the sensory organs or not.

The realization of a relationship between suggestion and hyperesthesia by Alexandre Bertrand and James Braid brought hypnotism into the domain of scientific fact. The significance of hyperesthesia in connection with every form of psychic phenomena can hardly be overestimated. Nor is it found only in the trance state. It enters into the normal existence to an extent that is but imperfectly understood. Dreams, for instance, frequently reproduce impressions that have been recorded in some obscure stratum of consciousness, while much that we call intuition is made up of inferences subconsciously drawn from indications too subtle to reach the normal consciousness.

Hyperesthesia has been defined as "an actual or apparent exaltation of the preceptive faculties," modern scientists being unsure whether the senses are actually sharpened or not. Most probably the hyperesthetic perception is merely a normal perception that, through cerebral dissociation, operates in a free field. Very slight sense impressions may be recorded in the brain during normal consciousness but other impressions may inhibit them from reaching the conscious mind.

Gilbert Murray conducted telepathic experiments by placing himself in a different room from the sensitive and having a sentence spoken to him in a very low voice. The sensitive in the other room reproduced the sentence. The British Society for Psychical Research considered this a case of telepathy. Charles Richet considered it exceptional auditory hyperesthesia. Similarly, the sudden movements that save people from falling objects in the street may be attributed to subconscious hearing of an almost inaudible sound that generates and sends an urgent impulse to the motor centers.

Emile Boirac recorded interesting cases of tactile and visual hyperesthesia. His subject read with his fingertips in complete darkness. Being bandaged, his back turned to Boirac, but holding his elbow, he could also read if Boirac passed his own fingertips along the lines of a newspaper. It did not make the least difference if Boirac closed his eyes. (See also Eyeless Sight.) Another subject could tell the time from a watch wrapped up in a handkerchief. A Mme. M., before the Medical Society of Tamboff, told the colors of 30 flasks wrapped in paper and placed under a thick cloth. Further complicating the issue, Mme. M. could also taste by the sense of touch.

James Braid found the olfactory sense so acute in some hypnotic patients that by the smell of a glove they could unhesitatingly and unerringly detect its owner in a large company. It is questionable whether auditory hyperesthesia could explain the astounding phonic imitations he observed, such as patients repeating accurately what was spoken in any language, or singing correctly in a language they had never heard before. Braid noted,

"A patient of mine who, when awake, knew not the grammar even of her own language, and who had very little knowledge of music, was enabled to follow Mlle. Jenny Lind correctly in songs in different languages, giving both words and music so correctly and simultaneously with Jenny Lind, that two parties in the room could not for some time imagine that there were two voices, so perfectly did they accord, both in musical tone and vocal pronunciation of Swiss, German, and Italian songs."

Hypnagogic State

A condition between waking and sleeping characterized by illusions of vision or sound. These appear to have been first noted by J. G. F. Baillarger (1809–1890) in France and W. Griesinger (1817–1868) in Germany about 1845. They were studied by the scholar and antiquary Alfred L. F. Maury, who gave them the name "illusions hypnagogiques." They are distinguished from "hypnopompic visions," which appear at the moment when sleep recedes and momentarily persist into waking life. Both illusions are related to the faculty of dreaming. Some hypnagogic visions have been noted as the precursor to out-of-the-body travel or astral projection.

Sources:

Monroe, Robert A. Journeys Out of the Body. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

Muldoon, Sylvan, and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Tart, Charles T. Altered States of Consciousness. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Doubleday, 1972.

White, John, ed. The Highest State of Consciousness. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Doubleday, 1972.

Hypno-Art

Term used by professional artist Curtis Watkins to denote his artwork done under hypnosis. He first began drawing under hypnosis in 1971 while working at a commercial art studio in Ann Arbor, Michigan. He had earlier learned self-hypnosis as an aid to relaxation. After using self-hypnosis to make the most of a short coffee break, Watkins was astonished to find that he had made a drawing without conscious effort.

Since then Watkins has experimented widely in producing art while under hypnosis. He found that this kind of art is quite unlike his normal conscious production. He established a Hypno-Art Research Center and Studio at 519 S. Michigan Ave., Howell, Michigan 48843. Watkins's experiments in hypno-art make interesting comparison with the automatic drawing and painting reportedly produced by Spiritualist mediums.

Hypnotism

A peculiar altered state of consciousness distinguished by certain marked symptoms, the most prominent and invariable of which are the presence of continuous alpha waves on the electroencephalograph, hypersuggestibility in the subject, a concentration of attention on a single stimulus, and a feeling of "at oneness" with the stimulus. Hypnotic states may be induced by various techniques applied to oneself or by another.

The hypnotic state may be induced in a large percentage of normal individuals, or may occur spontaneously. It is recognized as having an affinity with normal sleep, and likewise with a variety of trance-like conditions, among which may be mentioned somnambulism, ecstasy, and the trances of Hindu yogis and fakirs, and various tribal shamans. In fact, in one form or another, hypnosis has been known in practically all countries and periods of history.

Hypnotism, once classed as an occult science, has gained, though only within recent years, a definite scientific status, and no mean place in legitimate medicine. Nevertheless, its history is inextricably interwoven with occult practice, and even today much hypnotic phenomena is associated with the psychic and occult, so that a consideration of hypnotism remains a necessary component in any mature understanding of the occult world science of both our own time and the past.

The Early Magnetists

As far back as the sixteenth century, hypnotic phenomena were observed and studied by scientists, who attributed them to "magnetism," an effluence supposedly radiating from every object in the universe, in a greater or lesser degree, and through which objects might exercise a mutual influence on one another. From this doctrine was constructed the "sympathetic" system of medicine, by means of which the "magnetic effluence" of the planets, of the actual magnet, or of the physician was brought to bear upon the patient. Paracelsus is generally supposed to be the originator of the sympathetic system, as he was its most powerful exponent. Of the magnet he states,

"The magnet has long lain before all eyes, and no one has ever thought whether it was of any further use, or whether it possessed any other property, than that of attracting iron. The sordid doctors throw it in my face that I will not follow the ancients; but in what should I follow them? All that they have said of the magnet amounts to nothing. Lay that which I have said of it in the balance, and judge. Had I blindly followed others, and had I not myself made experiments, I should in like manner know nothing more than what every peasant sees—that it attracts iron. But a wise man must inquire for himself, and it is thus that I have discovered that the magnet, besides this obvious and to every man visible power, that of attracting iron, possesses another and concealed power."

That power, he believed, was of healing the sick. And there is no doubt that cures were actually effected by Paracelsus with the aid of the magnet, especially in cases of epilepsy and nervous affections. Yet the word "magnet" is most frequently used by Paracelsus and his followers in a figurative sense, to denote the magnes microcosmi, man himself, who was supposed to be a reproduction in miniature of the Earth, having, like it, his poles and magnetic properties. From the stars and planets, he taught, came a very subtle effluence that affected human intellect, while earthly substances radiated a grosser emanation that affected the body. The human Mumia (body of vitalism) especially was a "magnet" well suited for medical purposes, since it draws to itself the diseases and poisonous properties of other substances. The most effective Mumia, according to Paracelsus, was that of a criminal who had been hanged, and he suggests the manner of its application:

"If a person suffer from disease, either local or general, experiment with the following remedy. Take a magnet impregnated with Mumia, and combined with rich earth. In this earth sow some seeds that have a likeness to, or homogeneity with, the disease; then let this earth, well sifted and mixed with Mumia, be laid in an earthen vessel, and let the seeds committed to it be watered daily with a lotion in which the diseased limb or body has been washed. Thus will the disease be transplanted from the human body to the seeds which are in the earth. Having done this, transplant the seeds from the earthen vessel to the ground, and wait till they begin to flourish into herbs. As they increase, the disease will diminish, and when they have reached their mature growth, will altogether disappear.''

The quaint but not altogether illogical idea of ''weapon-salve''—anointing the weapon instead of the wound—was also used by Paracelsus, his theory being that part of the vital spirits clung to the weapon and exercised an ill effect on the vital spirits in the wound, which would not heal until the ointment was first been applied to the weapon. This also was an outcome of the magnetic theory.

Towards the end of the sixteenth century, Paracelsus' ideas were developed by J. B. van Helmont, a scientist of distinction and an energetic protagonist of magnetism. ''Material nature,'' he writes, ''draws her forms through constant magnetism from above, and implores for them the favour of heaven; and as heaven, in like manner, draws something invisible from below, there is established a free and mutual intercourse, and the whole is contained in an individual.''

Van Helmont also believed in the power of the will to direct the subtle fluid. There was, he held, in all created things a magic or celestial power through which they were allied to heaven. This power or strength is greatest in the human soul, resides in a lesser degree in the body, and to some extent is present in the lower animals, plants, and inorganic matter. It is by reason of their superior endowment in this respect that humans are enabled to rule the other creatures, and to make use of inanimate objects for their own purposes. The power is strongest when one is asleep, for then the body is quiescent, and the soul most active and dominant, and for this reason dreams and prophetic visions are more common in sleep. He notes,

''The spirit is everywhere diffused, and the spirit is the medium of magnetism; not the spirits of heaven and of hell, but the spirit of man, which is concealed in him as the fire is concealed in the flint. The human will makes itself master of a portion of its spirit of life, which becomes a connecting property between the corporeal and the incorporeal, and diffuses itself like the light.''

To this ethereal spirit he ascribed the visions seen by ''the inner man'' in ecstasy, and also those of the ''outer man'' and the lower animals. In proof of the mutual influence of living creatures he asserted that a human being could kill an animal merely by staring hard at it for a quarter of an hour.

That Van Helmont was not ignorant of the power of imagination is evident from many of his writings. A common needle, he declared, may by means of certain manipulations and the willpower and imagination of the operator, be made to possess magnetic properties. Herbs may become very powerful through the imagination of the person who gathers them. And he adds,

''I have hitherto avoided revealing the great secrets, that the strength lies concealed in man, merely through the suggestion and power of the imagination to work outwardly, and to impress this strength on others, which then continues of itself, and operates on the remotest subjects. Through this secret alone will all receive its true illumination—all that has hitherto been brought together laboriously of the ideal being out of the spirit—all that has been said of the magnetism of all things—of the strength of the human soul—of the magic of man, and of his dominion over the physical world.''

Van Helmont also gave special importance to the stomach as the chief seat of the soul, recounting an experience of his own. Upon touching some aconite with his tongue, he found all his senses transferred to his stomach. Several centuries later, seeing with the stomach was to become a favorite accomplishment of somnambules and cataleptic subjects.

A distinguished English magnetist was Robert Fludd, who wrote in the first part of the seventeenth century. Fludd was an exponent of the microcosmic theory and a believer in the magnetic influence. According to Fludd, not only were these emanations able to cure bodily diseases, but they also affected the moral sentiments. If radiations from two individuals were flung back or distorted, negative magnetism, or antipathy resulted. However, if the radiations from each person passed freely into those from the other, the result was positive magnetism, or sympathy. Examples of positive and negative magnetism were also to be found among the lower animals and among plants. Another magnetist of distinction was the Scottish physician William Maxwell, author of De Medicina Magnetica (1679), who is said to have anticipated much of Mesmer's doctrine. He declared that those who are familiar with the operation of the universal spirit can, through its agency, cure all diseases, at no matter what distance. He also suggested that the practice of magnetism, though very valuable in the hand of a well-disposed physician, is not without its dangers and is liable to many abuses.

The Healers Valentine Greatrakes and J. J. Gassner

While the theoretical branch of magnetism was thus receiving attention at the hands of the alchemical philosophers, the practical side was by no means neglected. There were, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a number of ''divine healers,'' whose magic cures were without doubt the result of hypnotic suggestion.

Of these perhaps the best known and most successful were Valentine Greatrakes, an Irishman, and a Swabian priest named John Joseph Gassner. Greatrakes was born in 1628, and on reaching manhood served for some time in the Irish army, thereafter settling down on his estate in Waterford. In 1662 he had a dream in which it was revealed to him that he possessed healing by touch, a gift which could cure the king's evil (scrofula). The dream was repeated several times before he paid heed to it, but at length he experimented, his own wife being the first to be healed by him.

Many people who came to him from the surrounding country were cured when he laid his hands upon them. Later the impression came upon him strongly that he could cure other diseases besides the king's evil. News of his powers spread far and wide, as patients came by the hundreds to seek his aid. Despite the fact that the bishop of the diocese forbade the exercise of these apparently magical powers, Greatrakes continued to heal the afflicted people who sought him. In 1666 he proceeded to London, and, though not invariably successful, he seems to have performed there a surprising number of cures, which were testified to by Robert Boyle, Sir William Smith, Andrew Marvell, and many other eminent people.

His method of healing was to stroke the affected part with his hand, thus (it was claimed) driving the disease into the limbs and finally out of the body. Sometimes the treatment acted as though by magic, but if immediate relief was not obtained, the rubbing was continued. Only a very few cases were dismissed as incurable. Even epidemic diseases were healed by a touch. It was noted that during the treatment the patient's fingers and toes remained insensible to external stimuli, and frequently he or she showed every symptom of such a ''magnetic crisis'' as was afterward to become a special feature of mesmeric treatment.

Personally, Greatrakes was a simple and pious gentleman, persuaded that his marvelous powers were a divinely-bestowed gift, and most anxious to make the best use of them.

The other healer mentioned earlier, J. J. Gassner (1727–1779), belongs to a somewhat later period—about the middle of the eighteenth century. He was a priest of Bludenz in Vorarlberg, Austria, where his many cures gained for him a wide celebrity. All diseases, according to him, were caused by evil spirits possessing the patient, and his mode of healing thus consisted of exorcising the demons.

Gassner, too, was a man of kindly disposition and piety, and made reference to the Scriptures in his healing operations. The ceremony of exorcism was a rather impressive one. Gassner sat at a table, the patient and spectators in front of him. A blue red-flowered cloak hung from his shoulders. The rest of his clothing was "clean, simple, and modest." On his left was a window, on his right, the crucifix. His fine personality, deep learning, and noble character, which inspired the faith of the patient and his friends, doubtless played no small part in his curative feats. Sometimes he made use of "magnetic" manipulations, stroking or rubbing the affected part, and driving the disease, after the manner of Greatrakes, into the limbs of the patient. He generally pronounced the formula of exorcism in Latin, with which language the demons seemed to show a perfect familiarity.

Not only could Gassner control sickness by these means, but the passions also were amenable to his treatment,

"Now anger is apparent, now patience, now joy, now sorrow, now hate, now love, now confusion, now reason—each carried to the highest pitch. Now this one is blind, now he sees, and again is deprived of sight, etc."

These curious results suggest what in the nineteenth century was termed "phreno-magnetism," where equally sudden changes of mood were produced by touching with the fingertips those parts of the subject's head which phrenology associated with the various emotions to be called forth.

Emanuel Swedenborg

Hitherto it will be seen that the rational and supernatural explanations of magnetism had run parallel with one another, the former most in favor with the philosophers, the latter with the general public. It was reserved for Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), the Swedish philosopher and seer to unite the doctrine of magnetism with that of spirit agency—i.e., the belief in the action in the external world of the discarnate spirits of deceased human beings. That Swedenborg accepted some of the theories of the older magnetists is evident from some of his mystical writings, where, for example, he states,

"In order to comprehend the origin and progress of this influence [i.e., God's influence over man], we must first know that which proceeds from the Lord is the divine sphere which surrounds us, and fills the spiritual and natural world. All that proceeds from an object, and surrounds and clothes it, is called its sphere.

"As all that is spiritual knows neither time nor space, it therefore follows that the general sphere or the divine one has extended itself from the first moment of creation to the last. This divine emanation, which passed over from the spiritual to the natural, penetrates actively and rapidly through the whole created world, to the last grade of it, where it is yet to be found, and produces and maintains all that is animal, vegetable, and mineral. Man is continually surrounded by a sphere of his favorite propensities; these unite themselves to the natural sphere of his body, so that together they form one. The natural sphere surrounds every body of nature, and all the objects of the three kingdoms. Thus it allies itself to the spiritual world. This is the foundation of sympathy and antipathy, of union and separation, according to which there are amongst spirits presence and absence.

"The angel said to me that the sphere surrounded man more lightly on the back than on the breast, where it was thicker and stronger. This sphere of influence peculiar to man operates also in general and in particular around him by means of the will, the understanding, and the practice.

"The sphere proceeding from God, which surrounds man and constitutes his strength, while it thereby operates on his neighbour and on the whole creation, is a sphere of peace, and innocence; for the Lord is peace and innocence. Then only is man consequently able to make his influence effectual on his fellow man, when peace and innocence rule in his heart, and he himself is in union with heaven. This spiritual union is connected with the natural by a benevolent man through the touch and the laying on of hands; by which the influence of the inner man is quickened, prepared, and imparted. The body communicates with others which are about it through the body, and the spiritual influence diffuses itself chiefly through the hands, because these are the most outward or ultimum of man; and through him, as in the whole of nature, the first is contained in the last, as the cause in the effect. The whole soul and the whole body are contained in the hands as a medium of influence."

Mesmerism or Animal Magnetism

In the latter half of the eighteenth century, a new era was inaugurated in connection with the doctrine of a magnetic fluid, due in large measure to the works of Franz Anton Mesmer, the physician from whose name mesmerism was taken. Mesmer was born at Wiel, near Lake Constance, in 1733, and studied medicine at the University of Vienna, receiving his medical degree in 1766. In the same year he published his first work, De Planetarum Influxu (The Influence of Planets on the Human Body). Although he claimed to have thereby discovered the existence of a "universal fluid," to which he gave the name of magnétisme animal, there is no doubt that his doctrine was in many respects identical to that of the older magnetists mentioned above.

The idea of the universal fluid was suggested to him in the first place by his observation of the stars, which led him to believe the celestial bodies exercised a mutual influence on each other and on the Earth. This he identified with magnetism, and it was but a step (and a step which had already been taken by the early magnetists) to extend this influence to the human body and all other objects, and to apply it to the science of medicine.

In 1776, Mesmer met with J. J. Gassner, the Swabian priest. Mesmer set aside the supernatural explanation offered by the healer himself, and declared that the cures and severe crises that followed his manipulations were attributable to nothing but magnetism. Nevertheless this encounter gave a new trend to his ideas. Hitherto he himself had employed an actual magnet in order to cure the sick, but seeing that Gassner dispensed with that aid, he was led to consider whether the power might not reside in a still greater degree in the human body. Mesmer's first cure was performed on an epileptic patient by means of magnets, but the honor of it was disputed by a Jesuit, Fr. Hell (a professor of astronomy at the University of Vienna), who had supplied the magnetic plates, and who claimed to have discovered the principles on which the physician worked.

Thereafter for a few years Mesmer practiced in various European cities and strove to obtain recognition for his theories, but without success. In 1778, however, he went to Paris, and there attained an immediate and triumphant success in the fashionable world, although the learned bodies still refused to have anything to say to him.

Aristocratic patients flocked in hundreds to Mesmer's consulting rooms hung with mirrors, which the physician theorized would augment the magnetic fluid. He himself wore, it was said, a shirt of leather lined with silk, to prevent the escape of fluid, while magnets were hung about his person to increase his natural supply of magnetism. The patients were seated round a baquet, or magnetic tub, a description of which was left by Seifert, one of Mesmer's biographers:

"The receptacle was a large pan, tub, or pool of water, filled with various magnetic substances, such as water, sand, stone, glass bottles (filled with magnetic water), etc. It was a focus within which the magnetism was concentrated, and out of which proceeded a number of conductors. These being bent pointed iron wands, one end was retained in the baquet, whilst the other was connected with the patient and applied to the seat of the disease. This arrangement might be made use of by any number of persons seated round the baquet, and thus a fountain, or any receptacle in a garden, as in a room, would answer for the purpose desired.''

For the establishment of a school of animal magnetism Mesmer was offered 20,000 livres by the French government, with an annual sum of 10,000 livres for its upkeep; he refused. Later, however, the sum of 340,000 livres was subscribed by prospective pupils and handed over to him.

One of Mesmer's earliest and most distinguished disciples was Charles D'Eslon, a prominent physician, who laid the doctrines of animal magnetism before the Faculty of Medicine in 1780. Consideration of Mesmer's theories was, however, indignantly refused, and D'Eslon was warned to rid himself of such a dangerous doctrine.

Another disciple of Mesmer who attained distinction in magnetic practice was the Marquis de Puységur, who was the first to observe and describe the state of induced somnambulism, now well known as the hypnotic trance.

Puységur's ideas on the subject began to supersede those of Mesmer, and he gathered about him a distinguished body of adherents, among them the celebrated Lavater. Indeed, his recognition that the symptoms attending the magnetic sleep were resultant from it was a step of no small importance in the history of mesmerism.

In 1784, a commission was appointed by the French government to enquire into the magnetic phenomena. For some reason or another its members chose to investigate the experiments of D'Eslon, rather than those of Mesmer himself. The commissioners, including Benjamin Franklin, Antoine Lavoisier, and Jean Bailly, observed the peculiar crises attending the treatment, and the rapport between patient and physician, but decided that imagination could produce all the effects, and that there was no evidence whatever for a magnetic fluid. The report, edited by Bailly, offers a description of the crisis,

''The sick persons, arranged in great numbers, and in several rows around the baquet (bath), received the magnetism by means of the iron rods, which conveyed it to them from the baquet by the cords wound round their bodies, by the thumb which connected them with their neighbours, and by the sounds of a pianoforte, or an agreeable voice, diffusing magnetism in the air.

''The patients were also directly magnetised by means of the finger and wand of the magnetiser, moved slowly before their faces, above or behind their heads, or on the diseased parts.

''The magnetiser acts also by fixing his eyes on the subjects; by the application of his hands on the region of the solar plexus; an application which sometimes continues for hours.''

Meanwhile the patients present a varied picture.

''Some are calm, tranquil, and experience no effect. Others cough and spit, feel pains, heat, or perspiration. Others, again, are convulsed.

''As soon as one begins to be convulsed, it is remarkable that others are immediately affected.

''The commissioners have observed some of these convulsions last more than three hours. They are often accompanied with expectorations of a violent character, often streaked with blood. The convulsions are marked with involuntary motions of the throat, limbs, and sometimes the whole body; by dimness of the eyes, shrieks, sobs, laughter, and the wildest hysteria. These states are often followed by languor and depression. The smallest noise appears to aggravate the symptoms, and often to occasion shudderings and terrible cries. It was noticeable that a sudden change in the air or time of the music had a great influence on the patients, and soothed or accelerated the convulsions, stimulating them to ecstasy, or moving them to floods of tears.

''Nothing is more astonishing than the spectacle of these convulsions.

''One who has not seen them can form no idea of them. The spectator is as much astonished at the profound repose of one portion of the patients as at the agitation of the rest.

''Some of the patients may be seen rushing towards each other with open arms, and manifesting every symptom of attachment and affection.

''All are under the power of the magnetizer; it matters not what state of drowsiness they may be in, the sound of his voice, a look, a motion of his hands, spasmodically affects them.''

Although Mesmer, Puységur, and their followers continued to practice magnetic treatment, the report of the royal commission had the effect of quenching public interest in the subject, although from time to time a spasmodic interest in it was shown by scientists. M. de Jussieu, at about the time the commission presented its report, suggested that it would have done well to inquire into the reality of the alleged cures, and to endeavor to find a satisfactory explanation for the phenomena they had witnessed, while to remedy the deficiency he himself formulated a theory of ''animal heat,'' an organic emanation that might be directed by the human will. Like Mesmer and the others, he believed in action at a distance, i.e., what is today termed absent healing.

Mesomeric practitioners formed themselves into Societies of Harmony until the political situation in France rendered their existence impossible. Early in the nineteenth century Pététin and Jean Deleuze published works on animal magnetism. But a new era was inaugurated with the publication in 1823 of Alexandre Bertrand's Traité du Somnambulisme, followed three years later by a treatise Du Magnétisme Animal en France.

From Animal Magnetism to Phreno-Magnetism and Hypnotism

Alexandre Bertrand was a young physician of Paris, and to him belongs the honor of having discovered the important part played by suggestion in the phenomena of the induced trance. He had observed the connection between the magnetic sleep, epidemic ecstasy, and spontaneous sleepwalking, and declared that all the cures and strange symptoms that had formerly been attributed to animal magnetism, animal electricity, and the like, resulted from the suggestions of the operator acting on the imagination of a patient whose suggestibility was greatly increased.

It is probable that had he lived longer (he died in 1831, at the age of 36), Bertrand would have gained a definite scientific standing for the facts of the induced trance, but as it was, the practitioners of animal magnetism still held to the theory of a ''fluid'' or force radiating from magnetizer to subject, while those who were unable to accept such a doctrine ignored the matter altogether, or treated it as vulgar fraud.

Nevertheless Bertrand's works and experiments revived the flagging interest of the public to such an extent that in 1831 a second French commission was appointed by the Royal Academy of Medicine. The report of this commission was not forthcoming until more than five years had elapsed, but when it was finally published, it contained a definite testimony to the genuineness of the magnetic phenomena, and especially of the somnambulistic state, and declared that the commission was satisfied of the therapeutic value of ''animal magnetism.''

The report was certainly not of great scientific worth. The name of Bertrand was not even mentioned therein, nor his theory considered. On the other hand, a good deal of space was given to the more paranormal or ''supernatural'' phenomena, clairvoyance, action at a distance, and the prediction by somnambulistic patients of crises in their maladies. This is the more excusable, however, since these ideas were almost universally associated with somnambulism. A community of sensation was held to be a feature of the trance state, as was also the transference of the senses to the stomach. Thought-transference was suggested by some of these earlier investigators, notably by J. P. F. Deleuze, who suggested that thoughts were conveyed from the brain of the operator to that of the subject through the medium of the subtle ''magnetic fluid.''

Meanwhile the Spiritualist theory, i.e., the activity of spirit entities, was becoming more and more frequently advanced to explain the ''magnetic'' phenomena, including both the legitimate trance phenomena and the multitude of supernormal phenomena that was supposed to follow the somnambulistic state. This will doubtless account in part for the extraordinary animosity the medical profession showed toward animal magnetism as a therapeutic agency. Its anesthetic properties they ridiculed as fraud or imagination, notwithstanding that serious operations, even of the amputation of limbs, could be performed while the patient was in the magnetic sleep.

Thus John Elliotson was forced to resign his professorship at the University College Hospital, and James Esdaile, a surgeon who practiced at a government hospital at Calcutta, had to contend with the derision of his professional colleagues. Similar contemptuous treatment was dealt out to other medical men who were really pioneers of hypnotism, against whom nothing could be urged but their defense of mesmerism.

In 1841, James Braid, a British surgeon, arrived independently at the conclusions Bertrand had reached some 18 years earlier. Once more the theory of abnormal suggestibility was offered to explain the various phenomena of the so-called magnetic sleep, and once more it was largely ignored, alike by the world of science and by the public.

Braid's explanation was essentially that which is offered now. He placed the new science, which he called ''hypnotism,'' on a level with other natural sciences, above the mass of medieval magic and superstition in which he had found it. Yet even Braid did not seem to have entirely separated the chaff from the grain, for he countenanced the practice of phrenomesmerism, a combination of mesmerism and phrenology wherein the entranced patient whose head was touched by the operator's fingers exhibited every sign of the emotion or quality associated with the phrenological organ touched.

Braid asserted that a subject, entirely ignorant of the position of the phrenological organs, passed rapidly and accurately from one emotion to another, according to the portion of the scalp in contact with the hypnotist's fingers. His physiological explanation is a somewhat inadequate one, and we can only suppose that he was not fully appreciative of his own theory of suggestion.

In 1843, two periodicals dealing with magnetism appeared: the Zoist, edited by John Elliotson and a colleague, and the Phreno-Magnet, edited by Spencer T. Hall. The first, adopting a scientific tone, treated the subject mainly from a therapeutic point of view, while the latter was of a more popular character. Many of the adherents of both papers, and notably Elliotson himself, afterward became Spiritualists.

In 1845, an additional impetus was given to animal magnetism by the publication in that year of Baron von Reichenbach's research. Reichenbach claimed to have discovered a new force, which he called od, odyle, or odylic force, and which could be seen in the form of flames by sensitives, i.e., psychics. Reichenbach meticulously classified the indications of such sensitivity as a more acute form of normal human faculty.

In the human being these emanations might be seen to radiate from the fingertips, while they were also visible in animals and inanimate things. Different colors issued from the different poles of the magnet. Reichenbach experimented by putting his sensitives in a dark room with various objects—crystals, precious stones, magnets, minerals, plants, animals—which they could unerringly distinguish by the color and size of the flame visible to their clairvoyant eye. These emanations appeared so invariable and so permanent that an artist might paint them and, indeed, this was frequently done. Feelings of temperature, heat or cold, were also experienced in connection with the force.

Baron von Reichenbach's experiments were spread over a number of years, and were made with every appearance of scientific care and precision, so that their effect on the mesmerists of the time was very considerable. But notwithstanding the mass of dubious and occult phenomena which was associated with hypnotism at that time, there is no doubt that the induced trance, with its therapeutic and anesthetic value, would soon have come into its own had not two other circumstances occurred to thrust it into the background.

The first was the application of chloroform and ether to the purposes for which hypnotism had hitherto been used, a substitution which pleased the medical faculty greatly. Both work to induce sleep even in persons only lightly or totally unaffected by hypnotism. At about the same time, the introduction of the movement known as modern Spiritualism emphasized the occult associations of trance phenomena and drove many people from any study of anything closely tied to it.

Later Views of Hypnotism

But if the great body of medical and public opinion ignored the facts of hypnotism during the period following Braid's discovery, the subject did not fail to receive some attention from scientists in Europe. From time to time investigators took upon themselves the task of inquiring into the phenomena. This was especially the case in France, where the study of mesmerism or hypnotism was most firmly entrenched and where it met with least opposition. In 1858, one Dr. Azam of Bordeaux investigated hypnotism from Braid's point of view, aided by a number of members of the Faculty of Paris. An account of his research was published in 1860, but cast no new light on the matter. Later the same set of facts was examined by E. Mesnet, M. Duval, and others. In 1875, the noted psychical researcher Charles Richet also studied artificial somnambulism.

It was, however, from the Bernheim and the Nancy school that the generally accepted modern view of hypnotism is taken. H. Bernheim was himself a disciple of A. A. Liébeault, who, working on independent lines, had reached the same conclusion as Bertrand and Braid and once more formulated the doctrine of suggestion. Bernheim's work De la Suggestion, published in 1884, embodied the theories of Liébeault as well as the result of Bernheim's own research.

According to this view, hypnotism is a purely psychological process, and is induced by mental influences. The ''passes'' of Mesmer and the magnetic philosophers, the elaborate preparations of the baquet, the strokings of Valentine Greatrakes, and all the multitudinous ceremonies with which the animal magnetists used to produce the artificial sleep were only of service in inducing a state of expectation in the patient, or in providing a soothing and monotonous, or violent, sensory stimulus. And so also the modern methods of inducing hypnosis—the fixation of the eyes, the contact of the operator's hand, the sound of his voice—are only effective through the medium of the subject's mentality.

Other investigators who played a large part in popularizing hypnotism were J. M. Charcot, of the Salpêtrière, Paris, a distinguished pathologist, and R. Heidenhain, professor of physiology at Breslau. The former taught that the hypnotic condition was essentially a morbid one, and allied to hysteria, a theory which, becoming widely circulated, exercised a somewhat detrimental effect on the practice of hypnotism for therapeutic purposes, until it was at length proved erroneous. As a result, prejudice lingered against the use of the induced hypnotic trance in medicine until relatively modern times.

Heidenhain laid stress on the physical operations to induce somnambulism, believing that thereby a peculiar state of the nervous system was brought about wherein the control of the higher nerve centers was temporarily removed, so that the suggestion of the operator was free to express itself automatically through the physical organism of the patient. The physiological theory also is somewhat misleading, nevertheless its exponents did good work in bringing the undoubted facts of hypnosis into prominence.

Besides these theories there was another to be met with chiefly in its native France—the old doctrine of a magnetic fluid. But it rapidly died out.

Among the symptoms which may safely, and without reference to the supernatural, be regarded as attendant on hypnotism are: the rapport between subject and operator, implicit obedience on the part of the former to the smallest suggestion (whether given verbally or by look, gesture, or any unconscious action), anesthesia, positive and negative hallucinations, the fulfillment of post-hypnotic promises, and control of organic processes and of muscles not ordinarily under voluntary control.

Other phenomena which have been allied from time to time with magnetism, mesmerism, or hypnotism and for which there is not the same scientific basis, are clairvoyance, telekinesis, transference of the senses from the ordinary sense organs to some other part of the body (usually the fingertips or the pit of the stomach), community of sensation, and the ability to commune with the dead.

The majority of these, like the remarkable phenomena of phreno-magnetism, can be directly traced to the effect of suggestion on the imagination of the patient. Ignorant as were the protagonists of mesmerism with regard to the great suggestibility of the magnetized subject, it is hardly surprising that they saw new and supernormal faculties and agencies at work during the trance state. To the same ignorance of the possibilities of suggestion and hyperesthesia may be referred the common belief that the hypnotizer can influence his subject by the power of his will alone, and secure obedience to commands which are only mentally expressed. At the same time it must be borne in mind that if belief in telepathy be accepted, there is a possibility that the operation of thought transference might be more freely carried out during hypnosis. It is notable, in this respect, that the most fruitful of the telepathic experiments conducted by psychical researchers and others have been made with hypnotized percipients.

An Extraordinary Experiment

One of the most bizarre and dangerous experiments in hypnotic telepathy is related in M. Larelig's biography of the celebrated Belgian painter Antoine Joseph Wiertz (1806–1865) and also in the introductory and biographical note affixed to the Catalogue Raisonné du Musée Wiertz, by Dr. S. Watteau (1865). Wiertz was the hypnotic subject and a friend, a doctor, was the hypnotizer.

Wiertz had long been haunted by a desire to know whether thought persisted in a head severed from the trunk. His wish was the reason for the following experiment being undertaken, this being facilitated through his friendship with the prison doctor in Brussels and another outside practitioner. The latter had been for many years a hypnotic operator and had more than once put Wiertz into the hypnotic state, regarding him as an excellent subject.

About this time, the trial for a murder in the Place Saint-Géry had been causing a great sensation in Belgium and the painter had been following the proceedings closely. The trial ended in the condemnation of the accused. A plan was arranged and Wiertz, with the consent of the prison doctor, obtained permission to hide with his friend, Dr. D., under the guillotine, close to where the head of the condemned would roll into the basket.

In order to carry out more efficiently the scheme he had determined upon, the painter desired his hypnotizer to put him through a regular course of hypnotic suggestion, and when he was in the sleep state to command him to identify himself with various people and tell him to read their thoughts and penetrate into their psychical and mental states. An account appeared in Le Progrés Spirite:

"On the day of execution, ten minutes before the arrival of the condemned man, Wiertz, accompanied by his friend the physician with two witnesses, ensconced themselves underneath the guillotine, where they were entirely hidden from sight. The painter was then put to sleep, and told to identify himself with the criminal. He was to follow his thoughts and feel any sensations, which he was to express aloud. He was also 'suggested' to take special note of mental conditions during decapitation, so that when the head fell in the basket he could penetrate the brain and give an account of its last thoughts.

"Wiertz became entranced almost immediately, and the four friends soon understood by the sounds overhead that the executioner was conducting the condemned to the scaffold, and in another minute the guillotine would have done its work. The hypnotized Wiertz manifested extreme distress and begged to be demagnetized, as his sense of oppression was insupportable. It was too late, however—the knife fell.

"'What do you feel? What do you see?' asks the doctor. Wiertz writhes convulsively and replies, 'Lightning! A thunderbolt falls! It thinks; it sees!' 'Who thinks and sees?' 'The head. It suffers horribly. It thinks and feels but does not understand what has happened. It seeks its body and feels that the body must join it. It still waits for the supreme blow for death, but death does not come.'

"As Wiertz spoke, the witnesses saw the head which had fallen into the basket and lay looking at them horribly; its arteries still palpitating. It was only after some moments of suffering that apparently the guillotined head at last became aware that is was separated from its body.

"Wiertz became calmer and seemed exhausted, while the doctor resumed his questions. The painter answered: 'I fly through space like a top spinning through fire. But am I dead? Is all over? If only they would let me join my body again! Have pity! give it back to me and I can live again. I remember all. There are the judges in red robes. I hear the sentence. Oh! my wretched wife and children. I am abandoned. If only you would put my body to me, I should be with you once more. You refuse? All the same I love you, my poor babies. Miserable wretch that I am I have covered you with blood. When will this finish!—or is not a murderer condemned to eternal punishment?'

"As Wiertz spoke these words, the witnesses thought they detected the eyes of the decapitated head open wide with a look of unmistakable suffering and of beseeching.

"The painter continued his lamentations: 'No, such suffering cannot endure for ever; God is merciful. All that belongs to earth is fading away. I see in the distance a little light glittering like a diamond. I feel a calm stealing over me. What a good sleep I shall have! What joy!' These were the last words the painter spoke. He was still entranced, but no longer replied to the questions put by the doctor. They then approached the head and Dr. D. touched the forehead, the temples, and teeth and found they were cold. The head was dead."

In the Wiertz Gallery in Brussels are to be found three pictures of a guillotined head, presumably the outcome of this gruesome experiment.

Theory of Hypnotic Action

Among numerous explanations of the physiological conditions accompanying the hypnotic state there is one, the theory of cerebral dissociation, which was generally accepted by science, and which may be briefly outlined as follows. The brain is composed of innumerable groups of nerve cells, all more or less closely connected with each other by means of nervous links or paths of variable resistance. Excitement of any of these groups, whether by means of impressions received through the sense organs or by the communicated activity of other groups, will, if sufficiently intense, occasion the rise into consciousness of an idea.

In the normal waking state, the resistance of the nervous association-paths is fairly low, so that the activity is easily communicated from one neural group to another. Thus the main idea which reaches the upper stratum of consciousness is attended by a stream of other, subconscious ideas, which has the effect of checking the primary idea and preventing its complete dominance.

Now the abnormal dominance of one particular system of ideas—that suggested by the operator—together with the complete suppression of all rival systems, is the principal fact to be explained in hypnosis. To some extent the physiological process conditioning hypnosis suggests an analogy with normal sleep. When one composes oneself to sleep there is a lowering of cerebral excitement and a proportionate increase in the resistance of the neural links. This is apparently what happens during hypnosis, the essential passivity of the subject raising the resistance of the association-paths.

But in normal sleep, unless some exciting cause be present, all the neural dispositions are at rest, whereas in the hypnotic state such a complete suspension of cerebral activities is not permitted, since the operator, by means of voice, gestures, and manipulations of the patient's limbs, keeps alive that set of impressions relating to himself. One neural disposition is thus isolated, so that any idea suggested by the operator is free to work itself out in action, without being submitted to the checks of the sub-activity of other ideas.

The alienation is less or more complete according to the degree of hypnotism, but a comparatively slight raising of resistance in the neural links suffices to secure the dominance of ideas suggested by the hypnotizer.

Hyperesthesia, mentioned so frequently in connection with the hypnotic state, really belongs to the doubtful class, since it has not yet been decided whether or not an actual sharpening or refining of the senses takes place. Alternatively it may be suggested that the accurate perception of faint sense-impressions, which seems to furnish evidence for hyperesthesia, merely reclass the fact that the excitement conveyed through the sensory nerve operates with extraordinary force, being freed from the restriction of sub-excitement in adjacent neural groups and systems.

In putting forward this viewpoint it must be conceded that in the conscious, awakened state, feeble sensory stimuli must act on nerve and brain just as they do in hypnosis. However, in the former case they are so stifled amid a multitude of similar impressions that they fail to reach consciousness. In any case the occasional abnormal sensitivity of the subject to slight sensory stimuli is a fact of hypnotism as well authenticated as anesthesia itself. The term "hyperesthesia," if not entirely justified, may for want of a better term, be practically applied to the observed phenomenon.

The hypnotic state is not necessarily induced by a second person. "Spontaneous" hypnotism and "autohypnotization" are well known. Certain yogis, fakirs, and shamans can produce in themselves a state closely approximating hypnosis by a prolonged fixation of the eyes, and by other means. The mediumistic trance is also, as will be shown hereafter, a case in point.

Hypnotism and Spiritualism

The association of spirits and what is today called hypnotism was advocated by the magnetic philosophers of medieval times, and even earlier by astrologers and magi. It has been shown that at a early date, phenomena of a distinctly hypnotic character were ascribed to the workings of spirit agencies, whether angelic or demonic, by a certain percentage of the observers. Thus Greatrakes and Gassner believed themselves to have been gifted with a divine power to heal diseases. Witchcraft, in which the force of hypnotic suggestion seems to have operated to a large degree, was thought to result from the witches' traffic with the devil and his legions. Cases of ecstasy, catalepsy, and other trance states were given a spiritist significance, i.e., demons, angels, elementals, and so on, were supposed to speak through the lips of the possessed. Even in some cases the souls of deceased men and women were identified with these intelligences, although not generally until the time of Swedenborg.

Although the movement known as modern Spiritualism is properly dated from 1848, the year of the Rochester rappings, its roots lead directly to the animal magnetists. Additionally, Swedenborg, whose affinities with the magnetists have already been referred to, exercised a remarkable influence on the Spiritualist thought of America and Europe, and was also a precursor of that faith. Automatic phenomena were even then a feature of the magnetic trance, and clairvoyance, community of sensation, and telepathy were believed in generally, and regarded by many as evidences of spiritual communication.

In Germany, Professor Jung-Stilling, C. Römer, Dr. Werner, and the poet and physician Justinus Kerner, were among those who held opinions on these lines, the latter pursuing his investigations with a somnambule who became famous as the Seeress of Prevorst—Frederica Hauffe. Hauffe could apparently see and converse with the spirits of the deceased, and she gave evidence of prophetic vision and clairvoyance. Physical phenomena were witnessed in her presence, knockings, rattling of chains, movement of objects without contact, and, in short, such manifestations as were characteristic of a poltergeist. She was, moreover, the originator of a "primeval" language, which she declared was that spoken by the patriarchs. Hauffe, although only a somnambule or magnetic patient, possessed all the qualities later associated with successful Spiritualist mediums.

In England also there were many circumstances of a supernatural character associated with mesmerism. Dr. Elliotson, one of the best-known of English magnetists, became in time converted to a Spiritualist theory as offering an explanation of the clairvoyance and similar phenomena he thought he observed in his patients.

France, the headquarters of the rationalist school of magnetism, had indeed a good deal less to show of Spiritualist opinion. Nonetheless even in that country the latter doctrine made its appearance at intervals prior to 1848. J. P. F. Deleuze, a capable scientist and an earnest protagonist of magnetism, who published his Histoire Critique du Magnétisme Animal in 1813, was said to have embraced the doctrines of Spiritualism before he died.

It was however, Louis-Alphonse Cahagnet, a man of humble origin who began to study induced somnambulism about the year 1845 and experimented with somnambules, who became one of the first French Spiritualists of distinction. So good was the evidence for spirit communication furnished by Cahagnet and his subjects that it remains among the most impressive the movement produced.

In the United States, La Roy Sunderland, Andrew Jackson Davis, and others who became pillars of Spiritualism were first attracted to it through the study of magnetism. Elsewhere we find hypnotism and the consideration of the work of spirits identified with each other until 1848, when a definite split occurs, and the two go their separate ways. Even so, however, the separation is not quite complete. In the first place, the mediumistic trance is obviously a variant of spontaneous or self-induced hypnotism, while in the second, many of the most striking phenomena of the séance room have been matched time and again in the records of animal magnetism.

For instance, the diagnosis of disease and prescription of remedies dictated by the control to the "healing medium" have their prototype in the cures of Valentine Greatrakes, or of Mesmer and his disciples. Automatic phenomena—speaking in tongues and so forth—early formed a characteristic feature of the induced trance and kindred states.

Even some of the physical phenomena later associated with Spiritualism, movement without contact, apports, and rappings, were witnessed in connection with magnetism long before the movement known as modern Spiritualism was so much as thought of. In some instances, though not in all, it is possible to trace the operation of hypnotic suggestion in the automatic phenomena, just as we can perceive the result of fraud in many of the physical manifestations.

Hypnotism and Psychical Phenomena

In the 1890s, psychical researcher Paul Joire described the three classical states of hypnotism:

"Lethargy, the state of complete relaxation with variable amount of anesthesia, with neuro-muscular excitation as its fundamental characteristic. In this state the subject has the eyes closed and is generally only slightly open to suggestion.

"Catalepsy, the eyes are open, the subject is as though petrified in the position which he occupies. Anesthesia is complete, and there is no sign of intelligence. Immobility is characteristic of this state.

"Somnambulism, the condition of the eyes varies, the subject appears to sleep. Simple contact, or stroking along any limb is sufficient to render that limb rigid. Suggestibility is the main characteristic of this state. The somnambulistic state presents three degrees:

"1. Waking somnambulism, slight passivity with diminution of the will and augmentation of suggestibility.

"2. The second personality begins to take the place of the normal one. Torpor of consciousness and memory. Sensibility decreases.

"3. Complete anesthesia. Disappearance of consciousness and memory. Inclination to peculiar muscular rigidity."

It is likely that the depth of hypnotic sleep may vary infinitely. Distinct trains of memory may correspond to each stage, presenting alternating personalities of a shallow type.

The means to induce the hypnotic state differ. In many cases simple suggestion will do, even from a distance; in others, passes and the close proximity of the hypnotizer will be necessary. Some subjects feel the old "mesmerizer" influence, some do not.

The implicit obedience to suggestion has great therapeutical and psychological significance. Bad habits may be improved, phobias, manias, criminal propensities, and diseases cured, inhibitions removed, pain banished, the ordinary working of defective senses restored, the ordinary senses vivified, intelligence and ability in professional pursuits increased, and new senses of perception developed.

Subconscious calculation discloses flashes of mathematical genius, and once the rapport is established, the possibility is open for the development of supernormal faculties. The subject may see clairvoyantly, give psychometric descriptions, see into the future, read the past, make spiritual excursions to distant places and hear and see events occurring there, and give correct medical diagnoses.

Eugèn Osty believed that the number of hypnotizable subjects was getting smaller and smaller, and in support of his contention, he refers in the Revue Metapsychique (November–December 1930) to the similar experiences of Berillon, Richet, and Emile Magnin. However, modern hypnotists have shown that there is no shortage of subjects and that a high percentage of ordinary individuals are susceptible to hypnosis.

The exact nature of the hypnotic trance is still somewhat unknown, although it has received additional attention as new techniques and instrumentation for measuring brain activity has been developed. The electroencephalograph (EEG), for example, can measure brain activity by detecting small electronic currents emitted by the brain. During the awakened state beta waves, at a frequency of 13-35 Hz, are discharged. Similarly, sleep emits brain waves oscillating at 4-8Hz, known either as delta or theta waves. However, the hypnotic state—the state of dreams and somnambulism—is characterized by alpha waves, which oscillate at 8-13 Hz. This state is typified by muscular relaxation, focused concentration, and hyperactivity of the senses.

Goldberg (1998) asserts the hypnotic trance is actually a natural-occurring state which transpires regularly during the day for everyone.

"We experience four hours of daydreams or natural hypnotic states during our waking day. Our nighttime dreams are another form of hypnosis occurring during the REM (rapid eye movement) cycle of sleep. We dream approximately three hours every night. Projecting this out, we experience seven hours of natural hypnosis during every twenty-four-hour day cycle—approximately 2500 hours in a year!"

The relation of hypnotic trance to the mediumistic trance is of absorbing interest to spiritualists (though of minuscule concern to modern scientists). The medium's trance differs in that it tends to be voluntary and self-induced, although hypnotism, for the purpose of relieving the medium from the attendant physiological suffering, is sometimes employed to bring it about.

Julien Ochorowicz saved the medium Stanislawa Tomczyk much exhaustion by hypnotizing her. The Didier brothers were always accompanied by a magnetizer and the mediumship of Andrew Jackson Davis was initiated by hypnotic clairvoyance. Juliette Bisson facilitated the materialization phenomena of Eva C., and Kathleen Goligher was hypnotized by W. J. Crawford, though we are now aware of the fraud inherent in Eva C.'s and Goligher's work.

The hypnotized subject has great powers of personation. But he or she does not claim, unless so suggested, communication with the dead. In the mediumistic trance such suggestion is already assumed, but works in a confined territory. Often, those whose appearance is yearned for do not communicate at all; many strangers come and go, and all the controls seem to exhibit a distinct personality far surpassing in variety the imitative efforts of any hypnotized subject. If they were subjective creations of the medium's mind, Spiritualists argue, they would not exhibit those special peculiarities by which the sitters establish their identity with their departed friends.

The hypnotic self does not normally exhibit such cunning as the personation of hundreds of individuals and the acquisition of facts deeply buried in the subconscious or totally unknown to the sitters, although there is evidence that the subconscious mind may sometimes invent plausible personalities, just like the waking consciousness of a novelist.

The hypnotic personality usually has an uncanny sense of time. Spirit controls, on the other hand, are generally vague and uncertain on this point. Their messages are not exactly located in time, and are sometimes borne out by past or near future happenings.

William James made many attempts to see whether Leonora Piper's medium-trance had any community of nature with ordinary hypnotic trance. The first two attempts to hypnotize her failed but after the fifth attempt, he noted, she had become a good hypnotic subject:

". . . as far as muscular phenomena and automatic imitations of speech and gesture go; but I could not affect her consciousness, or otherwise get her beyond this point. Her condition in this semi-hypnosis is very different from her medium-trance. The latter is characterized by great muscular unrest, even her ears moving vigorously in a way impossible to her in her waking state, but in hypnosis her muscular relaxation and weakness are extreme. She often makes several efforts to speak before her voice becomes audible; and to get a strong contraction of the hand, for example, express manipulation and suggestion must be practised. Her pupils contract in the medium-trance. Suggestions to the control that he should make her recollect after the medium-trance what she had been saying were accepted, but had no result. In the hypnotic trance such a suggestion will often make the patient remember all that has happened."

Current Issues in Hypnosis

From time to time hypnotism has been used in an attempt to validate theories of reincarnation. In hypnotic regression, a hypnotized subject is made to recall experiences that progressively regress to birth and then (allegedly) to memories of former births. An early experimenter in this technique was Albert Rochas from France.

In modern times, the hypnotist Morey Bernstein created a sensation with his book The Search for Bridey Murphy (1956). The book was based on his experiences with the subject "Ruth Simmons" (Mrs. Virginia Tighe), alleged to have recovered memories of a previous life as an Irish girl named Bridey Murphy. Another modern experimenter is Denys Kelsey, who hypnotized his wife, novelist Joan Grant. Their book, Many Lifetimes (1969), presents Joan Grant's claimed memories of former lives. Many of these memories were given in a series of novels by Grant.

Past life regression is a therapeutic technique of hypnosis said to be used to resolve conflicts between souls which may have originated in a lifetime prior to the last birth. Several different types of phenomena can reportedly occur during such regressive episodes:

Xenoglossy is the speaking or writing during a hypnotic trance, in a language previously unknown by the subject.

Soul loss is said to be the forfeiture of vital energy experienced as a result of any kind of physical, emotional, mental, or spiritual trauma. In the regressive practice of soul retrieval, the therapist seeks to disentangle the subject's soul from another entity, freeing each soul of its dysfunctional attachment to the other.

Possession occurs when flashes of an attached entity's past infiltrate the subject's own past life memories, while depossession seeks to remove the traces of the separate entity from the current life experience.

Future life progression examines the effect of interacting paranormal entities which originate in the future.

Even with subjects who do not believe in past lives and spiritual entities, these hypnotic regressions are said to be effective projective exercises—a kind of internal role playing—for resolving emotional conflict.

Related to past life regression is the phenomenon of age regression. Through hypnotic techniques, the subject is made to relive experiences of an earlier age in the current lifetime, in order to resolve trauma or conflict which originated in that age period. Age regression is related to a controversial practice called Repressed Memory Therapy (RMT). Considerable media attention has focused on accusations of severe and ritual child sexual abuse which have emerged from Repressed Memory Therapy, and other hypnotic techniques reclaiming regressed memories. Critics of RMT assert that the memories of the sexual abuse which the subjects claim to retrieve are often actually imaginative ideas suggested, often unwittingly, by the hypnotist. Although amnesia and delayed recall are documented among sex abuse victims, critics warn reconstruction of the memories cannot be thought of as empirical evidence of abuse, but rather part of a theoretical construct used to explain the given disorder.

Apart from its use in paranormal episodes, hypnotism remains an often effective technique in the treatment of emotional and behavioral disorders. In addition to psychotherapeutic sessions, hypnotism is now being utilized in other realms of health and education. For instance, hypno-birthing is a technique founded by Marie Mongan. Hypnotic techniques are reportedly utilized to create a calm state for the birth mother. This alledgedly enables the mother to draw upon natural birthing muscles, bodily anesthesias, and inherent instincts to facilitate a trauma-free birth.

Another modern derivative of hypnotic techniques is Neuro Linguistic Programming (NLP), developed by John Grinder and Richard Bandler of the University of California at Santa Cruz. NLP is the study of how communication effects and is effected by subjective experience, which can be used to determine how different kinds of persons learn. It explores relationships between neurology, linguistics, and observable patterns of behavior, incorporating hypnotic techniques of Milton Erickson. NLP unlocks secrets of highly effective communication, some of which might be outside the realm of conscious awareness.

Both age regression and past life regression, however, point to the heart of the debate concerning using hypnotism to access memory, or for facilitating occult and parapsychological encounters. The controversy revolves around determining the exact nature of what the somnambulistic subject experiences and, subsequently, expresses. Perhaps the subject actually encounters entities, communications, and experiences originating in alternative planes of existence. Or maybe these phenomena are merely the result of imagination heightened by suggestion, whether intentional or incidental. It is possible that these experiences merely reflect images and information that have accumulated in the unconscious, often escaping the awareness of the sentient mind.

Since it is often difficult for the subject themselves to differentiate between these kind of stimuli, the debate is likely to continue indefinitely.

Sources:

Ambrose, G., and G. Newbold. A Handbook of Medical Hypnosis. 4th ed. New York: Macmillan, 1980.

Barber, Theodore Zenophon. Hypnosis: A Scientific Approach. New York: Psychological Dimensions, 1976.

Bernheim, H. Hypnosis and Suggestion in Psychotherapy: A Treatise on the Nature and Uses of Hypnotism. London, 1888. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Braid, James. Neurypnology. 1843. Reprinted as Braid on Hypnotism: The Beginnings of Modern Hypnosis. New York: Julian Press, 1960.

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1970.

Cahagnet, L. Alphonse. The Celestial Telegraph. London, 1850. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Carroll, Robert Todd. "Repressed Memory Therapy." Skeptic's Dictionary 1998 http://skepdic.com/repress.html.

Crasilneck, Harold B. Clinical Hypnosis: Principles and Applications. Orlando: Grune & Stratton, 1985.

Deleuze, J. P. F. Practical Instruction on Animal Magnetism. New York, 1879.

Edmunds, Simeon. Hypnotism and Psychic Phenomena. Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire, n.d.

Erskine, Alex. A Hypnotist's Casebook. London: Rider, 1932.

Esdaile, James. Mesmerism in India. 1850. Reprinted as Hypnosis in Medicine and Surgery. New York: Institute for Research in Hypnosis Publication Press, 1957.

Fahnestock, William B. Statuvolism, or Artifical Somnambulism. Chicago, 1871.

Frankau, Gilbert, ed. Mesmerism by Doctor Mesmer (1779): Being the First Translation of Mesmer's Historic "Mémoire sur la découverte du Magnétisme Animal" to appear in English. London: Macdonald, 1948.

Goldberg, Dr. Bruce. New Age Hypnosis. St. Paul, Minn: Lewellyn Publications, 1998.

Goldsmith, Margaret. Franz Anton Mesmer: The History of an Idea. London: Arthur Barker, 1934.

Greatrakes, Valentine. A Brief Account of Mr. V. Greatrakes and Divers of the Strange Cures by Him Performed, Written by Himself. London, 1666.

Gregory, William. Animal Magnetism or Mesmerism and its Phenomena. London, 1884. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Grossi, Ralph. Reliving Reincarnation Through Hypnosis. Smithtown, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1975.

Gucciardi, Isa, Ph.D. "Depth Hypnosis with Isa Gucciardi, Ph.D," 15 March 2000 http://www.andreas.com/depth-hypnosis/.

Haddock, Joseph W. Somnolism and Psycheisan: Of The Science of the Soul and The Phenomence of Nervation. London, 1851. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Hall, James A. Hypnosis: A Jungian Perspective. New York: Guilford Press, 1989.

Hopper, James, Ph.D. "Recovered Memories of Sexual Abuse: Scientific Research & Scholarly Resources," 10 October 1999 http://www.jimhopper.com/.

Hull, C. L. Hypnosis and Suggestibility: An Experimental Approach. New York: Century Psychology Service, 1933.

Milne, J. Bramwell. Hypnotism: Its History, Practice, and Theory. London, 1903.

Moll, Albert. Hypnotism: Including a Study of the Chief Points of Psycho-Therapeutics and Occultism. London: Walter Scott Publishing, 1909.

Natural Childbirth. http://hypnobirthing.com. March 29, 2000.

Ochorowicz, Julien. De la Suggestion Mentale. Paris, 1887.

Podmore, Frank. Mesmerism and Christian Science. London: Methuen, 1909.

Reichenbach, Karl von. Letters on Od and Magnetism. Translated by William Gregory. London: Hutchinson, 1928. Reprinted as The Odic Force: Letters on Od and Magnetism. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

———. Researches on Magnetism, Electricity, Heat, Light, Crystallizaton, and Chemical Attraction in their Relations to the Vital Force. Translated by William Gregory. London, 1850. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Rutter, J. O. N. Human Electricity: The Means of Its Development. London: Parker, 1854.

Smith, Susy. ESP and Hypnosis. New York: Macmillan, 1973.

Theories of Hypnosis: Current Models and Perspectives. New York: Guilford Press, 1991.

Tinterow, Maurice M. Foundations of Hypnosis: From Mesmer to Freud. Springfield, Ill.: Chas. C. Thomas, 1970.

Toksvig, Signe. Emmanuel Swedenborg, Scientist and Mystic. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1948.

Wambach, Helen. Reliving Past Lives: The Evidence Under Hypnosis. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.

Wilson, Ian. All in the Mind. Garden City, New York: Doubleday and Co., Inc, 1982.

Hypocephalus

A disk of bronze or painted linen found under the heads of Greco-Roman mummies in Egypt. It is inscribed with magic formulas and divine figures, and its purpose was probably to secure warmth for the corpse.

Hyslop, George Hall (1892–1965)

American physician, neuropsychiatrist, and psychical researcher. He was born on December 20, 1892, in New York City. He studied at Indiana University (B.A., 1913; M.A. psychology, 1914) and Cornell University Medical College (M.D., 1919). He had a distinguished medical and psychiatric career and served as president of the New York Neurological Society (1955–56) and as chair of the section on neurology and psychiatry of the New York Academy of Medicine (1941–42).

Hyslop was the son of pioneer psychic researcher James Hervey Hyslop. He joined the board of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) in 1921, the year after his father's death, and suffered through the society's disruption in the 1920s. He emerged at the end of the decade as one of the prime voices demanding the reestablishment of the high standards of research that had existed during his father's lifetime. In 1941, at the time of the merger of the Boston Society for Psychical Research back into the ASPR, he assumed the mantle of leadership of the organization and served as president for the next 21 years. He was also a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hyslop, George H. "The Biological Approach to Psychic Phenomena." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (April 1942).

———. "Certain Problems of Psychic Research." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (August 1930).

———. "An Instance of Apparent Spontaneous Telepathy." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (April 1948).

———. "James H. Hyslop: His Contribution to Psychical Research." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (October 1950).

———. "Report of the Questionnaire Committee." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (November 1930).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Hyslop, James Hervey (1854–1920)

Professor of logic and ethics and prominent psychical researcher. He was born on August 18, 1854, in Xenia, Ohio. He was educated at Wooster College, Ohio (B.A., 1877), the University of Leipzig (1882–84), and Johns Hopkins University (Ph.D., 1877). He was one of the first American psychologists to connect psychology with psychic phenomena. He joined the philosophy department at Columbia University as a professor in ethics and logic, during which time he became deeply involved with psychical research.

As early as 1888, in a skeptical frame of mind, he was brought for the first time into contact with the supernormal through the mediumship of Leonora Piper. Messages from his father and relatives poured through. Out of 205 incidents mentioned as of his sixteenth sitting, he was able to verify 152.

The personalities of the communicators were so impressive that after 12 sittings he publicly declared,

"I have been talking with my father, my brother, my uncles. Whatever supernormal powers we may be pleased to attibute to Mrs. Piper's secondary personalities, it would be difficult to make me believe that these secondary personalities could have thus completely reconstituted the mental personality of my dead relatives. To admit this would involve me in too many improbabilities. I prefer to believe that I have been talking to my dead relatives in person; it is simpler."

Early in the new century ill health forced him to retire from his teaching post. He used the occasion to found the American Institute for Scientific Research to stir interest and raise funds for psychical research. However, in 1905 Richard Hodgson, the research officer and real force in the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR), died. The following year the ASPR was dissolved. Hyslop quickly revived it as a section of his institute. It soon absorbed and replaced the institute altogether.

Hyslop dominated, somewhat autocratically, the ASPR for the rest of his life. He assumed Hodgson's role as chief investigator of Piper's continuing mediumship. He issued the first Journal in January 1907. He recruited both Hereward Carrington and Walter F. Prince to assist in the work.

Hyslop became a significant propagandist of human survival of death. In his Life After Death (1918), for example, he forcefully states,

"I regard the existence of discarnate spirits as scientifically proved and I no longer refer to the skeptic as having any right to speak on the subject. Any man who does not accept the existence of discarnate spirits and the proof of it is either ignorant or a moral coward. I give him short shrift, and do not propose any longer to argue with him on the supposition that he knows anything about the subject."

Hyslop also contributed many ingenious theories to psychical literature. He made a deep study of multiple personality and of obsession, and came to the conclusion that in many cases it could be attributed to spirit possession. In his will he left money to found an institute for the treatment of obsession through the instrumentality of mediums. He died June 17, 1920, in Upper Montclair, New Jersey. The evidence of his own spirit return is discussed by his longtime secretary, Gertrude O. Tubby, in her book James Hyslop X.—His Book (1929).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hyslop, George H. "James H. Hyslop: His Contribution to Psychical Research." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (October 1950).

Hyslop, James H. Borderland of Psychical Research. London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1906.

———. Contact with the Other World. New York: Century, 1919.

———. Enigmas of Psychical Research. Boston: H. B. Turner, 1906.

———. Life After Death: Problems of the Future Life and Its Nature. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1918.

———. Psychical Research and Survival. London: G. Bell and Sons, 1913.

———. Psychical Research and the Resurrection. Boston: Small, Maynard, 1908.

———. Science and a Future Life. London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1906.

Knopf, A. Adolphus. A Reminiscence of and a Promise to Professor James Hervey Hyslop. New York: The Author, 1921.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Tubby, Gertrude. James Hysop X—His Book. York, Pa.: York Printing, 1929.

Hyujong (1520–1604)

Hyujong, a sixteenth-century Korean Buddhist meditation master, was born at Anju in P'yongan Province. His parents died when he was a child, and he was adopted by a local magistrate. He was sent to the National Academy in the capital and seemed destined for life as a civil servant. However, he failed the civil service examination and left the city to wander through the countryside. He studied Buddhism with various teachers and spent considerable time in meditation. Then in 1549 his early training came to his aid as he took an exam for an administrative position with the national Buddhist establishment. Passing at the top of his group, he was offered an important monastic title. He served for eight years before resigning and returning to a life of meditation.

Hyujong's writings reflect in part the secondary position of Buddhism in Korea during the century in which he lived. Confucian thought reigned supreme. He tried to argue that in essence, Buddhism, Taoism, and Confucianism were in agreement, though they differed in outward appearance. He argued for the superiority of the way of Buddhist meditation without denigrating Confucian thought.

Hyujong's major work, The Mirror of the Meditation School, appeared in 1564. Essentially a manual for monks, it attempted to bridge the difference between those more interested in Buddhist teachings and those more interested in meditation. Adopting a similar approach to his perspective on Confucianism, he argued that doctrine and meditation were ultimately the same, with meditation being Buddha's mind and doctrine Buddha's words. In the end, however, the identification breaks down and meditation is superior to doctrines. Doctrines are the passageway to the goal that is only reached with meditation.

Hyujong argued that everyone had the potential for enlightenment. Those spiritually inclined could do it through the identification of their own mind with the Buddha's mind and work to bring their thought and action into conformity with that realization. For others, enlightenment could be reached through such outward practices as chanting the Buddha's name and the use of mantras and spells to assist in ridding one of past karmic accretions.

Toward the end of his life, Hyujong was called to lead an army of monks against the Japanese who invaded Korea in 1592. He survived the fighting and lived to 1604. He was little appreciated outside of Buddhist circles in his own day, but has been given renewed attention in the decades since the Korean War (1950s). His writings have not yet been translated into English or other Western languages.

Sources:

McGreal, Ian P. Great Thinkers of the Eastern World. New York: Harper, 1995.

I

IAC See Institute for Anomalistic Criminology

IAM See International Association of Metaphysicians

I AM America

I AM America is a publishing house founded to publish and distribute the I AM America Map, a map showing a set of predicted Earth changes that will affect the United States in the near future, and related teaching materials. The map was received in a series of channeled transmissions to Lori Toye, a farmwife and mother of three children. In 1978 Toye had become the student of the ascended masters in the tradition of the ''I AM'' Religious Activity. In 1983, four beings she recognized as ascended masters appeared to her in a dream and showed her a map of North America that indicated places where dramatic changes would be occurring.

Toye did not act on her dream but over the next years shared the content with several friends. They all encouraged her and in 1988 she began to meditate on the dream and the prophecies associated with it. Eventually the four masters reappeared and initiated some six months of channeling activity. Within the messages was a detailed set of prophecies of coming change. The prophecies were attached to a message of coming catastrophes and the possibilities of choices that would lead to new opportunities.

After receiving all of the material, Toye decided to sell her home and with the money, have the map printed. It became available in September of 1989. She then launched a lecture tour through California and the Northwest. The following year she met Lenard Toye, whom she eventually married. They established I AM America.

The map and associated prophecies suggest that the coming changes will be signaled by the arrival of a huge meteor that will set off various faults and volcanoes around the Pacific Rim. A series of steps will follow, including the melting of the Arctic icecap and a shift in the Earth's polar axis. Among the major changes will be the inundation of the American West Coast, Florida, and the Mississippi River Valley. Following the change, five golden city vortexes will arise.

These changes were to begin occurring at the end of the 1990s, which obviously did not happen. Around 1996, Toye and her husband began to back away from the literal interpretation of the prophecies. They began to emphasize the message of the map as an opportunity to exercise choice and bring in the ultimate golden age that is to be focused in the five golden city vortexes. They have noted that it is possible to begin to build the golden age immediately without waiting for any Earth changes. Each person can begin to act for the environment, work on a project to improve his/her community, and initiate efforts for self-improvement. Each person can also visit one of the golden city vortexes and feel its very different energy level. Meanwhile I AM America continues to distribute the map and its associated products.

I AM America can be reached at P.O. Box 2511, Payson, AZ 85547. Its Internet site is at http://www.iamamerica.com/.

Sources:

I AM America. http://www.iamamerica.com/. June 10, 2000.

''I AM'' Religious Activity

Theosophical religious movement that originated in the 1930s. It was founded by Guy W. Ballard (1878–1939) and Edna W. Ballard (1886–1971), who claimed to be the ''accredited messengers'' of the ascended masters of the Great White Brotherhood. In 1929 Guy Ballard visited Mt. Shasta, a volcano in northern California that had for several generations been the object of legends and mysterious stories, among them that it was hollow and the home to occult adepts. In the slope of the mountain, Ballard, as he later recounted the story, encountered the ascended master Saint Germain. Saint Germain supposedly assigned Ballard the task of initiating the Seventh Golden age, the permanent ''I AM'' age of eternal perfection on earth. The saint designated Ballard, his wife, and their son Donald as the only accredited messengers of the masters.

Staying near Mt. Shasta, Ballard wrote about his experiences in a series of letters to his wife. He returned to Chicago and they initiated the ''I AM'' Religious Activity and organized the Saint Germain Foundation and the Saint Germain Press. In 1934 and 1935 the press issued two initial volumes, Unveiled Mysteries and The Magic Presence, which describe Ballard's experiences with the masters. In 1934 Ballard held his first ten-day public class, in which he delivered messages for the masters by a process known today as channeling, though leaders of the movement reject that term. These messages were published in The Voice of the ''I AM'' beginning in 1936, and the most important were compiled into a set of books.

The ''I AM'' teachings build upon previous claimed contact with ascended masters by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Ballard claimed to have contacted not only the several masters who spoke to Blavatsky but also a host of additional exalted beings. By far the largest number of messages were from Saint Germain and the master Jesus.

Through Ballard the masters taught of the ''I AM,'' the basic divine reality of the universe, God in action. Individualized, the ''I AM'' is the essence of each person, they said, and should be constantly invoked and activated. It is pictured as an entity residing above each person's head and surrounded by golden light and a rainbow of color. It is connected to the person by a shaft of white light. The ''I AM'' presence is invoked by use of decrees, affirmative commands that the ''I AM'' presence initiate action in the self and the world. Basic in the daily activity of an ''I AM'' student is the violet flame decree, in which a violet flame is pictured surrounding the person and purifying him spiritually.

The ''I AM'' movement has published a wide variety of decrees to be used for all life situations. Included are a set of decrees used for removing negative conditions from the individual's life or environment. These negative decrees have been occasionally misunderstood, and the movement has occasionally been accused of using them to curse someone, which the movement denies. The decrees picture the blasting away of negative energies in the world, and strict instructions are given to students not to decree against any person.

The ''I AM'' movement grew spectacularly during the 1930s but ran into significant problems shortly after Guy Ballard's death in 1939. Several former students began to organize against the movement, charging that its leaders were religious frauds. In 1942 Edna Ballard, Donald Ballard, and a number of leading students were charged with mail fraud. In the trial the prosecutor argued that Ballard had made up the religion and that he and other members did not believe it and operated the foundation purely as a fraudulent moneymaking scheme. Although the defendants were initially convicted, the convictions were eventually overturned in an important Supreme Court decision holding that one's religious faith could not be put on trial. Not until the early 1950s was the damage done by the initial indictments reversed.

Meanwhile Edna Ballard had assumed control of the movement, taking it out of the public spotlight. She refused to give interviews to outsiders, and through the next decades many supposed the movement had died out. It had actually expanded. As of the early 1980s there were more than three hundred ''I AM'' sanctuaries and centers in North America. The movement is now led by a board and several teachers appointed by the Ballards. Since Edna Ballard's death, no messages have been received from the masters.

The Saint Germain Foundation and Press are located at 1120 Stonehedge Dr., Schaumburg, IL 60194. A summer retreat center is located not far from Mt. Shasta, California. Every summer, members gather for various events, closing with the public presentation of a pageant on the life of Christ. The pageant tells the story of Jesus' life without mentioning the Crucifixion and emphasizes Christ's ascension.

Ending one's life on earth by ascending to the realm of the masters is a goal of ''I AM'' activity.

Sources:

Germain, Saint, through Guy W. Ballard. The "I AM" Discourses. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1935.

King, Godfre Ray [Guy W. Ballard]. The Magic Presence. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1934.

———. Unveiled Mysteries. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1935.

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. Detroit: Gale Research, 1992.

IANDS See International Association for Near-Death Studies

Iao (or I-ha-ho)

A mystic emblem said by Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–ca. 213 C.E.) to have been worn by the initiates of the mysteries of Serapis. It was said to embody the symbols of the two generative principles, and is thus similar to aum in India. Serapis was an Egyptian divinity who, with Isis, supplanted Osiris and Apis and acquired their attributes. As a healing divinity, Serapis was a rival of Aesculapius in Rome and in vogue in the Greek cult of Asklepios at Pergamon and Alexandria.

IAPR See International Association for Psychotropic Research

IARP See International Association for Religion and Parapsychology

Ica Stones

Among the important artifacts brought forth in the 1990s as evidence of ancient contact between humans and extraterrestrials are the so-called stones of Ica, Peru. The stones, carved at some point in prehistorical (i.e., pre-Columbian) times, appear to show humans fighting dinosaurs, complex medical operations on the human body, and various long-extinct animal species.

The stones were first discovered by Dr. Javier Cabrera in 1966 when as a young physician residing in Ica, he was given one of the stones as a gift. He became interested as he discerned that the stone pictured a long-extinct fish. Over time he discovered more of the stones, all carved from andesite, an extremely hard stone rarely chosen for carvings. Over the next 25 years, Cabrera collected more that 15,000 of the stones, which he now displays in a modest museum. In the process of collecting the stones, he uncovered a cave in which many thousands have been found.

Cabrera initially reached the conclusion that the stones had been carved by local people to feed the tourist trade. However, their number and the difficulty of working andesite soon led him to question that idea. He was further convinced by the nature of the images he found, which required some technical knowledge of dinosaurs. He concluded that the stones were real ancient artifacts, that they pictured events and objects seen by those who carved them, and they suggest some rewriting of ancient history.

Skeptical voices looking at the stones have suggested that they are a hoax, at least in part, though the motivation for carving so many of the stones for no apparent financial motive (there are so many that they have little value) is not explained. It has also been suggested that some of the stones may in fact be old artifacts, but that the interpretation placed on them by Cabrera is romantic fantasy. They also point out that there is not other evidence of an ancient culture that could have carved the stones. In the meantime, books and Internet sites showing examples of the stones and arguing for their authenticity have appeared. People interested in ancient mysteries have speculated on the stones and tied them to other artifacts found in the country and tied them to ancient astronauts or to Atlantis.

The museum established by Cabrera can be contacted at Plaza de Armas, Bolivar No. 170, Ica, Peru.

Sources:

Cabrera, Javier. The Message of the Ingraved Stones of Ica. Ica, Peru: The Author, n.d.

Prickett, Robert. ''Ica Stones of Peru.'' http://www.mm2000.nu/sphinxff.html. June 11, 2000.

Stones of Ica, Peru. http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Rue/3378/stones.html. June 11, 2000.

ICELAND

The history of Iceland began around 870 C.E. when Norse settlers arrived from the west coast of Norway, as well as those who had previously settled in Ireland and Great Britain. Some Icelanders would explore eventually the land that came to be known as Greenland; but the majority of the people of Iceland formed a conservative rural society. They were farmers who created a highly-evolved social structure defined by their work with the land. The stories they told, well-known as the Islendinga sogur, or, Iceland sagas, reflected that down-to-earth daily life by which honor was to be measured.

Through the best-known literary character, Odin, Icelanders were not totally without fantasy, myth or fascination with the magical and mysterious. Robert Kellogg, in an introduction to the book, The Sagas of Icelanders, talked about the role Odin as he discussed Egil's Saga, a key story in Icelandic literature:

> The patron of all poets was Odin, who was sometimes known as the one-eyed god. . .Odin gave away his eye in order to drink from the underworld well of the wise god Mimir and thus to acquire wisdom. Egils is not only the beneficiary of Odin's gifts of poetry and magic, but also to some small degree an embodiment of the god.

Iceland has been a Christian country since 1000 C.E., following its ancestral religious roots of Asatru. (An interesting note is that the writings of J.R.R. Tolkein, known best for the Lord of the Rings, emerged from the Codex Regis, the ancient ''sacred'' manuscript of this pre-Christian belief. While Iceland's citizens currently enjoy the Constitutional benefit of freedom of religion, nearly 95 percent of them are Lutherans, the state-affiliated church. At the end of the twentieth century Iceland's population at 240,000 was about the same size as Cumberland County, Maine, the largest in that state. With the entire country's population occupying only about one-fifth of the land, Iceland is about the size of a medium American city. The people, too, are an interestingly homogenous group. Unlike Americans, all natives have descended from only two groups-the original Nordic and Celtic people who settled there. (Consequently, the population has been the subject of scientific research crucial to the study health and disease throughout the years.) This fact also emphasizes that while statistics might indicate only a small portion of the population engaged in the area of psychical research, or phenomena, it reflects a percentage that in fact might be no lower than many other countries.

Icelandic interest in psychical research goes back many years to the founding of Salarrannsoknafelag Island, the Society for Psychical Research of Iceland in Reykjavik in 1918. The founder was Prof. Einar Hjöleifsson Kvaran (1859–1938), a well-known writer who edited Morgunn, a Spiritualist magazine. A prominent member was Prof. Harald Nielsson (d. 1928) of the University of Reykjavik, who spent five years investigating the phenomena of the medium Indridi Indridason.

Indridi Indridason (1883–1912) was a physical medium, long unknown outside of Iceland. He is believed to be the first Icelander who demonstrated such gifts. When he first demonstrated them in 1905 at a ''table-tilting'' being held by academic researchers, and reportedly lasted until 1909. The group of investigators were those that later formed the Icelandic Society for Psychical Research. One of Indridason's most chilling communications was the story of a fire in Copenhagen on November 24, 1905. It was not confirmed until a month later when news came by boat from Denmark—the only means the story had of transmittal in those early days of the twentieth century. Other phenomena including materializations became commonplace during the seances Indridason served.

A prominent Icelandic psychologist and parapsychologist, Erlendur Haraldsson is known worldwide for his work investigations of ESP, and experiences of death. One of his most famous works was, Modern Miracles, based on the life of Indian religious leader, Sathya Sai Baba, known for the miracles that he performed. He serves on the faculty of Social Sciences at the University of Iceland in Reykjavik. In a 1988–989 survey he conducted entitled, ''Survey of Claimed Encounters with the Dead,'' Haraldsson discovered that 31 percent of Icelanders, ''. . .perceived the presence of a dead person.'' His work continues while he remains a faculty member in social sciences and is perhaps reflective of a few aspects of human daily life that fit into the context their own history and sociology.

Sources

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Iceland. http://www.iceland.org/. June 6, 2000.

Noah's Ark Society (Great Britain). The Mediumship of Indridi Indridason. http://www.noahsark.clara.net/ind1.htm. June 6, 2000.

Thorsson, Ornolfur, ed. The Sagas of Icelanders. New York: Viking (Penguin), 1997.

I Ching (Yi King or Y-Kim)

The ancient Chinese Book of Changes, attributed to the emperor Fo-Hi in 3468 B.C.E. It expounds a classical Chinese philosophy based on the dual cosmic principles of yin and yang and claims to elucidate the outcome of any given situation by a technique involving interpretation of 64 hexagrams, each composed of two groups of three lines. These lines are each either broken or solid.

Predicitions are traditionally ascertained by a detailed process of selecting sticks or yarrow stalks to indicate the appropriate hexagram and the interpretation associated with it. A bundle of 50 sticks is used. These should be kept wrapped in clean silk or cloth. When the I Ching is consulted, it is traditional to face south and incorporate the divination procedure into a ritual. Prostrations are made, then incense lighted and the sticks passed through the fumes. The question to be answered should be straightfoward, usually related to the favorable or unfavorable auguries of a given project. One of the 50 sticks is taken out and put on one side. The remaining 49 are bunched together then quickly divided into two heaps by the right hand. The inquirer then takes one stick from the right-hand pile and places it between the last two fingers of the left hand. He then pushes away four sticks at a time from the left-hand pile until only one, two, three, or four remain. This remainder is placed between the next two fingers of the left hand. Next, four sticks at a time are pushed away from the right-hand pile until only one, two, three, or four remain. The left hand should now contain either five or nine sticks, thus: 1 + 1 + 3; 1 + 2 + 2; 1 + 3 + 1; or 1 + 4 + 4. These sticks are laid in the second heap. The process is then repeated with the remaining sticks from the first heap, which are pushed together with the right hand and then divided as previously. This will yield a total of either four or eight sticks, thus: 1 + 1 + 2; 1 + 2 + 1; 1 + 3 + 4; or 1 + 4 + 3. These four or eight sticks are then placed on the first pile, but kept slightly apart from those already there.

The process is repeated with sticks remaining on the first heap, resulting in either four or eight, as in the second phase. After these three counts, the second heap will contain (5 or 9) + (4 or 8) + (4 or 8). These three figures indicate the bottom line of the appropriate hexagram (i.e., unbroken or broken), and whether ''moving'' or not. The 49 sticks are then bunched together again and the whole process repeated to discover the second line from the bottom of the hexagram, and so on until the six lines have been found. A table of interpretations of the upper and lower trigrams can then be consulted.

A quicker system of divining the appropriate hexagrams involves tossing six coins; a set of I Ching playing cards has been marketed in the United States, permitting an even more rapid divination.

There are several translations currently available, and it is advisable to study more than one, because the interpretations of the ancient Chinese concepts and symbols sometimes vary. For parallels between the I Ching and Western occultism, see Y-Kim, Book of.

Sources:

Baynes, C. F., and R. Wilhelm, trans. The I Ching or Book of Changes. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1967.

Blofeld, John, trans. I Ching: The Book of Changes. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1968.

Legge, James, trans. I Ching: Book of Changes. Edited by Ch'u Chai and Winberg Chai. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Liu, Da. I Ching Coin Prediction. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Reifler, Sam. I Ching: A New Interpretation for Modern Times. New York: Bantam, 1974.

Schoenholtz, Larry. New Directions in the I Ching: The Yellow River Legacy. New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, 1975.

Wincup, Gregory. Rediscovering the I Ching. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1986.

Ichthyomancy

Divination by the inspection of the entrails of fish.

Icke, David (1952–)

British television presenter who was a familiar figure on television snooker (a form of pool) contests. Icke became a sensation when he suddenly turned visionary, promoting often bizarre channeled revelations that were featured in his books.

Born in Leicester, England, Icke's interest in sports began at an early age. He became a professional goalkeeper for the Coventry City soccer team and later for Hereford United. After his career was thwarted by arthritis, he eventually became a sports journalist and television presenter.

When his media career ended he was married, with two children. He worked for a time for a travel agency, becoming familiar with railway timetables. He was fascinated by steam trains and planned to write a history of the steam line on the Isle of Wight. He moved there in 1984 and championed the cause of the Isle of Wight Steam Railway. He was also active in other causes, notably the welfare of the handicapped. He organized a Special Olympics for children in 1987, which he persuaded BBC Television to film. Icke became the first president of the Isle of Wight Special Olympics Committee, and his associates recall his tremendous enthusiasm for that cause, which did not last. In his later visionary period he put forward the astonishing view that the mentally handicapped have brought their condition upon themselves by acts in former lives.

After his enthusiasm for steam train history and the mentally handicapped waned, Icke next entered Isle of Wight politics through the Liberal Party (since renamed Liberal Democrats), but suddenly dropped out, now converted to the cause of Green party politics. This conversion, which he claims changed his life, occurred after reading the Green party's manifesto. This new cause is documented in his book It Doesn't Have To Be Like This (1990). He also championed the Green cause on television programs.

In 1990, while Icke was seeking relief for his arthritis from a medium and spiritual healer, the medium channeled a message from an entity claiming to be Chinese and to have died 800 years earlier, which stated that Icke "is a healer who is here to heal the earth, and he will be world-famous." Through another channeler, Deborah Shaw (since known as Mari Schawaun), he received messages from "master souls and extraterrestrials" named Attarre and Rakorczy claiming that the Isle of Wight was a center point for life forces and ley lines (ancient straight tracks on the ground) from all over the world, that Earth was in danger of imminent destruction through geological upheavals, and that the Christian church had perverted Christ's teachings by hiding the realities of karmic reincarnation.

In his book The Truth Vibrations (1991), Icke proclaimed himself the Son of God, destined to help remedy the imbalance of Earth's energies and ensure the survival of the planet. The book was disastrous to his television career, which rapidly came to an end, and Icke was widely ridiculed for his bizarre and outlandish beliefs. In a later book, The Robots Rebellion (1994), Icke claimed that the controversy and criticism had served a valuable purpose in giving him a platform from which to put forward his views to a wider public.

ICR See The Institute for Consciousness Research

Identity

Establishing the identity of spirit communicators has been a difficult problem for psychical researchers. Nineteenth-century Russian Spiritualist A. N. Aksakof conceded, "Absolute proof of spirit identity is impossible to obtain; we must be content with relative proof." Psychical researcher Charles Richet agreed, saying, "Subjective metapsychics will always be radically incapable of proving survival."

Sir Oliver Lodge suggested that the question of identity in spirit communication could be established (1) by gradually accumulated internal evidence based on thorough and meticulous records; (2) by cross correspondences, that is, the reception of unintelligible parts of one consistent and coherent message through different mediums; or (3) by information or criteria especially characteristic of the supposed communicating intelligence and, if possible, in some sense new to the world.

The role of the communicating spirit in a Spiritualist séance is somewhat complicated. The spirit acts like a prompter in the theater. The automatic script or trance speech delivered through the medium is seldom in his or her own hand or voice. The medium's organism acts like a freshly painted sieve; it tints whatever it lets through. Besides, communication is an art itself and has its own inherent difficulties. Direct voice séances, materialization in good light, lifelike personation of the departed, or the transfiguration of the medium, which afford more dramatic evidence with less opportunity for self-deception, are comparatively rare.

Many spirit entities claim to be ancient or historic personalities, and the problem of establishing the identity of such entities is almost impossible. Impersonation frequently occurs. According to the entity "Imperator," in a script of Rev. William Stainton Moses, "There is much insanity among lower spirits. The assumption of great names, when it is not the work of conscious deceivers, is the product of insanity. The spirit imagines itself to be some great one, fancies how he would act, and so projects his imaginings on the sphere of the medium's consciousness."

If the information claimed as proof of identity of famous personages is verifiable, it cannot be proved that such facts were not fraudulently gathered by the medium before the séance, that the information was inaccessible to the medium's subconscious mind, or that it was not obtained through clairvoyance. Furthermore, "Rector," another control of Stainton Moses, purportedly had the power to read books. Such power would open up a storehouse of pertinent information for so-called deceiving spirits.

Therefore, the difficulties of proof of spirit identity are almost insurmountable, a major reason why psychical research has largely abandoned the task. On a practical level, however, the human element—personal information embedded in the complexity of life—often provides convincing material to an individual who receives a communication through a medium.

One of the earliest cases of such convincing identity proof was registered by the Rev. J. B. Ferguson in his book Spirit Communion (1854). According to Ferguson's account, his cousin O. F. Parker died on August 5, 1854, in St. Louis. On the following day, in Maryville, Kentucky, Mrs. Ferguson was controlled by his spirit. Part of the communication was "My books I ordered to be sold to defray my funeral expenses, but it was not done. I am afraid, too, that there will be some flaw picked in my life policy, and if so I wish you to order my books to be sold to pay my debts, and if they fail, do not fail then from any delicacy of feeling to write to my mother, and she will have all properly settled. The policy is now in the hands of Mr. Hitchcock."

The Reverend Ferguson affirmed that until the communication the only account they had of his cousin's death was a short telegram. Because every detail was found correct, he considered the evidence of identity overwhelming.

C. H. Foster was visited in 1874 in San Francisco by the Honorable Charles E. de Long, a perfect stranger to him. Foster said he had a message for Ida and asked the visitor if this name meant anything to him. It was the name of de Long's wife. Foster asked him to bring her, and when she came he delivered the following message by means of automatic writing: "To my daughter, Ida. Ten years ago I entrusted a large sum to Thomas Madden to invest for me in certain lands. After my death he failed to account for the investment to my executors. The money was invested and 1,250 acres of land were bought, and one half of this land now belongs to you. I paid Madden on account of my share of the purchase 650 dollars. He must be made to make a settlement. Your father, Vineyard." This story proved to be true. Madden admitted it and made restitution.

An often-quoted case in Spiritualist literature is that of the steamroller suicide. The notes of Rev. Stainton Moses are as follows: "February 20, 1874. Dr. and Mrs. Speer and I dined with Mrs. Gregory, to meet the Baron du Potet, the celebrated magnetist and spiritualist. Mr. Percival was of the party. During dinner I was conscious of a strange influence in the room and mentioned the fact. The Baron had previously magnetised me very strongly, and had rendered me more than usually clairvoyant. He also recognised a spirit in the room, but thought it was the spirit of a living person. After dinner, when we got upstairs, I felt an uncontrollable inclination to write, and I asked the Baron to lay his hand upon my arm. It began to move very soon and I fell into a deep trance. As far as I can gather from the witnesses, the hand then wrote out 'I killed myself to-day.' This was preceded by a very rude drawing, and then 'Under steamroller, Baker Street, medium passed,' (i.e., W. S. M.) was written. At the same time I spoke in the trance and rose and apparently motioned something away, saying 'Blood' several times. This was repeated and the spirit asked for prayer. Mrs. G. said a few words of prayer, and I came out of the trance at last, feeling very unwell.

"On the following day Dr. Speer and I walked down Baker Street and asked the policeman on duty if any accident had occurred there. He told us that a man had been killed by the steamroller at 9 A.M. and that he himself had helped to carry the body to Marylebone Workhouse."

The only flaw in this case is that the Pall Mall Gazette published a short account of the suicide the same evening and this might have been subconsciously seen by the medium. The name was not known, nor was it disclosed by Moses.

Dr. Isaac Funk, the New York editor, handed a letter to Lenora Piper containing the word mother. Piper gave the Christian name of Funk's mother, told him that she was walking on only one leg and asked, "Don't you remember that needle?" She had hurt herself by thrusting a needle into her foot. Piper also described a grandson, Chester, of whom Funk knew nothing. Upon inquiry, however, he found out that a grandson of that name had died 20 years earlier.

Dr. Joseph Vezzano established the identity of a materialized form in a séance given by Eusapia Palladino and describes it in Annals of Psychic Science (vol. 6, September 1907, p. 164) as follows: "In spite of the dimness of the light I could distinctly see Mme. Palladino and my fellow sitters. Suddenly I perceived that behind me was a form, fairly tall, which was leaning its head on my left shoulder and sobbing violently, so that those present could hear the sobs; it kissed me repeatedly. I clearly perceived the outlines of this face, which touched my own, and I felt the very fine and abundant hair in contact with my left cheek, so that I could be quite sure that it was a woman.

"The table then began to move, and typtology gave the name of a close family connection who was known to no-one present except myself. She had died some time before and on account of incompatability [sic] of temperament there had been serious disagreements with her. I was so far from expecting this typtological response that I at first thought this was a case of coincidence of name, but whilst I was mentally forming this reflection I felt a mouth, with warm breath, touch my left ear and whisper in a low voice in Genoese dialect, a succession of sentences, the murmur of which was audible to the sitters. These sentences were broken by bursts of weeping, and their gist was to repeatedly implore pardon for injuries done to me, with a fullness of detail connected with family affairs which could only be known to the person in question.

"The phenomenon seemed so real that I felt compelled to reply to the excuses offered me with expressions of affection, and to ask pardon in my turn if my resentment of the wrongs referred to had been excessive. But I had scarcely uttered the first syllables when two hands, with exquisite delicacy, applied themselves to my lips and prevented my continuing. The form then said to me: 'Thank you,' embraced me, kissed me, and disappeared."

According to Theodore Flournoy, this case was nothing more than the objectification of the emotional complex existing within the subconscious mind of Vezzano. There is food for thought, even for those who incline to differ, in his following remark: "The invasion or subjugation of the organism of the medium by a psychic complex belonging to a strange individual is not more easy to explain if that individuality be a spirit of the dead than if it is or belongs to one of the sitters in flesh and blood. And in this equally difficult question there is no reason to attribute to the discarnate or to the spirit world phenomena which can as readily be explained by the phenomena of our empirical world."

The pearl tie-pin case of Sir William Barrett has been frequently cited. Through the medium Hester Dowden, a Mrs. C. obtained a message spelled out on the Ouija board: "Tell mother to give my pearl tie-pin to the girl I was going to marry." The message allegedly came from a cousin of Mrs. C's, an officer who had been killed a month earlier. The name and address was returned and the whole message was thought ficitious. Six months later, however, it was discovered that the officer had been engaged to the lady. The war office returned his effects—a pearl tie-pin among them—and it was found that he put the lady's name in his will as his beneficiary.

Ernesto Bozzano recorded that in a sitting held on July 23, 1928, with the Marquise Centurione Scotto in Millesimo Castle, a voice addressed him as follows: "O Ernesto Bozzano, O my dear, my dear, I sought you in London, I sought you in Genoa, at last I find you." He immediately recognized the voice; the words carried a strong southern accent like that of Eusapia Palladino. He later noted: "This, her first manifestation, was a great revelation to me from the point of view of personal identification of the communicating spirit; because, without the faintest shadow of doubt, I recognised the person who was speaking to me the moment she pronounced my name. In life she had her own particular way of enunciating my surname, for she pronounced the two z's in an inimitable manner. Not only so, for when she spoke to me in life, she never called me simply by my surname, but invariably added my Christian name, though she never used the word 'Mr.' These small but most important idiosyncrasies of language are really what constitute the best demonstration of the real presence of the agency which affirms that it is actually present. I must add that she spoke with the identical timbre of voice which she had in life and with the very marked accent of her Italianized Neapolitan dialect."

Many visions of deceased soldiers were recorded by clairvoyants during the world wars. Mrs. E. A. Cannock of London described at a Spiritualist meeting a novel and convincing method employed by the fallen soldiers to make their identity known. In her vision they advanced in single file up the aisle, led by a young lieutenant. Each man bore on his chest a large placard with his name and the place where he lived inscribed.

Cannock read the names and the place. The audience identified them one after the other. After recognition the spirit form faded and made way for the next one.

There has been no shortage of evidence of communication from servicemen who died in World War II. One of the most distinguished champions of such communication was Air Chief Marshal Lord Dowding, who was head of fighter command in the Battle of Britain. He obtained convincing evidence of spirit communication from servicemen at sittings with such famous mediums as Estelle Roberts, which he later compiled in his books Many Mansions (1943) and Lychgate (1945).

Of course, such convincing personal evidence of identity in spirit communications does not reach the level demanded by scientific criteria. However, thousands of people from all walks of life have been assured of and based their affirmation of survival upon such impressive clairaudient and clairvoyant messages through a medium or psychic.

Sources:

Baird, Alexander T. One Hundred Cases for Survival After Death. New York: Bernard Ackerman, 1944.

Christopher, Milbourne. Search for the Soul: An Insider's Report on the Continuing Quest by Psychics and Scientists for Evidence of Life After Death. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1979.

Currie, Ian. You Cannot Die: The Incredible Findings of a Century of Research on Death. New York: Methuen; London: Hamlyn, 1978.

Ducasse, C. J. Paranormal Phenomena, Science, and Life After Death. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1969.

Garrett, Eileen J., ed. Does Man Survive Death? A Symposium. New York: Helix Press, 1957.

Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against An After Life. Springfield, Ill.: Charles Thomas, 1959.

Hyslop, James H. Contact With the Other World: The Latest Evidence as to Communication with the Dead. New York: Century, 1919.

Kastenbaum, Robert, ed. Between Life and Death. New York: Springer, 1979.

Murphy, Gardner. Three Papers on the Survival Problem. New York: American Society for Psychical Research, 1945.

Richmond, Kenneth. Evidence of Identity. London: G. Bell, 1939.

Salter, W. H. Zoar; or, The Evidence of Psychical Research Concerning Survival. London: Sidwick & Jackson, 1961.

Ideoplasm

Another term for ectoplasm, a substance claimed to issue from the body of a materialization medium in a vaporous or solid form, taking on the appearance of phantom forms or limbs. The concept of ideoplasm stems from the investigations of such psychical researchers as the Frenchman Gustav Geley and conveys the additional idea that the substance may be molded by the operators into any shape to express ideas of the medium or of the sitters.

Idolatry

The subject of idolatry was raised as a religious polemic, a monotheistic appraisal of the polytheism. Idolatry is concerned with the rather ubiquitous belief among indigenous cultures that images of gods can become a repository of divine power, one development of animism, in which all of nature was imbued with supernatural forces. The sympathetic magic of images depended upon the image being a proper representation of the god, and also being installed through a special invocatory ceremony. Although the early Judaic commandment not to worship graven images implied a new separate form of worship, the statement that the Jewish god was "a jealous god" implied that Pagan images possessed some power but that it would be of rival demonic gods as distinct from the monotheism of Moses.

The belief in the power of images is also related to the designation of special sacred places—particularly striking natural locations or buildings such as tabernacles, synagogues, and churches where the presence of God might be enhanced. The very structure of churches and cathedrals utilized architecture to reinforce this belief, while rituals created a mental and emotional structure to invoke divine presence. Allied to the use of rituals are the geometrical shapes of mandalas, used as an aid in meditation.

In the history of Christianity, the Judaic commandment prohibiting images, in the face of their almost universal appeal, caused great controversies in relation to the use of icons (flat stylized picture of the saints), as opposed to statues of Christ and/or the Virgin Mary in churches, one major element in the division of Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox Christians. The sixteenth-century Protestant reformers banned images in their churches, and only in recent decades have they returned, but only as decorative art.

The Catholic view is that such representations are not actually worshiped, but are simply an aid for intercession with divine power, that it is a more intangible god that is worshiped. However, the concept of God as a father figure, and the tangible representations of Jesus Christ merely remove imagery to a mental and spiritual level, for which an image is a support.

Moreover, in some countries, the "veneration" of images closely approaches actual "worship," as for example, the famous "Child of Prague" image of the Carmelites Church of Our Lady of Victories in the former Czechoslovakia (a statue actually brought from Spain in the sixteenth century). This statue has become known in many countries and venerated by thousands of people, in the belief that it can render favors on those who pray to it. Interestingly enough, the robes of this image are changed regularly in accordance with the ecclesiastical calendar. This custom of dressing images is also widely practiced at the present day temples through India, indicating that customs and beliefs relating to images are common to many traditions.

Worship associated with ancient pagan Mother Goddesses has much in common with Christian adoration of the Virgin Mary. Some comparative religionists would go so far as to claim that these are but different forms of one primal maternal force in nature. Similarly the concept of a divine savior, born of a virgin and crucified for the atonement of human sin, is also found in some Pagan religions.

The belief that images might become actual centers of divine power is still common in different religions. In Hindu temples, images are installed with special ceremonies to invoke divinity, and subsequently treated as living entities. The installation ceremonies mark an important point in the opening of a temple for public worship. In Swaminarayan temples, for example, the installation of an image requires a ritual in which, at the high point, a mirror is held in front of the deity's eyes, so that the power may not blind observers; the mirror is said to be cracked by this force.

In Roman Catholicism, miracles continue to be associated with statues of Christ and the Virgin Mary. Such miracles involve statues that move, weep, or shed blood. In the phenomenon of stigmata, an intensely devout individual or a saint may become, in effect, a living statue upon which the wounds of Christ are physically reproduced—the marks of scourging, wounds on the shoulder and side, the bruising of wrist, and bleeding hands. Apparitions of the Virgin Mary are a related phenomenon in which a holy figure does not require the material support of an image for manifestation but appears with independent life.

Even in modern times, there are claims of moving statues of the Virgin Mary, notably at the village of Ballinspittle, in Ireland.

Sources:

Abbott, John. The Keys of Power: A Study of Indian Ritual and Belief. London: Methuen, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Bevan, Edwyn Robert. Holy Images; An Inquiry Into Idolatry and Image—Worship in Ancient Paganism and in Christianity. London: George Allen, 1940.

Breasted, J. H. Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1912.

Graves, Kersey. The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors. Boston, Mass., 1875. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1971.

Hastings, James, ed. Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics. 12 vols. Edinburgh: James Clark, 1908.

Tylor, E. B. Primitive Culture. 2 vols. London: John Murray, 1871.

Ifrits

Hideous specters, probably of Arabian origin, now genies of Persian and Indian mythology. They assume diverse forms and inhabit ruins, woods, and wild, desolate places for the purpose of preying upon human beings and animals. They are sometimes associated with the jinns or divs of Persia.

IFS See International Frankenstein Society

Ignath, Lujza Linczegh (b. 1891)

Hungarian clairvoyant, and healing and apport medium, controlled by "Nona," a pure spirit who claimed to have never been incarnated and came without trance, in the manner of an alternating personality. Ignath's unusual psychic powers were first described in a Hungarian pamphlet by William Tordai of Budapest. In Tidskrift for Psykisk Forskning (vol. 5), the journal of the Norwegian Society for Psychical Research, Lujza Lamaes-Haughseth, a high school teacher and experimental psychologist, published a long report of her observations with Ignath in Budapest. As a consequence the Norwegian Society for Psychical Research, headed by Professors Jaeger and Theostein Wereide, both of the University of Oslo, sent an invitation to Ignath, which she accepted.

According to a report in the Tidens Tegn (November 20, 1931), the medium produced direct writing in the presence of 100 people on places selected by the audience. In an experimental sitting for the Norwegian SPR conducted by Dr. Jorgen Bull, a chemist in Oslo, direct writing was produced on wax tablets in a specially prepared and closed box.

In religious ecstatic condition, stigmatic wounds were observed on Ignath's head. On such occasions "Nona" delivered moving lectures on the subject of religion.

Ignath's oddest phenomena consisted of miniature heads that she materialized in drinking glasses filled with water. "Nona" asserted that the heads, the size of walnuts, were "plastic thoughts." Having been shown a photograph of Haughseth's husband, Nona materialized his likeness. Flashlight photographs of these forms were published in the Psykisk Forskning (vol. 6).

In the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 38, p. 466-71) Theodore Besterman describes some psychometric experiments with Ignath in Budapest. On November 18, 1928, he left a sealed vial with Lujza Haughseth for testing. His conclusion of the reading was that "the experiment is very instructive from a negative point of view."

Ignis Fatuus

A wavering luminous appearance frequently observed in meadows and marshy places, around which many popular superstitions cluster. Its folknames, Will o' the Wisp and Jack o' Lantern, suggest a country fellow bearing a lantern or straw torch (wisp). Formerly these lights were supposed to haunt desolate bogs and moorlands for the purpose of misleading travelers and drawing them to their death. Another superstition says that they are the spirits of those who have been drowned in the bogs, and yet another says that they are the souls of unbaptized infants. Science now attributes these ignes fatui to gaseous exhalations from the moist ground or, more rarely, to night-flying insects.

Ike, Rev. See Eikerenkoetter II, Frederick I

Illuminati

A term first used in the fifteenth century by enthusiasts in the occult arts, signifying those who claimed to possess light directly communicated from a higher source or because of abundant human wisdom. The term was used in Spain about the end of the fifteenth century, but probably originated from an Italian Gnostic source. All kinds of people, many of them charlatans, claimed to belong to the Illuminati. In Spain those who assumed the label had to face the rigor of the Inquisition, and many of them moved to France as refugees in the early seventeenth century.

Here and there small bodies of those called Illuminati—sometimes known as Rosicrucians—rose into publicity for a short period. It was through Adam Weishaupt (1748–1830), professor of law at Ingolstadt, that the movement first became identified with republicanism. Weishaupt founded the order of the Illuminati in Bavaria in 1776. It soon secured a stronghold throughout Germany. Its critics suggested that its founder's objective was merely to convert his followers into blind instruments of his will.

Weishaupt built a strong organization modeled on the Jesuits'. The Illuminati was an occult organization and had a series of classes and grades, similar to that within Freemasonry. It offered promise of the communication of deep occult secrets in the higher ranks. Only a few of the members knew Weishaupt personally as the society spread throughout Germany. He was able to enlist a number of young men of wealth and position, and within four or five years the members even began to have a hand in the affairs of the state. Not a few of the German princes found it to their interest to have dealings with the fraternity.

Weishaupt blended philanthropy and mysticism. He was only 28 when he founded the sect in 1776, and it began to prosper when a certain Baron Adolph von Knigge (1752–1796) joined him in 1780. A gifted person of strong imagination, von Knigge had been a master of most of the secret societies of his day, including the Freemasons. He was also an expert occultist, and the supernatural held a strong attraction for him. He and Weishaupt rapidly spread the gospel of the revolution throughout Germany. They grew fearful, however, that if the authorities discovered the existence of such a society as theirs they would take steps to suppress it. With this in mind they conceived the idea of grafting Illuminism onto Freemasonry, which they thought would protect it and help it spread more widely and rapidly.

The Freemasons were not long in discovering the true nature of those who had just joined their organization. A chief council was held to thoroughly examine the beliefs held by the Illuminati, and a conference of Masons was held in 1782. Knigge and Weishaupt attended and endeavored to capture the whole organization of Freemasonry, but a misunderstanding grew up between the leaders of Illuminism. Knigge withdrew from the society, and two years later some who discovered Weishaupt's democratic aims denounced it to the Bavarian government, which quickly moved to suppress it. The Illuminati were all but destroyed in 1785 and Weishaupt fled. However, illuminist ideas spread to occultists in France and helped in building support for the French Revolution.

The title Illuminati was later given to the French Martinists, followers of the French mystic Louis Claude de St. Martin (1743–1803), known as "le philosophe inconno."

A famous member of the Order of Illuminati was Count Alessandrodi Cagliostro. He was initiated in 1781 at Frankfurt, where the Illuminati used the name Grand Masters of the Templars, and was said to have received money and instructions from Weishaupt to influence French Masonry. Cagliostro later became associated with the Martinist order, which had been founded in 1754. Some believe that the Illuminati maintained a complex network of secret orders in the later seventeenth century, others that a variety of different independent groups used the name. A revived Order of Illuminati was founded in 1880 by Leopold Engel at Dresden, Germany. Notable names connected with this revival include Rudolph Steiner and Franz Hartmann.

Through the twentieth century, the idea of an Illuminati conspiracy became one of the more popular conspiracy myths feeding off waves of paranoia in the Western public. In the late twentieth century, popular writer Robert Anton Wilson played with the Illuminati theme in a series of books designed to shake the reader out of conventional modes of thought.

Sources:

Barruel, Augustin. Memoirs Illustrating the History of Jacobinism. 4 vols., London, 1797.

Daraul, Arbon. Secret Societies, Yesterday and Today. London: Fernhill Housen, 1961. Reprinted as A History of Secret Societies. New York: Citadel, 1961.

Fagan, Myron. A Brief History of the Illuminati. Lansing, Ill.: H.B.C., 1978.

Gould, R. F. History of Freemasonry. 5 vols. Rev. ed. London: Caxton, 1931.

Hackethorn, Charles William. The Secret Societies of All Ages and Countries. 2 vols. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Holmes, Donald. The Illuminati Conspiracy. Los Angeles: Falcon Press, 1987.

Waite, Arthur E. A New Encyclopaedia of Freemasonry. 2 vols. London: Rider, 1921. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Wilgus, Neal. The Illuminoids. New York: New American Library, 1989.

Wilson, Robert Anton. Cosmic Trigger: Final Secret of the Illuminati. Berkeley, Calif.: And/Or Press, 1977.

———. The Illuminati Papers. Berkeley, Calif.: And/Or Press, 1980.

———. Illuminatus! 3 vols. New York: Dell, 1975.

———. Masks of the Illuminati. New York: Timescape, 1981.

Illusion

Sensory perception originated by an actual sensory stimulus to which wrong interpretation is attached. (See also Hallucination)

IMBAS

IMBAS is a relatively new Druid Neo-Pagan group founded in the mid-1990s that seeks to honor land, ancestors, and the traditional Celtic gods and goddesses through home, family, and community/tribe. It is a part of the international Celtic revival that became evident in the 1990s in both Christian and Pagan communities, and advocates what it terms Celtic Reconstructionist Paganism. It actively promotes the cultural heritage of the Celtic peoples, and its program is grounded in folk tradition, mythological texts, and the archaeological and historical records of the ancient Celts. The Celtic world includes the modern peoples of Alba (Scotland), Breizh (Brittany), Cymru (Wales), Éire (Ireland), Kernow (Cornwall), and Mannin (Isle of Man), though IMBAS is open to people of all ethnic backgrounds.

IMBAS members show a deep reverence for the pre-Christian Celtic deities. Their magical practices assume contact with both their ancestors and the land spirits, which correlates with their concern for family and a staunch environmental awareness. IMBAS has also developed a concern for historical research and strives to be historically (and mythologically) accurate in its assertions. Gaps in information concerning the beliefs and practices of Celtic groups (who were not a literary people) makes it necessary to create something new. New practices introduced to IMBAS members are made as consistent as possible with contemporary knowledge of the ancient Celts. Thus IMBAS attempts to work a balanced approach to Celtic religion that grows out of sound scholarship filled in with the products of poetic inspiration. Members are cognizant of which elements of their faith are derived from each source. IMBAS is an Irish word meaning "poetic inspiration," and pronounced "im-bus."

IMBAS charters local IMBAS groups, provides a training program for prospective Seanchái (traditional lore keepers), and carries on a public education program about Celtic culture. In developing its program within the larger Neo-Pagan world, IMBAS has, on the one hand, distanced itself from both ceremonial magick and modern traditions influenced by it, especially Wicca. On the other hand, it has also separated itself from the romantic Druid revival represented by Edward Williams (better known as Iolo Morganwg, who at the beginning of the nineteenth century helped create a broad interest in Druidism with his imaginative writings and rituals), and eschews the various Druidic movements of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. IMBAS is also opposed to Druid eclecticism, the combining of early Celtic religion with other cultural traditions.

IMBAS may be contacted at P.O. Box 1215, Montague, NJ 07827-0215. It publishes a quarterly journal, An Tríbhís Mhór: The IMBAS Journal of Celtic Reconstructionism. It has an extensive website at http://www.imbas.org/, which includes much of the group's research findings.

Imhotep

(Also spelled "Imhetep.") An ancient Egyptian deity, son of Ptah and Nut, to whom great powers of exorcism were attributed. Imhotep was often appealed to in cases of demonic possession.

Sources:

Doumato, Lamia. Imhotep. Monticello, Ill.: Vance Bibliographies, 1981.

Shorter, Alan W. The Egyptian Gods. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1937. Reprint. 1981.

Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary

The Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary is a suborder within the Gnostic Order of Christ, an esoteric-Christian ordered community founded in 1988. Both the Gnostic Order and the Servants of Mary have attempted to recreate the life and structure of the former Holy Order of MANS that had been founded in 1968 by Fr. Paul Blighton. Fr. Blighton had a special devotion to the Virgin Mary and in 1972 was inspired to found the Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary. He drew together those females within the Holy Order who felt a special calling to devotion to and willingness to work with Mary in a healing ministry. In the message that Blighton received to found the suborder, his wife Ruth Blighton and Master Teacher Marian Linda Carter, generally known as Master M within the order, were to direct the training of the sisters.

In 1986, the members of the Immaculate Heart Sisters of Mary moved into the Greek Orthodox Missionary Archdiocese of Vasiloupolis and were effectively dissolved. Two years later, Jessica Catherine Burkhouse was moved to revive the Servants of Mary as part of the newly established Gnostic Order of Christ. On April 19, 1984, Sister Jessica was named a master teacher within the Holy Order, and Master M conferred a special Mantle of the Sisterhood on her. In June of 1988 Burkhouse attended a ceremony led by Indian Spiritual teacher Mata Amritanandamayi, during which a mantra was given to her. The use of the mantra evoked the memory of the Mantle of the Sisterhood. The sisterhood became a matter of meditation over the next months during which time the Gnostic Order of Christ was formally organized. Burkhouse also came into contact with another Order master teacher, Mary Elizabeth Hodges, who had had an apparition of the Virgin Mary.

Together Hodges and Burkhouse revived inspiration that the sisterhood should be reestablished as the Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary. The single word change was significant as the new suborder was to be for both men and women and open to all who felt a special devotion to Mary or had a calling to a special work with Mary. Especially it is for those who have a calling in the public sphere to work for the equal rights of women and children.

Those who wish to associate with the Servants of Mary are inducted with a special blessing ceremony and incorporate the meditations developed by the former sisterhood into their daily devotions. Hodges has also formed the Marian Order of Mary's Way, a group that is open to people who are not otherwise members of the Gnostic Order. The Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary may be contacted through the Gnostic Order of Christ, P.O. Box 8660, San Jose, CA 95155-8660. It has a website at http://www.Gnostic.net/ihsm/.

Sources:

Immaculate Heart Servants of Mary. http://www.Gnostic.net/ihsm/. May 13, 2000.

Immortality

Psychical research is concerned primarily with survival as a matter of inference from intelligently observed and interpreted psychic phenomena. It does not attempt to answer the question whether survival means continued existence for a only a limited period or for a longer time, or even forever. With few exceptions, psychical researchers have been concerned with the authenticity of claimed phenomena and with the question of whether there is really evidence for survival of personality after death.

The issues of the continued existence of a soul or spirit and the possible perfection of that soul through evolution or reincarnation move from science into the realm of religion. Many religions proclaim the immortality of the soul. Christianity speaks of a continued existence in heaven with an eternity for progress and perfection (though different denominations have quite different ideas about the exact details of the afterlife). Eastern religions also offer elaborate descriptions of the existence beyond this earthly life, although, again, details vary considerably on the relationship between the human soul and God.

In advaita Vedanta, for example, the individual soul is perfected by infinite reincarnations to reassert its true reality as a group soul, then as the infinite Divine itself; in vishadvaita Vedanta, however, there remains some distinction between Divinity and the perfected human souls. In general Vedanta does not view immortality in terms of an achievement of individual souls in a period of time, but rather as the reassertion of an infinite divine reality when the illusions of individual ego, body, mind, time, space, and causality have disappeared. This postulates the infinite Divine as the eternal reality that is veiled by illusions of individual consciousness and the world of matter.

At its beginning Spiritualism offered itself as a new religion, necessarily rooted in Christianity. The question of immortality and perfectibility of the soul has been more than just another doctrine; it has been a keystone of the Spiritualist position. As the movement developed, it developed a split over the doctrine of reincarnation. Most Spiritualists now accept reincarnation.

Most of the pioneers of psychical research in the nineteenth century were religious people who had experienced a crisis of faith, largely because of the attacks of nineteenth-century science on traditional Christian doctrine. Spiritualism claimed the ability to demonstrate "scientifically" the reality of life after death. It thus offered a means, many hoped, to recover not only an affirmation of mere survival (the primary issue open to psychical research) but a firm base from which a faith in a meaningful afterlife could be reaffirmed as a religious hope.

The religious quest so evident in the life of most of the pioneer psychical researchers suggests that a will to believe was operative in their research and was a causative element in their frequently falling victim to fraud.

Sources:

Augustine, Saint. Immortality of the Soul. Reprinted in the Fathers of the Church series, vol. 4. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1973.

Bernard, Theos. Philosophical Foundations of India. London: Rider, [1945].

Carrington, Hereward. Death: The Causes and Phenomena with Special Reference to Immortality. London, 1911. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1977.

Charles, R. H. A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, in Judaism and in Christianity. London, 1899. Reprinted as Eschatology, The Doctrine of a Future Life in June 19, 2000, in Judaism, and in Christianity: A Critical History. New York: Schocken Books, 1963.

Ducasse, C. J. Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1974.

Fournier, D'Albe. New Light on Immortality. London, 1908.

Hyslop, James H. Psychical Research and the Nature of Life After Death. Albuquerque, N.Mex.: American Institute for Psychological Research, 1980.

James, William. The Will to Believe and Human Immortality. New York: Dover Publications, n.d.

Lombroso, Cesare. After Death—What? London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1909.

Myers, Frederick W. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London, 1903. Reprint. New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Steiner, Rudolf. Reincarnation and Immortality. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.

Tugwell, Simon. Human Immortality and Redemption. London: Darton, Longman, & Todd, 1990.

Immortality (Magazine)

Spiritualist monthly "for progressive thinking people," founded in 1919 as the official organ of the General Assembly of Spiritualists, New York. It continued publication into the 1930s.

Immortality and Survival (Magazine)

British monthly, incorporated after a short existence into Survival magazine. No longer published.

Imoda, Enrico (ca. 1912)

Pioneer Italian psychical researcher. Dr. Imoda conducted a series of methodical experiments in Turin with the medium Linda Gazzera in the house of Marquise de Ruspoli. His book Fotografie di fantasmi (1912), with a preface by Charles Richet, contains photographs of what is purported to be ectoplasm produced by Gazzera. In 1908 Dr. Imoda experimented with the famous medium Eusapia Palladino and claimed that radiations resembling those of radium and the cathode rays of Sir William Crookes emanated from the medium.

Sources:

Imoda, Enrico. "The Action of Eusapia Palladino on the Electroscope." Annals of Psychical Science 7, 44/45, (August–September 1908).

"Imperator"

The famous spirit control of the Rev. W. Stainton Moses, commanding a band of spirits engaged in a missionary effort to uplift the human race by teachings through automatic writing. He first identified himself as "Imperator" on September 19, 1872, but later, yielding to entreaties by Moses, he revealed, on July 6, 1873, in Book IV of his writings that he was the biblical prophet Malachi. The spirit control charged the medium not to speak of his biblical identity (except to those intimately associated with Moses) without his express permission.

Imperator was seen clairvoyantly by Stainton Moses, and his appearance is described in Book VI of the writings. His communications were not written by Imperator himself, but by "Rector." The signature was "Imperator S. D. (Servus Dei)" or "I.S.D.," preceded by a Latin cross at first, then later by a crown.

In 1881 a story was circulated from theosophical sources maintaining that Imperator was a living man, a theosophical brother whose dealings with Moses had been known all along to Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Imperator, following Moses' query, branded the whole story as false. Of Blavatsky he added, "She does not know or speak with us, though she has the power of ascertaining facts concerning us." Imperator claimed that he directed the whole course of Moses' life and had carefully prepared him for his role as a messenger.

Complaining of Moses' unquestioning acceptance of all the spirit said, Imperator summed up the case on January 18, 1874, as follows: "We are real in power over you; real in the production of objective manifestations; real in the tests and proofs of knowledge which we adduce. We are truthful and accurate in all things. We are the preachers of a Divine Gospel. It is for you to accept the individual responsibility from which none may relieve you, or deciding whether, being such as we are, we are deceivers in matters of vital and eternal import. Such a conclusion, in the face of all evidence and fair inference, is one which none could accept save a perverted and unhinged mind; least of all one who knows us as you do now."

"Imperator" and Lenora Piper

In 1897 Imperator and his band supposedly took over as the controls of Lenora Piper. Immediately both Sir Oliver Lodge and William James raised doubts that they were the Imperator group of Stainton Moses, since these entities could not give the names that they had given to Moses. Though Piper's other controls, the spirits of F. W. H. Myers and Richard Hodgson, endorsed them, Lodge countered, "I conjecture, however, that whatever relationship may exist between these personages and the corresponding ones of Stainton Moses, there is little or no identity" (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 23., p. 235).

Eleanor Sidgwick (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research vol. 28, p. 71) also rejected their claims for identity. James H. Hyslop was slightly inclined to accept it. He argued (Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research, vol. 16, p. 69) that Malachi means "messengers" and that this is the very function that Imperator assumed through Piper and Minnie Soule (public name, Mrs. Chenoweth), as well as through Stainton Moses.

A. W. Trethewy, author of The "Controls" of Stainton Moses (London, 1923), stated that ". . . the internal evidence points to the two groups not having been identical. There are, it is true, slight resemblances, but they are either so vague as to be well within the sphere of coincidence where two good bands of controls are concerned, or they are of a nature to suggest an origin from the mind of Mrs. Piper or her sitter. On the other hand, the ignorance and the errors of her controls concerning the earth-lives of the guides of Stainton Moses whose names they bore, and concerning important features of his mediumship, are altogether inconsistent with their claim to identity."

Richard Hodgson (d. 1905), in the last years of his life, also received direct communications from the Imperator group. Hereward Carrington gave the following character sketch of Hodgson in The Story of Psychic Science (1930): "He possessed a keen sense of humour, and was always buoyant and cheerful, but would become serious when the name of Imperator was mentioned. It is now realised, perhaps, that this Personality—together with Rector and the other members of the group—played a large part in many people's lives, and that numerous old "Piper Sitters" (as they were called) prayed to Imperator for comfort and guidance—as one might pray to any favourite Saint."

Communications by Imperator were received at a later date through Minnie M. Soule, and in the 1920s Gwendolyn Kelley Hack also claimed the control of Imperator in her automatic scripts. (See the account in the 1929 Modern Psychic Mysteries at Millesimo Castle.)

Sources:

Carrington, Hereward. The Story of Psychic Science. 1930.

M. A. (Oxon) [W. Stainton Moses]. More Spirit Teachings. Manchester, England: Two Worlds Publishing, 1942.

Spirit Teachings. 1898. Reprint, London: Spiritualist Press, 1949.

Trethewy, A. W. The "Controls" of Stainton Moses. London, 1923.

The Incommunicable Axiom

Occultist Éliphas Lévi suggested that all magic was embodied in knowledge of this secret. The axiom was to be found enclosed in the four letters of the Tetragram arranged in a certain way; in the words Azoth and Inri written kabbalistically; and in the monogram of Christ embroidered in the labarum. Whoever succeeded in elucidating it became omnipotent in the practice of magic.

Thus did Lévi deal with a Western occult interpretation of Jewish Kabbalah and Eastern teachings about the creative power of the Ineffable Name of God, Aum. (See also Divine Name; Mantra; Shemhamphorash)

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. London: Rider, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Incorporeal Personal Agency (IPA)

Rather cumbersome term used by parapsychologist J. B. Rhine to indicate survival of bodily death (i.e., aspects of personality surviving without a body).

Incubus/Succubus

A demon spirit that has sexual intercourse with mortals. The concept may have arisen from the idea of the commerce of gods with people, which was rife in pagan times. The male demon said to have intercourse with women is called the incubus and the female demon who seduces men the succubus. The demons were generally believed to appear most frequently during sleep or in nightmares. During the witchcraft scare of the late medieval period these demons, when associated with an individual witch or sorcerer, were known as familiars.

Belief in incubi and succubi goes back to ancient times but was incorporated into Christian belief in the medieval period. Such churchmen as Thomas Aquinas (1225–74) discussed the demons.

The Incubus

The Description of Scotlande of Hector Boethius as translated in the first volume of Holinshed's Chronicles (1577), has three or four notable examples of these demons, which are corroborated by Jerome Cardan. One of these, concerning an incubus, is quoted in the quaint language Holinshed used:

"In the year 1480 it chanced as a Scottish ship departed out of the Forth towards Flanders, there arose a wonderful great tempest of wind and weather, so outrageous, that the master of the ship, with other the mariners, wondered not a little what the matter meant, to see such weather at that time of the year, for it was about the middle of summer. At length, when the furious pirrie and rage of winds still increased, in such wise that all those within the ship looked for present death, there was a woman underneath the hatches called unto them above, and willed them to throw her into the sea, that all the residue, by God's grace, might yet be saved; and thereupon told them how she had been haunted a long time with a spirit dailie coming into hir in man's likenesse. In the ship there chanced also to be priest, who by the master's appointment going down to this woman, and finding her like a most wretched and desperate person, lamenting hir great misfortune and miserable estate, used such wholesome admonition and comfortable advertisements, willing her to repent and hope for mercy at the hands of God, that, at length, she seeming right penitent for her grievous offences committed, and fetching sundrie sighs even from the bottome of her heart, being witnesse, as should appeare, of the same, there issued forth of the pumpe of the ship, a foule and evil-favoured blacke cloud with a mighty terrible noise, flame, smoke, and stinke, which presently fell into the sea. And suddenlie thereupon the tempest ceased, and the ship passing in great quiet the residue of her journey, arrived in saftie at the place whither she was bound." (Chronicles, vol. 5, p. 146, 1808 ed)."

In another case related by the same author, the incubus did not depart so quietly. In the chamber of a young gentlewoman who was the daughter of a nobleman in the country of Mar there was found "a foule monstrous thing, verie horrible to behold." For the love of this "Deformed," nevertheless, the lady had refused sundry wealthy marriages. A priest who was in the company began to repeat St. John's Gospel, and "suddenlie the wicked spirit, making a verie sore and terrible roaring noise, flue his waies, taking the roofe of the chamber awaie with him, the hangings and coverings of the bed being also burnt therewith."

Jean Bodin, author of Démonomaie (1580) cites the case of Joan Hervilleria, who at age 12 was solemnly betrothed to Beelzebub by her mother, who was afterward burned alive for contriving this clandestine marriage. According to the story, the bridegroom was respectably attired and the marriage oath simple. The mother pronounced the following words to the bridegroom: "Ecce filiam meam quam spospondi tibi." Then, turning to the bride, she stated "Ecce amicum tuum qui beabit te." Joan was not satisfied with her spiritual husband alone, however. She became a bigamist by intermarrying with real flesh and blood.

In another story Margaret Bremont, in company with her mother and others, was in the habit of attending diabolic trysts. She and the others were burned alive by Adrian Ferreus, general vicar of the Inquisition.

Magdalena Crucia of Cordova, an abbess, was more fortunate. Suspected by her nuns of magic—an accusation convenient when a superior was at all troublesome—she anticipated their charge. Going before Pope Paul III, she confessed a 30-year intimacy with the devil and obtained pardon.

The Succubus

Old rabbinical writings relate the legend of how Adam was visited during a 130-year period by female demons and had intercourse with demons, spirits, specters, lemurs, and phantoms. Another legend relates how, under the reign of Roger, king of Sicily, a young man was bathing by moonlight. He thought he saw someone drowning and hastened to the rescue. Having drawn from the water a beautiful woman, he became enamored of her, married her, and had by her a child. Afterward she disappeared with her child, which made everyone believe that she was a succubus.

The historian Hector Boece (1465–1536), in his history of Scotland, relates that a handsome young man was pursued by a female demon who would pass through his closed door and offer to marry him. He complained to his bishop, who enjoined him to fast, pray, and confess his sins, and as a result the infernal visitor ceased to trouble him.

The witchcraft judge Pierre de Lancre (1553–1631) stated that in Egypt an honest blacksmith was occupied in forging during the night when a demon appeared to him in the shape of a beautiful woman. He threw a hot iron in the face of the demon, which at once took flight.

More Accounts of Incubi and Succubi

Among the many writers who reflected upon the incubus/succubus were Erastus, in his tract de Lamiis; Jakob Sprenger and Heinrich Kramer in Malleus Maleficarum (1486), which contains a report of a nun who slept with an incubus in the form of a bishop; H. Zanchius in de Operibus Del, (1597, 16, 4); G. Dandini in Aristotelis Tres de Anima (1610); J. G. Godellman in Tractatus de Magis (1591); M. A. Del Rio in Disquisitionum Magicarum (1599); and F. M. Guazzo in Compendium Maleficarum (1608).

An interesting treatise on the subject is the nineteenth-century hoax Demoniality or Incubi and Succubi, supposedly by one Fr. L. M. Sinistari of Ameno, first translated and published by the bibliophile Isidore Liseux in Paris in 1879. It was later translated into English by Montague Summers (Fortune Press, London, 1927; reprinted B. Blom, New York, 1972).

In the early nineteenth century the issue of the incubus/succubus, which had been dismissed by many as outdated superstition was raised again by the emerging science of psychoanalysis. Possibly the most important discussion is that of Ernest Jones, a Freudian psychoanalyst in his famous treatise On the Nightmare (1951).

Sources:

Barrett, Francis. The Magus. 1801. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

Jones, Ernest, On the Nightmare. New York: Liveright Publishing, 1951.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Independent Church of Australia

The Independent Church of Australia is an esoteric metaphysical church with an eclectic background. It draws its ritual and liturgy from both Roman and Protestant Christianity and its teachings have been inspired by New Thought and theosophical traditions, especially the Unity School of Christianity and the Christian Community founded by Rudolf Steiner.

The church was founded in 1969 in Perth by the Revs. Mario Schoemaker (1929–1997) and Colin Reed (1944–1999). Two years later they created the church's educational arm, the Institute of Metaphysics. Emphasis is placed upon the understanding of Jesus as a God who took on human form and who, having passed through death, now inhabits the spiritual atmosphere of the planet. Each member nurtures the "Christ within" and the church teaches that each possesses an essential divine nature. Each person is seen as growing towards a mystical unity with God. Worship is focused on the weekly celebration of the Cosmic Mass (similar to that in the Christian community) and a spiritual healing service.

The institute offers a full curriculum providing students with knowledge of metaphysics (including the metaphysical interpretation of the Bible), psychic experience, mysticism, and the Christian mysteries. Over the years, a group of more advanced students have arisen, and in 1988 Schoemaker founded the Order of the Mystic Christ in which students were encouraged to develop their psychic abilities and attain a mystic vision of Christ. The spiritual practice of the order includes a set of chants and meditations. The order is centered in Melbourne and those members who reside in the area gather twice a month, and all members engage in a program of study and spiritual practice.

The church is currently headquartered in suburban Melbourne at 32 Trevallyn Close, Montrose, Victoria 3765, Australia. Schoemaker, who emerged as the major teacher of the group prior to his death, wrote several books, including The New Clairvoyance and A Short Occult History of the World, and left behind a number of tapes of his talks and classes. The church has expanded to include congregations across Australia and New Zealand, and now has one congregation in the Netherlands. Its website is found at http://www.ica.org.au/.

Sources:

Independent Church of Australia. http://www.ica.org.au/. March 23, 2000.

Independent Drawing and Painting See Direct Drawing and Painting

Independent Spiritualist Association of the United States of America

The Independent Spiritualist Association of the United States of America was founded in 1924 by Amanda Cameron Flower (1863–1940), a medium with the National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC). Flower absorbed some theosophical emphases, including a belief in reincarnation, an idea not consistent with NSAC belief. She also protested the NSAC rule against its mediums teaching or doing mediumistic work in non-NSAC churches. Last known address: 5130 West 25th St., Cicero, IL 60650.

Sources:

Judah, J. Stillson. The History and Philosophy of the Metaphysical Movement in America. Philadelphia, Penn.: Westminster Press, 1967.

Independent Voice See Direct Voice

Independent Writing See Direct Writing

INDIA

Many occult beliefs and practices stem from the complex religious and mystical concepts of India and her people. It might be said that the mysticism of the Hindus was a reaction against the austere religion and practical ceremonial of the sacred scriptures, the Vedas. If its trend were summarized it might justly be said that the Vedas point champion detachment; the pantheistic identification of the subject and object, worshiper and worship, aimed at ultimate absorption in the Infinite; inculcating transcendence from the material world through the most minute self-examination, the cessation of physical powers; and belief in the spiritual guidance of the guru or mystical adept.

For the Indian theosophist there is only one Absolute Being, the One Reality. However, in popular Hinduism, the pantheistic doctrine of Ekam advitiyam "the One without Second" supposes a countless pantheon of gods, great and small, and a rich demonology, but these should be understood ultimately as merely illusions of the soul and not realities. Upon the soul's coming to fuller knowledge, its illusions are totally dispelled. According to such a theory, to the ordinary man and woman the impersonality of the Absolute being is too remote, and they require a symbolic deity to bridge the gulf between the impersonal Absolute and the very material self, hence the numerous gods of Hinduism regarded by the initiated merely as manifestations of the Supreme Spirit.

In this way, even the everyday forms of temple idols can be seen as possessing higher meaning. As Sir Alfred Lyall stated,

"It [Brahminism] treats all the worships as outward visible signs of the same spiritual truth, and is ready to show how each particular image or rite is the symbol of some aspect of universal divinity. The Hindus, like the pagans of antiquity, adore natural objects and forces,—a mountain, a river, or an animal. The Brahmin holds all nature to be the vesture or cloak of indwelling divine energy which inspires everything that produces all or passes man's understanding."

A life time of asceticism has from the remotest times been regarded in India as a true preparation for communion with the deity. Asceticism has been extremely prevalent especially in connection with the cult of the god Siva, who is in great measure regarded as the prototype of this class.

The yogis (disciples of the yoga philosophy) practice mental abstraction, and are popularly supposed to attain to superhuman powers. In some cases their extreme ascetic practices have resulted in madness or mental vacancy and many claimed paranormal powers, as in Spiritualism, have turned out to be jugglery and conjuring. Charlatans, of course, exist in all religions. The authentic prerequisites of the training of a yogi preclude such imposture and warn against the vanity of displaying supernatural powers.

The paramahamsas, that is "supreme swans," are believed to have achieved communion with the world-soul through spiritual disciplines and meditation. They are said to be equally indifferent to pleasure or pain, insensible to heat or cold, and incapable of satiety or want. The sannyasis are those who renounce the world and live as wandering monks or residents in an ashram or spiritual retreat. The dandis, or staff-bearers, are worshipers of Siva in his form of Bhairava the Terrible.

J. C. Oman in Mystics, Ascetics and Saints of India (1903) said of these sadhus or holy men,

"Sadhuism, whether perpetuating the peculiar idea of the efficacy of asceticism for the acquisition of far-reaching powers over natural phenomena, or bearing its testimony to the belief in the indispensableness of detachment from the world as a preparation for the ineffable joy of ecstatic communion with the Divine Being, has undoubtedly tended to keep before men's eyes, as the highest ideal, a life of purity, self-restraint, and contempt of the world and human affairs. It has also necessarily maintained amongst the laity a sense of the righteous claims of the poor upon the charity of the more affluent members of the community. Further, Sadhuism, by the multiplicity of the independent sects which have arisen in India has engendered and favoured a spirit of tolerance which cannot escape the notice of the most superficial observer."

Of the three main branches of Hinduism, the most esoteric is the Shaktas. The Shaktas are worshipers of the shakti or the female principle as a creative and reproductive agency. Each of the principal gods possesses his own Shakti, through which his creative acts are performed. The Shaktas or Tantrics developed an elaborate picture of the subtle anatomy of the individual, proposing that each person had a secondary body composed of spiritual/psychic energies. In Tantra, sexual energy in the yogi is manifested in a pure form as kundalini, a psycho-physiological force resting like a coiled snake at the base of the spine. When awakened, the kundalini travels up the spine to the several psychic centers called chakras and eventually to the top of the head. The rise of the kundalini to the highest chakra brings higher consciousness and spiritual enlightenment.

Tantrics usually can be divided into two distinct groups. The original self-existent gods were supposed to divide themselves into male and female energies, the male half occupying the right-hand and the female the left-hand side. From this conception we have the two groups of ''right-hand'' observers and ''left-hand'' observers. In distinction to the ascetic world-denying approach to the religious life, Tantra does not offer enlightenment as a result of denying the material world, but from using it. Tantric practice takes things specifically denied to the ascetic and accepts them as the means ''of overcoming the world and gaining enlightenment. The righthand path does this symbolically, the left hand path actually eats denied food and participates in denied activities. Most controversial of all is sexual activity, for which tantrics have been most frequently criticized. The left-hand path of Tantra involves participation in sexual intercourse as a means of union with the goddess.

The right hand tantrism was expounded by Sri Aurobindo and Pandit Gopi Krishna. Lefthand tantrism has found a major exponent in Swami Satyananda Saraswati whose students have moved to the west.

Brahmanism

Brahmanism is a system originated by the Brahmans, the sacerdotal caste of the Hindus, at a comparatively early date. It is the mystical religion of India par excellence, and represents the older beliefs of its peoples. It states that the numerous individual existences of animate nature are only so many manifestations of the one eternal spirit towards which they tend as their final goal of supreme bliss. The object of life is to prevent oneself sinking lower in the scale, and by degrees to raise oneself in it, or if possible to attain the ultimate goal immediately from such state of existence as one happens to be in.

The socio-religious Code of Manu concludes ''He who in his own soul perceives the supreme soul in all beings and acquires equanimity towards them all attains the highest state of bliss.'' Mortification of animal instincts, absolute purity and perfection of spirit, were the moral ideals of the Brahman class. But it was necessary to pass through a succession of four orders or states of existence before any hope of union with the deity could be held out. These were: that of brahmacharin, or student of religious matters; grihastha, or householder; varnaprastha or hermit; and sannyasin or bhikshu, religious mendicant.

Virtually every man of the higher castes practiced at least the first two of these stages, while the priestly class took the entire course. Later, this was by no means the rule, as the scope of study was intensely exacting, often lasting as long as forty-eight years. The neophyte had to support himself by begging from door to door.

He was most often guided by a spiritual preceptor. After several years of his tuition he was married. It was considered absolutely essential that he should leave a son behind him to offer food to his spirit and to those of his ancestors. He was then said to have become a ''house-holder'' and was required to maintain the fire perpetually that he brought into his house upon his marriage day.

Upon growing older, the time arrived for him to enter the third stage of life. Having fulfilled his dharma (social and religious obligations) he now became aware of the transitory nature of the material life and found it necessary to become preoccupied with more eternal spiritual truth. He consequently cut himself off from family ties except (if she wished) his wife, who might accompany him, and went into retirement in a lonely place, carrying with him his sacred fire, and the instruments necessary for his daily sacrifices. Scantily clothed, the anchorite lived entirely on food growing wild in the forest—roots, herbs, wild grain, and similar primitive nourishment. He was not permitted to accept gifts unless absolutely necessary. His time was spent in studying the metaphysical portions of the Vedas under the guidance of a guru, in making offerings, and in practicing austerities with the object of producing entire indifference to worldly desires.

In this way he fitted himself for the final and most exalted order, that of religious mendicant or bhikshu. This consisted solely of meditation. He took up his abode at the foot of a tree in entire solitude and only once a day at the end of his labors might he go near the dwellings of men to beg a little food. In this way he waited for death, neither desiring extinction nor existence, until at length it reached him, and was absorbed in the eternal Brahma.

The doctrines of Brahmanism are to be found in the vedanta philosophic system, which recognizes the Vedas, a collection of ancient Sanskrit hymns, as the revealed source of religious belief through the visions of the ancient rishis or seers. The Upanishads are later scriptures (after 1000 B.C.E.). The Vedas and Upanishads are the most widely accepted holy writings in India. A large number of later writings are also accepted by various groups as sacred scripture. Among the most popular of these later scriptures is the Bhagavad-Gita.

As before noted, the Hindu regarded the entire gamut of animated nature as being traversed by the one soul, which journeyed up and down the scale as its actions in its previous existence were good or evil. To the Hindu the vital element in all animate beings appears essentially similar, and this observation gave credence to the Brahmanical theory of reincarnation that took such a powerful hold upon the Hindu mind.

Demonology

A large and intricate demonology appears as part of Hindu mythology. The gods were at constant war with demons. Vishnu slew more than one demon, but Durga appeared to have been a great enemy of the demon race. The asuras, probably a very ancient and aboriginal pantheon of deities, later became demons in the popular imagination, and the rakshasas may have been cloud-demons. They were described as cannibals, could take many forms, and were constantly menacing the gods. They haunted cemeteries, disturbed sacrifices, animated the dead, and harried and afflicted mankind in all sorts of ways. There were in fact somewhat similar to the vampires of Slavonic countries—assisting the conjecture that the Slavonic vampires were originally cloud-spirits.

We find the gods constantly harassed by demons, and on the whole may be justified in concluding that just as the Tuatha-dedanaan harassed the later deities of Ireland, so did these aboriginal gods lead an existence of constant warfare with the divine beings of the pantheon of the immigrant Aryans.

Popular Witchcraft & Sorcery

The popular witchcraft and sorcery of India resembles that of Europe. The Dravidian or aboriginal peoples of India have always been strong believers in sorcery, and it is possible that this is an example of the mythic influence of a conquered people. They are nonetheless extremely reticent regarding any knowledge they possess of it.

It seems possible that the demands made upon the popular religious sense by Brahmanism crushed the superstitions of the popular occult practices of the very early period, and confined the practice of minor sorcery, (malevolent magic), to the castes of Dravidian or aboriginal stock. Witchcraft seems most prevalent among the more isolated peoples like the Kols, Bhils, and Santals.

The nomadic peoples were also strong believers in sorcery, one of the most dreaded forms of which was the Jigar Khor, or liver-eater, of whom Abul Fazl (1551–1602) stated:

''One of this class can steal away the liver of another by looks and incantations. Other accounts say that by looking at a person he deprives him of his senses, and then steals from him something resembling the seed of a pomegranate, which he hides in the calf of his leg; after being swelled by the fire, he distributes it among his fellows to be eaten, which ceremony concludes the life of the fascinated person. A Jigar Khor is able to communicate his art to another by teaching him incantations, and by making him eat a bit of the liver cake. These Jigar Khors are mostly women. It is said they can bring intelligence from a long distance in a short space of time, and if they are thrown into a river with a stone tied to them, they nevertheless will not sink. In order to deprive any one of this wicked power, they brand his temples and every joint of his body, cram his eyes with salt, suspend him for forty days in a subterranean chamber, and repeat over him certain incantations.''

The witch does not, however, devour the man's liver for two and a half days, and even if she has eaten it, and is put under the hands of an exorcizer, can be forced to substitute a liver of some animal in the body of the man whom she victimized. Folk tales also exist about witches taking out the entrails of people, sucking them, and then replacing them.

All this undoubtedly illustrates, as in ancient France and Germany, and probably also in the Slavonic countries, the manner in which the witch and vampire were believed to be essentially one and the same. In India the archwitch Ralaratri, or ''black night'' has the joined eyebrows, large cheeks, widely-parted lips, and projecting teeth, of the Slavonic werewolf and is a veritable vampire. But she also possesses the powers of ordinary witchcraft—second-sight, the making of philters, the control of tempests, the evil eye, and so forth.

Witches also took animal forms, especially those of tigers, and stories of trials are related at which people gave evidence that they had tracked certain tigers to their lairs, which upon entering they had found tenanted by a notorious witch or wizard. For such witch-tigers the usual remedy was to knock out their teeth to prevent their doing any more mischief.

Strangely enough, the Indian witch, like her European prototype, was very often accompanied by a cat. The cat, said the jungle people, is aunt to the tiger, and taught him everything but how to climb a tree. Zalim Sinh, the famous regent of Kota, believed that cats were associated with witches, and imagining himself enchanted ordered that every cat should be expelled from his province.

As in Europe, witches were known by certain marks. They were believed to learn the secrets of their craft by eating offal of all kinds. The popular belief concerning them was that they were often very handsome and neat, and invariably applied a clear line of red lead to the parting of their hair. They were popularly accused of exhuming dead children and bringing them to life to serve occult purposes of their own. Witches could not die as long as they were witches and until (as in Italy) they could pass on their knowledge of witchcraft to someone else.

They recited charms backwards, repeating two letters and a half from a verse in the Quran. If a certain charm was repeated ''forwards,'' the person employing it would become invisible to his neighbor, but if he repeated it backwards, he would assume whatever shape he chose.

A witch could acquire power over her victim by getting possession of a lock of hair, the paring of nails, or some other part of his body, such as a tooth. For this reason Indian people were extremely careful about the disposal of these particular body parts, burying them in the earth in a place covered with grass, or in the neighborhood of water, which witches universally disliked. Some people even cast the cuttings of their hair into running water.

Like the witches of Europe, these witches also made images of persons out of wax, dough, or similar substances, and tortured them with the idea that the pain would be felt by the person whom they desired to injure.

In India the witches''familiar was known as a bir or the ''hero,'' who aided her to inflict injury upon human beings. The power of the witch was greatest on the 14th, 15th, and 29th of each month, and in particular on the Feast of Lamps (Diwali) and the Festival of Durga.

Witches were often severely punished amongst the isolated hill-folk and diabolical ingenuity was shown in torturing them. To nullify their evil influence, they were beaten with rods of the castor-oil plant and usually died in the process. They were often forced to drink filthy water used by couriers in the process of their work. If not, their noses were cut off, or they were put to death. It has also been reported that their teeth were often knocked out, their heads shaved and offal thrown at them. In the case of women, their heads were shaved and their hair was attached to a tree in some public place. They were also branded, had a ploughshare tied to their legs or were made to drink the water of a tannery.

During the Mutiny, when British authority was relaxed, the most atrocious horrors were inflicted upon witches and sorcerers by the Dravidian people. Pounded chili peppers were placed in their eyes to see if they would bring tears, and the wretched beings were suspended from a tree head downwards, being swung violently from side to side. They were then forced to drink the blood of a goat, and to exorcize the evil spirits that they had caused to enter the bodies of certain sick persons. The mutilations and cruelties practiced on them were severe; but one of the favorite ways of counteracting the spells of a witch was to draw blood from her, and the local priest would often prick the tongue of the witch with a needle and place the resulting blood on some rice and compel her to eat it.

In Bombay state, the Tharus people were supposed to possess special powers of witchcraft, so that the ''Land of Tharus'' is a synonym for witch-land. In Gorakhpur, witches were also very numerous and the half-gypsy banjaras, or grain-carriers, were notorious believers in witchcraft. In his Popular Religion and Folk-lore of Northern India (1896) William Crooke, who did much to elucidate India's popular mythology, stated regarding the various types of Indian witches:

''At the present day [ca. 1895] the half-deified witch most dreaded in the Eastern Districts of the North-western Provinces is Lona, or Nona, a Chamarin or woman of the currier caste. Her legend is in this wise. The great physician Dhanwantara, who corresponds to Luqman Hakim of the Muhammadans, was once on his way to cure King Parikshit, and was deceived and bitten by the snake king Takshaka. He therefore desired his sons to roast him and eat his flesh, and thus succeed to his magical powers. The snake king dissuaded them from eating the unholy meal, and they let the cauldron containing it float down the Ganges. A currier woman, named Lona, found it and ate the contents, and thus succeeded to the mystic powers of Dhanwantara. She became skilful in cures, particularly of snake-bite. Finally she was discovered to be a witch by the extraordinary rapidity with which she could plant out rice seedlings. One day the people watched her, and saw that when she believed herself unobserved she stripped herself naked, and taking the bundle of the plants in her hands threw them into the air, reciting certain spells. When the seedlings forthwith arranged themselves in their proper places, the spectators called out in astonishment, and finding herself discovered, Nona rushed along over the country, and the channel which she made in her course is the Loni river to this day. So a saint in Broach formed a new course for a river by dragging his clothes behind him. . .

''Another terrible witch, whose legend is told at Mathura, is Putana, the daughter of Bali, king of the lower world. She found the infant Krishna asleep, and began to suckle him with her devil's milk. The first drop would have poisoned a mortal child, but Krishna drew her breast with such strength that he drained her life-blood, and the fiend, terrifying the whole land of Braj with her cries of agony, fell lifeless on the ground. European witches suck the blood of children; here the divine Krishna turns the tables on the witch.

"The Palwar Rajputs of Oudh have a witch ancestress. Soon after the birth of her son she was engaged in baking cakes. Her infant began to cry, and she was obliged to perform a double duty. At this juncture her husband arrived just in time to see his demon wife assume gigantic and supernatural proportions, so as to allow both the baking and nursing to go on at the same time. But finding her secret discovered, the witch disappeared, leaving her son as a legacy to her astonished husband. Here, though the story is incomplete, we have almost certainly, as in the case of Nona Chamarin, one of the Melusina type of legend, where the supernatural wife leaves her husband and children, because he violated some taboo, by which he is forbidden to see her in a state of nudity, or the like."

The aborigines of India lived in great fear of ghosts and invisible spirits, and a considerable portion of their time was given up to averting the evil influences of these. Protectives of every description littered their houses, and the approaches to them, and they wore numerous amulets for the purpose of averting evil influences. Regarding these, W. Crooke stated:

"Some of the Indian ghosts, like the ifrit of the Arabian Nights, can grow to the length of ten yojanas or eighty miles. In one of the Bengal tales a ghost is identified because she can stretch out her hands several yards for a vessel. Some ghosts possess the very dangerous power of entering human corpses, like the Vetala, and swelling to an enormous size. The Kharwars of Mirzapur have a wild legend which tells how long ago an unmarried girl of the tribe died, and was being cremated. While the relations were collecting wood for the pyre, a ghost entered the corpse, but the friends managed to expel him. Since then great care is taken not to leave the bodies of women unwatched. So, in the Punjab, when a great person is cremated the bones and ashes are carefully watched till the fourth day, to prevent a magician interfering with them. If he has a chance, he can restore the deceased to life, and ever after retain him under his influence. This is the origin of the custom in Great Britain of waking the dead, a practice which 'most probably originated from a silly superstition as to the danger of a corpse being carried off by some of the agents of the invisible world, or exposed to the ominous liberties of brute animals.' But in India it is considered the best course, if the corpse cannot be immediately disposed of, to measure it carefully, and then no malignant Bhut can occupy it.

"Most of the ghosts whom we have been as yet considering are malignant. There are, however, others which are friendly. Such are the German Elves, the Robin Goodfellow, Puck, Brownie and the Cauld Lad of Hilton of England, the Glashan of the Isle of Man, the Phouka or Leprechaun of Ireland. Such, in one of his many forms, is the Brahmadaitya, or ghost of a Brahman who has died unmarried. In Bengal he is believed to be more neat and less mischievous than other ghosts; the Bhuts carry him in a palanquin, he wears wooden sandals, and lives in a Banyan tree."

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

While Madame Blavatsky's Theosophist movement did find its way to India, the scientific study of psychical phenomena in India really belongs to the period following independence (1948). A small beginning took place in 1951 at the Department of Philosophy and Psychology of Benares Hindu University under Bhikhan L. Atreya, when parapsychology was included as a postgraduate subject, but it did not make much progress. Other Indian scholars such as C. T. K. Chari and S. Parthasarthy of Madras, and Prof. & Mrs. Akolkar of Poona did become interested in psychical phenomena. Prof. Chari took a special interest in scientific and statistical approaches and published papers in the Journal of the American Society of Psychical Research.

Another pioneer was K. Ramakrishna Rao, professor and head of the Department of Psychology and Parapsychology at Andhra University who worked for several years at Duke University, North Carolina, and then established the department at Andhra University and collaborated with B. K. Kanthamani. Rao subsequently became president of the Parapsychological Association for 1965 and 1978, and was later director of the Institute for Parapsychology, Durham, North Carolina.

In North India, Dr. Sampurananand first became interested in parapsychology when Education Minister, and later initiated study of the paranormal at the University of Lucknow in conjunction with Kali Prasad, head of the Department of Philosophy and Psychology. When Sampurananand was appointed Governor of Rajasthan, he helped to establish a department of parapsychology at the Rajasthan University at Jaipur, although this was subsequently closed. Since then, however, there has been interest in the subject for postgraduate degrees in Lucknow and Agra Universities.

In 1962–63, the Bureau of Psychology in Allahabad took up a research project in parapsychology, studying (ESP) Extra sensory perception in schoolchildren. The results were published in the International Journal of Parapsychology in the Autumn 1968 issue.

In 1964, Jamuna Prasad, president of the Indian Institute of Parapsychology, Allahabad, assisted Ian Stevenson who visited India to investigate reported cases of reincarnation first hand. A group of researchers took part in this project, which involved a Specific Trait Questionnaire designed to assess the possible impressions of past experiences carried over to another incarnation. With the formal establishment of the Indian Institute of Parapsychology, another valuable project on "Paranormal Powers Manifested During Yogic Training" was undertaken with a grant from the Parapsychology Foundation.

Of a slightly different nature was "Project Consciousness" inaugurated in December 1966 by Karan Singh, Minister of Health and Family Planning. This project, conducted by the National Institute of Mental Health and Neuro Sciences, Bangalore, was largely concerned with exploration of the ancient Hindu concept of kundalini as a psycho-physiological force in humans related to sexual energy, and in a sublimated form, to levels of higher consciousness. Interest stemmed from the work of Pandit Gopi Krishna, one of several modern spiritual teachers who revived interest in the subject through his writing and teaching activity. The project languished after a change of government.

Indian publications concerned with parapsychology have included: Darshana International (quarterly journal of philosophy, psychology, psychical research, religion and mysticism); Psychics International (quarterly journal of psychic and yoga research); Parapsychology (an Indian journal of parapsychological research from the department of parapsychology; Rajasthan University, Jaipur), discontinued with the closure of the Department of Parapsychology at Rajasthan University; and the Journal of Indian Psychology (Andhra University).

The journal Kundalini (formerly Kundalini & Spiritual India) was devoted to the study of consciousness evolution arising from the work of Gopi Krishna and embodying more the mystical realm than parapsychological. In this connection, a Central Institute for Kundalini Research was established at Srinagar, Kashmir, although it became inactive following the Gopi Krishna's death in 1984. The influence of the mysticism and gurus from India have been a strong influence in America for decades, particularly since the 1950s.

Sources:

Abbott, John. The Keys of Power: A Study of Indian Ritual and Belief. London, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Atreya, B. L. An Introduction to Parapsychology. Banaras, India: International Standard Publications, 1957.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bernard, Theos. Philosophical Foundations of India. London: Rider, 1945.

Crooke, William. The Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of Northern India. Allahabad, India: Government Press, 1894. Reprint, 2 vols. London: A. Constable, 1896.

Garrison, Omar. Tantra—The Yoga of Sex. New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Gervis, Pearce. Naked They Pray. London: Cassell, 1956.

Gopi Krishna, Pandit. The Biological Basis of Religion & Genius. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

———. Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. London: Stuart & Watkins, n.d. Reprint, Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1967.

Oman, J. Campbell. Cults, Customs & Superstitions of India. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1908.

———. The Mystics, Ascetics and Saints of India. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1903.

Sanyal, J. M., trans. The Srimad Bhagavatam. 2 Vols., New Delhi, India: Munshiram Manocharlal, 1973.

Washington, Peter. Madame Blavatsky's Baboon, A History of the Mystics, Mediums, and Misfits Who Brought Spiritualism to America. New York: Schocken Books, 1993.

Indian Journal of Parapsychology

Journal of parapsychology published by the University of Rajasthan's Department of Parapsychology. Current address unavailable.

Indian Rope Trick

A legendary illusion said to have been witnessed by travelers in India and other Oriental countries. As classically described, the demonstration starts with the magician throwing a rope high into the air. The rope stays vertical and a boy assistant of the magician climbs up the rope and disappears from sight. The magician calls to the boy in apparent anger, demanding his return, then puts a sharp knife in his teeth and also climbs the rope and disappears high into the air. There is then the sound of a fierce quarrel; the dismembered limbs of the boy, followed by his bleeding trunk and head, are thrown down to the ground. The magician comes down the rope, kicks the limbs, throws a cloth over them or puts them in a basket, and in a moment the boy reappears whole, none the worse for the experience.

Travelers' tales often included the detail that a photographer took a picture, which proved blank on developing the negative, or alternatively showed only the magician sitting on the ground without a rope, suggesting that the whole exhibition was a collective hallucination induced by the magician.

An early account of the illusion is that of the great Moslem traveler Ibn Batuta (1304–1378), who claimed to witness it in Hang-chow, China. Two centuries later a wandering juggler demonstrated a version of the trick in Germany. Pu Sing Ling, a seventeenth-century Chinese author, wrote that he saw the trick at Delhi, India, in 1630, but it was performed using a 75-foot chain instead of a rope. Edward Melton, a British sailor, saw the trick performed at Batavia by Chinese conjurers about 1670. Since then there have been several reports and numerous rumors of the trick by British travelers and residents in India, continuing until modern times. The British newspaper the Daily Mail carried several firsthand accounts of different versions of the trick (beginning on January 8, 1919) and even ran a photograph.

The various reports by people who have actually witnessed the trick suggest that it is an illusion accomplished by a combination of concealed wires, special lighting assisted by a sun low in the sky at the end of the day, and a dissected monkey whose parts can be thrown from the air. Given modern devices there are other methods that could be used to assist in the illusion. One version of the trick was demonstrated in India by the American illusionist John Keel, who used carefully suspended wires invisible to the spectators, over which a rope was thrown and secured by a hook. Keel claimed that he learned the trick from an Indian holy man who was no longer interested in illusions.

However, there are still some feats of Indian fakirs that have not been explained by simple illusion. These include various acts of levitation done in the round, with prying eyes at every angle. Some have suggested that such events argue for the existence of a rare but genuinely occult power.

According to traditional Hindu yoga teachings, levitation and other supernormal powers are possible at a certain stage of yogic development. The material world itself is regarded as maya (illusion), an inferior reality that may be transcended by advanced yogis. The great Hindu religious teacher Shankaracharya (b. eighth century C.E.) cites the classic form of the Indian rope trick in his commentary on the scripture Mandukya Upanishad, using this as an example of the illusory nature of empirical reality. He points out that although the spectators appear to witness the marvels of the trick, in reality the magician is simply seated on the ground veiled by his own magic. This discussion suggests that Shankaracharya had seen the trick performed and that he thought it to be achieved by the magician's transcending empirical reality and communicating an illusory demonstration to the spectators. In modern terms Shankaracharya is suggesting that what today would be thought of as a collective hallucination achieved by the supernormal powers of an occultist.

Sources:

Gould, Rupert T. The Stargazer Talks. Reprinted as More Oddities and Enigmas. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

Keel, John A. Jadoo. London, 1958.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Indridason, Indridi (1883–1912)

Powerful Icelandic medium (discovered by the novelist Einar H. Kuaran) who was the subject of systematic experiments between the years 1904 and 1909 by the Psychic Experimental Society of Reykjavik, which was established for the purpose of studying this mediumship, the first that Iceland had known. Indridason, who was under exclusive contract to the society, began with automatic writing and trance speaking. After that telekinesis, levitation, materialization, and direct voice developed. He also had healing powers. The phenomena was so strong that direct voice was heard and levitations took place in the presence of 60 to 70 sitters.

Indridason's chief control claimed to be a brother of his grandfather, a university professor at Copenhagen. The power of the medium was at its height in 1909. During the summer he contracted typhoid fever and later consumption, dying in a sanatorium in August 1912.

The experimental society disbanded after his death. Harald Nielsson, professor of theology at the University of Reykjavik, was the chief exponent of the genuineness of Indridason's power (Light, October–November 1919). The Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (1924, p. 239) published a critical analysis of the phenomena by Prof. Gudmundur Hanneson of the University of Reykjavik. He concludes: "The phenomena are unquestionable realities."

Sources:

Gissurarson, Loftur R., and Erlendur Haraldsson. "The Icelandic Physical Medium Indridi Indridason." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 57, 214 (January 1989).

Inedia

Technical term for the claimed ability to survive without taking nourishment. This ability has been reported of various saints throughout history, and in modern times of the Bavarian peasant woman Therese Neumann, who is said to have existed for many years without food, taking only a little water.

Infernal Court

Johan Weyer (1515–88) and other demonologists knowledgeable in the lore of the infernal regions claimed to have discovered there princes and high dignitaries, ministers, ambassadors, and officers of state, whose names and occupations are listed as precisely as in any earthly census. Satan is no longer the sovereign of Hades but is leader of the opposition, the true leader being Beelzebub.

According to Weyer, the demons number 7,405,926, commanded by 72 princes. The anonymous author of Le Cabinet du Roy de France (1581) amends these figures to 7,409,127 demons and 79 princes.

Although demons are specifically named in many inspired catalogs and invoked by sorcerers from their grimoires, there is no real agreement on names and numbers, and in all these fantastic works it is not difficult to see that they represent a distorted reflection of social organization of the world of their time.

Sources:

Weyer, Johannes. Witches, Devils and Doctors in the Renaissance: Johann Weyer, De Praestigiis. Edited by George Mora. Binghamton, N.Y.: Medieval & Rensaissance Texts & Studies, 1991.

Influence

In mediumistic terminology influence is equivalent to ''spirit.'' The American medium Lenora Piper applied it to objects that, by virtue of association of ideas or magnetism of the late owner, helped her to establish communication with the deceased. The presence of such objects, she declared, helped her to clear the ideas of the communicators. The term influence was used earlier by practitioners of animal magnetism to denote the mesmeric force between operator and subject.

INFO See International Fortean Organization

INFO (Journal)

Journal of the International Fortean Organization, continuing the research of the late Charles Fort into inexplicable events, prodigies, mysteries, and so forth. Address: INFO, P.O. Box 367, Arlington, VA 22210-0367. (See also Doubt; Fortean Times)

Information Services for Psi Education

A clearinghouse for information on sources of parapsychology in New York City. It was formed to provide facts on individuals, organizations, and research findings for the benefit of librarians and educators. Apparently now inactive.

Informazioni de Parapsicologia

Semiannual Italian publication reporting research in parapsychology; includes news and book reviews. Last known address: Centro Italiano di Parapsicologia, Via Belvedere 87, 81027 Naples, Italy.

Inglis, Brian (1916–1993)

Irish author and journalist, an authority on alternative medicine and paranormal topics. Inglis was born on July 31, 1916, in Dublin. He attended Shrewsbury and Magdalene Colleges, Oxford (B.A., honors) and Dublin University (Ph.D.). He served in the Royal Air Force during World War II and afterward became a journalist and author. He was editor of The Spectator (1959–62).

His original outlook on and mistrust of scientific dogma led him to join the Society for Psychical Research in the early 1960s and make his own investigation into paranormal subjects. He was a founding member of the K.I.B. Foundation, with Arthur Koestler, formed to encourage and promote research in fields presently outside scientific orthodoxies, such as parapsychology and alternative medicine. (After the death of Arthur Koestler, the organization was renamed The Koestler Foundation.)

Inglis wrote numerous books on Irish history, unorthodox medicine, and the paranormal. He was also a consultant to the serial publication The Unexplained.

Parapsychologist Scott Roge complained that Inglis had a bad habit in his writing of suppressing negative information about psychics and researchers he favored by failing to note cases of fraud that were uncovered. Inglis died in 1993.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Inglis, Brian. Fringe Medicine. 1964. Reprinted as The Case for Unorthodox Medicine. New York: Berkeley, 1969.

———. The Hidden Power. London: Jonathan Cape, 1986.

———. Natural and Supernatural: A History of the Paranormal from Earliest Times to 1914. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1977.

———. Natural Medicine. London: Collins, 1979.

———. The Paranormal: An Encyclopedia of Psychic Phenomena. London: Granada, 1985.

———. Science and Parascience: A History of the Paranormal, 1914–1939. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1984.

Inglis, Brian, and Ruth West. The Alternative Health Guide. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1983.

Initiates of Thanateros

The Initiates of Thanateros (IOT) is the primary organization perpetuating the practice of chaos magick, a new magical teaching that emerged in the 1960s out of the world of Austin Osman Spare (1886–1956). Chaos magick developed out of the earlier ceremonial magic. It adopted an essentially Eastern view of reality that begins with the universe understood as a transcendent everchanging whole. It is beyond intellectual grasp, but can be mystically encountered and perceived. Chaos is the name given that whole universe. Chaos is not the opposite of order, but the order that is beyond what can be conceived.

Chaos magick places a considerable emphasis on the individual subconscious as the focus of magical activity. As in Eastern thought, the essential self is seen as identical with the whole. The self is also seen as the source of magical power, hence there is no attempt in magical training to attune the individual with either deities or power outside of or apart from the self.

Chaos magick emerged in the 1960s, and an informal ''Circle of Chaos'' developed in England around Ray Sherwin and Julian Wilde, who wrote the initial works on chaos theory and practice. During the 1970s, Peter J. Carroll emerged as the primary theoretician of chaos magick, and he took the lead in the formation of the Initiates of Thanateros as a new magical order that would serve as a vehicle for chaos magick. By this time, chaos magick had spread across Europe and the formal organization of the Pact of the IOT occurred in Austria in 1977.

The pact is loosely organized as a network of magicians and certain people designated to perform various functions. Local temples, the basic organization units, are encouraged to experiment with rituals and disciplines and to share results with the larger order. It is understood that those that are most successful will be widely used and become the basis for further change. Less successful ideas will fall by the wayside.

The pact exists solely to provide space for its members to pursue the Great Work, i.e., magick, and to provide gathering and programs for the spread of magick in what is considered the New Aeon. The writings of Peter J. Carroll have been widely accepted and used within the IOT. Chaos magick has spread around the world and IOT temples now exist in more than a dozen countries. IOT in the United Kingdom may be contacted at BM Sorcery, London WC1N 3XX. IOT in the United States is headquartered at P.O. Box 92012, Milwaukee, WI 53202. A complete list of contacts internationally can be found on its website at http://www.chaosmagick.org/.

Sources:

Carroll, Peter J. Liber Null & Psychinaut. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1987.

Savage, Adrian. An Introduction to Chaos Magick. New York: Magickal Childe, 1988.

Initiation

The process of entry into a secret society, an occult group, or a mystical stage of religion. The idea of initiation was inherited by the Egyptians and Assyrians from Neolithic peoples who possessed secret organizations or ''mysteries'' analogous to those of the Medwiwin of the North American Indians or those of the Australian Blackfellows. Initiation was a stage in the various grades of the Egyptian priesthood and the mysteries of Eleusis and Bacchus. These processes probably consisted of tests of courage and fidelity (as with the ordeals of primitive peoples) and included such acts as sustaining a severe beating, drinking blood, real and imaginary; and so forth.

In the Popol Vuh, the saga of the Kiche Indians of Guatemala, there is a description of the initiation tests of two hero-gods on entrance to the native equivalent of Hades. Indeed, many of the religious mysteries typified the descent of man into hell and his return to earth, based on the corn mother legend of the resurrection of the wheat plant.

Initiation into the higher branches of mysticism, magic, and Theosophy is largely symbolic and is to be taken as implying a preparation for the higher life and the regeneration of the soul. Typical of such rites are the ceremonies for initiation and advancement of Freemasons.

The great religions instituted initiation rituals, such as the baptism and laying on of hands in Christianity, and the circumcision and bar mitzvah in Judaism.

The ordeal rituals of initiation into Freemasonry echo older ceremonies symbolizing the mysteries of birth, pain, death, and the life of the soul. Many trades also have traditional ordeal ceremonies for the initiation of young apprentices, similar to those instituted by college fraternities.

In esoteric traditions, both Eastern and Western, initiation refers to the entrance into various levels of purification of the individual through development at all levels of experience—body, mind, emotions, and soul—as discussed in various forms of magical and mystical traditions. Initiation can be used in a somewhat watered-down sense, and is adaptable to any new insight brought about by the ups and downs of living. However, it more properly is used to refer to those insights created by a planned system of inner development while the individual is involved in mastering a particular system of esoteric teachings.

Sources:

Allen, M. R. Male Cults and Secret Initiation in Melanesia. Melbourne, Australia: Melbourne University Press, 1967.

Alli, Antero, et al. All Rites Reversed: Ritual Technology for Self-Initiation. Boulder, Colo.: Vigilantero Press, 1987.

Danielou, Alain. Yoga: The Method of Re-Integration. London: Christopher, 1969. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1956.

Duncan, Malcolm C. Duncan's Masonic Ritual and Monitor. New York: McKay, 1976.

Eliade, Mircea. Rites and Symbols of Initiation: The Mysteries of Birth & Rebirth. New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1968.

Fortune, Dion. The Training and Work of an Initiate. 1930. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Hall, Manly P. Secret Teachings of All Ages. Hollywood, Calif.: Philosophical Research Society, 1962. Rev. ed. 1977.

Heard, Gerald. Training for the Life of the Spirit. Hankins, N.Y.: Strength Books, 1975. Distributed by Steiner Books.

Huxley, Francis. The Way of the Sacred. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974. Reprint, New York: Dell, 1976.

MacKenzie, Norman, ed. Secret Societies. London: Aldus Books, 1967.

Oliver, Rev. George. The History of Initiation, in Twelve Lectures; comprising a Detailed Account of the Rites & Ceremonies, Doctrines and Discipline, of all the Secret and Mysterious Institutions of the Ancient World. London: Richard Spencer, 1829. Rev. ed. 1841.

Sédir, Paul. Initiations. London: Regency Press, 1967.

Stewart, R. J. UnderWorld Initiation: A Journey Towards Psychic Transformation. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1985.

Underhill, Evelyn. Mysticism. London: Methuen, 1911.

Young, Frank W. Initiation Ceremonies: A Cross-Cultural Study of Status Dramatization. Bobbs-Merrill, 1965.

In Light Times

In Light Times is a post-New Age networking periodical published in Las Vegas, Nevada, but serving Nevada, Arizona, Southern California, and Utah. Published monthly, it is distributed free at sites throughout its target area. In Light Times was founded in 1989 and has steadily grown into a substantive magazine that each month includes a selection of feature articles that covers the whole spectrum of New Age concerns including holistic health, channeling, spiritual development, prosperity consciousness, meditation, global changes, and various transformative practices. It has also been able to include articles by and/or interviews with many notables in the New Thought and New Age community, recent issues including, for example, Marianne Williamson, Lazaris (Jac Purcel), Alan Cohen, Danion Brinkley, Deepak Chopra, and Raymond Moody.

Each issue also includes a variety of monthly columns including book reviews, astrology, and the popular column by New Thought teacher Louise Hay. An events calendar carries notices of related events, especially in the Las Vegas Area. Like many New Age network magazines, advertising is an important feature and fills much of the content of each issue.

In Light Times has been one of the New Age periodicals to make the jump to an electronic format. It offers potential readers the option of an abridged e-mail copy of the magazine and has an expansive Internet site that includes the favorite articles, including editor Michelene K. Bell's editorials, from past issues. The magazine also sponsors occasional events in Las Vegas and a weekly radio show on a local station. In spite of its fame as a gambling/entertainment center, Las Vegas is also a normal urban center with a large and active religious and metaphysically oriented community.

In Light Times may be contacted at P.O. Box 35798, Las Vegas, NV 89133. Its Internet site is at http://www.inlighttimes.com/.

Sources:

In Light Times. http://www.inlighttimes.com/. May 16, 2000.

Inner Circle Kethra E'Da Foundation

A foundation established in 1945 by trance medium Mark Probert. Probert was recognized as a medium by Meade Layne of the Borderland Sciences Research Society, who helped assist him in his development. Gradually a set of teachers emerged who expressed the desire to use him as their means of communicating with the world. The sessions at which these spirit entities spoke were recorded, transcribed, and published by the foundation.

Probert died in 1969, and since then the foundation has preserved tape recordings of his trance lectures and circulated copies of those that were published. As of 1992 there were three centers associated with the foundation where people gathered to listen to the Probert tapes. The foundation may be contacted at P.O. Box 121722, San Diego, CA 92112.

Sources:

Probert, Mark. Excerpts from the Mark Probert Séances: 1950 Series. 3 vols. San Diego, Calif.: Inner Circle Press, 1950.

———. The Magic Bag. San Diego, Calif.: Inner Circle Kethra E'Da Foundation, 1963.

Wassen, Ralph, ed. Yada Speaks. San Diego, Calif.: Kethra E'Da Foundation, 1985.

Inner Forum Newsletter

Monthly publication featuring developments in parapsychology; included sections on yoga, astrology, pyramids, and related subjects. Last known address: P.O. Box 1611, Boise, ID 83701.

Inner Light Foundation

Betty Bethards emerged as a popular psychic and teacher in Northern California in the 1960s. Her message centered upon the potential for each person to develop a conscious awareness of God. Within each individual lie intuitive faculties which may be awakened and utilized for bringing about a realization of universal brotherhood. From this understanding she founded the Inner Light Foundation in 1969. Starting small, it grew through the era of the New Age Movement into one of the largest associations of psychically oriented people on the American West Coast during the 1980s. Bethards authored several books and became a popular speaker at New Age events.

The foundation's program is built upon Bethards' belief that individuals have three basic tools that allow them to actualize their own inner potentials and utilize their own inner guidance and insight. Thus she teaches people to become aware of their dreams, adopt various visualization/meditation techniques, and use affirmation. These are brought together in a powerful meditation technique that Bethards developed, the use of which allows the practitioner to gain inner awareness and a mystical consciousness and acquire different spiritual (psychic) abilities.

The foundation is centered in Petaluma, California (a San Francisco suburb), after many years in Novato, but regularly sponsors activities in various locations in both the San Francisco Bay Area and Los Angeles. By the mid-1990s membership in the foundation had reached above 10,000, most concentrated in the American West. Copies of its periodical, Inner Light Foundation Illuminations, may be secured from its headquarters at Box 750265, Petaluma, CA 94975. The webpage may be found at http://www.innerlight.org/.

Sources:

Bethards, Betty. The Dream Book. Shaftesbury, UK: Element Boooks, 1997.

———. Relationships in the New Age of Aids. Novato, Calif.: Inner Light Foundation, 1988.

———. The Sacred Sword. Novato, Calif.: Inner Light Foundation, 1972.

———. Sex and Psychic Energy. Novato, Calif.: Inner Light Foundation, 1977.

———. There Is No Death. Novato, Calif.: Inner Light Foundation, 1975.

———, and Jaclyn Catalfo. The Way of the Mystic. Shaftesbury, UK: Element, 1995.

Inner Sense Scientist Association See New Age World Religious and Scientific Research Foundation

Inner-Space Interpreters

Publishers in the 1970s of three valuable guides to periodicals, recordings, and services in the fields of psi phenomena and New Age spiritual awareness: the Guide to Psi Periodicals (newspapers, magazines, newsletters); the California Directory of Psi Services (organizations, individuals, shops, services); and the Guide to Psi Tape Recordings. All three guides were edited by Elizabeth M. Werner. They were superseded by Whole Again Resource Guide, published by SourceNet, in Santa Barbara, California, in the 1980s.

Inner Voice

An auditory sensation covered, whether subjective or objective, by the term clairaudience. Clairaudience is usually conceived of as a purely mental phenomenon. One interesting description of the inner voice was offered by medium T. Herbert Noyes, before the London Dialectical Society in the last century: "I know that I should excite the derision of the sceptics if I were to say that I have conversed with spirits after a fashion which was asserted to be that in which spirits communicate with each other—by an "inner voice," which I could only compare to the sensation which would be caused by a telegraphic apparatus being hooked on to one of the nerve-ganglia—a distinctly audible click accompanying every syllable of the communication, which one could not say one heard, but of which one was made conscious by a new sense, and which was clearly distinguishable from thoughts originated in one's own mind."

InPSIder, The (Newsletter)

Monthly newsletter issued by the Parapsychological Services Institute (PSI), a nonprofit organization founded in 1986. PSI offered education and counseling for those wishing to explore the meaning of psychic and spiritual experiences. The first issue of The InPSIder was published in July 1992. Last known address: 5575 B Chamblee Dunwoody Rd., Ste. 323, Atlanta, GA 30338.

INPSITE (Psychical Research Database)

This computer catalog of the holdings of the American Society for Psychical Research is maintained in Inmagic, a software package designed for libraries and information centers. The software assists with serials control and circulation, and also connects with other computer systems. INPSITE contains records of book and journal collections, the pamphlet file, and the society's archives. Initially INPSITE emphasized items that did not appear in the existing card catalog—which closed in early 1987 with some 600 books and many pamphlets not yet cataloged—but as INPSITE expands, it hopes to provide access to the complete card catalog. Address: American Society for Psychical Research, 5 W. 73rd St., New York, NY 10023.

Insight (Journal)

Occasional publication of the Central Psi Research Institute. Last known address: 4800 N. Milwaukee Ave., Ste. 210, Chicago, IL 60630.

Insight (Magazine)

Quarterly magazine of occultism with a wide range of coverage, published by Deric Robert James, 25 Calmore Close, Stourvale Meadows, Bournemouth, Dorset, England.

Insight Northwest (Newsletter)

Bimonthly newsletter published by PsiCircle Center, concerned with New Age, holistic, and spiritual topics. Last known address: PsiCircle Center, P.O. Box 95341, Seattle, WA 98145.

Insights (Journal)

Monthly publication of the Jersey Society of Parapsychology, reporting on the society's activities and experiments in psi phenomena. Address: P.O. Box 2071, Morristown, NJ 07960.

Inspiration

A psychic state in which one becomes susceptible to creative spiritual influence or unwittingly lends oneself as an instrument for through-flowing ideas. It is the creative state of the artist, poet, and author, traditionally believed to be amenable to the wisdom of the muses or inspiring gods. In a state of inspiration, the prophets of various religions dictated scriptures or predicted future events. The term inspiration denotes a breathing in of the divine creative spirit, bringing perception of truth.

Numerous thinkers and artists have noted their own experience of inspiration. They describe states of outward passivity in which the mind becomes receptive to information that they cannot ascribe to their own intelligence. The inspiration of the muse in poets, painters, and musicians, when considered universally, resembles the experiences of mediums, channels, and psychics.

The philosopher Ferdinand Schiller wondered where his thoughts came from; they frequently flowed through him ''independent of the action of his own mind.'' Mozart stated, ''When all goes well with me, when I am in a carriage, or walking, or when I cannot sleep at night, the thoughts come streaming in upon me most fluently; whence or how is more than I can tell.'' Beethoven said, ''Inspiration is for me that mysterious state in which the entire world seems to form a vast harmony, when every sentiment, every thought re-echoes within me, when all the forces of nature become instruments for me, when my whole body shivers and my hair stands on end.''

Lord Beaconsfield, British statesman and novelist, admitted, ''I often feel that there is only a step from intense mental concentration to madness. I should hardly be able to describe what I feel at the moment when my sensations are so strangely acute and intense. Every object seems to be animated. I feel that my senses are wild and extravagant. I am no longer sure of my own existence and often look back to see my name written there and thus be assured of my existence.''

The two satellites of Mars were discovered in 1877 by Professor A. Hall. One hundred seventy-five years earlier, Jonathan Swift wrote in Gulliver's Travels of the astronomers of Laputa: ''They have discovered two small stars, or satellites, which revolve round Mars. The inner one is three diameters distant from the centre of the planet, the outer one five diameters; the first makes its revolution in ten hours, the second in twenty hours and a half.'' These figures, cited at the time as a proof of Swift's ignorance of astronomy, show a striking agreement with the later findings of Hall.

W. M. Thackeray in one of his ''Roundabout Papers'' (Cornhill Magazine, August 1862): ''I have been surprised at the observations made by some of my characters. It seems as if an occult power was moving the pen. The personage does or says something and I ask: 'How did he come to think of that?'&43''

Lafcadio Hearn (1850–1904) said his writing was done in ''periods of hysterical trance.'' He said he saw and heard things that were not real.

Of the inception of the chapter ''The Death of Uncle Tom'' in Uncle Tom's Cabin, one biographer of Harriet Beecher Stowe stated, ''It seemed to her as though what she wrote was blown through her mind as with the rushing of a mighty wind.''

Bogdan Hasdeu, the great Romanian writer, became a convinced Spiritualist after he automatically obtained messages from his deceased daughter. His father had been a distinguished linguist and was planning a standard dictionary of the Romanian language at the time of his death. Bogdan himself was a historian. When half through his History of the Romanian People, he suddenly plunged into the compilation of a vast dictionary, saying he felt that he was forced to do so. It is difficult to explain this case by ordinary psychological processes, since in a séance Bogdan later atteneded the medium (who could not speak Russian) passed into trance and wrote messages from his father in Russian urging him to complete the work.

The popular novelist and playwright Edgar Wallace wrote in the London Daily Express (June 4, 1928): ''Are we wildly absurd in supposing that human thought has an indestructible substance, and that men leave behind them, when their bodies are dead, a wealth of mind that finds employment in a new host? I personally do not think we are. I am perfectly satisfied in my mind that I have received an immense amount of help from the so-called dead. I have succeeded far beyond the point my natural talents justified. And so have you—and you. I believe that my mind is furnished with oddments of intellectual equipment that have been acquired I know not how.''

Sitting with W. T. Stead and Ada Goodrich-Freer, the medium David Anderson went into trance and gave the name of the hero and some incidents from a story that Goodrich-Freer had written but never published. A similar occurrence is recorded in H. Travers Smith's Voices from the Void (1919).

Hannen Swaffer interviewed a number of distinguished artists and writers on the method by which their work was produced. The majority of their statements, recorded in Swaffer's book Adventures with Inspiration (1929) attribute the imparting of creativity to a supernormal source.

According to ancient Hindu mysticism, there is a psychophysiological mechanism in human beings by which a condition of higher consciousness may be brought about by meditation or yoga practice, and in modern times there is some evidence that this condition—the raising of the kundalini—has occurred spontaneously in inventors and men of genius.

Sources:

Bucke, Richard Maurice. Cosmic Consciousness: A Study in the Evolution of the Human Mind. Innes & Sons, 1901. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Clissold, Augustus. The Prophetic Spirit in its Relation to Wisdom and Madness. London, 1870.

Duchesneau, Louise. The Voice of the Muse. Frankfurt, Germany: P. Lang, 1986.

Gopi Krishna. The Biological Basis of Religion and Genius. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Graves, Robert. The White Goddess. London: Faber & Faber, 1948.

James, William. The Varieties of Religious Experience. London: Longmans Green, 1902.

Kast, Verena. Joy, Inspiration, and Hope. College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1991.

Kennard, Nina H. Lafcadio Hearn, His Life and Work. New York: D. Appleton and Co., 1912.

Inspirational Speakers

Trance mediums who deliver impromptu platform addresses on various subjects, often chosen by the audience, the contents of which seem to greatly surpass their normal intellectual power and knowledge. The degree of difference in knowledge and erudition between the medium awake and in a trance continues to be (in the case of New Age channeling) one of the primary arguments in favor of the spirit hypothesis. The history of Spiritualism is rich in accounts of inspirational mediums. Among the most famous mediums in the United States were Cora Richmond (first known as ''Miss Cora Scott'' and later as ''Mrs. Hatch'' and ''Mrs. Tappan''), Emma Hardinge Britten, Thomas Lake Harris, Thomas Gale Forster, and Nettie Colburn (also known as ''Maynard''). They were joined in England by William J. Colville, J. J. Morse, Anne Meurig Morris, Estelle Roberts, and Winifred Moyes.

The first American inspirational speaker who visited England shortly after the arrival of Maria B. Hayden was Emma Frances Jay (later Mrs. Emma Jay Bullene). Emma Hardinge Britten mentions a number of additional inspirational speakers in her survey Modern American Spiritualism (1870), among them a Miss Sprague, Charlotte Tuttle, Hattie Huntley, Frances Hyzer, and Mrs. M. S. Townsend. Trance speaker Henrietta Maynard had a special claim to fame since her oratory reportedly influenced Abraham Lincoln on the issue of emancipation.

In recent times the concept of trance speaking has experienced a remarkable revival as a New Age phenomenon, with the deviation that the New Age channels rarely allow the audience to suggest the topic for their regular discourses. Familiar names from the modern era include Edgar Cayce and Jane Roberts, who inspired a host of contemporary channelers, such as Elwood Babbitt, JZ Knight (who channels ''Ramtha''), Jack Pursell (''Lazaris''), and Ruth Montgomery.

It is not always clear whether the trance message is coming from a real or fictitious communicating entity or whether it springs from a hidden level of consciousness of the channeler. It is therefore always wise, as with mediumship in general, to evaluate the phenomenon of channeling on the basis of the quality of inspiration and on the accuracy of information and insight.

Sources:

Garrett, Eileen J. My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. New York, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Klimo, Jon. Channeling: Investigations on Receiving Information from Paranormal Sources. Los Angeles: Jeremy P. Tarcher, 1967.

Leaf, Horace. What Mediumship Is. London: Spiritualist Press, 1976.

Maynard, Nettie. Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? Philadelphia: R. C. Hartranft, 1891. Reprint, London: Psychic Book Club, 1917.

Moses, William Stainton. Spirit Teachings Through the Mediumship of William Stainton Moses. London, 1883. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Roberts, Jane. Seth Speaks. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1972. Stern, Jess. Edgar Cayce: The Sleeping Prophet. Virginia Beach, Va.: A.R.E. Press, 1967.

Institute for Anomalistic Criminology (IAC)

Specialized section of the Center for Scientific Anomalies Research (founded 1981). The IAC was formed by Marcello Truzzi to bring together behavioral science researchers and criminal investigation experts concerned with the interface between claims of scientific anomalies and criminal behavior. Concerns include such diverse topics as ''occult crime'' (e.g., claims of Satanic abuse), use of psychics by law enforcement agencies, spontaneous human combustion, involvement of ''apparitions'' in crimes, and correlation between lunar phase and crime.

Address: Center for Scientific Anomalies Research, c/o Dr. Marcello Truzzi, Director, P. O. Box 1052, Ann Arbor, MI 48106-1052.

Sources:

Lyons, Arthur, and Marcello Truzzi. Blue Sense: Psychic Detectives and Crime. New York: Mysterious Press; New York: Warner Books, 1991.

The Institute for Consciousness Research (ICR)

A Canadian organization of individuals concerned with fostering public awareness of kundalini, the powerful life force believed by many Hindus to be possessed by all human beings, as understood in the teachings of Pandit Gopi Krishna. It was originally described in ancient Hindu treatises on yoga and spiritual development. ICR (Institute for Consciousness Research) believes this energy to be the divine guiding force behind the continuing evolution of human beings toward higher dimensions of consciousness and, as such, the mechanism responsible for all extraordinary talents, intuition, genius, inspiration, and spiritual illumination. The group encourages the scientific investigation of kundalini and is confident that such research will inevitably lead to a new understanding of evolution, religion, psychic gifts, insanity, and all other normal and abnormal phenomena of the mind.

ICR members are active in literary research concerned with kundalini and also support other groups concerned with related studies and the promotion of a cleaner environment and world peace. ICR publishes the books and audiotapes of Gopi Krishna, who wrote a number of books based on his more than 45 years of personal experience of higher consciousness states, after arousing kundalini energy through yoga meditation. Address: R.R. 5, Flesherton, ON, Canada, NOC 1EO. Website: http://www.stn.net/icr/icr.html.

Institute for Parapsychology

A division of the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man, housing the Duke University collection on parapsychology, comprised of more than 10,000 accounts of spontaneous psi experiences. The institute was founded in 1962 after Duke University discontinued its sponsorship of the controversial Parapsychology Laboratory which was headed by pioneer parapsychologist J. B. Rhine.

The institute conducts research and serves as an international forum. It holds meetings attended by researchers from other parapsychology centers, and many of their papers and reports are published by the institute in its Journal of Parapsychology. It also houses a large parapsychology library and sponsors summer study programs for graduate students and postgraduate research. The current director is Dr. K. Ramakrishna Rao. Address: 402 N. Buchanan Blvd., Durham, NC 27701.

Institute for Spiritualist Mediums

The Institute for Spiritualist Mediums began in 1956 when Bertha Harris, a prominent London medium, and two associates, Ben Harrington and Russell Harwood, hosted a small gathering to discuss the formation of a new organization to assist mediums and promote mediumship. The initial group of six sent a letter of invitation to all the known mediums in the London area to join in discussions at a second meeting. A number of the prominent mediums accepted the invitation and moved toward the formation of what would initially be termed the Union of Spiritual Mediums. A periodical, Mediums, was launched. The new organization would specialize in the promotion of mediums and mediumship in particular and Spiritualism in general. It owns no property, has no paid employees, and holds no Sunday gatherings. It self consciously refuses to compete with the various Spiritualist groups already in existence.

The new union moved to assist in the training of new mediums and in the certification of mediums as they reached various levels of proficiency. Younger members are granted a Probationer's Certificate. More accomplished members may receive registration as an Approved Medium, an important acknowledgment signaling a medium's ability, public proficiency, and knowledge of Spiritualism. The union also sought ways to bring new mediums from the countryside into London to demonstrate their abilities. The study sessions began with evening meetings, and later, lectures and workshops were held during the day. In the 1970s the union instituted the first Residential Study Weekend, now a regular annual event.

At its 25th anniversary in 1981, the union's name was changed to the Institute for Spiritualist Mediums. The institute moved to create a program for home circles, and president Eileen Roberts produced a Home Circle Tutorial kit to assist these small groups that sit to contact spirits.

The institute may be contacted through its web address: http://www.ism.org.uk/.

Sources:

Institute for Spiritualist Mediums. http://www.ism.org.uk/. February 20, 2000.

Institute for the Development of the Harmonious Human Being

An organization dealing with a Sufi form of Fourth Way teachings (derived from the work of Georgei Ivanovitch Gurdjieff). The institute encouraged a search for God that transcends human conceptuality and, by assimilation with God, the discovery of truth and happiness. The institute held workshops on conscious birth, sex, and death, and taught meditation techniques. Last known address: Box 370, Nevada City, CA 95959.

Institute for the Study of American Religion (ISAR)

Educational research organization formed to further research and the study of the numerous small religious bodies and psychic/occult organizations formed in America during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It existed in Evanston, Illinois, for many years before moving to Santa Barbara, California, in 1985. At the time of the move the institute donated its library of more than 40,000 volumes to the Davidson Library at the University of California, Santa Barbara (UCSB), where it now exists as the American Religions Collection. The institute continues to support and build the collection. The American Religions Collection houses more than volumes in addition to research files, magazines, and ephemeral literature. Among its unique materials is the Elmer T. Clark Memorial set of volumes used by him in writing his classic work The Small Sects in America (Abingdon, 1949). The collection is open to the public for research through the special collections department of the university.

Above and beyond building a research library, ISAR has worked at creating reference books and other scholarly tools for the study of new religious movements, especially occult, magic, and Eastern groups. With the relocation of the library to the university, the research and publication program took center stage. In cooperation with the Gale Group and Garland Publishing Company, the institute has been responsible for producing almost 200 separate publications during the 25 years of its existence. With the help of the Institute of World Spirituality, the institute began the International Relgions of World Spirituality Project in 1996.

ISAR's director is J. Gordon Melton, who also serves as a research specialist with the Department of Religious Studies at UCSB. He has written and edited a number of the institute's publications. The institute also sponsors periodic conferences. Address: P.O. Box 90709, Santa Barbara, CA 93190-0709. Website: http://www.americanreligion.org/.

Sources:

Institute for the Study of American Religion. http://www.americanreligion.org/. March 8, 2000.

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. 6th ed. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

———. Religious Leaders of America. 2nd ed. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Murphy, Larry J., Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward, eds. Encyclopedia of African American Religion. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.

Institute for Yoga and Consciousness

The Institute for Yoga and Consciousness was established in 1985 at Andhra University, Andhra Pradesh, India, by K. Ramakrishna Rao. Earlier, in 1967, Rao had been responsible for setting up the Department of Psychology and Parapsychology at the school, which became the center for the dissemination of information about parapsychology in India. In 1977 Rao moved to North Carolina to become head of the Institute for Parapsychology. While there he became aware of the new interest in consciousness studies. In 1984 he returned to India to become vice chancellor at his former school. In that position he set up the first Indian center to dedicate itself to consciousness research with a special reference to yoga and the popular consciousness-altering techniques developed by the various yoga disciplines.

Rao became the first director of the new institute, but in 1987 he came back to the United States and again resumed his leadership of the Institute for Parapsychology. The Institute for Yoga and Consciousness continued its program of research in consciousness and paranormal powers in the context of Indian spiritual belief and practice. The institute also conducted a practical program assisting individuals in using its findings in a personal program of self-discovery through yoga, meditation, counseling, and psychotherapy. Current address available.

Sources:

Rao, K. R. The Basic Experiments in Parapsychology. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1984.

Institute Magazine

A journal of Fourth Way teachings, stemming from the philosophy of Georgei Ivanovitch Gurdjieff as taught by J. G. Bennett. Last known address: Coombe Springs Press, Daglingworth Manor, Daglingworth, Gloucestershire, GL7 7AH, England.

Institute of Divine Metaphysical Research

The Institute of Divine Metaphysical Research grew out of the 1931 vision of Dr. Henry Clifford Kinley, an Ohio Christian minister who had absorbed insights from two very different sources, the Sacred Name Movement and Theosophy. The former had swept through conservative churches following World War I (1914–18)with the idea that the Creator of the universe should be called by the name He had revealed, Yahweh, and his Son should be called Yahshua rather than Jesus. In 1931, Kinley claimed that Yahweh revealed his plan for the Ages, and Kinley began to teach what he had learned. For that purpose, he founded the Kinley Institute that later evolved into the Institute of Divine Metaphysical Research.

The statement of aims of the institute are "To form a nucleus of Universal Brotherhood of Humanity in Yahshua the Messiah without distinction of Race or Nationality, Creed, Sex, Caste or Color; To investigate the Unexplained Spirit Law or so called Law of Nature and the Powers latent in man; To encourage and promote the study of Scriptures, comparative Religions, Psychology, Philosophy and Modern (practical and occult) Science." This statement was adapted from that of the Theosophical Society.

In 1958, Carl F. Gross succeeded Kinley as head of the institute and along with a group of Kinley's students relocated its headquarters to Los Angeles where for the first time it was incorporated. Later he published Kinley's primary text, Elohim the Archetype (Original) Pattern of the Universe. Yahweh had revealed his pattern or plan previously to Moses, who embodied it in the Hebrew tabernacle. It was later embodied in such teachings as the Kabbalah, where it is pictured in the Tree of Life diagram.

Yahweh appeared at various times in His super incorporeal form on several occasions including to Moses (Exodus 24), Isaiah (Isaiah 6), and at the mount of Transfiguration (Matthew 17). Yahweh is ultimately Spirit, without form. However, since matter is simply condensed Spirit, Yahweh can take physical form. He does this in a more general sense as the material creation, but in a specific sense in Yahshua. Following his resurrection, Yahshua continued in His "physical" form as the Comforter (usually called the Holy Spirit).

Yahweh has acted in history though a series of ages or dispensations. The last of these ages began with the resurrection of Yahshua. The revelation to Kinley was to usher in the end of this present church age, which should come to an end at sometime around the end of the twentieth century.

During the 1990s, by which time the institute had developed centers across North America, the headquarters moved to Florida and new leadership emerged in the person of Dr. Kenneth Haverly, III. The institute can be contacted at P.O. Box 536156, Orlando, FL 32856-6156.

Sources:

Kinley, Henry Clifford. Elohim the Archetype (Original) Pattern of the Universe. Los Angeles: Institute of Divine Metaphysical Research, 1961, 1969.

Institute of Noetic Sciences (IONS)

Founded in 1973 by former astronaut Edgar D. Mitchell to encourage and conduct basic research and education programs on mind–body relationships for the purpose of gaining new understanding of human consciousness. The term noetic is defined as "pertaining to, or originating in intellectual or rational activity." Institute programs include research in parapsychology, healing, personal awareness, and control of interior states. In 1993, the institute merged with the Intuition Network. The institute, now a worldwide organization, has a 50,000-plus membership. Address: 475 Gate Five Rd., Ste. 300, Sausalito, CA 94965. Website: http://www.noetic.org/.

Sources:

Institute of Noetic Sciences. http://www.noetic.org/. March 8, 2000.

Mitchell, Edgar D. Psychic Exploration. Edited by John White. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1974.

Institute of Parascience See International Parascience Institute

Institute of Psychophysical Research

Founded in 1962 at Oxford, England, by members of the Society for Psychical Research, London, at Oxford University to advance understanding of the working of the human mind by scientific research on neglected areas of psychology, including lucid dreams, out-of-the-body travel, and hallucinations.

The Institute of Psychophysical Research is an independent group under the directorship of Celia E. Green, best known as the author of the book Out-of-the-body Experiences, published in 1968 as volume 2 of Proceedings of the Institute of Psychophysical Research. Address: 118 Banbury Rd. Oxford, Oxfordshire, OX2 6JU England.

Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene (Institute for Border Areas of Psychology and Mental Hygiene)

German institute for parapsychology and related areas, founded in 1950 by Hans Bender. In conjunction with Freiburg University, West Germany, a chair in psychology and border areas of psychology was established at Freiburg University in 1953 and was held by Bender until his retirement in 1975. His successor, Johannes Mischo held the position until 1998 and is currently the managing director of the institute.

Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene maintains a library and provides a counseling service. Over the years, the institute has published the Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie (Journal of Parapsychology and Border Areas of Psychology), in which many articles contain summaries in English. Address: Wilhemstr. 3a, D-79098 Freiburg i Br., Germany. Website: http://www.igpp.de/.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene. http://www.igpp.de/. March 27, 2000.

Institut Général Psychologique

Founded in Paris in 1904 to pursue psychical research. The presidents of the institute were, successively, Professor Duclaux (Pasteur's successor in L'Institut Pasteur); M. d'Arsonval (member of the Academy): and a Professor Borda. Following the intervention of Czar Nicholas, the French government authorized a lottery on behalf of the institute that produced 800,000 francs. The depreciation of the franc, however, wiped out most of this capital. The institute's most memorable investigation was conducted between 1905 and 1908 with Eusapia Palladino. After the capital was gone the institute ceased activities.

The moving spirit of the institute was Serge Yourievitch, secretary to the Russian Embassy in Paris, and the secretarial duties were attended to by M. J. Courtier.

Institutio "Gnosis" per la Ricérca Sulla Ipótesi della Sopravvivenza

The Institutio "Gnosis" per la Ricérca Sulla Ipótesi della Sopravvivenza (Gnosis Association for Multidisciplinary Research on the Hypothesisof Survival) was founded in July 1981 in Naples, Italy, by Giorgio Di Simone, a French parapsychologist who teaches at the University of Naples. Di Simone came of age during World War II and during his whole adult life has been intrigued by the study of possible survival of death. He has concentrated on the study of out-of-the-body experiences, deathbed visions, and mediumship as phenomena with the greatest potential of yielding data that will increase our understanding of individual human destiny.

The institute as a research organization cooperates with the Centro Italiano de Parapsicologia, an educational organization with which it shares office space. The institute publishes a triannual periodical, Quaderni Gnosis. Address: Via Belvedere, 87/80127, Naples, Italy.

Sources:

Gnosis: Association for Multidisciplinary Research on the Hypothesis of Survival. http://www.stm.it/gnosis/emoreinf.htm/.

Institut Métapsychique International

Founded by Jean Meyer at 89 Ave. Niel, Paris, in 1918, and recognized as an institute of public utility. The first director was Gustav Geley, who was assisted by a committee consisting of Charles Richet, a Professor Santoliquido, Count de Gramont of the Institut of France, Medical Inspector General Dr. Calmette, Camille Flammarion, former Minister of State Jules Roche, and a Dr. Treissier of the Hospital of Lyons. Later members were Sir Oliver Lodge, Ernesto Bozzano, and a Professor Leclainche, a member of the institute and inspector general of sanitary services. Later, Eugén Osty became director and Richet was elected president. The institute published a journal, La Revue Métapsychique.

An important phase of the work of the institute was to invite public men of eminence in science and literature to witness the investigations. Invitations to a hundred men of science were extended by Geley to the séances with "Eva C." The institute installed infrared photography equipment with which it was possible to take 1,000 fully exposed pictures per second. The apparatus cost about $2,500, but was so noisy and technically impractical it could not be put to much use.

The most important experiments after Osty took office were conducted with Rudi Schneider. The medium produced an invisible substance that—though it could not be seen—intercepted the passage of an infrared ray emitted from an apparatus outside his reach. The interception was automatically registered on a revolving cylinder.

Instituto Argentino de Parapsychología

The Instituto Argentino de Parapsychología (Argentine Parapsychological Society) was founded in 1949. Its foundation came in direct response to the government's establishment the year before of the Institute of Applied Psychopathology with the aim of studying the practices of Spiritualists and determining if they were injurious to public welfare. The Parapsychological Society had the support of the Spiritualist groups in the country and included several outstanding Spiritualists, such as José S. Fernández and J. Ricardo Musso, in its leadership.

In response to a growing membership, the society reorganized in 1952 to provide both lectures and classes in parapsychology. It also began the first Spanish-language parapsychological journal, the Review of Parapsychology. During the next 20 years the institute, which had initially garnered the support of several academics, helped spread interest in parapsychology through the nation's university system. Musso was given an appointment to teach at the Littoral National University. Then in the late 1960s the government began to reverse its support of parapsychological research and by 1970 only one course remained. The institute also had a program of public lectures and nonuniversity-based courses for the general public. Last known address: Calle Ramon Lists 868, 1706 Domingo F. Sarmiento (Haedo) Prov. Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Instituto de Estudios Parapsicológicos

The Instituto de Estudios Parapsicológicos (Institute of Parapsychological Studies) was founded in Panama in 1982, the first and only parapsychological research center in Central America. The institute launched an expansive program of research and education that included a series of public lectures over the first three years of its existence. The research program includes both controlled laboratory experiments and observations of spontaneous psychic occurrences. As part of their study, research programs of indigenous native groups have been undertaken.

The institute had defined its task as the study of the nature of the human being as revealed by psi phenomena such as telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, and psychokinesis. While it began as a membership organization, that aspect was dropped in 1985, and the institute now concentrates on research alone. It may be contacted c/o Roberto Mainieri C., Instituto de Estudios Parapsicológicos, Apartado 3335, Ancon, Panama. Website: http://healthclub.fortunecity.com/hockey/91/mainieri.html.

Instituto de Parapsicologia

Through the 1950s and 1960s parapsychology enjoyed the support of the Argentine government and spread through the nation's university system. However, by 1970 that support had been withdrawn and all of the courses in the subject had been discontinued except those taught at the University of Salvador. In response to the downturn of events, in 1972 several people at the university founded the Instituto de Parapsicologia, modeled on the Institute for Parapsychology created by J. B. Rhine in North Carolina. The institute also began a journal, Cuaderanos de Parapsicologia, modeled after the Journal of Parapsychology. The work of the institute has been largely devoted to attempts to replicate the work initiated at the Institute for Parapsychology. Address: Zabala 1930, 1712 Castelar, Prov. Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Instituto Mexicano de Investigaciones Siquicas

The Instituto Mexicano de Investigaciones Siquicas (Mexican Institute of Psychical Investigations) was founded in 1939 as the Circulo de Investigationes Metasíquicas de Mexico at the National University of Mexico. Its founding was occasioned by the fame of physical medium Louis Martinez, whose work it studied. It conducted a series of séances with Martinez, attended by a number of Mexico City's social and political leaders. The organization flourished for a few years and then was discontinued.

Insufflation

Occultist Éliphas Lévi, in his book Transcendental Magic (1896), defines insufflation as follows:

"[It]" is one of the most important practices of occult medicine, because it is a perfect sign of the transmission of life. To inspire, as a fact, means to breath upon some person or thing, and we know already, by the one doctrine of Hermes, that the virtue of things has created words, that there is an exact proportion between ideas and speech, which is the first form and verbal realisation of ideas. The breath attracts or repels, according, as it is warm or cold. The warm breathing corresponds to positive and the cold breathing to negative electricity.

"Electrical and nervous animals fear cold breathing, and the experiment may be made upon a cat, whose familiarities are importunate. By fixedly regarding a lion or tiger and blowing in their face, they would be so stupefied as to be forced to retreat before us.

"Warm and prolonged insufflation recruits the circulation of the blood, cures rheumatic and gouty pains, restores the balance of the humours, and dispels lassitude. When the operator is sympathetic and good, it acts as a universal sedative.

"Cold insufflation soothes pains occasioned by congestions and fluidic accumulations. The two breathings must therefore be used alternately, observing the polarity of the human organism and acting in a contrary manner upon the poles, which must be treated successively to an opposite magnetism. Thus, to cure an inflamed eye, the one which is not affected must be subjected to a warm and gentle insufflation, cold insufflation being practised upon the suffering member at the same distance and in the same proportion.

"Magnetic passes [moving the hands over something, e.g., an afflicted part of the body] have a similar effect to insufflations, and are a real breathing by transpiration and radiation of the interior air, which is phosphorescent with vital light. Slow passes constitute a warm breathing which fortifies and raises the spirits; swift passes are a cold breathing of dispersive nature, neutralising tendencies to congestion. The warm insufflation should be performed transversely, or from below upward, the cold insufflation is more effective when directed downward from above."(See also mesmerism)

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. Transcendental Magic. N.p., 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Integral Yoga International (IYI)

Founded in 1966 as the Integral Yoga Institute by Sri Swami Satchidananda, disciple of the late Sri Swami Sivananda of Rishikesh, India. Integral Yoga combines various yoga methods such as hatha yoga (postures, breathing practices, and relaxation techniques), karma yoga (selfless service), bhakti yoga (devotion), japa yoga (mantra repetition), jnana yoga (the path of discrimination leading to wisdom) and raja yoga (path of self-mastery through meditation), thus harmonizing the personality and enhancing spiritual awareness. Satchidananda wrote one of the standard modern texts on hatha yoga.

There are over forty IYI branches across the United States and abroad. These institutes offer instruction for beginners and advanced students, trips abroad, and various wholeness programs. Record albums, cassette tapes, and spiritual publications are available from Integral Yoga Distribution. Address: Satchidananda Ashram Yogaville, Rte. 1, Box 1720, Buckingham, VA 23921. Website: http://www.yogaville.org/.

Sources:

Barlow, Sita, et al. Sri Swami Satchidananda: Apostle of Peace. Yogaville, Va.: Integral Yoga Publications, 1986.

Satchidananda, Sri Swami. A Decade of Service. Pomfret Center, Conn.: Satchidananda Ashram-Yogaville, 1976.

———. Integral Hatha Yoga. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1970.

Weiner, Sita. Swami Satchidananda. New York: Bantam Books, 1972.

Integratron

George Van Tassel (1910–1978), one of the original flying saucer contactees of the 1950s, also organized the annual conventions of flying saucer believers at property he owned in the California desert. The presence of a large monolith at the place where the meetings were held gave his land its name, Giant Rock. Correlative to his belief in flying saucers and that he was in contact with extraterrestrials, Van Tassel also developed a belief that he could use some of the ideas of Hungarian scientist Nicola Tesla to create a rejuvenation machine. According to Van Tassel, he was given the actual design of the Integratron, which came to dot the landscape just a short walk from Giant Rock, by the space brothers. Van Tassel believed that it would become a focus of communication with them, and the completion of the Integratron became an agenda item for the Ministry of Universal Wisdom, the organization he founded to spread the teachings of Ashtar and the other space beings with whom he spoke. Research on rejuvenation and construction of the building were placed in the hands of the College of Universal Wisdom.

The Integratron is a circular building 58 feet in diameter with a domed top that gives it the appearance of a planetarium. Inside is a giant static generator, the theory behind the machine being that the creation of a large negative ion field, in which an aging individual could be enveloped, would produce the rejuvenation. This highly speculative venture was supported by scientific works on the effects of magnetic and electrostatic fields on various life forms. Van Tassel believed that once completed, the Integratron would also allow time travel and the nullification of gravity.

Van Tassel never finished the Integratron, due in no small part to lack of funds, and following his death in 1978, all work ceased. The building remained abandoned and unused for a decade. However, at the end of the 1980s it was purchased by Emile Canning and in 1991 it was renovated as a center for research into new technologies for physical and mental rejuvenation. Canning also began to hold pubic gatherings at the Integratron at which Van Tassel's ideas on rejuvenation were explored.

Sources:

Benson, Bob. Integratron. Larkspur, Calif.: Golden State Productions, 1991.

Van Tassel, George. The Council of Seven Lights. Los Angeles: DeVorss & Co., 1958. Reprinted as Religion and Science Merged. Yucca Valley, Calif.: Ministry of Universal Wisdom, 1968.

Intercosmic Association of Spiritual Awareness

Founded by Dr. Rammurti S. Mishra, endocrinologist, neurosurgeon, and psychiatrist, who has also published authoritative works on hatha yoga and yoga philosophy. ICSA is responsible for Mishra's lectures and study groups throughout the world, operating through the Ananda Ashram, Rte. 3, P.O. Box 141, Monroe, NY 10950.

Sources:

Mishra, Rammurti S. Fundamentals of Yoga. New York: Lancer Books, 1969.

———. Self Analysis and Self Knowledge. Lakemont, Ga.: CSA Press, 1978.

International Academy for Continuous Education

Founded in 1971 by mathematician-philosopher J. G. Bennett to propagate the Fourth Way work of Georgei Ivanovitch Gurdjieff. It aimed "to achieve, in a short space of time, the effective transmission of a whole corpus of practical techniques for self-development and self-liberation, so that people could learn effectively to direct their own inner work and to adapt to the rapid changes in the inner and outer life of man." The organization was based in Sherborne House, a Victorian mansion in the Cotswold countryside of Britain. Students studied psychology, art, history, cosmology, and linguistics and practiced spiritual and psychological exercises that were demanding at all levels—mental, physical, and emotional.

After Bennett's death in 1974 the academy expected considerable changes, largely necessitated by the evolution brought about by the inner and outer work of the students. In fact the organization soon ceased to exist, though work in the Bennett tradition continues in the United States through the Claymont Society for Continuous Education.

International Association for Near-Death Studies (IANDS)

Founded in 1981 with a membership of medical, academic, and health care professionals, as well as laypersons and those who had undergone near-death experiences (phenomena occurring in individuals who are very close to death or who pass into a temporary state of clinical death). The first president of the association was Kenneth Ring, a modern pioneer in the study of the subject.

The goals of the association are to encourage, promote, and support the scientific study of near-death experiences; to inspire the exchange and communication of ideas among persons who have conducted or are conducting research on such experiences; to collect information for educational material to be dispersed in the public and popular media; and to relate knowledge emerging from research to appropriate settings, including hospitals and nursing homes.

The association serves as a fraternal organization for those who have had near-death experiences. It maintains a collection of tapes describing these experiences and holds seminars, workshops, and symposia. It also publishes a quarterly newsletter, Vital Signs, and the Journal of Near-Death Studies. Address: P.O. Box 502, East Windsor Hill, CT 06028-0502. Website: http://www.iands.org/. (See also Death; Shanti Nilaya; Thanatology)

Sources:

Ring, Kenneth. Heading Toward Omega: In Search of the Meaning of the Near-Death Experience. New York: William Morrow, 1984.

International Association for Psychotronic Research

Publishers of reports, bulletins, newsletters, and a journal concerned with psychotronics—defined as the mutual interactions of consciousness, energy, and matter. The association brought together individuals conducting experimental research and applied studies in interactions between living organisms and their internal and external environments and the energetic processes underlying their manifestations.

Originally based in Ontario, Canada, the association moved to Czechoslovakia in the 1980s. Last known address: c/o Association Internationale de Recherche Psychotronique, V Chaloupkach 59, HLoubetin, CS–194 01 Prague 9, Czech Republic.

International Association for Psychotropic Research (IAPR)

Eastern European organization that conducts experimental and applied research in the interdisciplinary study of distant interactions between living organisms (i.e., telepathy). IAPR also offers conventions and conferences and publishes two quarterly (non-English language) journals. Address: V Chaloupkach 59, Hloubetin, CS-194 01 Prague 9, Czech Republic.

International Association for Religion and Parapsychology (IARP)

A psychical research organization founded in Toyko in 1972 by parapsychologist and engineer Hiroshi Motoyama. As early as 1966 Motoyama has traveled to the Philippines to study psychic surgery, and he began to develop a model of the unification of spirit and science and to prove the non-physical basis of mind. The association was founded to verify the reality of paranormal phenomena and to provide a program for individuals to clarify truths of mind, matter, and religious experience.

Above and beyond its research, the association holds yoga classes, retreats and other programs, and maintains an acupuncuture clinic. Demonstrating the truth and basis of acupuncutre had taken a significant portion of Motoyama's research time. The association publishes a journal and a newsletter in English. It may be contacted at 4-11-7 Inogashira, Mitaka-shi, Tokyo 181-0001, Japan.

Sources:

Motoyama, Hiroshi, and Rande Brown. Science and the Evolution of Consciousness: Chakras, Ki, and Psi. Brookline, Mass.: Autumn Press, 1978.

International Association of Metaphysicians (IAM)

Organization formed in 1985 to serve as a central registry of metaphysicians and establish a code of ethics. The term metaphysician refers to healers and other workers in various psychic areas. The association proposed a summer camp program for children with psychic abilities. Benjamin Smith, president of IAM, has a special interest in healing and past-life regression and believes that some of the world's most valuable resources are lying untapped in children. Address: 2929 SE Mile High Dr., #A-6, Port Orchard, WA 98366-6021. Website: http://iammall.com/mall/.

Sources:

IAM-Metaphysical Mall. http://iammall.com/mall/. March 8, 2000.

International Association of Parapsychologists

New Age association founded in 1965 to bring together individuals in all phases of parapsychology, organic gardening, sciences, and arts and "to build a new age town incorporating new age thought with no masters, gurus, or teachers such as leaders, and no particular teachings."

The association believed that each individual is an "instrument of light" or "temple" and not part of a commune or family. It bestowed awards, conducted charitable and specialized educational programs, and offers children's services. It maintained a library of approximately 1,000 volumes on parapsychology, science, herbs, UFOs, and related subjects and published Luminator News. Last known address: P.O. Box 1450, Apache Junction, AZ 85220.

The International Astrologer

Quarterly publication of the International Society for Astrological Research. It includes a cumulative digest of astrological activities and research. Address: P.O. Box 38613, Los Angeles, CA 90038. Website: http://www.isarastrology.com/.

Sources:

International Society for Astrological Research. http://www.isarastrology.com/. March 8, 2000.

International Congress of Psychical Research

Occasional gathering of psychical researchers from all over the world. The first congress was held in Copenhagen in 1921, the second in 1923 in Warsaw, the third in 1927 in Paris, and the fourth in 1930 in Athens. World War II interrupted such international congresses, but in 1953 the first of a new series of international conferences on parapsychological studies was held at Utrecht University, Holland, sponsored by the Parapsychology Foundation.

International Cooperation Council

A New Age organization formed as an international coordinating body for educational, scientific, cultural, and religious organizations that "foster the emergence of a new universal person and a civilization based on unity in diversity among all peoples." Originally formed to propagate the ideals and activities of several such organizations during the International Cooperation Year, it was voted into being in 1965 by the General Assembly of the United Nations. It has since been reformed under the title Unity-in-Diversity Council, with the aim of linking metaphysical and New Age groups worldwide.

International Flat Earth Society

Successor to the Universal Zetetic Society of America and Great Britain, dedicated to the view that "so called modern astronomy is false; that no proof has been brought forth to show the earth as a spinning ball." The term zetetic refers to an ancient Greek school of skeptical inquiry and has also been used in the title of several periodicals that examine claims for paranormal phenomena. Address: Box 2533, Lancaster, CA 93539.

International Fortean Organization (INFO)

An organization founded in 1965 by Ronald J. Willis, with a membership of scientists, scholars, and laymen concerned with new and unusual scientific discoveries, philosophical problems pertaining to the criteria of scientific validity, and theories of knowledge. The organization is named after Charles Hoy Fort (1874–1932), who researched and cataloged unusual and unexplained phenomena. INFO maintains a library of approximately 5,000 volumes in the physical, biological, and psychological sciences, and publishes a triannual journal INFO. Address: P.O. Box 367, Dept. W, Arlington, VA 22210-0367. Website: http://research.umbc.edu/~frizzell/info. (See also Fortean Society; Fortean Times)

Sources:

International Fortean Organization. http://research.umbc.edu/~frizzell/info. March 8, 2000.

International Frankenstein Society (IFS)

Founded in 1980 by Dr. Jeanne K. Youngson as a division of the Count Dracula Fan Club to bring together enthusiasts of Frankenstein, the main character in, and title of, the novel by Mary Shelley (1797–1851).

The society existed separately during the 1980s but has since become a section of the Count Dracula Fan Club. IFS promotes exchange of information; sponsors "ethical, social, moral and educational activities mixed with good fun"; and offers a book search service for members. An IFS section appears in the Count Dracula Fan Club Newsletter. The society publishes the Frankenstein Gold Book of membership registration. Last known address: c/o Dr. Jeanne K. Youngson, 29 Washington Square W., Penthouse N, New York, NY 10011.

International General Assembly of Spiritualists See Light of Divine Truth Foundation

International Ghost Registry

Formed in California to preserve and investigate records of hauntings and ghostly phenomena throughout the world. The major objectives included preserving firsthand records of ghost sightings that might otherwise have been lost, cataloging and recording ghost lore from individual geographic regions, encouraging careful evaluation and documentation of ghostly phenomena, and providing a central file for use by researchers and writers in parapsychology. The registry was administered by the International Society for the Investigation of Ghosts. It was active in the 1980s but has since become inactive.

International Group of Theosophists

The International Group of Theosophists was a small group of Theosophists active during the mid-twentieth century. They tried to remain aloof from the very intense quarrels that divided the movement in the 1890s. Heading the group was Boris Mihailovich de Zirkoff (1902–1981), the grandnephew of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, one of the founders of the original Theosophical Society. De Zirkoff spent much of his life editing and publishing Blavatsky's collected works. The group dissolved soon after de Zirkoff's death.

Sources:

The Theosophical Movement, 1875–1950. Los Angeles: Cunningham Press, 1951.

International Institute for Psychical Research See International Institute for Psychic Investigation

International Institute for Psychic Investigation

British organization formed in January 1939 by the merger of the British College of Psychic Science and the International Institute for Psychical Research (IIPI). The institute was founded in 1934 by Mrs. Dawson Scott, pupil and associate of pioneer psychical researcher J. Hewat McKenzie; J. Arthur Findlay; and Shaw Desmond. The institute had as its aim investigation of psychic phenomena by the objective methods of laboratory research. Fraser Harris was appointed as the original research officer. He was succeeded by Nandor Fodor, who held the post until the summer of 1938. The IIPR premises at Harrington Rd., London, SW, were later moved to Walton House, Walton St., London, SW3.

The institute emphasized the need for experimental work and secured photographic and recording apparatuses to investigate and record voice and physical phenomena. The council consisted of both Spiritualists and non-Spiritualists, ensuring a balanced approach to the investigation of paranormal phenomena.

The institute published papers on their experiments, including the following: Bulletin I: Historic Poltergeists, by Hereward Carrington; The Saragossa Ghost, by Nandor Fodor; Bulletin II: The Lajos Pap Experiments, by Nandor Fodor; and Bulletin III: Enquiry into the Cloud-Chamber Method of Studying the "Intra-Atomic Quantity," by G. J. Hopper.

During January 1939 the institute was amalgamated with the British College of Psychic Science (BCPS) under the name International Institute for Psychic Investigation (IIPR). The BCPS transferred many of its workers and its excellent reference library to the IIPR at the Walton House. Publication of the college's valuable journal, Psychic Science, continued under the auspices of the institute. With the outbreak of war the organization had a difficult time, however, and collapsed in 1947. The library and records were dispersed or destroyed by bombing.

Its place was to a large extent filled by the College of Psychic Science, in London, formed in 1955 from the long-established London Spiritualist Alliance, originally founded in 1884. The College of Psychic Science had similar objectives to the BCPS and IIPR and at one time or another leading Spiritualists or psychical researchers connected with the earlier organizations also took part in its activities. The college also maintains a reference library at its premises in 16 Queensberry Pl., South Kensington, London, SW7., and arranges for consultations with mediums, currently carried out under the new name College of Psychic Studies.

Sources:

Edmunds, Simeon. Spiritualism: A Critical Survey. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

International Institute for the Study of Death

Organization providing an international forum for exploration of the central questions raised by the death experience. The institute maintained a research division and multilingual periodicals as well as organized conferences and seminars. Last known address: P.O. Box 8565, Pembroke Pines, FL 33084. (See also Death; Near-Death Experiences)

International Institute of Projectiology and Conscientiology

The International Institute of Projectiology and Conscientiology was founded in 1988 in Brazil as the Institute of Projectiology by Waldo Vieira, a dentist and physician who had become interested in paranormal research. Over the years he developed techniques through which he claimed he could teach people to leave their body at will. Projectiology was the name he gave to the study of out-of-the-body experiences and the application of the methods he had developed. His initial findings became the basis of his calling a group of colleagues together to found the institute and his establishing a number of schools to teach his techniques across Brazil. In 1990 Vieira hosted the first International Conference on Projectiology.

Further research, including investigation of Brazilian practitioners of psychic surgery, and mature consideration of the accumulated data, led him to propose that consciousness was the source of out-of-the-body phenomena, and in 1994 he proposed conscientiology as the name of the field of consciousness studies. Subsequently, the name of the institute was expanded to incorporate this new emphasis. Vieira has written a dozen books detailing his research and expounding upon his approach to consciousness research and paranormal studies including Projectiology: Overview of Experience Outside the Human Body and 700 Conscientiology Experiments.

Through the 1990s, almost 100,000 people took courses from the institute's facilities, and a new research facility, the Center for Higher Studies of Consciousness, is being built at Iguassu Falls, Brazil, to help extend its knowledge base and program. The center is building a large library of material from around the world on the issues of primary interest to the institute.

The international headquarters of the institute is located at Rua Visconde de Pirajá 572-6 andar, Rio de Janeiro, RJ 22410-002, Brazil. National offices are also operating in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, Spain, Portugal, and Argentina. The institute supports an extensive Internet site at http://www.iipc.org/.

Sources:

International Institute of Projectiology and Conscientiology. http://www.iipc.org/. May 20,2000.

Vieira, Waldo. Projections of Consciousness: A Diary of Out-of-Body Experiences. Rio de Janeiro, Brazil: International Institute of Projectiology and Conscientiology, 1997.

International Journal of Parapsychology

Former scholarly journal that appeared quarterly from the summer of 1959 through the winter of 1968, published by the Parapsychology Foundation "as a forum for scholarly inquiry, linking parapsychology with psychology, physics, biochemistry, pharmacology, anthropology, ethnology and other scientific disciplines." Summaries of main articles were given in French, German, Italian, and Spanish.

The purpose of the International Journal of Parapsychology has now been assumed by the bimonthly Parapsychology Review, published by the Parapsychology Foundation. Back issues of the Journal are available from University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, MI 48106.

International Kirlian Research Association

Founded in 1975 with a membership of physicists, electrical engineers, psychologists, parapsychologists, physicians, graduate science students, interested individuals with advanced degrees, and those engaged in scientific research. The association hoped to advance research on Kirlian photography (electrography) through multidisciplinary research or electromagnetic interactions in biological and medical functions.

Kirlian photography is named for its inventor, Semyon Kirlian, a Russian electrical engineer who developed a technique of photographing objects without the use of cameras through a high-voltage, high-frequency, low-amperage electrical discharge, thus showing an aura around objects. The Kirlian aura was frequently identified as the aura reportedly seen around individuals by psychics and that was seen by Walter J. Kilner through various optical effects.

The work of the association was blunted in the early 1980s by a negative laboratory opinion on the more interesting Kirlian effects that suggested they were caused by flawed experimental controls. The association maintains a speakers bureau and publishes Communications and Acta Electragrafica quarterly. Address: 2202 Quentin Rd., Brooklyn, NY 11229.

International Organization of Awareness

The International Organization of Awareness was one of several groups that emerged in the late 1960s following the death of William Ralph Duby, the leader of the Organization of Awareness (now known as Cosmic Awareness Communications). The International Organization of Awareness, which was headquartered in Honolulu under the leadership of Edward Young, lasted only a few years.

International Parascience Institute

Founded in 1971 in Devon, England, at the Institute of Parascience to investigate scientific aspects of parapsychology. The first president was Alan J. Mayne. Beginning with a mimeographed publication Parascience, the institute held symposia on experimental psi research and published Parascience Proceedings and Parascience Newsletter (1975). Subjects covered include psychical research and the theory of resonance, the macromechanics of psychokinesis, approaches to psi and methods of psi research, precognition, and mediumship. The institute is located at Cryndir, Nantmel, Llandrindod Wells, Powys LD1 6EH, England.

International Plant Consciousness Research Newsletter

Monthly publication that reported on meetings and seminars concerned with matters relating to plant consciousness. The directors included pioneer researcher Cleve Baxter and Mrs. Charles Musés. It was headquartered in Long Beach, California, but is no longer active. (See also Plants, Psychic Aspects of)

International Psychic Gazette

Monthly magazine founded in 1912 as the official organ of the International Club for Psychical Research. It ceased publication after only a few months.

International Psychic Register

A directory of practitioners of the psychic arts in North America and Great Britain that appeared during the 1970s from Ornion Press in Erie, Pennsylvania. It included classified lists of healers, psychics, teachers, and parapsychologists, with addresses and telephone numbers.

International Self-Realization Healing Association (ISRHA)

The International Self-Realization Healing Association (ISRHA) began in the 1990s as a professional association for healers trained by Mata Yogananda, formerly a disciple of Swami Paramahansa Yogananda, and her husband Peter Sevananda. Mata Yogananda is the founder of the Self-Realization Meditation Healing Centre that in 1988 moved to its present site in Somerset, England. Through the 1980s and 1990s they trained a number of healers who subsequently emerged as full-time spiritual healers who remain in relationship with Mata Yogananda. Several also founded Self-Realization Healing Centres.

Within the association, spiritual healing is seen to begin with the subtle energies released in the healing process that reach beneath the surface to free the patient from his/her problems. Spiritual healing is coupled with a process of "Progressive Counseling" that focuses on present problems and provides simple exercises to meet them. It is believed that healing and understanding have to be generated within the patient rather than imposed from outside. The healing energies reconnect the individual with what is seen as the universal source of spiritual awareness. During the healing process, patients learn to operate with the healing energies within themselves.

Members of the association have been trained to keep a spiritual attunement that allows them to serve as healers and counselors. In England, the work of spiritual healers has gained some legal status and patients in hospitals are free to call them to their bedside. There is less recognition in other countries. Through the 1990s, a number of healers established centers across the United Kingdom and others from several countries of the British Commonwealth also trained with Mata Yogananda and Peter Sevananda. After the ISRHA was founded, affiliated members appeared in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand.

The ISRHA is headquartered at 1 Hamlyn Rd., Glastonbury, Somerset BA6 8HS, United Kingdom. It publishes a biannual periodical, Change, first issued in 1997. The Self-Realization Meditation Healing Centre headed by Mata Yogananda is located at Laural Lane, Queen Camel, Yeovil, Somerset BA22 7NU, United Kingdom. It publishes an annual periodical, Dharma, through its publishing arm, Daoseva Press. Associated centers are found in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada. It has an Internet presence at http://www.selfrealizationcentres.org/.

Sources:

Change. Somerset, UK, n.d.

Dharma. Somerset, UK, n.d.

Self-Realization Meditation Healing Centres. http://www.selfrealizationcentres.org/. April 30, 2000.

International Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers

Founded in 1959 by Swami Vishnu-devananda, disciple of the late Swami Sivananda of Rishikesh, India, who sent Vishnu-devananda to the West in 1957. Vishnu-devananda became a world famous exponent of the science of hatha yoga and traveled throughout Western countries demonstrating and lecturing on the relationship of yoga to ethical life and peace. He is the author of one of the more popular textbooks on hatha yoga published during the last generation.

Swami Sivananda developed a system of "integral yoga," a combination of the main traditional forms of yoga—karma, jnana, bhakti, and raja. His system derives from the teachings of the Hindu sage Patanjali and involves the practitioner in the eight steps to self-realization: yama and niyama (moral restraints and ethical observance), yoga asanas (physical exercises), pranayama (breathing exercises), pratyahara (control of senses), dharana (concentration), dhyana (meditation), culminating in samadhi (superconsciousness). In traditional Hinduism yoga is not simply a matter of practicing physical exercises, but is an all-around ethical and spiritual development.

Vishnu-devananda settled in Quebec and established headquarters in Val Morin. He eventually developed centers across the continent and retreat centers in the Laurentian Mountains and in the Bahamas, making close to 80 Sivananda locations. Address: 673 8th Ave., Val Morin, Quebec, Canada J0T 2R0. Website: http://www.sivananda.org/.

Sources:

Sivanada Yoga "Om" Page. http://www.sivananda.org/. March 27, 2000.

The Sivananda Yoga Center. The Sivananda Companion to Yoga. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1983.

Vishnudevananda, Swami. The Complete Illustrated Book of Yoga. New York: Julian Press, 1960.

———. Meditation and Mantras. New York: OM Lotus Publishing, 1978.

International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON)

Hindu bhakti yoga religious group. The International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) was founded in 1966 by A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977), who migrated to the United States at the age of 70, soon after the passing of new immigration laws allowing the migration of Asians into America. During his adult life as a businessman, Prabhupada was initiated into Krishna Consciousness as a member of the Guadiya Matha Mission in Calcutta. Krishna Consciousness is a popular term given the revival movement founded by Chaitanya Mahaprabhu (1486–1534?), who taught intense devotion to the deity Krishna. Devotional activity was centered upon public dancing and chanting and temple worship before the statues of Krishna. Most characteristic of the movement was the repetition of the Hare Krishna mantra:

Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna
Hare Hare, Krishna Krishna
Hare Rama, Hare Rama
Hare Hare, Rama Rama.

In traditional Hindu teachings, Krishna and Rama are avataras, or incarnations of the god Vishnu, and those who worship Vishnu as their primary deity are called Vaishnavas (one of the three large religious groups in India). Bhakti yoga is the name given to the practice of following a path to God primarily through devotional activity.

Prabhupada was told by his guru, Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati Goswami, to prepare himself to take Krishna devotion to the West. Krishna Consciousness had actually been introduced into the United States soon after the beginning of the twentieth century by another teacher from Bengal, Baba Bharati, but his organization died out soon after he returned to India. Soon after his arrival, Prabhupada began anew the task of introducing Krishna Consciousness to Westerners. He settled in New York City and soon established a following among young people, many of whom had flocked to New York as part of the social upheaval of the sixties. He had already published translations of the first three volumes of the Bhagavad Purana, and soon after he developed a following he published other important books of the tradition, the Bhagavad-gita As-It-Is and the Caitanya-caritamrita.

The groups became well known in the early 1970s. Members adopted Indian garb and attracted attention on the street, dancing, chanting, and distributing literature. As the anticult movement developed in the mid-1970s, they became a major target of deprogrammings.

In the early 1970s Prabhupada appointed a governing body commission (GBC) to manage his growing international society and to oversee ISKCON after his death. The GBC was made up of the initiating gurus who had been installed in the various areas to which the movement had spread, as well as other prominent leaders. Through the 1980s it had to deal with attacks on the movement from outside as well as internal disputes over successorship. Several top leaders of the society, who were serving as gurus after Prabhupada's death, gave up their vows which caused significant turmoil within ISKCON as well as public embarrassment. The guru of a large Krishna community in West Virginia, Kirtananda Swami, was excommunicated from ISKCON for ethical and religious violations in 1986, and was later jailed for federal crimes.

In the early 1990s the community had a multimillion dollar judgment (awarded at the height of the anticult struggles) overturned and then settled out of court. The judgment in the Robin George case had threatened to close several temples in the US and Canada. In the meantime, the movement spread internationally and now has centers in more than eighty countries. In the United States it has three thousand core members, full-time Krishna devotees, but is also supported by many thousands of congregational members, approximately half of whom are within the Indian American community.

Nominal headquarters from what has become a decentralized movement is at the ISKCON International Communications Office, 10310 Oaklyn Dr., Potomac, Maryland, 20854. Its primary magazine, Back to Godhead, can be reached at P.O. Box 430, Alachua, Florida, 32616. Website: http://www.iskcon.com.

Sources:

Gelberg, Steven, ed. Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna. New York: Grove Press, 1983.

Knott, Kim. My Sweet Lord. Wellingsborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1986.

Prabhupada, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami. Bhagavad-Gita As It Is. New York: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1972.

International Society for the Investigation of Ghosts

An organization that through the 1970s and 1980s maintained an International Ghost Registry to preserve and investigate records of hauntings and related phenomena throughout the world. The society published a bimonthly newsletter FOG, which included ghost accounts sent by members, articles, and book reviews.

International Society for the Study of Subtle Energies and Energy Medicine (ISSSEEM)

ISSSEEM was organized informally in 1989 by a clinical psychologist, a biomedical engineer, an anthropologist, and a psychophysiologic researcher. It is concerned with the study of information systems and energies that interact with the human psyche and physiology, either enhancing or perturbing homeostasis. The society publishes a quarterly magazine and journal Subtle Energies and Energy Medicine: An Interdisciplinary Journal of Informational and Energetic Interactions. Address: 11005 Ralston Rd., Ste. 1002, Aruada, CO 80004. Website: http://www.issseem.org/.

International Society of Cryptozoology (ISC)

Organization concerned with the study and discussion of anomalous animal phenomena (i.e., creatures bordering between fact and myth). The ISC publishes a quarterly newsletter, The ISC Newsletter and an official journal, Cryptozoology. Address: Box 43070, Tucson, AZ 85733. Website: http://www.izoo.org/isc.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

International Society of Life Information Science

International Society of Life Information Science is a parapsychological association established in Japan in the 1980s. It grew out of earlier gatherings that were being held at both the National Institute of Radiation of Japan and Tokyo Denki University. Those conducting the meetings decided to combine their efforts into a single organization. The founders' interest had originated in the spread of information on the body-mind (including consciousness and spirit) interaction and the dissatisfaction of some scientists in the limitations of science's exploration being confined to the physical world. Founders of the society were attracted to new scientific data suggesting that phenomena in the realm of consciousness or mind existed that was as yet unexplained by conventional science.

The society set itself the tasks of gathering the information currently available on the world of paranormal phenomena, and conducting research on as yet undocumented phenomena using a positive scientific methodology. It chose as topics of special concerns such issues as qigong, oriental medicine, brain physiology, emissions from human bodies, and psychophysical phenomena. Theoretical considerations are focused upon the underlying principles determining such phenomena and uncovering information that is useful in science and technology.

The society publishes a biannual periodical, the Journal of International Society of Life Information Science. It holds regular lectures, a biannual symposium, and every few years an international symposium. It also nurtures research being conducted by its various members.

The society is headquartered at the Bio-Emission Laboratory, Division of Radiation Research, National Institute of Radiological Sciences, 9-1, Anagawa-4, Inage-ku, Chiba-shi 263-8555, Japan. It has associated offices in China and the United States. It supports an Internet page at http://www.soc.nacsis.ac.jp/islis/.

Sources:

International Society of Life Information Science. http://www.soc.nacsis.ac.jp/islis/. May 20, 2000.

International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship

An organization founded in 1956 by a group of Christian clergy and laypersons to explore an interest in paranormal phenomena—especially the evidence for life after death—and to explore the life of prayer, meditation, mysticism, and spiritual healing. Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship (SFF) had its origin in a network of Christian leaders who had been influenced by the work of Spiritualist medium Arthur A. Ford, with whom many had private sittings. They had come to share Ford's opinion that much of the spiritual dryness so evident in many mainstream Christian churches could be attributed to a lack of direct experience of the spiritual world. In 1953 British church leaders had founded the Churches Fellowship for Spiritual and Psychical Studies, and SFF modeled itself on the British organization.

SFF issued a statement of "principles, purposes, and programs" that called for emphases on mystical prayer, spiritual healing, and the search for evidence of personal survival of death. While trying to revive the spiritual life of the churches, the group has been open to parapsychological perspectives and has supported a research committee. In 1972 it sponsored the development of an affiliated academic organization, the Academy of Religion and Psychical Research, which grew out of a recommendation of the organization's field director, J. Gordon Melton.

Through the years the organization has undergone several changes. In the early 1970s the original interest in mediumship and survival gave way to a primary interest in meditation and spiritual healing. During this time SFF experienced a period of rapid growth. The organization experienced a major overturn in leadership in 1974–75 and a period of organizational chaos. When it stabilized in the early 1980s, it was considerably weakened. It has also taken a new direction, identifying largely with the emerging New Age movement. The organization has largely cut its ties with conventional Christian churches.

In 1987 the headquarters of SFF were moved to 33210 Baring St., Philadelphia, PA 19104. It has recently added "International" to its name. It publishes a monthly newsletter and the Spiritual Frontiers journal.

Sources:

Higgins, Paul Lambourne, ed. Frontiers of the Spirit. Minneapolis: T. S. Denison, 1976.

Rauscher, William V. The Spiritual Frontier. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship. Christianity and the Paranormal. Independence, Mo. The Author, 1986.

Wagner, Melinda Boiler. Metaphysics in Midwestern America. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1983.

International Spiritualist Alliance

The International Spiritualist Alliance is a Canadian-based international Spiritualist church founded for the purpose of bringing brotherhood and unity to Spiritualists worldwide. It has succeeded in bringing congregations in Canada, the United States, and Great Britain together. The alliance operates out of a loose fellowship association. Members accept seven affirmations concerning the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the immortality of the soul, communion with the departed, personal responsibility, compensation for good and evil, and the eternal progress of the soul. These affirmations are set within a general Christian theology that accepts God as the loving creator and Jesus as the Lord incarnated for the salvation of humanity. Perfected in suffering, Jesus became Lord and Christ. The church is headed by the Rev. Beatrice Gaulton Bishop of Vancouver, British Columbia. Current address unavailable.

International Spiritualist Congress

The name of five international gatherings of Spiritualist leaders held in the years between the two world wars. The first was held at Liège (1923), the second at Paris (1925), the third in London (1928), the fourth at The Hague (1931), and the fifth in Barcelona (1934).

The Paris congress prepared and promulgated a statement of the philosophy and fundamental principles of Spiritualism. Delegates agreed that Spiritualism stood for (1) the existence of God as the intelligent and supreme cause of all things; (2) the affirmation that man is a spirit related to a perishable body by an intermediate body (the etheral or "perispirit") that is indestructible in nature; (3) the immortality of the spirit and its continuous evolution toward perfection through progressive stages of life; and (4) universal and personal responsibility, both individual and collective, between all beings. Later congresses reaffirmed these principles. The congresses were a programmatic expression of the International Spiritualists Federation.

International Spiritualists Federation (Fédération Spirites Internationale)

A Spiritualist organization founded in 1923 with headquarters at Maison des Spirites, 8 Rue Copernic, Paris. Its original presidents were Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Ernest W. Oaten (editor of the journal Two Worlds). Affiliated associations were formed in Europe (England, France, Germany, Spain, Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland), the Americas (United States, Cuba, Costa Rica, and Mexico), and South Africa. The first International Spiritualist Congress was held at Liège, Belgium, in 1923, followed by four others in 1925, 1928, 1931, and 1934. The organization was destroyed during World War II.

International UFO Reporter (Magazine)

International UFO Reporter (IUR) is the quarterly journal of the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies (CUFOS). It was launched in the mid-1980s as a newsletter for supporters of the center which had been organized by J. Allen Hynek (1910–1986) to focus scientific research on UFOs following the devastating blow to the field delivered by the Condon Report. Hynek, an astronomer at Northwestern University and former consultant to the U. S. Air Force on UFOs, had concluded that the Condon Report had been far from the final word on UFOs and that further attention by scientists was needed. As one of the few pro-UFO, he became a key person in the reestablishment of UFO studies.

After several years during which the format and appearance of IUR changed on several occasions under the editiorship of Jerome Clark; in the 1980s a format was finally settled upon. Each issue contains two to three lengthy articles reporting on current research or discussing current issues, the 1990s being dominated by discussions of UFO abductions. In discussing individual UFO cases, IUR has shied away from simple reports of UFO sightings to emphasize research of more formal investigations of prominent incidents. Address: 2457 W. Peterson, Ave., Chicago, IL 60659.

Sources:

International UFO Reporter. Chicago, n.d.

International Yoga Guide

Monthly magazine of the International Yoga Society. It includes extracts from Hindu scripture, yoga exercises, and news of society activities. Address: 6111 SW 74th Ave. Miami, FL 33143.

Interplanetary Space Travel Research Association (ISTRA)

Nonprofit society founded in 1957 to promote public interest in space activities (including UFOs and extraterrestrials) and science fiction. Membership is free. The first issue of Space Digest (1977) is available from ISTRA. Contact: Robert Morison, Editor, 30 Grosvenor Rd., London, E. 11, England.

Interspace Link Confidential Newsletter

Monthly newsletter of National Investigations Committee on UFOs. Address: 14617 Victory Blvd., #4, Van Nuys, CA 91411.

Intuition

Human faculty by which individuals are aware of facts not accessible to normal sensory or mental processes. Some apparent intuition may be attributed to unconscious sensory or mental perception or deduction. Other intuitive awareness suggests paranormal faculty. (See also Extrasensory Perception)

Intuitional World

Theosophical term for the Buddhic plane or the fourth world, from which come intuitions. (See also Intuition; Solar System; Theosophy)

Intuition Network

Founded in 1986 by Weston H. Agor to bring small groups of people together to share their personal experiences and knowledge of intuition as a resource to aid them in daily life. In 1993 Dr. Jeffrey Mishlove was appointed director of the network, which now works on a larger scale, utilizing the mediums of modern communication, via the Internet and fax machines. Also in 1993, the network announced its merger with the Institute of Noetic Science. Membership numbers over 7,500 worldwide. Address: 369-B Third St., #161, San Rafael, CA 94901. Website: http://www.intuition.org/.

Sources:

Intuition Network. http://www.intuition.org/. March 24, 2000.

Invisibility

The belief in invisibility is an ancient one in religion, folklore, and superstition. The soul or vital principle in human beings could not be established visibly, and after death was presumed to inhabit an invisible realm, also peopled by angelic and demonic entities not visible to normal human sight. Even in modern times, the concept of the astral plane and of heaven and hell in some invisible dimension of space rather than a distant position in the cosmos still persists, and has relevance to the belief in apparitions or ghosts of the dead that may become visible and then vanish under certain circumstances. In Spiritualism, such appearances and disappearances of phantom forms are claimed in the phenomena of materialization and dematerialization.

Although the concept of an invisible world that may sometimes be made visible is at variance with the known scientific machinery of vision and the function of the eyes, there remains the philosophical problem that the actual nature of empirical reality cannot be established scientifically through human senses, although there is consistency in the common experience of vision, touch, and other sensory impressions that are validated by sensations in the brain. The idealist school of philosophy stemming from Bishop Berkeley, Immanuel Kant, and others holds that there are no physical objects existing apart from thought and experience, and the theist claims that the consistency of mental experience derives from divine law.

Much of the great body of superstition, folklore, and sorcery relating to visibility and invisibility derives from the earliest experiences of humankind and the prescientific observation of natural phenomena incorporated in religious and magical beliefs. Many of these beliefs appear untenable to scientifically trained minds.

Invisibility in Folklore

A constant motif in folktales throughout the world is the power of becoming invisible, giving the possessor of this power special advantages in overhearing an enemy's plans, winning battles with powerful adversaries, or merely stealing valuable objects unperceived. Usually invisibility was conferred by an object or garment, such as a magic ring, stone, cap, shoes, or cloak. Such magic possessions were sometimes associated with other powers—the shoes that carry the wearer great distances in a brief moment, the ring that could be rubbed to summon up a genie, the cap that conferred wisdom, or vision of distant or future events.

In Greek legend, the hero Perseus, who slew the Gorgon, had magic shoes that carried him through the air, in addition to a cap of invisibility. In the ancient Sanskrit story book Kathasaritsagara (Ocean of Story) of Somadeva, the Brahmin Gunarsarman becomes invisible by putting a magic ointment on his eyes, and is thus able to penetrate the camp of King Vikramaskti.

The cloak of invisibility is known in folktales throughout Europe, and even in the Apache Indian legends of America, where Child-of-the-Water gets a cloak from Lizard, enabling him to get near to the monster Buffalo without being seen. In Arthurian legend, the king himself had a cloak of invisibility.

The Motif-Index of Folk-Literature (1932–36) compiled by Stith Thompson lists 28 magic objects that confer invisibility, including a stone, flower, serpent's crown, heart of an unborn child, belt, cloak, saint's cowl, ring, helmet, sword, and wand. For example, it was long believed that fern seed conferred invisibility, but the seed itself was supposed to be invisible, so anyone who could find this seed and carry it would also become invisible. The fern was said to bloom at midnight on Midsummer Eve, and to seed soon after. The seeker of the seed had to avoid touching it, or letting it fall on the ground. A white cloth had to be placed under the plant for the invisible seed to fall on. It could then be wrapped up and carried around, rendering the owner invisible. Shakespeare, Ben Johnson, Beaumont, and Fletcher all have references in their plays to fern seed conferring invisibility, and this belief continued in folklore centuries later.

Another persistent folk belief was the power of the "Hand of Glory." This was the dried or pickled hand of a dead criminal hanged on the gallows. Robbers were supposed to be invisible if they carried this gruesome hand with a candle made from the fat of a hanged man. Sometimes the fingers of the hand were used as candles, and a finger lit for each occupant of the house to be robbed, ensuring that they would remain motionless.

The Rev. Richard Barham, in his Ingoldsby Legends (1840 etc.) versified this belief in "The Nurse's Story, The Hand of Glory."

On January 3, 1831, a gang of thieves attempted to rob the house of a Mr. Napier in Loughcrew, County Meath, Ireland. They broke into the house carrying a Hand of Glory and a candle, believing that it would prevent the occupants from waking. However, the Hand of Glory failed to keep the inmates asleep, and the robbers fled, leaving their talisman behind.

Invisibility in Sorcery and Witchcraft

A Manuscript (No. 2350) titled "Le Secret des Secrets" in the Bibliotheque de l'Arsenal in France, contains a chapter devoted to the secret of invisibility. It consists of a spell in Latin, which opens with over thirty mystical names, preferably to be written in bat's blood, and continues in a mixture of Christian and pagan tradition with an invocation translated as:

"O thou, Pontation! master of invisibility, with thy masters [here follow names of the masters], I conjure thee, Pontation, and these same masters of invisibility, by Him Who makes the universe tremble, by Heaven and Earth, Cherubim and Seraphim, and by Him Who made the Virgin conceive and Who is God and Man, that I may accomplish this experiment in perfectibility, in such sort that at any hour I desire I may be invisible; again I conjure thee and thy ministers also, by Stabuches and Mechaerom, Esey, Enitgiga, Bellis, and Semonei, that thou come straightway with thy said ministers and that thou perform this work as you all know how, and that this experiment may make me invisible in such wise that no one may see me. Amen.''

According to other grimoires, invisibility may be achieved by simply carrying the heart of a bat, a black hen, or a frog under the right arm.

Another method is to construct and wear the Ring of Gygès, King of Lydie. It should be made of fixed mercury, set with a little stone found in a lapwing's nest, and around the stone the words ''Jésus passant par le milieu d'eux s'en allat'' are inscribed. A variant instruction for the Ring of Gygès is contained in the grimoire Le Véritable Dragon Rouge . . . plus La Poule Noire (1521), where the inscription is in magical symbols.

The Second Book of the Secrets of Albertus Magnus contains the following formula:

''If thou wilt be made Invisible.

''LVII. Take the Stone which is called Ophethalminus, and wrap it in the leafe of the Laurell or Bay tree. And it is called Lapis Obtelmicus, whose colour is not named, for it is of many colours, and it is of such virtue that it blindeth the sights of them that stand about. Constantinus carrying this in his hand, was made invisible therewith.''

The seventeenth-century grimoire The Lemegeton of Solomon or Book of the Spirits contains the names of spirits who may be invoked in a crystal at a set hour and used for magical purposes by means of their mystical seals. These include:

''BAAL. This is the name of one of the most powerful of all kinds of demons. He may present himself as a man with a human head—or that of a cat or toad. Occasionally he is seen with all at once. Speaking in a hoarse voice, he gives knowledge of all kinds, and tells the means to obtain invisibility.

''GLASYALABOLAS is a powerful President, whose importance is belied by his appearance as a winged dog. In addition to teaching all sciences, he causes murder, makes men invisible and knows all about the past, present and future.''

The Grimorium Verum (True Grimoire) of the sixteenth century or earlier, contains the following black magic instuctions:

''To Make Oneself Invisible. Collect seven black beans. Begin the ritual on a Wednesday before sunrise. Then take the head of a dead man and put one of the black beans in his mouth, two in his eyes and two in his ears. Then make upon his head the character of MORAIL. Afterwards bury the head with the face upwards, and for nine days before sunrise water it each morning with good brandy. On the eighth day you will find the spirit mentioned, who will say to you: 'What wilt thou?' You will reply: 'I am watering my plant.' Then the Spirit will say: 'Give me the Bottle, I desire to water it myself.' In response, refuse him, even although he will ask you again. Then he will reach out with his hand and will show you the same figure which you had drawn upon the head. Now you can be certain that this is the right spirit, the spirit of the head. There is a danger that some other Spirit might try to trick you, which would have evil consequences—and in that case your operation would not succeed. Then you may give him the bottle and he will water the head and depart. On the next day, which is the ninth, when you return you will find that the beans are germinating. Take them and put them in your mouth, or in that of a child. Those which do not confer invisibility are to be reburied with the head.''

Invisibility in Spiritual Development

Invisibility is one of the siddhis or occult powers traditionally marking the progress of the Indian yogi on the pathway to higher spiritual development. Other siddhis include knowledge of past incarnations, access to the minds of others, knowledge of the time of one's death, and of hidden things, of movements and positions of stars and planets, freedom from hunger and thirst, the ability to walk through space and time, or to enter other bodies, and to become light or heavy at will, and to levitate.

In the Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali, a standard yoga treatise (ca. 3rd century B.C.E., Chapter III, 21), it is stated:

''By Samyana [combined concentration-absorption-trance] on the form of the body, suspending the power of another to see it, there follows disappearance of the body.''

However, such powers are regarded only as signs of progress, and their use for personal gain or to impress others is considered to be a serious obstacle to spiritual development.

In The Kingdom of the Lost (1947), J. A. Howard Ogdon offers an account of the use of such yoga techniques to create invisibility, The author suffered from schizophrenia, and after a period of voluntary treatment at a British mental hospital was improperly certified as a lunatic and confined to a mental institution. During his incarceration, he practiced hatha yoga intensively without the knowledge of the authorities, and perfected techniques of mental concentration and suggestion.

In 1941, he escaped from the institution in broad daylight in full view of some forty other patients and the hospital attendants. His pockets were bulging with food for his journey and he wore a raincoat and carried a full shopping bag, as well as a gas mask container (gas masks were issued to all civilians during World War II in Britain). He claims that through mental concentration he walked openly past fifty or sixty individuals and out through the front door of the institution without being perceived or challenged by anyone.

Naturally such a claim from a former mental patient must be treated with caution, but it is clear that Ogdon was an intelligent and well-read individual with a very rational view of his illness. The possibility of establishing an atmosphere of mass suggestion is not implausible. Some modern hypnotists have claimed to make individuals invisible to a hypnotized subject, so that he or she apparently sees right through them, even if they may be sitting in chairs.

Scientific Aspects of Invisibility

Aside from the fantasies and wish-fulfillment stories of folklore, or the interference with normal visual perception by means of hypnosis, the possibility of scientific techniques of invisibility has long been a matter for speculation. There are many accounts of seeing apparitions, but no adequate scientific explanation of how invisible forms can become visible, then again vanish. Where do they come from and where do they go? Ingenious theories have been advanced of intra-atomic space or interlocking universes, but outside the realm of science fiction literature there is no evidence for extra-dimensional worlds.

Spiritualists claim that phantom forms of the dead may manifest at séances using a subtle substance exuded by the medium in a vapor or cloud-like flow, becoming more solid and eventually taking on the form of a deceased person and having the appearance of a living individual as in the case of ''Katie King.'' This substance is known as ectoplasm, is said to be sensitive to light, and to recoil suddenly upon the medium if handled roughly. The process of becoming visible then vanishing again is known as materialization and dematerialization. Few today would argue for the existence of ectoplasm, or materializations. Since such claimed phenomena usually occur in subdued light or darkness, there is opportunity for fraud, and many cases have been detected. There remain a few reported cases of apparitions appearing in daylight.

Any scientific method of producing invisibility in human beings would involve apparently insuperable difficulties of interference with the light refracting characteristics of various types of human tissue and organs, and to be fully effective, the individual would need to be transparent as well as invisible. Unless the invisibility process also applied to inanimate material such as clothing, the invisible being would be obliged to travel naked, a problem vividly portrayed in H. G. Wells' science fiction novella The Invisible Man (1897).

A high level of skepticism is therefore inevitable in considering the claim that a top secret U.S. Navy experiment in 1943 succeeded in rendering the destroyer Eldridge and its crew temporarily invisible and teleporting it from its berth in Philadelphia to Norfolk, Virginia. Some of the crew members were said to have disappeared without trace, others to have gone mad, or to have met alien beings. Authors Charles Berlitz and William Moore suggest that the experiment involved using an intensified force field around the ship, deriving from the principles of Einstein's Unified Field Theory.

Another book, Invisible Horizons (1964) by Vincent Gaddis, attempts to link the Philadelphia Experiment story with the Bermuda Triangle mystery. All this is fascinating but highly speculative and lacking firm evidence. The Office of Naval Research firmly denies the whole story, and the Department of the Navy, Office of Information, states: "ONR has never conducted any investigations on invisibility, either in 1943 or at any other time." A 1984 movie The Philadelphia Experiment further fictionalized the story.

Sources:

Berlitz, Charles, and William Moore. The Philadelphia Experiment: Project Invisibility. N.p., 1979.

Moore, William L., and Charles Berlitz. The Philadelphia Experiment. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1979.

IONS See Institute of Noetic Sciences

IPA See Incorporeal Personal Agency

IRELAND

Pagan and Christian Beliefs

[For information regarding ancient Ireland, see Celts.]

Although nominally Christianized, there is little doubt that the early medieval Irish retained many remnants of their former paganism, especially those with elements of magic. The writings of the Welsh historian Giraldus Cambrensis (ca. 1147–1220) point to this. This is the first known account of Irish manners and customs after the invasion of the country by the Anglo-Normans. His description, for example, of the Purgatory of St. Patrick in Lough Derg, County Donegal, suggests that the demonology of the Catholic Church had already fused with the animism of earlier Irish tradition. He states:

> There is a lake in Ulster containing an island divided into two parts. In one of these stands a church of especial sanctity, and it is most agreeable and delightful, as well as beyond measure glorious for the visitations of angels and the multitude of the saints who visibly frequent it. The other part, being covered with rugged crags, is reported to be the resort of devils only, and to be almost always the theatre on which crowds of evil spirits visibly perform their rites. This part of the island contains nine pits, and should any one perchance venture to spend the night in one of them (which has been done, we know, at times, by some rash men), he is immediately seized by the malignant spirits, who so severely torture him during the whole night, inflicting on him such unutterable sufferings by fire and water, and other torments of various kinds, that when morning comes scarcely any spark of life is found left in his wretched body. It is said that any one who has once submitted to these torments as a penance imposed upon him, will not afterwards undergo the pains of hell, unless he commit some sin of a deeper dye.
>
> "This place is called by the natives the Purgatory of St. Patrick. For he, having to argue with a heathen race concerning the torments of hell, reserved for the reprobate, and the real nature and eternal duration of the future life, in order to impress on the rude minds of the unbelievers a mysterious faith in doctrines so new, so strange, so opposed to their prejudices, procured by the efficacy of his prayers an exemplification of both states even on earth, as a salutary lesson to the stubborn minds of the people.

Human Animals

The ancient Irish believed in the possibility of the transformation of human beings into animals. Giraldus, in another narrative of facts purporting to have come under his personal notice, shows that this belief had lost none of its significance with the Irish of the latter half of the twelfth century. The case is also interesting as being one of the first recorded examples of lycanthropy in the British Isles:

"About three years before the arrival of Earl John in Ireland, it chanced that a priest, who was journeying from Ulster towards Meath, was benighted in a certain wood on the borders of Meath. While, in company with only a young lad, he was watching by a fire which he had kindled under the branches of a spreading tree, lo! a wolf came up to them, and immediately addressed them to this effect: 'Rest secure, and be not afraid, for there is no reason you should fear, where no fear is!' The travellers being struck with astonishment and alarm, the wolf added some orthodox words referring to God. The priest then implored him, and adjured him by Almighty God and faith in the Trinity, not to hurt them, but to inform them what creature it was in the shape of a beast uttered human words. The wolf, after giving catholic replies to all questions, added at last: 'There are two of us, a man and a woman, natives of Ossory, who, through the curse of Natalis, saint and abbot, are compelled every seven years to put off the human form, and depart from the dwellings of men. Quitting entirely the human form, we assume that of wolves. At the end of the seven years, if they chance to survive, two others being substituted in their places, they return to their country and their former shape. And now, she who is my partner in this visitation lies dangerously sick not far from hence, and, as she is at the point of death, I beseech you, inspired by divine charity, to give her the consolations of your priestly office.'

"At this wood the priest followed the wolf trembling, as he led the way to a tree at no great distance, in the hollow of which he beheld a she-wolf, who under that shape was pouring forth human sighs and groans. On seeing the priest, having saluted him with human courtesy, she gave thanks to God, who in this extremity had vouchsafed to visit her with such consolation. She then received from the priest all the rites of the church duly performed, as far as the last communion. This also she importunately demanded, earnestly supplicating him to complete his good offices by giving her the viaticum. The priest stoutly asserting that he was not provided with it, the he-wolf, who had withdrawn to a short distance, came back and pointed out a small missal-book, containing some consecrated wafers, which the priest carried on his journey, suspended from his neck, under his garment, after the fashion of the country. He then intreated him not to deny them the gift of God, and the aid destined for them by Divine Providence; and, to remove all doubt, using his claw for a hand, he tore off the skin of the she-wolf, from the head down to the navel, folding it back. Thus she immediately presented the form of an old woman. The priest, seeing this, and compelled by his fear more than his reason, gave the communion; the recipient having earnestly implored it, and devoutly partaking of it. Immediately afterwards the he-wolf rolled back the skin and fitted it to its original form.

"These rites having been duly, rather than rightly performed, the he-wolf gave them his company during the whole night at their little fire, behaving more like a man than a beast. When morning came, he led them out of the wood, and, leaving the priest to pursue his journey pointed out to him the direct road for a long distance. At his departure, he also gave him many thanks for the benefit he had conferred, promising him still greater returns of gratitude, if the Lord should call him back from his present exile, two parts of which he had already completed.

"In our own time we have seen persons who, by magical arts, turned any substance about them into fat pigs, as they appeared (but they were always red), and sold them in the markets. However, they disappeared as soon as they crossed any water, returning to their real nature; and with whatever care they were kept, their assumed form did not last beyond three days. It was also a frequent complaint, from old times as well as in the present, that certain hags in Wales, as well as in Ireland and Scotland, changed themselves into the shape of hares, that, sucking teats under this counterfeit form, they might stealthily rob other people's milk."

Witchcraft in Ireland

In Anglo-Norman times, sorcery, malevolent magic, was apparently widely practiced, but records are scarce. It is only by fugitive passages in the works of English writers who constantly comment on the superstitious nature and practices of the Irish that any information concerning the occult history of the country emerges. The great scandal of the accused witch Dame Alice Kyteler did shake the entire Anglo-Norman colony during several successive years in the first half of the fourteenth century. The party of the Bishop of Ossory, the relentless opponent of the Dame Alice, boasted that by her prosecution they had rid Ireland of a nest of sorcerers; and, yet, there is reason to believe that Ireland could have furnished other similar instances of black magic had the actors in them been of royal status—that is, of sufficient importance in the eyes of chroniclers.

In this connection St. John D. Seymour's Irish Witchcraft and Demonology (1913) is of striking interest. The author seems to take it for granted that witchcraft in Ireland is purely an alien system, imported into the island by the Anglo-Normans and Scottish immigrants to the north. This is a possibility because the districts of the Pale and of Ulster are concerned, even if it cannot be applied to the Celtic districts of Ireland.

Early Irish works contain numerous references to sorcery, and practices are chronicled in them that bear a close resemblance to those of the shamans and medicine men of tribes around the world. The ancient Irish cycles frequently allude to animal transformation, one of the most common feats of the witch, and in Hibernian legend most heroes have a considerable working magic available to them. Wonder-working druids also abound.

Seymour claimed that, "In Celtic Ireland dealings with the unseen were not regarded with such abhorrence, and indeed had the sanction of custom and antiquity." He added that ". . .the Celtic element had its own superstitious beliefs, but these never developed in this direction," by which he meant witchcraft. He lacked support for this observation. An absence of records of such a system is no proof that one never existed, and it is possible that a thorough examination of the subject would prove that a veritable system of witchcraft obtained in Celtic Ireland as elsewhere, although it may not have been of "Celtic" origin.

Seymour's book nonetheless is most informative on those Anglo-Norman and Scottish portions of Ireland where the belief in sorcery followed the lines of those in vogue in the mother-countries of the immigrant populations. He sketched the famous Kyteler case; touched on the circumstances connected with the Earl of Desmond; and, he noted the case of the Irish prophetess who insisted upon warning the ill-fated James I of Scotland on the night of his assassination at Perth. It is not stated by the ancient chronicler whom Seymour quotes where in Ireland the witch in question came from—and undoubtedly she was a witch because she possessed a familiar spirit, "Huthart," whom she alleged warned her of the coming catastrophe. This spirit is the Teutonic Hudekin or Hildekin, the wearer of the hood, sometimes also alluded to as Heckdekin, well known throughout Germany and Flanders as a species of house-spirit or brownie. Trithemius alludes to this spirit as a "spirit known to the Saxons who attached himself to the Bishop of Hildesheim" and it is cited here and there in occult history. From this circumstance it might be inferred that the witch in question came from some part of Ireland that had been settled by Teutonic immigrants, probably Ulster.

Seymour continued his survey with a review of the witchcraft trials of the sixteenth century; the burning of Adam Dubh; the Leinster trial of O'Toole and College Green in 1327 for heresy; and, the important passing of the statute against witchcraft in Ireland in 1586. He noted the enchantments of the Earl of Desmond, who demonstrated to his young and beautiful wife the possibilities of animal transformation by changing himself into a bird, a hag, a vulture, and a gigantic serpent. One full chapter was devoted to Florence Newton, the witch of Youghal, who was one of the most absorbing in the history of witchcraft.

Ghostly doings and apparitions, fairy possession, and dealings with fairies are also included in the volume, and Seymour did not confine himself to Ireland. He followed one of his countrywomen to the United States, where he demonstrated her influence on the "supernatural" speculations of Congregationalist minister Cotton Mather.

Seymour completed his survey with seventeenth-century witchcraft notices from Antrim and Island Magee and the affairs of sorcery in Ireland from the year 1807 to the early twentieth century. The last notice is that of a trial for murder in 1911, when a woman was tried for killing another (an old-age pensioner) in a fit of insanity. A witness deposed that he met the accused on the road on the morning of the crime holding a statue or figure in her hand and repeating three times, "I have the old witch killed. I got power from the Blessed Virgin to kill her." It appears that the witch in question had threatened to plague the woman with rats and mice. A single rodent had evidently entered her home and was followed by the bright vision of a lady who told the accused that she was in danger, and further informed her that if she received the senior citizen's pension book without taking off her clothes and cleaning them and putting out her bed and cleaning up the house, she would "receive dirt for ever and rats and mice."

Modern Occultism

During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Celtic mysticism and legends of ghosts and fairies received a new infusion from Hindu mysticism through the Dublin lodge of the Theosophical Society and the writings of poets William Butler Yeats and "AE" (pseudonym of George W. Russell). Through the society, Russell was profoundly influenced by Hindu scriptures such as the Bhagavad-Gita and came to understand that mysticism should be interfused with one's everyday social responsibilities. Russell wrote mystical poems and painted pictures of nature spirits.

Yeats became a noted member of the Hermetic order of the Golden Dawn, a ritual magic society. Its teachings had a primary influence on the symbolism of his poems and on his own mystical vision. He was also impressed by Hindu mystical teachings, and collaborated with Shri Purohit Swami in the translation of Hindu religious works.

After the death of Yeats and Russell, occultism did not make much headway in Irish life and literature. The occult and witchcraft boom of the 1950s and 1960s was largely ignored in Ireland. Janet and Stewart Farrar, both neo-pagan witches trained by Alexander Sanders, did take up residence in the Republic of Ireland. Stewart Farrar has written a number of books on witchcraft, including the early neo-pagan classic What Witches Do: The Modern Coven Revealed (1971).

The Fellowship of Isis, headquartered at Huntingdon Castle, Clonegal, Enniscorthy, has become an international association of neo-pagans and witches. It is devoted to the deity in the form of the goddess, and publishes material concerning matriarchal religion and mysticism.

Irish writer Desmond Leslie was coauthor with George Adamski of the influential book Flying Saucers Have Landed (1953) an important early book introducing the topic to the English-speaking public. The book was eventually translated into 16 languages.

Psychical Research & Parapsychology

Although Ireland is traditionally a land of ghosts, fairies, banshees, and haunted castles, there have been few systematic attempts to conduct psychical research there. The exceptions have been some interest in dowsing (water-divining), and the work of medium Kathleen Goligher. In 1914, then 16 year-old Goligher came into the world's attention by Dr. William Crawford, in Belfast. Goligher was from a family of physical mediums, but considered the best of them. The phenomena demonstrated consisted of raps that reportedly shook the room, and levitation of a ten and a half pound table, often for as long as five minutes. Crawford photographed the manifestations that supported the levitations-ectoplasmic structures that resembled rods. Harry Houdini saw the pictures that Crawford had intended to use in his book. He remained completely skeptical and decided that Crawford was insane. Following Crawford's suicide in 1920, another photograph of plasma coming out of Goligher's body was thought to be genuine. By 1922 Dr. E. E. Fournier d'Albe claimed she was a fraud after 20 sittings with her. Following a ten-year period of retirement, it was reported in 1933 that Goligher produced cloth-like ectoplasm. Researchers did not investigate that claim, so no verification could be made. That Crawford introduced technology to verify the investigation is what remained of prime interest historically.

Currently, the Belfast Spiritual Fellowship, a group ascribing to Spiritualist beliefs, can be contacted at 44 Barnsmore Drive, Belfast, Northern Ireland BT13 3FF.

Sources:

AE [George W. Russell]. The Candle of Vision. London: Macmillan, 1918. Reprint, New Hyde Park, NY: University Books, 1965.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Curtin, Jeremiah. Tales of the Fairies and of the Ghost World, Collected from Oral Tradition in Southwest Munster. London: D. Nutt, 1895. Reprint, Dublin: Talbot Press, 1974.

Dunne, John J. Haunted Ireland: Her Romantic and Mysterious Ghosts. Belfast: Appletree Press, 1977.

Farrar, Stewart. What Witches Do: The Modern Coven Revealed. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan; London: Peter Davies, 1971.

Giraldus Cambrensis. The Historical Works of Giraldus Cambrensis, Containing the Topography of Ireland, and The History of the Conquest of Ireland. Translated by R. C. Hoare. London: Bohn's Antiquarian Library, 1847.

Gregory, Lady. Visions and Beliefs in the West of Ireland. 2 vols. New York: George Putnam's Sons, 1920. Reprint, U.K.: Colin Smythe, 1970.

Harper, George Mills. Yeats's Golden Dawn. London: Macmillan, 1974.

McAnally, D. R., Jr. Irish Wonders: The Ghosts, Giants, Pookas, Demons, Leprechawns, Banshees, Fairies, Witches, Widows, Old Maids and Other Marvels of the Emerald Isle. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1888. Reprint, Detroit: Grand River Books, 1971.

O'Donnell, Elliot. The Banshee. London: Sands, 1920.

Seymour, St. John D. and Harry L. Neligan. True Irish Ghost Stories. London: Oxford University Press, 1915. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

Spiritualist Webring. Available at: http://home.vicnet.net.au/~johnf/welcome.htm.

Washington, Peter. Madame Blavatsky's Baboon, A History of the Mystics, Mediums, and Misfits Who Brought Spiritualism to America. New York: Schocken Books, 1993.

White, Carolyn. A History of Irish Fairies. Cork, Ireland: Mercier Press, 1976.

Yeats, W. B., ed. Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry. London: Walter Scott Publishing, 1888. Reprint, New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1957.

Iremonger, Lucille (d'Oyen) (ca. 1920–1989?)

British novelist, journalist, and broadcaster who was highly regarded for her thoughtful examinations of history, politics, and parapsycology. Born in Jamaica around 1920, Iremonger received her M.A. at Oxford University (1939) with honors. She was awarded the Society of Women Journalists' Lady Britain trophy for the best book of the year in 1948 for It's A Bigger Life and that same year received the Lady Violet Astor trophy for the best article of the year. She was also awarded the Silver Musgrave Medal (Jamaica) for her contributions to literature relating to the West Indies (1962). Occult themes were woven into many of her writings, including West Indian Folk Tales: Anansi Stories (retold for English children; 1956) and The Ghosts of Versailles: Miss Moberly and Miss Jourdain and Their Adventure—A Critical Study (1957), an account of an alleged 1901 sighting of Marie Antoinette at Versailles.

Sources:

Contemporary Authors Online. The Gale Group, 1999. Reproduced in Biography Resource Center. Farmington Hills, Mich.: The Gale Group. March 2000. (http://www.galenet.com/servlet/BioRC)

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Iridis (Newsletter)

Monthly newsletter of the California Society for Psychical Study, Address: P.O. Box 844, Berkeley, CA 94709.

Irish Society of Diviners

Society composed of individuals interested in all aspects of dowsing, water divining, radiesthesia, healing, earth energies, and tracing missing persons through divining techniques. It was founded in 1958 and holds meetings and lectures. For a time it issued a journal titled Irish Diviner, now superseded by the society's newsletter, The Irish Diviner Newsletter. Address: c/o Mr. Jim Bourke, Son-na-Mara, Coliemore Rd., Dalkey, Co. Dublin, Ireland. Website: http://anamspirit.com/society.html.

Sources:

The Irish Society of Diviners. http://anamspirit.com/society.html. March 8, 2000.

Irish UFO Organization

Society concerned with the scientific study of the UFO phenomenon. It investigated and classified UFO reports and published an occasional newsletter. It was associated with Spectrum—Society for Psychical and Spiritual Studies, with which it its office. Last known address: 70 Glasmeen Rd., Glasnevin, Dublin 11, Republic of Ireland.

Iron

An ancient observation on the occult virtues of iron was made by Pliny the Elder (ca. 23–79 C.E.) in his Natural History (as translated in 1601 by Philemon Holland).

"As touching the use of Yron and steele in Physicke, it serveth otherwise than for to launce, cut and dismember withal; for take the knife or dagger, an make an ymaginerie circle two or three times round with the point thereof upon a young child or an elder bodie, and then goe round withall about the partie as often, it is a singular preservative against all poysons, sorceries, or enchantments. Also to take any yron naile out of the coffin or sepulchre wherein man or woman lieth buried, and to sticke the same fast to the lintle or side post of a dore, leading either to the house or bed-chamber where any dooth lie who is haunted with Spirits in the night, he or she shall be delivered and secured from such phanasticall illusions. Moreover, it is said, that if one be lightly pricked with the point of sword or dagger, which hath been the death of a man, it is an excellent remedy against the pains of sides or breast, which come with sudden prickes or stitches.''

In certain parts of Scotland and Ireland, there was a belief in the potency of iron for warding off the attacks of fairies. An iron poker, laid across a cradle, would, it was believed, keep fairies away until the child was baptized. The Reverend John G. Campbell in his Superstitions of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland (1900) relates how, when children, he and another boy were believed to be protected from a fairy that had been seen at a certain spot because one boy possessed a knife and the other a nail.

Many other countries had folklore about iron as a religious taboo or a charm against witchcraft and the supernatural. Iron tools were prohibited in Greek and Hebrew temples in ancient times. In Korea the body of the king was never to be touched by iron. Roman priests were forbidden to shave with iron blades. In India and China evil spirits were warded off by iron.

Sources:

French, Roger. Science in the Early Roman Empire: Pliny the Elder, His Sources and His Influence. New York: Barnes & Nobel, 1986.

Pliny the Elder. Natural History. New York: Penguin, 1991.

Irving, Rev. Edward (1792–1834)

Famous Scottish preacher, born on August 4, 1792, in Annan, Scotland. His Regent Square Church congregation was the scene of extraordinary psychic manifestations in 1831. His followers called ''Irvingites'' were seized with the gift of speaking in tongues; they also prophesied and effected cures. Irving was forced to retire from Regent Square in 1832 because of his acceptance and promotion of pentecostal phenomena. Along with Irving, the Irvingites formed a dissenting congregation called Catholic Apostolic Church. In 1833 Irving was condemned by the presbytery of Annan on charges of heresy. Irving died in Glasgow, Scotland on December 7, 1834.

Sources:

Baxter, Robert. A Narrative of Facts Characterising the Supernatural Manifestations in the Members of Mr. Irving's Congregation, and Other Individuals in England and Scotland, and formerly in the Writer Himself. London, 1833.

Dallimore, Arnold A. Forerunner of the Charismatic Movement: The Life of Edward Irving. Chicago: Moody Press, 1983.

Dictionary of National Biography. The Concise Dictionary. part 1, From the Beginnings to 1900. London: Oxford University Press, 1953.

Drummond, Andrew L. Edward Irving and His Circle. London: J. Clarke, 1937.

Marricks, William S. Edward Irving: The Forgotten Giant. East Peoria, Ill.: Scribe's Chamber Publications, 1983.

Wilks, Washington. Edward Irving: An Ecclesiastical and Literary Biography. London, 1854.

Irwin, H(arvey) J(on) (1943–)

Australian parapsychologist, senior lecturer in psychology at the University of New England, Australia. Irwin was born on September 8, 1943. He studied at Sydney University (B.Sc., 1964; Dip.Ed., 1965), the University of New South Wales (B.A., 1969), and the University of New England (Litt.B., 1972; Ph.D., psychology, 1978). His dissertation was entitled Visual Selective Attention and the Human Information Processing System: Structures, Processes, and Processing Interference in Visual Input Selection. After graduation he was a senior tutor at the University of New England. In 1985 joined the faculty in psychology as a lecturer, a position that allowed him some freedom to teach in the overlapping area between psychology and parapsychology.

His doctoral research concerned the nature of selective attention in vision and its interpretation within an information-processing framework. He has since explored the possibility of accounting for the experiential properties of paranormal phenomena in terms of information-processing theory. In recent years he has also investigated the nature of out-of-the-body experiences. He has published articles and several books on parapsychology and psychology.

Sources:

Irwin, H. J. Flight of Mind: A Psychological Study of the Out-of-Body Experience. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1985.

———. An Introduction to Parapsychology. 2d ed. Pittsburgh: R. A. McConnell, 1994.

———. Psi and the Mind: An Information Processing Approach. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1979.

Isaac of Holland (fl. fifteenth century)

Little is known about the life of this alchemist, but he is commonly supposed to have lived and worked early in the fifteenth century. The main reason for assigning his career to that period is that in his writings he refers to Geber, Dastin, Morien, and Arnaldus de Villanova, but not to more modern authorities. Furthermore, he appears to have been acquainted with various chemical processes discovered toward the close of the fourteenth century. Therefore, it may be deduced that he did not live before that time.

According to tradition Isaac worked with his son, whose name is not recorded, and the pair are usually regarded as having been the first men to exploit chemistry in the Netherlands. They are said to have been particularly skillful in the manufacture of enamels and artificial gems, and it is noteworthy that no less distinguished an alchemist than Paracelsus attached value to the Dutchmen's research. Isaac and his son were also mentioned with honor by the seventeenth-century English scientist Robert Boyle.

Isaac compiled two scientific treatises on alchemy, one entitled Opera Mineralia Joannis Isaaci Hollandi, sive de Lapide Philosophico (1600), and the other De Triplici Ordine Elixiris et Lapidis Theoria (1608). Both were published at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The latter treatise is the more important of the two because the author sets forth his ideas on exalting base metals into Sol and Luna (gold and silver) and illustrates exactly what kind of vessel should be used for each.

ISAR See Institute for the Study of American Religion

ISC See International Society of Cryptozoology

Isian News

Quarterly publication of the Fellowship of Isis, an Irish-based religious organization founded in 1976 to revive worship and communion with the feminine principle in deity, in the form of the Goddess, and to promote knowledge of the world's matriarchal religions. Address: Clonegal Castle, Enniscorthy, Eire, Ireland. Website: http://www.fellowshipofisis.com/.

Sources:

Fellowship of Isis Homepage. http://www.fellowshipofisis.com/. March 8, 2000.

ISKCON See International Society for Krishna Consciousness

ISKCON Review (Journal)

Short-lived biannual interdisciplinary journal of the Bhaktivedanta Institute of Religion and Culture. Founded in the spring of 1985, its purpose was "to stimulate and communicate—as well as to review—research and reflection on the Hare Krishna movement in all its aspects. It is intended both for those who have a direct interest in ISKCON, as well as for those whose general interest in Hindu tradition, new religious movements, or contemporary spirituality might be served by a deeper awareness of the movement. It is directed towards a wide, primarily academic and professional audience, including Hindu studies, scholars, sociologists, and psychologists of religion, students of American religious history, theologians, mental health professionals, and clergy—as well as interested members of ISKCON."

Although subsidized by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness through the Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, ISKCON's publishing house, the Review had complete editorial autonomy and was not an official publication of the Hare Krishna movement. It served as a forum both for those committed to ISKCON and for independent scholars and theologians.

Isle of Avalon Foundation

The Isle of Avalon Foundation was founded in 1991 as the University of Avalon, an independent training center, in the legendary community of Glastonbury, in England. The foundation is not tied to any particular magical or Pagan group, but attempts to draw upon the various strains of occultism associated with the community. Most important is the tradition of the Fraternity of the Inner Light founded early in the twentieth century by Dion Fortune (1890–1946). The fraternity, born amid the demise of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, established a guest house near the Tor at Glastonbury that provided a retreat for Fortune, who was often in tension with the male-dominated magical community in London.

The Isle of Avalon Foundation also draws heavily on the tradition that ties the area to the legends of the ancient Isle of Avalon. These legends include references to Joseph of Arimathea, who is believed by many to have brought the Holy Grail, the cup used at the Last Supper by Jesus, to Glastonbury. From this belief, the idea of the search for the Grail has entered popular occult thinking. In addition, during the 1970s, Glastonbury became one of England's most prosperous New Age centers and is believed to be a particular focus of esoteric and magical energies.

Founded as an independent study and spiritual educational facility, the University of Avalon ran into problems with the British government. Since it was not a recognized degree-granting institution, it was forced to change its name. As the Isle of Avalon Foundation, however, it has continued as a New Age and magical teaching center offering a wide variety of courses in the Sacred Arts and Sciences from spiritual healing to numerology and shamanistic magic. It may be contacted at 33 Oldridge Rd., London SW12 8PN.

Sources:

Barrett, David V. Sects, Cults, and Alternative Religions: A World Survey and Source Book. London: Blandford, 1996.

ISRAEL

Beginning with the Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917, there was a great influx of Jewish immigrants into Palestine, and this migration was intensified with the establishment of the State of Israel on May 14, 1948. Refugees from persecutions and the aftermath of two world wars brought the rich folklore of Europe into the new homeland. Stories of the Hasidim—the miracle-working mystical rabbis and their followers—existed side by side with legends of the Angel of Death, or the golem created by Rabbi Loew of Prague. As in the United States, mystical groups in Israel have kept alive the study of Kabbalah. The 1990s showed a resurgence of the study of Jewish mysticism, when celebrities such as Madonna and Roseanne announced their studies publicly.

Beyond the legends of miracles and occult phenomena that have a basically mystical purpose, speculation on the afterlife is alien to the general trend of Judaism and there has been little basis for studies of Spiritualism and psychical research. Since the 1960s, however, there has been a growing interest in parapsychology in Israel, given added topical interest by the furious controversies over the phenomena of Uri Geller, who encountered great opposition from scientists and psychologists who were convinced that he was a fraud. More information on Uri Geller's current activity can be found at his website: http://www.uri-geller.com/.

Enlightened scientific interest in parapsychology in Israel owes much to Professor H. S. Bergman, who was a great friend of the famous psychic Eileen Garrett, founder of the Parapsychology Foundation in the United States. With the cooperation of Bergman, F. S. Rothschild, Heinz C. Berendt and others, the Israel Parapsychology Society was formed. In 1965, Garrett visited the group in Jerusalem for the opening of the Parapsychology Foundation Library. Berendt published the first Hebrew-language book on parapsychology, Parapsychology—The World Beyond (Jerusalem, 1966).

In 1968 the Israel Society for Parapsychology was founded in Tel Aviv under the chairmanship of Margot Klausner. The society has organized lectures and courses on a wide range of subjects, such as clairvoyance, telepathy, reincarnation, dowsing, spiritual healing, meditation, and astrology. It also publishes a journal, Mysterious Worlds, and maintains a library of more than 1,200 volumes. The last known address of Israel Parapsychology Society is c/o Mr. Gilad Livneh, 28 Hapalmach St., 92542 Jerusalem, Israel.

In response to the explosion of interest of parapsychology and in opposition of extreme religious activism, beginning with the assassination of Israel's Prime Minister Itzhak Rabin, the Israeli Atheists Society was founded on November 7, 1996. This organization views atheism as the only way for Israel to reach humanistic civilization and to survive as a nation.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

The Israeli Atheists Society Introduction. http://atheism.org.il/english.htm. June 20, 2000.

ISRHA See International Self-Realization Healing Association

ISSSEEM See International Society for the Study of Subtle Energies and Energy Medicine

ISTRA See Interplanetary Space Travel Research Association

ITALY

[For information regarding ancient Italy, see Rome, Ancient Religion and Magic.]

Magic and sorcery in medieval Italy centered around the many great personalities of the church. Even several popes have been included by the historians of occult science in the ranks of notable Italian sorcerers and alchemists. There appears to have been some sort of folk tradition that the popes had been given over to the practice of magic ever since the tenth century, and it was alleged that Silvester II confessed to this charge on his death bed. Éliphas Lévi stated that Honorius III, who preached the Crusades, was an abominable necromancer, and the author of the Grimoire of Honorius, a book by which spirits were evoked.

Bartholomew Platina (1421–1481), quoting from Martinus Polonus, stated that Silvester, who was a proficient mathematician and versed in the Kabbalah, on one occasion evoked Satan himself and obtained his assistance to gain the pontifical crown. Furthermore he stipulated as the price of selling his soul to the devil that he should not die except at Jerusalem, where he inwardly determined he would never go.

He did become pope. But on one occasion while celebrating Mass in a certain church at Rome, he felt extremely ill, and suddenly remembered that he was officiating in a chapel dedicated to the Holy Cross of Jerusalem. He had a bed set up in the chapel, to which he summoned the cardinals and confessed that he had held communication with the powers of evil. He further arranged that when dead, his body should be placed upon a car of green wood drawn by two horses, one black and other white. He stipulated that the horses should be started on their course, but neither led nor driven, and that where they halted his remains should be entombed. The conveyance stopped in front of the Lateran, and at this juncture terrible noises proceeded from it, which led the bystanders to suppose that the soul of Silvester had been seized upon by Satan according to the agreement.

There is no doubt whatsoever that such legends concerning papal necromancers are simply inventions; they can be traced through Platina and Polonus to Galfridus and the chronicler Gervase of Tilbury, whom Gabriel Naudé termed ''the greatest forger of fables, and the most notorious liar that ever took pen in hand!''

On par with such myths is that of Pope Joan, who for several years was supposed to have sat on the papal throne although a woman, and who was supposed to be one of the rankest sorceresses of all time. Many magic books were attributed to Pope Joan. Lévi has an interesting passage in his History of Magic (1913) in which he states that certain engravings in a life of this female pope, purporting to represent her, are nothing but ancient tarots representing Isis crowned with a tiara. ''It is well-known that the hieroglyphic figure on the second tarot card is still called 'The Female Pope,' being a woman wearing a tiara, on which are the points of the crescent moon, or the horns of Isis.''

But all Italian necromancers and magicians were by no means churchmen—indeed, medieval Italy was hardly a place for the magically inclined, so stringent were the laws of the church against the occult. One exception, astrology, however, flourished, and its practitioners were accepted into the highest levels of society. A Florentine astrologer named Basil, who flourished at the beginning of the fifteenth century, obtained some repute for successful predictions and was said to have foretold to Cosmo de Medici that he would attain exalted dignity, as the same planets had been in ascendency at the hour of his birth as at the birth of the Emperor Charles V.

Many remarkable predictions were made by Antiochus Tibertus of Romagna, who was for some time counselor to Pandolpho de Maletesta, Prince of Rimini. He foretold to his friend Guido de Bogni, the celebrated soldier, that he was unjustly suspected by his best friend, and would forfeit his life through suspicion. Of himself he predicted that he would die on the scaffold, and of the Prince of Rimini, his patron, that he would die a beggar in the hospital for the poor at Bologna. It is stated that the prophecies came true in every detail.

Although the recorded notices of sorcery in medieval times are few in Italian history, there is reason to suspect that although magic was not outwardly practiced, it lurked hidden in out-of-the-way places. An excellent portrait of the medieval Italian magician can be found in the popular myths of Virgil the Enchanter.

The Legend of Virgil

The fame of Virgil the Poet was so great in ancient Italy that in due time his name became synonymous with fame itself. From that it was a short step to the attribution of supernatural power, and Virgil the Roman poet became in the popular mind a medieval enchanter. His myth is symptomatic of magic in medieval Italy as a whole and is therefore described here at some length.

When the popular myth of Virgil the Enchanter first grew into repute is uncertain, but probably the earliest conception arose about the beginning of the tenth century and each succeeding generation embroidered upon it some new fantastic element. Soon, in the south of Italy (the necromancer's fame was of southern origin), mysterious legends of the enchantments he had wrought emerged.

Thus Virgil was said to have fashioned a brazen fly and planted it on the gate of fair Parthenope to free the city from the inroads of the insects of Beelzebub. On a Neapolitan hill he built a brass statue and placed a trumpet in its mouth. When the north wind blew a roar so terrible came from that trumpet that it drove the noxious blasts of Vulcan's forges back into the sea. At one of the gates of Naples, Virgil supposedly raised two statues of stone and gifted them respectively with the power of blighting or blessing the strangers who passed by one or the other of them on entering the city. He constructed three public baths for the removal of every disease afflicting the human body, but the physicians, in a dread of losing their patients and their fees, caused them to be destroyed.

Other wonders he was supposed to have wrought were woven into a biography of the enchanter, first printed in French about 1490–1520. A still fuller history appeared in English as ''The Life of Virgilius,'' about 1508, printed by Hans Doesborcke at Antwerp. It set forth with tolerable clearness the popular type of the medieval magician, and is drawn upon in the following biographical sketch:

''Virgil was the son of a wealthy senator of Rome, wealthy and powerful enough to carry on war with the Roman Emperor. As his birth was heralded by extraordinary portents, it is no marvel that even in childhood he showed himself endowed with extraordinary mental powers, and his father having the sagacity to discern in him an embryo necromancer sent him, while still very young, to study at the University of Toledo, where the 'art of magick' was taught with extraordinary success.''

''There he studied diligently, for he was of great understanding, and speedily acquired a profound insight into the great Shemaia of the Chaldean lore. But this insight was due not so much to nocturnal vigils over abstruse books, as to the help he received from a very valuable familiar.''

The story goes on to say that Virgil's father died and his estates were seized by his former colleagues, so his widow was sunk into extreme poverty. Virgil accordingly gathered together the wealth he had amassed by the exercise of his magical skill and set out for Rome to put his mother in a position proper to her rank. At Toledo he had been regarded as a famous student; but at Rome he was a despised scholar, and when he asked the emperor to execute justice and restore his estate to him, that potentate, ignorant of the magician's power, simply replied, "Methinketh that the land is well divided to them that have it, for they may help you in their need; what needeth you for to care for the disheriting of one school-master. Bid him take heed, and look to his schools, for he hath no right to any land here about the city of Rome."

Four years passed, and only such replies as this were given to Virgil's frequent appeals for justice. Growing at length weary of the delay, he resolved to exercise his wondrous powers in his own behalf. When the harvest came, he accordingly shrouded the whole of his rightful inheritance with a vapor so dense that the new proprietors were unable to approach it, and under its cover his men gathered in the entire crop with perfect security. This done, the mist disappeared.

Then his angry enemies assembled their swordsmen and marched against him to take off his head. Such was their power that the emperor fled out of Rome in fear, ". . .for they were twelve senators that had all the world under them, and if Virgilius had right, he had been one of the twelve, but they had disinherited him and his mother." When they drew near, Virgil once more baffled their designs by encircling his patrimony with cloud and shadow.

The emperor, with surprising inconsistency, now joined forces with the senators against Virgil, whose magical powers he should have feared far more than the rude force of the senatorial magnates, and made war against him. But who can prevail against the arts of necromancy? Emperor and senators were duly beaten, and from that moment Virgil, with marvelous generosity, became the faithful friend and powerful supporter of his sovereign.

It may not be generally known that Virgil, besides being the savior of Rome, was supposed to be the founder of Naples. This feat had its origin, like so many other great actions, in the power of love.

Virgil's imagination had been fired by the reports that reached him of the surpassing loveliness of the sultan's daughter. Now the sultan lived at Babylon (that is, at Cairo, the "Babylon" of medieval romancers) and the distance might have daunted a less ardent lover and less potent magician. But Virgil's necromantic skill was equal to magically raising a bridge in the air, and, passing over it, he found his way into the sultan's palace and into the princess's chamber. Speedily overcoming her natural modesty, Virgil bore her back with him to his Italian bower. There, he enjoyed his fill of love and pleasure, then restored the princess to her bed in her father's palace. Meanwhile, her absence had been noted, but she was soon discovered on her return, and the sultan, hastening to her chamber, interrogated her respecting her disappearance. He found that she did not know who had carried her off, nor where she had been carried.

When Virgil abducted and restored the princess on the following night, she took back with her, by her father's instructions, some fruit plucked from the enchanter's garden, and from its quality the sultan guessed that she had been carried to a southern land "on the side of France." These nocturnal journeys being several times repeated and the sultan's curiosity growing ungovernable, he persuaded his daughter to give her lover a sleeping draught. The deceived magician was then captured in the Babylonian palace and flung into prison, and it was decreed that both he and his mistress should be punished for their love by death at the stake.

Necromancers are not so easily outwitted. As soon as Virgil was apprised of the fate intended for him, he made, by force of his spells, the sultan and all his lords believe that the mighty Nilus, great river of Babylon, was overflowing in the midst of them, and that they swam and lay and sprang like geese, and so they took up Virgil and the princess, tore them from their prison, and placed them upon the aerial bridge. And when they were thus out of danger, Virgil delivered the sultan and all the lords from the river, and when they recovered their wits they saw the enchanter bearing the beautiful princess across the Mediterranean, and they marveled and felt that they could not hope to prevail against such supernatural power.

And in this manner Virgil conveyed the sultan's daughter over the sea to Rome. He was infatuated with her beauty, and,

"Then he thought in his mind how he might marry her [apparently forgetting that he was already married] and thought in his mind to found in the midst of the sea a fair town with great lands belonging to it; and so he did by his cunning, and called it Naples. . ."

After accomplishing so much for his Babylonian beauty, Virgil did not marry her. He did endow her with the town of Naples and its lands, and gave her in marriage to a certain grandee of Spain. Having disposed of her, the enchanter returned to Rome, collected all his treasures, and removed them to the city he had founded, where he resided for some years and established a school that speedily became of illustrious renown. Here he lost his wife, by whom he had no issue, built baths and bridges, and wrought the most extraordinary miracles. So passed an uncounted number of years, and Virgil at length abandoned Naples forever and retired to Rome.

Italian Witchcraft

In his Aradia, or the Gospel of the Witches of Italy (1899) folklorist Charles Godfrey Leland gives a valuable account of the life and practice of the Italian strega, or witch, as described by a Florentine hereditary witch named Maddalena. He states:

"In most cases she comes of a family in which her calling or art has been practiced for many generations. I have no doubt that there are instances in which the ancestry remounts to medieval, Roman, or it may be Etruscan times. The result has naturally been the accumulation in such families of much tradition. But in Northern Italy, as its literature indicates, though there has been some slight gathering of fairy tales and popular superstitions by scholars, there has never existed the least interest as regarded the strange lore of the witches, nor any suspicion that it embraced an incredible quantity of old Roman minor myths and legends, such as Ovid has recorded, but of which much escaped him and all other Latin Writers. . .Even yet there are old people in the Romagna of the North who know the Etruscan names of the Twelve Gods, and invocations to Bacchus, Jupiter, and Venus, Mercury, and the Lares or ancestral spirits, and in the cities are women who prepare strange amulets, over which they mutter spells, all known in the old Roman time and who can astonish even the learned by their legends of Latin gods, mingled with lore which may be found in Cato or Theocritus. With one of these I became intimately acquainted in 1886, and have ever since employed her specially to collect among her sisters of the hidden spell in many places all the traditions of the olden times known to them. It is true that I have drawn from other sources but this woman by long practice has perfectly learned what few understand, or just what I want, and how to extract it from those of her kind.

"Among other strange relics, she succeeded, after many years, in obtaining the following 'Gospel,' which I have in her handwriting. A full account of its nature with many details will be found in an Appendix. I do not know definitely whether my informant derived a part of these traditions from written sources or oral narration, but believe it was chiefly the latter. . .

"For brief explanation I may say that witchcraft is known to its votaries as la vecchia religione, or the old religion, of which Diana is the Goddess, her daughter Aradia (or Herodias) the female Messiah, and that this little work sets forth how the latter was born, came down to earth, established witches and witchcraft, and then returned to heaven. With it are given the ceremonies and invocations or incantations to be addressed to Diana and Aradia, the exorcism of Cain, and the spells of the holy-stone, rue, and verbena, constituting, as the text declares, the regular church service, so to speak, which is to be chanted or pronounced at the witch meetings. There are also included the very curious incantations or benedictions of the honey, meal, and salt, or cakes of the witch-supper, which is curiously classical, and evidently a relic of the Roman Mysteries.''

Briefly, in discussing the ritual of the Italian witches, Leland reports that at the Sabbath they take meal and salt, honey and water, and say a conjuration over these, one to the meal, one to the salt, one to Cain, and one to Diana, the moon goddess. They then sit down naked to supper, men and women, and after the feast is over they dance, sing, and make love in the darkness, quite in the manner of the medieval Sabbath of the sorcerers. Many charms are given connected with stones, especially if these have holes in them and are found by accident. A lemon stuck full of pins we are told is a good omen. Love spells fill a large space in the little work, which for the rest recounts several myths of Diana and Endymion in corrupted form.

Leland's interesting book was one of the major sources used by Gerald B. Gardner in his reconstruction of witchcraft in the 1940s and served as a model for the Book of Shadows, which modern witches claim as a traditional descent in their covens.

Spiritualism

An early indication of the rise and spread of Spiritualism in Italy was surveyed in an article published in Civitta Catholica, the well-known Roman organ entitled ''Modern Necromancy.'' It concluded,

''1st. Some of the phenomena may be attributed to imposture, hallucinations, and exaggerations in the reports of those who describe it, but there is a foundation of reality in the general sum of the reports which cannot have originated in pure invention or be wholly discredited without ignoring the value of universal testimony.

''2nd. The bulk of the theories offered in explanation of the proven facts, only cover a certain percentage of those facts, but utterly fail to account for the balance.

''3rd. Allowing for all that can be filtered away on mere human hypotheses, there are still a large class of phenomena appealing to every sense which cannot be accounted for by any known natural laws, and which seem to manifest the action of intelligent beings.''

The famous medium D. D. Home visited the principal cities of Italy in 1852 and was so active in his propaganda that numerous circles were formed after his departure. Violent journalistic controversies arose out of the foundation of these societies, with the result that public interest was so aroused that it could only be satisfied with the publication of a paper on the subject. It was titled Il amore del Vero, issued from Geneva and edited by Pietro Suth and B. E. Manieri. In this journal accounts of the spiritual movements in the various countries of Europe, and the United States were published although the church and press leveled anathemas against the journal.

In the spring of 1863, a society was founded at Palermo named Il Societa Spiritual di Palermo, which had for its president J. V. Paleolozo, and such members as Paolo Morelle, professor of Latin and philosophy.

It was about the autumn of 1864 that lectures were first given on Spiritualist subjects in Italy. They were started in Leghorn and Messina, and although of a very mixed character and often partaking largely of the lecturer's peculiar idiosyncrasies on religious subjects, they served to draw attention to the upheaval of thought going on in all directions, in connection with the revelations from the spirit world.

In the year 1870, over a hundred different societies were formed, with varying success, in different parts of Italy. Two of the most prominent flourishing at that date were conducted in Naples, and according to the French journal Revue Spirite, represented the two opposing schools that have prevailed in Spiritualism, namely, those who accepted the idea of reincarnation—associated with the Spiritism of Allan Kardec from France—and those who looked for the continued upward progress of the soul, known in America and England merely as ''Spiritualists.''

About 1868, the cause of Spiritualism was energized (at least in the higher strata of Italian society) by the visit of Samuel Guppy and his wife Agnes Guppy-Volckman to Naples, where they took up residence for two or three years. Guppy-Volckman was known throughout Europe for her physical mediumship. Drawing upon Guppy's wealth and social standing, she was able to place her performance at the command of the distinguished visitors who crowded his salons. It soon became a matter of notoriety that the most exalted individuals in the land, including King Victor Emmanuel and many of his nearest friends and counselors, had become convinced of the truth of the phenomena exhibited through her mediumship.

About the year 1863 Spiritualism began to enjoy the advantage of positive representation in the columns of a new paper named the Annali dello Spiritismo (Annals of Spiritualism). This journal was published in Turin by Niceforo Filalete. The columns of the Annali recorded that a Venetian Society of Spiritualists named ''Atea'' elected General Giuseppe Garibaldi their honorary president, and received the following reply by telegraph from the distinguished hero, the liberator of Italy,

''I gratefully accept the presidency of the Society Atea. Caprera, 23rd September.''

The same issue of the Annali contained a verbatim report of a ''grand discourse, given at Florence, by a distinguished literary gentleman, Signor Sebastiano Fenzi, in which the listeners were considerably astonished by a rehearsal of the many illustrious names of those who openly avowed their faith in Spiritualism.''

The years 1863–64 appear to have been rich in Spiritualist efforts. Besides a large number of minor associations, (their existence was recorded from time to time in the early numbers of the Annali and Revue Spirite), about this time the Magnetic Society of Florence was formed. It would continue for many years to exert a marked influence in promoting the study of occult forces and phenomena. Seymour Kirkup, well known to the early initiators of Spiritualism, resided in Florence and contributed many records of spiritual phenomena to the London Spiritual Magazine. Nearly ten years after the establishment of the Magnetic Society of Florence, Baron Guitern de Bozzi, an eminent occultist, founded the Pneumatological Psychological Academy of Florence, but it was discontinued after his death.

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

In Italy, the divisions between Spiritualism and psychical research have tended to be blurred. Many eminent psychical researchers were sympathetic to Spiritualism if not actually endorsing its beliefs. One of the most famous investigators was the psychiatrist and criminologist Cesare Lombroso (1836–1909) who was convinced by the evidence for survival after death. Marco Tullio Falcomer, who conducted experiments with the famous physical medium Florence Cook, was a Spiritualist, as was also Enrico Morselli (1852–1929) who had investigated the phenomena of the medium Eusapia Palladino (1854–1918).

Among other Italian psychical researchers were Giovanni Batista Ermacora (1869–98), Enrico Imoda (who investigated the phenomena of Linda Gazzera), P. B. Bianchi, Angelo Brofferio (who became a Spiritualist), Ercole Chiaia, Philippe Bottazzi, Augusto Tamburini, and Rocco Santoliquido (1854–1930), who played a part in the founding of the Institut Métapsychique in Paris. Later researchers were Ernesto Bozzano (1862–1943), Giovanni Pioli of Milan, Lidio Cipriani of the University of Naples, William McKenzie of Genoa, Count Cesar Baudi De Vesme (1862–1938), Ferdinando Cazzamalli of Como, Fabio Vitali, G. C. Trabacchi, and Sante de Sanctis.

In 1901, the Società di Studi Psichici (Society of Psychic Studies) was founded in Milan. It was responsible for investigations of the mediums Augustus Politi, Eusapia Palladino and Lucia Sordi.

In 1937, the Società Italiana di Metapsichica (Italian Society of Metapsychics) was founded in Rome, in memory of Charles Richet, the noted French psychical researcher. In 1946, one group from the society headed by Ferdinando Cazzamalli formed the Association di Metapsichica, in Milan; at a later date the name was changed to Società Italiana di Parapsicologia, replacing the older term ''metapsychics'' with ''parapsychology.'' It is currently headed by Emilio Servadio, at Via de Montecatini 7, 00186 Rome. The quarterly journal Metapsichica Rivista Italiana di Parapsicologia is the official organ of the Associazione Italiana Scientifica di Metapsichica headquartered at Via 5 Vittore, 19-20123 Milano.

Another active organization is the Centro Studi Parapsicologici (Center for Parapsychological Studies) established in Bologna in 1948, directed by Piero Cassoli. Other organizations include the Facoltà di Scienze Psichiche e Psicologiche (Faculty of Psychic and Psychological Sciences) of Academia Tiberina, established in 1960 (which may be reached at Via del Vantaggio 22, Rome), the Centro Italiano di Studi Metapsichici (Italian Center of Metapsychic Studies) founded in Pavia in 1968, which has conducted studies in psychic healing (and may be reached at Via Calascione 5/A, Naples), and the Centro Studi Parapsicologici de Bologna, Via Tamagno 2, Bologna.

Among periodicals the oldest is Luce e Ombre (Light and Shadow) founded in 1900 in Rome, edited from January 1932 from Milan under the title Ricerca Psichica. The journal Uomini e Idee (Men and Ideas) was launched in Naples in 1959 and in 1965 it was replaced by Informazioni di Parapsicologia (Parapsychology News) as a publication of the Centro Italiano di Parapsicologia. Since then, Luce e Ombra has been published quarterly by dell'Associazione Archivio di Documentazione Storica della Ricerca Psichica. Address: Bozzano-De Boni, Via Orfeo, 15, 40214 Bologna. The Fondazione Biblioteca Bozzano-DeBoni, with the Bozzano-DeBoni Library Foundation, is located at Via Guglielmo Marconi, 8-40122 Bologna. The website for the foundation is: http://www2.comune.bologna.it/fbibbdb/siti.htm. The foundation and research library is devoted primarily to psychical research and parapsychology, and was initially collected by Ernesto Bozzano (1862–1943) and Gastone De Boni (1908–1986) who were both recognized scholars in paranormal phenomenonology. It is a nonprofit association. DeBoni was responsible for reviving Luce e Ombra following the interruption of the war years from 1940 to 1946. In 2000, the publication celebrated the hundredth anniversary, and four volumes containing several of the articles throughout the hundred years were being published. A congress was held on June 3, 2000 also in celebration of this long pursuit.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Guiley, Rosemary Ellen. Harper's Encyclopedia of Mystical & Parranormal Experience. San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1991.

The Wonderful History of Virgilius The Sorcerer of Rome. London: Daure Nutt, 1893.

Iubdan

In Ultonian romance (the Ossianic stories of Ireland), the king of the Wee Folk. One day he boasted of the might of his strong man Glower, who could hew down a thistle at one blow. His bard Eisirt retorted that beyond the sea there existed a race of giants, any one of whom could annihilate a whole battalion of the Wee Folk. Challenged to prove his words, Eisirt returned with Creda, King Fergus's dwarf and bard. He then dared Iubdan to go to Fergus's palace and taste the king's porridge.

Iubdan and Bebo, his queen, arrived at the palace at midnight, but while trying to get at the porridge so he could taste it and be gone before daybreak, Iubdan fell in. He was found in the pot the next morning by the scullions, and he and Bebo were taken before Fergus, who after a while released them in exchange for a pair of water shoes, which by wearing a man could go over or under water as freely as on land.

Ivan III (1440–1505)

Ivan, son of Vasily Vasilievich, grand duke of Moscow, became grand duke of Muscovy in the fifteenth century. According to legend, when he was at the point of death, he fell into terrible swoons, during which his soul made laborious journeys. In the first he was tormented for having kept innocent prisoners in his dungeons; in the second he was tortured further for having ground the people under heavy tasks; during the third voyage he died, but his body disappeared mysteriously before he could be buried, and it was thought that the devil had taken him.

Ivanova, Barbara (1917–)

Soviet psychic healer and parapsychologist. A former foreign-language college instructor, she was also an educator, lecturer, and author. She became known throughout the USSR for her healing skills and attended many prominent officials. Her techniques included conventional healing through holding her hands close to the patient, but she also experimented with absent healing, using telephone conversations as a contact with the subject. During the conversation Ivanova attempted to visualize the patient and the illness and form a mental healing process. During such conversations she believed she visualized former incarnations of the subject.

Ivanova became the first teacher of psychic healing in the USSR. She both conducted experiments in telepathy and allowed herself to be studied as a subject. She was an honorary member of many parapsychological societies and journals (including the editorial advisory board of Psi Research). She wrote on a broad range of subjects, and her articles on parapsychology, healing, human potential, and the interconnectedness in living nature have appeared in many languages, including English, German, French, Italian, Spanish, Polish, and Yiddish.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Ivanova, Barbara. The Golden Chalice. Edited by M. Mir and L. Vilenskaya. San Francisco: H. S. Dakin, 1986.

———. ''Reincarnation and Healing.'' Psi Research 5, 1,2 (March/June 1986).

———. ''Some Experiments on Healing Processes.'' International Journal of Paraphysics 19, 5,6 (1985).

Ivunches

Chilean familiars. (See South America)

IYI See Integral Yoga International

Iynx

A Chaldean symbol of universal being, the name of which means ''power of transmission.'' It was reproduced as a living sphere or winged globe and was said to be projected forth by divine mind on the plane of reality, to be followed by two other beings, called ''paternal'' and ''ineffable,'' and finally by hosts of iynxs of a subordinate character, called ''free intelligences.''

The iynx was described by occultist Éliphas Lévi as ''corresponding. . . to the Hebrew Yod or to that unique letter from which all other letters were formed,'' and thus related to the Jewish mysticism of the Sepher Yetsirah or Book of Creation, a primary text of the Kabbalah. For reference to Chaldean concepts, see the complex Gnostic emanations discussed by G. R. S. Mead.

J

J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies

Foremost organization investigating unidentified flying objects. CUFOS was founded as the Center for UFO Studies in 1973 by J. Allen Hynek, a professor of astronomy at Northwestern University, and Sherman J. Larsen, an insurance salesman who had been active in the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP). Through the 1960s Hynek was the chief consultant for the air force UFO project known as Blue Book, but later turned his attention to nurturing scholarly enthusiasm for the study of strange flying objects.

CUFOS grew through the 1970s and had its peak years toward the end of the decade. Allan Hendry joined the staff in 1976 as a full-time investigator. A newsletter grew into a periodical, the International UFO Reporter. The work of the center was hindered, however, by methodological problems, and as Hendry concluded in 1979 in a massive report on his ongoing research, its investigators lacked the tools to carry out their task. However, CUFOS carried on in an attempt to generate scholarly interest, maintain public support, and garner financial resources.

The center underwent substantial change in the mid-1980s. Hynek moved to Phoenix, Arizona, and then died in 1986. The center moved to Glendale, Arizona, and then to Chicago, Illinois. Mark Rodeghier succeeded to leadership of the organization, which took a new name in honor of its founder. The organization currently publishes the International UFO Reporter, a substantial magazine dealing with both recent sightings and the more theoretical issues surrounding UFOs; occasional monographs; and the scholarly Journal of UFO Studies. Address: 2457 W. Peterson Ave., Chicago, IL 60659. Website: http://www.cufos.org/.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s. Vol. 1 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Hendry, Allan. The UFO Handbook: A Guide to Investigating, Evaluating, and Reporting UFO Sightings. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1979.

The J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies. http://www.cufos.org/. March 8, 2000.

Jachin and Boaz

The names of two symbolical pillars of King Solomon's Kabalistic temple. They were believed to explain the mystery of the meaning of life. One was black and the other white, representing the powers of good and evil. It was said that they symbolized the need of "two" in the world. Human progression requires two feet, the worlds gravitate by means of two forces, generation needs two sexes.

The symbolism of the two pillars has been discussed in the book The Garden of Pomegranates, by Rabbi Moses Cordovero, a book on the Kabala first published in Cracow, Poland, in 1591. The two pillars have also become part of the symbolism of Freemasonry and ceremonial magic.

Jachowski, Jan (1891– ?)

Polish publisher who experimented with the divining rod and pendulum and also studied in the field of astrology. He was born on December 13, 1891, at Jaktorowo, Chodziez Poznanskie, Poland. He served as an editor for the publications services of the University of Poznan and was the winner in 1936 of the Silver Wreath of the Polish Academy of Literature.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jacinth

A gemstone, a variety of zircon that was believed to protect the wearer from plague and from lightning, to strengthen the heart, and to bring wealth, honor, prudence, and wisdom. It was recommended by Albertus Magnus as a soporific on account of its coldness and was ordered by Psellus in cases of coughs, ruptures, and melancholy; it was to be drunk in vinegar. Marbodeus described the wonderful properties of three species of jacinth. Pliny and Leonardus also spoke highly of it.

Jacks, L(awrence) P(earsall) (1860–1955)

British author and professor of philosophy who investigated psychical phenomena. He was born on October 9, 1860, at Nottingham, England. He was educated at University School, Nottingham; London University (M.A., 1886); Manchester College; and Harvard. He became a professor of philosophy at Manchester College, Oxford, in 1903, and for many years served as principal (1915–31).

Jacks served as president of the Society for Psychical Research, London (1917–18), and as vice president (1909–55). He was particularly concerned with the relationship of psychical research to philosophy. He also sat with a number of mediums, including Gladys Osborne Leonard, one of the outstanding British trance mediums. After an active life that included writing several books and a number of articles, Jacks died February 17, 1955.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Jacks, L. P. All Men Are Ghosts. London: Williams & Norgate, 1913.

———. The Confessions of an Octogenarian. N.p., 1942.

———. "Dramatic Dreams, an Unexplored Field for Psychical Research." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 17 (1915).

———. Elemental Religion. New York: Harper, 1934.

———. The Inner Sentinel. New York; London: Harper & Brothers, 1930.

———. My American Friends. London: Constable & Co. Ltd, 1933; New York: Macmillian, 1933.

———. My Neighbour the Universe. N.p., 1928.

———. Near the Brink. London: Allen & Unwin, 1955.

———. "Presidential Address: The Theory of Survival in the Light of Its Context." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 29 (1918).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jack the Ripper

Epithet of a brutal murderer in Whitechapel, London's east side. Over a period of some ten weeks during 1888 five prostitutes were murdered and mutilated, apparently by the same psychopath. The victims were Mary Anne Nicholls, Annie Chapman, Elizabeth Stridge, Catharine Eddowes, and Mary Jeannette Kelly. Some commentators have extended the list to seven victims, others to ten. In spite of police vigilance, the murderer was never discovered.

The sensational nature of the crimes (the victims were raped and mutilated) and the fact that they remained unsolved has generated hundreds of books, articles, and stories propounding various theories about the identity of the Ripper. Some of the more bizarre involve the Russian secret police, Masonic conspiracies, or members of the royal family. In their enthusiasm to validate a cherished theory, many otherwise reputable writers falsified evidence. One of the most persistent myths is that the Spiritualist and clairvoyant Robert James Lees had given the police advance knowledge of the crimes and identified the murderer through clairvoyant powers. This continuing story stemmed from a hoax article in the Chicago Sunday Times-Herald (April 28, 1895) and was repeated in London newspapers. One constant theme throughout the speculative volumes, however, is that the murderer was someone with medical knowledge, because of the skillful mutilations.

Among the many books, that by British author Melvin Harris, Jack the Ripper: The Bloody Truth (1987), has particular interest because of the occult connections it draws. Harris advances a convincing case that the Ripper was Dr. Roslyn D'Onston (born Robert Donston Stephenson), a journalist and medical man obsessed with the occult. D'Onston himself wrote articles claiming to know the true identity of Jack the Ripper. He also claimed to know exactly how the crimes were committed and stated that they were part of a black magic ritual. In his writings, D'Onston used the pseudonym Tautriadelta.

One of these articles was published in the April 1896 issue of the journal Borderland, edited by Spiritualist W. T. Stead. In a foreword to the article, Stead writes that the author "prefers to be known by his Hermetic name of Tautriadelta" and also states:

"The writer . . . has been known to me for many years. He is one of the most remarkable persons I ever met. For more than a year I was under the impression that he was the veritable Jack the Ripper, an impression which I believe was shared by the police, who, at least once, had him under arrest; although as he completely satisfied them, they liberated him without bringing him into court."

In the article itself Tautriadelta claims to have studied occultism under the novelist Bulwer Lytton, celebrated for his occult stories, and to have witnessed or taken part in extraordinary occult phenomena in France, Italy, India, and Africa.

D'Onston lived in London's Whitechapel, where the Ripper murders took place, in the same lodginghouse were Theosophist Mabel Collins and her occultist friend Vittoria Cremers lived. Collins became infatuated with D'Onston, but subsequently experienced fear and revulsion around him. She once told Cremers about something D'Onston said to her and showed her, and said "I believe D'Onston is Jack the Ripper." Cremers had noticed a large black box in D'Onston's room, and one day, while the doctor was out, she looked inside the box. She found some books and also some black ties that had dried, dull stains at the back. She thought the stains might be blood.

Later, commenting on a newspaper report that the Ripper would kill again, D'Onston laughed and said, "There will be no more murders. Did I ever tell you that I knew Jack the Ripper?" He went on to describe in detail how the Ripper had carried out the murders, said they were "for a very special reason," and related how he had concealed the organs cut from the victims in the space between his shirt and tie.

The story of the discovery by Cremers is retold in The Confessions of Aleister Crowley (1969) without naming D'Onston. Aleister Crowley also writes:

"At this time London was agog with the exploits of Jack the Ripper. One theory of the motive of the murderer was that he was performing an Operation to obtain the Supreme Black Magical Power. The seven women had to be killed so that their seven bodies formed a 'Calvary cross of seven points' with its head to the west."

All these references are detailed by Melvin Harris in his book, and he also cites an unsigned article by D'Onston that reinforces Crowley's claim that the murders were a black magic operation. The article is titled "Who Is the Whitechapel Demon? (By One Who Thinks He Knows)" and propounds in detail a black magic theory about the murders, stemming from occultist Éliphas Lévi's work Le Dogme et Rituel de la Haute Magic. D'Onston's precise knowledge of the methods and intentions of the murders, impudently combined with false clues while posing as an investigator of the crimes, makes a strong case that he was Jack the Ripper, as W. T. Stead, Vittoria Cremers, and Mabel Collins suspected.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. The Confessions of Aleister Crowley. Edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. New York: Hill & Wang, 1969.

Tautriadelta [Roslyn D'Onston]. "A Modern Magician: An Autobiography. By a Pupil of Lord Lytton." Borderland 3, no. 2 (April 1896).

Jacob, Auguste Henri ("Jacob the Zouave") (1828–1913)

Famous French spiritual healer whose curative and clairvoyant powers became known in 1867 while he was still attached to his French regiment. He was born on March 6, 1828. As a young man Jacob volunteered to serve in the Seventh Hussars (the Zouaves). He became interested in Spiritualism as it began to spread throughout Europe in the mid-nineteenth century. His healing powers probably began while he was serving in the Crimea and Algeria, but his fame spread when he was stationed in central France. He was soon discharged from the army, since the crowds that assembled daily around his tent made army discipline impossible. After moving to Versailles, Jacob visited Paris to effect his cures, and at a house in the Rue de la Roquette he was besieged by crowds of the crippled and diseased.

He began a career of healing mediumship, claiming that he saw spirits ministering to the patients who called upon him and that they prescribed healing. He not only refused to charge for his healing, but also declined freewill offerings, even when it was requested that they be devoted to healing the poor. His father, however, became a self-appointed manager, standing at the door selling Jacob's photograph for one franc to all who would buy.

Jacob's method of healing often resembled that of modern evangelists—a forceful command to be well. In other cases he simply stared at the patient. Many spectacular cures were reported. He was not always successful, and in some cases he simply dismissed the sufferer with the remark, "I can do nothing for your disease.'' In his later years he recommended natural health treatment and condemned the use of alcohol. He ascribed his own healing powers to ''the spirits of white magnetism.'' (See also Animal Magnetism)

Sources:

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Nineteenth Century Miracles. New York: W. Britten, 1884.

Jacob, August Henri. L'Hygiène naturelle, ou l'art de consevèr sa santé et de se guérir soi-même. Paris, 1868.

———. Les Pensées du Zouave Jacob. Paris, 1868.

———. Poisons et contre-Poisons dévoilés. Paris, 1874.

Jacob, Mr. (''Jacob of Simla'') (ca. 1850–1921)

A reputed wonder-worker of India during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. A rich diamond merchant, Jacob had a reputation for generosity and for working miracles. He was immortalized in literature, serving as the archetype for the main character in the novel Mr. Isaacs (1882), by F. Marion Crawford. In the novel, Isaacs is a disciple of Brahmin initiate Ram Lal, whose mystical powers include appearing and disappearing at will.

Jacob was also the model for ''Lurgan Sahib,'' the mysterious secret agent with hypnotic powers in Rudyard Kipling's great novel Kim (1901). Lurgan, too, is a dealer in precious stones and describes himself as a ''Healer of Pearls.'' He boasts, ''There is no one but me can doctor a sick pearl and re-blue turquoises. I grant you opals—any fool can cure an opal—but for a sick pearl there is only me. Suppose I were to die! Then there would be no one.''

Crawford first met Jacob in a hotel in Simla, India. Jacob invited the novelist to his room, where Crawford was astounded by an Aladdin's cave of wealth and beauty:

''It appeared as if the walls and the ceiling were lined with gold and precious stones. . . . Every available space, nook and cranny was filled with gold and jeweled ornaments, shining weapons or uncouth but resplendent idols. . . . The floor was covered with a rich, soft pile, and low divans were heaped with cushions of deep-tinted silk and gold . . . superbly illuminated Arabic manuscripts. . . . At last I turned, and from contemplating the magnificence and inanimate wealth, I was riveted by the majestic face and expression of the beautiful living creature, who by a turn of his want, or, to speak prosaically, by an invitation to smoke had lifted me out of the humdrum into a land peopled with all the effulgent fantasy and the priceless realities of the magic East.''

After publication of Crawford's novel, wild rumors spread about the reputed magical powers of Jacob, whose operation was assisted by his spirit guide, ''Ram Lal,'' who was said to have died 150 years earlier. An article by a European occultist calling himself ''Tautriadelta'' (pseudonym of Dr. Roslyn D'Onston) a pupil of Lord Lytton) in Borderland (April 1896) recounts miracles performed by Jacob, such as growing bunches of ripe black grapes on a walking stick, thrusting a sword into a man's body without injury, and walking on water. Some time later, interviewed by a member of the Society for Psychical Research, Jacob was quoted as saying that the growing of buds and blossoms on a walking stick was a trick with a prepared stick, and that pushing a sword into the body was only a matter of skill and knowledge, but that his walking on water was achieved by being supported in the air by his spirit guide, who also acted as a kind of ''astral postman,'' delivering messages over vast distances when needed.

This last phenomenon is of particular interest considering that Jacob met Theosophist Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, who later acquired fame for the magical precipitation of ''Mahatma letters'' over a distance. Jacob himself regarded Blavatsky as no more than ''a clever conjurer.''

Jacob's early life was as romantic as his later life was reputed to be. He was born a Turkish or Armenian Jew near Constantinople and sold into slavery at age ten. He was bought by a rich and intelligent pasha who saw that the boy had great abilities and instead of giving him menial tasks educated him in Eastern life, literature, philosophy, and occultism. On the death of his patron Jacob made a pilgrimage to Mecca, then took passage to Bombay, landing without money or friends. Through his knowledge of Arabic he soon obtained a position as scribe to a nobleman at the Nizam's court in Hyderabad. There he started dealing in precious stones, later moving to Delhi, then to Simla, where he became one of the most famous jewelers of the time. Maharajahs from all over India engaged his services and he became a rich man, furnishing his house in Oriental splendor with priceless and lavish possessions. At home he received Indian princes, viceroys, governors, and distinguished members of the civil and military services. Lord Lytton, then viceroy, visited him and remained for several days. In spite of his lavish surroundings, Jacob lived a simple vegetarian life, occasionally entertaining guests with occult marvels that became the gossip of Simla.

The story of his eventual downfall is equally remarkable. He had incurred the displeasure of a prime minister at Hyderabad through giving information about the brutal execution of a Hindu by the minister's brother. Knowing that the Imperial Diamond was being sold in England, Jacob offered to buy it for the nizam of Hyderabad, who agreed to pay him 46 lakhs of rupees (more than $600,000). Jacob knew that he could buy it for half that sum and saw the chance of a good bargain. The nizam paid him 20 lakhs of rupees on account. After the diamond arrived in India and was paid for by Jacob, the prime minister urged the government of India to prevent the sale, knowing that there was an official embargo on princes spending such large sums. The sale was vetoed and Jacob was left with the diamond and less than half the sum promised by the nizam. Next, the prime minister urged the nizam to sue Jacob for return of the money already paid. The trial lasted 57 days; after returning the nizam's deposit and paying legal costs, Jacob was ruined. In desperation he offered the diamond to the nizam at any price from one rupee upward and the nizam agreed to pay 17 lakhs of rupees. Jacob never received any money after handing over the diamond, however, and was penniless. He retired to Bombay, living in penury and later becoming blind.

Sources:

Fodor, Nandor. The Haunted Mind. New York: Garrett Publications, 1959.

Heath, Frederick W. ''The Story of Mr. Isaacs' Life.'' Occult Review (October 1912).

Russell, Edmund. '''Mr. Isaacs' of Simla.'' Occult Review (March 1917).

Jacobi, Jolande Szekacs (Mrs. Andrew Jacobi) (1890– ?)

Psychologist and psychotherapist who wrote on parapsychology in the context of Jungian psychology. Jacobi was born on March 25, 1890, at Budapest, Hungary, and later studied at the University of Vienna (Ph.D. psychology, 1938). She trained as a psychotherapist with C. G. Jung from 1938 to 1943. In 1947 she joined the staff as a lecturer for the Institute for Applied Psychology, University of Zürich, and the C. G. Jung Institute. She published a number of articles on depth psychology, Jungian psychology, and parapsychology, and she lectured on such topics throughout Europe. She also contributed a chapter, ''Dream of the Oracle,'' to the volume honoring Jung's eightieth birthday.

Sources:

Jacobi, Jolande S. Case Studies in Counselling and Psychotherapy. N.p., 1959.

———. Komplex, Archetypus, Symbol in der Psychologie von C. G. Jung. Zürich: Rascher, 1957; London: Routledge & Paul, 1959.
———. Paracelsus. Wien: P. Neff, 1951.
———. Die Psychologie von C. G. Jung. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1943.
———. Vom Bilderreich der Seele. Zürich: Rascher, 1940.
———. The Way of Individuation. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1967.
Jacobi, Jolande S. ed. Man and His Symbols. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.
Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jacob's Ladder

According to the Kabala, Jacob's Ladder, which was disclosed to Jacob in a vision, was a metaphorical representation of the powers of alchemy operating through visible nature. The ladder was a ''rainbow,'' or prismatic staircase, between heaven and earth. Jacob's dream symbolizes a theory of the hermetic creation. There were said to be only two original colors, red and blue, representing spirit and matter. Orange is red mixing with the yellow light of the sun; yellow is the radiance of the sun itself; green is blue and yellow; indigo is blue tinctured with red; and violet is produced by the mingling of red and blue. The sun is alchemic gold, and the moon is alchemic silver. It was believed that all earthly creations were produced through the interaction of these two potent ruling spirits.

Jacob's Ladder is also part of the symbolism of the high grades of Freemasonry.

Jade

A term covering minerals of varied color and chemical composition, credited with occult properties. Jade may be jadeite, nephrite, or chloromelanite, with a range of colors—black, brown, red, lavender, blue, green, yellow, or white. The mineral is found mainly in New Zealand, Mexico, Central America, and China. In prehistoric times jade was used for utensils and weapons, but in Mexico, Egypt, and China it was employed in burial rites. In China, Burma, and India, jade is used for amulets.

Jade is chiefly associated with China, where it has been carved into ornaments for thousands of years. The blue variety of jade was traditionally associated with the heavens, and Chinese emperors were said to have made contact with heaven through a disk of white jade. There was a Chinese superstition that rubbing a piece of jade in the hand would bring good fortune to any decision or business venture. The Chinese word for jade is yü, indicating beauty, nobility, and purity. Because of its yang (masculine, hot, active) qualities, jade is believed to prolong life. It is taken medicinally in water or wine, and is believed to protect against heat and cold, hunger and thirst. Powdered jade is taken to strengthen the heart, lungs, and voice. It is also considered an indicator of health and fortune, becoming dull and lusterless when its owner experiences ill health or misfortune.

In Burma, Tibet, and India, jade is considered a cure for heart trouble and a means of deflecting lightning. It has the property of bringing rain, mist, or snow when thrown into water. In Scotland it has been used as a touchstone to cure illness. The carving of jade into beautiful ornaments reached its peak in China, where even a small carving involved skilled and patient work over several months. There is still a large jade market in Hong Kong.

Sources:

Laufer, Berthold, Jade: A Study in Chinese Archeology and Religion. 2nd edition. South Pasadena, Calif.: Perkin, 1946.

Jadian

A wer-tiger or human animal in Malayan superstition. (See Malaysia)

Jadoo

A Hindu term for magic or wonder-working, usually applied to traveling conjurers, or jadoo-wallahs. The term was popularized in the United States by writer-magician John A. Keel in his book Jadoo (1958). Keel traveled through India, where his skill as an amateur magician earned him the confidence of Indian conjurers, who disclosed their own tricks, including a version of the famous Indian rope trick. Most of the present-day jadoo is skillful conjuring, but this does not preclude the possibility of genuine paranormal versions of the same wonders.

Sources:

Keel, John A. Jadoo. London, 1958.

Jaegers, Beverly (1935–)

Beverly Jaegers, writer and psychic, was born on September 1, 1935, in St. Louis, Missouri, where she grew up. She attended St. John's University, from which she earned both her bachelor's and master's degrees. She began writing in her high school years, her first substantive product being a vampire novel never published. Her first published work was a poem she sold to a newspaper. She has subsequently authored more than 20 books, most on topics related to her interest in psychic experiences, but she has also written a cookbook and a volume based upon her collection of historic fountain pens and inkwells.

Her interest in the psychic world emerged in the early 1960s. Unlike many psychics, she did not profess any childhood psychic talents that spontaneously emerged. Rather, she believes that psychic abilities can be learned and that she gained her abilities through study and hard work. She also believes that they can be used in everyday life on quite ordinary concerns. In 1962–63, she learned remote viewing using methods developed in the Soviet Union and soon afterward began her career as a public psychic. Her beliefs that anyone can learn to use his/her psychic abilities became the basis of her classes, which she began to teach in 1968 in the St. Louis suburb of University City. She subsequently became a popular teacher and lecturer and has made a number of media appearances.

Besides her work as a psychic reader, Jaegers has gained notoriety for her work in the stock markets and in crime detection. She has professed an ability to predict changes in the market and has had a variety of successes advising investors. On several occasions she has proved more correct than professional market analysts at predicting future directions. Jaegers also organized a group of her students into the US Psi Squad that has worked internationally assisting police with difficult criminal cases. She has persisted in the defense of her work in this area in spite of skeptical attacks upon its efficacy.

For many years, Jaegers has operated through Aries Productions, a company she founded and headed as president from 1976 to 1984.

Sources:

Jaegers, Beverly. Beyond Palmistry: The Art and Science of Modern Hand Analysis. New York: Berkley Books, 1992.
———. The Human Aura: How I Teach My Students to See It. Sappington, Mo.: Aries Productions, 1985.
———. The Magic Power of Healing: Learn to Heal Yourself. Sappington, Mo.: Aries Productions, 1979.
———. The Psychic Paradigm. New York: Berkley Books, 1998.
———. Psychometry: The Science of Touch. Sappington, Mo.: Aries Productions, 1985.

Jaffé, Aniela (1903–)

Jungian psychologist who wrote on parapsychology. Jaffé was born on February 20, 1903, in Berlin, Germany. After World War II she became the secretary at the C. G. Jung Institute, Zürich (1947–55), and then personal secretary to C. G. Jung (1955–61). She later recorded and edited the reminiscences of Jung, published as Memories, Dreams, Reflections (1963). In addition to her various important papers on psychology, she wrote widely on parapsychology, particularly on connections between psi phenomena and the unconscious, and on the psychological interpretation of paranormal phenomena.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Jaffé, Aniela. Apparitions and Precognition: A Study from the Point of View of C. G. Jung's Analytical Psychology. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

———. From the Life and Work of C. G. Jung. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

———. The Myth of Meaning. New York: Putnam, 1971.

———. "The Psychic World of C. G. Jung." Tomorrow (spring 1961).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jahagirdar, Keshav Tatacharya (1914–)

Indian professor of philosophy and psychology who studied parapsychological phenomena. He was born on April 16, 1914, at Agarkhed, Mysore, India. He studied at Allahabad University, Uttar Pradesh (M.A., 1941) and then was awarded a research scholarship in the philosophy department at Allahabad University (1941–44). He became a professor of philosophy at Nagpur University (1944–46) and a professor and head of the Departments of Psychology and Philosophy at M.T.B. College, Surat, Bombay (1946–54). In 1954 he began a long tenure as professor and head of the Departments of Psychology and Philosophy at D. & H. National College, Bombay.

Jahagirdar studied mediumship, psychokinesis, and clairvoyance, and from his studies he wrote many papers. He became a charter member and general secretary of the Society for Psychical Research, Bombay, in 1956.

Sources:

Jahagirdar, Keshav Tatacharya, and Edwin C. May. "From Where Does the Kum-Kum Come? A Materialization Attempt." In Research in Parapsychology 1975, edited by J. D. Morris, W. G. Roll, and R. L. Morris. New York: Parapsychological Association, 1976.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jahn, Robert G(eorge) (1930–)

Engineering professor and rocket propulsion specialist at Princeton University. Born on April 1, 1930. Jahn branched out into investigation, under strict laboratory conditions, of micro-PK effects in parapsychology. Following publication of his parapsychological studies, he was demoted from the post of dean of the engineering faculty at Princeton to an associate professorship. However, his studies are widely respected by parapsychologists for their scope and rigor. He continued experimenting at the Princeton Engineering Anomalies Research Laboratory, funded by the McDonnell Foundation and the Petzer Institute.

Jahn's experiments, conducted over 14 years, during which period he devised increasingly sophisticated safeguards against charges of possible error or fraud, are based on a random event generator featuring the white noise emitted by an electrical diode. The noise produced is sampled a thousand times a second to ascertain whether it is in a positive or negative value phase, the probability being roughly equal, even making allowance for occasional significant deviations, which can also be calculated. The setup amounts to a kind of electrical "heads or tails" choice. The subject sits in front of the generator and attempts to mentally effect a positive or negative registration, and the result is charted on a computer screen.

In later macro-PK experiments, Jahn created a random mechanical cascade, resembling a pinball machine, in which 9,000 polystyrene balls drop through a grid of nylon pegs, bouncing about to collect in time at the bottom. The balls should normally end up with a classic Gaussian (normal), bell-shaped distribution. Jahn's experiments show that PK subjects tend to produce slight deviations to one side.

One remarkable recent development is Jahn's experiments with subjects attempting to influence his devices from as far away as Kenya, New Zealand, England, and Russia, sitting for an hour at an agreed time and attempting to alter output according to a prearranged pattern. Distance does not appear to affect the results.

Jahn has also attempted to assist other experimenters by creating inexpensive solid-state versions of his random event generators that can be used to replicate his findings.

Jahoda, Gustav (1920–)

Lecturer in social psychology who wrote on parapsychological topics. He was born on October 11, 1920, in Vienna, Austria. He took all of his degrees at London University, England (B.S., 1945; M.S., 1948; Ph.D., 1952). After graduation Jahoda taught for four years at the University College of Ghana (Gold Coast), then became a senior lecturer in social psychology at Glasgow University, Scotland. In addition to his various papers on psychological, anthropological, and sociological subjects, Jahoda wrote on the supernatural beliefs of West Africans. His article "Emotional Stress, Mental Illness and Social Change" (International Journal of Social Psychiatry) describes West African healers; his "Aspects of Westernization" (British Journal of Sociology) analyzes West African belief in the paranormal.

Sources:

Jahoda, Gustav. The Psychology of Superstition. New York: J. Aronson, 1974.

———. White Man: A Study of the Attitudes of Africans to Europeans Before Independence. London; New York: Oxford University Press, 1961.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

James, T. P. (ca. 1874)

Automatic writing medium of Brattleboro, Vermont, who claimed the spirit of Charles Dickens led him to complete and publish Dickens's unfinished novel The Mystery of Edwin Drood.

James, William (1842–1910)

Professor of psychology at Harvard University and one of the founders of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR). James was born in New York City on January 11, 1842, and obtained his M.D. in 1870 from Harvard Medical School. In 1872 he was appointed instructor in anatomy and physiology at Harvard College. He went on to study psychology and hygiene and in 1890 published his famous work The Principles of Psychology. In 1897 James became professor of philosophy at Harvard and lectured at universities in the United States and Britain. He developed the doctrine of pragmatism, and one of his most important philosophical books is The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), which has been an influential work in the attempt to reconcile science and religion.

The first case that piqued James's interest in psychic phenomena is reported in the Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 1, part 2, pp. 221–31). It is the case of a drowned girl whose body was seen by a Mrs. Titus of Lebanon, New Hampshire, in a dream. The girl's head was under the timber trussing of a bridge at Enfield. Divers had searched for the girl's body in vain, but following Titus's vision they found it.

The discovery of Leonora Piper's mediumship for the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) was attributed to James. His mother-in-law, led by curiosity, paid a visit to Piper in 1885. She returned with a perplexing story. Seeking a simple explanation for the supernatural nature of the facts related to him, James took a rationalist view. Then a few days later, with his wife, he went to get a direct personal impression. The Jameses arrived unannounced, and they were careful not to make any reference to a relative who had preceded them. James later noted:

"My impression after this first visit was that Mrs. P. was either possessed of supernormal powers or knew the members of my wife's family by sight and had by some lucky coincidence become acquainted with such a multitude of their domestic circumstances as to produce the startling impression which she did. My later knowledge of her sittings and personal acquaintance with her has led me to absolutely reject the latter explanation, and to believe that she has supernormal powers."

For 18 months after his first experiments, James was virtually in charge of all arrangements for Piper's séances. When, because of other duties, he dropped his inquiries for a period of two years, he wrote to the SPR (London) and induced them to engage Piper for experiments. "The result," he wrote of his personal investigations, "is to make me feel as absolutely certain as I am of any personal fact in the world that she knows things in her trances which she cannot possibly have heard in her waking state." He admitted there was a strong case in favor of survival when the following message, obtained while a Ms. Robbins had a sitting with Piper, was submitted to him: "There is a person named Child, who has suddenly come and sends his love to William and to his own wife who is living. He says L . . ." Neither Robbins nor Piper knew Child, who was an intimate friend of James and whose Christian name began with L.

In the autumn of 1899 Piper visited James at his country house in New Hampshire. There he came to know her personally better than ever before. "It was in great measure," wrote Alta L. Piper in her biography of the medium, "due to his sympathetic encouragement and understanding of the many difficulties, with which she found herself confronted in the early days of her career, that my mother was able to adhere unfalteringly to the onerous course which she had set herself to follow."

In an often quoted lecture in 1890 James declared:

"To upset the conclusion that all crows are black, there is no need to seek demonstration that no crow is black; it is sufficient to produce one white crow; a single one is sufficient." Since his proclamation of Piper as his "one white crow," the concept of the single "white crow" has become a cliché in psychical research.

James published several papers in the Proceedings of the SPR and an important essay on psychical research in his book The Will to Believe (1902). In a lecture at Oxford in 1909 he announced his firm conviction that "most of the phenomena of psychical research are rooted in reality." Shortly before his death he stated in the American Magazine that, after 25 years of psychical research, he held the spiritistic hypothesis unproven and was inclined "to picture the situation as an interaction between slumbering faculties in the automatist's mind and a cosmic environment of other consciousness of some sort which is able to work upon them."

James served as president of the SPR, London, from 1894 to 1895 and as vice president from 1896 to 1910. His name and prestige and his open espousal of the cause of psychical research were a great benefit to the nascent science. He died at Chocorua, New Hampshire, August 26, 1910. His alleged return after death is discussed in a long chapter in James Hyslop's Contact with the Other World (1919).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

James, William. Essays in Psychical Research. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986.

———. Letters of William James and Theodore Flournoy. Edited by R. C. Le Clair. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1966.

———. William James on Psychical Research. Edited by Gardner Murphy and Robert O. Ballou. New York: Viking Press, 1960.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

James IV of Scotland (1473–1513)

The romantic nature of King James IV of Scotland led him to encourage the study of alchemy and the occult sciences during his reign. Born on March 17, 1473, in Stirling Castle, Scotland, James grew up to be crowned king in 1488 and reigned until his death on September 9, 1513, in Branxton, England. William Dunbar, in his Remonstrance, refers to the patronage that James bestowed upon alchemists and charlatans, and in the treasurer's accounts there are numerous payments for the "quinta essencia" (the "fifth essence," the spiritual goal of alchemy), including wages to the persons employed and utensils of various kinds. Following is a letter from King James to one Master James Inglis:

"We graciously accept your kindness, by which in a letter brought to us you signify that you have beside you certain books learned in the philosophy of the true Alchemy, and that although most worthy men have sought them from you, you have nevertheless with difficulty kept them for our use, because you had heard of our enthusiasm for the art. We bring you thanks . . . and we have sent our familiar, Master James Merchenistoun, to you, that he may see to the transfer hither of those books which you wish us to have; whom receive in good faith in our name. Farewell. From our Palace at Edinburgh."

In addition to promoting alchemy, James was also caught up in the witchcraft hysteria of his day and wrote a book that promoted witch-hunts.

Janet, Pierre (Marie Félix) (1859–1947)

French psychologist and neurologist noted for his research on hysteria and neuroses. Janet was born on May 30, 1859, in Paris. He studied at the École Normale and the École de Medecine, Paris. He became a lecturer on philosophy at the lycées of Chateauroux and The Hague, at the College Rollin, and at the lycées Louis-le-Grand and Condorcet. From 1889 to 1898 he was director of the psychological laboratory of the Saltpêtrière in Paris. He also lectured on psychology at the Sorbonne and became professor of psychology at the Collège de France in 1902. He published many important works on psychology and hysteria. His work with French neurologist J. M. Charcot includes a serious medical and scientific study of the phenomena of hypnotism.

The scope of Janet's influence in the world of psychology is often compared to that of Freud. Janet remained active and continued to lecture until his death on February 23, 1947.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Encyclopedia of World Biography. 2d ed. 18 vols. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

JAPAN

Magical concepts can be found among the Japanese in their traditional religious beliefs and rites and in their conception of nature. According to such beliefs, all forms and objects, both animate and inanimate, possess, equally with man, a soul with good or evil tendencies. These forms and objects, either of their own volition or by evocation, come into close touch with humans either to their advantage or detriment. Much of Japanese folklore and tradition is permeated with a belief in the supernatural.

Shinto Religion and Ancestor-Worship

A prominent feature of the Japanese religion Shintoism is the worship of ancestors, allied to the worship of nature. Each of the main sects of Shintoism includes the veneration of one's ancestors as a cardinal principle. According to that belief, the disembodied spirits acquire the powers of deities and possess supernatural attributes. They become potential for good or evil and exercise their potentialities in the same mundane sphere upon which their interests and affections centered during life. Consequently they become guardian divinities and the object of ceremonies to honor them, to show gratitude for their services while upon earth, and to solicit a continuance of these services beyond the grave.

On this point, Lafcadio Hearn writes:

> An intimate sense of relation between the visible and invisible worlds is the special religious characteristic of Japan among all civilized countries. To Japanese thought the dead are not less real than the living. They take part in the daily life of the people—sharing the humblest sorrows and the humblest joys. They attend the family repasts, watch over the well-being of the household, assist and rejoice in the prosperity of their descendants. They are present at the public pageants, at all the sacred festivals of Shinto, at the military games, and at all the entertainments especially provided for them. And they are universally thought of as finding pleasure in the offerings made to them or the honors conferred upon them.

Every morning, while ancient prayers are repeated, one member of the family places flowers and food-emblems as offerings of pious affection before the shrine to be found in most Japanese homes. On the shrine, beside the symbols of the sun-goddess and the tutelary god of the family, one finds the memorial tablets containing names, ages, and dates of death of members of the household. Stories circulate through the villages of the souls of ancestors taking material form and remaining visible through centuries.

In the month of July three days are set apart for the celebration of the Festival of the Dead. At this time it is thought that the disembodied souls return from the dismal region of the Shades to gaze for a while upon the beauty of their country and to visit their people. On the first morning, new mats are placed upon all altars and on the household shrine, while in the homes, tiny meals are prepared in readiness for the ghostly guests. The streets at night are brilliant with many torches. In front of the houses gaily-colored lanterns are lit in welcome. Those who have recently lost a relative go to the cemeteries to pray, burn incense, and leave offerings of water and flowers set in bamboo vases.

On the third day, the souls of those who are undergoing penance are fed, as are the souls of those who have no friends among the living to care for them. The evening of this day is the time of the ghosts' departure, and for this, thousands of little boats are fashioned and laden with food-offerings and tender messages of farewell. When the night falls, tiny lanterns are lit and hung at the miniature prows and the ghosts are supposed to step aboard. Then the craft are set free upon rivers, lakes, and seas, the water gleaming with the glow of thousands of lights. On this day no sailor dreams of going out to sea—for this one night belongs to the dead. It was believed that if a ship failed to come to port before the sailing of the ghost-fleet the dead arose from the deep and the sailors could hear their mournful whispering, while the white breakers were dead hands clutching the shores, vainly trying to return.

For the Japanese, land and life is sacred. In the Shinto pantheon, deities represent almost everything in heaven and earth, from the mountain of Fujiyama to the household kitchen. When infants were a week old they were taken to the temple and placed under the protection of some god chosen by the parents. In later years the child might choose a patron god for him or herself beside the tutelary one.

In remote parts of Japan traces may be found of an older form of Shinto in which phallic symbols represented life-giving power and therefore were used as a magical exorcism of evil influences, especially that of disease. In this connection a dwarf-god appears who is said to have first taught humankind the art of magic and medicine.

In Shinto there are no idols, their place being taken by shintia, god-bodies, concrete objects in which the divine spirit is supposed to dwell, such as the mirror, jewel, and sword of the sun-goddess, worshiped at the famous Ise shrine. Pilgrims from all parts of Japan made their way to this shrine, acquiring merit and purification thereby. These pilgrims received from the priests objects of talismanic properties called harai that also served as evidence of having been at the holy place. In former days they were recognized as passports.

The term harai signifies to ''drive out'' or ''sweep away,'' and had reference to the purification of the individual from his sins. These objects were in the form of small envelopes or paper boxes, each containing shavings of the wands used by the Ise priests at the festivals held twice a year to purify the nation in general from the consequences of the sins of the preceding six months. The list of sins included witchcraft, wounding, and homicide, these latter being regarded more as uncleanness than as a moral stigma. On the pilgrim's return home, the harai were placed upon the ''god's-shelf.''

On certain festival days the ancient ordeals were practiced. These were three in number: the Kugadachi, in which priests, wrought to ecstatic frenzy by participation in a rhythmic dance, poured boiling water upon their bodies without receiving harm from the process; the Hiwatari, a fire ordeal consisting of walking barefoot over a bed of live coals in which both priests and people alike participated; and Tsurugiwatari, the climbing of a ladder of sword-blades. The tests were regarded as tests of purity of character-purity thought to confer an immunity from hurt in these ordeals. The attendant rites consisted of exorcism of evil spirits by the waving of wands and magical finger-knots, and invocation of the gods who were then believed to be actually present.

Possession by Divinities

In connection with some of the Shinto sects, occult rites were practiced to bring about possession of a selected person by the actual spirits of the gods. Priests and laymen alike developed and practiced this art, undergoing a period of purification by means of various austerities. Prophecy, divination, and the cure of disease were the objects of these rites. The ceremony took place in a temple or ordinary house where the ''gods' shelf'' made the shrine. In the rites, the gohei, Shinto symbols of consecration, were used; the pendant form was utilized for purification and exorcism of evil influences; an upright gohei affixed to a wand signifying the shintai, or god-body, was the central object.

The medium, called nakaza, took his seat in the midst. Next to him in importance was the functionary, the maeza, who presided over the ceremony. It was he who built the magical pyre in a brass bowl and burned in the flames strips of paper inscribed with characters, effigies of disease and trouble. There was a clapping of hands to call attention to the gods, and chants were intoned, accompanied by the shaking of metal-ringed crosiers and the tinkle of pilgrim bells.

After the fire burned out, the bowl was removed and sheets of paper placed in symbolic form, upon which was then put the upright gohei wand. There was further chanting. The medium closed his eyes and clasped his hands, into which the maeza thrust the wand. All awaited the advent of the god, which was indicated by the violent shaking of the wand and convulsive throes on the part of the medium, who was now considered to have become the god. The maeza reverently prostrated himself before the entranced nakaza, and asked the name of the god who had deigned to come. This done and answered, he next offered his petitions, to which the god replied. The ceremony concluded with a prayer and the medium was awakened by beating his back and massaging his limbs out of their cataleptic contraction. These possession rites were also conducted by the pilgrims who ascended the mountain of Ontaké.

Buddhist Sects

Buddhism shared with Shinto the devotions of Japan, enjoining meditation as a means of attaining supernatural knowledge and occult power. It was said that to those who in truth and constancy put into force the doctrines of Buddha the following ten powers would be granted: (1) They know the thoughts of others. (2) Their sight, piercing as that of the celestials, beholds without mist all that happens in the Earth. (3) They know the past and present. (4) They perceive the uninterrupted succession of the ages of the world. (5) Their hearing is so fine that they perceive and can interpret all the harmonies of the three worlds and the ten divisions of the universe. (6) They are not subject to bodily conditions and can assume any appearance at will. (7) They distinguish the shadowing of lucky or unlucky words, whether they are near or far away. (8) They possess the knowledge of all forms, and knowing that form is void, they can assume every sort or form; and knowing that vacancy is form, they can annihilate and render nought all forms. (9) They possess a knowledge of all laws. (10) They possess the perfect science of contemplation.

Methods were known by which it was possible to so radically change the psychological condition of the individual that he or she would be enabled to recognize the character of the opposition between subjective and objective. These two extremes were reconciled in a higher condition of consciousness, a higher form of life, and a more profound and complete activity that concerns the inmost depths of the self. Such beliefs parallel Hindu yoga philosophy, and may have been imported into Japan from India by Buddhist influence during the twelfth and fourteenth centuries C.E. Early Buddhist influence in Japan from the sixth century on was from China.

Zen Buddhism in Japan belongs to the later period of the twelfth century. Zen monasteries were instituted where anyone so inclined could retire for temporary meditation and for the development of special faculties. These were produced by entering a calm mental state, not exactly passive, but in which the attention is not devoted to any one thing, distributed in all directions, producing a sort of void and detachment. The spirit thus obtains entire repose and a satisfaction of the thirst for the ideal. This mystical retirement was sought by politicians and generals, by business, scientific, and professional people, and it was believed that the force that accumulated within them by practicing the Zen was effective even in practical life.

Customs and Occult Lore

Many of the customs of the Japanese have a magical significance. At the Festival of the New Year, extending over three days, it is considered the highest importance to ensure good luck and happiness for the coming year by means of many traditional observances. Houses are thoroughly cleansed materially and spiritually, and evil spirits are expelled by throwing beans and peas out the open slides of the houses. The gateways are decorated with straw ropes made to represent the lucky Chinese numbers of three, five, and seven. Mirror cakes, associated with the sun-goddess, are eaten, as are lobsters, longevity being symbolized by their bent and ancient appearance. The pine-tree branches used for decoration at this time also signify long life.

Divination was performed by various methods: by divining-rods, by the reading of lines and cracks in the shoulder-blade of a deer, and by the classical form taken from the Confucian I Ching or Book of Changes, this involving the use of eight trigrams and sixty-four diagrams.

One method of ''raising spirits'' used by the Japanese, especially by girls who had lost their lovers by death, was to put into a paper lantern a hundred rushlights and repeat an incantation of a hundred lines. One of these rushlights was taken out at the end of each line and the would-be ghost-seer then went out in the dark with one light still burning and blew it out when the ghost ought to appear.

Charms used to be popular, fashioned of all substances and in all forms, such as strips of paper bearing magical inscriptions to avert evil, fragments of temples, carved rice grains representing the gods of luck, sutras (sacred texts) to frighten the demons, and copies of Buddha's footprint. Paper tickets bearing the name of a god were often affixed outside the doors of houses to combat the god of poverty.

Nature and her manifestations are the result of indwelling soul-life. The Japanese mind, imbued with this belief, peopled nature with multiform shapes. There were dragons with lairs in ocean and river that could fly abroad in the air, while from their panting breath came clouds of rain and tempests of lightning. In the mountains and forests were bird-like gnomes who often beset wayfaring men and women and stole away their wits. There were also mountain men, huge hairy monkeys, who helped the woodcutters in return for food, and mountain-women, ogres with bodies grown over with long white hair, who flitted like evil moths in search of human flesh.

Legend also told of the Senrim, hermits of the mountains, who knew all the secrets of magic. They were attended by wise toads and flying tortoises, could conjure magical animals out of gourds, and could project their souls into space.

Supernatural powers were also ascribed to animals. The fox was believed to possess such gifts to an almost limitless extent, for the animal had miraculous vision and hearing, could read the innermost human thoughts, and could be transformed, assuming any shape at will. He loved to delude humans and work destruction, often taking the form of a beautiful and seductive woman whose embrace meant madness and death. This animal was attributed demoniacal possession.

The cat was not regarded with any kindly feeling by the Japanese, because this animal and the serpent were the only creatures who did not weep at Buddha's death. Cats also had the power of bewitchment and possessed vampire proclivities. Yet among sailors the cat was held in high estimation, for it was thought to possess the power of warding off the evil spirits that haunt the sea.

The images of animals were also thought to be endowed with life. There are tales of bronze horses and deer, huge carved dragons, and stone tortoises wandering abroad at night, terrorizing the people and only laid to rest by decapitation. Butterflies were thought to be the wandering souls of the living who might be dreaming or sunk in reverie; white butterflies were the souls of the dead. Fireflies kept evil spirits afar, and an ointment compounded of their delicate bodies defied any poison.

Trees occupied a foremost place in the tradition and legends of Japan. The people regarded them with great affection, and there are stories of men who, seeing a tree they loved withering and dying, committed suicide before it, praying to the gods that their life so given might pass into the tree and give it renewed vigor. The willow is one of the most eerie of trees; the willow-spirit often became a beautiful maiden and wedded a human lover. The pine tree brought good fortune, especially in the matter of happy marriage. It was also a token of longevity. Tree spirits could sometimes be inimical to man and it is recorded that to stay the disturbing wanderings of one it was necessary to cut it down, at which time a stream of blood flowed from the stump.

The element of fire figured large in the Japanese world of marvels. It was worshiped in connection with the rites of the sun-goddess and even the kitchen furnace became the object of a sort of cult. There is the lamp of Buddha. Messages from Hades came to this world in the shape of fire wheels, phantom fires flickered about, flames burnt in the cemeteries, and there were demon-lights, fox-flames, and dragon-torches. From the eyes and mouths of certain birds such as the blue heron, fire darted forth in white flames. Globes of fire, enshrining human faces and forms, sometimes hung like fruit in the branches of the trees.

The dolls of Japanese children were believed to be endowed with life, deriving a soul from the love expended upon them by their human possessors. Some of these dolls were credited with supernatural powers. They could confer maternity upon a childless woman, and they could bring misfortune upon any who ill-treated them. When old and faded these dolls were dedicated to Kojin the many-armed who dwelt in the enokie tree, and they were reverently laid upon his shrine, bodies which once held a tiny soul.

New Religions in Japan

The ancient beliefs and superstitions confronted the tremendous pressures changing Japan in the decades following World War II. Although Shinto and Buddhist religions still predominate, an astonishing number of new religions, most variations of the older religions, have arisen. Many combine original Shinto and/or Buddhist beliefs with elements of Christianity. The defeat of Japan in the war was a crushing blow to national morale and weakened belief in traditional religion, especially Shintoism. Again, the post-war arrival of high technology and the intensification of industrialization created further receptivity to new directions in religious life. Many saw a need for updating and streamlining religious belief and practice. In modern times, hundreds of new religions have been registered officially, two-thirds of them developments of Shinto or Buddhism, with a combined following in the millions.

Among these sects is a group known as Omoto (Teaching of the Great Origin), which originally began in 1892 as a Messianic sect, founded by a farmer woman named Deguchi Nao. The sect was developed by Deguchi Onisaburo and featured the healing of diseases by mystical power. By 1934, it had some 2.5 million followers. Then in 1935, the Japanese government turned on the group and imprisoned the founders and leading followers; their headquarters were dynamited and for all practical purposes the group was destroyed. Not until after World War II was Omoto revived, now under the name of Aizen-en (Garden of Divine Love). Onisaburo died in 1948, but the movement continued to flourish and also gave rise to various splinter sects.

Counted in the unrelated new religions is Tensho Kotai Jingu Kyo, more generally known as Odoru Shukyo (The Dancing Religion) founded by Kitamura Sayo, a farmer's wife regarded by followers as divinely inspired. She is addressed as "Goddess" and her son as "Young God." She is believed to have prophetic insight and power to heal diseases.

Psychical Research & Parapsychology

Although little has been published in Western countries about Japan in relation to paranormal phenomena, Japanese interest in the subject goes back to the last century. As already mentioned, shamanistic techniques and mediumistic faculty were characteristic of some Japanese religions, and from the middle of the nineteenth century on, such phenomena began to be studied objectively. One early investigator was Atsutane Hirat (1776–1843) who was a pioneer in drawing attention to reported cases of reincarnation and poltergeists.

Chikaatsu Honda (1823–1889) studied the techniques of Chinkon, a method of meditation involving revelation through divine possession, becoming mediumistic himself. His techniques were later developed by Deguchi Onisaburo (1871–1948), the leading figure of Omoto. The Chinkon Kishin technique involved spirit communication, and Wasaburo Asano, then a member of Omoto, perceived that this had much in common with European Spiritualism. He subsequently became independent of Omoto and promoted the study of Spiritualism.

A pioneer of psychical research was Enryo Inoue (1858–1919) who founded Fushigi Kenkyukai (the Society for Anomalous Phenomena) at the University of Tokyo in 1888. Another early investigator was Toranosuke Oguma of Meiji University, who studied abnormal psychology, hypnosis, and dreams, and who began to make Western psychical research known in Japan. Oguma published several books on psychical science.

Another pioneer was Tomobichi Fukurai (1869–1952) of the University of Tokyo, whose experiments on clairvoyance and psychic photography (which he called "thoughtography") commenced in 1910. An English translation of his book Clairvoyance and Thoughtography (1913) was published in 1921. His experiments in thoughtography were a remarkable anticipation of the phenomena of Ted Serios in modern times, investigated by Jule Eisenbud. Unfortunately Fukurai's experiments caused dissension at Tokyo University, and he was obliged to resign. He went to the Buddhist University of Kohyassan where he became president of The Psychical Institute of Japan. He also published a second book, Spirit and Mysterious World (1932), in which he attempted to reconcile psychical phenomena with Buddhism. Today, the Fukurai Institute of Psychology that studies paranormal phenomena pursues their work in his name. Fukurai died in 1952.

In 1923, the Japanese Society for Psychic Science was founded at Tokyo, under the presidency of W. Asano. Progress in psychical research was slow. After the war, J. B. Rhine's book The Reach of the Mind (1947) was translated into Japanese and stimulated investigation of ESP. Meanwhile Fukurai, who had removed to Sendai in Honshu, organized a research group of psychologists and engineers for the study of parapsychology. Another organization formed for the purpose of investigating psychical research was the Institute for Religious Psychology, founded by Hiroshi Motoyama.

After a visit to Japan by J. G. Pratt of Duke University Parapsychology Laboratory in 1963, a Japanese Society for Parapsychology was officially foudned in 1968 through the initiative of Soji Otani, who visited Duke University and studied the techniques of the researchers there. The previous year, in 1967, the society held a conference of parapsychologists in Tokyo, when Oguma lectured on the history of parapsychology in Japan. Parapsychology has since become a recognized area for research at various Japanese universities.

The showing of a program featuring psychic Uri Geller on Japanese television stimulated interest in the phenomena of psychokinesis. In 1977, experiments were reported with a 17-year-old boy, Masuaki Kiyota, who claimed unusual faculties in metal bending and in thoughtography (now investigated as "nengraphy"). Some of these experiments were filmed and shown on American television in 1977. Kiyota has since confessed that he produced the results by fraud.

Addresses for Japanese organizations concerned with parapsychological investigations are as follows:

International Association for Religion & Parapsychology, 4–11-7 Inokashira, Mitaka, Tokyo 181.

Japan Nengraphy Association, Awiji-cho 2-25, Kannda, Chioda, Tokyo.

Japan Association for Psychotronic Research, c/o 284-6 Anagawa-cho. Chiba-shi.

Japanese Society for Parapsychology, 26–14 Chuo 4-chrome, Nakano, Tokyo 164.

Psi Science Institute of Japan, Shibuya Business Hotel 6F, 12-5 Shibuya 1-chrome, Shinjuki-ku, Tokyo 150.

Sources:

Anesaki, Masaharu. History of Japanese Religion. London: Kegan Paul, 1930.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Davis, F. Hadland. Myths and Legends of Japan. London: Harrap, 1912.

Deguchi, Onisaburo. Memoirs. Japan: Kameoka, 1957.

Fukurai, Tomokichi. Clairvoyance and Thoughtography. London: Rider, 1931. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Hearn, Lafcadio. Kokoro: Hints & Echoes of Japanese Inner Life. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1906.

International Society of Life Information Science, Tokyo. http://wwwsoc.nacsis.ac.jp/islis. June 6, 2000.

Japanese Society for Parapsychology. http://www.jspp.ne.jp/. June 6, 2000.

Lowell, Percival. Occult Japan. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1895.

Offner, C. B., and H. van Straelen. Modern Japanese Religions. Leyden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1963.

Thomsen, Harry. The New Religions of Japan. Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1963.

Uphoff, Walter, and Mary Jo Uphoff. Mind Over Matter: Implications of Masuaki Kiyota's PK Feats with Metal and Film. Ore. : New Frontiers Center; London: Colin Smythe, 1980.

Japanese Society for Parapsychology

Interest in parapsychology spread in Japan in the decades following World War II (1939–45) and a desire to engage in related research emerged at Tokyo University in the 1960s. Over the decades of the last half of the twentieth century, Japanese researchers had become known for their work on the Philippine psychic surgery, thoughtography (a form of psychic photography), and psychokinesis. As early as 1963, university professor Akira Onda, along with Soji Otani, a professor at the National Defense Academy, and Motoki Kanazawa, an instructor at Takenodai High School, created an informal organization to pursue parapsychological studies. This information organization was superseded by the Japanese Society for Parapsychology in 1968. Toranousuke Oguma (1888–1978), a professor of psychology at Meiji University, was the first president of the new society.

The society holds an annual convention each December and an annual seminar each August. In 1996 it launched the Japanese Journal of Parapsychology, a biennial scholarly journal that includes research articles in both Japanese and English. Scholars and researchers with the society conduct a variety of research attuned to the most recent experimentation being conducted in the West. The society also publishes an e-mail periodical, the Electronic Newsletter of the JSP, for those members and subscribers who have Internet access.

Soji Otani, now retired, serves as the current president of the society, and Arika Oda, also retired, has been named the society's advisor. The society's headquarters is at 29-24-204 Sakuragaoka, Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 150-0031, Japan. Its webpage is at http://wwwsoc.nacsis.ac.jp/jspp/jspp_e.htm.

Sources:

Japanese Society for Psychical Research. http://wwwsoc.nacsis.ac.jp/jspp/jspp_e.htm. April 14, 2000.

Jaquin, Noel (1894–1974)

Psychologist, diagnostician, and author. Jaquin was born in London in 1894. After studying with the nineteenth century palmist, W. G. Behman, he became one of the best-known British experts in palmistry. He went on to attempt to establish a scientific rationale for the study of what has so often been regarded as superstition. He was able to diagnose disease from markings on the hand and also consulted with police authorities from Scotland Yard and the British police force on the palmistry indications of criminals.

Sources:

Jaquin, Noel. The Hand and Disease. N.p., 1926.

———. The Hand of Man. London: Faber & Faber Ltd., 1933.

———. Hand-reading Made Easy. N.p., 1928.

———. The Human Hand. London: Rockliff, 1956.

———. It's in Your Hands: The Secrets of the Human Hand. New York: R. M. McBride & Co., 1941.

———. Man's Revealing Hand. N.p., 1934.

———. Scientific Palmistry. London: C. Palmer, 1925.

———. The Signature of Time. London: Faber & Faber Ltd., 1940.

———. The Theory of Metaphysical Influence: A Study of Human Attunements, Perception, Intelligence and Motivation. N.p., 1958.

Shaw, Eva. Divining the Future: Prognostication from Astrology to Zoomanancy. New York: Facts on File, 1995.

Jarman, Archibald Seymour (1909–)

Writer on parapsychological subjects. Jarman was born on June 23, 1909, at Richmond, Surrey, England. He worked as an estate administrator and was associate editor of Tomorrow magazine for many years, beginning in 1962. He also wrote articles for British journals dealing with parapsychology, including the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research. His article ''High Jinks on a Low Level'' (originally from Tomorrow), published in Spiritualism: A Critical Survey, by Simeon Edmunds (1966), is an amusing description of three séances attended by the writer and illustrates the crude methods of fraud carried out by bogus mediums.

Sources:

Jarman, Archie. ''High Jinks on a Low Level.'' Tomorrow 2, no. 2. Reprinted in Spiritualism: A Critical Survey, by Simeon Edmunds. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

———. ''Physical Phenomena: Fraud or Frontier?'' Tomorrow (autumn 1960).

———. ''Unsolved Animal Mysteries.'' Tomorrow (spring 1960).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jarricot, Jean (1877–1962)

French homeopathic physician and experimenter in the field of radiesthesia. Born July 14, 1877, at Saint Genis Laval, Rhône, France, he studied at Lyon University. Jarricot was laboratory director at the medical school of Lyon University and was on the staff for medical research in pharmodynamics at St. Rambert I'lle Barbe, Rhône.

He was honorary president of the Rhône Homeopathy Society; an honorary member of Barcelona Medico-Homeopathic Society; an associate member of the Hahnemanian Institute of Brazil; and a laureate of the Académie Française (1960). His article "A quel cadre de reférences rattacher les faits de parapsychologie?" (In what terms of reference should we consider parapsychology?) was published in La Tour Saint Jacques (May 1958). He died November 13, 1962.

Sources:

Jarricot, Jean. Pendule et Médecine (Pendulum and Medicine). Paris: G. Doin, 1949.

———. Radiesthesie (Radiesthesia). N.p., 1958.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jasper

A variety of quartz to which many medicinal values were attributed in ancient times. It was believed to prevent fever and dropsy, strengthen the brain, and promote eloquence. It was said to prevent defluxions (discharge of catarrhal mucous), nightmares, and epilepsy and was often used in the East as a countercharm. Bishop Marbodeus mentioned 17 species of this stone but noted that, like the emerald, it was mainly sought for its magic properties. As late as 1609 it was still believed that jasper worn about the neck would strengthen the stomach.

Jastrow, Joseph (1863–1944)

Psychologist, educator, and author who was critical of psychoanalysis and psychical research. In 1910 he revealed trickery by the famous medium Eusapia Palladino during investigations of her phenomena by a committee of American stage magicians. Jastrow was born on January 30, 1863, in Warsaw, Poland, the son of Marcus Jastrow (1829–1903), a noted rabbi and Hebrew scholar. The family immigrated to the United States when Joseph was still a child. He was educated at Rugby Academy, the University of Pennsylvania, and John Hopkins University.

From 1888 to 1927 he taught psychology at the University of Wisconsin and then moved to the New School for Social Research, where he taught until his retirement (1927–33). He wrote a number of books on psychology and played a large part in popularizing the subject with the general public, editing the syndicated newspaper column "Keeping Mentally Fit" (1928–32) and giving regular radio broadcasts (1935–38).

Although Jastrow closely followed the work of psychical researchers, he was intensely skeptical of the possibility of establishing significant evidence for the existence of psychic phenomena, especially any that implied there was life after death. In 1926 he took part in a public symposium on the subject at Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts, at which Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, F. Bligh Bond, and L. R. G. Crandon spoke as individuals "convinced of the multiplicity of psychical phenomena." William McDougall, Hans Driesch, Walter F. Prince, and F. C. S. Schiller said they were "convinced of the rarity of genuine psychical phenomena." John E. Coover and Gardner Murphy claimed to be "unconvinced as yet." Jastrow and magician Harry Houdini spoke as individuals "antagonistic to the claims that such phenomena occur." The papers were published in The Case For and Against Psychical Belief (1927), edited by Carl Murchison.

Jastrow died at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, on January 8, 1944.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Jastrow, Joseph. Error and Eccentricity in Human Belief. New York: Dover Publications, 1962.

———. Fact and Fable in Psychology. Boston; New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1900.

———. Freud, His Dream and Sex Theories. Cleveland; New York: The World Publishing Co., 1943.

———. The House That Freud Built. New York: Greenberg, 1932.

———. The Psychology of Conviction. Boston; New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1918.

———. Time Relations of Mental Phenomena. N.p., 1890.

———. Wish and Wisdom. New York; London: D. Appleton-Century Co. Inc., 1935.

Jastrow, Joseph ed. The Story of Error. N.p., 1936.

Murchison, Carl, ed. The Case For and Against Psychical Belief. Worcester, Mass., 1927.

Jayne, Charles (1911–1985)

Leading American astrologer, born in Jenkintown, Pennsylvania, on October 9, 1911. Jayne became interested in astrology as a young man and studied the subject throughout the 1930s. He published his first article in 1940 but did not become a professional astrologer until after World War II, in 1949.

Jayne is remembered as an innovative theoretician of astrology, much of his focus on a technical nature concerning the fine points of astrological interpretation. One of his more impressive studies concerned the long-term zodiacal cycles of the outermost planets, which take many years to pass around the zodiac. He found interesting correlations to cycles of history noted by historians such as Arnold Toynbee and Oswald Spengler (their theoretical work was never accepted by most historians). In recognition of his work he was given the Johndro Award in 1979 for contributions to the technical aspects of astrology.

Jayne also made contributions to astrological organizations. He was president of the Astrologers' Guild of America (1958–60), a professional organization. In 1958 he founded Astrological Research Associates and with his wife, Vivia Jayne, edited In Search (1958–62), an international astrological journal. In 1970 he founded the Association for Research in Cosmicology, an organization specializing in the reintegration of astrology into mainline science. He was also one of the founders of the National Council for Geocosmic Research.

Jayne died December 31, 1985, at Goshen, New York.

Sources:

Brau, Jean-Louis, Helen Weaver, and Allan Edwards, eds. Larousse Encyclopedia of Astrology. New York: New American Library, 1982.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Jayne, Charles. A New Dimension in Astrology. New York: Astrological Bureau, 1975.

———. The Technique of Rectification. New York: Astrological Bureau, 1972.

———. The Unknown Planets. New York: Astrological Bureau, 1974.

Jean

According to Lewis Spence (in the Encyclopedia of Occultism, 1920), Jean was a French magician, votary of Apollonius of Tyana. He traveled from town to town, wearing an iron collar and making his living by performing deeds of charlatanry. At Lyons he attained some measure of fame by his miraculous cures and met with the sovereign, to whom he presented a magnificent enchanted sword. In battle this weapon became surrounded by ninescore drawn knives. Jean also gave this prince a shield containing a magic mirror that divulged the greatest secrets. The arms vanished or were stolen.

(Unfortunately, Spence did not state the period or the ruler involved, but this is probably a medieval legend.)

Jean d'Arras (ca. 1387)

A French writer of the fourteenth century who compiled for his patron Jean, duke of Berry, the Chronique de la princesse in 1387 from popular stories about the fairy Mélusine. Mélusine was doomed to change into the form of a serpent every Saturday unless she found a husband who would never see her on Saturdays. She married Raymond of Poitiers of the house of Lusignan. He was rich and powerful, and Mélusine was instrumental in the building of the castle of Lusignan and other family fortresses. One Saturday her husband was overcome by curiosity and spied on her, whereupon she cried out and flew away in serpent form. Thenceforth, the cry of Mélusine was said to herald death in the family of Lusignan. (See also Banshee)

Jean de Meung (or Mehun) (ca. 1250–ca. 1305)

French poet who owes his celebrity to his continuation of the Roman de la Rose of Guillaume de Saint-Amour. De Meung also wrote a rhyming treatise on alchemy. He was born Jean Clopinel (or Chopinel) at Meun-sur-Loire and flourished through the reigns of Louis X, Philip the Long, Charles IV, and Philip de Valois. He appears to have possessed a light and railing wit and a keen appreciation of a jest, and it may well be doubted whether he was altogether sincere in his praises of alchemy.

The poet composed a strongly stigmatic quatrain on womankind and the ladies of Charles IV's court resolved to revenge their affronted honor. Surrounding him in the royal antechamber, they ordered the courtiers present to strip de Meung before they gave him a sound flogging. Jean begged to be heard before he was condemned and punished. Having obtained an interval of grace, the poet admitted—with fluent eloquence—that he was certainly the author of the calumnious verses, but that they were not intended to disparage all women. He referred only to the vicious and debased, he insisted, and not to such models of purity as he saw around him. Nevertheless, if any lady present felt that the verses really applied to her, he would submit to a well-deserved chastisement! None, of course, accepted.

Like most of the medieval poets, Jean de Meung was a bitter enemy of the priesthood, and he contrived with great ingenuity a posthumous satire upon their inordinate greed. He bequeathed in his will, as a gift to the Cordeliers (friars), a chest of immense weight. Since his fame as an alchemist was widespread, the brotherhood accepted the legacy in the belief that the chest contained the golden results of his quest for the philosophers' stone. But when they opened it, their dismayed eyes rested only on a pile of slates covered with the most unintelligible hieroglyphics and kabalistic characters. The perpetrator of this practical joke was hardly, it seems, a sincere believer in the wonders of alchemy.

Jean de Meung's book on alchemy was published as Le Miroir d'alchymie (1557) and in German as Der Spiegel der Alchymie (1771), but some critics believe it is spurious. Also doubtfully attributed to de Meung are the poetical treatises Les Remonstrances de Nature à l'Alchimiste errant and La Reponse de l'Alchimiste à Nature.

Jeanne D'Arc, St. (St. Joan of Arc) (ca. 1412–1431)

Joan was born Jeanette, with the surname Arc or Romée, in the village of Domrémy, on the border of Champagne and Lorraine, on January 15, 1412. In documents of her time she is known as Jeanne.

She was taught to spin and sew but not to read or write, these accomplishments being unnecessary to people in her station of life. Her parents were devout, and she was brought up piously. Her nature was gentle, modest, and religious, but with no physical weakness or morbidity. On the contrary, she was exceptionally strong, as her later history shows.

At or about age 13 she began to experience what modern psychology calls "auditory hallucinations." In other words, she heard voices (usually accompanied by a bright light) when no visible person was present. This is a symptom that occasionally presages a mental disorder, but no insanity developed in Jeanne d'Arc. She was startled at first, but continuation of the experience led to familiarity and trust. The voices gave good counsel of a commonplace nature, for example, that she "must be a good girl and go often to church."

Soon, however, she began to have visions. She saw St. Michael, St. Catharine, and St. Margaret and was given instructions as to her mission. She eventually made her way to the dauphin, put herself at the head of 6,000 men, and advanced to the relief of Orleans, which was surrounded by the victorious English. After a fortnight of hard fighting the siege was raised and the enemy driven off. The tide of war turned, and in three months the dauphin was crowned king at Rheims as Charles VII.

At this point Jeanne felt that her mission was accomplished, but her wish to return to her family was overruled by the king and the archbishop. She took part in further fighting against the allied English and Burgundian forces, showing great bravery and tactical skill. In November 1430, however, in a desperate sally from Compiégne (which was besieged by the duke of Burgundy), she fell into the enemy's hands and was sold to the English and thrown into a dungeon at their headquarters in Rouen.

After a year's imprisonment she was brought to trial before the bishop of Beauvais in an ecclesiastical court. The charges were heresy and sorcery. Learned doctors of the church and subtle lawyers did their best to entangle the simple girl in their dialectical webs, but she showed remarkable power in keeping to her affirmations and avoiding heretical statements. "God has always been my Lord in all that I have done," she repeated.

But the trial was only a sham, for her fate was already decided. She was condemned to the stake. To the end she solemnly affirmed the reality of her "voices" and the truth of her depositions. Her last word, as the smoke and flame rolled round her, was "Jesus." Said an English soldier, awestruck by the manner of her passing, "We are lost; we have burned a saint." The idea was corroborated in popular opinion by events that followed, for speedy death (as if by Heaven's anger) overtook her judges and accusers. Inspired by her example and claims, and helped by dissension and weakening on the side of the enemy, the French took heart once more and the English were all but swept out of the country.

Jeanne's family was rewarded by ennoblement, under the name De Lys. Twenty-five years after her death, the pope acceded to a petition that the trial by which Jeanne was condemned should be reexamined. The judgment was reversed and her innocence was established and proclaimed.

The life of the Maid of Orleans presents a problem that orthodox science cannot solve. She was a simple peasant girl with no ambitions. She rebelled pathetically against her mission, saying, "I had far rather rest and spin by my mother's side, for this is no work of my choosing, but I must go and do it, for my Lord wills it." She cannot be dismissed on the "simple idiot" theory of Voltaire, for her genius in war and her aptitude in repartee undoubtedly prove exceptional mental powers, unschooled though she was. She cannot be dismissed as a mere hysteric, for her health and strength were superb.

It is on record that a man of science said to an abbot, "Come to the Salpêtrière Hospital [the refuge for elderly, poor, and insane patients in Paris] and I will show you twenty Jeannes d'Arc." To which the abbot responded, "Has one of them given us back Alsace and Lorraine?"

Although Jeanne delivered France and her importance in history is great, it is arguable that her mission and her actions were the outcome of merely subjective hallucinations induced by the brooding of her religious and patriotic mind on the woes of her country. The army, being ignorant and superstitious, would have readily believed in the supernatural nature of her mission, resulting in great energy and valor—soldiers fight well when they feel that Providence is on their side. So goes the most common theory in explaining the facts surrounding the life of St. Joan. But it is not fully satisfactory.

How was it possible that this simple, untutored peasant girl could persuade not only the soldiers, but also the dauphin of France and the court of her divine appointment? How did she come to be given the command of an army? It seems improbable that a post of such responsibility and power would be given to an ignorant girl of 18 on the mere strength of her own claim to inspiration.

Although the materialistic school of historians conveniently ignores or belittles it, there is strong evidence to support the idea that Jeanne gave the dauphin some proof of her possession of supernormal faculties. In fact, the evidence is so strong that Andrew Lang, not known for unsupported statements, called it "unimpeachable." Among other curious things, Jeanne seems to have repeated to Charles the words of a prayer that he had said mentally, and she also made some kind of clairvoyant discovery of a sword hidden behind the altar of the Fierbois church. Johann Schiller's magnificent dramatic poem "Die Jungfrau von Orleans" (1801), although not historically correct in some details, is positive on these points concerning clairvoyance and mindreading.

There is also evidence that Jeanne was connected with fairies, which were also part of witchcraft beliefs. Not far from Domrémy was a tree called "the Fairies' Tree" beside a spring said to cure fevers. The wife of the local mayor stated that it had been said that "Jeanne received her mission at the tree of the fairy-ladies" and that St. Katharine and St. Margaret came and spoke to her at the spring beside the fairies' tree. During Jeanne's trial the fourth article of accusation was that Jeanne was not instructed in her youth in the primitive faith, but was imbued by certain old women in the use of witchcraft, divination, and other superstitious works or magic arts. Jeanne herself, according the accusation, had said she heard from her godmother and other people about visions and apparitions of fairies.

Moreover, Pierronne, a follower of Jeanne d'Arc, was burned at the stake as a witch. She stated on oath that God appeared to her in human form and spoke to her as a friend, and that he was clothed in a scarlet cap and a long white robe.

It has been suggested that the voices heard by Jeanne may have been those of human beings rather than Christian saints, and Jeanne herself stated, "Those of my party know well that the Voice had been sent to me from God, they have seen and known this Voice. My king and many others have also heard and seen the Voices which came to me. . . . I saw him [St. Michael] with my bodily eyes as well as I see you." Jeanne's references to "the King of Heaven" in the original Latin and French were translated with a Christian bias as "Our Lord," and "my Lord" was translated as "Our Saviour." The scholar Margaret A. Murray in her book The Witch-Cult in Western Europe (1921) also suggests that if Jeanne was a member of a Dianic [witch] cult, the wearing of male clothing may have been for Jeanne an outward sign of that faith, hence the importance attached to it.

In another book, The God of the Witches (1931), Murray examines the tradition that Jeanne was not actually burned at the stake but survived for a number of years afterward. The Chronique de Metz states, "Then she was sent to the city of Rouen in Normandy, and there was placed on a scaffold and burned in a fire, so it was said, but since then was found to be the contrary." Some of the evidence for this view had been cited earlier by Andrew Lang in his essay "The False Jeanne d'Arc" in his book The Valet's Tragedy and Other Studies (1903).

The period between the trial at Rouen and the Trial of Rehabilitation (1452–56) is crucial. In 1436, five years after the Rouen trial, the herald-at-arms and Jeanne's brother Jean du Lys announced officially in Orleans that Jeanne was still alive. The city accounts record that on Sunday, August 6, Jean du Lys, brother of "Jehane la Pucelle" [Jeanne the Maid] was in Orleans with letters from his sister to the king. In July 1439 Jeanne's brothers were in Orleans with their sister, now married to the sieur des Armoises (or Harmoises), and the city council presented Jeanne des Armoises with 210 pounds "for the good that she did to the said town during the siege of 1429." Accounts are also recorded of the wine merchant and draper who supplied Jeanne with wine and clothing. Her own mother was in Orleans at the time. Moreover, the masses that had been celebrated in Orleans for the repose of Jeanne's soul were discontinued after her mother's visit.

It is not conclusive that this Jeanne was an impostor (as Andrew Lang believed), and it seems unlikely that many people in Orleans, including Jeanne's own brothers, could have been deceived. The riddle of conflicting evidence of burning at the stake or substantiated appearances years later has never been satisfactorily resolved. Many such questions remain unresolved, in spite of various books, mainly by French writers, dealing with the issue.

Early French books on the subject include La Survivance et le Mariage de Jeanne D'Arc, by Grillot de Givry and La Legende Detruite: Indications pour essayer de suivre l'histoire de Jeanne d'Arc, by Paraf-Javal (1929). More recently another French writer, Pierre de Sermoise, published Jeanne d'Arc et la Mandragore (1983), which has revived the claim that the veiled woman burned at the stake in the marketplace was a prisoner condemned to death as a witch, substituting for France's national heroine.

More speculative is the conclusion of American biologist Robert Greenblatt (reported in 1983) that Jeanne was really a man. It was also claimed that two midwives who had examined Jeanne to establish her virginity were astonished to find that she had not reached puberty. In 1994, Jeanne d'Arc's suit of armor was thought to have been discovered by a Parisian antiques dealer. Not only did the suit fit his 14-year-old daughter's body, but where it was damaged seemed to match where it was believed to be the saint was wounded. Even in the twenty-first century Jeanne d'Arc remains a popular subject for articles, books and a popular character for television programs and movies.

Sources:

Barstow, Anne Llewellyn. Joan of Arc: Heretic, Mystic, Shaman. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1986.

Marglis, Nadia. Joan of Arc in History, Literature, and Film: A Select Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1990.

Jehovah's Witnesses

A popular millenarian Christian religious group that grew out of the ministry of Pastor Charles Taze Russell in the late nineteenth century. It is also known by reference to its corporate entity, the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society. Its members have become a common sight in many countries as they go from door to door preaching their message and distributing their literature, especially the Watchtower magazine. Originally known as Bible Students, the group adopted the name Jehovah's Witnesses in 1931.

The Witnesses have, like many Christian churches, shown a marked aversion to Spiritualism and other occult phenomena. Very early in the group's history Russell attacked Spiritualism (which he called Spiritism), and periodically over the years the organization has published booklets and numerous articles warning members to eschew any association with the occult. The Witnesses' primary biblical doctrinal handbook, Make Sure of All Things, Hold Fast to What Is Fine (1965), includes an assemblage of texts believed to refute Spiritualism as well as a separate set dealing with reincarnation. Address: 25 Columbia Heights, Brooklyn, NY 11201-2483. Website: http://www.watchtower.org/.

Sources:

Bergman, Jerry. Jehovah's Witnesses and Kindred Groups: A Historical Compendium and Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1984.

Can the Living Talk with the Dead? A Clear Explanation of Spiritism. Brooklyn, N.Y.: International Bible Students, 1920.

Russell, Charles Taze. Unseen Spirits—Do They Help Us? or, Do They Harm Us? Brooklyn, N.Y.: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1978.

———. What Do the Scriptures Say about "Survival of Death?" Brooklyn, N.Y.: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1955.

———. What Say the Scriptures about Spiritism? Brooklyn, N.Y.: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1897.

Watchtower: Official Site of the Jehovah's Witnesses. http://www.watchtower.org/. March 27, 2000.

Jensen, Wiers (1866–1925)

Norwegian dramatist who was active in the field of psychical research. Jensen was born on November 25, 1866, at Bergen, Norway, and was educated at the University of Oslo. In addition to his work as a playwright and an instructor at theaters in Bergen and Oslo, he edited the journal Norsk Tidsskrift for Psykisk Forksning, dealing with psychical research, from 1922 to 1925. His play Anne Pedersdotter is about a mediumistic woman believed to be a witch.

Jensen made a special study of the phenomenon of the psychic double as known in Norway and Scotland. His experiences and those of other individuals were chronicled by Thorstein Wereide in an article in Tomorrow in 1955. He died August 25, 1925. After Jensen's death, communications believed to be from him were received through the automatic writing of the medium Ingeborg Dahl.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Wereide, Thorstein. "Norway's Human Doubles." Tomorrow 3, no. 2 (winter 1955).

Jephson, Ina (d. 1961)

British artist and expert in child guidance. She joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, in 1920 and served on the council from 1928 on. Jephson was born in London and studied art at the Slade School. She also studied psychology under Leonard Seif in Munich, Germany, and later worked with children at the Individual Psychology Clinic of Doris Rayner. During World War II she worked with disturbed children at Oxford. Jephson devoted special attention to research designed to set up repeatable experiments dealing with clairvoyance, which became the main subject of a set of articles she wrote for the Proceedings of the SPR.

Sources:

Jephson, Ina. "A Behaviourist Experiment in Clairvoyance." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 128, no. 41 (January 1933).

———. "Evidence for Clairvoyance in Card-Guessing." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 109, no. 38 (December 1928).

Jephson, Ina, S. G. Soal, and Theodore Besterman. "Report on a Series of Experiments in Clairvoyance." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 118, no. 39 (April 1931).

Jersey Devil

Strange creature on the borderline between fact and legend, reported in southern New Jersey for more than two centuries. The Jersey devil is said to have a kangaroo body, bat's wings, pig's feet, dog's head, the face of a horse, and a forked tail. Depending on the storyteller the creature is said to be anywhere from 18 inches to 20 feet in height and is considered impervious to gunshot. It appears to have been born, at least as a legend, after the off-the-cuff remark of a woman unhappy over her pregnancy. Her curse on her child resulted in her child being devil-like. The Jersey devil appeared over the years, possibly as a running joke by bored newspaper reporters.

However, it might have remained unknown were it not for the accounts of its having terrorized inhabitants of the Delaware Valley in 1909, when people stayed home even in daylight and factories and theaters closed. When all the reports were assembled, though, descriptions of the creature varied widely. At least one person later confessed to participating in the 1909 events by creating footprints of the supposed devil. In another famous scare in 1951 the Jersey devil was said to have attacked and mutilated poultry, cats, and dogs. Some have written the Jersey devil off as a mere hoax. Others have seen it as a folk legend lost in endless variations.

Sources:

Bord, Janet, and Collin Bord. Alien Animals. Harrisburg, Penn.: Stackpole Books, 1981.

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

McCloy, J. F., and Ray Miller, Jr. The Jersey Devil. Newark, Del.: Middle Atlantic Press, 1976.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Jesodoth

According to Jewish mysticism, the angel through which Elohim, the source of knowledge, understanding, and wisdom, was imparted to the Earth. (See also Kabala)

Jesus, Master

One of the masters originally contacted by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society. According to theosophical teachings there exists a spiritual hierarchy composed of individuals who have finished their round of earthly reincarnations and have evolved to the spiritual planes, from which they guide the affairs of humanity. Those members of the hierarchy closest to humanity are the "lords of the seven rays" (of the light spectrum). Each ray represents a particular virtue, which the lord of that ray exemplifies.

The identity of Master Jesus is somewhat complicated in Theosophical history. According to the Theosophical Society, Master Jesus was not the same person as Jesus Christ. Rather, he took embodiment as Apollonius of Tyana.

Master Jesus is the lord of the sixth ray of purity and fiery devotion. As such he is the master of devotees, saints, and mystics of every religious tradition. He is the guardian of the Christian Church, founded by Maitreya (commonly known as Jesus Christ). He was also incarnated as the Indian teacher Ramanujacharya, who lived in the twelfth century. He currently inhabits the body of a Syrian and lives in Lebanon among the Druse people. Over the centuries his mission has been to found "magnetic centers."

Through the twentieth century, most theosophical movements have continued the original teachings tying Master Jesus to Appolonius rather than Jesus Christ, but others have quietly adopted an identification of the master with the ascended Jesus Christ. Most prominently, that identification has been made in the I Am Movement and in groups that have roots in the I Am Movement, such as the Church Universal and Triumphant.

Sources:

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Jet

A velvet-black coal that is a variety of lignite. Its occult virtues are thus described by Pliny (Historia naturalis, translated by Philemon Holland, 1601):

''In burning, the perfume thereof chaseth away serpents, and bringeth women again that lie in a trance by the suffocation or rising of the mother; the said smoke discovereth the falling sickness and bewraieth whether a young damsel be a maiden or no; the same being boiled in wine helpeth the toothache, and tempered with wax cureth the swelling glandules named the king's evil. They say that the magicians use this jeat stone much in their sorceries, which they practice by the means of red hot axes, which they call axinomancia, for they affirm that being cast thereupon it will burne and consume, if that ewe desire and wish shall happen accordingly.''

Jet was known in Prussia as black amber. (See also Electrum; Gagates)

Jettatura

The Italian name for the power of the evil eye. To guard against it magicians said that horns must be worn on the body or the phallic gesture of horns must be made with the fingers.

Jinn

Arabian spirits, perhaps animistic, but more probably strictly mythological like the Persian divs. The jinn were said to have been created out of fire and to have occupied the Earth for several thousand years before Adam. They were perverse and would not reform, although prophets were sent to reclaim them; they were eventually driven from the Earth and took refuge in the outlying islands of the sea.

One of the number named Azazeel (afterward called Iblees) was carried off as a prisoner by angels. He grew up among them and became their chief, but when he refused to prostrate himself before Adam he was degraded to the condition of a sheytân (devil), and became the father of the sheytâns.

The jinn are not immortal and, according to legend, are destined ultimately to die. They eat and drink and propagate their species, live in communities, and are ruled over by princes. They can make themselves visible or invisible, and they assume the forms of various animals, such as serpents, cats, and dogs. There are good jinn and bad jinn. They are said to frequent baths, wells, latrines, ovens, ruined houses, rivers, crossroads, and marketplaces. Like the demons of Jewish traditions, they ascend to heaven and learn the future by eavesdropping. With all their power and knowledge, however, they are liable to be reduced to obedience by means of talismans or occult arts and become obsequious servants until the spell is broken.

It is far from certain that the jinn of the East were derived from the mythology or philosophy of the West, and the practice of translating the Arabic word jinn by the Latin term genius arose more from an apparent resemblance in the names than from any identity in the nature and functions of those imaginary beings.

This similarity of name, however, must have been purely accidental, for the Arabs knew little or nothing of the Latin language. Demon—not genius—is the word they probably would have used if they had borrowed this part of their creed from the West. Jinn appears, moreover, to be a genuine Arabic word derived from a root signifying ''to veil'' or ''to conceal''; it therefore means properly ''that which is veiled and cannot be seen.''

''In one sense,'' states Frús-àbàdí (Câmús, vol. 3, p. 611), ''the word Jinn signifies any spiritual being concealed from all our senses, and, for that reason, the converse of a material being. Taken in this extensive sense, the word Jinn comprehends devils as well as angels, but there are some properties common to both angels and Jinn; some peculiar to each. Every angel is a Jinn, but every Jinn is not an angel. In another sense, this term is applied peculiarly to a particular kind of spiritual being; for such beings are of three kinds; the good, which are angels; the bad, devils; and the intermediate, comprehending both good and bad, who form the class of Jinn.''

Thus Arabs acknowledged good and bad jinn, in that respect agreeing with the Greeks, but differing from the Persians. The ''genii'' so long familiar to European readers through the Arabian Nights are not the same beings, but rather are the divs and dévatàs of Indian romance dressed up in a foreign attire to please the tastes of readers in Persia and Arabia.

The principal differences, therefore, between the genii of the West and the jinn of the East seem to have been as follows: the genii were deities of an inferior rank, the constant companions and guardians of men, capable of giving useful or prophetic impulses, acting as mediators and messengers between the gods and men. Some were supposed to be friendly, others hostile, and many believed one of each kind was attached from birth to every mortal. The former was called Agathodemon, the latter Cacodemon.

The good genius prompted men to good, the evil to bad actions. That of each individual was as a shadow of himself. Often the genius was represented as a serpent. His age also varied. He was generally crowned with a chaplet of plane-tree leaves. His sacrifices were wholly bloodless, consisting of wine and flowers, and the person who performed the oblation was the first to taste the cup. The birthday was placed under his special care.

Roman men swore by their genius, the women by their juno. The genius of the reigning prince was an oath of extraordinary solemnity. There were local as well as individual genii, concerning whom many particulars may be found in De Idolatria liber of Dionysius Vossius (editions 1633, 1641).

The jinn, on the contrary, who seem to be the lineal descendants of the dévatés and rakshasas of Hindu mythology, were never worshiped by the Arabs nor considered as anything but agents of the Deity. Since the establishment of Islam, indeed, they have been described as invisible spirits, and the feats and deformities that figure into romance are as little believed by Easterners as the tales of King Arthur's Round Table are by Westerners.

Jinnistan

An imaginary country that, according to a popular belief among the ancient Persians, was the residence of the jinn who submitted to King Solomon.

Jobson, Mary (ca. 1840)

Nineteenth-century psychic of Bishop Wearmouth, England. Her strange case is recorded in a brief book by Reid Clanny, A Faithful Record of the Miraculous Case of Mary Jobson (1841). At age 13, in November 1839, Mary was taken ill and had convulsions for 11 weeks. The first time she was seized her mother heard three loud knocks in the sickroom. The knocks were repeated, violent scratching was heard, and the door opened and shut violently four or five times.

While in a helpless and apparently hopeless condition, the girl heard voices and occasionally made accurate predictions. In May 1840 she foretold an attempt on the life of Queen Victoria. The voices claimed to come from the Virgin Mary, from apostles, and from martyrs. R. B. Embleton said he once heard the voice begin, ''I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt.''

Many other witnesses testified to a series of occult phenomena. Water appeared from nowhere and was sprinkled in the room, an astronomical design in green, yellow, and orange appeared on the ceiling, and music was frequently heard.

The latter phenomenon was confirmed by Jobson's governess, Elizabeth Gauntlett, and by a Dr. Drury. Drury stated, "On listening I distinctly heard most exquisite music which continued during the time I might count a hundred. This she told me she often heard." The girl alternately became blind, deaf, and dumb. After eight months of unaccountable illness she was mysteriously cured.

Jogand-Pagès, Gabriel (1854–ca. 1906)

Nineteenth-century French journalist who, under the name "Léo Taxil," perpetrated an extraordinary and prolonged hoax in which he claimed to have exposed devil worship within Freemasonry. Jogand's motives are not entirely clear even today, but it seems that his hoax was also designed to embarrass the Roman Catholic church.

In 1892 a book entitled Le Diable du XIXe Siècle was published in Paris, attributed to "Dr. Bataille." For a time the book was thought to be the work of Dr. Charles Hacks, who contributed a preface entitled "Revelations of an Occultist." Hacks was a real, although shadowy, figure. It was not until five years later that the hoax was revealed by Jogand himself.

The groundwork for the hoax began as early as 1885 when Jogand, as Léo Taxil, edited an anticlerical newspaper. He began to publish exposés of Freemasonry, claiming that there were lodges that practiced rites deriving from the Manichaean heresy. With the publication of "Dr. Bataille's" book, Jogand introduced a sinister high priestess of satanic Freemasons. She was Diana Vaughan, said to be a descendant of the seventeenth-century alchemist Thomas Vaughan. She had been chosen as a high priestess of Lucifer to overthrow Christianity and win the world over to Satanism, Jogand wrote. Diana was supposed to head a feminine cult of Freemasonry named Palladism. Periodicals claiming to emanate from the Palladium were published by Jogand.

His next audacious stroke was to announce that Diana Vaughan had been converted from Satanism to the true Roman Catholic faith. Her Memories d'une Ex-Palladist (1895–97) attracted enormous interest and enthusiasm. They were read by Pope Leo XIII, together with a short devotional work supposedly composed by Vaughan, and His Holiness responded with a papal benediction. It seemed that Jogand himself had repented of his former freethinking and created a saintly impression. He was received in private audience by the pope, who had expressed approval of his anti-masonic writings, and an anti-masonic congress was summoned in 1887 at Trent, famous for its sixteenth-century council.

By then there was great pressure for Diana Vaughan herself to be produced from the unnamed convent where Jogand claimed she was residing. It was announced that she would appear on Easter Monday 1897 and give a press conference in Paris. Instead, Jogand himself appeared and calmly announced that he had invented the whole conspiracy. He claimed that he himself had written Diana Vaughan's confessions, but asserted that Diana actually existed. She was his secretary, he said, and it had appealed to her sense of humor to be involved. After this astounding denouement, Jogand calmly left the hall by a side door and enjoyed a coffee and cognac in a nearby cafe, while a riot erupted in the lecture hall and the police were called in.

The whole affair was so extraordinary and deceived so many people, including exalted ecclesiastics, that much confusion still remains about Jogand's motives. Clearly he was a great liar, and even some details of his brazen confession are suspect. In general he seems to have developed the hoax to discredit both the Freemasons and the Catholic Church, but there also seem to be elements of personal neurosis. Jogand came from a deeply religious family but rebelled against his father's authority. As a young man, he early came into contact with Freemasonry and revolutionary circles, for which he was punished by being sent to a special school. He developed an aversion to authority and became a freethinker, later earning his living as a journalist concerned with freethinking publications.

Many questions remain unanswered about his great hoax as "Léo Taxil." The book by "Dr. Bataille" is a substantial work, and some of its revelations appear to be an imaginative embroidering of known facts. They provided the believable base from which the hoax could be worked. It is undoubtedly true that there were some Rosicrucian elements in certain masonic temples, and some of Taxil's inventions are not unlike the claims made against the Templars. Other individuals were evidently parties to the hoax, including Hacks and someone willing to pose as Diana Vaughan for photographs and for correspondence that was unlikely to have been written by Jogand.

The hoax was forgotten by all but a few students of occult history, but Taxil's books reemerged in the 1980s as source material from which contemporary anti-Mormon and anti-Satanist conspiracy books have been written.

Sources:

Bataille, Dr. [Gabriel Jogand-Pagès]. Le Diable du XIXe Siècle. Paris, 1892.

———. Memoire à l' Adresse des Members du Congrès de Trent. N.p., 1897.

Jastrow, Joseph. Error and Eccentricity in Human Belief. New York: Dover Publications, 1962.

Lea, H. C. Léo Taxil, Diana Vaughan et l'Eglise romaine. Paris, 1901.

Vaughan, Diana [Gabriel Jogand-Paqés]. Mémoires d'une Ex-Palladiste, parfaite Initié, Indépendante. Paris, 1895–97.

Waite, A. E. Devil Worship in France. London, 1896.

Johannine Daist Communion See Free Daist Communion

Johannites

A mystical sect of prerevolutionary Russia, founded on tenets from Father John of Kronstadt. The sect published a periodical and spread their propaganda by means of itinerant pamphlet sellers. They were said to abduct Jewish children, and because of this rumor they sometimes came under police supervision. On various occasions they unsuccessfully forecast the date of the Last Judgment. They declared that all the powers of heaven had descended into Kronstadt and were personified in the entourage of Father John.

They exhorted all believers to make confession to Father John, who alone could rescue sinners from the depths of hell. The orthodox clergy would not know the Lord, but Father John would gather together in Kronstadt 144,000 of the blessed and then "leave the earth." Another tenet of the Johannities was that all newborn babies were "little devils" who must be "stamped out" immediately after birth.

The Johannites urged people to sell all their possessions and send the proceeds to Father John, or entrust them to the keeping of the pamphlet sellers. It seems, however, that Father John was unaware of the abuse of his name, and on one occasion, in reply to a telegram from Bishop Nikander of Perm, he strongly repudiated any connection with certain Johannite propagandists in the Perm government.

Another well-known sect of Johannites existed in seventeenth-century Holland. They were a less rigid branch called the Mennonites. They were first known as Anabaptists, but this name became distasteful because of the excesses of the Anabaptists under such fanatics as John of Leyden, and in 1537 the priest Menno Simonis gave his name to the movement. The members of the Johannite branch were also known as "Waterlanders," from the name of the Waterland district in North Holland where they lived. Other Mennonite sects immigrated to the United States.

John, Bubba Free See Jones, Franklin Albert

John (Damian), Master, the French Leich

Among the several alchemists in the court of King James VI of Scotland, the most noted was the person variously styled in the Treasurer's Accounts as "the French Leich," "Maister John the French Leich," "Maister John the French Medicinar," and "French Maister John." The real name of this empiric was John Damian. He was a native of Lombardy and had practiced surgery and other arts in France before his arrival in Scotland. His first appearance at the court of James was in the capacity of a French leech, and, as he is mentioned among the persons who received "leveray" (livery) in 1501–02, there can be no doubt that he held an appointment as a physician in the royal household.

John soon succeeded in ingratiating himself with the king, and it is probable that it was from him that James absorbed a strong passion for alchemy, as James about this time erected at Stirling a furnace for conducting such experiments, and continued during the rest of his reign to expend considerable sums of money in attempts to discover the philosophers' stone. Bishop Lesley observed, "Maister John caused the king believe, that he by multiplying and utheris his inventions sold [should] make fine gold of uther metal, quhilk science he callit the Quintassence, whereupon the king made great cost, but all in vain."

There are numerous entries in the Treasurer's Accounts of sums paid for saltpeter, bellows, two great stillatours, brass mortars, coals, and numerous vessels of various shapes, sizes, and denominations, for the use of this foreign adept in his mystical studies. These studies, however, were not his sole occupation, for after the mysterious labors of the day were concluded, John used to play cards with the sovereign—a mode by which he probably transferred the contents of the royal exchequer into his own purse, as efficaciously as by his distillations.

Early in the year 1504, the Abbot of Tungland, in Galloway, died, and the king, with a reckless disregard of the dictates of duty, appointed the unprincipled adventurer John to the vacant office. On March 11, the treasurer paid "to Gareoch Parsuivant fourteen shillings to pass to Tungland for the Abbacy to the French Maister John." On the 12th of the same month, "by the king's command," he paid "to Bardus Altovite Lumbard twenty-five pounds for Maister John, the French Mediciner, new maid Abbot of Tungland, whilk he aucht (owed) to the said Bardus," and a few days later on the 17th, there was given "to Maister John the new maid Abbot of Tungland, seven pounds." Three years after, on July 27, 1507, occurs the following entry: "Item, lent, by the king's command to the Abbot of Tungland, and can nocht be gettin fra him £33 : 6 : 8."

An adventure that befell this dexterous impostor afforded great amusement to the Scottish court. On the occasion of an embassy setting out from Stirling to the court of France, he had the audacity to declare that by means of a pair of artificial wings he had constructed, he would undertake to fly to Paris and arrive long before the ambassadors. This incident gave rise to a satirical ballad entitled "Of the Fenyeit Friar of Tungland," in which a poet exposed in the most sarcastic strain the pretensions of the luckless adventurer, and related with great humor the result of his attempt to soar into the skies, when he was dragged to the earth by the low-minded propensities of the "hen feathers" he had inadvertently admitted into the construction of his wings.

Although John's unsuccessful attempt, according to Lesley, subjected him to the ridicule of the whole kingdom, it did not result in the loss of the king's favor. The Treasurer's books, from October 1507 to August 1508, repeatedly mention him as having played at dice and cards with his majesty, and on September 8, 1508, "Damiane, Abbot of Tungland," obtained royal permission to pursue his studies abroad during the space of five years.

John must have returned to Scotland, however, before the death of James, since the last notice given to this impostor is quite in character. On March 27, 1513, the sum of twenty pounds was paid to him for his journey to the mine in Crawford Moor, where the king had at that time artisans at work searching for gold.

Johndro, L. Edward (1882–1951)

Astrologer L. Edward Johndro was born in Quebec, Canada, on January 30, 1882. Around the beginning of the century he moved to Lockport, New York, where he was introduced to astrology by Edward Wykes, the manager of a children's home in Lockport who had an interest in the subject. Johndro was also intrigued by the new field of electronics and worked as an electrical engineer during World War I (1914–18) and after the war attended the National Radio Institute. His understanding of electricity and electromagnetism greatly affected his approach to astrology as he felt that changes in the electromagnetic energies might account for astrological phenomena.

Johndro's first astrological writings were two books on the fixed stars that were published in 1929. Fixed stars, those brightest stars that form the major points of light in the night sky, have had a role in traditional astrology, with each being assigned characteristics much like the planets. The conjunction of planets with fixed stars of related characteristics should manifest in the individual's life. In this instance, Johndro's work has been largely forgotten, in that contemporary astrologers have largely dropped consideration of fixed charts from their work.

In his attempt to build an electrodynamic theory for astrology, Johndro discovered a point on the chart that he called the electrical ascendant, now generally called the vertex. He considered this point the most fated, i.e., least susceptible to choice, in a person's chart, hence of vital importance in any interpretation. Another astrologer, Charles Jayne, discovered the same point on the chart and also incorporated it in his horoscopes. However, the process of locating the vertex is a somewhat sophisticated mathematical operation and few astrologers adopted it as part of their interpretive scheme. They had more appreciation for his attempt to build a scientific rationale for astrology in his 1929 book, The Stars, How and Where They Influence. He also proposed an alternative theory for the manner in which planetary rulerships operate.

In 1936, Johndro began a professional relationship with a colleague, W. Kenneth Brown. They consulted with prominent businessmen whom they advised on financial investments. In this business, Johndro and Brown utilized not only the birth charts but conception charts, charts of the planetary positions at the time their clients were actually conceived. Johndro believed that the conception charts show how creative people think or "conceive" of things, and hence had a vital role in predicting their financial life. Johndro continued in this work for the rest of his life.

He died on November 11, 1951. His wife died a short time later as she was phoning to make his funeral arrangements. While Johndro's approach has largely fallen out of favor with the ascendancy of psychological perspectives on astrology, he was highly regarded during his life for the technical nature and mathematical precision of his work. In 1978, the Association for Research in Cosmecology created an annual award named for Johndro acknowledging achievement in technical astrology.

Sources:

Brau, Jean Louis, Helen Weaver, and Allen Edwards. Larousse Encyclopedia of Astrology. New York: New American Library, 1980.

Johndro, L. Edward. The Earth in the Heavens. 1929. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

———. A New Conception of Sign Rulership. Washington, D.C.: American Federation of Astrologers, n.d.

———. The Stars: How and Where They Influence. 1929. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

"John King"

Claimed spirit entity manifesting at many Spiritualist séances. (See "King, John")

John of Nottingham

Famous occult magician of fourteenth-century England.

Johnson, Alice (1860–1940)

Prominent figure in British psychical research. Johnson was organizing secretary of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, from 1903 to 1916, research officer from 1908 to 1916, and editor of the society's Proceedings from 1899 to 1916. Born in Cambridge, England, she was educated at Newham College, Cambridge University (Bathurst student 1882). From 1884 to 1890 she was a demonstrator in animal morphology at the Balfour Laboratory.

Johnson became interested in psychical research through her association with Eleanor Sidgwick and became her personal secretary. Johnson participated in the first sittings in England with the American medium Leonora Piper in 1889 and assisted in the SPR Census of Hallucinations between 1889 and 1894. In 1901 she collaborated with Richard Hodgson on the preparation of the F. W. H. Myers book Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death, which was published after Myers's death. Johnson also reported on the SPR group of mediums investigated in connection with automatic phenomena (writing and trance messages). She died January 13, 1940.

Sources:

Johnson, Alice. "The Education of the Sitter." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1908–09).

———. "Mrs. Henry Sidgwick's Work in Psychical Research." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1936–37).

———. "On the Automatic Writing of Mrs. Holland." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1908–09).

———. "Report of Some Recent Sittings for Physical Phenomena in America." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1908–09).

———. "Second Report on Mrs. Holland's Scripts." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1910).

———. "Supplementary Notes on Mrs. Holland's Scripts." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1910).

———. "Third Report on Mrs. Holland's Scripts." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1910).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Johnson, Douglas (ca. 1909–1988)

Modern British medium who investigated haunted houses in the United States and who appeared on television programs to demonstrate clairvoyance and psychometry. He was born in London, and his powers were evident as early as age six. His parents were not psychic but did not disapprove of his predictive talents; they permitted him to attend a Spiritualist public meeting at age 12. Three years later he went into trance for the first time, channeling information and advice to a circle of people.

In World War II he served with the Royal Air Force, but he was removed from active duty after an injury at the end of the war. He had corresponded with the College of Psychic Science (now the College of Psychic Studies) in London and afterward gave many clairvoyant sittings there. He also spent time in the United States, where he worked with W. G. Roll, Eileen Garrett, Thelma Moss, Stanley Krippner, and other parapsychologists. He died in October 1988.

Sources:

Editors of Psychic Magazine. Psychics. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Johnson, Raynor C(arey) (1901–1987)

Master of Queen's College, University of Melbourne, Australia, author, and writer on parapsychology. Born April 5, 1901, at Leeds, England, he studied at Bradford Grammar School, Balliol College, Oxford, and the University of London (B.A., M.A., D.S.). He was also awarded an honorary doctorate by the University of Melbourne.

Johnson was successively a lecturer in physics, Queen's University of Belfast; lecturer in physics, King's College, University of London; and master of Queen's College, University of Melbourne (from 1934 on). He was a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and wrote various books on physics and on paranormal topics.

Johnson died on May 16, 1987.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Johnson, Raynor C. The Imprisoned Splendour. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953.

———. Nurslings of Immortality. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1957.

———. Psychical Research. New York: Philosophical Library, 1955.

———. The Spiritual Path. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.

———. Watcher on the Hills. New York: Harper & Row, 1959.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Johnson, Mrs. Roberts (fl. ca. 1918)

Direct voice medium of Stockton-on-Tees, England. Her powers developed after a sitting with Mrs. Thomas Everitt. Her principal control claimed to be David Duguid, the former trance painting medium of Glasgow.

A sitter at a séance held March 5, 1918, reported in Light as follows:

"I have never had two sittings alike with Mrs. Johnson. They are marked each time by some different characteristic. On this occasion, before each new speaker used the trumpet, I saw a faintly-luminous figure moving about. Then, again, all the voices were louder than is usual in ordinary conversation, so much so, that Mrs. Johnson on more than one occasion asked the male speakers to moderate their tone; otherwise neighbours and pedestrians outside might be attracted by the unusual noise. Most of our spirit visitors remained throughout the sitting, and verbally called our attention to the fact. This was the best direct-voice sitting which, so far, it has been my good fortune to attend."

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle remarked on Johnson's remarkable power with direct voice phenomena, commenting on the nonreligious atmosphere of her sittings with humorous spirit communicators.

John XXII, Pope (ca. 1244–1334)

Jacques Duèse, subsequently Pope John XXII, was born at Cahors, France. His parents were affluent, and it has even been suggested that they belonged to the nobility. Jacques was educated first at a Dominican priory in his native village and afterward at Montpellier. He then proceeded to Paris, where he studied both law and medicine.

Leaving the Sorbonne, Duèse was still at a loss as to what profession to follow, but, chancing to become intimate with Bishop Louis (a son of Charles II, king of Naples) the young man decided to enter the church, doubtless prompted to this step by the conviction that his new friend's influence would help him advance in his clerical career.

The future pontiff was not disappointed, for in the year 1300, at the request of the Neapolitan sovereign, he was elevated to the episcopal see of Fréjus, then in 1308 he was appointed chancellor of Naples. He soon showed himself a man of no mean ability in ecclesiastical affairs. In 1310 Pope Clement V summoned him to Avignon, anxious to consult him on the question of the legality of suppressing the Templars and also on whether to condemn the memory of Boniface VIII. Duèse was in favor of suppressing the Templars but rejected condemnation of Boniface. In 1312 Duèse was made bishop of Porto, and four years later was elected to the pontifical crown and scepter as Pope John XXII.

From that time on he lived at Avignon, but his life was by no means a quiet or untroubled one. Early in his papacy the throne of Germany became vacant. Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria both contended for it, and Pope John offended many by supporting Frederick. Later he raised a storm by preaching a somewhat unorthodox sermon purporting that the souls of those who die in a state of grace go straight into Abraham's bosom and do not enjoy the beatific vision of the Lord until after the Resurrection and the Last Judgment. This doctrine was hotly opposed by many clerics, notably Thomas of England, who had the courage to preach against it openly at Avignon. So great was the disfavor Pope John incurred that for several years after his death he was widely regarded as the Antichrist.

Pope John was frequently accused of avarice, and it is true that he made stupendous efforts to raise money, imposing numerous taxes unheard of before his papacy. He manifested considerable ingenuity in that regard, and so the tradition that he dabbled in hermetic philosophy (alchemy) may be founded on fact. He did issue a stringent bull against alchemists, but it was directed against the charlatans of the craft, not against those who were seeking the philosophers' stone with real earnestness and with the aid of scientific knowledge.

The pope may have introduced this mandate to silence those who had charged him with the practice of alchemy himself. Whatever his reason, it is probable that he believed in magic and was interested in science. His belief in magic is indicated by his bringing a charge of sorcery against Géraud, bishop of Cahors. Pope John's scientific predilections are evident from his keeping a laboratory in the palace at Avignon and spending much time there.

Doubtless some of this time was given to physiological and pathological studies, for various works of a medical nature are ascribed to Pope John XXII, in particular a collection of prescriptions, a treatise on diseases of the eye, and another on the formation of the fetus. But it may well be that the ativities in his laboratory also centered in some measure on alchemistic research. This theory is strengthened by the fact that Pope John was friends with Arnold de Villanova, famous physician, astrologer, and alchemist.

Among the writings attributed to Pope John XXII is the alchemical work L'Elixir des philosophers, autrement L'art transmutatoire, published at Lyons in 1557.

When he died the pontiff left behind him a vast sum of money and a mass of priceless jewels. It was commonly asserted among the alchemists of the day that the money, jewels, and 200 huge ingots were all manufactured by the late pope. The story of the unbounded wealth amassed in this way gradually blossomed and bore fruit, and one of the pope's medieval biographers credited him with having concocted an enormous quantity of gold.

Joire, Paul (1856– ?)

Professor at the Psycho-physiological Institute of Paris, president of the Societé Universelle d'Etudes Psychiques, and distinguished psychical researcher. His studies in hypnotism and in the obscure area of the exteriorization of sensitivity are especially noteworthy. He invented a device named the sthenometer to demonstrate the existence of a force that seemed to emanate from the nervous system and was capable of acting at a distance and causing movement of objects without contact.

His book Psychical and Supernormal Phenomena (1916) is an important contribution to psychical literature.

Sources:

Joire, Paul. Précis historique et pratique de Neuro-Hypnologie. N.p., 1892.

———. Traité de Graphologie scientifique. N.p., 1906.

———. Traité de l'Hypnotisme expérimental et thérapeutique. N.p., 1908.

Jones, Charles Stansfeld (1886–1950)

British occultist and author who lived in Canada and assumed the name Frater Achad. Jones was an accountant in Vancouver when he became a disciple of magician Aleister Crowley. Crowley would later come to consider Jones his "magical son" as prophesied in Crowley's early channeled text, The Book of the Law.

Crowley believed that Jones had discovered a kabalistic key to The Book of the Law. As a disciple Jones progressed to the grade of master of the temple in Crowley's secret order A∴A∴, while Crowley moved on to become a magus. There is a record of his achievement in Liber 165, partially published in Crowley's journal The Equinox (vol. 3, p. 127).

In attempting his mystical rebirth as a "Babe of the Abyss," Jones had a nervous breakdown. He returned briefly to England and joined the Roman Catholic Church, hoping to convert other Catholics to Crowley's Law of Thelema. Upon returning to Vancouver he wandered around the city wearing only a raincoat, which he threw off in public, crying that he had renounced all the veils of illusion. After his recovery Jones became somewhat hostile to Crowley, who had expelled him from his order.

Over the years Jones wrote a number of books, including The Anatomy of the Body of God (1925), which attempts a three-dimensional projection of the kabalistic Tree of Life. (See also Kabala)

Sources:

Achad, Frater [Charles Stansfeld Jones]. The Anatomy of the Body of God. Chicago: Collegium ad Spiritum Sanctum, 1925.

———. Chalice of Ecstacy. Chicago: Yogi Publication Society, 1923.

———. Liber 31. San Francisco: Level Press, 1974.

———. Q.B.L. or the Bride's Reception. The Author, 1922.

Jones, Franklin Albert (1939–)

Currently known by his religious name Avatara Adi Da, Franklin Jones is the founder of the Free Daist Communion, an advaita vedanta community that has undergone a number of changes since its founding in 1972. According to his own account, Jones was a fully enlightened being who gave up that enlightenment during the early years of this incarnation. As a young man he attended Columbia University (B.A., 1961), Stanford University (1961–62), and Lutheran Theological Seminary in Philadelphia (1966–67). In 1962 he participated in some research on drugs at the Veterans Administration Hospital, Mountain View, California, an event that stimulated his recovery of his enlightened state.

In 1964 Jones sought out Swami Rudrananda (Albert Rudolph) and in 1968 traveled to India to meet Swami Muktananda, one of Rudrananda's teachers. In the summer of 1970, while meditating in the temple of the Vedanta Society in Hollywood, California, he felt a "permanent reawakening." He founded the Dawn Horse Fellowship and began a public ministry on April 25, 1972. His first book, The Knee of Listening, had just appeared. The following year he severed his connection with Muktananda and changed his name to Bubba Free John.

He gathered around him a small group of devoted students with whom he worked in a somewhat intense fashion reminiscent of Georgei I. Gurdjieff. Many of his teachings given orally were transcribed and edited into books. In 1979 he withdrew from this form of active teachings and changed his name to Da (giver) Free John. He now saw his work as that of transmitting the transcendental condition to his students. As a teacher of advaita vedanta, he emphasized the unity and identity of the human self with the Brahman, the soul of all things. He continued to speak and write, and a steady flow of his books continued to be published. He also largely withdrew from public presence to an island in Fuji.

In the late 1980s he changed his name to Heart Master Da Love Ananda (bliss) and to Da Avabhasa (the Bright). This period has been accompanied by the release of those books that are considered the most important of his earthly career, The Dawn Horse Testament (1985) and Free Daism (1992), a presentation of his mature religious perspective. Jones is also known by the name Da Kalki.

Sources:

Bonner, Saniel. The Divine Emergence of the World-Teacher: The Realization, the Revelation and the Revealing Ordeal of Heart Master Da Love-Ananda. Clearlake, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1990.

Jones, Franklin [Heart Master Da Love Ananda]. Dawn Horse Testament. San Rafael, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1985.

——— [Da Avabhasa]. Free Daism: The Eternal, Ancient, and New Religion of God-Realization. Clearlake, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1992.

———. The Heart's Shout. Clearlake, Calif.: Dawn Horse Press, 1993.

———. The Knee of Listening. Los Angeles: Dawn Horse Press, 1972.

Jones, Jim (1931–1978)

Founder of the Peoples Temple 900, whose members died in a massive murder-suicide in 1978. Jones was for many years an honored pastor of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) before his career ended in controversy and death.

Jones was born May 31, 1931, in Lynn, Indiana. As a young man he became the pastor of a Methodist church but could not meet the Methodist standards for a minister. He left in 1954 to found an independent congregation in Indianapolis to further his vision of a church that could overcome racial barriers. He was impressed with the accomplishments of Father Divine, and he modeled his own church, which he called the Peoples Temple, on Father Divine's Peace Mission Movement. In the mid-1960s he had a vision of a nuclear holocaust and moved the congregation to Ukiah, California, which he believed would be a relatively safe location. In the meantime, he and the congregation had become affiliated with the Disciples of Christ.

In California, Jones became a social activist and was well known for his support of liberal social and political causes. He extended his work to Los Angeles and San Francisco, where he built predominantly African American congregations. Leadership, however, tended to fall into the hands of the minority white members. Worship followed a style common to the black community, with a gospel choir, spirited preaching, and reports of miracle healings. According to reports, Jones became increasingly autocratic in his leadership, and as he became frustrated at the lack of visible effects of his efforts to end racism, he began to lean increasingly toward Marxism.

In 1973 he founded a rural agricultural colony in the largely Marxist country of Guyana. Through the mid-1970s, as the colony seemed to prosper, there were an increasing number of rumors and accusations concerning irregularities at the temple, including charges of violence against former members and temple critics. In 1977, just before the appearance of an exposé article in New West magazine, Jones and many of his followers migrated to the colony, which had been named Jonestown.

Jones responded to the accusations with heightened paranoia. During this time he was also seeking a solution to the problem of financing his following and placing his followers in a harmonious environment. He explored a number of possibilities, including "revolutionary suicide,"—suicide committed in furtherance of a moral cause. During the Vietnam War, for example, several Buddhist monks killed themselves in protest of the war. Jones's situation was different, however, in that he was attempting to gain the entire community's acceptance of the idea.

In November 1978 California Congressman Leo Ryan made a visit to Guyana to observe life at Jonestown. For reasons still not well understood, immediately after he left and was preparing to return to the United States, a group of temple members attacked and killed him and his party. A short time later, most of the residents at Jonestown—approximately 900 men, women, and children—either committed suicide or were murdered. Jim Jones died on November 18, 1978 from a gunshot wound.

Understanding the tragedy of Jonestown has been hindered by the confiscation and storage under lock and key of the many records concerning the investigation of the temple and Ryan's death. The lack of information has allowed a wide range of speculation about what occurred. Jonestown has since become a popular example of the pitfalls of unapproved religious groups, or cults.

Sources:

Hall, John R. Gone from the Promised Land: Jonestown in American Cultural History. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction, 1987.

Melton, J. Gordon, ed. The Peoples Temple and Jim Jones: Broadening Our Perspectives. New York: Garland, 1990.

Moore, Rebecca, ed. New Religious Movements, Mass Suicide, and Peoples Temple: Scholarly Perspectives on a Tragedy. New York: Edwin Mellen, 1989.

Reiterman, Tom. Raven. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1982.

Jones, Marc Edmund (1888–1980)

Well-known writer on occult and astrological subjects. Born in St. Louis, Missouri, October 1, 1888, Jones was educated privately. From 1911 to 1918 he was a pioneer motion picture writer and the author of nearly 200 original screenplays. He was ordained a minister of the United Presbyterian Church and also founded the Sabian Assembly (concerned with solar mysteries).

Jones was founder of the Photoplay Authors' League (later renamed Screenwriters' Guild of the Authors' League of America). He was a member of the Writers Club (New York), the Writers (Hollywood), and Playwrights Club (New York). From 1922 on, he was a freelance writer and lecturer on metaphysical subjects; and occasional professional psychological, lay psychoanalytical, and astrological counselor. He was founder-editor of the Message, to which he contributed regularly beginning in 1926. He was an active proponent of New Thought and later in life he conducted 36 correspondence courses averaging 40,000 words each. Jones died on March 5, 1980.

Sources:

Jones, Marc Edmund. Essentials of Astrological Analysis. Stanwood, Wash.: Sabian Publishing Society, 1970.

———. How to Live With the Stars. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1976.

———. Key Truths of Occult Philosophy. Los Angeles: J. F. Rowney Press, 1925.

———. Occult Philosophy: An Introduction. Stanwood, Wash.: Sabian Publishing Society, 1971.

———. The Ritual of Living. Los Angeles: J. F. Rowney Press, 1930. Rev. ed. The Sabian Manual: A Ritual for Living. New York: Sabian Publishing Society, 1957.

———. The Sabian Book. Stanwood, Wash.: Sabian Publishing Society, 1973.

———. Scope of Astrological Prediction. Stanwood, Wash.: Sabian Publishing Society, 1969.

Jonson, Mr. (1854– ?) and Mrs. J. B. Jonson

Celebrated American mediums of Toledo, Ohio, who later moved to Altadena, California. Jonson was a painter and paperhanger who, with his wife, sat for materialization and direct voice phenomena. He was born October 16, 1854, in Akron, Ohio. His father was said to be a lineal descendant of the British poet Ben Jonson and his great-grandmother a descendant of Thomas Paine. Both his parents were Spiritualists and held a séance on the evening before his birth. His own psychic talents developed at age seven, when, while playing with his sister, he ran right through a burly black-whiskered man on the steps of the house. His sister also saw the phantom. She died soon after the incident, but manifested at a séance with Jonson when he was only 18.

Beginning in 1876 Jonson sat regularly in a home circle with friends, and physical manifestations occurred, including materializations. He also became a trumpet medium. He married in 1901, and his wife was usually present at séances. Both usually sat outside the cabinet, and Jonson went into trance. His wife was reputed to be a good direct voice medium.

Homer Taylor Yaryan, chief of the secret police under the Grant government, watched the mediums carefully for years and assured Admiral Usborne Moore that they were genuine. The admiral himself, in his book Glimpses of the Next State (1911), reached the same conclusion. He saw 15 to 16 phantoms—in circumstances that apparently excluded confederacy—emerge from the cabinet in a single sitting. Some of them dematerialized into the floor and it was possible to follow their heads with the eye until the shoulders were level with the carpet; some came too far out into the light, doubled up and collapsed; some dissipated after falling over on one side.

Each phantom had a distinctive movement of the limbs and carriage by which, in successive séances, they were identified. They were mostly etherealizations; the faces and heads alone were tangible. The admiral put his arms around the waist of a phantom relative and found nothing.

A white-robed figure with a bright silver band on her forehead and bracelets and jewels on her arm gave her name as "Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt"; another form claimed to be "Josephine."

In 1923 the Jonsons were visited in California by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who was greatly impressed by their materialization phenomena, which he believed genuine. He describes the séance in his book Our Second American Adventure (1923).

The Jonsons, however, did not live up to the favorable reputation that the experiments of Yaryan and Moore established for them. Considering the experiences of J. Hewat McKenzie in Toledo in 1917, those who accused them of fraud apparently had grounds for doing so. Writing in Psychic Science (April 1927), McKenzie notes:

"I proved on this visit, that the daughter of the Jonsons' masqueraded as a spirit, and would appear from the back room to dance as a materialised form in highly illuminated garments, the illumination for these being produced in an adjoining room with the help of magnesium wire used on clothing impregnated with phosphorescent paint. The smoke from the magnesium wire was seen by me in clouds in the room where she danced, and my sense of smell also recognized the well-known odour. Here we have a striking instance of what the abuse of spirit intercourse may lead to."

Sources:

Yaryan, Homer T. "An Investigator's Experience of Materialization Phenomena." Psychic Science (October 1926).

Jonsson, Olof (1918–)

Famous Swedish-born psychic who took part in telepathic experiments with Apollo astronaut Edgar Mitchell during Mitchell's flight to the moon. Jonsson trained as an engineer in Sweden, qualifying in 1941. He worked with various companies and in 1946 was appointed to be a design engineer at the Monarch motorcycle factory in Varberg. At this time his psychic gifts (which had been evident in childhood) became more widely manifested and he became known as "the psychic engineer" through his demonstrations of clairvoyance, telepathy, and psychokinesis.

He was tested by parapsychologists in Sweden and Denmark. He visited South America, Canada, China, Japan, and Australia, studying paranormal phenomena among primitive peoples. In 1953 J. B. Rhine of Duke University invited Jonsson to the United States, where he was tested by parapsychologists in such areas as telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, psychometry, and psychokinesis. His successful card guessing led to his being chosen to participate in the Apollo 14 tests of ESP with Edgar Mitchell during the three days before and after the moon landing. The tests are described in detail by Mitchell in the Journal of Parapsychology (June 1971). The results indicated scoring significantly above chance expectation. However, for a more skeptical view of claimed success, see the chapter "ESP in Outer Space" in Mediums, Mystics, and the Occult, by Milbourne Christopher (1975).

Among other psychic achievements, Jonsson is said to have elucidated 13 murder cases after visiting the scenes of the crimes and to have located three missing women. He was also supposed to have predicted accurately the time and place of death of Nasser and De Gaulle.

Sources:

Steiger, Brad. The Psychic Feats of Olof Jonsson. New York: Popular Library, 1971.

Jordan, Pacual (1902–ca. 1982)

Physicist who was concerned with the relationship of physics, psychology, and parapsychology. Jordan was born on October 18, 1902, at Hanover, Germany, and studied at Göttingen University (Ph.D., 1924). He was professor of theoretical physics at the University of Rostock (1929–44) and later a professor of theoretical physics at the Universities of Berlin and Hamburg. Jordan conducted joint research with Niels Bohr and Werner Heisenberg in quantum mechanics and in 1942 won the Max Planck Medal for his work in physics. He also won the Gauss Medal of the German Physical Society in 1955.

Through the 1950s Jordan manifested an interest in parapsychology. He contributed articles to the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, including one on "Quantum Field Theory." He was a member of the International Conference on Philosophy and Parapsychology, St. Paul de Vence, France, 1954, where he lectured on "New Trends in Physics and Their Relation to Parapsychology."

Sources:

Jordan, Pacual. "New Trends in Physics and Their Relation to Parapsychology." Parapsychology Foundation Newsletter (July–August 1955).

———. Verdrängung and Komplementarität (Repression and Complementarity). N.p., 1951.

Joseph Plan Foundation

The Joseph Plan Foundation was created in 1993 by Tara Singh, one of the more popular teachers of A Course in Miracles, a work channeled in the 1960s by Dr. Helen Schucman, a psychiatrist living in New York City. Published in the mid-1970s, A Course in Miracles became possibly the single most popular channeled work issued during the period of the New Age Movement. During the 1980s, a number of teachers emerged as commentators on the course.

Raised in India, Tara Singh became a practitioner of yoga and a monk. During the 1970s he spent five years in a silent retreat in Carmel, California. Soon after he ended the retreat, he discovered A Course in Miracles and in 1979 met Schucman. They had a number of visits in the two years prior to her death in 1981. Singh began to offer workshops on A Course in Miracles and to create a perspective drawing upon his appropriation of both Hinduism and the Western idealistic philosophical tradition represented by such thinkers as Ralph Waldo Emerson. A Course in Miracles has been seen as a contemporary restatement of the New Thought metaphysical tradition, and Emerson as providing the tradition its philosophical basis.

For many years Singh offered his workshops and lectures under the aegis of the Foundation for Life Action, which has been superseded by the Joseph Plan Foundation. Singh has also authored a number of popular books, including Awakening a Child from Within (1991), A Gift for All Mankind (1993), and Exploring A Course in Miracles (1996). Most of Singh's materials, including a number of audiocassettes, have been published by his Life Action Press.

The Joseph Plan Foundation may be contacted at P.O. Box 481228, Los Angeles, CA 90048. It has a website at http://www.josephplan.org/.

Sources:

Joseph Plan Foundation. http://www.josephplan.org/. May 17, 2000.

Singh, Tara. Awakening a Child from Within. Los Angeles: Life Action Press, 1991.

———. Exploring A Course in Miracles. Los Angeles: Life Action Press, 1996.

———. A Gift for All Mankind. Los Angeles: Life Action Press, 1993.

Jouret, Luc (1947–1994)

Luc Jouret, cofounder of the Solar Temple (Ordre du Temple Solaire), the occult group known because of the suicide of some 50 members in several incidents October 3–5, 1994, was born on October 18, 1947 in what was then the Belgian Congo, Africa. His Belgian parents returned to their homeland in the 1950s, and Jouret attended the Free University of Brussels from which he received his medical degree. During his college years he also became a Marxist, a fact that placed him under police surveillance. Two years after graduation, in 1976, he joined the Belgian Army and became a paratrooper. While in the army he participated in a famous action in Zaire to rescue some Europeans whose lives had become threatened in the newly independent nation.

Following his time in the army, he began a formal study of homeopathy (a very popular form of medical treatment in French-speaking Europe) and emerged as a homeopathic physician. He traveled widely studying various forms of alternative and spiritual healing. At the beginning of the 1980s he settled in Annemasse, France, not far from the Swiss border. He continued to lecture widely on holistic health and the paranormal and invited those who responded to him into Amenta Club (later renamed the Atlanta Club).

Among the groups for which he lectured was the Golden Way Foundation, a New Age group in Geneva, Switzerland, and he became close friends with the foundation's leader, Joseph Di Mambro (1924–1994). Di Mambro had been a Rosicrucian and Jouret had in 1981 affiliated with the Renewed Order of the Temple, an occult order founded in the 1970s by Julian Origas (1920–1983). They soon discovered their mutual interests and in 1984 together founded the Solar Temple. By this time Jouret was traveling widely through French-speaking Europe, Eastern Canada and Martinique as an inspirational speaker. While Di Mambro directed the group from behind the scenes, Jouret was its outward image and primary recruiter.

The Solar Temple wedded the Templars tradition to the New Age. It drew its authority in part by an appeal to a lineage of grand masters that was claimed to go back to the medieval Order of the Temple that was suppressed at the beginning of the fourteenth century. Di Mambro assigned members a significant role as agents to bring the New Age into visible presence in the world. The temple offered a program of personal spiritual progress through the practice of occult disciplines and rituals that invoked the power of the Great White Brotherhood to bring forth the New Age.

Jouret led a growing organization through the 1980s, but in the 1990s, troubles began to plague the temple. Members began to depart, Di Mambro fell ill, and authorities in several countries began to investigate its activities. Jouret and Di Mambro became increasingly pessimistic, especially after Jouret was arrested for attempting to purchase three handguns with silencers in Quebec. The incident was widely reported in the media and destroyed his reputation in Quebec.

In 1993 Jouret, Di Mambro, and several members traveled to Australia. By this time they were beginning to discuss the refusal of the public to evolve and bring in the New Age. They began to put together a set of documents that would be mailed out in October of 1994 detailing their rationale for their final act in which they would escape the world to a higher dimension. On October 3–5, 1994, Jouret and some 12 other members of the temple died by suicide at two locations in Switzerland. The night before he died, Jouret joined Di Mambro and a small group of members in a lavish last meal together at a local restaurant. Prior to their own death, the group assisted other members who had taken tranquilizers to die. These members were shot. The Solar Temple disbanded after Jouret's death, though a year later another group would commit suicide and in 1997 five more died believing that they were following the first group to a higher dimension.

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo. "The Magic of Death: The Suicides of the Solar Temple." In Catherine Wessinger, ed. Millennialism, Persecution, and Violence: Historical Cases. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

Meyer, Jean François. "&43'Our Terrestrial Journey is Coming to an end:" The Late Voyage of the Solar Temple." Nova Religio 2, 2 (April 1999): 172–96.

Palmer, Susan. "Purity and Danger in the Solar Temple." Journal of Contemporary Religion 11, 3 (October 1996): 303–18.

Wessinger, Catherine. How the Millennium Comes Violently. New York: Seven Bridges Press, 2000.

Journal du Magnetisme et du Psychisme Experimental Monthly publication founded by Baron Du Potet, covering 20 volumes (1845–61). It was later continued and edited by Henri Durville as the official organ of the Société Psychiques Internationale.

Journal of Automatic Writing

Journal concerned with automatic writing. Last known address: Spiritual Press, Box 464, Don Mills, Ontario M3C 2T3 Canada.

Journal of Borderland Research

Bimonthly publication of Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, concerned with such subjects as vril, telluric energies, radionics, radiesthesia, and related topics. Address: P.O. Box 6250, Eureka, CA 95502.

Journal of Holistic Health

A defunct publication that dealt with New Age teachings of a comprehensive and integrated approach to life, combining diet, environmental concern, personal responsibility, and spiritual growth. Contributors included Pir Vilayat Inayat Khan, Olga Worrall, Ruth Carter Stapleton, and Jonas Salk. Address: Mandala Holistic Health, P.O. Box 1233, Del Mar, CA 92014.

Journal of Humanistic Psychology

Quarterly professional journal of the Association for Humanistic Psychology, concerned largely with aspects of consciousness expansion from a psychological viewpoint, presenting research, theory, and discussion on various aspects of consciousness, health, and growth. Address: 45 Franklin St., No. 315, San Francisco, CA 94102.

Journal of Instrumented UFO Research

Former journal published at irregular intervals, specializing in the detection of UFOs by sophisticated electronic equipment. Psychic Ray Stanford of Austin, Texas, established the site upon which a UFO detection device was placed.

Journal of Man

J. R. Buchanan's journal of research in psychometry. Founded in 1853 in Cincinnati, it superseded S. B. Brittan's Spiritualist monthly The Shekinah. No longer published.

The Journal of Meteorology

One of several British periodicals concerned with the phenomenon of crop circles. It was formerly edited by George Terence Meaden and published by the now-defunct The Circles Effect Research Unit.

Sources:

Meaden, George Terence. The Circles Effect and Its Mysteries. Bradford-on-Avon, UK: Artetech Publishing, 1989.

Journal of Occult Studies

Short-lived quarterly publication of the Occult Studies Foundation, in cooperation with the University of Rhode Island, as "an interdisciplinary approach to Paranormal Phenomena." Beginning in May 1977 it published several issues until 1980, when its name was changed to MetaScience Quarterly and the foundation name to MetaScience Foundation. The change of name reflected reservations about the contemporary connotations of the word occult, since the MetaScience Foundation intends to maintain a high standard of scientific information in the field of parapsychology and related subjects. Address: MetaScience Quarterly, Box 32, Kingston, RI 02881.

Journal of Orgonomy

Biannual journal representing an authoritative view of the life, work, and writings of the late psychologist Wilhelm Reich. The journal is published by a group of accredited Reichian physicians and includes previously unpublished writings of Reich as well as contemporary views and research on orgone energy and associated topics. Address: The American College of Orgonomy, P.O. Box 490, Princeton, NJ 08542. Website: http://www.orgonomy.org/.

Sources:

The American College of Orgonomy. http://www.orgonomy.org/. March 27, 2000.

Journal of Our Time

Canadian journal concerned with Fourth Way teachings deriving from the philosophy of Georgei Gurdjieff. Last known address: P.O. Box 484, Adelaide St., Toronto, ON, M5C 2K4 Canada.

Journal of Parapsychology

Quarterly journal published since 1937 and edited for many years by Louisa E. Rhine (1891–1983) and Dorothy H. Pope. It is a scholarly publication "devoted primarily to the original publication of experimental results and other research findings in extrasensory perception and psychokinesis." In addition, articles presenting reviews of "literature relevant to parapsychology, criticisms of published work, theoretical and philosophical discussions, and new methods of mathematical analysis" are included in its scope. The journal has been the major organ of academic parapsychology since its founding. It is published by the Parapsychology Press, Rhine Research Center, 402 N. Buchanan Blvd., Durham, NC 27701.

Journal of Research in Psi Phenomena

Organ of the Kingston Association for Research in Parasciences. Last known address: P.O. Box 141, Kingston, ON, K7L 4V6, Canada.

Journal of Scientific Exploration

Semiannual journal of the Society for Scientific Exploration, devoted to advancing the study of anomalous phenomena originally catalogued by Charles Fort. Study includes anomalies in various areas of established science as well as in areas outside of established science that are currently being investigated under controlled laboratory conditions. The society also studies anomalies in areas outside established science that have not been subjected to investigation under control conditions, such as cryptozoology (the study of life forms such as Sasquatch and "Nessie"), precognition, extrasensory perception, psychokinesis, and UFO phenomena.

Address: Marsha Sims, Executive Editor, P.O. Box 5848, Stanford, CA 94309-5848. Website: http://www.scientificexploration.org/jse.html.

Sources:

Journal of Scientific Exploration. http://www.scientificexploration.org/jse.html. March 8, 2000.

Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research

The major quarterly publication of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR). It originally was published from 1906 until 1928, when volume 22 was continued under the title Psychic Research. In January 1932, however, the original title was resumed. The Journal and also the Proceedings of the ASPR are now published from the society's headquarters at 5 W. 73rd St., New York, NY 10023.

Journal of the American Society for Psychosomatic Dentistry and Medicine

Quarterly professional journal relating parapsychological phenomena, hypnosis, acupuncture, and similar subjects to medicine and the welfare of patients. Last known address: 2802 Mermaid Ave., Brooklyn, NY 11224.

Journal of the Society for Psychical Research

Published since 1884. Volumes 1 through 34 (1884–1948) were restricted to members of the society, but issues since September 1949 have been available for purchase by the public. The journal is now published quarterly by the society at 49 Marloes Rd., Kensington, London W8 6LA, England. The society also publishes a Combined Index to the Journal, and the society's Proceedings are also published.

Journal of Transpersonal Psychology

Semiannual journal with contributions concerned with a psychological approach to dreams, meditation, psychic experiences, biofeedback, and consciousness-expanding techniques. Last known address: 345 S. California, Palo Alto, CA 94306.

Journal of UFO Studies

Irregular publication of the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies (formerly the Center for UFO Studies). The journal is concerned with UFO research at a scholarly level, and articles include abstracts and bibliographies. Address: J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies, 2457 W. Peterson Ave., Chicago, IL 60659.

Journal of Vampirism

Short-lived journal of the Vampire Studies Society. It was published for several years in the mid-1970s by Chicago vampirologist Martin V. Riccardo.

Journal of Vampirology

Scholarly journal founded in 1984 and edited by John L. Vellutini. This quarterly journal covered many aspects of vampires, especially vampire folklore from around the world. It was discontinued in the early 1990s.

Journal UFO

Former Canadian publication reporting on UFO activities and related mysteries.

Joy, Sir George Andrew (1896–1974)

Official of the British Colonial and Foreign Office, also active in the field of psychical research. He was born on February 20, 1896, in London. He served in the British army and was, successively, assistant commissioner for the New Hebrides Condominium; resident commissioner and deputy commissioner for the Western Pacific; consultant for the Hoorn and Wallace Island; resident adviser to the Quaiti and Kathiri sultans, Hadhramaut States of Arabia; civil secretary to the government of Adam, and commissioner for civil defense, governor and commander-in-chief of St. Helena. He received numerous awards.

Joy served a tenure as secretary of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, beginning in 1958, and was a member of the SPR Council. He was later vice president of the organization. Joy died on April 25, 1974.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Joy Touch

Joy Touch is a meditation/healing technique developed by brain scientist Pete Sanders. Sanders graduated from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in the mid-1970s with majors in medical chemistry and brain science. He turned down the opportunity to attend Harvard Medical School to engage in independent research in mind-body potentials. In 1980 he settled in Sedona, Arizona, and opened Free Soul Mind Body Education. Drawing on his knowledge of the brain, he searched for ways to tap what he saw as the unlimited potential of the individual. He explored and taught a wide variety of healing techniques, including various means of cardiovascular stress reduction, and access to the body's psychic reception areas and what he termed "energy blending" for gaining a sense of oneness with the soul and beyond. He summarized these discoveries in a first book, You Are Psychic! (1990).

Beginning in the late 1980s, he turned his attention to solving the problem of emotional stress and its role in reducing human happiness. He discovered a meditation method for directly stimulating what he terms the body's joy center.

The joy touch technique leads to what Sanders believes is a mental "triggering [of] the septal nuclei of the septum pellucidum area of the brain." For the person performing the operation, it is quite simple and draws on familiar biofeedback processes.

Sanders may be contacted at his center, Free Soul, at P.O. Box 1762, Sedona, AZ 86339. His Internet site is located at http://www.freesoul.net/. The center has been located in Sedona to make use of the stimulation for successful meditation provided by the psychic vortexes believed to be located there. Sanders publishes the various techniques he uses in his books, but invites people to his center to experience them in the context of the vortexes. He also trains others who wish to teach them.

Sources:

Sanders, Peter A., Jr. Access Your Brain's Joy Center: The Free Soul Method. Sedona, Ariz.: Free Soul, 1997.

———. You Are Psychic! The Free Soul Method. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1990.

Judd, Pearl (1908–1967)

Direct voice medium of Dunedin, New Zealand, who held séances in a well-lighted room or in daylight with remarkable manifestations, as described in Clive Chapman's book The Blue Room (1927).

In Psychic Research (November 1930) psychical researcher Harry Price quoted the testimony of W. P. Gowland, professor of anatomy and neurologist at the Medical School, Dunedin. Gowland witnessed the levitation of heavy tables and the playing of a specified tune on an ordinary piano when three people were sitting on the closed and locked lid. He also heard invisible instruments and many voices.

An entity named "Sahnaei," who first manifested in 1923, stated he was an Arab who had lived hundreds of years before. Sahnaei appeared to be in charge of a band of communicators including "Captain Trevor," "Ronald," "George Thurston," "Charlie," "Grace," "Oliver," "Jack," and "Vilma." Judd's uncle, Clive Chapman, was also a medium and was present at the most impressive séances. These were held in a blue room, hence the title of Chapman's book. Pearl Judd retired some years after publication of the book. Chapman died August 10, 1967, at age 84.

Judge, William Q(uan) (1851–1896)

Prominent American Theosophist and one of the founders of the Theosophical Society along with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Henry Steel Olcott. Born April 13, 1851, in Ireland, Judge studied occult literature and immigrated to the United States, where he became a lawyer. After Blavatsky and Olcott moved to India, Judge became the leader of the American branch of the society. Following the death of Blavatsky, he was involved in the case of the Mahatma letters, in which communications allegedly from the Koot Hoomi, a mysterious adept, appeared to favor Judge's taking charge of the esoteric section of the society, as opposed to Blavatsky's choice to succeed her, Annie Besant.

At the 1895 convention of the American section of the Theosophical Society, members decided to secede from the parent society. Judge was elected president for life of the Theosophical Society in America. He died March 21, 1896, and passed leadership to Katherine Tingley.

Among his various writings Judge produced his own edition of the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali, study notes on the Bhagavad Gita, and a book, The Ocean of Theosophy (1893).

Sources:

Eek, Sven, and Boris de Zirkoff. William Quan Judge: Theosophical Pioneer. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1969.

Judge, William Q. Echoes of the Orient. 2 vols. San Diego, Calif.: Point Loma Publications, 1975, 1980.

———. The Ocean of Theosophy. Reprint, Point Loma, Calif.: Theosophical University Press, 1974.

Judith, Anodea (1952–)

Anodea Judith, Pagan priestess and former president of the Church of All Worlds, was born Judith Ann Mull on December 1, 1952, in Elyria, Ohio. She was raised in the Church of Christ, Scientist, but rejected Christianity as a teenager. She entered Clark University with the idea of becoming a therapist, but did not like the concentration on academic psychology as opposed to training in counseling. She dropped out, became an artist and moved to California in 1973. In 1974 she began a course of study at the California College of Arts and Crafts in Oakland.

The year 1975 became a turning point in her life. She radically changed her lifestyle which included becoming a vegetarian, stopping smoking, practicing yoga, and engaging in fasts. Along the way she had a vivid out-of-body experience in which she saw a book on the chakras (the sense organs of the spiritual body as conceived in tantric thought) written by herself. She began to teach workshops and classes in the San Francisco Bay area on such topics as yoga, the aura, and psychology. She also spent a significant amount of time by herself in the backwoods, and as she attuned herself to nature she changed her name to Anodea Judith. As she was going through this change, she read Zsusanna Budapest's Feminist Book of Light and Shadows and met Tim Zell (now known as Oberon G'Zell), the founder of the pioneering Neo-Pagan organization, the Church of All Worlds. Through the church she received some consciousness of the changes she was undergoing and came to see herself as a Pagan.

Judith quickly became a leader in the Church of All Worlds and worked with Gwydion Pedderwen (1946–1982) on the development of Annfin, the church's sanctuary. In 1978 she settled in Berkeley and became involved in a number of Pagan activities. She assisted Isaac Bonewits with the publication of Pentalpha, the Druid journal. She worked with author Marion Zimmer Bradley in the Aquarian Order of the Restoration. Professionally she gradually gave up her art to concentrate on bodywork (including bioenergetics and massage) and healing. In 1983 she founded Lifeways, the educational arm of the Church of All Worlds. In 1984, having been named a steward of Annfin, she moved there for 18 months, after which she returned to Berkeley to complete her first book, published in 1987 as Wheels of Life: A User's Guide to the Chakra System.

In 1988 she married Richard Ely, a Pagan, and they have developed an open marriage within the context of the free sexuality espoused by the Church of All Worlds. In the late 1980s Judith served a term as the church's president. Through the 1990s she has worked as a psychological counselor, having completed her degree in metaphysical psychology at the Rosebridge Graduate School of Integrative Therapy, and continues to write.

Sources:

Hopman, Ellen Evert, and Lawrence Bond, eds. People of the Earth: The New Pagans Speak Out. Rochester, Vt.: Destiny Books, 1996.

Judith, Anodea. Eastern Body, Western Mind: Psychology and the Chakra System As a Path to the Self. Berkeley, Calif.: Ten Speed Press, 1997.

———. The Sevenfold Journey: Reclaiming Mind, Body and Spirit Through the Chakras. Freedom, Calif.: Crossing Press, 1993.

———. Wheels of Life: A User's Guide to the Chakra System. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1987.

Ju-Ju

A term applied in a variety of ways by non-African writers to describe various features and sometimes even the whole of the system of African traditional tribal religion and/or magic practice. It is a French word meaning "little doll." Like fetishism, it is a term that has been abandoned in the contemporary discussion of African religion.

Sources:

King, Noel Q. African Cosmos: An Introduction to Religion in Africa. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1986.

Parrinder, Geoffrey. African Traditional Religion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1962.

Peek, Philip M., ed. African Divination Systems. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991.

Julia's Bureau

A public institution founded by William T. Stead in 1909 in London for free communication with "the beyond." Visitors were allowed to have three sittings with three different mediums to experience communication. Shorthand records were kept. For distant inquirers, psychometric readings were given. Robert King, Alfred Vout Peters, Mrs. Wesley Adams, J. J. Vango, and Etta Wriedt were employed as mediums. In its three years' existence about 1,300 sittings were given; running the bureau cost Stead about £1,500 a year.

The idea for the bureau was suggested to Stead in his own automatic scripts by the spirit of "Julia A. Ames," an American journalist, who was his constant communicator. In 1914 the work of Julia's Bureau was taken up by a new organization, the W. T. Stead Borderland Library, founded by Estelle W. Stead along the lines of other Spiritualist societies.

Jung, Carl Gustav (1875–1961)

Swiss psychologist who made the study of various occult ideas valid within the framework of psychology. Jung was born on July 26, 1875, at Kesswil, Thurgau, Switzerland. He studied medicine at the University of Basel, Switzerland, (1895–1900) and completed his M.D. at the University of Zürich (1902). While still a student he became fascinated with the occult, on which he read a number of books. He also attended several Spiritualist séances. Jung's first publication was an essay on the psychology and pathology of occult phenomena.

Jung became a physician and assisted Eugene Bleuler at the Burghölzi Mental Hospital in Zürich. In 1905 he joined the faculty at the University of Zürich; about the same time he became interested in the new psychoanalysis of Sigmund Freud. He became a leading student of Freud and in 1911 served as president of the International Psychoanalytic Society. In 1913, however, he went his own way as a result of what he regarded as Freud's overemphasis on sexual theories and opposition to occult ideas.

Jung's break with Freudian theory was marked by his paper "Symbols of the Libido," written in 1913. He resigned from the university that year, and for the next twenty years engaged in private practice, which allowed him to develop the approach he termed "analytic psychology." In his 1921 text Psychological Types he introduced his understanding of personality based on a set of polarities—introvert/extrovert, feeling/thinking, and sensation/intuition. Jung saw individual personality as determined by the balance or imbalance of these polarities.

Jung developed a view of the individual as consisting of a set of personality aspects he termed the ego (self-awareness), the persona (the expected social role played by each person), the shadow (a dark side), the animus (in a female) or anima (in a male) (the unconscious attitude toward the opposite sex), the self (soul or spirit), and the unconscious. He believed the development of a healthy personality, a process called "individuation," occurs as the various opposites in the personality are differentiated and then balanced.

Out of this basic understanding of the self several concepts of particular relevance to the modern occult community emerged. For example, Jung saw the unconscious as consisting of two layers—the personal unconscious and the collective unconscious. The collective unconscious, he said, is a deposit of archetypes or fundamental modes of apprehension that are common to all humanity because of the universality of certain underlying experiences. Archetypes manifest themselves in ancient (and not so ancient) myths, dreams, symbols, and artistic productions. One important appearance of archetypes is in the god forms of the ancient polytheistic religions. Thus one can speak of the archetype of the sky god or the mother goddess. Also from his concept of archetype, Jung speculated on the nature of flying saucers, about which he wrote a short book.

He also introduced the concept of synchronicity, the connecting principle between events, as distinct from conventional cause and effect, an important idea in modern astrology, which has attempted to break out of its deterministic mode of conceptualizing the relationship between humans and the zodiac.

Jung returned to teaching in 1933 as a professor of psychology at the Federal Polytechnical University, Zürich (1933–41) and professor of medical psychology at the University of Basel (1943–44). He spent his last years as a consultant and lecturer at the C. G. Jung Institute (1948–61). His many writings wore compiled in Collected Works (1953).

Jung's perception covered every major area of human experience. His occult experiences are indicated in his book VII Sermones ad Mortuoso, published anonymously, which dramatizes Jung's journey into the unconscious. Some of his reminiscences are recorded in Memories, Dreams, Reflections (1963). He died June 6, 1961, at Kuessnacht, Zürich.

Sources:

Charet, F. X. Spiritualism and the Foundations of C. G. Jung's Psychology. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

Franz, Marie-Louise von. On Divination and Synchronicity: The Psychology of Meaningful Chance. Toronto: Inner City Books, 1980.

Merkur, Daniel. Gnosis: An Esoteric Tradition of Mystical Visions and Unions. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Jung-Stilling, Johann Heinrich (1740–1817)

German author and physician, born on September 12, 1740, as Johann Heinrich Jung, was best known under his assumed name, Heinrich Stilling. He was professor of political economy, public administration, and agriculture at several German universities, a contemporary of Franz A. Mesmer, and founder of a German spiritual school of cosmology. His book Theorie der Geister-Kunde (1808; English translation by S. Jackson as Theory of Pneumatology, 1834) contains a great number of authentic narratives of apparitions and similar phenomena. Jung-Stilling also expounded the doctrine of a psychic body, based on the luminiferous ether.

According to Jung-Stilling, animal magnetism undeniably proves that we have an inward man, a soul, constituted of the divine spark, the immortal spirit, possessing reason and will, and of a luminous body that is inseparable from it. Light, electricity, magnetic forces, galvanic matter, and ether appear to be all one and the same body under different modifications, according to Jung-Stilling. This light substance, or ether, is the element that connects body and soul and the spiritual and material worlds. When the inward man—the human soul—forsakes the outward sphere, where the senses operate and merely continue the vital functions, the body falls into an entranced state, or a profound sleep, during which the soul acts more freely and powerfully. All its faculties are elevated.

The more the soul is divested of the body, the more extensive, free, and powerful is its inward sphere of operation, Jung-Stilling said. It has, therefore, no need whatever of the body in order to live and exist. The body is rather a hindrance to it. The soul does not require the organs of sense—it can see, hear, smell, taste, and feel in a much more perfect state.

The boundless ether that fills the space of our solar system is the element in which spirits live and move, according to Jung-Stilling. The atmosphere that surrounds our earth, down to its center, and particularly the night, is the abode of fallen angels and of human souls that die in an unconverted state. Jung-Stilling discouraged communications with the spirit world as sinful and dangerous. He considered trance a diseased condition. He believed implicitly in the efficacy of prayer and claimed psychic powers himself. More than ten weeks before the event, he predicted the tragic fate of Swiss writer Johann Kaspar Lavater, who was shot by a soldier in Zürich in 1801. The first part of Jung-Stilling's autobiography (Heinrich Stillings Jugend, 1777) was published at the instigation of Goethe.

He died on April 2, 1817.

Sources:

Jung, Johann Heinrich. Heinrich Stilling. Translated by S. Jackson. 1835–36. 2nd ed. 1843. Abridged ed., edited by R. O. Moon. N.p., 1886.

Jürgenson, Friedrich (1903–1987)

Russian-born Swedish painter and film producer who first discovered the paranormal voice phenomenon that has since come to be known as Raudive voices or the electronic voice phenomenon. In July 1959 Jürgenson recorded the song of a Swedish finch on his tape recorder and on playback heard what appeared to be a human voice. He thought there must be some fault in the apparatus, but subsequent recordings contained an apparent message that seemed to be from his dead mother. Jürgenson mentioned his experiences in a book that made a deep impression on the Latvian psychologist Konstantin Raudive.

The two men conducted further research into paranormal voices on tape recordings, collaborating with other scientists between 1964 and 1969. The collaborators included Hans Bender of the University of Freiburg and Friedebert Karger of the Max Planck Institute in Munich.

After 1969 Jürgenson and Raudive had some differences of opinion and conducted their further research independently.

Raudive's research was extensive and included the collection and study of more than 100,000 recordings. Following publication of his book on the subject, translated into English as Breakthrough: An Amazing Experiment in Electronic Communication with the Dead (1971), the phenomenon became generally known and discussed as ''Raudive voices,'' although more recently the term electronic voice phenomenon has become preferred by parapsychologists.

Essentially this phenomenon consists of paranormal voice communications (apparently from the dead) that are heard on recordings made on standard tape recorders, sometimes enhanced by a simple diode circuit. The voices are also apparent on the ''white noise'' of certain radio bands.

In view of traditional opposition to Spiritualist phenomena from the Catholic Church in the past, it is significant that the work of Jürgenson on paranormal voice recordings has been known to the Holy See since 1960, and according to Jürgenson the suggestion that these recordings are voices from the dead has been sympathetically considered. In 1969 Archbishop Dr. Bruno B. Heim presented Jürgenson to Pope Paul VI for investiture as commander of the Order of St. Gregory. This honor, however, was in respect of Jürgenson's work as a filmmaker.

After the initial discovery of the paranormal voice phenomenon through tape recordings of a bird song, some confusion was caused by the announcement that Raudive later investigated mediumistic messages conveyed by a budgerigar (parrot). Such bird voices may be related to the electronic voice phenomenon discovered by Jürgenson, but are basically of a different nature. Jürgenson died October 15, 1987, at his home in Hoor, Sweden, at age 84.

Sources:

Bander, Peter. Voices from the Tapes. New York: Drake Publishers, 1973.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Raudive, Konstantin. Sprechfunk mit Vesterbenen. Freiburg I Br., Germany: Herman Bauer, 1967. Translated as Breakthrough: An Amazing Experiment in Electronic Communication with the Dead. Gerrards Cross, UK: Colin Smythe; New York: Taplinger, 1971.

Juste, Michael

Pseudonym of poet and occultist Michael Houghton, an associate of Aleister Crowley.

Jyotir Maya Nanda, Swami (1931–)

Disciple of the late Swami Sivananda of Rishikesh, India, now president of Yoga Research Foundation of Miami, Florida. Jyotir Maya Nanda was born February 3, 1931, in Dumari Buzurg, District Saran, Bihar, India, and educated at the Science College of Patna University. He became a renunciate at age 22 and served as a religious professor at the Sivananda Ashram in Rishikesh for nine years. He lectured on yoga and Vedanta and also edited the journal Yoga Vedanta.

In 1962, at the invitation of Swami Lalitananda (formerly Leonora Rego), also a disciple of Swami Sivananda, Jyotir Maya Nanda moved to Puerto Rico to head the Temple of the Eternal Religion of India. In 1969 he moved with Swami Lalitananda to Miami as head of the International School of Yoga, now reformed as the Yoga Research Foundation. The foundation has issued a number of publications on yoga and Hindu philosophy, as well as tape recordings and study courses.

Sources:

Jyotir Maya Nanda, Swami. The Way to Liberation. Miami, Fla.: Swami Lalitananda, 1976.

———. Yoga Can Change Your Life. Miami, Fla.: International Yoga Society, 1975.

———. Yoga in Life. Miami, Fla.: The Author, 1973.

———. Yoga Vasistha. Miami, Fla.: Yoga Research Society, 1977.

K

Ka

The human double or astral body in ancient Egyptian belief. The ka was usually depicted as a birdlike duplicate of the deceased. Egyptologist Gaston Maspero defined it as "a kind of second copy of the body in matter less dense than the corporeal, a coloured though real projection of the individual, an exact reproduction of him in every part." The ka was believed to live in the tomb. Egyptians mummified the deceased's body and filled the tomb with provisions to prolong the life of the ka. If neglected the ka was thought to come out of the tomb and haunt the guilty relatives.

The ka was not to be confused with the soul, called ba or bai, which was believed to abandon the material body and the double at the moment of death.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hornung, Erik. Conceptions of God in Ancient Egypt. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1982.

Kabala (or Kabbalah or Cabbalah or Cabbala or Cabala)

A Hebrew and Jewish system of Gnosticism or Theosophy. The word means "doctrines received from tradition." In ancient Hebrew literature the name was used to denote the entire body of religious writings, the Pentateuch excepted. It was only in the early Middle Ages that the mystical system known as Kabalism was designated by that name.

The Kabala deals with the nature of God and with the sephiroth, or divine emanations of angels and man. God, the En Soph, fills and contains the universe. As in Gnosticism, God is boundless, inconceivable, and distantly transcendent. In a certain mystical sense, God can be thought of as nonexistent or preexistent. To justify existence the deity had to become active and creative, and this was achieved through the medium of the ten sephiroth, intelligences that emanated from God like rays proceeding from a luminary.

The first sephiroth was the wish to become manifest, and this contained nine other intelligences or sephiroth, which again emanated one from the other—the second from the first, the third from the second, and so forth. These ten sephiroth were known as the "Crown," "Wisdom," "Intelligence," "Love," "Justice," "Beauty," "Firmness," "Splendor," "Foundation," and "Kingdom." From the junction of pairs of sephiroth other emanations were formed; thus from Wisdom and Intelligence proceeded Love or Justice and from Love and Justice, Beauty.

The sephiroth were also symbolic of primordial man and heavenly man, of which earthly man was the shadow. They formed three triads, representing intellectual, moral, and physical qualities: the first was Wisdom, Intelligence, and Crown; the second, Love, Justice, and Beauty; the third, Firmness, Splendor, and Foundation.

The whole was encircled or bound by Kingdom, the ninth sephiroth. Each of these triads symbolized a portion of the human frame: the first, the head; the second, the arms; the third, the legs. Although those sephiroth were emanations from God, they remained a portion of God, simply representing different aspects of the One Being.

Kabalistic cosmology posits the existence of four different worlds, each forming a sephirotic system of a decade of emanations generated thusly: from the world of emanations, or the heavenly man, came a direct emanation from the En Soph. From the emanation was produced the world of creation, or the Briatic world of pure nature, less spiritual than the world of the heavenly man. The angel Metatron inhabited the Briatic world and constituted a world of pure spirit. He governed the visible world and guided the revolutions of the planets. From the world of pure nature was created the world of formation or the Yetziratic world, the abode of angels.

Finally, from these three worlds emanate the world of action or matter, the dwelling of evil spirits. It is said to contain ten hells, each becoming lower until the depths of diabolical degradation are reached. The prince of this region is the evil spirit Samuel, the serpent spoken of in the book of Genesis, otherwise known as "the Beast."

The universe was incomplete, however, without the creation of man. The heavenly Adam (the tenth sephiroth) created the earthly Adam, each member of whose body corresponds to a part of the visible universe. The human form is said to be shaped according to the four letters that constitute the Jewish tetragrammaton: YHWH.

Souls preexist in the world of emanations, and are all destined to inhabit human bodies, according to the Kabala. Like the sephiroth from which it emanates, every soul has ten potencies, consisting of a trinity of triads—spirit, soul, and elemental soul, or neptesh. Each soul, before its entrance into the world, consists of male and female united into one being, but when it descends to earth, the two parts are separated and animate different bodies.

The destiny of the soul upon earth is to develop from the perfect germ implanted in it, which must ultimately return to En Soph. If the soul does not succeed in acquiring the experience for which it has been sent to earth, it must reinhabit the body three times so that it becomes duly purified. When all the souls in the world of the sephiroth have passed through this period of probation and returned to the bosom of En Soph, the Jubilee will begin. Even Satan will be restored to his angelic nature, and existence will be a Sabbath without end. The Kabala states that these esoteric doctrines are contained in the Hebrew Scriptures but cannot be perceived by the uninitiated; they are, however, plainly revealed to persons of spiritual mind.

The Kabala is sometimes regarded as occult literature, and it has been stated that the philosophical doctrines developed in its pages have been perpetuated by a secret of oral tradition from the first ages of humanity. As British Hebrew and biblical scholar Christian D. Ginsburg notes (1863):

"The Kabala was first taught by God Himself to a select company of angels, who formed a theosophic school in Paradise. After the Fall the angels most graciously communicated this heavenly doctrine to the disobedient child of earth, to furnish the protoplasts with the means of returning to their pristine nobility and felicity. From Adam it passed over to Noah, and then to Abraham, the friend of God, who emigrated with it to Egypt, where the patriarch allowed a portion of this mysterious doctrine to ooze out. It was in this way that the Egyptians obtained some knowledge of it, and the other Eastern nations could introduce it into their philosophical systems. Moses, who was learned in all the wisdom of Egypt, [as] first initiated into the Kabala in the land of his birth, but became most proficient in it during his wanderings in the wilderness, when he not only devoted to it the leisure hours of the whole forty years, but received lessons in it from one of the angels. By the aid of this mysterious science the lawgiver was enabled to solve the difficulties which arose during his management of the Israelites, in spite of the pilgrimages, wars, and frequent miseries of the nation. He covertly laid down the principles of this secret doctrine in the first four books of the Pentateuch, but withheld them from Deuteronomy. . . . Moses also initiated the seventy Elders into the secrets of this doctrine, and they again transmitted them from hand to hand. Of all who formed the unbroken line of tradition, David and Solomon were most deeply initiated into the Kabala. No one, however, dared to write it down till Simon Ben Jochai, who lived at the time of the destruction of the second Temple. . . . After his death, his son, Rabbi Eliezer, and his secretary, Rabbi Abba, as well as his disciples, collated Rabbi Simon Ben Jochai's treatises, and out of these composed the celebrated work called Sohar, i.e., Splendor which is the grand storehouse of Kabalism."

This legendary account of kabalistic origins, however, has found little support from historians. The mysticism of the Mishna and the Talmud, the older Hebrew literature, must be carefully distinguished from that of the kabalistic writings.

At the time of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century, the Kabala found an audience among Protestant biblical scholars who turned to the Hebrew text for their biblical translations. From writers such as Johannes Reuchlin, Old Testament professor at Wittenburg, a Christian Kabala (usually spelled Cabala or Qabala) developed and was passed into non-Jewish occult circles.

Non-Jewish occultism and magic became deeply indebted to kabalistic combinations of the divine names for the terms of its rituals, deriving from the Kabala the belief in a resident virtue in sacred names and numbers. Certain rules were employed to discover the sublime source of power resident in the Jewish scriptures. Thus the words of several verses in the Scriptures that were regarded as containing an occult meaning were placed over each other and the letters were formed into new words by reading them vertically. Often the words of the text were arranged in squares so they could be read vertically or otherwise.

Words were joined together and redivided, and the initial and final letters of certain words were formed into separate words. Every letter of the word was reduced to its numerical value, and the word was explained by another of the same value. Every letter of a word was also taken to be an initial of an abbreviation of that word. The 22 letters of the alphabet were divided into two halves, one half placed above the other, and the two letters that thus became associated were interchanged. Thus a became l, b became m, and so on. This cipher alphabet was called albm, from the first interchanged pairs. The commutation of the 22 letters was effected by the last letter of the alphabet taking the place of the first, the next-to-last the place of the second, and so forth. This cipher was called atbah. These permutations and combinations are much older than the Kabala and were recognized by Jewish mystics from time immemorial.

During the nineteenth century a revival of magic—based in large part upon the Kabala and the identification of the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet with the tarot—occurred in France, primarily around Éliphas Lévi. From Lévi a new appreciation of the Kabala passed to the magicians of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and through it to Aleister Crowley, a dominant practitioner of magic in the twentieth century. It would be difficult to think of modern magic without the Kabala and its related practices of gematria and path workings.

Within the Jewish community study of the Kabala revived in the eighteenth century with the development of the Hassidic movement under the leadership of the Baal Shem Tov (1700–1760). This form of Judaism was seen as a competitor by the orthodox Jews, who organized efforts to suppress it during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Hasidim (Jewish mysticism) in Europe was largely wiped out during the Holocaust, but has survived in the United States and Israel. Some Jewish Kabalists have resented the Kabala being appropriated by non-Jewish occultists. Most, however, have participated in what has become an active dialogue with contemporary occultists. Jews and non-Jews alike, for example, appreciate the scholarship of Gershom Scholem, the greatest Kabala scholar of this century.

Sources:

Abelson, Joshua. Jewish Mysticism: An Introduction to Kabbalah. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1981.

Achad, Frater [Charles S. Jones]. The Anatomy of the Body of God: Being the Supreme Revelation of Cosmic Consciousness. Chicago: Collegium ad Spiritum Sanctum, 1925. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1969.

Bension, Ariel. The Zohar in Moslem and Christian Spain. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1932.

Berg, Phillip S. Kabbalah for the Laymen. New York: Research Center of Kabbalah, n.d.

Franck, Adolphe. The Kabbalah. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967. Reprint, New York: Citadel, 1979.

Gaster, Moses. The Origin of the Kabbalah. New York: Gordon Press, 1976.

Halevi, Z'ev Ben Shimon. An Introduction to the Cabala—Tree of Life. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Kalisch, Isidor, trans. Sepher Yezirah. New York, 1877. Reprint, San Jose, Calif.: Rosicrucian Press, 1950. Reprint, North Hollywood, Calif.: Symbols and Signs, n.d.

Lévi, Éliphas. The Book of Splendors. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

Luzzatto, Moses. General Principles of the Kabbalah. New York: Research Center of Kabbalah, 1970.

Meltzer, David, ed. The Secret Garden: An Anthology of the Kabbalah. New York: Seabury Press, 1976.

Pick, Bernhard. The Cabala. LaSalle, Ill.: Open Court Publishing, 1903.

Rauchlen, Johannes. On the Art of the Kabbalah. Translated by Martin Goodman and Sarah Goodman. New York: Abaris Books, 1983.

Scholem, Gershom. Kabbalah. New York: Quadrangle, 1974.

———. On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism. New York: Schocken, 1960.

———, ed. Zohar—The Book of Splendor: Basic Readings from the Kabbalah. New York: Schocken, 1963.

Sperling, Harry, and Maurice Simon, trans. The Zohar. 5 vols. New York: Rebecca Bennet Publishing, n.d.

Waite, Arthur E. The Holy Kabbalah. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1960. New York: Citadel, 1976.

Kabbalist, The (Journal)

Quarterly journal of the International Order of Kabbalists, devoted to study of Hebrew mysticism, occultism, and related subjects. Address: 25 Circle Gardens, Merton Pk., London, SW 19 3JX, England.

Kabir (ca. 1440–1518)

One of the most celebrated mystics of fifteenth- to sixteenth-century India, who practiced yoga and attempted to reconcile Hindus and Moslems. After his death he was claimed by both religions. Kabir's inspirational hymns are very moving and are still popular in present-day India. His teachings were a forerunner of Sikhism, which was established by his disciple Guru Nanak.

Sources:

Hedayetullah, Muhammed. Kabir: The Apostle of Hindu-Muslim Unity. Delhi, India: Motilal Banarsidass, 1977.

Kabir. One Hundred Poems of Kabir. Translated by Rabinadrath Tagore. London, 1915.

Kay, Frank E. Kabir and His Followers. London, 1931. Lorenzen, David N. Kabir Legendas and Ananta-das's Kabir Parachai. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1991.

Westcott, G. H. Kabir and the Kabir Panth. Calcutta: Varanasi Bhartiya Publishing House, 1974.

Kaboutermannekens

According to the folklore of Flemish peasants, these are little spirits that play tricks on country women, particularly on those who work in the dairy. In this respect they are similar to the fairies of other folklore.

Kaempffert, Waldemar B(ernhard) (1877–1956)

Editor and writer associated with pioneer psychical researchers. He was born in New York City on September 23, 1877. He attended the City College of New York (B.S., 1897) and New York University (LL.B., 1903). Kaempffert was a friend of James H. Hyslop and Walter Franklin Prince and believed that psychical research could help people learn more about themselves from physical, psychological, and philosophical viewpoints.

As science editor of the New York Times from 1927 to 1928 and from 1931 to 1956, Kaempffert's favorable reports on the work of J. B. Rhine and other parapsychologists helped to spread public awareness of research in parapsychology and its implications. He died November 27, 1956, in New York.

Sources:

Allison, L. W. "In Memory of Waldemar B. Kaempffert." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 51 (1957).

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Kaempffert, Waldemar B. Explorations in Science. N.p., 1953.

———. Invention and Society. Chicago: American Library Association, 1930.

———. Science Today and Tomorrow. New York: Viking Press, 1945.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kaf

According to Arabian tradition, a great mountain that stretches to the horizon on every side. The earth is in the middle of this mountain, like a finger in the middle of a ring. Its foundation is the stone Sakhrat, the least fragment of which is capable of working untold marvels. Sakhrat, made of a single emerald, is said to cause earthquakes. Kaf, which is frequently referred to in Eastern tales, is said to be the habitation of genii. To reach it one must pass through dark wildernesses, and it is essential that the traveler be guided by a supernatural being.

Kagyu Dharma

Group of centers founded in the United States by the late Venerable Kalu Rinpoche, concerned with the teaching and practice of Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism. Rinpoche studied at the Palpung Monastery and was a teacher of the Kargyupa—one of several primary sects of Tibetan Buddhism—which is revered as the most esoteric of all of the branches of Buddhism. It absorbed Hindu tantric emphases.

In 1957 Rinpoche established a monastery in Bhutan and later founded his own center, Samdup Tarjeyling Monastery, at Sonada, Darjeeling, India. He trained monks to establish centers in the West and during the 1970s founded centers in Europe and the United States (New York, California, Oregon, Washington, Hawaii, and Alaska). There is also a center in British Columbia, Canada. North American headquarters is 247 Sheafe Rd., Wappingers Falls, NY 12590. Website: http://www.kagyu.com/.

Kahn, Ludwig (ca. 1925)

German clairvoyant whose faculty of "lucidity" in reading sealed messages created a sensation in Paris in 1925. In 1925 and 1926 he appeared in Paris before the Institut Métapsychique. In the presence of a distinguished gathering of scientists, he held a pellet reading session during which he read the contents of 11 mixed pellets.

When his residence permit in France was expiring he went with a letter of introduction from Charles Richet to the commissioner of police. Richet, in the letter, argued that Kahn's stay in France was desirable from a scientific point of view, to which the commissioner replied that he would extend the permit if Kahn proved his lucidity to him. When Kahn convinced the commissioner of his powers he received the permit.

The literature concerning Kahn is summarized by E. J. Dingwall in an article in the 1926 Journal of the Society for Psychical Research.

Sources:

Osty, E. "Un Homme doué de connaissance paranormale: M. Ludwig Kahn." Revue Métapsychique (March–April, May–June, 1925).

Kahn, S. David (1929–)

Psychiatrist who wrote on experimental parapsychology. His interest in the psychic dated from his youth, his family having been friends of seer Edgar Cayce. Kahn was born on February 15, 1929, in New York City. He studied at Harvard University (B.A., 1950; M.D., 1954), during which time he made his first experiments in parapsychology, overcoming resistence from behaviorist B. F. Skinner. In the years immediately after his graduation he worked with Eileen Garrett and finally persuaded her to fund an experimental laboratory at her Parapsychology Foundation.

In 1960 Kahn was appointed senior psychiatrist at Montefiore Hospital, New York. He continued writing about parapsychology into the 1980s. He became a member of the Parapsychology Association and served on the board of the American Society for Psychical Research for many years until he retired in 1988.

Sources:

Kahn, S. David. "Ave Atque Vale: Gardner Murphy." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 74 (1980).

———. "The Enigma of Psi: A Challenge for Scientific Method." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (July 1962).

———. "Extrasensory Perception and Friendly Interpersonal Relations." In Explorations in Altruistic Love and Behavior, edited by Pitirim A. Sorokin. N.p., 1950.

———. "A Mechanical Scoring Technique for Testing GESP [General Extrasensory Perception]." Journal of Parapsychology 13, no. 3 (1949).

———. "Studies in Extrasensory Perception: Experiments Utilizing an Electronic Scoring Device." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research 25 (October 1952).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Pratt, J. G. "A Review of Kahn's 'Studies in Extrasensory Perception.'&43" Journal of Parapsychology 17 (1953).

Kai

King Arthur's seneschal, known of in the French romances as Messire Queux, or Maitre Queux or Kuex. He is prominent in Malory's Le Morte d'Arthur. In the tale of Kilhwch and Olwen in the Mabinogion, he is identified as a person whose "breath lasted nine nights and days under water" and who "could exist nine nights and nine days without sleep." A wound from his sword could not be cured; he could make himself as tall as the highest tree; and so great was his body temperature that during rain whatever he carried remained dry. Originally a rain and thunder god, he apparently degenerated through a series of mythological processes into a mere folk hero.

Kaiser, A. W. (1876– ?)

American direct voice medium of Detroit, Michigan, through whom "Blackfoot" and "Leota," both Native Americans, and "Dr. Jenkins," spoke as his chief controls. Some messages received through Kaiser were purportedly from the spirits of Sir Isaac Newton and from psychical researcher Richard Hodgson, who had died in 1905. Kaiser did not go into trance. Vice-Admiral W. Usborne Moore sat with Kaiser in Detroit in 1909 and in 1911. Moore described Kaiser as "an honest, manly young fellow . . . good to the poor, and admits many without payment." He commented, "There is not a doubt in my mind that Mr. Kaiser is a true psychic."

Sources:

Moore, W. Usborne. Glimpses of the Next State. N.p., 1911.

Kaivalyadhama S.M.Y.M. Samhiti

Indian center for the medical and scientific study of hatha yoga, established in 1924 by Swami Kuvalayananda for scientific and philosophico-literary research, training, and treatment in yoga.

The center is directed by Swami Digambarji and has been officially recognized as a research institute by the government of Bombay. It publishes the journal Yoga-Mimamsa and maintains an extensive library of some twenty-one thousand volumes. Address: 117 Valvan, Lonavla, 410 403, India.

Sources:

Kuvalayananda, Swami. Popular Yoga Asanas. Rutland, Vt.: C. E. Tuttle, 1972.

Kalari

An ancient Indian system of martial arts that appears to predate the systems of China and Japan. It includes all kinds of barehanded and weapons techniques. It is said to have been taught by the sage Agasthiya some two thousand years ago and has been kept alive by the traditional method of personal instruction from teacher to pupil. It is thought that kalari may be even older in origin, brought from the Middle East by Buddhist monks to India, China, and Japan through trade routes, where it was an essential safeguard against the dangers of such travel.

In kalari the pupil learns warm-up exercises rather like yoga postures, but active rather than static. Some of the postures and movements of kalari are also paralleled in Bharata Natyam, the ancient system of Indian dance. Kalari is also associated with the healing techniques called marma, involving specialized techniques of massage with the feet and the use of aromatic vegetable oils (see also aromatherapy). (Marma is concerned with pressure points in the body and is also part of the deadly barehanded martial art in which a blow to various vital points can cause serious injury or death.)

The kalari system is regarded as a religious exercise and is taught with rituals associated with gods and goddesses.

Kalé, Shrikrishna Vasudeo (1924–)

Psychologist actively concerned with parapsychology. Kalé was born on April 10, 1924, in Poona, India. He studied at the University of Bombay (B.A., 1944; M.A., 1947) and Columbia University, New York (M.A., 1950; Ph.D., 1953). In 1959 Kalé became a reader in psychology at the University of Bombay. He has written widely on psychology and has a continuing interest in parapsychology.

Sources:

Kalé, Shrikrishna Vasudeo. "Parapsychology and Science." Indian Journal of Parapsychology 1, no. 2 (1959).

———. "Parapsychology and Science." Indian Journal of Parapsychology 2, no. 1 (1961).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kale Thaungto

A town of wizards in Lower Burma.

Kali Yuga

The "Iron Age" of Hindu mythology. Hindu mythology posits four ages of the world: the Krita Yuga (Golden Age of Truth), lasting 4,800 years of the gods; the Treta Yuga (Silver Age), 3,600 years of the gods; the Dwapara Yuga, 2,400 years of the gods; and the Kali Yuga (Iron or Evil Age), 1,200 years of the gods.

Since a year of the gods equals 360 years of men, the extent of Kali Yuga is said to be 432,000 years; it would have begun in 540 B.C.E. During the Kali Yuga righteousness has diminished by three-quarters, and the age is one of devolution, culminating in the destruction of the world prior to a new creation and another Krita Yuga in an endless cycle of time.

Kammerdiener, Franklin Leslie, Jr. (1932–)

Director of the Parapsychology Laboratory at Wayland Baptist College, Plainview, Texas. Kammerdiener was born on September 1, 1932, in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. He studied at Oklahoma Baptist University (B.S., 1954); Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Texas (B.D., 1957; M.Th., 1959); and Stephen F. Austin State College, Nacogdoches, Texas (M.A., 1960). In 1960 Kammerdiener became an instructor in psychology at Wayland as well as director of the Parapsychology Laboratory. He was responsible for evaluation of experiments in telepathy involving objects of various shapes.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

KAMPUCHEA See CAMBODIA

Kanakuk (d. 1852)

Kanakuk, a nineteenth-century Native American visionary, arose among the Kickapoo in the years immediately after the War of 1812 as the government pursued its policy of moving all of the Native American people to the Louisiana territory west of the Mississippi River. In 1819 the Kickapoo signed the Treaty of Edwardsville by which they ceded their land in Illinois to the United States and agreed to move onto newly set-aside land in Missouri. However, several years later it was noticed that the move had not been made. Intervening in the situation was Kanakuk. Earlier, he had experienced a vision of the Great Spirit. As a result of his first vision, he commenced a journey during which he received a set of revelations.

In his second vision, the Great Spirit called for the Native Americans to give up the use of their medicine bags, bags that contained items used in various forms of folk magic, and to live a life without lies, quarreling, and murder. Their unwillingness to do as the Great Spirit said would result in disaster for the people. The Great Spirit also reaffirmed the revelation received by Tenskwatara a decade earlier that the land did not belong to any one Native American group, but by all collectively, hence no one group could sign any of it away (as was occurring in the various treaties).

Kanakuk found a significant response among his own people and resided among them as a spiritual leader who regularly brought forth (channeled) messages. He spoke to their self-interest and offered his message of behavioral reform, which came to include the cessation of whiskey consumption, as the means to their ability to remain at home. He also gathered them together for meetings on Sunday that led some whites who observed him to conclude mistakenly that his followers had converted to Christianity. He had absorbed various elements of Christianity that he had integrated into his own teachings, but was staunchly opposed to the efforts of missionaries to convert Native Americans. His message also spread to other tribes. He gave his followers a flat stick with various prayers and hieroglyphics carved on it. The prayers were cited the first thing in the morning and just before retiring in the evening.

Eventually, the movement delayed but did not prevent the removal of the Kickapoo to the West, and they eventually settled on land in Kansas. There Kanakuk died in 1852 of smallpox. Prior to his death he predicted that he would rise again in three days, and his followers waited before his body for some time.

Sources:

Mooney, James. "The Ghost-Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890." In the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnology. Compiled by J. W. Powell. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1896.

Kane, Elisha Kent (1820–1857)

Arctic explorer and husband of Margaret Fox, one of the Fox sisters, who pioneered American Spiritualism. Kane attended the University of Virginia and the University of Pennsylvania Medical School. In 1843 he was commissioned assistant surgeon in the U.S. Navy. He served two years in India and served with the marines in Mexico (1847–48). In 1850 he was assigned to accompany an Arctic expedition to search for the lost John Franklin expedition. In 1853 Kane set out on the trip that gave him some degree of fame. He sailed into the Arctic on a ship that became icebound. He and the crew made friends with the Eskimos and learned much of their culture. Abandoning the ship, they marched across land to a Danish settlement in the south of Greenland, arriving in 1855.

Kane met Fox soon after his return from Greenland. They were married in a simple ceremony in 1856. Kane's health had been broken by his Arctic experience and he died the next year. His relatives refused to accept the marriage or Margaret's claim to Kane's estate. In 1865 Margaret published a volume, The Love-Life of Dr. Kane, which contained his correspondence to her.

Kane did not believe in spirits, but there was nothing in his letters to suggest that he discovered fraud on Margaret's part. On the contrary, in a letter to her sister Kate he writes: "Take my advice and never talk of the spirits either to friends or strangers. You know that with my intimacy with Maggie after a whole month's trial I could make nothing of them. Therefore they are a great mystery." A lively controversy arose, however, about the meaning of his accusations against Margaret for "living in deceit and hypocrisy."

In another letter he writes: "I can't bear the thought of your sitting in the dark, squeezing other peoples hands. I touch no hand but yours; press no lips but yours; think of no thoughts that I would not share with you; and do no deeds that I would conceal from you."

Sources:

Baird, George W. Great American Masons. Kila, Mont.: Kessinger Publishing, 1992.

Fornell, Earl L. The Unhappy Medium: Spiritualism and the Life of Margaret Fox. Austin, Tex., 1964.

Kane, Margaret Fox. The Love-Life of Dr. Kane. New York, 1865.

Kant, Immanuel (1724–1804)

German philosopher, born on April 22, 1724, who anticipated the modern pictographic conception of apparitions in his analysis of the experiences of Emanuel Swedenborg in Dreams of a Spirit-Seer (1766). He was impressed with Swedenborg's attempts, with some seeming success, to communicate with the deceased brother of the wife of the king of Sweden. In his book, written several years later, Kant explores the possibility of the existence of disembodied spirits and their ability to communicate with humans: "Departed souls and pure spirits . . . can still act upon the soul of man. . . . For the ideas they excite in the soul clothe themselves according to the law of fantasy in allied imagery and create outside the seer the apparition of the objects to which they are appropriate."

Kant did not distinguish between veridical and objective apparitions and after some perfunctory speculation laid the subject aside.

In Dreams of a Spirit-Seer Kant expresses admiration for some of Swedenborg's insights, although he questions the seer's sanity and pokes fun at some of his more extravagant claims. He later acknowledges, albeit grudgingly, an affinity between his philosophy and Swedenborg's: "The system of Swedenborg is unfortunately very similar to my own philosophy. It is not impossible that my rational views may be considered absurd because of that affinity. As to the offensive comparison I declare we must either suppose greater intelligence and truth at the basis of Swedenborg's writings than the first impression excites, or that it is a mere accident when he coincides with my system."

Kant died on February 12, 1804.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Broad, C. D. "Immanuel Kant and Psychical Research." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 49 (1950).

Kant, Immanuel. Träume eines Geistersehers erläutert durch die Träume der Metaphysik. 1766. Translated as Dreams of a Spirit-Seer. N.p., 1900.

Kapila (ca. sixth century B.C.E.)

Celebrated Hindu sage and founder of the Sankya school of philosophy. He is believed by some Hindus to be the god Vishnu in the fifth of his 24 incarnations.

The Sankya system seeks to explain the creation of the phenomenal universe and the part played by spirit and matter (purusha and prakriti) and to harmonize rational analysis and the religious authority of the Vedas. It is the oldest of the Hindu philosophical systems and is regarded as the cornerstone of Hindu philosophy. The yoga system popularized in the Yoga Sutras of the sage Patanjali (ca. 200 B.C.E.) is based on the Sankya system.

Sources:

Bahadur, Krishna Prakash. The Wisdom of Saankhya. New Delhi, India: Sterling, 1978.

Prabhupada, Swami A. C. Bhaktivedanta. Teachings of Lord Kapila: The Son of Devahuti. New York: Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, 1977.

Kappers, Jan (1914–)

Dutch physician who was active in the field of parapsychology. He was born on July 30, 1914, at Rotterdam, the Netherlands. He took his medical degree at the University of Leiden (M.D., 1938). After several years as a medical officer with the Netherlands army (1938–40) he entered private practice in Amsterdam. Kappers also devoted much of his spare time to psychical research. In 1955 he became a board member of the Foundation for the Investigation of Paranormal Healing, and in 1959 he became the research officer of the Amsterdam Foundation for Parapsychological Research. He also served as president of the Parapsychological Circle, Amsterdam. In 1959 Kappers set up the Amsterdam Foundation for Parapsychological Research in order to facilitate funding.

Kappers joined the board of the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (the Dutch Society for Psychical Research) in 1958. He participated in a heated controversy regarding the organization's autocratic president. He and others left the society in 1960 and Kappers became the first president of the Nederlandse Vereniging voor Parapsychologie.

Kappers was associated with Arie Mak, F. van der Berg and A. H. de Jong in investigating clairvoyance with an apparatus devised by Mak. A report on this project was published in Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie (1957). Kappers also undertook a statistical evaluation of astrological findings, an inquiry into spontaneous paranormal phenomena in Amsterdam, and a study of paranormal events among subjects using hallucinogens. He edited the bimonthly journal Spiegel der Parpsychologie, to which he also contributed articles.

Sources:

Kappers, Jan. "ESP Status in 1966." International Journal of Neuropsychiatry (September–October 1966).

———. "The Investigation of Spontaneous Cases." Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie (1954).

———. "Is It Possible to Induce ESP with Psilocybine? An Exploratory Investigation." International Journal of Neuropsychiatry 2, no. 5 (1966).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Karadja, Princess Mary (Despina) (d. ca. 1935)

Swedish poet and writer on mystical themes. Although a member of the Swedish royal family, she spent many years in Britain. Karadja was the daughter of an eminent envoy to the Ottoman Empire based in London. She lived in London and later in Sussex and wrote several books, chiefly in English. She founded the White Cross Union and was president of the Universal Gnostic Alliance, founded in January 1912 to propagate gnosis (knowledge) of "the Great Spiritual Laws which rule the Universe, and thus promote the spiritual evolution of the human race."

Sources:

Karadja, Mary. Esoteric Meaning of the Seven Sacraments. N.p., 1910.

———. Etincelles (French epigrams). N.p., 1890.

———. King Solomon: A Mystic Drama. N.p., 1912.

———. Towards the Light. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1909.

Karagulla, Shafica (1914–ca. 1986)

Medical doctor and psychiatrist who took a special interest in psychic perception. Karagulla was born on June 28, 1914, in Turkey to a Christian family. She was educated at the American School for Girls in Beirut, Lebanon; the American Junior College for Women, Beirut; and the American University of Beirut (M.D. and surgery degree, 1940). She went on to specialize in psychiatry in Scotland, where she took her residency at the Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Mental and Nervous Disorders. She was awarded the Walter Smith Kay Research Fellowship in Psychiatry and the Lawrence McLaren Bequest by the University of Edinburgh. During this period she reported unfavorably on the effect of the then-fashionable electric shock therapy. In 1948 she was awarded the D.P.M. by the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, one of the highest medical qualifications in Britain.

In 1952 she visited the neurosurgeon Wilder Penfield at McGill University, Montreal, to discuss the investigation of hallucinations by electrode probes. Later she was associated as consultant psychiatrist with the work of Penfield on temporal lobe epilepsy and the study of hallucinations by electrical stimulation of the brain. In 1956 she moved to the United States as a practicing physician and joined the faculty of the State University of New York as an assistant professor in psychiatry. She also became an American citizen.

After reading the book Edgar Cayce: Mystery Man of Miracles (1961), by Joseph Millard, she became interested in psychic research and sought subjects with abilities similar to Edgar Cayce's for study. She spent several years researching what she called "higher sense perception" and published her findings in the book Breakthrough to Creativity (1967). Her book was warmly received in university circles. She moved to Beverly Hills, California, and founded the Higher Sense Perception Research Foundation. With her associate Viola P. Neal she taught courses in higher sense perception at the University College of Los Angeles. Karagulla developed an affinity for theosophical teachings and a special interest in the psychic ability of theosophical leader Dora Van Gelder. Karagulla died March 12, 1986.

Sources:

Bolen, J. G. "Interview: Shafica Karagulla." Psychic 4, no. 6 (1973).

Karagulla, Shafica. Breakthrough to Creativity: Your Higher Sense Perception. Santa Monica, Calif.: DeVorss, 1967.

Kardec, Allan (1804–1869)

The father of Spiritism, the French variation of Spiritualism, distinguished primarily by its acceptance of reincarna- tion. Kardec's birth name was Hypolyte Léon Denizard Rivail. The pseudonym originated in mediumistic communications. Both Allan and Kardec were said to have been his names in previous incarnations. He was born on October 3, 1804, at Lyon and studied at Yverdun, Switzerland, eventually becoming a doctor of medicine.

The story of his first investigations into spirit manifestations is somewhat obscure. Le Livre des Esprits (The Spirits' Book), which expounds a new theory of human life and destiny, was published in 1856. According to an article by Alexander Aksakof in The Spiritualist in 1875, the book was based on trance communications received through Celina Bequet, a professional somnambulist. For family reasons she took the name Celina Japhet and, controlled by the spirits of her grandfather, M. Hahnemann, and Franz Mesmer, gave out medical advice under this name. In her automatic scripts the spirits communicated the doctrine of reincarnation.

In 1857 Le Livre des Esprits was issued in a revised form and later was published in more than 20 editions. It became the recognized textbook of Spiritistic philosophy in France. It has been translated into many different languages and has had an enormous influence in Brazil, where Kardec has been commemorated on postage stamps, and has an estimated 3,000 temples.

Spiritism differs from Spiritualism in that it is built on the main tenet that spiritual progress is effected by a series of compulsory reincarnations. Kardec became so dogmatic on this point that he always disparaged physical mediumship in which the objective phenomena did not bear out his doctrine. He encouraged automatic writing, where there was less danger of contradiction stemming from the psychological influence of preconceived ideas. As a consequence, experimental psychical research was retarded for many years in France.

Several French physical mediums were never mentioned in La Revue Spirite, the monthly magazine Kardec founded in 1858. Nor did the Society of Psychologic Studies, of which he was president, devote attention to them. C. Brédif, a heralded physical medium, acquired celebrity only in St. Petersburg. Kardec even ignored the important mediumship of D. D. Home after the medium declared himself to be against reincarnation. Kardec died March 31, 1869, in Paris.

In England, Anna Blackwell was the most prominent exponent of Kardec's philosophy. She translated his books into English and helped get them published. In 1881 a three-volume work, The Four Gospels, about the esoteric aspect of the Gospels, was published in London.

Sources:

Kardec, Allan. Le Ciel et L'Enfer ou la justice divine selon le Spiritisme. 1865. Translated as Heaven and Hell, or the Divine Justice Vindicated in the Plurality of Existences. N.p., 1878.

———. Collection of Selected Prayers. New York: Stadium, 1975.

———. L'Evangile selon le Spiritisme. 1864. Translated as The Gospel According to Spiritism. London: Headquarters Publishing, 1987.

———. Le Livre des Mediums. Translated by Emma E. Wood as The Book of Mediums. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

———. The Spirits' Book. Translated by Anna Blackwell. Reprint, São Paulo, Brazil: Livraria Allan Kardec Editora, 1972.

Randi, James. "Allan Kardec," An Encyclopedia of Claims, Frauds, and Hoaxes of the Occult and Supernatural. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Karma

A doctrine common to Hinduism, Buddhism, and Theosophy, although not wholly adopted by Theosophists as taught in the other two religions. The word karma itself means "action," but implies both action and reaction. All actions have consequences, some immediate, some delayed, others in future incarnations, according to Eastern beliefs. Thus individuals bear responsibility for all their actions and cannot escape the consequences, although bad actions can be expiated by good ones.

Action is not homogeneous, but on the contrary contains three elements: the thought, which conceives the action; the will, which finds the means of accomplishment; and the union of thought and will, which brings the action to fruition. It is plain, therefore, that thought has potential for good or evil, for as the thought is, so will the action be. The miser, thinking of avarice, is avaricious; the libertine, thinking of vice, is vicious; and, conversely, one thinking of virtuous thoughts shows virtue in his or her actions.

There is also a viewpoint which believes that karma comes not from the action itself, but the beliefs and feelings which motivate or allow the action. "The law of karma is not a justice and retribution system, so anyone who has had much suffering in this life is not a victim of 'bad karma,' but simply finds themselves in predicaments that are simply the result of their own beliefs about themselves."

Arising from such teaching is the attention devoted to thought power. Using the analogy of the physical body, which can be developed by regimen and training based on natural scientific laws, Theosophists teach that character, in a similar way, can be scientifically built up by exercising the mind.

Every vice is considered evidence of lack of a corresponding virtue—avarice, for instance, shows the absence of generosity. Instead of accepting that an individual is naturally avaricious, Theosophists teach that constant thought focused on generosity will in time change the individual's nature in that respect. The length of time necessary for change depends on at least two factors: the strength of thought and the strength of the vice; the vice may be the sum of the indulgence of many ages and therefore difficult to eradicate.

The doctrine of karma, therefore, must be considered not in relation to one life only, but with an understanding of reincarnation. In traditional Hinduism individuals were seen as immersed in a world of illusion, called maya. In this world, distracted from the real world of spirit, one performs acts, and those actions create karma—consequences. In traditional teaching the goal of life was to escape karma. There was little difference between good and bad karma. Karma kept one trapped in the world of illusion.

During the nineteenth century, Western notions of evolution of life and the moral order were influenced by Indian teachings. Some began to place significance upon good karma as a means of overcoming bad karma. The goal gradually became the gaining of good karma, rather than escape. Such an approach to reincarnation and karma became popular in Theosophy and Spiritism, a form of Spiritualism.

Western scholars have often mistakenly viewed karma and fate as the same concept. Fate, however, is the belief that the path of one's life is established by agencies outside oneself. Karma is the opposite, implying the ability to alter one's path of life—in a future life if not the present—by altering one's feelings and beliefs, and by engaging in positive practices. "It is the coward and the fool who says this is fate," goes the Sanskrit proverb. "But it is the strong man who stands up and says, "I will make my fate."

According to this view, reincarnation is carried on under the laws of karma and evolution. The newborn baby bears within it the seeds of former lives. His or her character is the same as it was in past existences, and so it will continue unless the individual changes it, which he or she has the power to do. Each succeeding existence finds that character stronger in one direction or another. If it is evil the effort to change it becomes increasingly difficult; indeed a complete change may not be possible until many lifetimes of effort have passed. In cases such as these, temptation may be too strong to resist, yet the individual who has knowledge of the workings of karma will yield to evil only after a desperate struggle; thus, instead of increasing the power of the evil, he helps to destroy its potency. Only in the most rare cases can an individual free himself with a single effort.

The karmic goal in reincarnation, however, is said not necessarily to raise the soul to a higher plain of existence, but entreat enlightenment to reign at whichever level of existence the soul happens to find itself. "Many. . .see the process of enlightenment as "ascension"; it is in fact more true to say that it is a process of descension, that is bringing the light down to all levels."

Sources:

Abhedananda, Swami. Doctrine of Karma: A Study in the Philosophy and Practice of Work. Calcutta: Ramakrishna Vedanta Math, 1965.

Carus, Paul. Karma: A Study of Buddhist Ethics. La Salle, Ill.: Open Court, 1894.

Feuerstein, George. The Shambala Guide to Yoga. Boston and London: Shambala, 1996.

Glasenapp, Helmuth von. The Doctrine of Kerman in Jain Philosophy. Bombay: Bai Vojibai Jivanial Panalal Charity Fund, 1942.

Hanson, Virginia, ed. Karma: The Universal Law of Harmony. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1975.

Jast, L. Stanley. Reincarnation and Karma. Secaucus, N.J.: Castle Books, 1955.

"Karma: Meaning and Definition." Hinduism Today June 19, 1994, http://www.spiritweb.org/.

Payne, John. "Reincarnation & Karma." January 1, 1995 http://www.spiritweb.org/.

Reichenbach, Bruce R. The Law of Karma: A Philosophical Study. London: Macmillan, 1990.

Sharma, I. C. Cayce, Karma and Reincarnation. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1975.

Silananda, U. An Introduction to the Law of Karma. Berkeley, Calif.: Dharmachakka Meditation Center, 1990.

Torwesten, Hans. Vedanta: Heart of Hinduism. New York: Grove Weidenfeld, 1985.

Woodward, Mary Ann. Edgar Cayce's Story of Karma. New York: Coward-McCann, 1971.

Kat, Willem (1902–)

Dutch psychiatrist and neurologist who was active in the field of parapsychology. He was born on June 13, 1902, at Medemblick, the Netherlands. Kat studied at the University of Amsterdam and then spent many years on the teaching staff of the biochemical laboratory at Amsterdam University, eventually becoming head of the laboratory.

He investigated unorthodox healing. A member of the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (the Dutch Society for Psychical Research) and the Netherlands Committee for the Study of Unorthodox Healing and Its Social Consequences, he contributed articles on parapsychology to Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Katean Secret Society

A secret society of the Moluccas, or Spice Islands, of the Malay archipelago. Anyone who wished to become a member was introduced into the Katean house through an aperture in the form of a crocodile's jaws or a cassowary's beak. After remaining there for a few days, he was secretly removed to a remote spot. At the end of two months he was permitted to return to his relatives—theretofore unaware of his whereabouts—as a member of the Katean Society.

Kathari See Cathari

"Katie King" See "King, Katie"

Katika Lima

Malay system of astrology.

Katika Tujo

Malay system of astrology.

Kauks

Fabulous bird said to be hatched from a cock's egg.

Keel, John A(lva) (1930–)

Conjuring magician and writer on the subjects of magic, mysteries, and UFOs. Keel was born in Hornell, New York, on March 25, 1930, the son of Harry Eli Kiehle, a musician. From an early age he was interested in magic tricks and idolized the great Houdini. After the divorce of his parents he lived with his grandparents until age ten, then returned to his mother and stepfather, working on their farm near Perry, New York. At Perry High School he edited a mimeographed one-sheet journal called The Jester. At age 14 he edited a column in the local weekly paper, the Perry Herald, using the name John A. Keel. Meanwhile he studied at Perry Public Library and planned to be a professional writer.

In 1947 he left home, hitchhiking to New York, where he earned a meager living as a writer in Greenwich Village for four years before being drafted during the Korean War. Later, while quartered in West Germany, Keel contributed to the Armed Forces Network and was responsible for a Halloween broadcast from Frankenstein Castle, which started a monster scare similar to the scare caused by Orson Welles's famous radio broadcast about a Martian invasion in 1938.

Several years later he produced another Halloween broadcast from the Great Pyramid of Giza in Egypt. Attracted by the mystery of the East, he resigned from the Armed Forces Network and, at age 24, started a series of adventurous world travels, hoping to write his way around the world, earning a living as a journalist.

Keel's travels in search of mysteries took him from Egypt to India and Tibet, searching out mystics, fakirs, lamas, and magicians. In India he discovered the secrets of snake charming, being buried alive, walking on water, the basket trick, and the Indian rope trick, as well as other feats of Jadoo, or conjuring illusion.

However, he also admitted there were mysteries that were not tricks. In Darjeeling he met Sherpa Tensing Norgay, hero of the Everest expeditions, who talked about the Yeti, or Abominable Snowman. Keel went on to Sikkim, where he saw what he believed to be the Yeti's footprints and heard the creature's strange cry. All these adventures are recounted in his entertaining book Jadoo (1957).

Keel came out of obscurity at the beginning of the 1970s when his series of books on UFOs and Forteana (see Fort, Charles) began to appear. He wrote articles both for UFO periodicals and the popular men's magazines of the period, such as Saga and True. He considered as source material many stories that were generally dismissed because they were so strange.

After a flurry of writing, Keel faded from the scene in the late 1970s but reappeared with a new book in 1988 and also became a columnist for Fate magazine.

Sources:

Keel, John A. Disneyland of the Gods. New York: Amok Press, 1988.

———. The Eighth Tower. New York: New American Library, 1975.

———. The Mothman Prophecies. New York: Saturday Review Press, 1975.

———. Our Haunted Planet. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Gold Medal, 1977.

———. UFOs: Operation Trojan Horse. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970.

———. Why UFOs? New York: Manor Books, 1978.

Keeler, Pierre L. O. A.

American slate-writing medium who sat for physical phenomena before the Seybert Commission in 1885. The committee did not find the phenomena unexplainable by normal means and came to no definite conclusion except that it could "dismiss the theory of a spiritual origin of the hand behind Mr. Keeler's screen."

Alfred Russel Wallace describes in his book My Life (2 vols., 1905) some remarkable sittings with the medium in 1886 in the company of Elliott Coues, one General Lippitt, and a Mr. D. Lyman. In good light Wallace examined the enclosed space, the curtain, the floor, and the walls. After various telekinetic demonstrations, a hand appeared above the curtain, the fingers moving excitedly. Wallace narrates:

"This was the signal for a pencil and a pad of notepaper, then rapid writing was heard, a slip of paper was torn off and thrown over the curtain, sometimes two or three in rapid succession, in the direction of certain sitters. The director of the séance picked them up, read the name signed, and asked if anyone knew it, and when claimed it was handed to him. In this way a dozen or more of the chance visitors received messages which were always intelligible to me and often strikingly appropriate. . . . On my second visit a very sceptical friend went with us and seeing the writing pad on the piano marked several of the sheets with his initials. The medium was very angry and said that it would spoil the séance. However, he was calmed by his friends. When it came to the writing the pad was given to me, over the top of the curtain, to hold. I held it just above the medium's shoulder, when a hand and pencil came through the curtain and wrote on the pad as I held it."

At another séance, according to Wallace,

". . . most wonderful physical manifestations occurred. A stick was pushed through the curtain. Two watches were handed to me through the curtain, and were claimed by the two persons who sat by the medium. The small tambourine, about ten inches in diameter, was pushed through the curtain and fell on the floor. These objects came through different parts of the curtain, but left no holes as could be seen at the time, and was proved by a close examination afterwards. More marvelous still (if that be possible) a waistcoat was handed to me over the curtain, which proved to be the medium's, though his coat was left on and his hands had been held by his companion all the time; also about a score of people looking on all the time in a well-lighted room. These things seem impossible, but they are nevertheless facts."

Later in his career Keeler concentrated solely on slate writing, which he combined with pellet reading. A. B. Richmond, in his book What I Saw at Cassadaga Lake (1888), describes a sitting in which Keeler received an answer to a pellet inside a pair of locked slates, the key to which was in his pocket.

Admiral Osborne Moore, in his book Glimpses of the Next State (1911), writes of a successful séance in which, on five slates, 474 words were written and two pictures drawn in a period not exceeding ten minutes. The letters signed by names on the pellets were very commonplace. They contained no proof of identity. Still, Moore believed that the sitting was a striking exhibition of spirit power because there was full light and the slates were held above the table with no cloth or covering of any sort over them. He knew the reports of past slate writing through William Eglinton, S. T. Davey, and others, and said he thought that no explanation he had read was applicable to Keeler's case.

Hereward Carrington, during his investigations in the Lily Dale camp in August 1907, came to a different conclusion. He admitted that Keeler's slate writings were the most puzzling phenomena of their kind he had ever witnessed, but, as pointed out in his report (Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research, vol. 2), there was sufficient evidence of fraud. In the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (July 1908) an instance is mentioned in which Keeler was seen writing on a slate held on his lap under the table.

Carrington also stated that Richard Hodgson, Henry Ridgely Evans, David P. Abbott, and others thought that Keeler was a clever trickster, yet he said he did not wish to be dogmatic on the point since he was unable to explain many stories told to him by apparently good observers. Carrington reported only on his own sittings, saying that both the slate writing and direct voice were certainly fraudulent.

Keeler was also exposed by Walter F. Prince in 1921. In retrospect it seems doubtless that Keeler's phenomena—like those of so many other exponents of slate writing—were fraudulent.

Sources:

Prince, Walter F. "A Survey of American Slate Writing Mediumship." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research 15 (1921).

Keeler, William M.

American spirit photographer, brother of Pierre L. O. A. Keeler, also mentioned in the report of the Seybert Commission. No formal investigation took place because his terms ($300 for three sittings) and his conditions were considered unacceptable. Keeler was later exposed by Walter F. Prince. (See also Spirit Photography)

Sources:

Prince, Walter F. "Supplementary Report on the Keeler-Lee Photographs." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research 12 (1919).

Keely, John (Ernst) Worrell (1837–1898)

Founder of the Keely Motor Company, formed to promote his inventions powered by energy claimed to be derived from "vibratory etheric force" or cosmic energy. Keely was born in Philadelphia on September 3, 1837, the son of a musician. He worked as a carpenter before developing his famous inventions. The Keely Motor Company was incorporated April 29, 1874. The company spent $60,000 on experimental work on Keely's first engine, called "the Multiplicator." The company attracted investment, which Keely spent on research, but he had no practical motor to show for the money.

In 1881 the managers threatened Keely with imprisonment if he did not disclose his secret. He did in fact spend a brief period in jail, but was befriended by Clara Sophia Bloomfield Moore, a Theosophist, who provided further funds for Keely's experiments and defended him from criticism. She wrote a stirring defense of his work: Keely and His Discoveries (1893).

In addition to the famous motor, Keely also demonstrated other devices, including a "compound disintegrator," a "musical ball," a "globe engine," a "pneumatic rocket gun," and a model airship, all powered by the same mysterious etheric force. He wrote articles purporting to explain this force, but they were shrouded in such resounding pseudotechnical jargon that they only deepened the mystery. For example, he spoke of "Vibro-Molecular, Vibro-Atomic, and Sympathetic Vibro-Etheric Forces as applied to induce Mechanical Rotation by Negative Sympathetic Attraction."

There was no doubt about the startling demonstrations of force given in his laboratory in Philadelphia, however, and many scientists, professors, and businessmen were greatly impressed.

After Keely's death on November 18, 1898, startling evidence of fraud was uncovered, and it has since been assumed that all his inventions were fraudulent. The real motive force seems to have been compressed air, concealed in cylinders in a secret basement and conveyed to each apparatus by thin hollow wires. In spite of these findings, many individuals even today believe that any fraud Keely committed may have been merely because of the intense pressure to show practical results and that there may have been some genuine basis to Keely's lifework. However, there is no evidence that Keely ever discovered a more powerful force than the inspired jargon of his theoretical expositions.

A similar mysterious motor was built by John Murray Spear.

Sources:

Moore, Clara Sophia Bloomfield. Keely and His Discoveries. London, 1893. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Keely Motor

An invention of John E. Worrell Keely (1837–1898), who claimed that it was powered by "vibratory etheric force" or cosmic energy. The motor was developed from what was called a "Hydro-Pneumatic-Pulsating-Vacuo-Engine."

The Keely Motor Association was formed in 1873 with headquarters in New York, while Keely experimented in Philadelphia. It developed into the Keely Motor Company, incorporated the following year.

Keely gave startling test demonstrations of motor force and other inventions said to use a similar mysterious energy, and convinced many reputable individuals and investors that his discoveries were genuine. There was evidence of fraud after his death, however, and as a result of these disclosures the Keely Motor Company dissolved.

Sources:

Moore, Clara Sophia Bloomfield. Keely and His Discoveries. London, 1893. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Keevan of the Curling Locks

In Irish mythology, Keevan, the lover of the Danaan maiden Cleena, went off to hunt in the woods, leaving Cleena to be abducted by the fairies.

Keil, H(erbert) H(ans) J(ürgen) (1930–)

Lecturer in psychology and active parapsychologist. Keil was born May 30, 1930, at Freiberg, Germany. He emigrated to Australia as a young man and studied at the University of Tasmania, Hobart, from which he earned his B.A. (1957), Dip. Ed. (1959), and B.A. hons. (1960).

After a year as a teaching fellow in psychology at the University of Tasmania (1960–61) Keil became a research fellow at the Parapsychology Laboratory of North Carolina's Duke University (1961–62). He later returned to the University of Tasmania as a lecturer in psychology and became an associate member of the Parapsychological Association.

His parapsychological investigations included studies of psychokinesis with improved controls and automated experimental paraphernalia. With Montague Ullman and J. G. Pratt he presented a critical evaluation of psychokinetic findings regarding the psychic Nina Kulagina. Keil later wrote a book about Pratt, with whom he worked on various occasions. He also published articles in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research and the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Keil, Jürgen. Gaither Pratt: A Life for Parapsychology. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1987.

Keil, Jürgen, and J. Gaither Pratt. "First Hand Observations of Nina S. Kulagina Suggestive of PK on Static Objects." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 67 (1973).

Keil, Jürgen, Montague Ullman, and J. Gaither Pratt. "Directly Observable Voluntary PK Effects." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 56 (1976).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Keingala

The weatherwise mare of Asmund in the Icelandic saga of Grettir the Strong (ca. eleventh century). Asmund believed in her weather prophecies, and when he charged his second son, Grettir, with looking after the horses, he told Grettir to be guided by Keingala, who would always return to the stable before a storm. Because Keingala persisted in remaining on the cold hillside, grazing on the scanty grass until the lad was nearly frozen with cold, Grettir determined to make her return home regardless of the weather.

One morning, before turning out the horses, Grettir tore off a long strip of her skin from withers to flank. This made the mare soon seek her stable. When Keingala did the same thing the next day, no storm impending, Asmund himself let out the horses and discovered his son's cruel trick.

Kellner, Karl (1851–1905)

Karl Kellner, cofounder of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), an initiatory magical order later made famous by Aleister Crowley, was born on September 1, 1851, in Austria. He obtained some wealth as a chemist in the paper industry, and he traveled extensively throughout Europe, North America, and Asia Minor (the realms of the Ottoman Empire). In 1885, Keller met Dr. Franz Hartmann (1838–1912), like himself a student of Roscrucianism and the esoteric. However, their immediate concern ran in another direction as Hartmann headed a sanitarium for tuberculosis patients (tuberculosis was still an incurable disease). Utilizing Kellner's chemical skills, the two developed what was termed the "lignp-sulphite inhalation therapy" for use in the sanitarium.

As a student of the esoteric tradition, Kellner claimed later that he had come into contact with three high adepts (a Sufi, Solomion ben Aifa, and two Hindus who taught tantric practices, Bhima Sena Pratapa of Lahore [then still in India] and Sri Mahatma Agamya Paramahamsa). No independent verification of the existence of these three masters has been located. He also founded an organization called the Hermetic Brotherhood of Light. Such an organization did exist in England and later the United States. However, in his travels, Kellner claimed that he had discovered the key that explained the complicated symbolism of Freemasonry, and decided to create a Masonic academy that would assemble information on all of the different Masonic orders.

In 1885, Kellner initiated conversations with his friend Theodor Reuss (1855–1923) concerning the setting up of the academy. They decided to call it the Oriental Templar Order. It would be organized at two levels, an outer and inner circle. The outer circle would teach basic magic and occultism. The inner order would be patterned on the higher degrees of Freemasonry (specifically the Rites of Memphis and Mizraim) and would teach the combined wisdom of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Light and the new key to Masonic symbolism that Kellner had learned from the reputed adepts. Admission to the inner circle was limited to Masons who possessed the higher degrees. That meant that since only men could be Masons, the inner circle would not be able to admit women.

The early conversations between Reuss and Kellner did not bear fruit. Reuss was distracted by another project, to revive the old Order of Illuminati in cooperation with his friend Leopold Engel. Kellner disapproved of the revived order and disliked Engel. Thus, only when Reuss and Engel separated in 1902 did Kellner and Reuss begin work on founding the OTO. Unfortunately, Kellner was able to enjoy the fruit of his many years of research for only a short time as he passed away on June 7, 1905. Reuss carried on as outer head of the order for the remaining years of his life.

Sources:

King, Francis. Ritual Magic in England: 1887 to the Present Day. London, 1970. Reprinted as The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1971.

O.T.O. History. http://www.cyberlink.ch/ükoenig/. April 28, 2000.

Kelpie, The

A water spirit of Scotland believed to haunt streams and torrents. Kelpies appear to have been mischievous and were often accused of stopping the waterwheels of mills and of swelling streams. The Kelpie's name was occasionally used to frighten unruly children, and it was believed that he devoured women. The Kelpie, taking the form of a horse, was also said to tempt travelers to mount him, then plunge them into deep water and drown them. An Irish version of the Kelpie is the Eac Visge. (See also Phouka)

Kelpius, Johannes (1673–1708)

Johannes Kelpius, the founder of the first occult group in North America, the Chapter of Perfection (also known as the Society of the Woman in the Wilderness), was born 1673 in a German community in Halwegen, Transylvania. He received a good education and at the age of 16 wrote a treatise on natural theology. He subsequently wrote several learned texts that eventually brought him to the attention of Johann Jakob Zimmerman, a scholar and Lutheran pietist leader. Pietism was a movement that grew within Lutheranism at a time when the state church emphasized the more formal aspects of worship and church life and tended to be aloof from the religious needs of individuals. Across Germany numerous informal groups developed, centering on prayer, singing, and encouragement in the spiritual life. While many of these groups were quite orthodox, others veered off into mysticism and occultism. Such was the group that gathered around Zimmerman, who wished to find a means of combining science (including astrology), Christian theology, and mystical occultism.

In the late 1680s, encouraged by increasing government disapproval of pietisim and by his own expectation of the imminent return of Christ, Zimmerman planned for his followers to migrate to the British American colonies. Pennsylvania was already the home of a number of German religious refugees. However, before the group could leave, Zimmerman died, and his successor, Kelpius, oversaw the migration of the small body to Germantown. They arrived in June 1694.

Kelpius secured land on Wissahikon Creek (now a park in Philadelphia), where they built a forty-foot cube, which became the all-male group's headquarters and home. Discovering the local children were without a school, he founded a school and became their teacher. He also set up an astrological laboratory where members of the chapter watched the heavens for astrological and other signs of Christ's coming. He developed tuberculosis in the harsh weather, but hoped for Christ to return before he died. Meanwhile, he and the brothers gained some income from providing various healing and occult services for the surrounding community.

When Christ did not appear, Kelpius grew increasingly disappointed, a condition not helped by his failing health. In bed during most of the winter of 1706–07, he composed his most substantive writing and the hymn "A Loving Moan of the Disconsolate Soul in the Morning Dawn." Kelpius finally succumbed to tuberculosis in 1708 at the age of 35. He was succeeded by Conrad Matthai. Because the hope for Christ's return was the only force that held the group together, as that hope died, the group disintegrated. Some of the men who stayed in the area continued as healers, astrologers, and occult practitioners and their presence gave rise to what became known as powwow, or hexing, the peculiar form of folk magic practiced in southeastern Pennsylvania.

Sources:

Sasche, Julius F. The German Pietists of Provincial Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, 1895.

Kenawell, William Wooding (1920–)

Assistant professor of history at Stroudsburg State College, East Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania, and writer on parapsychology. He was born on November 19, 1920, in Reedsville, Pennsylvania. He studied at Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster (B.A., 1953), and Lehigh University, Bethlehem (M.A., 1955). After graduation he worked as a librarian at the Lehigh University library (1956–61) before taking his position at Stroudsburg.

Kenawell's major contribution to psychical studies came from a grant he received from the Parapsychology Foundation, for which he engaged in a study of the life of Frederick Bligh Bond, a British archaeologist who used automatic writing in connection with excavations at Glastonbury Abbey, England.

Sources:

Kenawell, William W. The Quest at Glastonbury: A Biographical Study of Frederick Bligh Bond. New York: Helix Press, 1965.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kephalomancy (or Cephalomancy)

A method of divination that was practiced by interpreting various signs on the baked head of an ass. It was familiar to the Germans, and the Lombards substituted the head of a goat. The ancient diviners placed lighted carbon on an ass's head and pronounced the names of those who were suspected of any crime. If a crackling coincided with the utterance of a name, that person was believed to be guilty.

Kephu

A vampire of the Karen tribes of Burma.

Kepler College of Astrological Arts and Sciences

The Kepler College of Astrological Arts and Sciences emerged in the 1990s as one of the most ambitious projects of the contemporary astrological revival and an important activity to return astrology into the mainstream of Western culture. As envisioned, Kepler College is to be a four-year liberal arts college that will have an entire curriculum, from astronomy to history, based on astrology and that will, in addition, grant degrees in astrology. Kepler is creating a curriculum that will reintegrate astrological concepts into all of the humanities, arts, and sciences. The college is scheduled to accept its first students in the year 2000. As designed, Kepler will be a professional school that will train those who are focused on building a career as an astrologer and will provide those already practicing with additional professional skills in business, science, education, and other related areas.

Heading the project to create Kepler is astrologer Joanne Wickenburg, who serves as chairperson of the board of trustees. She is assisted by a ten-member board of astrologers and educators sympathetic to astrology. The board has also assembled a large advisory council that includes a number of the most important leaders in the astrological community, including Steven Forrest, the chairperson, Donna Cunningham, Zipporah Dobyns, Demetra George, Robert Hand, Marion March, and Noel Tyl.

Even as classes open, it is recognized that the faculty, student body, and full curriculum will take time to develop. Many of the potential students, especially among people already into their professional career, will be unable to drop their work and return to school. Thus, in the spring of 2000, the first of the quarterly seven-day symposia was held. Each quarter students will be invited to the college for intensive study, which in combination with participation in the Distance Learning Program, students may use to work toward their bachelor's degree. Ongoing contact with students continues through the Internet.

Kepler College is located at 4630 200th St. S.W., Ste. L-1, Lynnwood, WA 098036. It has an Internet presence at http://www.keplercollege.org/.

Sources:

Kepler College. http://www.keplercollege.org/. March 15, 2000.

Kepler, Johann (1571–1630)

Famous German mathematician, astronomer, and astrologer. He was born on December 27, 1571, at Weil in Württemberg and educated at a monastic school at Maulbrunn. He attended the University of Tübingen, where he studied philosophy, mathematics, theology, and astronomy. In 1593 he became professor of mathematics and morals at Gratz in Styria, where he also continued his astrological studies. He had an unhappy home life and was somewhat persecuted for his doctrines.

The famous Rudolphine tables, which he prepared with the astronomer Tycho de Brahe, were printed in 1626.

Some of Kepler's writings were influenced by occult and mystical concepts. In his work De Harmonice Mundi (1619) he expounded a system of celestial harmonies. His book Somnium (1634) was an early speculation about life on the moon. A discussion of Kepler's concept of archetypes appears in "The Influence of Archetypal Ideas on the Scientific Theories of Kepler" in the book The Interpretation of Nature and the Psyche, by C. G. Jung and W. Pauli (1955).

The laws of the courses of the planets, deduced by Kepler from observations made by Tycho, and known as "the three laws of Kepler," became the foundation of Newton's discoveries, as well as of the whole modern theory of the planets. His services in the cause of astronomy place him high among the distinguished people of science, and in 1808 a monument was erected to his memory at Ratisbon. Kepler's most important work is his Astronomia nova, seu Physica Coelestis tradita Commentariis de Motibus Stellae Martis (1609), which is still regarded as a classic by astronomers.

Kepler died November 15, 1630, at Ratisbon.

Kerheb

The priestly caste of ancient Egyptian scribes.

Kerner, Justinus (Andreas) (Christian) (1786–1862)

Noted German poet and physician, born on September 18, 1786, at Ludwigsburg, Würtemberg. Kerner studied medicine at Tübingen and practiced as a physician at Wildbad. In addition to books of poetry, he was the author of a remarkable record of supernormal phenomena and experiments in animal magnetism therapeutics: Die Seherin von Prevorst, Eröffnungen über das innere Leben des Menschen und über das Hereinragen einer Geisterwelt in die Unsere (1845). It is the story of Frederica Hauffe, "the Seeress of Prevorst," who arrived in Weinsberg in November 1826 and became Kerner's patient.

Hauffe was the picture of death, exhibited many frightful symptoms, and fell into trance every evening at seven o'clock. For a while Kerner ignored her somnambulant condition and declared that he was not going to take any notice of what she said in her sleep. He began treating her by homeopathic remedies.

The medicine was ineffective, and Hauffe was fast approaching death. In trance she prescribed for herself a gentle course of animal magnetism. Kerner at first wanted nothing to do with the treatment, but he finally became convinced of the extraordinary character of the case and began to study it in earnest.

His book, published in 1829, passed through three enlarged editions (1832, 1838, and 1846). Translated by Catherine Crowe, it was published in English in 1845 under the title The Seeress of Prevorst; or, Openings-up into the Inner Life of Man, and Mergings of a Spirit World into the World of Matter. In Germany the book caused a great sensation. Among those who inquired into the case of the Seeress of Prevorst were Kant, Schubert, Eschenmayer, Görres, Werner, and David Strauss.

A school of philosophy was built on the revelations of the seeress, and in 1831 Kerner established a periodical, Blätter aus Prevorst; Originalien und Lesefrüchte für Freunde des innern Lebens (Leaves from Prevorst; or, Original Literary Fruits for Lovers of the Inner Life). Its chief contributors were Eschenmayer, Frederik von Mayer of Frankfort, Gotthelf, Heinrich von Schubert, Guido Görres, and Franz von Baader. Twelve volumes were published; then in 1839 the periodical was superseded by Magikon; Archive für Beobachtungen aus dem Gebiete der Geisterkunde und des magnetischen und magischen Lebens (Magikon; or, Archives for Observations Concerning the Realms of the Spirit World and of Magnetic Life). It was published until 1853.

King Ludwig of Bavaria and the king of Württemberg bestowed pensions upon Kerner, while King Frederick William IV of Prussia expressed his admiration in 1848 by sending him the gold medal of art and science. King Ludwig made him the first knight of the newly instituted Maximilian Order of Science and Art.

Besides the Seeress of Prevorst, Kerner wrote a variety of additional volumes, including Geschichte Zweier Somnambulen, nebst einiger andern Denkwürdigkieten aus dem Gebiete der Magischen Heilkunde und Psychologie (The History of Two Somnambules, Together with Certain Notable Things from the Realms of Magical Cure and Psychology; 1824); Geschichten Besessener neurer Zeit (History of Modern Possession; 1834); Nachricht von dem Vorkommen des Besesseins eines dämonisch-magnetischen Leidens und seiner schon im Alterthum bekannten Heilung durch magisch-magnetisches Einwirken (News of the Appearance of Possession, Demoniacal-Magnetic Suffering and its Cure through Magnetic Treatment; 1836); Eine Erscheinung aus dem Nachtgebiete der Natur, durch eine Reihe von Zeugen gerichtlich bestätigt (An Appearance from the Night Realms of Nature, Proved Legally by a Series of Witnesses; 1836); Die somnambülen Tische; Zur Geschichte und Erklärung dieser Erscheinung (Somnambulic Tables; or, the History and Explanation of That Phenomenon; 1853); and F. A. Mesmer aus Schwaben, Entdecker des thierischen Magnetimus (F. A. Mesmer, the Discoverer of Animal Magnetism; 1856).

Kerner died February 21, 1862.

Sources:

Howitt-Watts, A. M. The Pioneers of Spiritual Reformation. London, 1883.

Reinhard, Aime. Justinus Kerner und das Kernerhaus zu Weinsberg. Tübingen, Germany, 1862.

Kether

The term in the Kabala for the number one. It means reason, the equilibrating power. Also a Hebrew occult name for one of the three essentials of God, reason.

Kettner, Frederick (d. 1957)

Founder of the Biosophical Institute and Biosophy, a system of spiritual self-education and self-improvement intended to create a world fellowship of peace-loving men and women who have overcome religious, national, racial, and social prejudice to work creatively for the growth of democracy and world peace.

Kettner was inspired by the writings of the philosopher Baruch Spinoza and became a leading authority on his teachings. He created the Institute for the Advancement of Cultural and Spiritual Values in cooperation with leading educators and thinkers in the United States and in 1935 inaugurated a movement to place a secretary of peace in every government. He toured the United States to lecture on his ideas. ln 1936 the secretary of peace concept was partially endorsed by the Inter-American Peace Conference in Buenos Aires, where Kettner founded the Instituto Biosofico Argentino. He also founded the Biosophical Institute, which continues his teachings and which was warmly endorsed by Albert Einstein, who wrote, "Your group is the embodiment of that spirit which Spinoza served so passionately."

Keyhoe, Donald Edwards (1897–1988)

Prominent figure in early UFO controversies. Keyhoe was born on June 20, 1897, in Ottumwa, Iowa. He was a graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy (1919) and was commissioned a lieutenant in the marines. After an accident in 1922, he resigned from the marines. He held several jobs through the decade and emerged in 1928 as a successful freelance writer. Keyhoe returned to the marines during World War II and served with a naval aviation training division. He rose to the rank of major by the end of the war. He began writing about unidentified flying objects in 1949 when he was commissioned to write an article for True, a popular men's magazine. His article, "Flying Saucers are Real" (True, January 1950), caused a sensation with its claim that the U.S. Air Force was covering up evidence that proved flying saucers were real. He continued that theme in the three books that soon followed: The Flying Saucers Are Real (1950), Flying Saucers From Outer Space (1953), and The Flying Saucer Conspiracy (1955).

It was some years later that a memorandum discovered through the Freedom of Information Act revealed that Keyhoe was right about the air force's covering up its real investigation of UFOs with a public relations activity called Project Blue Book.

In 1956 Keyhoe founded National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena (NICAP). Prominent military men and politicians on the board of governors included Senator Barry Goldwater. During his period of leadership in NICAP, Keyhoe wrote one more book, Flying Saucers: Top Secret (1960). He could not solve NICAP's persistent financial situation over the years, and after a stormy meeting in 1969 Keyhoe retired as director, although he remained on the board.

After he left NICAP Keyhoe wrote one last book, Aliens From Space (1973), in which he continued his cover-up theme but shifted primary responsibility to the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency). He served on the Mutual UFO Network board through the 1980s but was never really active in ufology again.

Keyhoe died November 29, 1988.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Hall, Richard. "Major Donald E. Keyhoe: An Appreciation." MUFON UFO Journal (February 1989): 12–13.

Keyhoe, Donald E. Aliens From Space: The Real Story of Unidentified Flying Objects. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1973.

———. The Flying Saucer Conspiracy. New York: Henry Holt, 1955.

———. The Flying Saucers Are Real. New York: Fawcett Publications, 1950.

———. Flying Saucers From Outer Space. New York: Henry Holt, 1953.

———. Flying Saucers: Top Secret. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1960.

Key of Solomon the King (Clavicula Salomonis)

A grimoire—textbook on magic—of medieval origin. It is supposed to be the work of Solomon, but is manifestly of later origin and was probably written in either the fourteenth or fifteenth century. A number of manuscripts have survived. There are stories of a book of magic spells ascribed to Solomon as early as the first century C.E.; the historian Flavius Josephus stated that Eleazar the Jew exorcised devils with Solomon's book. Stories of a ring of Solomon's are also found in the Arabian Nights.

The Key is not an authentic Jewish work, since it contains ancient concepts that may date from earlier semitic or Babylonian times. It may have come to Europe through Gnostic channels and mixed with later kabalistic notions.

In its popular form, its chief use appears to be in finding treasure and performing magic rites with the purpose of interfering with the free will of others. The power of the Divine Name is much in evidence, but the work appears to combine elements of both white and black magic.

The Lemegeton (Lesser Key of Solomon) is much more noteworthy. Its earliest examples date from the seventeenth century, and it invokes the hierarchies of the abyss by legions and millions. It is divided into four parts that enable the operator to control the offices of all spirits.

The first part, Göetia, contains forms of conjuration for 72 demons with an account of their powers and offices; the second, Theurgia Göetia, deals with the spirits of the cardinal points, which are of mixed nature; the third, the Pauline Art (the significance of the name is unaccountable), deals with the angels of the hours of the day and night and with the signs of the zodiac; and the fourth, Almadel, enumerates four other choirs of spirits. The operator is required to live a pure life, and none of the conjurations may be applied to the injury of another.

Sources:

The Greater Key of Solomon. Translated by S. L. MacGregor Mathers. 1909. Reprint, Chicago: De Laurence, 1914. Reprint, London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

The Lesser Key of Solomon/Göetia/The Book of Evil Spirits. Chicago: De Laurence, 1916.

Shah, Indres. The Secret Love of Magic. London: Frederick Muller, 1957. Reprint, London: Abacus, 1972.

Waite, Arthur E. The Book of Ceremonial Magic. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Khaib

The ancient Egyptian name for the shadow, which at death was supposed to quit the body to continue a separate existence of its own.

Khérumian, Raphaël (1903–)

Painter and writer on parapsychological topics, born at Baku, Azerbaijan. He was a member of the board of directors of the Institut Métapsychique International, Paris, with special interest in the physiological mechanisms of telepathy and the moral implications of parapsychology. During the decade after World War II, Khérumian wrote a variety of articles for the Revue Métapsychique and one book, Léonard de Vinci et les mystères (Paris, 1952).

Sources:

Khérumian, Raphaël. "A propos de l'hypothèse cryptesthétique" (Regarding the Cryptesthetic Hypothesis). Revue Métapsychique 1, no. 2 (1955).

———. "Essai d'interprétation des expériences de Soal et Goldney" (Interpretative Essay on the Experiments of Soal and Goldney). Revue Métapsychique 8 (1949).

———. "Introduction à l'étude de la connaissance parapsychologique" (Introduction to the Study of Parapsychology Knowledge). Revue Métapsychique 1–3 (1948).

———. "Procédés mécaniques pour faciliter les transmissions télépathiques" (Mechanical Procedures to Facilitate Telepathic Messages). Revue Métapsychique 26 (1953).

———. "Les propriétés groupales des organismes et la parapsychologie" (The Group Properties of Organisms and Parapsychology). Revue Métapsychique 10 (1950).

———. "Réflexions sur l'état actuel et les perspectives de la parapsychologie" (Remarks on the Present Status and the Future of Parapsychology). Revue Métapsychique 2, nos. 8, 9 (1958–59).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Khu

The ancient Egyptian name for one of the immortal parts of man, probably the spirit. The word means "clear" or "luminous" and was symbolized by a flame.

Khunrath, Heinrich (1560–1605)

German alchemist and hierophant of the physical side of the Magnum Opus. Khunrath was certainly aware of the greater issues of Hermetic theorems and may be regarded as a follower of Paracelsus. Born in Saxony in 1560, Khunrath graduated in medicine from the University of Basle at age 28. He practiced in Hamburg and thereafter in Dresden. He died in poverty and obscurity in Leipzig on September 9, 1605 at age 45.

The most remarkable of his works, some of which are still in manuscript, is the Amphitheatrum Sapientiae! Eterne! solius vere, Christiano Kabbalisticum divino magicum. This unfinished work appeared in 1602, although it is believed an earlier edition was printed in 1598. A 1609 edition contains a preface and conclusion by Khunrath's friend Erasmus Wohlfahrt. It is a mystical treatise based on the wisdom of Solomon describing the seven steps leading to universal knowledge. Khunrath's book has been interpreted as the voice of ancient chaos, and its folding plates are particularly odd. In 1625 Khunrath's work was condemned by the Sorbonne for its mixture of Christianity and magic.

Khunrath believed in the transmutation of stones and metals through alchemy and sought the elixir of life. The physician and chemist Conrad Khunrath (ca. 1594) may have been Heinrich Khunrath's brother.

Kian

In Irish mythology the father of Lugh (who was the father of the Ulster warrior-hero Cuchulain). Kian had a magic cow with a wonderful supply of milk. After the cow was stolen by Balor (king of the Fomorians), Kian took revenge by making Balor's daughter, Ethlinn, the mother of three sons. Two were drowned by Balor, and the third, Lugh, escaped by falling into a bay and being wafted back to his father, Kian.

Some years later while fighting in Ulster, Kian encountered the three sons of Turenn, whose house was at enmity with his. To escape their notice, he turned himself into a pig, but they recognized him and one of them wounded him. He begged to be allowed to restore himself to his human form before dying. This request was granted, and Kian rejoiced in having outwitted his enemies; they would have to pay the blood fine for a man instead of a pig. The brothers, determined that there should be no bloodstained weapon as evidence of the deed, stoned Kian and buried his body.

KIB Foundation See Koestler Foundation

Kidd, James (1879–ca. 1949)

American copper miner and prospector whose disappearance in 1949 led to the discovery of his will bequeathing nearly a quarter of a million dollars to "research or some scientific proof of a soul of the human body which leaves at death." As a result, there ensued what newspapers called "the Ghost Trial of the Century," in which at least 134 scientific researchers, organizations, and institutions filed a claim on the Kidd estate.

Kidd was something of a mystery man, a quiet, well-mannered, unobtrusive loner who lived in Phoenix, Arizona, and worked in the copper mines or prospected in the mountains. He vanished after undertaking a prospecting trip in the area of Superstition Mountain, claimed as the locale of the legendary Lost Dutchman gold mine. Kidd set out November 9, 1949, and his disappearance was not noticed until some weeks later. Routine inquiries ascertained that he was born July 18, 1879, in Ogdensburg, New York, and had lived in Reno, Nevada, and Los Angeles, California. He worked for the Miami Copper Company of Arizona, lived simply, and had few acquaintances.

By 1954 Kidd was officially registered as a missing person but no proof of death was established. It was not until 1957 that the contents of Kidd's unclaimed safe deposit box, including stock certificates, were delivered to the estate tax commissioner's office in Arizona. In January 1964 official examination of Kidd's papers disclosed assets totaling $174,065.69 and a will written in Phoenix, Arizona. It reads,

"This is my first and only will and is dated the second of January, 1946. I have no heirs and have not been married in my life and after all my funeral expenses have been paid and one hundred dollars to some preacher of the gospel to say fare well at my grave sell all my property which is all in cash and stocks with E. F. Hutton Co., Phoenix, some in safety deposit box, and have this balance money to go in a research or some scientific proof of a soul of the human body which leaves at death I think in time their can be a Photograph of soul leaving the human at death, James Kidd."

Even before the will was validated, the first claim to the estate came from the University of Life Church, Inc., Arizona, as an organization conducting research on scientific proof of the existence of a human soul. Meanwhile two Canadians, claiming to be blood brothers of Kidd, contested the will. By now, widespread press coverage had resulted in claims to the estate from a number of individuals and organizations, including the Parapsychology Foundation, the Psychical Research Foundation, and the Neurological Sciences Foundation of the University of Arizona College of Medicine.

On May 6, 1965, the Court of Maricopa County, Arizona, declared the will fully acceptable for probate. More petitions flooded into the court, some of them merely facetious and invalid, others from reputable organizations like the American Society for Psychical Research. The hearings were presided over by Judge Robert L. Myers of the Supreme Court of Maricopa County and occupied 90 days and some 800,000 words of testimony. Eventually a decision of October 20, 1967, awarded the Kidd funds to the Barrow Neurological Institute, Phoenix, Arizona.

After an appeal, the court's decision was overridden and the money was split between the American Society for Psychical Research (two-thirds share) and the Psychical Research Foundation (one-third share).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Fuller, John G. The Great Soul Trial. New York: Macmillan, 1969.

Kilner, Walter J(ohn) (1847–1920)

British physician who first studied the phenomenon of the human aura and its changes in appearance during sickness and health. Kilner was born on May 23, 1847, at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, England. He was educated at Bury St. Edmunds Grammar School and St. John's College, Cambridge University, and was a medical student at St. Thomas's Hospital, London. In June 1879 he took charge of electrotherapy at St. Thomas's Hospital. In 1883 he became a member of the Royal College of Physicians, then opened a private practice as a physician in Ladbroke Grove, London.

Kilner took a scientific interest in the aura, believed to be a kind of radiating luminous cloud surrounding individuals, usually perceived only by clairvoyants. Kilner's interest was inspired in part by the work of Baron von Reichenbach, who claimed to perceive auras around the poles of magnets and around human hands.

In 1908 Kilner said he believed that the human aura might be made visible if viewed through a suitable light filter. He experimented with dicyanin, a coal tar derivative, and after careful study reported his findings in his book The Human Atmosphere (1911). This book was the first to approach the study of the human aura as scientific fact instead of questionable psychic phenomenon. The revised edition of Kilner's book was published in 1920, and some medical men endorsed his findings, although the theories were very unconventional for his time. Kilner died later that year, on June 12.

After Kilner's death, his findings were endorsed by the experimenter Oscar Bagnall in his book The Origin and Properties of the Human Aura (1937). A special photographic technique has since been devised by which it is claimed that the aura can be reproduced.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Kilner, Walter J. The Human Atmosphere. London, 1911. Reprinted as The Human Aura. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Kimmell, Susan C(randall) (1894–1975)

Public relations director who collaborated with Stewart Edward White on his channeled books. These include Anchors to Windward (1943), The Stars Are Still There (1946), With Folded Wings (1947), and The Job of Living (1948).

Born January 1, 1894, in Chicago, Crandall studied at the University of Minnesota (B.A., 1917). In 1924 she married Leslie Frederic Kimmell. From 1953 to 1962 she was director of public relations for the American Institute of Family Relations, Los Angeles. She died June 1975.

Kindred Spirit

Kindred Spirit, a New Age magazine founded in 1987, emerged in the 1990s as the United Kingdom's leading organ expressive of post-New Age spirituality. Subtitled "The UK's Leading Guide for Body Mind & Spirit," Kindred Spirit provides coverage of the broad range of occult and metaphysical topics including parapsychology, spiritual healing, ancient mysteries, meditation, astrology, and Wicca.

Each issue is built around a selection of feature articles that are drawn from the spectrum of reader interest. Those articles are set within a context of standard columns, the most important being the news, letters to the editor, astrology, and editorials. Kindred Spirit is one of a minority of post-New Age periodicals with a strong social consciousness and in both feature articles and editorial writings encourages readers to be socially engaged, especially related to environmentalism, animal protection, and identification with indigenous people.

Like most New Age periodicals, Kindred Spirit features a networking "Resources Directory" that serves the double purpose of informing the readers of all the various options available to them and providing the economic base to the magazine through the advertising revenue it generates. The New Age Movement was initially generated in the United Kingdom, and London remains one of its major centers of activity. The Resources Directory provides coverage of the many groups that hold meetings and classes, studies leading to professional careers, and various merchandise (books, music, art, meditation aids, etc.). Kindred Spirit is issued quarterly. It continues to be edited by its founders, Patricia Yates and Richard Beaumont. During the late 1990s it attained an international circulation throughout the English-speaking world. It is published at Foxhole, Dartington, Totnes, Devon TQ9 6EB, United Kingdom. Its website is at http://www.kindredspirit.co.uk/.

Sources:

Kindred Spirit. Totnes, Devon, UK, n.d.

Kindred Spirit. http://www.kindredspirit.co.uk/. March 11, 2000.

King, Bruce (1897–1976)

A modern tycoon of astrology who used the pseudonym Zolar. Born in Chicago, King became an actor, stockbroker, and eventually part owner of a radio station in Los Angeles. The station had an astrologer named Kobar as general manager, and King was impressed with his financial success. In the same week that Kobar left the station to go to Hollywood, another astrologer demonstrated a dime-in-the-slot horoscope machine to King. The two men went into partnership in the Astrograph Company, putting the machines in movie theaters.

King later conceived the idea of making horoscopes for chain stores and established a highly successful business. It was then that he took the pseudonym Zolar, derived from the word zodiac with echoes of "Kobar." He later sold approximately 100 million horoscopes and published a variety of popular books on astrology and occultism.

King died January 16, 1976.

Sources:

Zolar [Bruce King]. Black Magic. New York: Arco Publishing, 1972.

———. Dreams and Your Horoscope. New York: Zolar Publishing, 1970.

———. The Encyclopedia of Ancient and Forbidden Knowledge. Los Angeles: Nash, 1970.

———. Fortune Telling with Cards, Palmistry. New York: Arco Publishing, 1973.

———. History of Astrology. New York: Arco Publishing, 1972.

———. It's All in the Stars. New York: Zolar Publishing, 1962.

———. Nature's Mysteries. New York: Arco Publishing, 1972.

———. Sex and the Zodiac. New York: Zolar Publishing, 1971.

King, Cecil (Harmsworth) (1901–1987)

British newspaper tycoon who was sympathetic to Spiritualism and sponsored psychical research. King was born on February 20, 1901, in London and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford University. In 1951 he became chair of Daily Mirror Newspapers, Ltd. (1951–63), and then chairman of International Publishing Corporation, which included the Daily Mirror and some two hundred other papers and magazines, (1963–68). Through the 1960s he was also chair of Reed Paper Group (1963–68), a director of the Bank of England (1965–68), and chair of the Newspaper Proprietors Association (1961–68).

In addition to his newspaper and journalistic activities, King also wrote several books on history and current events. His second wife was Dame Ruth Railton, whom he married in 1962. She was a medium, and King publicly acknowledged her psychic gift at a meeting of the Royal Institution on the subject of ESP in 1969.

In 1964 readers of King's newspaper, the Daily Mirror, were invited to take part in a telepathy experiment. King donated a substantial sum of money to finance telepathy and clairvoyance experiments by three Oxford graduates who formed the Psycho-Physical Research Unit. He also provided funds for the Society for Psychical Research, London, which he and Dame Ruth joined in 1968. In 1970 he endorsed the phenomena of the musical medium Rosemary Brown.

In a speech at a Psychic News function in 1973, King stated: "It has seemed to me for many years that the only way out of the materialism of our society and our contempt for spiritual values will come from knowledge and wisdom in the general area covered by Psychic News. If we are to have a revival of religion—and this must come some day—it would seem that the work of Spiritualists may lead the way into realms of discovery ignored by ecclesiastical officialdom of today."

King was a guest of honor at a Psychic News dinner and dance in 1973, when he paid tribute to his wife's psychic gifts: "Her presence by my side is a constant reminder that there is more in heaven and Earth than atheists, skeptics, and some scientists suppose." King was not a Spiritualist and had never attended a séance but accepted the psychic gifts of his wife.

King had great affection for Ireland and the Irish people, and in 1974 he and his wife retired to Dublin. He died at his home in Dublin on April 17, 1987, at age 86. An obituary in the Psychic News (May 2, 1987) revealed that King had known the former editor, Maurice Barbanell, for some 40 years. King was quoted as saying, "We collaborated in our newspapers in reporting the psychic experiences of well-known mediums of the period, in particular Estelle Roberts."

King, Francis (Xavier) (1904– ?)

Contemporary British author who also wrote or edited a number of important historical studies on magic and occultism, especially as related to Aleister Crowley and the OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis). King edited and published some of the secret ritual materials of the OTO and also made important contributions to such reference books as the Encyclopedia of Mythology and the Encyclopedia of the Unexplained. With Israel Regardie, King revived the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, originally founded in the late 1800s.

Sources:

King, Francis. Astral Projection, Ritual Magic, and Alchemy. London, 1971.

———. Magic: The Western Tradition. London: Thames & Hudson, 1975.

———. The Magical World of Aleister Crowley. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1978.

———. Ritual Magic in England: 1887 to the Present Day. London, 1970. Reprinted as The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1971.

———. Satan and Swastika: The Occult and the Nazi Party. London: Mayflower, 1976.

———. Sexuality, Magic, and Perversion. London, 1971. Reprint, New York: Citadel Press, 1972.

———. Wisdom From Afar. London: Aldus Books, 1975.

King, Francis, and Stephen Skinner. Techniques of High Magic. New York: Destiny Books, 1980.

King, Francis, and Isabel Sutherland. The Rebirth of Magic. London: Corgi, 1982.

Shaw, Eva. Divining the Future: Prognostication from Astrology to Zoomancy. New York: Facts on File, 1995.

King, George (1919–1997)

George King, a prominent flying saucer contactee of the 1950s and founder of the Aetherius Society, was born in Shropshire, England, on January 23, 1919. He was raised in the Church of England but was attracted to the study of psychic phenomena and Spiritualism as a young man. He was able to demonstrate his own psychic abilities and also launched into the practice of yoga. As he matured, he found himself most interested in spiritual healing. Then in May of 1954 he heard a voice speak to him, "Prepare yourself! You are to become the voice of the Interplanetary Parliament."

King claimed to have come into telepathic contact with an extraterrestrial entity named Master Aetherius, who in 1955 named him the primary terrestrial mental channel. Out of his regular contacts (by what is currently termed "channeling") with Masters Aetherius and the Master Jesus, he founded the Aetherius Society. He also began a magazine, Cosmic Voice. He maintained regular contact with the Great White Brotherhood, the group of evolved beings charged with guiding Earth's evolution. King came to understand that the Earth was in the midst of a cosmic war between a set of "black magicians" seeking to enslave humanity and the brotherhood who opposed them. He and the members of the society participated in this battle by channeling spiritual energy to particular purposes.

Through the next two decades, King channeled more than 600 transmissions from the masters of the Great White Brotherhood, including a 1958 book from the Master Jesus, believed to be a Venusian. The Twelve Blessings is thought of as a continuation of the Sermon on the Mount. He also began Operation Starlight, which took him around the world to 18 mountainous locations. At each site he was directed to charge the mountain with spiritual power that could then be accessed by anyone visiting the site. Operation Starlight lasted for three years.

On the heels of Operation Starlight, King concentrated on methods of involving members in the cosmic war. A student of radionics, he created several radionic devices, which are believed to be especially efficient in receiving, storing, and transmitting spiritual and cosmic energy. The use of these devices, which have been improved steadily over the years, is ongoing, but at particular times during King's life, he directed members to concentrate on particular targets. These efforts, termed missions, were designed to win a particular battle in the cosmic war. Operation Bluewater, for example, was directed to the healing of the Earth along the California coast and is seen as having prevented a major West Coast earthquake. Operation Prayer Tower, inaugurated in 1973, established a system for directing prayer energy to any place on Earth where a natural catastrophe had occurred.

In the 1980s, King accepted consecration as a bishop from Richard Earl Quinn of the Independent Liberal Catholic Church, a theosophically oriented jurisdiction, and was from that time considered the archbishop of the Aetherius churches. He also received a number of titles from various chivalric organizations. The aging archbishop led the society until his death on July 12, 1997.

Sources:

Aetherius Society. http://www.aetherius.org/. April 1, 2000.

King, George. The Nine Freedoms. Los Angeles: Aetherius Society, 1963.

———. The Practices of Aetherius. Hollywood, Calif.: Aetherius Society, 1964.

———. The Twelve Blessings. London: Aetherius Press, 1958.

———, and Kevin Avery. The Age of Aetherius. Hollywood, Calif.: Aetherius Society, 1982.

King, Godfré Ray

Pseudonym of Guy W. Ballard (1878–1939), founder and leader of the I Am Movement. Under the name Godfré Ray King, Ballard wrote Unveiled Mysteries (1934), in which he reported meeting an ascended master, Saint Germain, who imparted the teachings of the I Am Movement. Ballard claimed that, "Each copy of this book carries with it the mighty Presence of the ascended Host, their radiation and sustaining power. The Masters have become a blazing outpouring of Light into which no discordant thought or feeling can enter."

King, Jani (1940?–)

Jani King, the channel for an entity named P'taah, was born in New Zealand in the 1940s and grew up in a rural area near Putararu. After finishing high school she took a number of jobs that allowed her to travel. Then in 1989, in Australia, she went to hear a psychic channel named Azena Ramanda, who channeled an entity named St. Germain. Her conversation with St. Germain allowed her to integrate several unusual experiences from her early life in perspective. About this same time, she also read a new book to which she had been drawn, Whitley Stieber's Communion.

In 1961 she had had an encounter with a beautiful being in a brilliant glowing body. In the years since she had experienced a number of UFO sightings and telepathic contact with whales and dolphins. St. Germain confirmed that King had been abducted in 1947, taken aboard a spacecraft, and given a medical examination. The being she had seen in 1961 was an extraterrestrial. King came to know this person as a resident of the constellation known as the Pleiades.

Within a short time, P'taah, the Pleiadian who had been in touch with her through the years, began to speak through her and in 1989 she made her first appearances as a channel. In the fall of 1991, in North Queensland, Australia, a group of people gathered weekly for a set of channeling sessions with P'taah in which he laid out his basic teachings and answered a spectrum of questions from those in attendance. These became the basis of an initial book, An Act of Faith (1991).

P'taah suggested that extraterrestrials, star people, had been coming to Earth for many centuries and their visits had been remembered in Earth's mythology. The star people were humanoid, but differed from Earth people in that they remembered their divine nature. Earth people had forgotten who they were. They had come to believe that they lived but one short life on Earth when in fact they had reincarnated many times. He also spoke of coming changes described as the flowering of the Goddess energy on Earth.

Through the 1990s, King emerged as one of Australia's most prominent post-New Age channels. She regularly channels P'taah for both individuals and groups, travels widely in North America and Europe, and leads retreats in Australia. Recent channeled messages regularly appear in Sedona: Journal of Emergence (in the United States) and Elohim (in Australia). Her Internet presence can be found at http://www.ptaah.com/.

Sources:

King, Jani. The Gift. Perth: Triad Publishers, 1996.

———. The P'taah Tapes: An Act of Faith. Perth: Triad Publishers, 1991.

———. The P'taah Tapes: Transformation of the Species. Light Source Publishers, 1991.

"King, John"

One of the most romantic and frequently claimed spirit entities, manifesting at many Spiritualist séances of different mediums over many decades. He claimed that he had been Henry Owen Morgan, the famous buccaneer who was knighted by Charles II and appointed governor of Jamaica. "Katie King," Florence Cook's control, claimed to be John King's daughter. John King first manifested with the Davenport brothers in 1850, his first materialization following the flash of a pistol fired by Ira Davenport in the dark. He remained as spirit manager with the Davenports throughout their career, and in typtology and direct voice he gave them sound advice during difficult times.

While faithfully serving the Davenport brothers, King took charge of the séances in the loghouse of Jonathan Koons in the wilds of Ohio. As the head of a band of 160 spirits, King claimed descent from a race of men known as "Adam," who had as leaders "the most ancient angels." They signed their communications "King No. 1," "No. 2," and so forth, and sometimes "Servant and Scholar of God." In his last incarnation King had strayed from the path of virtue and become a redoubtable pirate. He communicated in direct voice through a trumpet, his own invention, and through direct scripts. The tone of these writings was sanctimonious and upbraiding (e.g., "We know that our work will be rejected by many, and condemned as the production of their King Devil, whom they profess to repudiate, but do so constantly serve by crucifying truth and rejecting all that is contrary to their own narrow pride and vain imaginings.").

The Telegraph Papers of 1856 published a psychometric reading of the writing of John King by a Mrs. Kellog and a Miss Jay of New York, to whom the paper was handed in a sealed envelope. Kellog became entranced and said:

"A person of great might and power appears before me—a power unknown. I cannot compare him to anyone on earth. He wields a mighty weapon. I can neither describe nor explain the influence that emanates from him. I can only compare it to one of whom we read in the Bible. It seems like unto one who 'rules the world.' It does not seem to have been done by any human being. It does not seem to me that a mortal could have been employed even as the instrument for this writing. This is beyond human effort."

Jay gave a similar reading: "It must be a power so far exalted in the scale of development as to grasp the great laws that govern all material combinations. He does not seem to be of the Earth, but to belong to another race of beings, whose spiritual growth has continued for ages."

In the early years of British Spiritualism it was the aspiration of many mediums to secure the influence of John King. Mary Marshall was the first, Agnes Guppy-Volckman, Geor- gina Houghton, Mrs. A. H. Firman, Charles Williams, William Eglinton, and Cecil Husk followed. In the United States he was claimed by Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Holmes and Helena Petrovna Blavatsky during her early career as a Spiritualist. V. S. Solovyoff, in his book A Modern Priestess of Isis (1895), suggested that Blavatsky's Mahatma Koot Hoomi was John King transformed by Eastern garb.

On March 20, 1873, in a daylight séance conducted by Charles Williams, John King manifested so successfully that a sketch was made of him by an artist. A week later he appeared again in solid and material form. He was usually seen in the light of a peculiar lamp that he carried and that illuminated his face and sometimes the room. In Paris on May 14, 1874, a young man tried to seize him. John King eluded his grasp and left a piece of drapery behind. The medium was found entranced. He was searched, but no paraphernalia for deception was discovered.

In time John King took charge of the physical phenomena of Etta Wriedt in London. He greeted the sitters of Williams's and Cecil Husk's circle by their names. W. T. Stead once found a mislaid manuscript through communication in automatic writing from John King. "Feda," the control of Gladys Osborne Leonard, informed H. Dennis Bradley during a séance of his own that John King often helped with the voices and that the volume of King's voice was enormous.

Of all the public activities of John King, his association with Eusapia Palladino was the most remarkable. He said in many messages that Palladino was his reincarnated daughter. A curious story of his appearance in strong light is told by Chevalier Francesco Graus, an Italian engineer, in a letter to Vincent Cavalli. The letter was published in Luce e Ombra in April 1907. At the time of the narrative, Palladino worried herself ill over the theft of her jewels. She was so affected by the reproaches of the police inspector that she fainted. The table began to move and rapped out, "Save my daughter, she is mad." Graus later wrote of the incident:

"A minute later in full light, a phenomenon occurred which I shall never forget. On my left, in the space separating me from Mme. Palladino, appeared the form of an old man, tall, rather thin, with an abundant beard who, without speaking, laid the full palm of his right hand on my head, which he squeezed between his fingers as if to draw from it some vital fluid, and when he saw fit he raised his hand and spread over Eusapia's head the fluid he had withdrawn from my brain. He repeated this operation three times in succession, then the figure dissolved. Mme. Palladino immediately returned to her normal state. I remained for three consecutive days in such a condition of cerebral prostration, on account of the fluid that had been drawn from me, that I could not carry on the smallest intellectual work."

King and Morgan

The identification of John King with Henry Owen Morgan, the pirate, was investigated by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who had in his possession a contemporary picture of the buccaneer king. It bore no resemblance to the tall, swarthy man with a noble head and full black beard who presented himself in materialized form. But Doyle stated that a daughter of a recent governor of Jamaica was confronted in a séance in London by John King, who said to her, "You have brought back from Jamaica something which was mine." She asked, "What was it?" He answered, "My will." It was a fact. Her father had returned with the document.

Through Etta Wriedt at Julia's Bureau in London, John King gave many particulars in regard to his corporeal life in Jamaica and made beautiful bugle calls through the trumpet, saying that was how he used to call his men together in the old buccaneering days, one terrific blast being his signal to fight.

In February 1930 John King manifested in Glen Hamilton's circle in Winnipeg, Canada, and carried on a dialogue with "Walter," who controlled another medium, feigning that they were aboard a pirate ship among a crew of ruffians. This play-acting had a psychological purpose—the recovery of past memories and the imagining of a sailing ship that was afterward built out of ectoplasm.

The continued manifestation of John King with different mediums over a period of some 80 years raises a number of interesting questions. If the manifestations were genuine, why should a relatively unimportant individual dominate séance phenomena? Why should such a personality exist virtually unchanged for nearly a century? Was there so little progress in the spirit world? Or did the interest of mediums in a well-defined personality bring about conscious or unconscious fraud? Or was John King perhaps a fictitious personality like "Philip," the experimental "ghost" created by members of the Toronto Society for Psychical Research?

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Golney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54 (1964).

"King, Katie"

The famous spirit control of Florence Cook. Katie claimed to be the daughter of the equally famous spirit entity "John King," but there is even less proof of her identity than of her father's.

Katie began to manifest in the Cook house when Florence was a girl of 15. She was seen almost daily, the first time in April 1872, showing a deathlike face between the séance curtains. Later her materializations became more perfect, but it was only after a year of experimental work that she could walk out of the cabinet and show herself in full view to the sitters.

She became a nearly permanent inhabitant of the Cook household, walked about the house, appeared at unexpected moments, and allegedly went to bed with the medium, much to Cook's annoyance. When Florence Cook married, complications arose. According to Florence Marryat, Captain Corner felt at first as if he had married two women and was not quite sure which one was his wife.

According to all accounts Katie was a beautiful girl. In his famous investigations of psychic phenomena, Sir William Crookes had 40 flashlight photographs of Katie. In most of them she noticeably resembled Cook, but Crookes had no doubt of her independent identity. He wrote:

"Photography was inadequate to depict the perfect beauty of Katie's face, as words are powerless to describe her charm of manner. Photography may, indeed, give a map of her countenance; but how can it reproduce the brilliant purity of her complexion, or the ever varying expression of her most mobile features, now overshadowed with sadness when relating some of the bitter experiences of her past life, now smiling with all the innocence of happy girlhood when she had collected my children round her, and was amusing them by recounting anecdotes of her adventures in India?"

Katie claimed that her name during her earthly existence was Annie Owen Morgan. She said she was about 12 years old when Charles I was beheaded. She married, had two children, and committed many crimes, murdering men with her own hands. She died quite young, at age 22 or 23. Katie said her attachment to Florence Cook served the purpose of convincing the world of the truth of Spiritualism. This work was given her on the other side as a service to expiate her earthly sins, she claimed. On her farewell appearance, after three years of constant manifestations, she declared that her years of suffering were now over; she would ascend to a higher sphere from which she could only correspond with her medium through automat- ic writing at long intervals, although Cook would be able to see her clairvoyantly.

In her early manifestations in the séances of the Davenport brothers, Katie King was apparently far less spiritual than at the time of the Crookes records. Robert Cooper, describing a direct voice consultation of the spirits by the Davenports, wrote:

"The next minute a shrill female voice was heard immediately in front of us. It was like that of a person of the lower walks of life and talked away, like many persons do, for the mere sake of talking. It was intimated that it was 'Kate' who was speaking. There was a great attempt on her part at being witty, but according to my ideas on such matters, most of what was said would come under the category of small—very small—wit."

In another passage he wrote:

"Unlike John, Kate will talk any length of time, as long in fact as she can find anything to talk about, even if it be the most frivolous nonsense; but I must do her the justice to say that she talks sensibly enough at times, and I have heard great wisdom in her utterances, and satisfactory answers given to profound philosophical questions."

The "Katie" who assisted "John King" in the séances of Frank Herne and Charles Williams was apparently not identifiable with Katie King, since the former—after the materialization of a black hand—was described as a descendant of an African. Her voice was like a whisper, but perfectly distinct. The transportation of Agnes Guppy-Volckman to Williams's room was put down to her achievement.

A rather dubious Katie King manifested through the mediumship of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Holmes, of Philadelphia. Henry T. Child and Robert Dale Owen stated that they saw her materialize on May 12, 1874. Owen said he believed that she was identical to Cook's control, though her features differed from those in the photograph of the London Katie. The nose was straight, not aquiline, and the expression was more intellectual. Crookes, when he saw a photograph of the Philadelphia Katie, did not hesitate to declare her a fraud.

To justify her appearance in the United States, the Philadelphia Katie King declared, "Some of my English friends misinterpreted my parting words. I took final leave not of your Earth, but of dear Florrie Cook, because my continuance with her would have injured her health." This was a rather limp explanation that did not fit the fact that Cook, under the control of another spirit, "Marie," continued her materialization séances without injury to her health. On November 2, 1874, Owen reaffirmed his belief in the genuineness of the Katie King phenomena, but only a month later withdrew his assurances in the face of convincing evidence that he had been the victim of fraud. Child made a similar statement.

In October 1930 Katie King unexpectedly manifested in the circle of Glen Hamilton in Winnipeg, Canada. Photographs were taken. According to Hamilton,

"Obviously it was wholly impossible to say whether or not this Mary M.-Mercedes-Katie King is the same being as the entity appearing in the experiments of Crookes and others. We have the word of the controls in this case that it is so and we have seen how, so far, these controls have repeatedly established the fact that they know whereof they speak. . . . While there are, I may say, some points of similarity to be traced between Katie as photographed by Crookes and Katie as photographed in the Winnipeg experiments, both faces for instance being rather long in formation, the eyes in both being large and luminous, the angle of the jaw in both being rather pronounced, the later Katie is so much younger in appearance, her beauty so much more apparent that it is evident that we cannot use the earlier record of her presence in any way as conclusive proof that there is any connection between the two."

Meanwhile, serious doubts have been cast upon the Katie King phenomena of Florence Cook. In his book The Spiritualists (1962), Trevor H. Hall presents persuasive evidence that Crookes may have used the Katie King séances as a cover for an illicit love affair with Cook. More recently, Ray Stemman reported that Katie King materialized in Rome in July 1974 with the medium Fulvio Rendhell.

Sources:

Hall, Trevor. The Spiritualists. New York: Helix Press, 1963. Revised as The Medium and the Scientist. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1984.

Medhurst, R. G., and K. M. Golney. "William Crookes and the Physical Phenomena of Mediumship." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 54 (1964).

Stemman, Roy. Spirits and Spirit Worlds. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

King, Robert (1869– ?)

British professional clairvoyant and lecturer in occult science. He sat for Sir William Crookes, with whom he was acquainted, worked with Theosophist A. P. Sinnett, with whom he served on the Daily Mail committee for the investigation of psychic photography in 1908, and served as chief psychic of Julia's Bureau from 1909 to 1913. King toured Europe as a lecturer. His particular psychic faculty was diagnosing cases in which emotions were related to physical disease. He prepared himself for the profession by studying biology, physiology, and chemistry. King was not a trance medium and reflected spirit messages in a perfectly still but fully conscious state.

King Robert of Sicily

English romance of unknown authorship, written during the fourteenth century. It tells the story of King Robert of Sicily, who was beguiled by pride into sneering at a priest saying mass. An angel is sent by God to punish him, and transforms the king into the likeness of his own fool, sent out to lie with the dogs. King Robert is allowed to resume his proper shape after a long and ignominious penance. The theme is an ancient one, with parallels in early Buddhist and Hindu tales. It was revived by the poet Longfellow in one of his Tales of a Wayside Inn.

Sources:

Baring-Gould, S. Curiosities of Olden Times. London: J. T. Hayes, 1869.

King's Evil

For centuries, the kings of England and France were credited with the ability to cure scrofula by touching the sufferer with their fingers, a healing by touch ritual known as "touching for the king's evil." Many thousands of subjects regularly assembled for this royal touch, and some English kings were credited with hundreds of cures. The custom seems to have arisen during the reign of Edward the Confessor as a result of a young woman's dream. It was discontinued in England during the Hanoverian period, when it was considered a papal gift.

Kingsford, Anna Bonus (1846–1888)

Founder of Esoteric Christianity, which combined insights from Gnosticism, the Sufis, and proponents of spiritual alchemy. She was born Anna Bonus at Stratford, Essex, England, September 16, 1846. Even as a child, she displayed unusual psychic gifts and claimed kinship with fairies, who were said to visit her during sleep. She told fortunes at school and seems to have been something of a seeress.

After her marriage in 1867 to the Reverend Algernon G. Kingsford, an Anglican clergyman, she edited a ladies' journal and conducted a feminist campaign with special emphasis on womanly attributes. She considered masculinity in women degrading. In 1870 she became a Roman Catholic, and ten years later took her medical degree in Paris.

About this time she discovered in Edward Maitland a "twin soul" for her mystical mission. Although platonic, their association resulted in some mischievous gossip. In fact the Maitland and Kingsford families were related by marriage. In 1883, Kingsford became president of the Theosopical Society, and in 1884 Kingsford and Maitland founded the Hermetic Society in Britain for the study of mystical Christianity. While they were innovators in the field of mystical Christianity, their society was largely ineffectual. However, many of their inspired teachings were eventually included in the broad conspectus of Theosophy. Kingsford and Maitland placed a strong emphasis on vegetarianism and opposed experimentation on animals.

It was Kingsford who introduced the magician S. L. MacGregor Mathers to Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Mathers sympathized with the campaign against vivisection, although his occult interests were wider than those of the Theosophical Society. He eventually became a leading figure in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

Sources:

Kingsford, Anna Bonus. Clothed with the Sun. London: John M. Watkins, 1889.

Kingsford, Anna, and Edward Maitland. The Perfect Way: or, The Finding of Christ. London, 1882. Rev. ed. London, 1887. Reprint, Boston: Esoteric Book Co., 1988. Reprint, Mokelumne Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1972.

———. The Virgin of the World. 1885. Reprint, Minneapolis: Wizard's Bookshelf, 1977.

Maitland, Edward. Anna Kingsford: Her Life, Letters, Diary. London, 1896.

———. The Story of Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland and of the New Gospel of Interpretation. Birmingham, England: Ruskin Press, 1905.

Kinocetus

A fabled precious stone said to be effective for casting out devils.

Kirby, Bernard C(romwell) (1907–1991)

Professor of sociology who conducted investigations in parapsychology. Kirby was born on October 9, 1907, in Indianapolis, Indiana. He attended Denison University, Granville, Ohio (B.A., 1929), and held various government positions through the 1930s and 1940s. In 1946 he became an instructor at Farragut (Idaho) College and Technical Institute (1946–48). He moved to Seattle to work on his master's degree at the University of Washington (M.A., 1950). While completing his Ph.D. (1953) he worked as an instructor at the University of Washington. In 1954 he joined the sociology and anthropology faculty at San Diego State College, California. Kirby investigated the linkage effect in clairvoyance and conducted experiments in telepathy.

Kirby died on June 1, 1991.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kirkwood, Annie (1937–)

Annie Kirkwood, a contemporary channel, was born Annie Marie DeLeon in 1937 in Fort Worth, Texas. As a young woman, she married and had three children, all sons. In 1965 she became a licensed vocational nurse. In 1985 she married Byron Ray Kirkwood (1946–), an electrical engineer, like her, the parent of children from a previous marriage. He is the president of CompuRep, a company that represents businesses in the computer/networking field.

During the 1980s, Annie Kirkwood began to read New Age literature and was especially impressed with the writings of Ruth Montgomery. She also became concerned with the coming changes predicted for the planet and how she might act so that her family might get through them in the best way. At a bookstore, her attention was caught by a volume, The God-Mind Connection by Jean Foster, in which Foster's contact with some noncorporeal entities known as the "Brotherhood" are described as well as instructions on channeling.

Kirkwood began her own attempts to communicate with the Brotherhood through a process she called cosmic dictation, generally referred to as automatic writing. After some initial difficulties, she made contact with the Brotherhood and came to identify them with the biblical Holy Spirit, whom Jesus left when He returned to heaven as counselors for believers. The various entities in the Brotherhood do not use any personal identities they once might have had. Early in her messages, the Brotherhood instructed her to gather her family together, teach them to pray and meditate, and begin weekly family meetings. Each week she received material for these gatherings. The family members were invited to discuss problems and ask questions aimed at assisting all to get through the times ahead.

Shortly after she established contact, an entity who identified herself as Mary the Mother of Jesus came through with a message for the world that she wished to communicate through Kirkwood. Over a four-year period (1987–1991), Kirkwood received brief daily messages from Mary (in addition to the ones from the Brotherhood) that she later compiled into a book, Mary's Message to the World. That book, published in 1992, became a post-New Age bestseller. Two years later she compiled the material from the Brotherhood as Messages to Our Family from the Brotherhood, Mary and Jesus, as a manual for development. The teachings consist of a metaphysical and mystical approach to Christianity not unlike that offered by the Unity School of Christianity or A Course in Miracles.

In the wake of the success of her first book, Kirkwood and her husband began B&A Products, a company to distribute spiritual books and products for emergency preparedness. Meanwhile, she continues to receive messages from the Brotherhood.

Sources:

Kirkwood, Annie. Mary's Message to the World. Nevada City, Calif.: Blue Dolphin Publishing, 1992.

———, and Byron Kirkwood. Messages to Our Family from the Brotherhood, Mary and Jesus. Nevada City, Calif.: Blue Dolphin Publishing, 1994.

Kirlian Aura

Although the human aura has long been considered a psychic phenomenon visible only to gifted sensitives, some scientists have maintained that the aura is an objective reality and that such a radiation around human beings varies in different states of the individual's health. During the nineteenth century Karl von Reichenbach spent many years attempting to verify the existence of the aura, although he was ridiculed by many of his colleagues. In Britain the physician Walter J. Kilner (1847–1920), who knew of Reichenbach's experiments, devised a method of making the aura visible through spectacle screens or goggles impregnated with the chemical dicyanin. His work was developed further by other experimenters, notably Oscar Bagnall.

Then in 1958 Semyon Davidovich and his wife, Valentina Khrisanova Kirlian, two Soviet scientists, described electrophotography, a photographic technique of converting the nonelectrical properties of an object into electrical properties recorded on photographic film. They spent some 13 years in painstaking research. Eventually their work was endorsed by Soviet authorities and a new laboratory was provided for them in Krasnodar in the Kuban region of Southern Russia. Their technique of photographing what has become generally known as the "Kirlian aura" became well known in the West during the 1970s.

The method was a modern development of a technique known as early as the 1890s but not formerly applied to the human aura. In 1898 a Russian engineer and electrical researcher named Yakov Narkevich-Todko had demonstrated "electrographic photos" by using high-voltage spark discharges. The modern development by the Kirlians was influenced by study of acupuncture after Viktor Adamenko, a Soviet physicist, demonstrated the "tobiscope," a device to detect the acupuncture points of the human body. Various Kirlian photography devices were marketed in the United States and Europe to record biological fields around human beings, animals, and even plants. One such device available in Europe was known as a "Verograph."

Intense examination of the paranormal claims for Kirlian photography has shown that most of the early effects reported can be attributed to lack of proper controls in the laboratory. During the 1980s, reports of Kirlian effects all but disappeared.

Sources:

Bagnall, Oscar. The Origin and Properties of the Human Aura. London, 1937. Rev. ed. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Davis, Mikol, and Earle Lune. Rainbows of Life: The Promise of Kirlian Photography. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.

Johnson, Kendall. The Living Aura: Radiation Field Photography and the Kirlian Effect. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1976.

Kilner, Walter J. The Human Atmosphere. London, 1911. Revised as The Human Aura. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Krippner, Stanley, and Daniel Rubin. Galaxies of Life: The Human Aura in Acupuncture and Kirlian Photography. Gordon & Breach, 1973. Reprinted as The Kirlian Aura: Photographing the Galaxies of Life. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1974. Reprinted as Energies of Consciousness. New York: Interface, 1976.

Moss, Thelma. The Body Electric: A Personal Journey into the Mysteries of Parapsychological Research, Bioenergy, and Kirlian Photography. London: Granada, 1981.

Kischuph

In the Kabala, the higher magical influence. It was divided into two branches, an elementary and a spiritual, and included exorcism. Sometimes Kischuph exhibited a striking resemblance to the witchcraft of medieval times. Sorcerers were said to change themselves into animals and travel long distances in a very short time. They might also induce pain, disease, and death in men and animals.

Further allied to witches were the "women who make a contract with the Schedim, and meet them at certain times, dance with them, and visit these spirits who appear to them in the shape of goats." In many countries such women were killed. This form of Kischuph is true sorcery. The other form, material Kischuph, consists of disturbing influences on the natural elements produced by exciting false "rapports" in various substances.

Kiss, Bewitchment by a

Florence Newton, a notorious Irish witch of the seventeenth century, was on several occasions accused of bewitching people by means of a kiss. The first was a maid who refused alms to her. About a week later the witch kissed her violently, from which time the servant suffered from fits and was transported from place to place, first being carried mysteriously to the top of the house, then being placed between two feather beds, and so on. The witch was also said to have caused the death of David Jones, who stood sentinel over her in prison, by kissing his hand, and by the same means brought about the death of the children of three aldermen of Youghall, county Cork. Newton was tried at Cork Assizes in 1661.

Sources:

Seymour, St. John. Irish Witchcraft and Demonology. 1913. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Kitson, Alfred (1855–1934)

British pioneer of teaching Spiritualism to children through the lyceum system first founded in the United States by Andrew Jackson Davis around 1863. Kitson, son of a Yorkshire coal miner, was a veteran of the Spiritualist movement at a time when it was violently opposed in Britain. In 1876 he organized evening classes for children on the lyceum system as a wing of the newly formed Spiritualist Society in Yorkshire. Kitson campaigned vigorously for the lyceum movement and became known as "the Father of British Lyceums." He collaborated with Harry A. Kersey on the English Lyceum Manual, first published in 1887.

Kersey and Kitson were also largely instrumental in bringing into existence the Spiritualists' Lyceum Union in 1890. The Union started a monthly Spiritualists' Lyceum Magazine, first published in Oldham in January 1890. When this magazine ceased publication in November 1890 it was replaced by the Lyceum Banner, edited by J. J. Morse from Liverpool until 1902, when Kitson became editor. In 1894 the union changed its name to the British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union. The lyceum movement prospered for many years, but Kitson resigned from secretaryship of the union in 1919 because of ill health.

Kiyota, Masuaki (1962–)

Remarkable young Japanese psychic born April 30, 1962 who appears to have extraordinary talents in metal bending and nengraphy (psychic photography). Kiyota rivals famed psychics Uri Geller and Matthew Manning in his unusual demonstrations. Kiyota was elaborately tested and filmed in the 1970s while producing his phenomena. In addition to an appearance on a Nippon Television program, Kiyota was also featured on the American program "Exploring the Unknown" (narrated by Burt Lancaster), presented on NBC October 30, 1977. Later in the decade, he was investigated by Walter Uphoff and his wife Mary Jo, who visited him in Japan.

Kiyota's reputation as a paranormal metal bender suffered considerably with his own admission that he had cheated on two occasions. In the course of a television demonstration in Tokyo on February 3, 1984, Kiyota was challenged by observers who accused him of cheating during the metal bending. Kiyota admitted that he had assisted his claimed psychic efforts by physical exertion with his hands. A month later, in the course of an interview on April 27, 1984, with a Mr. Kasahara and Soji Otani, Kiyota further admitted to cheating on one earlier occasion during a "metal-bending party" in 1983. Kiyota stated that he had used normal muscular effort to produce metal distortions. These admissions have cast doubt over other performances by Kiyota. It is possible that the great publicity given to his claimed metal bending abilities put him under pressure to supplement paranormal ability with fraud, as has been often claimed in the case of earlier psychics and Spiritualist mediums.

For a thoughtful discussion on the subject of Kiyota's cheating and its implications, see the correspondence from Ian Stevenson, Emily Williams Cook, Carolee A. Werner, Michael Dennis, H. H. J. Keil, and Peter Phillips, with an additional communication from Jules Eisenbud, in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 79, no. 2, April 1985). (See also Japan)

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Eisenbud, Jules. "Some Investigations of Claims of PK Effects on Metal: The Denver Experiments." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 76 (1982).

Uphoff, Walter, and Mary Jo Uphoff. Mind Over Matter: Implications of Masuaki Kiyota's PK Feats with Metal and Film. Oregon, Wis.: New Frontiers Center, 1980. Reprint, UK: Colin Smythe, 1980.

Klarer, Elizabeth (1910–1994)

Elizabeth Klarer was the most prominent flying saucer contactee of the 1950s from South Africa. She was born in 1910 in Mooi River, Natal, South Africa and rose out of obscurity in 1956 following an encounter with a spaceship reputedly from Alpha Centauri, of which she took a picture. She was received enthusiastically among South African UFO buffs who provided her with a platform to recount her encounters.

As Klarer's story unfolded, she claimed to have had an initial UFO sighting in 1917 and again in 1937. Finally, in 1954, while at her farm in Natal where she was born, she saw a saucer again. This time it flew close enough that she could see one of its occupants. Then on April 6, 1956, she was again at her farm in Natal when a saucer landed and she was taken aboard. The fair-haired and handsome person she had seen before introduced himself as Akon. The saucer took her to a large mothership, where she was shown pictures of Meton, Akon's home planet. She was given food, a vegetarian meal, and introduced to their culture. Two months later she saw the saucer again and took a picture of it as it flew above her farm.

She told this story at UFO gatherings in South Africa, and over the years reported additional contacts. The most important event in these later encounters was her developing romantic attachment to Akon, with whom she had a son. She claimed that at one point she stayed for four months on Meton and completed her pregnancy there. Her son could not live on Earth, but occasionally visited her. All of these events were discussed in her 1980 book, Beyond the Light Barrier. Although warmly received in South Africa, her story was not believed by North American and European UFO researchers. Except for the picture, weak evidence indeed, there was nothing to collaborate her story. She persisted in her claims, however, until her death in February of 1994.

Sources:

Hind, Cynthia. UFOs-African Encounters. Salsbury, Zimbabwe: Gemini, 1982.

Klarer, Elizabeth. Beyond the Light Barrier. Cape Town, South Africa: Howard Timmins, 1980.

Klinckowstroem, Graf Carl von (1884–1969)

German research scientist who wrote about water divining and other parapsychological subjects. He was born on August 26, 1884, at Potsdam, Germany. Klinckowstroem attended the University of Munich, where he studied physics, philosophy, psychology, and history. He was a corresponding member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, from 1928 on and an honorary member of Deutscher Erfinder-Verband, Nuremberg. As an amateur conjuring magician he was critical of many claims of psychical phenomena. He was particularly skeptical of astrology and witchcraft, but was also critical of parapsychology. He gathered data on fraudulent mediums and attacked flaws in the research of Baron Schrenk-Notzing.

Klinckowstroem published several books on science, such as the 1959 volume Geschichte der Technik (History of Technology) and a variety of books on paranormal subjects.

He died August 29, 1969.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Klinckowstroem, Graf Carl von. Bibliographie der Wünschelrute (Bibliography of the Divining Rod). N.p., 1911.

———. Yogi-Künste (Yogic Arts). N.p., 1922.

———. Die Zauberkunst (The Art of Magic). N.p., 1954.

Klinckowstroem, Graf Carl von, and Rudolph von Maltzahn. Handbuch der Wünschelrute (Handbook of the Divining Rod). Müchen; Berlin: R. Oldenbourg, 1931.

Klinckowstroem, Graf Carl von, W. von Gulat-Wellenburg, and Hans Rosenbusch. Der Physikalische Mediumismus (Physical Mediumship). N.p., 1925.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Klinschor (or Klingsor)

According to tales of King Arthur, he was lord of the magic castle wherein Arthur's mother was kept. Klinschor was a nephew of Virgilius of Naples and was overcome by Sir Gawain. He is alluded to in the Parsival of Wolfram von Eschenbach.

Klokochovo

Klokochovo is a small village in present-day Slovakia known for its weeping icon. The town is traditionally a home to Carpatho-Rusyns, Eastern Rite Roman Catholics who at one point had converted from Eastern Orthodoxy. While Roman in belief, they retained their Eastern liturgy and practices, including the use of icons (specially prepared pictures) rather than statues as objects of veneration. In 1670, as conflict between Protestants and Catholics in the region was at a boiling point, and a Protestant army approached the village, residents fled to the parish church to seek the intervention of the Virgin on their behalf. As they were praying, the army entered the town and soldiers found their way to the church.

They were about to ransack the sanctuary when one of them noticed that the icon was weeping. He drove his bayonet into the icon. It continued to weep. He ripped it from the iconostasis (which separated the altar area from the rest of the sanctuary) and was about to destroy it when the villagers intervened. A person grabbed the icon and fled with it into the woods. The soldiers torched the church.

When peace returned to the area, the icon was placed in the town hall at Prjashev. However, the Countess Sophia Bathory, who ruled the region, became excited about the icon and had it transferred to her chapel at her castle at Mukachevo. The wealthy countess lavishly decorated the icon with jewels and drapes. It eventually became the possession of Countess Helen nee Zrinyi. In 1688, the area having come under the control of the Hungarians, the countess went into exile in Turkey and took the icon with her. It was returned to Mukachevo in 1703. However, in 1711 the Hungarians overran the castle and carried the icon (along with other valuables in the castle) to the Hapsburg family capital in Vienna. It was placed in the private chapel in the imperial palace.

The villagers requested the return of their icon. They were refused, but during the reign of Empress Maria Theresa, a copy was made, and in 1769 it was presented to the city of Prjashev. In 1907, the copy of the icon in Prjashev was presented to Bishop John Valyi, whose seat was in Prjashev. At this time, the village of Klokochovo requested its return to their parish church. The bishop refused, but he had a second copy made and presented it to the church in 1913. Subsequently, Klokochovo became a place of pilgrimage. Though interrupted when Slovakia came under Communist control, pilgrimages began again in 1989. In the meantime, the original icon had disappeared from the place in Vienna. Its present location is unknown.

Sources:

Weeping Icon of Klokochovo. http://www.carpatho-rusyn.org/. April 15, 2000.

Kloppenburg, Boaventura (1919–)

Professor of theology and Franciscan priest who studied Spiritism in Brazil. He was born on November 2, 1919, at Molbergen (Oldenburg), Germany, and studied at the Antonianum University, Rome (D.Th., 1950). Besides his books on Spiritualism, Kloppenburg wrote pamphlets on Theosophy and the Rosicrucians in Brazil.

Sources:

Kloppenburg, Boaventura. O Espiritismo no Brasil (Spiritism in Brazil). Petropolis: Editoria Vozes, 1964.

———. A Maçonario no Brasil (Masonry in Brazil). 4th ed. N.p., 1961.

———. Nossas Superstiçoes (Our Superstitions). N.p., 1959.

———. O Reencarnacionismo no Brasil (Reincarnationism in Brazil). Petropolis: Editoria Vozes, 1961.

———. Pastoral Practice and the Paranormal. Translated by Paul Burns. Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1979.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kluski, Franek (1874– ?)

Pseudonym of a distinguished Polish poet and writer whose remarkable physical powers coexisted with psychic gifts. As a child of five or six he had presentiments, visions of distant events, and saw phantoms. He thought the phantoms natural and talked with them familiarly. In 1919 Kluski's psychic gifts were discovered when he attended a séance with Jan Guzyk. His talent annoyed him at first, but curiosity prevailed and he consented to experiments. Various phases of physical phenomena developed, culminating in materialization, during which, like Elizabeth d'Esperance, Kluski retained consciousness.

For scientific research he placed himself readily at the disposition of the Polish Society for Psychic Research and the Institut Métapsychique of Paris, where his first sittings took place in 1920 in the presence of Charles Richet, Count de Grammont, and Gustav Geley. The paraffin casts of materialized limbs made in these séances were considered among the best objective evidence of supernormal power ever produced.

Another curious feature of Kluski's materialization séances was the appearance of animal forms, which included squirrels, dogs, cats, a lion, and a buzzard. One of the most disturbing manifestations was a large primitive creature like a huge ape or a hairy man. The face was hairy, and the creature had long, strong arms and behaved roughly to the sitters, trying to lick their hands and faces. This materialization, which Geley named "Pithecanthropus," exuded a strong odor like "a wet dog." Geley considered Kluski a universal medium, a king among his contemporaries. He found the clairvoyance that was manifest in Kluski's automatic writing scripts almost terrifying.

The best account of Kluski's mediumship is the 1926 book (in Polish) by Col. Norbert Ocholowicz, Wspomnienia Z, Seansow Z (Medium Frankiem Kluskim).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Geley, Gustav. Clairvoyance and Materialisation. London, 1927.

Kneale, Martha Hurst (1909–)

University fellow and tutor who wrote on psychical research. Born at Skipton, Yorkshire, England, Kneale studied at Somerville College, Oxford University (B.A., 1933). Following graduation she became a Graham Kenan fellow at the University of North Carolina (1933–34) and a graduate fellow at Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania (1934–36). She received her master's degree at Oxford University (1936). Kneale became a tutor in philosophy at Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford University. She had a keen interest in parapsychology and wrote papers on philosophical issues related to the discipline. She was a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London.

Sources:

Kneale, Martha Hurst. "Is Psychical Research Relevant to Philosophy?" Proceedings, Aristotelian Society. Supplementary volume 24 (1950).

———. "Time and Psychical Research." Proceedings of Four Conferences of Parapsychological Studies (1957).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Knight, Gareth (1930–)

Gareth Knight, a contemporary ritual magician, was born in Colchester, England. As a young man he became interested in the occult and began studying with the Fraternity of the Inner Light, the organization founded by Dion Forture (1890–1946) after her break with the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Over the next six years he worked his way through the curriculum and was initiated into the higher mysteries in 1959. He also worked as the fraternity's librarian. In 1962 he launched a periodical, New Dimensions, and began work on his first book, A Practical Guide to Qabalistic Symbolism (1965).

Through the mid-1960s he became dissatisfied with the Society of the Inner Light, now in the hands of Fortune's students, and he resigned. He relocated to Gloucestershire and along with another former fraternity member, William E. Butler, started a publishing house, Helios Books, and to launch a new course of study in magic, the Helios Course. Knight also became friends with a Christian priest whose reflections on Christianity highly influenced Knight's next book, Experience of the Inner World (1975).

In 1972, Butler and Knight went their separate ways. Under Butler's care, the Helios Course developed into the curriculum of the Servants of the Inner Light. In 1973 Knight founded a new esoteric school, informally known as the Gareth Knight Group, also based on the Society of the Inner Light, and began again to issue New Dimensions, which three years later transformed into Quadriga, a periodical primarily circulated among Knight's students. New students were trained through a correspondence course. After some years, as the core of the group began work at an increasingly advanced level, the teaching work was closed and it transformed into a working magical group now known as the Avalon Group.

Knight returned to teaching in 1987 with a tarot correspondence course, later published as a book, The Magical World of the Tarot (1996). In 1991 he accepted the invitation of the Society of the Inner Light to edit Dion Fortune's letters from the World War II era. He followed with work on a unique volume, An Introduction to Ritual Magic (1997). The volume consists of chapters written by Fortune (drawn from previously unpublished material) and an equal number of chapters written by Knight. He rejoined the Society of the Inner Light in 1998 and has been participating in its reorganization.

Knight has his own home page on the Internet, http://www.angelfire.com/az/garethknight/.

Sources:

Gareth Knight's Homepage. http://www.angelfire.com/az/garethknight/. April 25, 2000.

Knight, Gareth. Experience of the Inner World. Chetenham, Glos., UK: Helios Book Service, 1975.

———. Magic and the Western Mind. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1990.

———. The Magical World of the Tarot. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1996.

———. A Practical Guide to Qabalistic Symbolism. N.p., 1965. Reprint. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1978.

Knight, JZ (1946–)

Channel of "Ramtha," a 35,000-year-old warrior spirit from the lost continent of Atlantis, and head of Ramtha's School of Enlightenment. JZ Knight was born Judith Darlene Hampton on March 16, 1946, in Dexter, New Mexico. She grew up in poverty and was unable to go to college; after high school she married and became the mother of two children. The marriage ended when she became unwilling to continue to countenance her husband's alcoholism and infidelity. She became a businesswoman and her career led her eventually to Tacoma, Washington, and a second marriage. Along the way, a cryptic psychic reading told her that one day she would meet "the One." She did not understand, for several years, but the words proved true when in 1977 she encountered Ramtha.

Ramtha appeared to her one Sunday afternoon in 1977. Shortly thereafter he began to speak through her and there was an immediate response from people who attended her initial sessions as a channel. After she became relatively comfortable as a channel, she began channeling Ramtha regularly in weekend "dialogues" held at various locations around the United States. Knight eventually took the dialogues to Canada, England, Germany, Australia, and New Zealand. In the 1980s she became the most successful of the channels that grew up around the New Age movement.

In 1987 she discontinued the dialogues and opened Ramtha's School of Enlightenment in Yelm, Washington, on land previously used as a ranch. Many of the students moved to northeast Washington and have gathered periodically in the years since for more systematic teaching by Ramtha, who continues to speak through Knight. Approximately three thousand students are connected with the school.

During the early years of the school, Knight went through a period of intense criticism from the media, largely caused by the obvious success and built around the criticisms of former followers of Ramtha's teachings. About that same time, Knight released her own autobiography. The negative publicity continued into the 1990s, in large part occasioned by the breakup of her marriage to Jeff Knight, who contested the terms of their divorce and charged that the guru used mind-control tricks. However, these issues have been largely decided in Knight's favor and the school has continued to grow and prosper.

Over the years of the dialogues, transcripts of Ramtha's talks were compiled and published, and several videotapes of dialogue sessions were released. While these cover some major themes in Ramtha's teachings, a more systematic presentation of Ramtha's basic philosophy and instruction on the spiritual disciplines is currently available only to students of the school.

Sources:

Knight, JZ. A State of Mind: My Story. New York: Warner Books, 1987.

Ramtha (as channeled by JZ Knight). The Ancient Schools of Wisdom. Transcribed by Diane Munoz. Yelm, Wash.: Diane Munoz, 1992.

———. I Am Ramtha. Edited by Cindy Black, Richard Cohn, Greg Simmons, and Wes Walt. Portland, Ore.: Beyond Words Publishing, 1986.

Ramtha (The White Book). Edited by Steven Lee Weinberg, with Randall Weischedel, Sue Ann Fazio, and Carol Wright. Eastsound, Wash.: Sovereignty, 1986.

Ramtha's School of Enlightenment: The American Gnostic School. Yelm, Wash.: JZK, 1994.

Knight, Richard Payne (1751–1824)

Richard Payne Knight, an amateur archeologist and advocate of an esoteric Pagan philosophy as an alternative to orthodox Christianity, was the son of an Anglican clergyman from Herefordshire, England. His father retired relatively early in his life and married the daughter of a carpenter who had served as his housekeeper. A sickly child, young Richard was kept at home and thus received little formal education, though he was tutored by his father, and following his father's death in 1764, by a tutor hired by the family. He did not attend a university, but was able to travel extensively. As he entered adulthood he inherited a large sum from his grandfather, which provided him the necessary funds to pursue his various independent intellectual pursuits.

By the time of his third trip to Italy in 1777, Knight had rejected the Christianity of his father, which he had come to view as a degenerating force. He had also become interested in exploring a neglected aspect of the ancient world, the worship of Priapus, the Roman god of fertility, the signs of his cult having survived in a variety of images and statues. Sir William Hamilton, who at the time headed the British embassy in Naples, had begun research into the survivals of Priapus worship in the local traditions. Knight found himself in a circle of independent scholars who shared a dislike for Christianity and whose research had the additional agenda of challenging the uniqueness of Christianity.

During his travels Knight explored a variety of ancient ruins and found himself particularly drawn to the many representations of the male generative organ. The philosophy that emerged from his work was originally published in his 1786 book-length essay, "A Discourse on the Worship of Priapus and Its Connection with the Mystic Theology of the Ancients." Five hundred copies were privately published. Knight suggested that the phallus was a symbol of the God of Nature who generated the universe in his threefold aspects as creator, destroyer, and renovator. God is both male and female. His passive and active sides manifest as divine essence (life force) and universal matter (substance). The widespread images of sexual intercourse found in ancient art and statuary symbolized the universal process of creation.

Knight also posited the previous existence of a universal theology that resembled eighteenth-century Deism. This worldview survives in a more-or-less degenerate form in various contemporary religions. He rejected these modern religious forms as they tended to lead to religious bigotry, a view that led him to become an outspoken advocate of religious liberty.

Knight never married. He spent much of his time with the large collection of classical artifacts he had assembled on his travels and which he left to the British Museum. In 1809 he turned the family estate over to his brother and moved into a modest cottage away from the main house. Unlike many of his contemporaries who also advocated allegiance to the God of Nature, Knight seemed actually to enjoy the solitary contemplation of nature and took daily walks through the countryside.

While Knight had little use for popular occultism or astrology, his sexually oriented philosophy would serve as a major source for twentieth-century ceremonial magic, especially the thelemic philosophy of Aleister Crowley.

Sources:

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Knight, Richard Payne. A Discourse on the Worship of Priapus and Its Connection with the Mystic Theology of the Ancients. 1786. Reprint, Secacus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

———. On the Symbolical Language of Ancient Art and Mythology. London: Black and Armstrong, 1836.

Knock

Irish village in county Mayo that was the scene of apparitions of the Virgin Mary similar to those that occurred at Lourdes in the nineteenth century. On the evening of August 21, 1879, shortly before dusk, three strange figures were observed by one or two parishioners of the village. The figures were standing motionless by the gable of the Roman Catholic church. At first this occasioned no surprise, since the parishioners assumed that the figures were statues ordered by the parish priest. As the evening advanced, however, the figures appeared to be surrounded by a strange light, and soon a small crowd of villagers assembled to observe the apparitions. The main figure was a woman clothed in white, wearing a golden crown. On each side of her was a man, one wearing a bishop's mitre, the other elderly and bearded.

Because it was raining at the time the crowd eventually dispersed. Some villagers went home to dry their clothes, others to assist an elderly woman who had collapsed on her way to church. The priest's housekeeper went to tell the priest about the apparitions, but he was not impressed and did not go to the church to see for himself. Later that night the apparitions disappeared.

The apparitions had been witnessed by nearly 30 people, and a few weeks later the archbishop of Tuam set up a commission to investigate the phenomenon and interview the witnesses. Fifteen villagers were interviewed, ranging from a boy of six to an old woman of 75. Their evidence was given in a frank, down-to-earth manner that carried absolute conviction, and their accounts never changed throughout their lives. Minor variations between accounts were no more significant than might be expected from a number of individual witnesses to a remarkable event.

A Marian shrine for pilgrimages was constructed at Knock with the permission of the Roman Catholic Church. In addition to the original Knock Shrine at the apparition church, there is now a large new Church of Our Lady, and, as at Lourdes, there are mass services for healing the sick. The shrine achieved worldwide recognition when Pope John Paul II visited Knock in September 1979. In the 1980s an ambitious project was begun—the construction of an airport at Knock.

The Knock airport was the brainchild of Monsignor James Horan, parish priest of Knock, and although the plan was at first ridiculed, he managed to secure initial financial support, which was later curtailed. Critics pointed out that there was no need for an airport at Knock, that it was on the edge of a bog in the middle of nowhere. In spite of such opposition Horan's tireless enthusiasm somehow culminated in completion of the airport, now regarded as the major miracle of Knock.

On Friday, October 25, 1985, the Knock airport was operational and three Aer Lingus planes landed there. They took off with nearly 500 people on an eight-day pilgrimage to Rome, where Horan was received at St. Peter's. The 72-year-old priest made a speech calling upon the Irish transport minister to grant full recognition to Knock and create a duty-free zone there in order to develop the airport to its full potential.

On Friday, August 1, 1986, Horan died at age 74, only two days after the first transatlantic flight touched down at the new Connaught Airport at Knock. It was also the golden jubilee year of Horan's ordination to the priesthood.

On July 9, before setting out on his final pilgrimage to Lourdes, Horan had signed the remaining contract for Connaught International Airport to install lighting on the runway.

In Lourdes he celebrated public Mass and remarked, "This is the happiest day of my life." With a convivial Irish group in the hotel lounge he sang "Auld Lang Syne;" he died only a few hours later.

From time to time, skeptics have revived the theory—considered in great detail in 1879—that the apparitions at Knock were the work of a prankster projecting magic lantern slides. However, this theory is based solely on the fact that the images appeared static—as distinct from the reported living and moving images of the Virgin Mary seen at other locations—and there is no direct evidence to substantiate the slide projection theory.

Notable points from witnesses seem to negate the magic lantern theory. The apparitions were first seen in daylight, just before sunset, and continued after dark. It was raining, but this did not affect the apparitions. Various witnesses saw the apparitions from different angles of approach, and some would surely have observed a characteristic beam of light proceeding from a magic lantern, even assuming that it could project images in daylight as well as dusk and be unaffected by rain.

In 1880 a reporter for the London Daily Telegraph interviewed a policeman who said he saw only "a rosy sort of brightness, through which what seemed to be stars appeared. I saw no figures . . . but some women who were praying there, declared that they beheld the Blessed Virgin" he said. Asked whether he looked around to see where the brightness came from, the policeman replied, "I did, but everything was dark. There was no light anywhere, except on the gable."

The Daily Telegraph reporter also made a detailed investigation of all possible sources for a magic lantern projection, as other investigators had done earlier. His finding was as follows:

"The chapel stands in a rather extensive yard, which is bounded, opposite the table, and distant from it some 25 paces, by a dilapidated wall about four feet high. Beyond this is a large field and the open country. Within the yard, a little to the north of a line drawn from the north angle of the gable to the low wall, stands a schoolhouse, its gable directly facing towards the east. Obviously, therefore, if the appearances alleged to have been seen on the chapel wall were due to a magic lantern, the operator, supposing he could have focussed his picture at such a distance, must have taken post behind the low wall; or, if stationed in the school, must have thrown the image on the 'screen' at a very considered angle. The wall theory may be dismissed, because over its tumbled stones the first witness passed to get a nearer view, and the glare of the lantern would at once have been detected by the observant policeman. There remains the notion of a manipulator stationed in the schoolhouse. I gave my best attention to the windowless gable of that building, and could find no signs of hole or crack from chimney to foundation. Going inside among the children, to look at the wall from that point of view, the plaster appeared untouched, and the roof too much open to admit a man working between its apex and what there was of ceiling."

One of the witnesses, a Mrs. O'Connell, later recalled how two church commissioners took her statement in the schoolhouse and a fortnight later 20 more priests arrived, and carried out elaborate tests with magic lantern slides. "They wanted to make out," she said, "that the pictures were like the ones we saw, but they were no more like them and no one could make them like the apparitions."

The Catholic Church is normally skeptical of reported miracles and is prepared to endorse them only after most careful and extensive investigation. Moreover, in the case of Knock, the commission of inquiry had barely completed taking depositions from witnesses when further visions were reported. Amid scenes of great religious fervor, similar appearances on the same church gable were reported on February 9 and on March 25 and 26, 1880. The probability of a prankster being able to maintain a hoax over a period of several months, in the presence of investigators and newspaper reporters, seems low.

The magic lantern theory was again revived in a British television program, "Is There Anybody There?" produced by Karl Sabbagh and telecast on October 31, 1987. In this production

Nicholas Humphrey demonstrated how a passable magic lantern image could be projected from within the gable of a Cambridge church, using a right-angled shaving mirror. Humphrey suggested fraud by Archdeacon Cavanagh, one of the three commissioners. In support of the theory, a document from the State Papers in Dublin Castle was cited in which Cavanagh, parish priest of Knock, was reported by a spy as criticizing rebels and consequently endangering his prestige in the area by championing landlords and attacking local Fenians or Land League leaders. The idea that Cavanagh, widely respected in his parish, might resort to fraud was not well received.

Over the years, many remarkable miraculous cures have been reported in connection with Knock Shrine, including cures of three archbishops, and Knock has become known as "the Lourdes of Ireland."

Sources:

Berman, David. "Knock: Some New Evidence." The British and Irish Skeptic 1, no. 6 (November/December 1987).

———. "Papal Visit Resurrects Ireland's Knock Legend." The Freethinker (October 1979). Reprinted in The British and Irish Skeptic 1, no. 1 (January/February 1987).

Coyne, William D. Our Lady of Knock. New York: Catholic Book Publishing, 1948.

MacPhilpin, John. The Apparitions and Miracles at Knock, also Official Depositons of the Eye-Witnesses. Tuam, Ireland, 1880. 2d ed. Dublin: M. H. Gill & Son, 1894.

Neary, Tom. Our Lady of Knock. London: Catholic Truth Society, 1976.

Rynne, Catherine. Knock 1879–1979. Dublin: Veritas Publications, 1979.

Walsh, Michael. The Apparition at Knock: A Survey of Facts and Evidence. Tuam, Ireland: St. Jarlath's College, 1959.

Webber, Muriel I. Knock: Who Goes There? London: Protestant Truth Society, 1980.

Knockers

Underground sprites of Cornish folklore in England who are said to inhabit tin mines. They resemble the friendly German kobolds, since they knock to indicate places underground where there is a rich vein of ore. (See also Elementary Spirits)

Knodt, William Charles (1936–)

Administrative employee, Illinois Bell Telephone Company. He conducted experiments in psychokinesis (influencing casting of dice) and correlation between physical pain and ESP in hospital patients.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Knorr von Rosenroth, Christian (1636–1689)

German alchemist and mystic who edited kabalistic works under the title Kabbala Denudata (1677, 1684). This book includes three fragments from the book Zohar with extensive commentary, as well as treatises by Isaac Luria, founder of a kabalistic sect in the sixteenth century, and the Treatise on the Soul, by Moses Cordovero. Rosenroth translated these Hebrew works into Latin and thus made them available to non-Jewish readers. An English translation of Kabbala Denudata was published by S. L. MacGregor Mathers in 1887. (See also Kabala)

Knowles, Elsie A(nna) G(race) (1908–)

German statistician who wrote and experimented in the field of parapsychology. She was born on July 14, 1908, in Berlin, and studied at the University of Jena (Ph.D., 1932). In 1935 she moved to England and taught mathematics at various universities through the mid-1950s. Then in 1954 she became the manager of the statistics department at Ferodo Ltd. Associates, Institute of Physics, London.

Knowles had a longtime interest in psychical research and was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association. She conducted experiments in psi dexterity.

Sources:

Knowles, Elsie A. G. "Report on an Experiment Concerning the Influence of Mind Over Matter." Journal of Parapsychology 13, no. 3 (September 1949).

———. "Report on the Susceptibility of Manually Operated Random Selector to Psi Dexterity." Journal of Parapsychology 16, no. 1 (March 1952).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Knowles, Frederick W(ilfred) (1911–)

German physician and surgeon who wrote on psychic healing. Knowles was born on June 7, 1911, in Berlin. He studied at the Royal College of Surgeons, England (member 1950), and the Royal College of Physicians (licentiate 1950). His medical practice took him to Canada, India, New Guinea, Australia, and New Zealand as well as to England. He was a life member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and a charter member of the Parapsychological Association.

Knowles's studies on psychic healing included Indian yoga techniques, hypnosis, and phenomena formerly known as mesmerism. In addition to his medical and anatomical papers, he published articles on paranormal healing.

Sources:

Knowles, Frederick W. "ESP Today." Corrective Psychiatry and Journal of Special Therapy 12, no. 2 (March 1966).

———. "Psychic Healing in Organic Disease." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 50, no. 3 (July 1956).

———. "Rat Experiments and Mesmerism." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 53, no. 2 (April 1959).

———. "Some Investigations into Psychic Healing." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 48, no. 1 (January 1954).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kobolds

The sprites or fairies of German folklore. They are of two kinds. The first is a household sprite like the English brownie, helping with the housework if properly fed and treated, but mischievous, playing pranks on people. Kobolds are often given names, like "Chimmeken," "Heinze," or "Walther." The second type are underground sprites who haunt caves and mines and are often evil and malicious. The metallurgist George Landmann describes these spirits in his book De Animatibus subterraneis (1657). (See also Elementary Spirits; Knockers)

Koch, Walter A(lbert) (1895– ?)

Teacher and astrologer who wrote books and articles on parapsychology. He was born on September 18, 1895, in Esslingen/Neckar, Württemberg, Germany, and studied at the University of Tübingen (Ph.D., 1920). He was scientific adviser to the Association of German Astrologers and leader of the investigation circle of the Cosmobiosophical Association, Hamburg. He served in the German army during World War I but was arrested for resistance to the Nazis in 1941 and spent three years in prisons (including the concentration camp at Dachau). Koch wrote a number of books on astrological subjects. He also contributed articles on psychokinesis, card divination, and prophecy to various journals, including Neue Wissenschaft and Mensch und Schicksal.

Sources:

Koch, Walter A. Astrologische Farbenlehre (Astrological Science of Colors). N.p., 1930.

———. Deine Farbe—Dein Charakter (Your Color—Your Character). N.p., 1953.

———. Dr. Korsch und Die Astrologie (Dr. Korsch and Astrology). N.p., 1956.

———. Innenmensch und Außenmensch (Man: Introversion and Extraversion). N.p., 1956.

———. Prophetie und Astrologische Prognose (Prophecy and Astrological Prediction). N.p., 1954.

———. Psychologische Farbenlehre (Psychological Science of Colors). C. Marhold, 1931.

———. Regiomontanus und das Häusersystem des Geburtosortes (Regiomontanus and the System of Houses of Birthplaces). N.p., 1960.

———. Die Seele der Edelsteine (The Psyche of Precious Stones). N.p., 1934.

Koestler, Arthur (1905–1983)

World-famous novelist and writer on political, scientific, and philosophical themes who was also interested in parapsychology. He was born in Budapest September 5, 1905, the only son of a Hungarian father and an Austrian mother. He described his early life as "lonely, precocious and neurotic," saying he was "admired for my brains and detested for my character by teachers and schoolfellows alike." Koestler attended the Polytechnic High School in Vienna and studied engineering, then studied science and psychology at the University of Vienna.

As a young man he became a Zionist, and when working as a journalist he joined the Communist party. He was a reporter in Spain during the Civil War, where he was imprisoned as a Communist and was only released after the intervention of the British government. In Paris during World War II, he was arrested and sent to a concentration camp. His prison experiences became the basis of his brilliant but depressing book Darkness at Noon (1940). In this book, as in his contribution to the later symposium The God That Failed: Six Studies in Communism (1949), he expresses his rejection of communism and other totalitarian regimes, which he sees as corrupted by inhuman and cynical power politics. In 1941 Koestler joined the British army and after the war became a British citizen. By 1955 he had ceased to be actively involved in political campaigning.

In addition to his novels Koestler published a series of brilliant questing works concerned with human faculty and destiny in relation to scientific findings. Although it was not widely recognized that he had a long-standing interest in parapsychology, his book The Roots of Coincidence (1972) touches on the question of scientific validation of psychic gifts and states that extrasensory perception might be "the highest manifestation of the integrative potential of living matter," while in The Challenge of Chance, published a year later, Koestler reviews possible connections between parapsychology and quantum physics. However, he maintained a characteristic skepticism, as expressed in a television interview: "I am still skeptical. I've got a split mind about it. I know from personal experience, from intuition, whatever you call it, that these phenomena exist. At the same time, my rational or scientific mind rejects them. And I'm quite happy with that split of the mind."

He participated in three annual international conferences of the Parapsychology Foundation. At the 1972 Amsterdam conference, "Parapsychology and the Sciences," he contributed a paper, "The Perversity of Physics," in which he states:

"I do believe that there is a positive, not only a negative rapprochement between those two black sheep: parapsychology and quantum physics. But let us not try to rush things. The great new synthesis in the history of science occurred when each component, which ultimately went into synthesis, was already there and they only needed to be together. I do not think that the time is ripe, but I think there is this affinity between parapsychology and modern physics which is more intuitive than logical, more potential than actual . . . a kind of 'gestalt' affinity."

In the 1974 conference at Geneva, he again discussed parapsychology in relation to quantum physics, stating,

"So there is now a radical wing in parapsychology, a sort of Trotskyite wing, of which I am a member, with Alister Hardy and others, who are trying really radically to break away from causality, not only paying lip service to the rejection of causality, or confining this rejection of causality and determinism to the micro-level, but who really wonder whether a completely new approach, indicated in holism, Jung's synchronicity, and so on, might not be theoretically more promising."

Koestler was also a founding member of the KIB Foundation (later renamed the Koestler Foundation), a British organization fostering research into unorthodox and paranormal phenomena. He wrote some 35 books.

Koestler died at his London home March 3, 1983, at age 77, in a joint suicide with his third wife, Cynthia Koestler. He had been suffering from leukemia and advanced Parkinson's disease. In his will he included a bequest to a British university for the study of paranormal faculties such as metal bending, telepathy, and healing. The Koestler bequest, equivalent to $600,000, was awarded to the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, to establish the Koestler Chair of Parapsychology. The first occupant was Robert L. Morris of Syracuse University, former president of the Parapsychological Association.

Koestler is generally recognized as one of the most stimulating intellects of the twentieth century. In 1968, at the University of Copenhagen, he was awarded the Sooning Prize for his political and philosophical writings, a prize earlier awarded to Bertrand Russell and Winston Churchill. Koestler was also honored with such awards as Commander of the British Empire and Companion of the Royal Society of Literature.

Sources:

Atkins, John. Arthur Koestler. N.p., 1956.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hardy, Aleister C., Arthur Koestler, and Robert Harvie. The Challenge of Chance: A Mass Experiment in Telepathy and Its Unexpected Outcome. New York: Random House, 1973.

Huber, Peter Alfred. Arthur Koestler, Das Literarische Werk. Zürich: Fretz & Wasmuth, 1962.

Koestler, Arthur. The Ghost in the Machine. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

———. The Lotus and the Robot. London: Hutchinson, 1960.

———. The Roots of Coincidence. London: Hutchinson, 1972.

———. The Yogi and the Commissar. New York: Macmillan, 1946.

Webberly, Rob, ed. Astride the Two Cultures: Arthur Koestler at 70. London: Hutchingson, 1975.

Koestler Foundation

British organization founded in 1980 as the KIB Foundation to encourage and promote research in fields outside established science, especially parapsychology and alternative medicine. The trustees were Arthur Koestler, Brian Inglis, Tony Bloomfield, Michael Fullerlove, and Sir William Wood. The foundation's original name derived from initials of the first three trustees. After the death of Arthur Koestler in 1983 the foundation was given its present name.

The foundation acted as a clearinghouse for information about research in various parts of the world and as a bridge between sponsors and research projects. Selection of projects was by an advisory group that included individuals of distinction in relevant fields of science and medicine. Among its major accomplishments had been the publication of A Glossary of Terms Used in Parapsychology (1982), compiled by Michael A. Thalbourne, on behalf of the Society for Psychical Research. Last known address: 23 Harley House, Marylebone Rd., London, NW1 5HE, England.

Koestler Parapsychology Unit

Following the death of author Arthur Koestler (1905–83) and his wife, the lawyer handling their will put out the word that money had been left to endow a chair in parapsychology. Of the several schools that applied for the money, the psychology department at Edinburgh University was chosen. The chair was funded in 1984 and the following year Robert L. Morris (b. 1942) was selected as the first occupant. Morris had done postdoctoral work at Duke University with J. B. Rhine and had written numerous papers relating psi to his specialization, biological psychology.

Morris organized the Koestler Parapsychology Unit and had as an initial assignment the development of a research program that would be integrated into the ongoing life of the whole psychology department and the university as a whole. Morris was fortunate to have a department with a positive history relative to parapsychology in that through the 1970s and early 1980s, John Beloff (now retired), a prominent parapsychologist in his own right, had taught at Edinburgh.

Within a few years, Morris had built a viable research team that included graduate students and several associates with doctoral degrees. The research program was built on a research model that honestly accepted the problems inherent in psychical research including the hostility of much of the academic community to the endeavor, the task of creating experiments that might enhance the likelihood of psi emerging in a laboratory context, and the need to treat some scientifically fuzzy areas such as consciousness and will. The guidelines for the chair also called for an examination of what were termed "exceptional human experiences," experiences that are out of the ordinary and enigmatic enough as to inspire (if positive) or create dread (if negative), but may or may not involve any psi element. Such experiences include, but are not limited to, out-of-body experiences, near-death experiences, and the sighting of apparitions.

The program developed by Morris has concentrated on explorations of the mechanisms of psi, the experiences of psi, and the role of psi in the larger environment. In the meantime, Morris has emerged as one of the most respected theoreticians in the field. The program has met with much acclaim, and in 1996 Morris was honored with his election to the presidency of the Psychology Section of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The unit may be contacted at 7, George Sq., Edinburgh, Scotland EH8 9JZ. Its website can be found at http://www.moebius.psy.ac.uk/.

Sources:

Morris, Robert L. "The Concept of the Target." In Linda A. Henkel and Rick E. Berger, eds. Research in Parapsychology 1988. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1989.

———. "Spontaneous Synchronistic Events as Seen through a Simple Communication Model." In Betty Shapin and Lisette Cody, eds. Spontaneous Psi, Depth Psychology and Parapsychology. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1992.

———. "A Survey of Methods and Issues in ESP Research." In Stanley Krippner, ed. Advances in Parapsychological Research. 2. Extrasensory Perception. New York: Plenum Press, 1978.

Wiseman, Richard, and Robert L. Morris. Guidelines for Testing Psychic Claimants. Hatfield, Herts., UK: University of Hertsfordshire Press, 1995.

Koilon

The name given to ether by Theosophists Annie Besant and Charles W. Leadbeater in their book Occult Chemistry (1919).

Kolisko Effect

Lilly Kolisko was a youthful follower of German theosophist Rudolf Steiner, the founder of the Anthroposophical Society. In the 1920s she began a series of experiments to test empirically some of the claims made for the society's astrological teachings. Among these teachings was the observation that certain planets rule certain metals. For example, according to traditional astrological wisdom, the Sun rules gold and the Moon, silver. Other metals said to have rulers include mercury (Mercury), copper (Venus), iron (Mars), tin (Jupiter), lead (Saturn). Steiner taught that the rulership is especially in effect when these elements are in liquid solution. To Kolisko, this teaching suggested that during certain aspects of the ruling planet, especially when it was involved in a conjunction with an additional planet, the behavior of the metal might be altered.

To test this hypothesis Kolisko carried out a series of experiments in which metallic salts were dissolved and the solutions then allowed to crystallize on filter paper. Kolisko hypothesized that if the position of the planets had any effect then the patterns of the resulting crystals would be changed as the planets, aspects shifted. She ran hundreds of tests and reported significant results. Among the more dramatic were effects that occurred during a conjunction of the planet Saturn by the Sun and then the Moon. During the conjunction, called in astrology an occultation, in which Saturn was behind the Sun or Moon, the rate of crystallization was either significantly delayed or blocked altogether. These experiments were recorded and published in a series of publications released in the 1930s by the Anthroposophical Society.

In the 1930s, Kolisko also conducted a series of experiments to test the belief held by many farmers that planting should occur while the Moon is waxing. She tested the growth of plants sown both prior to the Full Moon (when the Moon is waxing) and prior to the New Moon (when the Moon is waning). She found that, in fact, those plants sown prior to the Full Moon did grow more rapidly and in a more satisfactory manner when sown just prior to the Full Moon as opposed to those sown prior to the New Moon. These results were reported in her booklet. The Moon and Plant Growth.

Kolisko's results were reported as World War II (1939–45) was beginning, and little work at replication occurred immediately. However, two British scientists, J. Maby and T. Bedford Franklin, did carry out some initial testing of the experiments with plants. They reached negative conclusions published in their book, The Physics of the Divining Rod, in 1939. Others found negative results testing the results of the more important findings concerning chemical solutions. However, during the war years, Kolisko's work was largely forgotten.

In the years since World War II, some attempts at verifying Kolisko's results have appeared. Anthroposophist Theodore Schwenck, a scientist working at the Swiss Weleda Company, found marked results with a solution allowed to crystallize during the Mars-Saturn conjunction of 1949. This experiment would be replicated in 1964. Over the decades, other members of the society tested Kolisko's thesis, with successful results being reported primarily in various anthroposophical publications.

Although experiments with the fast moving Moon (that moves through the entire zodiac every month) could be regularly repeated, some of the more infrequent but longer lasting conjunctions, such as that of Mars and Saturn, have been reported to produce the more dramatic results, sometimes lasting for several days. Thus in 1972, Nicolas Kollerstrom began a set of experiments involving Mars, Saturn, and the Moon. A decade later he was able to report marked results with solutions of iron, lead, and silver. The Mars-Saturn effect always peaked in the days immediately after the conjunction.

It can be argued that the Kolisko effect is as yet unverified, having as yet received little attention outside of the Anthroposophical Society, but at the same time, the amount of evidence gathered in support of it remains impressive. It has also been hypothesized that the initial inability of British scientists to replicate her work with plants may be due to what is termed the "green house" effect, the peculiar ability that some people seem to have with plants; that is, it may be due to a psi effect rather than an astrological one. Until more fully tested, however, the Kolisko effect remains one of the building blocks for those attempting to make the scientific case for astrology.

Sources:

Davidson, Allison. Metal Power: The Soul Life of the Plants. Garberville, Calif.: Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, 1991.

Kolisko, Lilly. Das Silber und der Mond. Stuttgart, Germany: Orient-Occident Verlag, 1929.

———. Saturn und Blei. Stroud, Germany: Privately published, 1952.

Kollerstrom, Nicolas. "Planetary Influences on Metal Ion Activity." Correlation 3, no.1 (1983): 38–50.

West, John Anthony, and Jan Gerhard Toonder. The Case for Astrology. New York: Coward-McCann, 1970.

Kommasso

Burmese evil spirits inhabiting trees.

Koons, Jonathan (ca. 1855)

A well-to-do American farmer in Millfield Township, Athens County (a remote district of Ohio), and an early American Spiritualist medium. Koons became interested in Spiritualism in 1852 and was told at a séance that he was "the most powerful medium on Earth" and that all of his eight children—even the seven-month-old baby—had psychic gifts. Acting on spirit instructions, he built a "spirit room," a single-room log house, 16 feet by 12, for use by the spirits and equipped it with all kinds of musical instruments. This log house soon became famous and people flocked from great distances to see a variety of curious phenomena. The eldest boy, Nahum, a youth of 18, sat at the "spirit table," the audience in benches beyond.

When the lights were put out a fearful din ensued that was sometimes heard a mile away. Surprising feats of strength were also manifested, yet no one present was struck or injured by the flying objects or target-shooting pistol bullets. The sitters were touched by materialized hands that, in the light of phosphorized paper, were seen carrying objects. Spirit faces were also seen. Through a trumpet that sailed about in the air, voices called out the names of the guests even if they concealed their identities; deceased relatives and friends spoke to them and gave proof of survival.

The circle was attended by a host of ministering spirits said to number 165. They claimed to belong to a race of men known under the generic title "Adam" (red clay), antedating the theological Adam by thousands of years. They represented their leaders as the most ancient angels. One of these ancient angels, who instructed the circle, was called "Oress." Generally they signed themselves in the written communications as "King" No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3, and sometimes "Servant and Scholar of God." Foremost among them was the "John King" who claimed to have been Henry Morgan, the pirate.

Two or three miles from the Koons' farm was another lonely farmhouse, belonging to John Tippie, where another "spirit room" was laid out on the same plan. The manifestations in the Tippie family were identical to those in the Koon log house. Each had a "spirit machine" that consisted of a complex arrangement of zinc and copper for the alleged purpose of collecting and focusing the magnetic aura used in the demonstrations. The Tippies had ten children, all mediums.

J. Everett of Athens County, Ohio, who investigated the Koons' phenomena, published the messages of the spirits under the title Communications from Angels (1853) and also printed a number of affidavits testifying to the occurrences in the spirit house, with a chart of the spheres drawn by Nahum Koons in trance.

Charles Partridge writes of his visit in the American Spiritual Telegraph of 1855:

"The spirit rooms will hold . . . 20 to 30 persons each. After the circle is formed and the lights extinguished, a tremendous blow is struck by the drum-stick, when immediately the bass and tenor drums are beaten with preternatural power, like calling the roll on a muster field, making a thousand echoes. The rapid and tremendous blows on these drums are really frightful to many persons; it is continued for five minutes or more and when ended, 'King' usually takes up the trumpet, salutes us with 'Good evening, friends' and asks what particular manifestations are desired. After the introductory piece on the instruments, the spirits sang to us. They first requested us to remain perfectly silent; then we heard human voices singing, apparently in the distance, so as to be scarcely distinguishable; the sounds gradually increased, each part relatively, until it appeared as if a full choir of voices were singing in our room most exquisitely. I think I never heard such perfect harmony. Spirit hands and arms were formed in our presence several times, and by aid of a solution of phosphorous, prepared at their request by Mr. Koons, they were seen as distinctly as in a light room."

The Koons family did not fare well at the hands of their neighbors. Their house was attacked by mobs, fire was set to their crops and barns, and their children were beaten. Finally they left the countryside and began missionary wanderings, which lasted for many years. Their mediumship was given free to the public, and they did a great service to the cause of early American Spiritualism.

The phenomenally noisy "spirit room" of the Koons bears a striking resemblance to some shaman performances, where the medicine man enters an enclosed area and manifests noisy spirit communications.

Koot Hoomi, Master (Kuthumi)

One of the masters originally contacted by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society. According to theosophical teachings a spiritual hierarchy exists, composed of individuals who have finished their round of earthly reincarnations and have evolved to a position from which they guide the affairs of humanity from the spiritual planes. Members of the hierarchy closest to humanity are the lords of the Seven Rays (of the light spectrum). Each ray is representative of a particular virtue that the lord of that ray exemplifies.

Master Koot Hoomi, generally referred to simply as "Master K. H.," is the lord of the Second Ray, and exemplar of wisdom. He is especially concerned with culture—art, religion, and education—and is the guardian of a vast museum located in the remote Tibetan valley where he and Master Morya reside. In one of his past incarnations Koot Hoomi was the philosopher Pythagoras but today he inhabits the body of a Kasmirian Indian. Like Morya, he travels frequently and many members of the Theosophical Society have reported seeing him. Blavatsky reportedly first met him in 1868. He also had a special relationship with A. P. Sinnett, one of the early theosophical leaders. Master Koot Hoomi was one of the three main communicators

(the others being Master Morya and Djual Khul) of what were compiled as The Mahatma Letters, the ultimate source for many theosophical ideas.

K. H. has been one of the masters with whom leaders of theosophical movements independent of the Theosophical Society have claimed frequent contact.

Sources:

Barker, A. Trevor, ed. The Mahatma Letters to A. P. Sinnett from the Mahatams M. and K.H. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1923. 3rd ed. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1962.

Jesus and Kuthumi [through Mark L. Prophet and Elizabeth Clare Prophet]. Prayer and Meditation. Los Angeles: Summit University, 1978.

Kuthumi [through Ann Herbstreith]. The Nameless One. Grass Valley, Calif.: Golden Sierra Printing, 1973.

Kuthumi, Ascended Master. The Wisdom of the Ages. 2 vols. St. James, N.Y.: Bridge to Freedom, n.d.

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Kooy, J(ohannes) M(arie) J(oseph) (1902–)

Lecturer in mathematics and physics who made special studies of the problems of space travel and precognition in dreams. Kooy was born on July 13, 1902, at Rotterdam, the Netherlands. He studied at the Technical University of Delft and the University of Leyden (Ph.D. physics and mathematics). He became an engineer with De Nederlandsche Staalindustrie, Rotterdam (1927–32); chief scientific adviser in the aeronautical department of the Technical University, Delft (1936–39); a lecturer in theoretical physics, mechanics, and mathematics at the Royal Military Academy, Breda (1939–59); and a lecturer in space-flight mechanics at the Technical University of Delft (1960–). Besides his publications on ballistics, space travel, and related fields, Kooy published many papers on parapsychology, especially ruminations on the relationship of time, space, and psychical events. He was a charter associate member of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Kooy, J. M. J. "Introspectief Onderzoek naar Het Dunne-Effect" (Introspective Investigation of the Dunne-Effect). Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie 6, no. 3 (March 1934).

———. "Paragnosie en Kansrekening" (Extrasensory Perception and the Calculus of Probability). Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie 7, no. 3 (March 1935).

———. "Reply to Dr. Chari." Journal of Parapsychology 22, no. 1 (March 1958).

———. "Space, Time and Consciousness." Journal of Parapsychology 21, no. 4 (December 1957).

———. "Tijd, Ruimte en Paragnosie" (Time, Space and Extrasensory Perception). Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie 15, nos. 3–4, (May–July 1947).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Koresh

Hebrew for "Cyrus" and the name assumed by Cyrus Reed Teed (1839–1908), proponent of a form of the hollow earth theory. Teed founded the Koreshan Unity, a communal group that constructed a settlement in Estero, Florida, in the hope that it would become the capital of the world.

Koreshan Unity

Communal group founded by Cyrus Reed Teed (1839–1908) under the name "Koresh." Teed was a major exponent of the cellular cosmogony theory, which postulates that humans actually live on the inside of a hollow earth and the sun is in the center of the globe. Current address unavailable.

Koschei the Deathless

A demon of Russian folklore. This horrid monster is described as having a death's-head and a fleshless skeleton "through which is seen the black blood flowing and the yellow heart beating." Koschei is armed with an iron club, with which he knocks down all who come into his path. In spite of his ugliness he is said to be a great admirer of young girls and women. He is avaricious, hates old and young alike, particularly those who are fortunate. His dwelling is among the mountains of the Koskels and the Caucasus, where his treasure is concealed.

Sources:

Ralston, W. R. S. Russian Folk-Tales. 1873. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1977.

Kosh

A wicked forest fiend of the Bangala of the southern Congo.

Kosmon Unity

Semiannual publication of the Confraternity of Faithists, concerned with the teachings of the "New Age Bible," Oahspe. Oahspe is an automatic script received on a typewriter by J. B. Newbrough and published in 1882. Kosmon Unity may be ordered from the Kosmon Press, BM/KCKP, London, WCIV 6XX, England, or, in the United States, from the Kosmon Service Center, P.O. Box 664, Salt Lake City, UT 84110.

Kosmos See The International Astrologer

Kostka, Jean (d. 1903)

Pseudonym of Jules Stanislas Doinel, a former Gnostic and initiate of the 33rd degree. After being converted to Christianity, Kostka claimed to reveal his diabolic adventures in the pages of La Verité under the title "Lucifer démasqué" (Lucifer Unmasked). He tells of diabolic happenings in the private chapel of a lady, "Madame X," who figures frequently in his pages (she was thought to be the late countess of Caithness).

It seems probable from the evidence that "Jean Kostka" never came into personal contact with a satanic cult and that his diabolic experiences were merely the imaginings of an intellectual Satanist. Kostka's revelations came in the same period as the fake Satanist writings of "Léo Taxil" (Gabriel Jogand-Pagès) and seem to partake of the same contemporary anti-Masonic and anti-Semitic conspiracies.

Around 1890 Kostka founded the Universal Gnostic Church in France and assumed the role of patriarch. He claimed consecration directly from Jesus and later from two Bogomile bishops who emerged during a Spiritualist séance. He in turn consecrated other bishops and they perpetuated the Kostka succession in a variety of small Gnostic churches.

Sources:

Anson, Peter F. Bishops at Large. London: Faber & Faber, 1965.

Kowalska, Maria Faustina (1905–1938)

Sister Maria Faustina Kowalska, a Roman Catholic visionary known for having experienced apparitions of Jesus Christ, was born and raised in Poland and as a young woman joined the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy. Though most of her coreligionists were not aware of it, her life changed on February 22, 1931, when she had her first vision of Jesus. In His appearances He gave her a basic message of trust in God's mercy. He then asked her to be an apostle of God's mercy and assist its spread throughout the world. He also called her to be a model of the message of mercy and asked her to keep a record of their encounters.

She shared the account of her experiences with her confessor and with her monastic superiors. They arranged for her to see a psychiatrist, who pronounced her in good mental health. Satisfied that she was not simply hallucinating, they arranged for an artist to paint a picture of Jesus as He appeared to Kowalska. The picture shows Christ with a beam of light emanating from His heart. Through the remainder of the decade she continued to see and receive messages from Jesus until her untimely death from tuberculosis on October 5, 1938. She was buried at the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy convent outside of Krakow. Eventually a shrine to Divine Mercy would be erected there.

After her death, word of the visions and message received by Sister Faustina began to circulate in Poland, but World War II (1939–45) made the normal process of authentication impossible. As a result, the Vatican forbade the spread of the message. As the country recovered, reexamination was hampered by the new situation as the country was plunged under Communist rule. However, through the 1960s, churchmen and theologians began to reexamine the writings and found them both theologically correct and spiritually sophisticated. One among them, Archbishop Carol Wojtyla, became her champion and is given credit for having the ban lifted. The release of the writings to the public occurred just a short time prior to his becoming Pope John Paul II.

As people became aware of the message and of Sister Faustina's role in receiving it, she became an object of veneration and healing began to be attributed to her. Even prior to the original ban on the message, a national shrine to Divine Mercy had been established in Stockbridge, Massachusetts. The congregations of Marians at Stockbridge have led in the spread of the Divine Mercy revelation and in pressing the cause of Sister Faustina's canonization as a saint of the Roman Catholic Church. She was beatified in 1993, a step toward her canonization which occurred on April 30, 2000.

Sources:

Kowalska, Maria Faustina. Divine Mercy in My Soul. Diary. Stockbridge, Mass.: Marian Press, 1987.

Krafft, Karl Ernst (1900–1945)

Swiss astrologer of German descent born May 10, 1900 who was employed by the Nazis for propaganda work during World War II. He participated in tests by the German parapsychologist Hans Bender in 1937 upon moving to Germany. Krafft had formerly conducted an ambitious statistical investigation of cosmic influences on individuals and developed his own system of "typocosmy." His book Traité d'Astro-Biologie was printed in Brussels in 1939.

Krafft was introduced to the German Propaganda Ministry by C. Loog, another astrologer, who had worked on interpretations of the famous Nostradamus prophecies. Krafft's pro-German edition of Nostradamus was used for psychological warfare, and Krafft himself became highly regarded after he made a successful prediction of the attempt on Hitler's life November 9, 1939, in Munich. In fact, this prophecy was so remarkable that Krafft was at first interrogated by the Gestapo, who thought he might have had a hand in the plot.

After the 1941 flight of Rudolf Hess to Britain, many astrologers and occultists in Germany were arrested, including Krafft, who was imprisoned for a year. After his release he again worked for the German Propaganda Ministry, interpreting horoscopes of leaders of the Allies in a manner favorable to Germany. However, he was arrested again in 1943 and sent to Oranienburg concentration camp. He died January 8, 1945, on the way to Buchenwald.

Sources:

Howe, Ellie. Astrology and Psychological Warfare during World War II. London: Rider, 1972.

Kral, Josef (1887– ?)

Publisher, editor, and writer on parapsychology. He was born August 15, 1887, in Munich, Germany. During World War II he worked with the opposition to Hitler and was eventually awarded the Distinguished Service Cross of the German Federal Republic. Kral published an autobiography in 1958, Auftrag des Gewissens: Documente Katholischen Widerstandes gegen das N. S. Regime (Command of Conscience: Documents of Catholic Resistance to the National Socialist Regime).

After the war Kral became general secretary of Imago Mundi, the International Society of Catholic Parapsychologists, and in 1951, with Alois Wiesinger, he began publication of the journal Vergorgene Welt (Hidden World), dealing with occult and parapsychological subjects. He also wrote a number of books on the paranormal.

Sources:

Kral, Josef. Das Heisse Eisen: Das Außersinnliche als Wissenschaft und Glaube (The Hot Iron: The Paranormal as Science and Faith). Berlin: Verlag Harmonie, 1962.

———. Die Irrelehre vom Zufall und Schicksal im Lichte der Wissenschaften und des Glaubens (The Heresy of Coincidence and Fate in the Light of Science and Faith). N.p., 1953.

———. Der Neue Gottesbeweis: Parapsychologie, Mystik, Unsterblichkeit (New Proof of God: Parapsychology, Mysticism, Immortality). N.p., 1956.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kramer, Heinrich (ca. 1430–1505)

Dominican inquisitor who played a leading part in the great witchcraft persecutions as author of the infamous Malleus Maleficarum, (literally, the Witches' Hammer), the authoritative sourcebook for inquisitors, judges, and magistrates.

Born at Schlettstadt, in Lower Alsace, near Strasbourg, Kramer entered the Dominican order, where he progressed so rapidly that he was appointed prior to the Dominican House in Schlettstadt while still a young man. He became preacher-general and master of sacred theology (two Dominican Order distinctions) and around 1474 was appointed inquisitor for the districts of Tyrol, Salzburg, Bohemia, and Moravia. He received praise from Rome and from the archbishop of Salzburg, becoming spiritual director of the Dominican church in Salzburg.

In 1484 Pope Innocent VIII was responsible for the famous bull Summis desiderantes affectibus of December 9, which deplored the power of the witch organization and redefined witchcraft in such a way as to bring it into the scope of the Inquisition. The pope also delegated Kramer and Sprenger as inquisitors throughout northern Germany, especially in Mainz, Cologne, Treves, Salzburg, and Breman.

In 1485 Kramer wrote a treatise on witchcraft that initially circulated in manuscript; it was published in 1486 as Malleus Maleficarum,, with the name of his colleague Jacob Sprenger added as coauthor. This became the working manual for inquisitors, judges, and magistrates in the great witchcraft persecutions and went into many editions in French, Italian, and English, as well as in German.

Kramer resided for a period at the priory of Santi Giovanni e Paolo (X. Zanipolo), returning to Germany in 1497, where he lived at the convent of Rohr, near Regensburg. On January 31, 1500, he was appointed nuncio and inquisitor of Bohemia and Moravia by Alexander VI and empowered to proceed against the Waldenses and Picards as well as witches. He died in Bohemia in 1505.

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Krapf, Phillip H. (1935–)

Phillip H. Krapf, a writer and former copyeditor for the Los Angeles Times, emerged in 1998 as a UFO contactee/abductee. Following his graduation from college in 1963, he worked on a paper in the San Fernando Valley in California, and then in 1968 joined the staff of the Times. Among the highlights of his career was his sharing in the coverage of the Los Angeles riot of 1992 that earned a Pulitzer Prize. He retired in 1993 and has since worked as a freelance writer.

His life changed on June 11, 1997, when, according to his account, around 2 A.M., he was abducted aboard a spacecraft. The aliens were a little over five feet in height and slender in build. They had prominent eyes that shone out from slanted openings. They had pointed ears that reminded him of Mr. Spock, the character on the Star Trek television series. Their skin was greyish green. They wore flowing garments. Other humans were also in the room when he arrived. Some were on tables being examined.

The aliens identified themselves as from the planet Verdant. They said that they had been abducting humans over the last generation to study their biology, and that that study had come to an end. They now wished to establish contact with Earth openly and had abducted Krapf for that purpose. They were in the process of abducting several hundred people, some of relative cultural importance who would begin to establish the context in which contact would occur. Krapf was chosen to write an account of the Verdants because his colleagues had known him to have disbelieved abduction stories in the past.

The Verdants' home planet was some 14 light years distance from Earth and approximately 2 and 1/2 times its size. They had achieved a level of intelligence that allowed them to live without war and they had moved out into the galaxy to establish an interplanetary association known as the Intergalactic Federation of Sovereign Planets, into which Earth was being invited. In the near future, the visitors will convert an area in the desert Southwest into a grassland and construct a city that would become the focal point of contact.

After three days of meeting with the aliens, Krapf was returned to his bedroom. He began to write up his story and within a few months had a manuscript in the hands of a publisher. In the meantime he had learned that much of the future collaboration of his story would begin early in the year 2002 with the earthlings who were being trained as ambassadors coming forward to place plans for contact before the public. In 2004 some startling events will occur that make the presence of the aliens fully known.

Krapf's account was published in 1998 along with a letter of endorsement by popular metaphysician and owner of his publishing concern, Louise Hay. He subsequently appeared on a number of talk shows, including the popular late-night radio show hosted by Art Bell. His story, which combined elements of classic contactee reports with those associated with abductions, was received with great skepticism by ufologists and some negative reviews appeared. Subsequently, Krapf reported a meeting with one of the ambassadors (in 1999) and gave an interview in which he predicted that all of the Y2K problems had been solved and that nothing of consequence would occur with the computers at the end of the year (a prediction that was verified). The ultimate evaluation of the remainder of his story awaits the unfolding of his timetable beginning in 2002.

Sources:

Krapf, Phillip H. The Contact Has Begun: A True Story of a Journalist's Encounter with Alien Beings. Carlsbad, Calf: Hay House, 1998.

Krasperdon, Dino

Dino Krasperdon was the pen name of a controversial flying saucer contactee from Brazil named Aladino Felix. According to the account later published in his book, My Contact with Flying Saucers, in November of 1952 Felix and a friend saw several flying saucers above a mountain in rural Sao Paulo state. Going back to the location, Felix waited three days for the saucers to return. He was rewarded when a saucer landed and invited him inside. He took a tour of the ship and was told it would return. That return occurred some three months later when the ship's captain showed up at Felix's house. During the visit, the captain said that at various times he had lived on Jupiter, Ganymede, and Io. Three subsequent meetings followed in which the captain spoke on a wide range of subjects from science and space travel to life on other worlds. As was common to contactee literature, the captain also spoke philosophically about the human condition.

The book-length account of Felix's conversations was published in Brazil in Portuguese in 1957 and in English two years later. It was not impressive for its teachings or as evidence of possible extraterrestrial contact, and was soon forgotten. Then in August of 1959 Felix emerged out of obscurity to grant an interview on Brazilian television. He claimed that the events recounted in his book had never occurred. Then several weeks later he was arrested as a member of a terrorist gang. Following his arrest, he was reported to have claimed that Venusians would soon appear to free him and his associates. The Venusians never came and when he was finally sentenced in 1971, he was remanded to a mental institution. Only writer John A. Keel attempted to defend Felix with an argument that he was a victim of evil supernatural entities.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1998.

Keel, John A. UFOs: Operation Trojan Horse. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970.

Krasperdon, Dino [pseudonym of Aladino Felix]. My Contact with Flying Saucers. New York: Citadel Press, 1959.

Krata Repoa

Title of a book published in Berlin in 1782 claiming to be an "initiation into the ancient mysteries of the priests of Egypt." The authors were C. F. Köppen (1734–ca. 1797) and J. W. B. von Hymmen (1725–1786). Köppen was a German official and one of the founders of the Order of African Architects.

The Krata Repoa is of a Masonic ritual nature and is divided into seven grades. The grade of Postophoris (a name used by Apuleius to signify a priest of Isis) corresponds to the apprentice or keeper of the sacred threshold. Second comes the degree of Neokaros, in which are found many ordeals and temptations. The third grade is the state of death—of judgment and passage of the soul. The candidate is restored to light in the following degree, that of the battle of the shadows. In the fifth grade, a drama of vengeance is enacted. The sixth is that of the astronomer before the gate of the gods. In the final grade, the whole scheme of initiation is expounded.

It was believed that these degrees corresponded to the actual procedure of a secret society, and it may be that in some measure they did, since one of their authors was a prominent member of the African Architects. However, although there seem to be elements of real tradition in the work, most of it is probably invention.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur E. A New Encyclopaedia of Freemasonry. London: William Rider & Son, 1921. Rev. ed. 1923. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Kraus, Joseph (1892– ?)

Famous European performer of stage telepathy and clairvoyance during the 1930s, known under the stage name Frederick Marion.

Kreskin (1935–)

The mentalist magician Kreskin was born George Joseph Kresge, Jr., on January 12, 1935, in Montclair, New Jersey. He was educated at Seton Hall University (B.A., 1963). He worked for eight years as consultant to a psychologist. He disclaims supernatural powers but appears to use some form of ESP in such stage tricks as "influencing" a member of his audience to select a name (previously placed by Kreskin in an envelope) from a pile of telephone directories. He has described telepathy as "just a heightening of the senses," and he has suggested that "ESP" should read "PSE"—phenomena scientifically explainable.

In addition to his book The Amazing World of Kreskin (1973), he has also published Use Your Head to Get Ahead! With Kreskin's Mind Power Book (1977). Although he says he uses telepathy in conjunction with conventional stage magic, he also claims that his methods are purely scientific. According to Kreskin, "Everything I do is inherent in everyone. But what I have done is to learn to sensitize myself to the reactions and attitudes of people around me. Under certain conditions I can sense their thoughts as well as influence their thoughts."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Kreskin [George J. Kresge, Jr.]. The Amazing World of Kreskin. New York: Random House, 1973.

KRF See Kundalini Research Foundation

Krieger, Delores (1921–)

Delores Krieger was born in Paterson, New Jersey, and educated at New York University (B.A., 1960; M.A., 1962; Ph.D., 1967). Krieger became a professor of nursing in the Division of Nursing Education at New York University and burst into public consciousness in the late 1970s as the advocate of a somewhat traditional laying-on-of-hands technique as an additional tool for nurses in their treatment of patients. Krieger had become intrigued by the work conducted by Canadian cancer researcher Bernard Grad in the 1960s with healer Oscar Estabany. Grad published some of the most impressive data in parapsychological literature on the effects of psychic healing. Krieger decided to test Grad's findings, which had been conducted in a laboratory on plants and laboratory mice, on human beings in a hospital setting.

In 1971 Krieger set up a program with Estabany and discovered that his healing touch appeared to increase the presence of a protein pigment in the blood of the initial patients with whom he worked. The change, confirmed in a second series of experiments, led her to begin teaching the technique to the nurses in her classes. She referred to the laying-on-of-hands, a term that has significant religious connotations, as "therapeutic touch," a more nonreligious designation. Krieger's work, while presenting little new data to parapsychologists, was of significance because it spread parapsychological knowledge into an established field.

Sources:

Krieger, Delores. "Healing by the Laying-On of Hands as a Facilitator of Bioenergetic Change: The Response of In-Vivo Human Hemoglobin." Psychoenergetic Systems 1 (1976): 121.

———. "Therapeutic Touch: The Imprimatur of Nursing." American Journal of Nursing 75, no. 5 (May 1875): 784–87.

Leaders in Education. 5th ed. New York: R. R. Bowker, 1974.

Kripalu Center for Yoga and Health

Residential community offering programs in yoga, holistic health, stress management, dance exercise, and bodywork training, founded in 1971 by Yogi Amrit Desai. Address: Box 793, Lenox, MA 02140.

Krippner, Stanley Curtis (1932–)

Psychologist and writer on parapsychology. Krippner was born on October 4, 1932, at Edgerton, Wisconsin. He studied at the University of Wisconsin (B.S., 1954) and Northwestern University (M.A., 1957; Ph.D., 1961). After completing his education he became the director of the Child Study Center at Kent State University in Ohio. Such interests were reinforced by contacts with parapsychologists J. B. Rhine and Gardner Murphy during his undergraduate and graduate years. While at Kent Krippner visited Rhine at Duke University and began to conduct parapsychological experiments with the children with whom he was working.

An internationally known humanistic psychologist, Krippner has explored dreams, altered states of consciousness, and paranormal phenomena for many years. His interest in such things began as a teenager on a Wisconsin farm: "When I was about 14 years of age, I had a very dramatic sense of my uncle's death at the very time that my parents received a phone call announcing his death. The effect of that was quite electrifying. Also I was an avid science fiction reader and an amateur magician, and all of these interests coalesced."

In 1964 Krippner left his position at Kent State University to become director of the Dream Laboratory at Maimonides Medical Center in Brooklyn, New York. With Montague Ullman and, later, Charles Honorton, Krippner spent ten years in a systematic exploration of dreams, including ESP in dreams and other altered states of consciousness. Interest in consciousness studies in the early 1970s led him to explore psychedelic drugs, yoga, meditation, and other means of altering consciousness.

He also established contact and nurtured relationships with European colleagues, and in 1973 he became the first parapsychologist to become vice president for the Western Hemisphere of the International Psychotronic Research Association. He chaired sessions of the Psychotronic Congress in Czechoslovakia in 1973 and in Monte Carlo in 1975 and became editor of the international journal Psychoenergetic Systems.

In 1973 Krippner became a faculty member of the Institute for Humanistic Psychology and more recently the director of the Center for Consciousness Studies at Saybrook Institute in San Francisco. Krippner has been recognized as one of the most outstanding leaders in the parapsychological field. In 1973 he became president of the Parapsychological Association and the following year began a tenure as president of the Association for Humanistic Psychology. He also serves as editor-in-chief of Advances in Parapsychological Research: A Biennial Review. He has written extensively on parapsychology and related consciousness and psychological subjects.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Krippner, Stanley. Dreamworking: How to Use Your Dreams for Creative Problem Solving. Buffalo, N.Y.: Bearly Ltd., 1988.

———. Human Possibilities: Mind Exploration in the USSR and Eastern Europe. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1980.

———. Psychoenergetic Systems: The Interaction of Consciousness, Energy, and Matter. New York: Gordon and Breach Science Publishers, 1979.

———. Song of the Siren: A Parapsychological Odyssey. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Krippner, Stanley, and Daniel Rubin. Galaxies of Life: The Human Aura in Acupuncture and Kirlian Photography. Gordon & Breach, 1973. Reprinted as The Kirlian Aura: Photographing the Galaxies of Life. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Anchor, 1974. Reprinted as Energies of Consciousness: Exploration in Acupuncture, Auras, and Kirlian Photography. New York: Interface, 1976.

Krippner, Stanley, and Sidney Cohen. LSD Into the Eighties. N.p., 1981.

Krippner, Stanley, and A. Villoldo. The Realms of Healing. Millbrae, Calif.: Celestial Arts, 1976.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Ullman, Montague, and Stanley Krippner, with Alan Vaughn. Dream Telepathy. New York: Macmillan, 1973.

Krishnamurti, Jiddu (1895–1986)

Indian philosopher and spiritual teacher. Born May 12, 1895 in Madanapelle, South India, Krishnamurti was educated privately. While still a child, in 1909, he was "discovered" by Theosophist Charles W. Leadbeater, who had been promoting the idea that the next world teacher would appear among Theosophists. Leadbeater presented the young boy to Annie Besant, president of the Theosophical Society, who took up his cause.

Besant saw to his education and in the 1920s began to travel the world with him. She organized the Order of the Star of the East to promote his mission. Krishnamurti emerged as a talented teacher but also began to question the role that had been thrust upon him. In 1929 he publicly announced that he did not accept the messianic role and withdrew from any association with Theosophy. He continued from that time forward as an independent teacher to those who were attracted to him. A network of foundations formed in various countries to facilitate his teaching activity and publish transcripts of his lectures.

Krishnamurti's philosophical position stemmed from his background in Hinduism and Theosophy, but he developed his own unique iconoclastic understanding. He traveled widely and addressed audiences all over the world. He attacked many other Indian teachers then working in the West, some of whom he believed were watering down Indian thought and exploiting their followers.

Krishnamurti died in Ojai, California, on February 17, 1986, at age 90. A number of books were produced from the transcripts of his talks and dialogues with various intellectuals.

Sources:

Field, Sidney. Krishnamurti: The Reluctant Messiah. New York: Paragon House, 1989.

Jayakar, Pupul. Krishnamurti. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986.

Krishnamurti, Jiddu. The Awakening of Intelligence. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

———. The First and Last Freedom. London: V. Gollancz, 1954.

———. Life Ahead. London: V. Gollancz, 1963.

———. The Only Revolution. London: V. Gollancz, 1970.

Lutyens, Emily. Candles in the Sun. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1957.

———. Krishnamurti, The Years of Awakening. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux, 1975.

———. Krishnamurti, The Years of Fulfillment. London: J. Murray, 1983.

Krishna Venta (1911–1958)

Religious name adopted by Francis Heindswater Pencovic, founder of the now-defunct WFLK (Wisdom, Faith, Love, and Knowledge) Fountain of the World, a Hindu-based religious community. Pencovic grew up in Utah as a Mormon and was orphaned when he was eight. Venta who claimed to be Christ, was said to have come from the planet Neophrates many years ago and landed in Nepal. He was teleported to the United States on March 9, 1932, and took over the biography of a three-year-old boy, Francis Pencovic, who had recently died. He gathered a following that settled in the Box Canyon area of the San Fernando Valley in the 1940s.

During the 1950s Krishna Venta was accused of unfaithfulness to his wife with various women of the group. On December 10, 1958, several former members whose wives were still in the group encountered Krishna Venta in the administrative building of the group's communal settlement and set off a dynamite bomb that killed ten people, including Venta. His wife succeeded him as leader of the group, which continued into the early 1980s.

Kristensen, H(arald) Kromann (1903–)

Danish engineer and chairman of the Danish Society for Psychical Research (1963). Kristensen was born on March 5, 1903, at Charlottenlund, Denmark. He studied at the Polytechnic University of Denmark (M.S., electrical engineering, 1927). From 1928 on he was a staff member of the City of Copenhagen Lighting Department. He published many technical papers on engineering.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Krohn, Sven I(lmari) (1903–)

Professor of philosophy and writer on parapsychology. Krohn was born on May 9, 1903, at Helsinki, Finland, and later studied at the University of Helsinki (M.A., 1929) and the University of Turku, Finland (Ph.D., 1949). He became successively a schoolteacher, a lecturer in theoretical philosophy, and professor of philosophy and in 1960 was appointed head of the Philosophical Institution at the University of Turku.

Krohn had a lifelong interest in parapsychology. He served as president of the Society for Psychical Research, Finland (1934–40); as the Finnish representative to the International Congress for Psychical Research, Oslo (1935); and as founder and president of the Society for Parapsychological Studies in Finland.

Sources:

Krohn, Sven I., and Ake Tollet. Jälleenlöydetty sielu: Kekustelu-ja parapsykologiasta (Soul Rediscovered: Dialogues Concerning Parapsychology). N.p., 1936.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Krstaca

Dalmatian (Serbo-Croatian) name for a witch. (See Slavs)

Krumm-Heller, Arnoldo (1876–1949)

Arnoldo Krumm-Heller, a German esotericist who became an important figure in the spread of occultism in Latin America, was born Arnold Krumm-Heller in Salchendorf, Germany, on April 15, 1876. At the age of 16 he moved to Argentina to live with his brother on a ranch in the country's interior. He failed to make the connection when he arrived in South America and wound up in Chile working as a chemist. There he remained for the next two decades. Then in 1896 he began to travel extensively. He returned to Germany, where he studied with Franz Hartmann, noted Theosophist and occultist. Around the turn of the century he visited with Gérard Encausse, publicly known as Papus, and later attended the Masonic and Spiritual Conference that Papus organized in Paris in 1908. At that conference he was given authority and he accepted responsibility to spread the esoteric work in Spain and Latin America. Documents to this effect were received from both Papus and from Theodor Reuss, the head of the Ordo Templi Orientis. At some point he was also consecrated as a bishop in the Gnostic Catholic Church by H. C. Peithmann.

In 1910 Krumm-Heller settled in Mexico and began to study medicine. Prior to World War I (1914–18), he founded the Fraternitas Rosicruciana Antiqua and opened a branch of the Gnostic Church using a set of rituals supplied by Peithmann as well as the Gnostic Mass developed by Aleister Crowley. He developed the work for a decade and then in 1920 moved back to Germany. He settled in Marburg, where he established a printing business.

Marburg became the center of what had become an international Spanish-speaking esoteric work. He moved in occult circles and knew Aleister Crowley, Karl Johannes Germer, and Rudolf Steiner, who had founded the Anthroposophical Society. Then in 1936 a pamphlet began to circulate accusing Krumm-Heller and Reuss of being agents of a Jewish-Masonic conspiracy. At one point the Nazi government confiscated Krumm-Heller's library but did not arrest him. He left Germany and spent a year in Mexico, but returned to Germany, where he lived through World War II (1939–45). He remained in contact with the Rosicrucians in Latin America through friends in Sweden. Soon after the war ended he reactivated the international leadership of the Fraternitas Rosicruciana Antiqua, but lived only four more years.

Krumm-Heller died in Marburg in 1949. He did not appoint an international successor, but rather named a series of successors, each with a responsibility for a single country. Besides groups in Latin America, the fraternity had work in Spain and the Philippines. He had, at one point, issued a charter to H. Spencer Lewis, founder of the Ancient Mystical Order Rosae Crucis, but later withdrew it. He then established ties with R. Swinburne Clymer and the Rosicrucian Fraternity in Quakertown, Pennsylvania.

Sources:

The Invisible Basilica: Arnoldo Krumm-Heller. http://www.hermetic.com/sabazus/krumm.htm. April, 21, 2000.

Kübler-Ross, Elisabeth (1926–)

Contemporary physician who has become a world authority on the subject of death and after-death states. Born in Switzerland on July 8, 1926, she worked as a country doctor before moving to the United States. During World War II she spent weekends at the Kantonspital (Cantonai Hospital) in Zürich, where she volunteered to assist escaped refugees. After the war she visited Majdanek concentration camp, where the horrors of the death chambers stimulated in her a desire to help people facing death and to understand the human impulses of love and destruction. She extended her medical background by becoming a practicing psychiatrist. Her formal work with dying patients began in 1965 when she was a faculty member at the University of Chicago. She also conducted research on basic questions concerning life after death at the Manhattan State Hospital, New York. Her studies of death and dying have involved accounts by patients who reported out-of-the-body travel. Her research tends to show that while dying can be painful, death itself is a peaceful condition. Her 1969 text, On Death and Dying, was hailed by her colleagues and also became a popular best-seller.

In 1978 Kübler-Ross helped to found Shanti Nilaya (Final Home of Peace), a healing and growth center in Escondido, California. This was an extension of her well-known "Life-Death and Transition" workshops conducted in various parts of the United States and Canada, involving physicians, nurses, social workers, laypeople, and terminally ill patients. Much of Kübler-Ross's later research was directed toward proving the existence of life after death. Her publication To Live Until We Say Good-bye (1979) was both praised as a "celebration of life" and criticized as "prettifying" the real situation. She has also dealt with issues such as AIDS and "near death" experiences. In the mid-1980s Shanti Nilaya moved from San Diego County, California, to Head Waters, Virginia, where it continues to offer courses and short- and long-term therapeutic sessions.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Gill, Derek L. T. Quest: The Life of Elisabeth Kübler-Ross. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.

Kübler-Ross, Elisabeth. AIDS: The Ultimate Challenge. New York: Macmillan, 1987.

———. Coping With Death and Dying. Edited by John T. Chirban. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1985.

———. Living with Death and Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1981.

———. On Death and Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1969.

———. Questions and Answers on Death and Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1974.

———. To Live Until We Say Good-Bye. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1978.

———, ed. Death: The Final Stage of Growth. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1975.

Kuda Bux (1905–1981)

Kashmiri stage magician who demonstrated claimed feats of eyeless sight and fire walking. Born at Akhnur, Kashmir, on October 15, 1905, he moved to London in 1935. He first practiced fire walking at age 14 and subsequently devoted himself to public performances of stage magic. He normally performed fire walking only at an annual religious festival and claimed that his immunity from burns was attributable to this faith, conferred by a higher power in India. He also claimed to be able to convey his immunity to others and take them over the fire walk without burns.

During 1935 Kuda Bux cooperated with psychical researcher Harry Price in two fire walk tests under control conditions, on September 9 and September 17. Scientific observers carefully monitored all aspects of the fire walk. Kuda Bux's feet were examined, and no chemical or other preparation was discovered. The temperature of his feet was taken before and after the walk and was found to be slightly lower after it. His feet were not blistered or injured in any way. The skin was soft and not calloused; moreover the feet were washed and dried before the walk.

The surface temperature of the fire trench on the second day was 430°C. The trench was 25 feet long by 6 feet wide and 9 inches deep. Kuda Bux walked the trench deliberately and steadily in 4.5 seconds; the estimated time of contact of each foot with the burning embers was half a second. The tests were photographed and a cinematographic record taken. A volunteer European, Digby Moynagh, attempted the walk on both days but suffered some blistering of the feet. A full report of the tests appeared in Bulletin II of the University of London Council for Psychical Investigation in 1936. These tests made Kuda Bux well known, and he performed in British variety theaters with his impressive act of "eyeless sight." (Fire departments would not permit fire trenches to be built on stage for demonstrations of fire walking.)

In 1938 Kuda Bux traveled to the United States to demonstrate his fire walk for a Robert Ripley "Believe It or Not" radio program and later became a member of the Society of American Magicians. He demonstrated his eyeless vision act widely and in 1945 rode a bicycle through the heavy traffic of Times Square in New York while blindfolded.

Magicians claim that such performances are tricks, in spite of the performer's being heavily blindfolded, with balls of dough placed over the eyes and secured with yards of bandages. The skeptical view is that the dough and bandages are shifted sufficiently by the performer to enable him to squint underneath them.

Kuda Bux claimed that his performance consisted of feats of mental concentration, establishing a link between his mind and outside objects, although he admitted to practicing conjuring tricks in his acts. (See also Fire Ordeal; Rosa Kuleshova; Jules Romains; Seeing with the Stomach; Transposition of the Senses)

Kuhlman, Kathryn (1907–1976)

Well-known Christian healer of the United States. Kuhlman was born on May 7, 1907, in Concordia, Missouri. At age 13, she had a religious experience and felt a strong call to the ministry. Though she could not find a church that would accept her, Kuhlman dropped out of school and at age 15 started preaching. She eventually became an itinerant evangelist traveling throughout the midwestern states.

Her first healing took place while she preached in Franklin, Pennsylvania, in 1946. A woman stood up and gave testimony that she had been cured of a tumor. From 1947 on, Kuhlman held regular services in the Carnegie Auditorium at Pittsburgh, where a number of cases of miraculous healing were reported during her ministry. She held services at the Carnegie Auditorium for 20 years before transferring to the First Presbyterian Church in downtown Pittsburgh.

During her services she would speak with simplicity and emotional sincerity and become transformed by what she called the Holy Spirit. Members of the congregation reported a feeling of power building up, with a healing effect. At this point Kuhlman would become clairvoyantly aware of various diseases and symptoms of ill health, which she would locate and "rebuke" from her place on the stage. "To my right in the first balcony, somebody is being healed of diabetes. . . . a growth has disappeared. It's a man up there in the top balcony." Kuhlman spoke rapidly in a kind of transported trancelike condition. She later revealed that she experienced out-of-the-body travel during the healing segments of her services.

She often introduced medical doctors into her programs, some of whom confirmed the reality of her miraculous cures, although one physician, William Nolen, attacked the validity of the healings.

Kuhlman died in Tulsa, Oklahoma, February 20, 1976, following open-heart surgery.

Sources:

Kuhlman, Kathryn. I Believe in Miracles. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1962.

———. Nothing Is Impossible With God. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1974.

Nolen, William. Healing: A Doctor in Search of a Miracle. New York: Random House, 1975.

Spraggett, Allen. Kathryn Kuhlman: The Woman Who Believes in Miracles. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1970. Reprint, New York: New American Library, 1971.

Kukai (774–835)

Kukai, the founder of Japanese esoteric Buddhism, was born in Zentsuji on the island of Shikoku to an aristocratic family. His uncle, a tutor to the crown prince, also became his teacher. As a young man, he dropped his studies of Confucius and career at court to study Buddhism, then very much a minority perspective. He was only 23 when he produced his first book, in which he argued for the superiority of Buddhism over Confucianism and Taoism. Over the next few years he studied widely in the several different schools of Buddhist thought then available in Japan, all of which were headquartered at Nara, near the imperial capital at Kyoto.

In 804 he traveled to Changan, then the capital of China, and became the last student of Hui-Guo (746–805), the leader of the Shingon or esoteric school of Buddhism. When he returned to Japan he was an accomplished exponent of the esoteric tradition. He established himself in two centers, one on Mount Koya south of Kyoto and the other in Kyoto at the Toji temple. He would teach at these two places for the rest of his life and establish Dhingon as a major school of Japanese Buddhism.

In contrast to most Buddhists of his day who suggested that enlightenment took many lifetimes, Kukai argued that it was possible to achieve in a single lifetime. He also argued that the body, which most who sought enlightenment considered an obstacle, was in fact the vessel for its realization. He argued that the Buddha nature is present in all things, including all human beings. To understand the essential and innate unity of all things, Kukai proposed that students engage in meditative disciplines. Meditative insight would bring clarity to what was otherwise a seemingly unbelievable idea. Kukai also argued for the dissolving of the secular and sacred. He argued for a form of natural mysticism in which the Buddha was incarnate in the world of nature and by extension in the world of art and music. He believed that even words could have the power of revelation.

In his book The Meanings of Sound, Word, and Reality, Kukai argued for the correlation of words and reality. Some words correspond to the reality of the Buddha nature. These True Words are termed mantras, and chanting a mantra articulates the Buddha nature for as long as the sound persists. He also believed that the overcoming of the ordinary consciousness and the Buddha nature was in fact most difficult for most people. People could overcome the separation through the practice of meditation, the chanting of mantras, and the use of mystical hand gestures called mudras.

Kukai died at Mt. Koyo in 835. In later generations he came to be worshipped almost as a god and many came to believe that he had never died. He is now generally called Kobo Daishi or Great Master of the Extensive Teachings. Shingon Buddhism now exists in a variety of separate schools in Japan who have, over the centuries, developed a wide variety of esoteric methods to achieve communion with the Buddha nature.

Sources:

Kukai: Major Works. Translated by Yoshito Hakeda. New York: Columbia University Press, 1972.

Yamasaki, Taiko. Shingon: Japanese Esoteric Buddhism. Boston: Shambhala, 1988.

Kulagina, Nina S. (1926–1990)

Russian psychic who demonstrated the ability to move objects at a distance, one form of psychokinesis (PK). Kulagina, a St. Petersburg housewife, has been tested under laboratory conditions by noted researchers, including physiologist L. L. Vasiliev and neurophysiologist Genady A. Sergeiev of the Uktomskii Physiological Institute, Leningrad; Czech psychical researcher Zdenek Rejdak; psychologist B. Blazek; and Dr. J. S. Zvierev.

Tested by Vasiliev in the 1960s, Kulagina caused a compass needle to spin by holding her hand a few inches above it and also moved matchboxes at a distance. She was filmed demonstrating her ability to move small objects such as a pen or cigarettes without contact. In 1968 this film was presented by Sergeiev before an international meeting of parapsychologists in Moscow. American parapsychologists who tested her, including Montague Ullman and J. G. Pratt, considered her a most successful subject with respect to producing PK regularly on demand.

Kulagina died in 1990.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Kulagina, V. V. "Nina S. Kulagina." Journal of Paraphysics 5 (1971).

Rejdak, Z. "Nina Kulagina's Mind Over Matter." Psychic 2, no. 4 (June 1971).

Kuleshova, Rosa (1955–1978)

Russian psychic who demonstrated the ability to "read" printed words with the fingers of her right hand when her normal vision was completely obstructed, an ability usually termed dermo-optical perception or eyeless sight. She could also determine color tones on paper and objects by touch. Experiments with Kuleshova were reported in 1963 by Soviet scientist I. M. Gol'dberg.

Kuleshova was a relatively unimportant individual in her hometown of Nizhniy Tagil in the Urals, but after news of her remarkable abilities spread through the scientific world in the USSR she was invited to Moscow to undergo experiments at the Biophysics Institute of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. There Kuleshova demonstrated her abilities to scientists, and it seems likely that the attention and excitement went to her head.

She found it difficult to adjust to ordinary life back in Tagil and insisted on returning to Moscow for further experiments. She made wild claims that she often failed to fulfill and was even caught cheating. After this led to skepticism about "skin vision," further scientific tests were undertaken with precautions against fraud, and these validated Kuleshova's basic abilities. In 1964 Life reporter Bob Brigham saw Kuleshova in Moscow and stated that she was able to read the small print on his business card accurately with her elbow when her normal vision was entirely obstructed. Soon other Soviet subjects were discovered to have the ability of eyeless sight, and new programs of scientific investigation were undertaken. The faculty of "skin vision" was renamed "bio-introscopy" in the Soviet Union.

Rosa Kuleshova died in 1978 from a brain tumor. Reports of her successful demonstrations of eyeless sight in the editorial offices of the Moscow journal Technika Mologeji shortly before her death were reported in The International Journal of Paraphysics (vol. 13, nos. 3, 4). (See also Jules Romains; Seeing with the Stomach; Transposition of the Senses; USSR)

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Gol'dberg, I. M. "On Whether Tactile Sensitivity Can Be Improved by Exercise." Soviet Psychology and Psychiatry 2, no. 1 (1963).

Ostrander, Sheila, and Lynn Schroeder. Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970. Reprint, New York: Bantam Books, 1971.

Kumbha Mela

Important Hindu religious festival held every 12 years at the appropriate planetary conjunction; an Ardh-Kumbha (half-Kumbha) is held midway between the major Kumbha festivals. Kumbha is equivalent to the sign Aquarius, and the festival is calculated at the conjunction of Jupiter, Aquarius, Aries, and the sun. The festival takes place at either Hardwar, Allahabad, Ujjain, or Nasik. In 1977 the festival was at Allahabad, an especially holy place where the sacred river Ganges merges with the Jamuna and the Saraswati.

Ritual bathing by pilgrims is a special feature of the festival, which originated in ancient times as an occasion for spiritual instruction from great sages and yogis. Some two million pilgrims attend the festival to visit wandering holy men and yogis from all over India. The festival is divided into different camps relating to individual Hindu sects and subsects.

The Indian government has provided sanitary facilities and a system of barricades to prevent accidents caused by vast crowd movements. Kumbha Mela is one of the most colorful mass festivals of India, a kind of nongenerational super-Woodstock of the spiritual life.

Kundalini

According to ancient Hindu religious teachings and yoga science, a latent force in the human organism responsible for sexual activity and (in a sublimated form) higher consciousness. In Hindu mythology kundalini—from the root word kundala meaning coiled—is personified as a goddess, sometimes with the aspect of Durga (a creator) and sometimes Kali (the destroyer) or Bhujangi (the serpent). Kundalini is often described as a serpent that sleeps at the base of the spine and, when aroused, darts upward, bringing enlightenment or pain. According to classical literature, signs of awakened kundalini are grouped into three categories: vocal, physical and mental signs. Kundalini is also believed to be connected with certain psychic powers, known to yogis as siddhis.

The traditional Hindu yoga texts state that kundalini can be aroused by a combination of hatha yoga positions, pranayama (breathing exercises), meditation, and spiritual practices. It is said much of the yogic practice is designed to release knots or blockages in the body which prevent the flow of kundalini energy. However, kundalini may emerge within one who has never performed traditional kundalini rising practices. Often it is not a matter of the seeker grasping Enlightenment, but Enlightenment snaring the seeker.

Some claim when kundalini is incorrectly aroused, physical disability or even death can result. Students are often frightened when they experience signs of kundalini if they have not been properly instructed because the characteristics of the kundalini episode can be frightening. The signs are similar to a manic or psychotic episode: spontaneous vocal expression, trembling, shaking, spontaneous postures, periods of elation or fear, visionary or hallucinatory episodes, and feelings of bliss or anxiety.

The Panchastavi is an esoteric Hindu scripture in which kundalini is addressed as the mother of all beings. The arousal of kundalini for mystical enlightenment is described in ecstatic terms:

"Flawless, exceedingly sweet and beautiful, soul-enchanting, fluent speech manifests in all ways in those [devotees] blessed with genius who keep Thee, O Shakti [power] of Shiva, the destroyer of Kamadeva [god of love] constantly in mind, as shining with the stainless luster of the moon in the head. . .'' (3-12).

''O Goddess, rising from the cavity of Muladhara [chakra or center at the base of the spine], piercing the six lotuses [chakras] like a flash of lightning, and then flowing from the moon into the immovable sky-like center [in the head] as a stream of Supreme nectar, Thou then returnest [to Thy abode]'' (4-6).

These descriptions, in context, indicate that kundalini is considered to be the creative force expressed in procreation. It is also responsible for mystical enlightenment when sublimated by rising up the spine through the chakras, or psychic centers, to the highest center in the head. These centers are located in the physical vicinity of primary nerve and glandular centers which govern actions and responses of the body. From bottom to top, the chakras are commonly identified as:

Muladhara–The earth or root chakra is located at the base of the spine. It is said to be the chakra most connected with the earth, mother nature, the human animal, and the base self.

Svadhisthana–Also known as the sexual chakra, svadhisthana is found in the area of the reproductive organs. It is concerned with sexual energy, procreation, erotic feelings, and interactions.

Manipura–The third chakra is the power chakra, identified with action, will, anger, laughter, and courage. It is said to be located in the naval and the solar plexus. It is said to be ''the energy of the solar system radiating in our personal lives.''

Anahata–The heart chakra is located in the center of the chest and is associated with compassion, acceptance, and unconditional love. As it is located equidistant between the highest and lowest chakras, it acts as the mediator among the chakras.

Visuddha–The throat chakra, is situated in and around the larynx and therefore is known as the communication chakra. It is associated with the powers of speech, communication, and expression and is the center for mantras and other vocalizations associated with kundalini.

Ajna–The sixth center, located at the base of the nose between the eyebrows, is also known as ''The Third Eye.'' It governs the principles of wisdom, knowing, intuition, and psychic abilities. It is where God speaks to one directly during meditation.

Sahasrara–Sahasrara, the mystic chakra, is located in the crown of the head, in the cerebrum. The mystic chakra is said to control the brain's pineal gland, unrecognized in modern medicine, but known by yogis for thousands of years. The mystic chakra is the spirit, the higher self, the connection with the Brahman. It is said to be beyond human comprehension and gurus warn again attempting to attain seventh-chakra consciousness until the nervous system is fully prepared.

There are foreshadowings of the biblical story of the Garden of Eden in the poetic myth of the serpent and the tree with the fruit of knowledge or of sexual force, and there are similar myths in many ancient religions, suggesting a lost secret of the relationship between sex and mysticism. Esoteric groups in many countries have guarded this secret. There is evidence of meditation systems in ancient Egypt, China, and Tibet that, under one name or another, taught the arousal of the serpent like force for higher consciousness instead of procreation. Many other religions have emphasized a relationship between sex and mysticism by enjoining celibacy for priests and monks.

In the nineteenth century B. D. Basu of the Indian Medical Service, in a essay entitled ''The Hindu System of Medicine'' (Guy's Hospital Gazette, London, 1889), identified kundalini and the chakras with nervous energy and the main plexi of the human body. This theory was elaborated by Dr. Vasant G. Rele in his book The Mysterious Kundalini (1927).

The controversial psychoanalyst Wilhelm Reich, originally a pupil of Freud's, developed a theory of orgone energy expressed in different segments of the human body, closely paralleling the course of kundalini through the chakras. Reich also associated this energy with sexual activity. However, he was strongly opposed to yoga, which he mistakenly considered merely a system of fixed physical positions with rigid musculature.

In the twentieth century the ancient concept of kundalini has been revived and spread in the West by several Indian teachers, such as Pandit Gopi Krishna of Srinagar, India. Gop Krishna aroused this legendary force and claimed to experience a continuing state of higher consciousness. He describes his experience in Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man (1970) and a number of other books. Among other modern Hindus who claimed to have aroused kundalini is Swami Muktanada, who was said to have the power to communicate this arousal by touch, a technique traditionally known in India as shaktipat.

Pandit Gopi Krishna believed that kundalini is an evolutionary force that will play an increasingly important part in the development of the human race and its goals, indicating new directions for both science and religion. Unfortunately, his followers have not been able to see his goal realized. Following up on the writings of Gopi Krishna, Karan Singh, union minister of health in India, announced in 1974 an ambitious kundalini research project, to be sponsored by the All-India Institute of Medical Science, to research the ''Kundalini concept and its relevance to the development of higher nervous functions.'' The project failed, however, to secure official funding following a general election and change of government. Meanwhile, sympathizers with the work of Gopi Krishna founded the Central Institute for Kundalini Research at Srinagar, Kashmir, India, but it too became inactive following the death of Gopi Krishna in 1984.

There are now several organizations concerned with kundalini. The Kundalini Research Association International is located at Gemsenstrasse 7, 8006 Zürich, Switzerland. In the United States the Kundalini Research Foundation's address is P.O. Box 2248, Darien, CT 06820. In Canada the FIND (Friends in New Directions) research trust publishes books and audio tapes on the work and thought of Gopi Krishna. It may be reached at R.R. 5, Flesherton, Ontario, Canada, NOC IEO. Through the Dhyanyoga Centers, located in California, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Maine, Shri Ananda Ma directs yogis who direct students in the awakening of kundalini. The Dhyanyoga Centers can be contacted through their website at http://www.dyc.org/.

Sources:

Avalon, Arthur [Sir John Woodroffe]. The Serpent Power. Madras, India, 1922.

Condron, Barbara. Kundalini Rising: Mastering Creative Energies. Windyville, Mo.: SOM, 1992.

Gopi Krishna. The Awakening of Kundalini. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1975.

Greenwell, Ph.D, Bonnie Energies of Tranformation: A Guide to the Kundalini Process Saratoga, Calif.: Shakti River Press, 1995

———. The Biological Basis of Religion and Genius. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

———. Kundalini: The Evolutionary Energy in Man. Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1970.

Keutzer, Kurt, ''Kundalini: Frequently Asked Questions and Selected References.'' http://hmt.com/kundalini. May 8, 2000.

Kieffer, Gene, ed. Kundalini for the New Age: Selected Writings of Gopi Krishna. New York: Bantam Books, 1988.

Madhusudaandasji, Shri Dhyanyogi. ''The Path of Kundalini Maha Yoga.'' http://www.dyc.org/. May 8, 2000.

Narayananda, Swami. The Primal Power in Man of the Kundalini Shakti. Risikesh, India: N. K. Prasad, 1950.

Radha, Swami Sivananda, Kundalini Yoga for the West Spokane, Wash.: Timeless Books, 1978
Rele, Vasant G. The Mysterious Kundalini. Bombay: Taraporevala, 1927.
Savola, Marja, "Kundalini-Network in Denmark." http://home5swipnet.se. May 8, 2000.
Selby, John Kundalini Awakening: A Gentle Guide to Chakra Activation and Spiritual Growth New York: Bantam Books, 1992
Vyasdev, Brahmachari Swami. Science of Soul (Atma Vijnana). Gangotri, India: Yoga Niketan Trust, 1964.

Kundalini Quarterly

Quarterly publication of the Kundalini Research Institute, California, concerned with the relationship of kundalini energy and yoga techniques to the emotional, physical, and spiritual life of human beings. Last known address: P.O. Box 1020, Claremont, CA 91711.

Kundalini Research Association International

A Swiss-based organization for the scientific study of all aspects of kundalini, first described in traditional Hindu scriptures and yoga texts as a divine power latent in the human organism, and now believed to be a subtle biological force generated by the reproductive system, responsible for human evolution and states of higher consciousness and mystical experience.

The association aimed to initiate, encourage, and support research into the nature and functions of kundalini; to cooperate with individuals and organizations concerned with spiritual, cultural, medical, or other aspects of kundalini; to study, translate, and publish texts from Tibet, China, Germany, Japan, or elsewhere concerned with kundalini; and to gather statistics and study case histories of people in all parts of the world who have had experience or claim talents related to the arousal of kundalini.

The association adhered to the teachings of the late Pandit Gopi Krishna (1903–1984), who claimed that kundalini is the basic psychosomatic mechanism responsible for genius, psychic faculties, mystical ecstasy (or samadhi) and (in an abnormal form) certain kinds of insanity. The association hoped to create global awareness about the scientific implications of kundalini in order to establish the unity of religions and to bridge the gulf existing between revealed knowledge and science. Last known address: Gemsenstrasse 7, CH-8006 Zürich, Switzerland.

Kundalini Research Foundation, Ltd. (KRF)

American organization concerned with the study of kundalini, believed to be the powerful life force related to procreation and higher consciousness, originally described in ancient Hindu treatises on yoga and spiritual development, but also known in various cultures and religions throughout history. The KRF is particularly concerned with the writings of Pandit Gopi Krishna (1903–1984), who wrote from personal experience of the arousal of kundalini and consequent states of higher consciousness.

The KRF acts as a clearinghouse for information on all aspects of kundalini, including correlation of traditions in various cultures, personal experiences, and scientific study of the phenomenon. Address: P.O. Box 2248, Darien, CT 06820. Website: http://www.renature.com/KRF/.

Kuppuswami, B(angalore) (1907–)

Professor of psychology, active in the field of parapsychology. Kuppuswami was born on February 29, 1907, at Bangalore, Mysore, India, and studied at the University of Mysore (B.A., 1927; M.A., 1929). Beginning in 1929, he was a lecturer in psychology for two decades at Presidency College, Madras. In 1952 he became a professor of psychology at the University of Mysore.

He had an outstanding career as a psychologist. He served as, among many other positions, president of the psychology section of the Indian Science Congress (1945); editor of the journal Psychological Studies (Mysore); chairman of the section on social change, International Conference on Human Relations, the Netherlands (1956); president of the psychology section, All India Philosophical Conference (1956); and president of the Parapsychology Conference, Indian Science Congress (1960). In addition to his work in the fields of psychology, sociology, and education, Kuppuswami studied the effects of education and variation in distance on psi ability.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Kusche, Lawrence David (1940–)

Author of an important critical work on the Bermuda Triangle mystery. His carefully researched book, The Bermuda Triangle Mystery—Solved (1975), examines popular theories of time warps, black holes, UFOs, and so on and opts for a rational view that there is no single overall mysterious explanation, but rather a mystery built up from inaccurate research, exaggeration, omission of important facts, and the spread of rumors. Kusche has had considerable experience as a flight instructor and also as a research librarian. In commenting on his approach to such matters as the Bermuda Triangle question, he has stated:

"I might be called a skeptic. It's not that I disbelieve anything and everything, but I especially question much of the present day written and televised information that passes for 'fact.' Much of it is nothing more than a half-fact attempt to earn as much money as possible with as little regard for truth as possible."

Kusche followed his initial book with The Disappearance of Flight 19 (1980), which discusses the disappearance on December 5, 1945, of five navy TBM Avenger torpedo bombers, carrying 14 men, after leaving Fort Lauderdale Naval Air Station on a routine flight. This event has often been cited as a basic example of the Bermuda Triangle mystery. Kusche spent seven years in careful research of all aspects of the event, including many interviews, and retraced the Flight 19 route. He provides a basically rational explanation of the tragedy, which he believes was the lack of experience of the pilots.

Sources:

Kusche, Lawrence David. The Bermuda Triangle Mystery—Solved. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.
———. The Disappearance of Flight 19. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.

Kuvalayananda, Swami (1883–1966)

Famous Indian pioneer of the scientific study of hatha yoga. He was born Jagannath Ganesh Gune on August 30, 1883, at Dabhoi, Baroda. His first language was Marathi, but all of his publications on yoga in English. He was a noted scholar, educationist, and national freedom fighter. He organized the Khandesh Education Society in 1916 and was principal of the society's college (1921–23). He chaired the Physical Education Committee, appointed by the Bombay Board of Physical Education, and was a member of the Central Advisory Board of Physical Education.

Gune was one of Paramahamsa Shree Madhavadasji Maharaj's two major students at Malsar, on the banks of the river

Narmada in Gujarat State. Paramahamsa Madhavadasji trained Gune and Shri Yogendra in yoga, which had died out in most of India; Paramahansa Madhavadasji was the major advocate of its revival. Yogendra founded a yoga center in Bombay, and Gune worked at it until 1932. He then left to found the Yogic Health Center at Santa Cruz, Bombay; new premises were secured in 1935 and the center was renamed Ishwardas Chunilal Yoga Health Centre, Kaivalyadhama. Later a spiritual center was added at Kanakesvara Hill in the Kolaba district of Bombay. An additional center, the Kaivalyadhama Saurashtra Mandal, was established in Rajkot in 1943.

By the end of 1943 it was decided to divide the main organization into two wings: Kaivalyadhama Ashrama with emphasis on spiritual development, and Kaivalyadhama Sreeman Madhava Yoga Mandira (SMYM) Samhiti at Lonavla, Poona, specializing in the medical and scientific investigation of yoga. The latter wing was officially recognized as a research institute by the government of Bombay and by Bombay State.

Since 1935 the Kaivalyadhama SMYM Samhiti has published the Yoga-Mimamsa journal, edited by Swami Kuvalayananda, with both popular and scientific sections devoted to the serious study of yoga.

Sources:

Kuvalayananda, Swami. Asanas. Lonavla (C.R.), India: Yoga-Mimamsa Office. Reprinted as Popular Yoga Asanas. Rutland, Vt.: C. E. Tuttle, 1972.

———. Pranayama. Lonavla (C.R.), India: Yoga-Mimamsa Office. Reprint, Bombay: Popular Prakashan, 1966.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

KUZ See Kwan Um School of Zen

Kwan Um School of Zen (KUZ)

International organization concerned with the application of traditional Buddhist teachings to everyday life. The school was founded by Zen master Seung Sahn, one of the first Korean Zen masters to teach in the West. KUZ schools include some 50 associated resident centers and groups in the United States, western Europe, Poland, and Korea. Address: Kwan Um School of Zen, R.F.D. 5, 528 Pound Rd., Cumberland, RI 02864.

Kyphi

An aromatic substance of the ancient Egyptians with soothing and healing properties, prepared from 16 materials according to the prescription of the sacred books. (See also Egypt)

Kyteler, Dame Alice (ca. 1280–ca. 1325)

Fourteenth-century accused sorcerer of Kilkenny, Ireland, of a good Anglo-Norman family. Members of her fourth husband's family, attempting to break the will that left her in control of most of the family fortune, accused her of malevolent magic. She was indicted by Bishop de Ledrede, but with her connections and wealth she was able to defy the church. The bishop, however, moved to excommunicate her. Kyteler responded by imprisoning the bishop, who responded by indicting the whole community.

However, the lord justice, who supported Kyteler, obliged the bishop to lift his ban. The bishop eventually succeeded in instituting a case against Kyteler and others accused with her of sorcery, but she fled to England. Her maid Petronilla de Meath was arrested and flogged, only after which she confessed to various orgies involving Kyteler. Petronilla was excommunicated and burned for her part in Kyteler's supposed crimes at Kilkenny on November 3, 1324. Kyteler eventually lost her estate but spent the rest of her life peacefully in England. The case is significant as the first witchcraft (i.e., sorcery) trial in Ireland. A full account is printed as volume 24 in the series of the Camden Society, England, under the title A Contemporary Narrative of the Proceedings against Dame Alice Kyteler, prosecuted for Sorcery in 1324, edited by Thomas Wright, 1843.

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. Witchcraft in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1972.

Wright, Thomas, ed. A Contemporary Narrative of the Proceedings Against Dame Alice Kyteler. 1843. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1968.

L

Labadie, Jean (1610–1674)

A French religious leader of the seventeenth century who was born in 1610 at Bourg, on the Dordogne. He declared himself a second John the Baptist, sent to announce the second coming of the Messiah, and also claimed some measure of divinity for himself.

Labadie had pronounced taste for worldly pleasures, however, which he indulged under the mask of religion. He left the Jesuit College in Bordeaux in 1639 and became canon of Amiens. He became the favorite confessor of upper-class women but was obliged to leave Amiens after a number of scandals. He was also in trouble in Toulouse and was eventually discredited by the church.

In 1650 Labadie joined the Reformed Church and became a pastor at Montauban but was banished after charges of sedition. He was similarly ousted from Geneva and moved to Middleburg in Zealand with a band of followers. He was opposed by the Lutherans and eventually expelled with his band. He died February 16, 1674, at Erfurt.

A sect of Labadists persisted for a few years at Wiewart, North Holland, professing austerity of manners similar to early Quakers. The Labadists emphasized community of property within the church and continuance of prophecy. Among the works of Labadie (which were condemned) was Le Veritable Exorcisme, au l'unique moyen de chasser le diable du monde chrétien (1667).

Labarum

A Kabalistic sign embodied in the Great Magical Monogram. The Labarum is the seventh and most important pentacle of the Enchiridion, a collection of sixteenth-century prayers and charms ascribed to Pope Leo III.

Laboratoire d'études des relations entre rythmes cosmiques et psychophysiologiques

Established by psychologist Michel Gauquelin and his wife, Françoise, for the study of cosmic influences in relation to the psychology of personality. Over 20 publications were released during Gauquelin's life.

Laboratoire Universitaire de Parapsychologie et d'Hygiene Mental

The Laboratoire Universitaire de Parapsychologie et d'Hygiene Mental was founded in 1974 in Toulouse, France, by a group of University of Toulouse researchers interested in parapsychology. Psychical research had flourished in France for a century prior to World War II (1939–45), but it had slowed in the 1930s and completely died out during the years of the German occupation. During the last half of the twentieth century, it has been slow to revive, but the center at Toulouse has emerged as the most vital in the nation.

The laboratory conducted a program of laboratory experiments including card guessing experiments, psychokinetic tests, and field research in such diverse subjects as ghost hauntings and dowsing. The experimental work was complemented with an educational program that includes public lectures, workshops, and an annual conference. It was the organization's hope that sharing parapsychological data could lead the public to replace irrational opinions on the occult with scientific knowledge of the paranormal.

In 1987 the laboratory created the Organisation pour la Recherche en Psychotronique as an independent agency to promote parapsychological research in France and other French-speaking countries. The laboratory was directed by Yves Lignon. Last known address: c/o IUER Mathématics, Université Toulouse-Le-Mirail 31058, Toulouse CEDEX, France.

Labouré, Catherine Zoé (1806–1876)

Catherine Labouré, a French visionary and Roman Catholic saint, was born on May 2, 1806, at Fain-les-Moutiers, Cote d'Or, the eighth child of Pierre and Madeleine Gontard Labouré. As a child she was known by her middle name, Zoé. Since females were not allowed to attend any of the schools in her town, she was an adult before she learned to read and write. When her mother died in 1815, Zoé was sent to live with her older married sister at Saint Remy. At the time of her first Communion in 1818, she had decided to consecrate her life to God. She moved back to the house with her father and assumed the burden of housekeeping duties.

Her call to the religious life appears to have originated with a dream in which an elderly priest told her that she would soon be with him as God had planned. At the end of 1829, she went to the convent of the Daughters of Charity at Chatillon-sur-Seine to discuss her becoming a nun. On the wall she saw a picture of the priest in her dream. It turned out to be the departed founder of the Daughters of Charity, Vincent de Paul. At the beginning of 1830 she became a postulate at Chatillon-sur-Seine and on April 21 arrived at the convent in Paris to begin her novitiate.

Soon after her arrival, Sister Catherine began to manifest her visionary tendencies. Four days after she arrived, the body of the founder, which had been hidden during the worst days of the Revolution, was brought to the Paris convent. On each of the next three days, Sister Catherine had a vision of the saint's heart, each time while she was in the convent's chapel. On June 6 she saw Jesus as a king with a cross adorning his breast. However, she really desired to have an apparition of the Virgin Mary and went to sleep on July 18 with a prayer to that effect on her lips. Awakened around eleven o'clock, she saw a child dressed in white who instructed her to go to the chapel. When she arrived it was lit up even though it was long after all the other sisters had retired. She knelt at the communion rail and moments later the child announced Mary's arrival. She was seated on a chair by the altar wearing an ivory robe and a blue mantle. She then proceeded to give her a rather lengthy message that had three discernible parts. First, she called Sister

Catherine to a special mission. Second, she warned of troubles in the immediate future, but said that the convent would be protected. Then she warned of another time of trouble some 40 years in the future that would include the death of the archbishop of Paris. Sister Catherine told of her meeting with the Virgin and what was said only to her confessor. He did not believe her until the Revolution again broke out in Paris and anticlericalism spawned riots throughout the city. True to her prediction, however, no problem touched the convent.

Her primary vision of Mary occurred on November 27 when Mary again appeared in the chapel. Mary was dressed in white atop a globe. She held a smaller globe in her hands which then disappeared. Mary dropped her arms to her side and then extended them forward with the palms facing out. Rays of light shot from her hands, representative of graces available to all who asked for them. Then, an oval of golden letters surrounded the Virgin spelling out a brief prayer, "O Mary, conceived without sin, pray for us who have recourse to thee." Then Mary faded out and was replaced with a large M surmounted by a cross. Below were the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary. Sister Catherine was told to have a medal struck conforming to what she had just seen. Graces would come to those who wear the medal. Her confessor was unimpressed. However, the vision was repeated in December, and the following March and September. Only then did he take action and confer with the archbishop of Paris who ordered the medal struck.

The archbishop was doubly impressed with the medal after miracles and unusual occurrences were reported to him by people who had received and were wearing it. In the meantime, Sister Catherine was sent to the hospice outside of Paris where she worked with the poor for the rest of her life. She had not told any of her sisters of her visions or what had occurred because of them. In 1836 a formal investigation of the miracles attributed to the medal was held. Sister Catherine's confessor testified, but he did not reveal her identity and she was not called to tell her story. In 1856 he asked her to write up an account of what had occurred. The events originally prophesied in 1830 occurred in 1870 with the abdication of Napoleon III and the death of the archbishop of Paris during the Franco-Prussian War.

It was not until 1876, 11 years after the death of her confessor, that Sister Catherine broke her silence and told her Mother Superior of her visions and their relation to the medal. She did that only after Mary had again appeared to her and told her that a statue of the Virgin holding the globe should be made and placed in the convent in Paris.

Through the rest of 1876 her health failed and she died on December 31, 1876. Those who came to know her life story initially asked for her canonization in 1895. Through the early decades of the twentieth century her cause passed through the necessary steps. She was named venerable in 1907, beatified in 1933, and finally named a saint in 1947. Following her beatification, her body was exhumed, found to be uncorrupted, and placed in the chapel behind glass where it can be seen by visitors to this day. Millions of people now wear the Miraculous Medal and attune to the prayer it has on it.

Sources:

Dirvin, Joseph I. St. Catherine Labouré of the Miraculous Medal. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday Echo Books, 1965.

Englebert, Omer. Catherine Labouré and the Modern Apparitions of Our Lady. New York: P. J. Kennedy & Sons, 1958.

Lacteus

A fabled precious stone said by ancient writers to be efficacious when applied to rheumatic eyes.

Ladybug (or Ladybird)

Popular name of the colorful red-spotted beetle of the family Coccinellidae of the order Coleoptera. It is the subject of many folklore superstitions. It brings children, warns of danger, forecasts length of life by the number of its spots, or warns of death. In British and European folklore, the ladybird was captured by a young woman and bidden to fly "north, south, or east, or west" in the direction in which her lover lived. Whichever way the insect flew, there dwelled her future husband. A well-known children's rhyme is: "Ladybird, ladybird, fly away home, your house is on fire, and your children all roam."

Lady of Lawers (ca. 1650)

Name given to a woman of the Breadalbane family of Scotland (possibly a Stewart of Appin), who was married to Campbell of Lawers (north shore of Loch Tay, ca. 1650). This woman was believed to be gifted with prophetic powers; her prophecies, said to be written in a book shaped like a barrel and kept in the charter room of Taymouth Castle, were known as "The Red Book of Balloch."

The prophecies all had reference to the house and lands of Breadalbane. One of these related to an ash tree planted by the lady on the north side of the church, beneath which she was said to have been eventually buried. The prophecy was: "The tree will grow, and when it reaches the gable the church will be split asunder, and this will also happen when the red cairn on Ben Lawers falls."

The tree reached the gable in the year 1833, when a great thunderstorm demolished the west loft of the church, collapsing into the middle and rendering the church derelict. At the same time, a cairn (heap of stones) built by sappers and miners on Ben Lawers fell, and the Disruption of the Church of Scotland itself took place.

Lafleche, Pierre (1892– ?)

French poet and government official who studied telepathy and ESP in cooperation with René Warcollier. Lafleche was born on February 6, 1892, in Paris, France. He studied at the Collège de Juilly (Seine-et-Marne) (Bachelier ès lettres, 1909) and at the University of Paris (licencié en droit, 1918). He served in the French army in World War I and received the Croix de Guerre and chevalier, Legion of Honor.

Lafleche worked for the French Ministry of Public Works from 1920 to 1952. He published three volumes of poetry and a number of articles on parapsychology in various journals such as Psychica, Revue Métapsychique, Lotus Bleu, and Tomorrow.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Laidlaw, Robert W(ordsworth) (1901–1978)

Physician and psychiatrist with an interest in parapsychology. He was born on February 26, 1901, at Englewood, New Jersey. He studied at Princeton University (B.A., 1924) and Columbia University (M.D., 1931). In 1949 he served as chief of psychiatric services at Roosevelt Hospital in New York City and as consultant in psychiatry at Union Theological Seminary.

Laidlaw's interest in parapsychology led him to study hypnosis, mediumship, and the effect of chemical substances on the human mind. He presented the paper "Psychedelics: A New Road to the Understanding of Mediumistic Phenomena?" at the Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics held in New York in 1958. That same year his article on hypnosis and hypnoanalysis appeared in Tomorrow magazine (autumn 1958).

Laidlaw investigated such topics as the effect on the mind of LSD 25 and the clinical aspects of spiritual healing. He also took an interest in the healing techniques of Ambrose and Olga Worrall.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lakshmi (Center)

Organization founded by former English professor Dr. Frederick Lenz, who was a disciple under guru Sri Chinmoy for 11 years. Given the name Atmananda by his guru, Lenz began teaching yoga in Los Angeles and throughout Southern California. His students reported a number of extraordinary experiences during his classes, including that Lenz was seen to levitate and disappear completely during group meditations and to radiate intense beams of light.

Lenz formed the Lakshmi center in the 1970s as an independent organization. Lakshmi is the Hindu goddess of fortune and the consort of Vishnu. In the early 1980s Lenz announced to a gathering of his students that Eternity had given him the new name "Rama." Accordingly, in 1985 Lakshmi was superseded by a new organization, Rama Seminars.

As Rama, Lenz teaches that humanity is approaching the end of a cycle. The present period is the Kali Yuga, the dark age of devolution. At the end of each cycle or age, the god Vishnu is due to become incarnated. While Rama (Lenz) does not claim to be the same conscious entity as the historic Rama (the hero of the religious epic Ramayana and a previous incarnation of Vishnu), Lenz does claim to be the embodiment of the "particular octave of celestial light which was once before incarnated as the historic Rama."

Rama Seminars was headquartered in southern California through the 1980s. However, a scandal, occasioned by accusation of abuse by several of Lenz's students, disrupted the organization, which has moved its headquarters to the East Coast.

Sources:

The Last Incarnation. Malibu, Calif.: Lakshmi Publications, 1983.

Lenz, Frederick. Life Times. New York: Fawcett Crest, 1979.

Rama [Frederic Lenz]. The Wheel of Dharma. Malibu, Calif.: Lakshmi Publications, 1982.

Lam

A mystical word in Hindu yoga practice that is associated with the Muladhara chakra, or subtle energy center situated at the base of the human spine. Each chakra has its characteristic shape, colors, symbolic figure, and mantra (mystical sounds formed by combinations of letters). "Lam" is a bija, or seed, mantra—a special form of natural power that can be liberated by meditation. (See also kundalini)

Lama Foundation

New Age communal center founded in 1968 by a small group wishing to work for the awakening of higher consciousness. Members agreed to live and work full time wherever needed, to participate in group meetings and decisions, and to cooperate in fund-raising ventures. The foundation conducts programs of regular meditation, group meetings, communal meals, work projects, farming and gardening, and book publishing. The work projects include making rubber stamps, T-shirts, notecards and Tibetan prayer flags. The money produced by the sale of these products helps the continuance of the Lama Foundation. Address: P.O. Box 240, San Cristobal, NM 87564. Website: http://www.newmex.com/lama/.

Sources:

Dass, Baba Ram. Be Here Now! San Cristobal, N.Mex.: Lama Foundation, 1971.

Gardner, Hugh. The Children of Prosperity. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1978.

Hedgepath, William, and Dennis Stock. The Alternative. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Lama Foundation. http://www.newmex.com/lama/. March 8, 2000.

Lamb, John (d. 1628)

Lamb was a noted astrologer and reputed sorcerer in the time of Charles I. In Certainty of the World of Spirits (1691), Richard Baxter recorded an apocryphal account in which Lamb met two acquaintances who wished to witness some examples of his skill. He invited them home with him, conducted them into an inner room, then, to their great surprise, they saw a tree spring up in the middle of Lamb's apartment. A moment later three diminutive men appeared with axes in their hands to cut down this tree. After the tree was felled, the doctor dismissed his guests.

That night a tremendous hurricane arose, causing the house of one of the guests to rock from side to side, with every appearance that the building would come down and bury him and his wife in the ruins. The wife in great terror asked, "Were you not at Dr. Lamb's to-day?" The husband confessed the truth. "And did you not bring something away from his house?" The husband admitted that, when the little men felled the tree, he had picked up some of the chips and put them in his pocket. As soon as he obtained the chips, and got rid of them, the whirlwind immediately ceased, and the remainder of the night passed quietly.

Originally a physician, Lamb became known for practicing "other mysteries, as telling fortunes, helping of divers to lost goods, showing to young people the faces of their husbands or wives that should be in a crystal glass." It is possible that popular resentment against Lamb was due less to the success of his magical practices than his position as a favorite of the duke of Buckingham. It was generally believed that Lamb used magic charms to corrupt women to serve the pleasure of the duke.

Lamb eventually was so hated for his infernal practices that a mob tore him to pieces in the street. Then, 13 years later, a woman who had worked as a maid in Lamb's house was charged with witchcraft, tried, and executed at Tyburn.

A broadside ballad by Martin Parker titled "The Tragedy of Doctor Lambe, the great supposed conjurer, who was wounded to death by saylers and other lads, on Friday the 14 of June, 1628. And dyed in the Poultry Counter, neere cheap-side, on the Saturday morning following" was sold and sung in the streets. The ballad contains two mistakes, as Lamb was mobbed on June 13 and died the following day.

Lambert, G(uy) W(illiam) (1889–1983)

A British government official who took an active interest in psychic research. He was born in London, England, on December 1, 1889, studied at St. John's College, Oxford University (B.A. with honors, 1912), and was a member of the British Civil Service (1913–51). From 1938 to 1951 Lambert was assistant undersecretary of state for war; he received the Chevalier, Legion of Honor (1920), the Silver Jubilee Medal (1935), the Coronation Medal (1937), and the Companion of the Bath (1942).

Beginning in 1925 Lambert was a council member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London. He served as president (1955–58) and as honorary secretary beginning in 1958. He studied spontaneous phenomena involving ESP, haunting and poltergeists, and the Glastonbury Scripts of Frederick Bligh Bond. He contributed various articles to publications of the SPR.

Lambert, who died December 15, 1983, was one of the longest serving members of the Society for Psychical Research, having been a member for 70 years.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lambert, G. W. "Antoine Richard's Garden." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 37 (July–October 1953, March–April 1954); 41 (June 1962).

———. "The Dieppe Raid Case." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 35 (May–June 1952).

———. "Poltergeists: A Psychical Theory." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 38 (June 1955).

———. "The Quest at Glastonbury." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43 (1966).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lambert, R(ichard) S(tanton) (1894– ?)

Broadcasting official and author who explored the field of parapsychology and published books and articles on the subject. He was born on August 25, 1894, at Kingston-on-Thames, England, and studied at Oxford University (M.A., 1921). He tutored at the University of Sheffield (1919–23), then at the University of London (1923–28). He was editor of the Listener, published by the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) (1928–39), then moved to Canada where in 1943 he became supervisor of school broadcasts for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC). He won the Governor General of Canada Medal for Juvenile Literature in 1949. Lambert wrote over 30 books dealing with biography, children's adventure, travel, art, crime, radio, films, propaganda, and various school textbooks.

In the field of parapsychology he investigated poltergeist phenomena with Harry Price, with whom he was joint author of The Haunting of Cashen's Gap (1936). The publicity around this celebrated case nearly cost Lambert his career as editor of the Listener, when one of the governors of the BBC concluded that an interest in the supernatural was a reflection on Lambert's competence. Lambert challenged him by suing him for defamation. Lambert tells the story of this case in his biographical works Ariel and All His Quality (1940). Lambert's Exploring the Supernatural (1955) also deals with parapsychology. (See also Cashen's Gap)

Sources:

Lambert, Richard Stanton. Areil and all His Quality. London: V. Gollancz Ltd., 1940.

———. Exploring the Supernatural. London: A. Barker, 1955.

Price, Harry, and R. S. Lambert. The Haunting of Cashen's Gap. N.p., 1936.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lamia

In ancient Greek folklore, Lamia was a shape-shifting monster that sucked blood and ate flesh, similar to stories of the succubus and vampire. Lamia, the daughter of Belus and Libya, was loved by Zeus and punished by Hera. Because Hera took Lamia's children away, Lamia took her revenge on the children of men and women, since she had no power over gods. Lamia became transformed into a class of demonic being in Greek lore, the lamiai. According to folk beliefs, the lamiai might be in the form of a beautiful woman, a snake with a woman's head, or a monster with deformed lower limbs and the power to take out her eyes. (See also Striges)

Sources:

Lawson, John Cuthbert. Modern Greek Folklore and Ancient Greek Religion. 1910. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Lampadomancy

Form of divination based on reading the form, color, and movements of the flame of an oil lamp or a torch. A flame with a single point was believed to indicate good fortune, but two points signaled bad luck. A flame that bent might indicate illness. Sparks were said to indicate forthcoming news, and the sudden extinction of the flame portended disaster.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Lamps, Magic

Stories of magic lamps are of great antiquity. According to G. Panciroli (1523–1599), the sepulcher of Tullia, daughter of the Roman statesman Cicero (106–43 B.C.E.), had a lamp that burned for over 1,550 years. St. Augustine described a lamp placed by the seashore that was not extinguished by wind or rain. Monsignor Guerin, the chamberlain of Pope Leo XIII, told of a lamp before the shrine of St. Genevieve in the Church of St. Denis whose oil was always consumed but never diminished in quantity.

Another lamp legend concerned Rabbi Jachiel of Paris, who was regarded by the Jews as one of their saints and by the Parisians as a sorcerer. During the night when everyone was asleep, he was believed to work by the light of a magic lamp that illuminated his chamber like the sun itself. The rabbi never replenished this lamp with oil, nor otherwise attended to it, and folks began to hint that he had acquired it through diabolic agencies. If anyone knocked at his door during the night, they reported seeing the lamp throw out sparks of light of various colors, but if they continued to rap, the lamp failed, and the rabbi would touch a large nail in the middle of his table that connected magically with the knocker on his door, giving the person who rapped on it something of the nature of an electric shock (see France).

One of the best-known stories is the one about Aladdin and his lamp from the Arabian Nights Entertainment, or Book of a Thousand and One Nights, in which the lamp is a magic wish-fulfilling talisman. Although versions of the stories in the Arabian Nights are of some antiquity, some of the tales, like that of Aladdin, are from late Egyptian sources.

Another well-known legend is that of the tomb of Christian Rosenkreutz, founder of the Order of the Rosy Cross, or Rosicrucians. According to the Rosicrucian manifesto Fama Fraternitatis (first printed in 1614), translated together with the manifesto Confessio Fraternitatis (1615) by "Eugenius Philalethes" (the pseudonym used by alchemist Thomas Vaughan) in London, 1652, the tomb of Christian Rosenkreutz was opened many years after his death, and a secret vault was discovered with an ever-burning lamp, together with magical mirrors, sacred books, bells, more ever-burning lamps, and "artificial songs," which sounded like precursors of the phonograph record. For an attempt to separate history from legend and symbolism in this story, see Arthur E. Waite's The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross (1924). Many stories of ever-burning lamps stem from phosphorescent phenomena or from spontaneous combustion caused by the sudden influx of air into a gaseous vault.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur E. The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross. 1924. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Lancashire Witches

A famous episode of ignorance, superstition, and persecution in Lancashire, England, which involved a mass trial of 20 alleged witches. Not far from Manchester lies Pendelbury Forest, where, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, witches were said to live. Terrified townspeople avoided the place, imagining it to be the scene of frightful orgies and diabolical rites. Roger Nowel, a country magistrate, hit upon the plan of routing the witches out of their den and ridding the district of their malevolent influence, and he believed he would be performing a public-spirited and laudable service.

He promptly seized Elizabeth Demdike and Ann Chattox, two women of 80 years of age, one blind and the other threatened with blindness, both living in squalor and abject poverty. Demdike's daughter, Elizabeth Device, and her grandchildren, James and Alison Device, were included in the accusation, and Ann Redferne, daughter of Chattox, was apprehended with her mother.

Also seized in quick succession were Jane Bulcock and her son John, Alice Nutter, Catherine Hewitt, and Isabel Roby. All of them were induced to make a more or less detailed confession of the communication with the Devil. It is not known how these confessions were obtained, but considering the age and condition of the women, their confessions were probably extorted. Afterward they were sent to prison in Lancaster Castle, some 50 miles away, to await trial.

Soon after the authorities were informed that about 20 witches assembled on Good Friday at Malkin's Tower, the home of Elizabeth Device, in order to arrange the death of one Covel, to blow up the castle in which their companions were confined and rescue the prisoners, and also to kill a man called Lister by means of a diabolical agency.

In summer 1612, the prisoners were tried for witchcraft and were all found guilty. The woman Demdike had died in prison and thus escaped a more ignominious death at the gallows. The principal witnesses against Elizabeth Device were her grandchildren, James and Jannet Device. When Jannet entered the witness-box, her grandmother set up a terrible yelling punctuated by bitter execrations.

The child, who was only nine years of age, begged that the prisoner be removed so that she could proceed with her evidence. Her request was granted, and she and her brother swore that the devil had visited their grandmother in the shape of a black dog and asked what were her wishes. She said she desired the death of one John Robinson, whereupon the fiend told her to make a clay image of Robinson and gradually crumble it to pieces, saying that as she did so the man's life would decay and finally perish. On such evidence, 10 persons were hanged, including the aged Ann Chattox.

The story of the Lancashire witches became the subject of Thomas Shadwell's play of that name in 1681, and a novel by W. H. Ainsworth in 1848. Twenty-two years after the events of 1612, a similar outrage in the same area of Lancashire was narrowly avoided, by the shrewdness of the judge who tried the case. A man by the name of Edmund Robinson thought to profit by the general belief in witchcraft. He told his young son, a boy of 11, to say that he had encountered two dogs in the field, and he tried to get them to catch a hare. When the animals would not obey his bidding, he tied them to a post and whipped them, when they immediately turned into a witch and her imp.

The fiction gained such credence that Robinson declared that his son possessed a sort of second-sight, which enabled him to distinguish a witch at a glance. He took the boy to the neighboring churches, set him on a bench, and bade him point out the witches. The boy identified 17 persons, and the jury convicted them. They might have been hanged were it not for the judge's suspicions about the story.

The judge postponed their sentences and sent some of them to London for examination by the king's physician and by King Charles I himself. The boy's story was investigated and found to be false, and the child himself admitted the lie.

Sources:

Ainsworth, William Harrison. The Lancashire Witches: A Romance of Pendle Forest. London: George Routledge, 1878.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Whitaker, Thomas D. A History of The Original Parish of Whalley. London, 1818.

Lancaster, John B(usfield) (1891–1974)

Engineering technician who experimented in the field of parapsychology. He was born on January 19, 1891, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He studied structural design and building at the Drexel Institute, Philadelphia (1914–18). He was a draftsman, power plant engineer, and chief draftsman at the Philadelphia Gas Works, 1911–55.

Lancaster developed games for testing telepathy and psychokinesis, which he presented to the Parapsychology Laboratory of Duke University in Durham, North Carolina. During 1959 he conducted long-distance experiments in telepathy with students of Cambridge and Oxford Universities in England and Wayland College in Plainview, Texas.

Lancaster died in February 1974.

Sources:

Lancaster, John B. "A GESP Experiment with a Dual (Color-Symbol) Target." Journal of Parapsychology (December 1959).

Lancelin, Charles (ca. 1927–)

French physician and occultist who was an early experimenter in the field of astral projection, also known as out-of-the-body travel. He published a number of important books in the active period of French interest in occultism that preceded World War II.

Sources:

Lancelin, Charles. L'ame humaine: etudes expérimentales de psycho-physiologie. Paris: H. Durville, 1921.

———. Comment on meurt, comment on nait. Paris: H. Durville, 1912.

———. La fraude dans la production des phénomès mediumiques. N.p., 1912.

———. Histoire mythique de Shatan: de la légende au dogme. N.p., 1903.

———. L'humanité posthume et le monde angélique. N.p., n.d.

———. Méthode de dédoublement personnel. N.p., 1913.

———. L'occultisme et la science. Paris: J. Meyer, 1926.

———. L'occultisme et la vie. Paris: Editions Adyar, 1928.

———. Qu'est-ce l'âme? N.p., n.d.

———. La réincarnation. N.p., n.d.

———. La sorcellerie des campagnes. N.p., 1923.

———. La vie posthume. Paris: H. Durville, 1922.

Landau, Lucian (1912–)

Industrial consultant who experimented and lectured in the field of parapsychology. He was born on April 13, 1912, in Warsaw, Poland. He first came to England as a business executive and consultant in the rubber, plastics, and electronics industries. He invented various devices and processes used in Britain, France, and Italy and wrote a study on latex published by the British Rubber Development Board in 1954.

Landau experimented with dowsing, clairvoyance, psychic photography, and radiasthesia and lectured on such subjects to the Medical Society for the Study of Radiesthesia, the Cambridge University Society for the Study of Parapsychology, and the College of Psychic Science, London. He published articles in Light journal, including a report on the Delawarr Camera (vol. 77, no. 3430 [March 1957]). (See also black box)

Sources:

Landau, Lucian. "Radionics: General Considerations." Journal of the British Society of Dowsers (September 1958).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lane, David (Christopher) (1956–)

Philosophy professor and writer on new religious movements. He was born on April 29, 1956, in Burbank, California, and received his education at Los Angeles Valley College (Associate of Arts) and California State University, Northridge (B.A., 1978). He did his graduate work at the Graduate Theological Union (M.A., 1983) and the University of California at Berkeley from which he received both a M.A., 1988, and Ph.D., 1991, in sociology. While there he was a research assistant to Mark Juergensmeyer on a grant to study the trans-national Radhasoami faith. He traveled throughout North India and compiled an exhaustive genealogical tree of Radhasoami gurus and gaddis (seats of Sikh gurus). He helped to produce a documentary film on the history of Sant Mat (a transcendental Sikh movement), and was instrumental in arranging a rare interview with Baba Faqir Chand, then a 94-year-old sage in the foothills of the Himalayas. The research became the basis of his M.A. thesis (1981) and ultimately a book, The Radhasoami Tradition (1992). His research also helped satisfy his own spiritual quest and in 1978 he was initiated by Radhasoami master Maharaj Charan Singh. Prior to assuming his present position, Lane taught at the University of California, San Diego, where he received a Regents Fellowship in Sociology. Lane's research on the Radhasoami movement led to work on two modern western offshoots of the movement, ECKANKAR and the Movement for Inner Spiritual Awareness (MSIA), both of which had denied their contact with the larger movement. The first result was the publication in 1983 of The Making of a Spiritual Movement (originally presented as a term paper at California State University, Northridge, 1978), a detailed study of the intellectual roots of ECKANKAR and of its founder, Paul Twitchell. The book charged that Twitchell had been trained by Radhasoami master Kirpal Singh and had plagiarized extensively from Radhasoami literature in books circulated as ECKANKAR texts. Lane went on to found a journal, Understanding Cults and Spiritual Movements, with his colleague Brian Walsh and continued his research on various Radhasoami and Indian-based groups, some of which he felt had perverted the Radhasoami tradition. John Roger Hinkins and Da Free John especially became objects of severe criticism.

Lane's own publishing venture was interrupted in the mid-1980s by a series of events including some death threats, a break-in at his home, and the theft of his mailing lists and other documents. However, he has continued to write in the field and has recently published two volumes, including an updated text of his early study of the Radhasoami tradition and an anthology of his critical works on Indian spiritual movements.

Sources:

Lane, David Christopher. Exposing Cults: When the Skeptical Mind Confronts the Mystical. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.

———. The Making of a Spiritual Movement. Del Mar, Calif.: Del Mar Press, 1983.

———. The Radhasoami Tradition: A Critical History of Guru Successorship. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

Lang, Andrew (1844–1912)

Philosopher, poet, scholar, and author of scholarly books on a wide range of topics, including anthropology, folklore, mythology, psychology, ghost lore, history, biography, and fairy tales. He was born at Selkirk, Scotland, on March 31, 1844, and was educated at St. Andrews University. He also studied at Glasgow University and Oxford University (Balliol and Merton colleges). Lang abandoned his fellowship at Merton College to become a journalist and author in London.

He joined the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) in 1906, but his interest in psychical phenomena was of longer standing. Lang studied them rather from the historic and anthropologic, than from the experimental, viewpoint.

His earliest paper was read before the SPR on the Cock Lane Ghost in 1894. Subsequently he was a frequent contributor to the society's Proceedings and Journal. In the Journal (vol. 7) he wrote on Queen Mary's diamonds; in Proceedings (vol. 11) on the voices of Joan of Arc. The telepathy à trois (involving three individuals) was his conception in a paper on the mediumship of Leonora Piper. His book Custom and Myth, published in 1884, contained a chapter on the divining rod, which he regarded as a mischievous instrument of superstition. However, the investigations of William Barrett convinced him that it was "a fact, and a very serviceable fact." Lang also contributed some valuable personal evidence on crystal gazing.

He wrote several articles on psychic research for the Encyclopaedia Britannica in 1902. His books The Making of Religion (1898), Magic and Religion (1901), Cock Lane and Common Sense (1894), and The Book of Dreams and Ghosts (1897) are regarded as valuable tools for students of psychic research. The Mind of France (1908) was the first attempt to consider Joan of Arc in the light of psychic phenomena. In 1911 Lang became president of the Society for Psychical Research. According to the Rev. M. A. Bayfield in Proceedings (vol. 26), it is fair to infer from Lang's later writings that he found the exclusion of an external agency from some phenomena increasingly difficult.

The range and content of Lang's books and writings demonstrate remarkable originality and scholarship. He was the first scholar to properly correlate the mythology of ancient society with the folklore and psychic phenomena of modern civilization. His rainbow-colored series of fairy tale books for children, beginning with The Blue Fairy Book in 1889, remains popular.

Lang was honored by St. Andrews and Oxford universities and was elected an honorary fellow of Merton College in 1890. The freedom of his native town of Selkirk was conferred on him in 1889. He died July 20, 1912.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lang, Andrew. The Book of Dreams and Ghosts. 1897. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1974.

———. Cock Lane and Common Sense. London: Longmans, Green, 1894. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1970.

———. Magic and Religion. 1901. Reprint, New York: Greenwood Press, 1969.

———. The Maid of France, Being the Story of the Life and Death of Jeanne d'Arc. London: Longmans, Green, 1908.

———. The Making of Religion. 1898. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1968.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lanulos

Lanulos is an imaginary planet known only from the account by flying saucer contactee Woodrow Derenberger, who claimed to have flown there on a spaceship. In 1996, a being reputedly from Lanulos named "Indrid Cold" contacted De-renberger and indicated that he was seeking friendly contact with humans.

According to Cold's account, Lanulos was some 14.6 light years from Earth in the Ganymede galaxy of stars. It was originally settled by people from Earth who traveled there in space ships (thus implying that Earthlings could travel in space prior to the twentieth century) but that the knowledge of space travel had been lost for a long time and only more recently rediscovered. Their new planet was much like Earth, though the yearly cycle had only three seasons: planting, harvest, and cold. Now back in contact with Earth, the Lanulosians can easily pass for human.

Cold related that the people of Lanulos are religious. They believe in one God, the Father of all and the creator of all that is good. They have a language, but also communicate via telepathy. They developed in a nonhostile manner and have no crime or war. Government is loosely organized around a 56-person Guiding Council whose members are elected every six months. If a member proves unfit, he/she is dismissed and another elected to fill the vacancy. The people also have no need of clothes and generally walk around in the nude. When Derenberger first visited the planet, he found he attracted stares because of his clothing and soon adopted the local custom. (Derenberger also reported that he had traveled to Venus and that its residents were nudists).

Marriage is common among the Lanulosians. When a couple marries, they are "united." The male refers to his spouse as his "union," and a female calls her husband her "united." Cold indicated that he had a wife and two children. Children go through a lengthy education period that begins as soon as they seem capable of knowing good from evil. People live to be 125 to 175 years old (in Earth time).

The friendly Lanulosians, while not warlike, were engaged in business, and desired to establish trade with Earth. However, they found their attempts to form a relationship rebuffed. They had approached the American government but found officials unwilling to guarantee their safety. On occasions when they had attempted to land, they had been met with hostility. Cold indicated that he had received wounds from a shotgun on one occasion.

Derenberger published his most substantive account of Lanulos in 1971, though writer John Keel had a continued fascination with the Derenberger story and included information he had collected in several of his books over the years. There has been no independent verification of the existence of such a planet as Derenberger described.

Sources:

Derenberger, Woodrow W., and Harold W. Hubbard. Visitors from Lanulos. New York: Vantage Press, 1971.

Keel, John. Mothman Prophecies. New York: Saturday Review Press/E. P. Dutton, 1975.

———. Strange Creatures from Time and Space. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Gold Medal, 1970.

———. UFOs: Operation Trojan Horse. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970.

Lanz von Liebenfels, Jörg (1874–1954)

Austrian astrologer and member of the occult underground preceding the Nazi movement. His Order of New Templars only admitted members who had satisfied his racist concepts of Nordic purity. He also founded the Ariosophical Movement, another occult and anti-Semitic organization.

Born in Vienna July 19, 1874, as Adolf Lanz, he claimed to be the son of Baron Johannes Lancz de Liebenfels. He circulated an incorrect birthdate to mislead other astrologers. He became a novice at a Cistercian monastery but was expelled for improper behavior. Soon afterward he founded his Order of New Templars, which claimed divine support for Hilter's race theories and the supremacy of a master race. Lanz advocated special breeding colonies, or stud farms, for the master race, as well as the elimination of lesser breeds.

The order used the swastika symbol before it was officially adopted by the Nazi party, and Hitler met Lanz as early as 1909, when he collected some issues of Lanz's journal Ostara. Lanz prophesied the success of Hilter as a world figure but failed to find favor with the Nazis after their 1938 invasion of Austria. His ideas were certainly used by the Nazis, but Hitler may have been reluctant to admit their origin. Lanz died April 22, 1954.

Sources:

Daim, W. Der Mann, der Hitler die Ideen gab (The man who gave Hitler the ideas). München: Isar Verlag, 1958.

Sklar, Dusty. Gods and Beasts: The Nazis and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1977.

Webb, Janes. The Occult Establishment. La Salle, Ill.: Open Court, 1976.

Lapis Exilis

A fabulous precious stone believed to cause the phoenix to renew her youth. According to Wolfram von Eschenbach, the Lapis exilis was synonymous with the Holy Grail. (See also Lapis Judaicus)

Lapis Judaicus

A fabulous precious stone also identified with the Holy Grail and the talismanic stone of inexhaustible feeding power. It was sometimes called "Theolithos" and may have been another name for the Lapis Exilis. It has also been known as the Phoenix stone. Another legend claimed that it fell from the crown of Lucifer as he was banished from heaven and remained in the keeping of the angels of the air.

LAPLAND

The Laplanders acquired a reputation for magical practice that was almost proverbial throughout Europe, and certainly so among the peoples of the Scandinavian peninsula. Indeed the Finns used to credit them with extraordinary power in sorcery and divination. Many Scandinavian scions of nobility were in ancient times sent to Lapland to obtain a magical reputation, and Eric, the son of Harold Haarfager, found Gunhild, daughter of Asur Tote, living among the Lapps in 922 C.E. for that purpose. English literature abounds with references to Lapland witches. But sorcery in Lapland was a preserve of the male shamans or magicians. Like the Celtic witches, the Lapps were addicted to the selling of wind or tempests in knotted ropes.

In his The History of Lapland (1674), Joannes W. Scheffer describes Lapp magic,

"The melancholic constitution of the Laplanders, renders them subject to frightful apparitions and dreams, which they look upon as infallible presages made to them by the Genius of what is to befall them. Thus they are frequently seen lying upon the ground asleep, some singing with a full voice, others howling and making a hideous noise not unlike wolves.

"Their superstitions may be imputed partly to their living in solitudes, forests, and among the wild beasts, partly to their solitary way of dwelling separately from the society of others, except who belong to their own families sometimes several leagues distance. Hereafter it may be added, that their daily exercise is hunting, it being observed that this kind of life is apt to draw people into various superstitions, and at last to a correspondence with spirits. For those who lead a solitary life being frequently destitute of human aid, have ofttimes recourse to forbidden means, in hopes to find that aid and help among the spirits, which they cannot find among men; and what encourages them in it is impunity, these things being committed by them, without as much as the fear of any witnesses; which moved Mr. Rheen to allege, among sundry reasons which he gives for the continuance of the impious superstitions of the Laplanders, this for one: because they live among inaccessible mountains, and at a great distance from the conversation of other men. Another reason is the good opinion they constantly entertain of their ancestors, whom they cannot imagine to have been so stupid as not to understand what God they ought to worship, wherefore they judge they should be wanting in their reverence due to them if, by receding from their institutions, they should reprove them of impiety and ignorance.

"The parents are the masters, who instruct their own sons in the magical art. 'Those,' says Tornaeus, 'who have attained to this magical art by instructions receive it either from their parents, or from somebody else, and that by degrees which they put in practice as often as an opportunity offers. Thus they accomplish themselves in this art, especially if the genius leads them to it. For they don't look upon every one as a fit scholar; nay, some are accounted quite incapable of it, notwithstanding they have been sufficiently instructed, as I have been informed by very credible people.' And Joh. Tornaeus confirms it by these words: 'As the Laplanders are naturally of different inclinations, so are they not equally capable of attaining to this art.' And in another passage, they bequeath the demons as part of their inheritance, which is the reason that one family excels the other in this magical art. From whence it is evident, that certain whole families have their own demons, not only differing from the familiar spirits of others, but also quite contrary and opposite to them. Besides this, not only whole families, but also particular persons, have sometimes one, sometimes more spirits belonging to them, to secure them against the designs of other demons, or else to hurt others.

"Olaus Petri Niurenius speaks to this effect, when he says—'They are attended by a certain number of spirits, some by three, others by two, or at least by one. The last is intended for their security, the other to hurt others. The first commands all the rest. Some of those they acquire with a great deal of pains and prayers, some without much trouble, being their attendants from their infancy.' Joh. Tornaeus gives us a very large account of it. 'There are some,' says he, 'who naturally are magicians; an abominable thing indeed. For those who the devil knows will prove very serviceable to him in this art, he seizes on in their very infancy with certain distemper, when they are haunted with apparitions and visions, by which they are, in proportion of their age, instructed in the rudiments of this art. Those who are a second time taken with this distemper, have more apparitions coming before them than in the first, by which they receive much more insight into it than before. But if they are seized a third time with this disease, which then proves very dangerous, and often not without the hazard of their lives, then it is they see all the apparitions the devil is able to contrive, to accomplish them in the magical art. Those are arrived to such a degree of perfection, that without the help of the drum (see infra), they can foretell things to come a great while before; and are so strongly possessed by the devil, that they foresee things even against their will. Thus, not long ago, a certain Laplander, who is still alive, did voluntarily deliver his drum to me, which I had often desired of him before; notwithstanding all this, he told me in a very melancholy posture, that though he had put away his drum, nor intended to have any other hereafter, yet he could foresee everything without it, as he had done before. As an instance of it, he told me truly all the particular accidents that had happened to me in my journey into Lapland, making at the same time heavy complaints, that he did not know what use to make of his eyes, those things being presented to his sight much against his will.'

"Lundius observes, that some of the Laplanders are seized upon by a demon, when they are arrived to a middle age, in the following manner: 'Whilst they are busie in the woods, the spirit appears to them, where they discourse concerning the conditions, upon which the demon offers them his assistance, which done, he teaches them a certain song, which they are obliged to keep in constant remembrance. They must return the next day to the same place, where the same spirit appears to them again, and repeats the former song, in case he takes a fancy to the person; if not, he does not appear at all. These spirits make their appearances under different shapes, some like fishes, some like birds, others like a serpent or dragon, others in the shape of a pigmee, about a yard high; being attended by three, four, or five other pigmees of the same bigness, sometimes by more, but never exceeding nine.'

"No sooner are they seized by the Genius, but they appear in the most surprising posture, like madmen, before bereaved of the use of reason. This continues for six months; during which time they don't suffer any of their kindred to come near them, not so much as their own wives and children. They spend most of this time in the woods and other solitary places, being very melancholy and thoughtful scarce taking any food, which makes them extremely weak. If you ask their children, where and how their parents sustain themselves, they will tell you, that they receive their sustenance from their Genii.

"The same author gives us a remarkable instance of this kind in a young Laplander called Olaus, being then a scholar in the school of Liksala, of about eighteen years of age. This young fellow fell mad on a sudden, making most dreadful postures and outcries, that he was in hell, and his spirit tormented beyond what could be expressed. If he took a book in hand, so soon as he met with the name of Jesus, he threw the book upon the ground in great fury, which after some time being passed over, they used to ask him whether he had seen any vision during this ecstasy? He answered that abundance of things had appeared to him, and that a mad dog being tied to his foot, followed him wherever he stirred. In his lucid intervals he would tell them, that the first beginning of it happened to him one day, as he was going out of the door of his dwelling, when a great flame passed before his eyes and touching his ears, a certain person appeared to him all naked. The next day he was seized with a most terrible headache, so that he made most lamentable outcries, and broke everything that came under his hands. This unfortunate person's face was as black as coal, and he used to say, that the devil most commonly appeared to him in the habit of a minister, in a long cloak; during his fits he would say that he was surrounded by nine or ten fellows of a low stature, who did use him very barbarously, though at the same time the standers-by did not perceive the least thing like it. He would often climb to the top of the highest fir trees, with as much swiftness as a squirrel, and leap down again to the ground, without receiving the least hurt. He always loved solitude, flying the conversation of other men. He would run as swift as a horse, it being impossible for anybody to overtake him. He used to talk amongst the woods to himself no otherwise than if several persons had been in his company.

"I am apt to believe, that those spirits were not altogether unknown to the ancients, and that they are the same which were called by Tertullian Paredri, and are mentioned by Monsieur [Herride] Valois, in his Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius.

"Whenever a Laplander has occasion for his familiar spirit, he calls to him, and makes him come by only singing the song he taught him at their first interview; by which means he has him at his service as often as he pleases. And because they know them obsequious and serviceable, they call them Sveie, which signifies as much in their tongue, as the companions of their labour, or their helpmates. Lundius has made another observation, very well worth taking notice of, viz.:—That those spirits of demons never appear to the women, or enter into their service, of which I don't pretend to allege the true cause, unless one might say, that perhaps they do it out of pride, or a natural aversion they have to the female sex, subject to so many infirmities."

The Magic Drum

For the purposes of augury or divination, the Lapps employed a magic drum, which, indeed, was in use among several Arctic peoples. Writing in 1827, De Capell Brooke states that the ceremonies connected with this instrument had almost quite disappeared at that date. The encroachments of Lutheranism had been long threatening the existence of the native shamanism. In 1671 the Lapp drum was formally banned by Swedish law, and several magicians were apprehended and their instruments burned. But before that date the religion the drum represented was in full vigor.

The Lapps called their drum Kannus (Regnard, 1681), also Kaunus, Kabdas, Kabdes Gabdas, and Keure (Von Duben, 1873), its Scandinavian designations being troll-trumma, or Rune-bomme, "magic or runic drum," otherwise Spa-trumma, "fortune-telling drum." J. A. Friis has shown that the sampo of the Finnish national epic poem Kalevala is the same instrument. According to G. W. von Düben, the best pictures and explanations of the drum are to be found in Lappisk Mythologi (Christiania, 1871) by J. A. Friis (pp. 30–47) but there are good descriptions in G. W. von Düben's own work Om Lappland och Lapparne (Stockholm 1873), as also in the books of Scheffer, Leem, Jessen, and others.

The appearance of the Lapp drum was thus described by Jean François Regnard in 1681,

"This instrument is made of a single piece of wood, hollowed in its thickest part in an oval form, the under part of which is convex, in which they make two apertures long enough to suffer the fingers to pass through, for that purpose of holding it more firmly. The upper part is covered with the skin of the reindeer, on which they paint in red a number of figures, and from whence several brass rings are seen hanging, and some pieces of the bone of the reindeer."

A wooden hammer, or, as among the Samoyeds (1614), a hare's foot, was used as a drumstick in the course of the incantation. An arpa or divining-rod was placed on a definite spot showing from its position after sounding the drum what magic inference might be drawn. By means of the drum, the priest could be placed in sympathy with the spirit world, and was thus enabled to divine the future, to ascertain synchronous events occurring at remote distances, to forecast the measure of success attending the day's hunting, to heal the sick, or to inflict people with disease and cause death. Although long obsolete in Lapland, these rites survived for a long time among the Samoyeds and other races of Arctic Asia and America. It is interesting to note how exactly the procedure described among the Vaigatz Samoyeds in 1556 (Pinkerton's Voyages, London, 1808, I, 63) tallied with the account of the Sakhalin Ainos in 1883 (J. M. Dixon in the Transactions of the Asiatic Society of Japan, Yokohama, 1883, 47). The same practices can be traced eastward through Arctic America, and the drum was used in the same fashion by the Eskimo shaman priests in Greenland (Hinrich Johannes Rink's Tales and Traditions of the Eskimos, 1875, pp. 60–61). The shape of the drum varied a little according to locality. The form of the Eskimo drum was that of a tambourine.

According to J. J. Tornaeus:

"Their most valuable instrument of enchantment is this sorcerer's kettle-drum, which they call Kannas or Quobdas. They cut it in one entire piece out of a thick tree stem, the fibres of which run upwards in the same direction as the course of the sun. The drum is covered with the skin of an animal; and in the bottom holes are cut by which it may be held. Upon the skins are many figures painted, often Christ and the Apostles, with the heathen gods, Thor, Noorjunkar, and others jumbled together; the pictures of the sun, shapes of animals, lands and waters, cities and roads, in short, all kinds of drawings according to their various uses. Upon the drum there is placed an indicator, which they call Arpa, which consists of a bundle of metallic rings. The drumstick is, generally, a reindeer's horn.

"This drum they preserve with the most vigilant care, and guard it especially from the touch of a woman. When they will make known what is taking place at a distance—as to how the chase shall succeed, how business will answer, what result a sickness will have, what is necessary for the cure of it, and the like, they kneel down, and the sorcerer beats the drum; at first with light strokes, but as he proceeds, with ever louder stronger ones, round the index, either till this has moved in a direction or to a figure which he regards as the answer which he has sought, or till he himself falls into ecstasy, when he generally lays the kettle-drum on his head.

"Then he sings with a loud voice a song which they call Jogke, and the men and women who stand round sing songs, which they call Daura, in which the name of the place whence they desire information frequently occurs. The sorcerer lies in the ecstatic state for some time—frequently for many hours, apparently dead, with rigid features; sometimes with perspiration bursting out upon him. In the meantime the bystanders continue their incantations, which have for their object that the sleeper shall not lose any part of his vision from memory; at the same time they guard him carefully that nothing living may touch him—not even a fly. When he again awakes to consciousness, he relates his vision, answers the questions put to him, and gives unmistakable evidence of having seen distant and unknown things."

The inquiry of the oracle does not always take place solemnly and completely. In everyday matters as regards the chase, etc., the Lapp consults his drum without falling into the somnambulic crisis. On the other hand, a more highly developed state of prophetic vision may take place without this instrument, as has already been stated. Claudi relates and incident from Bergen, Norway, concerning the clerk of a German merchant who demanded a Norwegian Finn-Laplander tell him what his master was doing in Germany. The Finn promised to give him the intelligence. He first began to cry out like a drunken man, and to run round in a circle, until he fell, as one dead, to the earth. After a while he woke again, and gave the answer, which time showed to be correct.

Finally, that many Lapp shamans, while wholly awake and free from convulsions, were able to become clairvoyant, is asserted by Tornaeus: "The use which they make of their power of clairvoyance, and their magic arts, is, for the most part, good and innocent; that of curing sick men and animals; inquiring into far-off and future things, which in the confined sphere of their existence is important to them. There are instances however, in which the magic art is turned to the injury of others."

Sources:

Abercromby, John. The Pre- and Proto-historic Finns. 2 vols. N.p., 1898.

Jessen-Schardebøl, E. J. Afhandling om de Norske Finners og Lappers Hedenske Religion. N.p., 1765.

Petitot, Émile. Les Grands Esquimaux. N.p., 1887.

Sioborg, N. H. Tympanum Schamanico-lapponicum. N.p., 1808.

Larcher, Hubert (1921–)

French physician and authority on industrial medicine who was also active in the field of parapsychology. Larcher was born June 26, 1921, in Paris, France. He studied at the University of Grenoble (Licencié en philosophie, 1943) and the University of Paris (M.D., 1951; diploma in industrial hygiene and industrial medicine, 1955). From 1961 onward he was professor of hygiene and safety at Ecole Normale Sociale, Paris. He became a council member of the Institut Métapsychique International.

Larcher took a special interest in paranormal psychophysiology, pathogenesis, and paranormal cures. He studied the relationship between parapsychology, psychic research, and mysticism, and investigated physiological aspects of metamorphosis and survival, as well as such parapsychological phenomena as levitation and psychokinesis. He is the author of Le sang peut-il vaincre la mort? and the editor of Aux frontierès de la science (1957).

Sources:

Larcher, Hubert. "Perspectives parapsychochimiques: La Drogue" (Parapsychochemical Outlook: Narcotics). La Tour St. Jacques 1 (1960).

———. "Prodiges sanguins après la mort" (Wonders of the Blood after Death). Revue Métapsychique (Sept.–Oct. 1953; Nov.–Dec. 1953).

———. "Towards a Science of Healing." Proceedings of Four Conferences on Parapsychological Studies (1957).

———. "Trois cas extraordinaires d'oncorruption de la chair" (Three Remarkable Cases of Lack of Decay of Flesh). Revue Métapsychique (March–April 1954).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

La Salette

La Salette, a mountain in the Alps of southeastern France, was the sight on September 19, 1846, of an apparition of the Virgin Mary to two children, Maximin Gigaud (age 11) and Melanie Matthieu (age 15). The young people were out tending cattle when they fell asleep. Upon awakening, they found that the cattle had wandered off and they went to look for them. Just as they located the cattle, they also saw a light that directed their attention to a spot beside a spring that had some time previously dried up. Then the children saw a woman sitting on a rock and weeping. The woman called the children to her. As they approached, the woman rose and moved to meet them. She appeared suspended in mid-air.

As the children later related the story, the woman was dressed in white. Pearls were on her dress, and roses on her cape. She had a gold apron and a diadem of roses that radiated light. She then gave to the children a lengthy message that reflected upon the present poor harvest and predicted a future famine in the country if the people did not refrain from taking Christ's name in vain and continued to neglect their attendance at Mass.

The children, believing that they had seen a great saint, told the story to the village priest upon their return to town and he preached about it the following Sunday. His sermon tied in the apparition of the Virgin Mary and caused many to return to the spot of the apparition, where they discovered that the spring had suddenly begun to flow. Though skeptics abounded, the predicted crop failures occurred and finally a famine spread during the years 1854–56. Some 250,000 died of starvation and related causes.

In 1851, the children communicated the secret message to Pope Pius IX. While he did not reveal the secrets, he did say that their essence was, "Unless you do penance you shall all perish." The secrets have not subsequently been revealed. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, a number of texts circulated purporting to be the secrets of La Salette. In 1951 the Vatican made a formal statement condemning their various speculations as spurious. However, through La Salette, the history of apparitions of Mary was introduced to the idea of Mary conveying a secret message. Secret messages would also be conveyed at Fatima and Medjugorje, and accompanying several more questionable apparitions.

After official inquiry, La Salette joined the short list of apparitions to which the Roman Catholic Church has given at least a modest approval. A pastoral letter sent out in 1859 to the diocese of Grenoble found the apparition, unique in its being concluded in a singular appearance, worthy of credence. Pilgrims still find their way to the site of the apparition and a variety of healings have been reported. Afterward, Melanie entered the religious life and eventually founded a new order. Over the years she had a number of other visions and she finally wrote a book, The Apparition of the Most Blessed Virgin on the Mountain of La Salette. In the book she revealed the "secret," which caused the book to be placed in the index of forbidden books and further discussion of her secret stopped. Maximin led a very unstable and unhappy life, though on his deathbed he reaffirmed the apparition. Of all of the generally known and approved apparitions, La Salette is possibly the most questionable.

Sources:

Connor, Edward. Recent Apparitions of Our Lady. Fresno, Calif.: Academy Guild Press, n.d.

Delaney, John J. A Woman Clothed with the Sun: Eight Great Appearances of Our Lady in Modern Times. Garden City, N.Y.: Hanover House, 1960.

Kennedy, John S. Light on the Mountain: The Story of LaSalette. New York: McMullen Books, 1953.

O'Reilly, James P. The Story of La Salette. Chicago: J. S. Paluch & Co., 1953.

Lascaris (fl. eighteenth century)

Legendary alchemist about whom limited facts are known. He was commonly supposed to have been active in Germany at the beginning of the eighteenth century, but everything recorded concerning him reads like a romance and suggests the Middle Ages.

According to popular belief, he claimed to be of Oriental origin, a native of the Ionian Isles, and a scion of the Greek royal house of Lascaris, while on other occasions he declared himself to be an archimandrite of a convent in the Island of Mytilene. His reason for coming to Europe was to solicit alms for the ransom of Christian prisoners in the East, but the alchemical achievements credited to him make this purpose unlikely. He began his wanderings in Germany around 1700. While staying in Berlin, Lascaris fell ill and sent for medical aid. It happened that Johann Friedrich Bötticher, the young apothecary who provided medical care, was deeply interested in alchemy. A friendship sprang up between physician and patient, and when Lascaris left the Prussian capital, he gave Bötticher a packet of transmuting powder and instructed him how to use it successfully, although he refrained from telling him how to manufacture the powder itself.

Bötticher set to work speedily, concocted considerable quantities of gold and silver, grew rich, was raised to the peerage, and began to mingle and be courted by kings and nobles, especially for his services as a scientist. The title of baron was conferred on him. When his supply of the precious powder ran short, and being unable to make more, he found his reputation waning rapidly. Because he had spent all his newly acquired wealth, Bötticher found himself reduced to penury. He was placed under house arrest, and when he attempted to escape he was removed to prison. During his detention he was allowed to experiment with chemistry. Bötticher discovered a process for the manufacture of red porcelain, and by the sale of this he eventually restored his fallen fortunes.

Why the alchemist gave the powder to Bötticher is unknown, as is the reason he made an analogous present to someone else at a later date. The second recipient was Schmolz de Dierbach, a lieutenant colonel in the Polish Army. Like the German apothecary, Schmolz succeeded in making a quantity of gold, although no more is known about him after this transmutation. A certain Baron de Creux was likewise favored by Lascaris, the baron's experiments proving just as successful as those of the others.

The alchemist bestowed his transmutatory powder on others as well, such as on Domenico Manuel, the son of a Neopolitan mason. Manuel then wandered through Spain, Belgium, and Austria, performing alchemical operations before princes and noblemen, and reaping wealth accordingly.

Soon Manuel began styling himself Comte Gautano, then Comte di Ruggiero, and in one town he maintained that he was a Prussian major general. Elsewhere he declared that he was field marshal of the Bavarian forces. In Berlin he offered to make gold in the presence of the king, but when he failed, the king had him hanged as a charlatan.

That was in 1709, and in the same year, according to tradition, Lascaris himself performed some successful transmutations before a German politician named Liebknech, a citizen of Wurtembourg. Nothing further was ever heard of the mysterious alchemist, and his generosity had no parallel in the whole history of hermetic philosophy.

Laszlo, Laszlo (1898–1936)

One of the most famous fake mediums of Hungary during the 1920s. He was born in Budapest September 23, 1898, the son of a locksmith. At the age of 13 he was apprenticed to an electrician, by whom he was harshly treated. Laszlo ran away on several occasions but was returned by the police. After three and a half years apprenticeship, he beat up his master before finally leaving him.

Laszlo earned a living as an electrician until 1915, when he joined a Polish Legion of the Austro-German campaign against Russia. He fought at the front for nearly a year but deserted after being wounded. He was court-martialed, then escaped, later serving in a Hungarian unit on the Italian front in 1916. He deserted again when his girlfriend became a prostitute, and, since ordinary employment was barred to him, Laszlo joined a gang of burglars. He supported his girlfriend to keep her off the streets, but when he found that she was still living as a prostitute and even keeping pimps, he began to drink heavily and attempted suicide. He was arrested and imprisoned until October 1918, when the revolution in Hungary decreed a general amnesty.

After that, he continued his criminal activities, taking refuge from the police in southeast Hungary, where he became involved with an anti-Communist plot. Arrested and sentenced to be shot, Laszlo was freed by anti-Communists. He fought against Romanians until captured and taken to the death camp of Jassy, where he was beaten and starved for three months before he escaped.

Laszlo returned to Budapest, hoping that his criminal record had been lost in archives' burnings. According to his own account, he took a succession of jobs as actor, film extra, variety artist, playwright, painter, and electrical technician. The performance of a music hall hypnotist led him to become interested in Spiritualism and occultism.

With his background and emotional instability, it was a fatal mixture. Influenced by Laszlo's séances, several young men committed suicide in order to journey to the "Great Beyond." In 1920 Laszlo fell off a tram, and during two weeks in a hospital met a girl with whom he fell deeply in love. After recovery, he telephoned her, demanding that they become engaged, and when she refused him, he shot himself in the telephone booth. Back in the hospital, he fell in love with another girl, with whom he later formed a suicide pact. In a somewhat confused scene with a gun, the girl died, while Laszlo was only wounded. He was arrested for homicide.

The police astonishingly agreed to hold a Spiritualist séance at their headquarters with Laszlo as medium, during the course of which Laszlo claimed that he was the victim of an evil entity from the thirteenth century who desired to use psychic force to destroy victims. Laszlo was released, but he later claimed the séance to be a fake.

He then became a journalist on a Budapest newspaper, publishing articles about occultism and Spiritualism. Through them Laszlo was introduced to William Torday, president of the Hungarian Metapsychical Society. Torday and his colleagues believed that Laszlo had brilliant occult talents and persuaded him to sign an exclusive contract with them for séances. Laszlo duly produced fake spirit heads and hands and built up a reputation as a great medium.

After reading a classic work on materialization by famed psychic researcher Baron Schrenck-Notzing, Laszlo deliberately contrived to fake such effects in order to deceive the baron. The materials used by Laszlo for fake ectoplasm were gauze and cottonwool soaked in goose fat. These props were hidden in the furniture in the séance room, and when this became impossible through strict controls, Laszlo was impudently adroit in slipping his props into the pockets of his investigators when he was searched, then picking their pockets during the séance! It is not known whether Schrenck-Notzing was actually deceived, but many prominent psychic researchers were.

Laszlo was exposed in his fraud by Eugene Schenck, a music-hall hypnotist and stage clairvoyant. Anticipating publicity for his tricks, Laszlo himself admitted fraud at a public lecture and even reveled in them. In the aftermath of the scandal, Torday was discredited as a psychic researcher, and 67 of the 70 members of the Hungarian Metapsychical Society resigned. According to Laszlo, he was then visited by two young men who were members of a Spiritualist circle. They said they had received a spirit message that Laszlo should retract his confession of fraud or be killed. Laszlo accordingly drew up a public statement that his materialization phenomena were genuine, and he undertook not to combat Spiritualism in any way. This melodramatic episode may also be of Laszlo's invention. The story of Laszlo can be compared with that of the famous British fake medium William Roy, who was equally shameless.

Laszlo resumed his everyday work as an electrician, and in due course became a criminal again. Ten years later he was arrested for burglary and housebreaking. Before the hearing could be completed, he died of a lung hemorrhage in 1936.

Sources:

Tabori, Cornelius. My Occult Diary. London, 1951.

Tabori, Paul. Companions of the Unseen. London, 1968.

Latihan

A spiritual exercise that is a basic feature of the Subud movement (the term is Indonesian). The object of the latihan is worship of God. In a state of submission, contact is said to be made with the divine life force, resulting in a process of regeneration.

In principle the latihan can be practiced individually, but usually a number of individuals gather together for this purpose. The preliminary stages of the latihan are characterized by marked physical reactions. Urges to cry, weep, dance, or speak in tongues occur, but these may be stopped if need be. No particular stress is laid on such manifestations, but they are said to cause a release of tension that culminates in a state of inner quietude, in which communion with God takes place. All this is believed to have a strong resemblance to what is supposed to have occurred at the original Pentecostal scene.

In contrast to other spiritual movements and sects involving Pentecostal phenomena, there are no anticipatory stimulating speeches, music, ceremonies, or rituals; the ecstatic state emerges spontaneously. The cathartic quality of the latihan is said to manifest in a gradual integration of the entire being. In conjunction with the latihan, the problems of members are "tested," and answers are received in a state of inner receptivity.

The characteristic physical features of the latihan compare with the spiritual exercises of earlier religious movements such as the Shakers. The backwoods revivalists of Kentucky and Tennessee in the early nineteenth century often acted out "the jerks," similar to the physical convulsions of the early Methodists in Britain, who sometimes jumped and danced until they became insensible. In Hindu yoga practice, the onset of kundalini, or divine force, is also accompanied by jerking and twitching in the body.

Sources:

Van Hien, Gordon. What is Subud? London: Rider, 1963. Revised, 1968.

Laurel

A tree that Lucius Apuleius (ca. 126–173 B.C.E.) classed as among the plants which preserve men from the influence of evil spirits. It was also believed to give protection from lightning. The laurel was regarded as sacred to Apollo, and it was associated with purifying, since Apollo was the great purifier. An evergreen, it was a symbol of immortality; its intoxicating properties associated it with prophetic and poetic inspiration. The Pythian priestess at Delphi in Greece used to chew laurel leaves to enhance oracular powers. The laurel also symbolized victory and peace. The victors in the Pythian games were crowned with laurel. Roman generals sent news of their victories in messages wrapped in laurel leaves, delivered to the Senate.

"Laurin" (or "Der Kleine Rosengarten")

A Tyrolese romance of the late thirteenth century, attached to the saga-cycle of Dietrich of Bern. Laurin, a dwarf, possessed a magic rose-garden into which no one could enter without losing a hand or a foot. Dietrich and his follower Witege entered the garden, and Witege rode through the rose bushes. Laurin appeared on horseback and dismounted Witege. He was challenged by Dietrich and, because he wore his cloak of invisibility, Laurin wounded him.

Dietrich then persuaded him to try a wrestling match, during which he wrenched off Laurin's belt, the source of his superhuman strength. Thus Dietrich overthrew Laurin. Laurin invited Dietrich and his followers to his mountain home, prepared a banquet for them, made them tipsy, and threw them all into a dungeon. They were eventually released by Künhild, a mortal woman, who also returned their weapons. They took Laurin prisoner and carried him to Bern, where he converted to Christianity and received Künhild in marriage.

Sources:

MacDowall, M. W. Epics and Romances of the Middle Ages. London: S. Sonnenschein, 1896.

LaVey, Anton (1930–1997)

Founder and high priest of the Church of Satan. Howard Anton Szandor LaVey was born in Chicago on April 11, 1930. As a youth he became interested in magic and the occult. Shortly after World War II, he dropped out of high school and joined the circus, where he trained the big cats and learned stage magic.

In the early 1960s he married his second wife, Diane Hegarty, and they organized late-evening occult meetings, from which the idea for the Church of Satan, and its original members, emerged. The church was formally founded on April 30, 1966. LaVey, with years of performing behind him, brought a flare for the dramatic to his leadership. He shaved his head and donned black ritual garb to announce the first year of "Satan's era." During the first year he conducted the first satanic wedding and funeral, each with a cadre of media representatives present, and played the part of the Devil in the movie version of Rosemary's Baby. In 1969 he completed The Satanic Bible, in which the beliefs and basic rituals of the church are presented. The book has remained in print and its ideas are expanded on in two subsequent volumes, The Compleat Witch (1970) and The Satanic Rituals (1972).

LaVey had a most secularized image of Satan and Satanism. On the one hand he saw the power of the image of Satan to invoke fear in Christians and the hold the image retained even over those who had left their Christian beliefs behind. He saw the value that a focus on Satan could have in freeing people from their Christian pasts and turning them into autonomous, modern people. Thus rituals were designed not so much as a means of worshiping or invoking Satan, but as a way of affirming the self and unleashing what LaVey saw as natural human drives (such as for sex and pleasure) that had been suppressed by a culture that branded them as evil. At the same time, the church was particularly vocal about members being involved in anything that suggested they were breaking the law under the guise of following their religion.

LaVey's support was weakened by the defection of many members in the early 1970s who believed in a more literal existence of Satan and were attempting to find a more traditional Satanism. Since that time, LaVey assumed a much lower profile and the church tended to avoid publicity. Its high level of fame, including regular attacks from Christian ministers, supplied it with a steady stream of prospective members. LaVey died on October 29, 1997 of a heart attack in San Francisco, California. Since his death, Blanche Barton has taken over LaVey's Church of Satan.

Sources:

Barton, Blanche. The Secret Life of a Satanist: The Authorized Biography of Anton LaVey. Los Angeles: Feral House, 1990.

Harrington, Will. "The Devil in Anton LaVey." The Washington Post Magazine (February 23, 1986): 6–9, 12–17.

LaVey, Anton. The Compleat Witch. New York: Lancer Books, 1971.

———. The Satanic Bible. New York: Avon Books, 1969.

———. The Satanic Rituals. Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1972.

Wolfe, Burton H. The Devil's Avenger. New York: Avon Books, 1974.

La Voisin (?–1680)

La Voisin, the center of a black magic ring in the court of King Louis XIV of France, was a fortune-teller in Paris in the 1670s. She was the nexus of an international business dealing in poison that reached to Italy and Spain. Her given name was Catherine Deshayes, her common appellation being derived from the name of her late husband, M. Montvoisin. Before he died, she bore him a daughter. La Voisin described her specialties as chiromancy (palmistry) and physiognomy.

In January of 1673, the Paris police began an investigation that grew out of the charges of several priests that some of the people they had encountered in the confessional booth had spoken to them of using poisons to deal with unfaithful (or unwanted) spouses. The investigation led to the discovery of the trade in poisons, the arrest of a number of dealers, and the discovery of a large cache of their stock. It also led to a fortune-teller named Marie Bosse who made the mistake of selling some poison to an undercover police officer. Under intense questioning, Bosse began to implicate members of the French nobility. Based on her accusations, the king authorized a star chambre court that was set in secret and from which there was no appeal. After the star chambre was established, La Voisin was among the first people detained. She was arrested as she left church services one morning in March of 1679.

As the story was revealed, for some years La Voisin had been a distributor of magical potions and poisons to a large clientele. She had an extensive network of associates and had been able to place young girls among the ladies-in-waiting at the royal court. She handled a wide variety of problems, including the abortion of unwanted fetuses. She also provided magical services for women having love problems.

The most extreme service provided by La Voisin was the facilitating contact with several priests who, for a fee, would perform a black mass (the first mention of such occurrences for which there is a substantial record). According to later testimony from Fr. Guibourg, one of La Voisin's associates, no less a personage than Mademoiselle des Oeillets, Louis' mistress, came to him to have a mass said for her to retain the king's favor. He also confessed to having killed several babies during masses for another high-ranking lady. Also implicated in the records was Madame de Montespan, a former mistress who appears to have tried to poison the king and his current mistress.

Following her arrest and that of several associates, La Voisin confessed to a variety of crimes, but to nothing that would have earned her the death penalty. Her accusers focused upon a number of illegal abortions she reputedly performed. After being held a year, she was subjected to three days of intense torture during which her legs were systematically crushed. Still she did not confess. However, in the end she was condemned to death and burned alive on February 22, 1680. At the time of her death, her involvement in the black masses had not yet been uncovered, but multiple accounts of these events, including the testimony of her daughter, were later attained.

After many years of stories circulating throughout Europe of witches, Satanists, and black masses, largely believed to have been created by the imaginations of Inquisitors, the case of La Voisin appears to have been the first real case of events that began to conform to the rumors. It would, of course, not be the last, though rumors of satanic activity continue to far exceed reliable reports.

Sources:

Rhodes, Henry Taylor Fowkes. The Satanic Mass. New York: Citadel Press, 1955.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1970.

Lavritch, Sophie Bentkowski (1905–)

Editor and writer on parapsychological subjects. She was born on May 8, 1905, in St. Petersburg, Russia, and studied at the University of Paris Law School (Licencié en droit, 1926). She was editorial director of the journal Initiation et Science, and from 1945 to 1946 was welfare officer at the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

Lavritch described her experimental studies in clairvoyance in the article "La Voyance: Ses limites et ses erreurs" (Clairvoyance: Its limits and errors) in Initiation et Science (no. 49). She wrote under the names of Sophie Bentkowski, Sonia Bentkowski-Lavritch, and Sophie de Trabeck.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Law, William (1686–1761)

English mystic and theologian. William Law was born in 1686, at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, England. His father, a grocer, managed to send William to Cambridge University in 1705. Entering Emmanuel College, he became a fellow in 1712, but on the accession of George I in 1714, felt himself unable to subscribe to the oath of allegiance. As a result, Law forfeited his fellowship.

In 1727 he went to Putney to tutor the father of Edward Gibbon, the historian of the Roman Empire. He held this post for 10 years, winning universal esteem for his piety and theological erudition.

When his employer died in 1737, Law retired to his native village of King's Cliffe and was chiefly supported by some of his devotees, notably Hester Gibbon, sister of his guardian pupil, and the widow Mrs. Hutcheson. The two women had a united income of fully 3,000 pounds a year, so Law must have been comfortable, and wealth and luxury did not corrupt him. It is recorded that he rose every morning at five and spent several hours before breakfast in prayer and meditations.

Early in his career, Law began publishing theses on mysticism and on religion in general. After he retired, he acquired fresh inspiration from reading the works of Jakob Boehme, of which he was an enthusiastic admirer, and produced year after year a considerable mass of writing until his death April 9, 1761.

Law's works comprise some 20 volumes. In 1717 he published an examination of the recent tenets of the bishop of Bangor, which were followed soon after by a number of analogous writings. In 1726 his attack on the theater was published as The Absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage Entertainment Fully Demonstrated. In the same year he issued A Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection, followed shortly thereafter by A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, Adapted to the State and Condition of All Orders of Christians (1728), considered his best-known work.

Other well-regarded works include: The Grounds and Reason of Christian Regeneration (1739), The Spirit of Prayer (1749), The Way to Divine Knowledge (1752), The Spirit of Love (1752), and Of Justification by Faith and Works (1760).

Most of Law's books, especially A Serious Call, have been reprinted again and again, and a collected edition of Law's works appeared in 1762, a year after his death. In 1893 an anthology was brought out by Dr. Alexander Whyte. In his preface Whyte spoke of Law's "golden books," declaring that "in sheer intellectual strength Law is fully abreast of the very foremost of his illustrious contemporaries, while in that fertilising touch which is the true test of genius, Law stands simply alone."

Sources:

Law, William. The Absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage Entertainment Fully Demonstrated. Reprint, New York: Garland Publishing, 1973.

———. The Grounds and Reason of Christian Regeneration. Philadelphia: Andrew Bradford, 1741.

———. A Practical Treatise upon Christian Perfection. Newcastle upon Tyne: J. Gooding, 1743.

———. A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, Adapted to the State and Condition of All Orders of Christians. London: W. Innys, 1732.

———. The Spirit of Love. London: W. Innys and J. Richardson, 1752.

———. The Spirit of Prayer. London: W. Innys, 1750.

———. The Works. Brockenhurst: G. Moreton, 1892–93.

Rudolph, Erwin Paul. William Law. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Lawrence Museum of Magic and Witchcraft

Situated in Galveston, about 50 miles north of Indianapolis, Indiana. It contained Aleister Crowley's salt and water set, authentic implements from Gerald Gardner, and magical and psychic artifacts from the ancient Aztec and modern civilizations. Last known address: Merlin and Moonstone, P.O. Box 219, Galveston, IN 46932.

Lawton, George (1900–1957)

Psychologist, gerontologist, lecturer, and writer on Spiritualism. He was born on June 22, 1900, in New York City, took all his degrees from Columbia University (B.A., 1922; M.A., 1926; Ph.D., 1936), and entered private practice as a psychologist beginning in 1936. He authored several books, the most important being The Drama of Life after Death (1932), concerned with the psychological motivations behind Spiritualism. Lawton died October 9, 1957.

Sources:

Lawton, George. The Drama of Life after Death. New York: H. Holt, 1932.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Laya Yoga

That form of yoga in which the yogi listens to sounds that can be heard within his own body when the ears are closed. These sounds, termed Nada, are of various kinds, ranging from the roar of the ocean to the humming of bees. Variations on laya yoga have become central to the Radhasoami groups in the Pubjab and to its North American derivatives such as the Diving Life Mission (now Elan Vital) and ECKANKAR.

Lazare, Denys (ca. 622 C.E.)

A prince of Serbia said to have lived in the year of the Hegira (flight of Mohammed from Mecca), i.e. in 622 C.E. He was author of a work entitled Dreams, published over a millennia later in 1686. He himself claimed to have had nocturnal visions.

"Lazaris"

The name of the nonphysical entity channeled by Jach Pursel. Pursel first became aware of this entity in the 1970s when on a business trip as part of the accelerated executive program with State Farm Insurance. He reportedly had a visionary experience while meditating, and the "Lazaris" entity manifested. Later Pursel began channeling "Lazaris" to his wife Peny and eventually to groups of friends and to individuals seeking guidance in life.

Since forming the home-based organization Concept Synergy, Pursel has channeled "Lazaris" to as many as 850 people in afternoon and weekend programs with visitors from Australia, Argentina, Switzerland, and Hong Kong. Pursel has traveled throughout North America, and "Lazaris" has been consulted by celebrities such as Shirley MacLaine, Michael York, and others.

"Lazaris" manifests without exotic settings of New Age incense, robes, and candles. Pursel simply sits on a chair, goes into trance, and the "Lazaris" speeches begin. Concept Synergy, which publishes and distributes audio and videotapes of "Lazaris," may be contacted at P.O. Box 3285, Palm Beach, FL 33480-3285.

Sources:

Martin, Katherine. "The Voice of Lazaris." New Realities 7, no. 6 (July/August 1987).

Pursel, Jach. Lazaris Interviews. 2 vols. Beverly Hills, Calif.: Concept Synergy, 1988.

———. Lazaris: The Sacred Journey; You and Your Higher Self. Beverly Hills, Calif.: Concept Synergy, 1987.

Leadbeater, C(harles) W(ebster) (1854–1934)

British clergyman, occultist, and author who played a prominent part in the Theosophical Society. Leadbeater was born February 16, 1854. While a curate in the Church of England in Hampshire, he became interested in Theosophy and eventually left the Church. In 1884 he moved to Adyar, the headquarters of the Theosophical Society near Madras, India. He devoted himself to the cause of Theosophy and the related Liberal Catholic Church for the rest of his life.

He traveled in Ceylon with Henry S. Olcott, one of the founders of Theosophy, and publicly professed himself to be a Buddhist. He returned to England in 1890 and became a tutor. After the death of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky in 1891, Leadbeater wielded considerable influence over Annie Besant, Blavatsky's successor, in part due to his reputed clairvoyant abilities.

Leadbeater's homosexuality became a matter of ongoing embarrassment to Besant and the society. In 1906 several mothers in the United States brought charges against Leadbeater for immoral practices with their sons. Besant found it impossible to accept these charges, so the mothers appealed to Olcott, then in London, and a judicial committee of the society summoned Leadbeater to appear before them. In the face of clear evidence, Leadbeater was obliged to resign from the society. However, after Olcott's death, the Leadbeater scandal took a bizarre turn. In an Open Letter, Weller van Hook, General Secretary of the American Section, vigorously defended Leadbeater's sex theories on the upbringing of young boys and even claimed that this defense was dictated to him by a Theosophical Master, or Mahatma. Leadbeater had initially designated van Hook's son as the new World Savior and believed that he was due to appear in the immediate future.

In July 1908 the British Convention of the society carried a resolution to the president and general council requesting that Leadbeater and his practices be repudiated. The council did not agree and "saw no reason why Mr. Leadbeater should not be restored to membership." This action prompted some 700 members (including the scholar G. R. S. Mead) to resign. Leadbeater then rejoined the society, settled in Madras, and for several years exerted powerful influence over the Indian section, emphasizing clairvoyant teachings and an exalted lineage of reincarnation. During World War I he entered the newly formed Liberal Catholic Church and wrote many of the church's basic texts.

In 1908 Leadbeater switched allegiance and designated a young Brahmin boy, Jiddu Krishnamurti, as the future World Teacher, or Messiah. Besant saw to Krishnamurti's education and later founded the Order of the Star in the East to propagate his mission. After a decade of work, during which the society saw its greatest expansion and membership growth, Krishnamurti publicly renounced his messianic role in 1929, dissolved the order, and dropped his connections with Theosophy. He became an independent Indian spiritual teacher and taught all over the world.

The reemergence of the charges of active homosexuality with minor boys forced Leadbeater out of India. He moved to Australia, where he was living when Bishop James I. Wedgewood made his initial world tour establishing the Liberal Catholic Church. Wedgewood consecrated Leadbeater as bishop of Australia of the Liberal Catholic Church. Leadbeater remained in Australia, though at a distance from the local Theosophists, for the rest of his life. He died February 29, 1934. Long after his death, Leadbeater remains a controversial figure. A comprehensive biography, The Elder Brother: A Biography of Charles Webster Leadbeater, was published in 1982 by Gregory Tillett.

Leadbeater wrote numerous books, many of which became popular theosophical texts that are frequently reprinted.

Sources:

Leadbeater, C. W. The Hidden Side of Christian Festivals. Los Angeles: St. Alban Press, 1920.

———. The Hidden Side of Things. 1913. Reprint, London: 1968. Abridged reprint, Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1974.

———. Man Visible and Invisible. Reprint, London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1920.

———. The Masters and the Path. Chicago: Theosophical Press, 1925.

———. Outline of Theosophy. Chicago: Theosophical Book Concern, 1903.

———. The Science of the Sacraments. Los Angeles: St. Alban Press, 1920.

———, and Besant, Annie. Light on the Path. N.p., 1926.

———. The Lives of Alcyone: A Clairvoyant Investigation. 2 vols. N.p., 1924.

———. Man, Whence, How, and Whither. 1913. Reprint, Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Press, n.d.

———. Occult Chemistry, Clairvoyant Observations. N.p., 1919.

———. Talks on the Path of Occultism. Vol. 1: At the Feet of the Master. 1926. Vol. 2: The Voice of the Silence. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1947.

———. Thought-Forms: A Record of Clairvoyant Investigation. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1948.
Melton, J. Gordon. Religious Leaders of America. Detroit: Gale Research, 1991.
Tillett, Gregory. The Elder Brother: A Biography of Charles Webster Leadbeater. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1982.

Leading Edge: A Bulletin of Social Transformation

Newsletter edited and published every three weeks by Marilyn Ferguson, author of the New Age book The Aquarian Conspiracy (1980). The format of the newsletter was similar to Brain/Mind Bulletin (also edited and published by Ferguson), but The Leading Edge focused on social aspects of the New Age (politics, relationships, business, schools, law, arts, religion) and other topics related to The Aquarian Conspiracy. The Leading Edge complemented the materials in Brain/Mind Bulletin, which covered such topics as learning, medicine, psychology, psychiatry, and right and left brain research. Last known address: P.O. Box 42247, Los Angeles, CA 90042.

Sources:

Ferguson, Marilyn. The Aquarian Conspiracy. Los Angeles: J. B. Tarcher, 1980.

Leading Edge Journal

British newsstand periodical dealing with the broad range of New Age and esoteric topics. Last known address: Runnings Park, Croft Bank, West Malvern, Worcestershire, WR14 4BP, England.

Leaf, Horace (ca. 1886–1971)

Well-known British lecturer and author in the cause of Spiritualism and psychic research. His own psychic abilities included clairvoyance, psychometry, and healing. Leaf traveled extensively, meeting most of the important mediums in North America and regularly contributing articles to such Spiritualist journals as Light.

He was well known to the pioneer Spiritualist James Hewat McKenzie, whom he met at the beginning of the twentieth century while a member of a debating society in North London, which discussed philosophical, political, social, and religious topics. Soon after McKenzie established the British College of Psychic Science in London, Leaf became a staff lecturer on psychology and the development of mediumship.

Sources:

Leaf, Horace. Ahmed's Daughter. N.p., 1933.
———. Death Cannot Kill. N.p., 1967.
———. Psychology and Development of Mediumship. London: Rider, 1923.
———. Under the Southern Cross. N.p., 1923.
———. What is this Spiritualism? New York: G. H. Doran, 1919.
———. What Mediumship Is. London: Psychic Press, 1938.

Leaf, Walter (1852–1927)

Classical scholar, banker, and pioneer of psychical research in Britain. He was born November 28, 1852, in London, England, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A., 1874; M.A., 1877). Leaf became a successful banker and retained an amateur interest in classical studies. His banking leadership was acknowledged by his being elected president of the Institute of Bankers (1919–21) and later president of the International Chambers of Commerce (1924–26). He was also president of the Hellenic Society (1914–19), president of the Classical Association (1921), and an honorary fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Leaf was also an active member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, and served a tenure on the council (1889–1902). He took part in the SPR sittings with the medium Leonora Piper in 1889–90 and frequently contributed to the Journal and the Proceedings of the SPR. He died March 8, 1927.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.
Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Leanan Sidhe

Also "lhaiannan sidhe," Gaelic words for "fairy sweetheart" either male or female. According to one tradition, mortals are advised to have nothing to do with such beings, as no good ever comes of the connection. So long as the fairy lover is pleased with his or her mortal, all goes well, but when offended, life may be the forfeit.

In Ireland the fairy mistress has sometimes been considered the spirit of life, inspiring poets and singers but making their lives short through their all-consuming burning vision. Another tradition regards the leanan sidhe of a man as more like a vampire or succubus. (See also genius)

Sources:

Arrowsmith, Nancy, and George Moore. A Field Guide to the Little People. New York: Wallaby, 1978.
Briggs, Katherine M. An Encyclopedia of Fairies, Hobgoblins, Brownies, Bogies, and Other Supernatural Creatures. New York: Pantheon Books, 1976.

Leary, Timothy (1920–1996)

With Dr. Richard Alpert, Leary became a controversial figure in the psychedelic revolution of the 1960s. He was born October 22, 1920, in Springfield, Massachusetts. He attended Holy Cross College (1938–39), the U.S. Military Academy (1940–41), the University of Alabama (A.B., 1943), Washington State University (1946), and the University of California at Berkeley (Ph.D. in psychology, 1950).

He was an assistant professor at the University of California at Berkeley (1950–55), director of psychological research at the Kaiser Foundation, Oakland, California (1955–58), and a lecturer in psychology at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1959–63). After leaving Harvard Leary became the head and first guide of the League of Spiritual Discovery, which was based at a mansion in Millwood, New York.

Leary and Alpert were both dismissed from Harvard for their experiments with psilocybin (later revealed to have been funded by the U.S. government). They engaged in widespread psychedelic experiments and emerged as advocates for the use of LSD and other such drugs to produce altered states of consciousness, and to treat alcoholism, schizophrenia, and other psychophysiological disorders. Together they launched the psychedelic revolution that in less than a decade impacted an entire generation.

The belief that mystical experience could be obtained from mind-altering drugs came from Leary's and Alpert's experiences as well as from the suggestion made a decade earlier in Aldous Huxley's book The Doors of Perception (1954), which described the sacramental use of peyote by certain North American Indians.

Having exhausted the drug experience by 1967, Alpert went to India in search of more substantial spirituality and experienced a major transformation. He discovered a guru in the Himalayas and returned to the United States as Baba Ram Dass. His transformation became a parable of the emerging New Age movement, and he is a popular teacher of Hinduism and New Age values. Leary had gone to India in 1965 and converted to Hinduism and added a spiritual dimension to his psychedelic activities. After Alpert had left the United States, Leary continued to advocate the psychedelic revolution. His publications during this time reflect his efforts to provide information and instruction on the use of hallucinogens and, influenced by Eastern philosophies and religious texts, reveals Leary's emphasis on the spiritual possibilities of psychedelics. In 1964, Leary, along with Richard Alpert and Ralph Metzner, published The Psychedelic Experience: A Manual Based on the Tibetan Book of the Dead. This book relates the death and rebirth cycle experienced through psychedelic drugs to the ancient Buddhist text that prepares followers for the after-death experience.

Various brushes with the law on drug charges resulted in Leary receiving sentences of 10 years imprisonment by a federal judge in Houston on January 21, 1970, and another ten years in Santa Ana, California, on March 22, 1970, both charges involving marijuana offenses. He began serving his sentence at the California Men's Colony West in San Luis Obispo, but escaped in September 1970 and later surfaced in Lebanon. He settled in Switzerland for a time but later returned to the United States and served his sentence at Folsom Prison in California. The 10-year jail sentence in 1970 resulted from possession of less than half an ounce of marijuana, which had a street value of ten dollars. His 42-month imprisonment (29 months in solitary confinement) seemed to reflect mainstream opinion about the psychedelic revolution initiated by Leary and his associates.

Leary's case was reviewed in the mid-1970s, and in March 1975 he was paroled but immediately began serving another sentence. Leary was finally released April 21, 1976. Separated from his wife, Rosemary, in 1971, he married his fourth wife, Barbara, after being released from jail.

Over the next 10 years Leary continued to be in the public eye as a trendsetter in ideas. He lectured widely, though he no longer advocated the psychedelic revolution or drug taking. In September 1976 he spoke to 3,000 students at Princeton University on a scientific approach to self-development. In his book Exo-Psychology (1977), he suggested that human beings could evolve into pure, intelligent, disembodied energy. Other lecture topics include Skylab/space shuttle activities and efforts to increase human intelligence and life-span, summed up in the acronym SMILE (Space Migration, Increased Intelligence, Life Extension). He founded an organization named Starseed, a cooperative to colonize space.

In 1982 Leary toured on a debate circuit with convicted Watergate conspirator G. Gordon Liddy, who participated in a 1966 raid on Leary's Millbrook drug community. In the 1990s Leary had taken on a role as a futurist guru, advocating ways to stimulate human development and intelligence. He had popularized the concept of SKPI (Super Knowledge, Processing Interaction), using computers as mind-expanding tools. Although Leary refrained from advocating mind-expanding drugs, he expressed no regrets for his part in the psychedelic revolution.

A comprehensive assessment of Leary, his kaleidoscopic career and philosophies, and the views of other commentators can be found in Contemporary Authors (Vol. 107, 1983). In addition to Leary's own biographical works, see also Psychedelic Drugs, Hallucinogens, and Mushrooms. Leary died of cancer on May 31, 1996 in Beverly Hills, California.

Sources:

Kleps, Art. Millbrook: The True Story of the Early Years of the Psychedelic Revolution. Oakland, Calif.: Bench Press, 1977.

Leary, Timothy. Changing My Mind among Others: Lifetime Writings. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1982.

———. Flashbacks. Los Angeles: Jeremy P. Tarcher, 1983.

———. High Priest. New York: World Publishing, 1968.

———. The Politics of Ecstasy. New York: G. P. Putnam's, 1968.

———. The Psychedelic Experience. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

———. Psychedelic Prayers after the Tao te ching. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1966.

Leary, Timothy, Robert Wilson, and George A. Koopman. Neuropolitics: The Sociobiology of Human Metamorphosis. Los Angeles: Starseed/Peace Press, 1977.

Slack, Charles W. Timothy Leary, the Madness of the Sixties, and Me. New York: Peter H. Wyden, 1974.

Le Brun, Charles (1619–1690)

A celebrated French painter born in Paris, February 24, 1619. When only 15 years old, he received commissions from Cardinal Richelieu, and his paintings were also praised by Poussin. Le Brun was a founder of the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture (1648) and the Academy of France at Rome (1666). He also was director of the Gobelins, a famous school for the manufacture of tapestries and royal furniture. Le Brun's treatise on physiognomy, Traité sur la physionomie humaine comparée avec celle des aminaux, was written at a time when the subject was considered to be an occult science. In this book Le Brun executed remarkable drawings comparing human and animal faces, a theme later developed with reference to the emotions by Charles Darwin in his book The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals (1872 etc.). Le Brun died February 22, 1690.

Lebrun, Pierre (1661–1729)

French theologian born at Brignolles. He published a book on the divining-rod, Lettres qui découvrent l'illusion des philosophes sur la Baguette et qui détruisent leurs systèmes (1693), and a work on occult curiosities and popular beliefs, Histoire critique des pratiques superstitieuses qui ont séduit les peuples et embarrassé les savants (1702).

Lecanomancy

A branch of crystalomancy (divination by water). One method was to toss an object into a full container of water and interpret either the image formed by it or else the sound it made striking the water. Another more complex method involved placing water in a silver vase on a clear, moonlit night. The light from a candle would be reflected onto the water by the blade of a knife and the inquirer would concentrate on the image formed in the water. (See also pegomancy)

Lecour, Paul (1871–1954)

French government official and writer on psychic research. Born on April 5, 1871, at Blois, France, he was a tax collector and head of the department of the French Ministry of Public Works from 1896 to 1934. In 1926 he organized the Society for Atlantean Studies at the Sorbonne, which issued the journal Atlantis beginning in 1927. He was present at sittings with the famous physical medium Eva C. (Marthe Beraud), and his own photographs of her reputed ectoplasm phenomena were reproduced in Annales des Sciences Psychique (No. 1, 1919). He died February 5, 1954.

Sources:

Lecour, Paul. Hellénisme et Christianisme (Hellenism and Christianity). Bordeaux: Editions Bierre, 1943.

———. Ma Vie mystique (My mystical life). N.p., n.d.

———. Saint Paul et les mystères Chrétiens (St. Paul and the Christian mysteries). N.p., n.d.

———. Le Septième sens (The Seventh sense). N.p., n.d.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

LeCron, Leslie M. (1892–1972)

Psychologist, expert on hypnotism, and author on parapsychological topics. He was born on October 27, 1892, at Minneapolis, Minnesota, and studied at the University of Colorado (B.A., 1916). He entered into private practice as a psychologist and became a member of the Society for Clinical and Experimental Hypnosis and the Academy of Psychosomatic Medicine. Lecron was an honorary member and a consultant of the Los Angeles Society for Psychic Research. He died April 1972.

Sources:

Cheek, David B., and Leslie M. LeCron. Clinical Hypnotherapy. New York: Grine & Stratton, 1968.

LeCron, Leslie M. Experimental Hypnosis. New York: Macmillan, 1952.

———. "The Paranormal in Hypnosis." Tomorrow magazine (spring 1955).

———. Self-Hypnosis: The Technique and Its Daily Use in Daily Living. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1964.

———. Techniques of Hypnotherapy. New York: Julian Press, 1962.

LeCron, Leslie M., and Jean Bordeaux. Hypnotism Today. New York: Grune & Stratton, 1964.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lectorium Rosicrucianum

The Lectorium Rosicrucianum, the largest of the European-based Rosicrucian groups, was founded in the Netherlands in 1924 by former members of the Rosicrucian Fellowship, under the leadership of Jan Van Rijckenborgh and Catharose de Petri (both pen names). The organization grew very slowly and was forced to disband during the German occupation of Holland. It revived after the war, however, and has since spread throughout Europe and into North America, Africa, South America, New Zealand, and Australia.

The order views itself as gnostic (from the Greek word gnosis, or knowledge) and is organized as a gnostic school. Following ancient gnostic learning, the order teaches that wisdom comes from the Word, the divine source of all that exists. Members follow a path of transfiguration, or return to the gnosis, for humankind is presently in a fallen state, from which it needs reawakening. Within each person is a rose of the heart, a spirit-speak atom, which can ascend to the divine. This process is aided by those who have already found knowledge, the Universal Brotherhood. The school transmits the light of the Universal Brotherhood to the members, thus allowing them to break the chain of reincarnation (death and rebirth) and begin the process of return to the divine.

The Lectorium Rosicrucianum is unique in its espousal of the concept of two nature orders. Humans are born into this nature order, the seventh cosmic region, that is, the world of nature. Humans also carry a remnant of their origin in the sixth cosmic region, where they exist as an immortal seed. Their purpose on Earth is to cooperate with the blossoming of the rose of the heart, the Christ principle within, in the process of transfiguration and return.

From their headquarters in Holland, the order has initiated an extensive translation and publishing program in English, German, French, Portuguese, Swedish, and other European languages. A periodical, Pentagram, is published in five languages. The Lectorium Rosicrucianum can be contacted at Bakenessergract 11-15, 2011JS, The Netherlands, or in the United States at the Western North American headquarters, Box 9246, Bakersfield, CA 93389. There are some 11,000 members internationally. Website: http://www.lectoriumrosicrucianum.org

Sources:

Van Rijckenborgh, Jan. The Coming New Man. Haarlem, The Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1957.

———. Elementary Philosophy of the Modern Rosecross. Haarlem, The Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1961.

The Way of the Rosecross in Our Times. Haarlem, The Netherlands: Rozekruis-Pers, 1978.

Lee, Dal (1895–1973)

Prominent writer and astrologer, born Adalbert Nebel in New York City on December 7, 1895. As a young man he became attracted to astrology and for a decade (1917–27) studied it privately. In 1927 he became a part-time astrologer and then in 1937 became an associate editor of Astrology Guide magazine. The following year he also became editor of Your Personal Astrology, another newsstand periodical. He discontinued his private practice in 1941 and thereafter spent his life as an editor and writer of astrological literature.

Lee died in Fort Lee, New Jersey, on July 7, 1973.

Sources:

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Lee, Dal. Dictionary of Astrology. New York: Paperback Library, 1968.

———. How to Use and Understand Astrological Predictive Systems. New York: Astro Books, 1939.

———. Understanding the Occult. New York: Paperback Library, 1969.

Lee, Gloria (1926–1962)

Gloria Lee, one of the prominent flying saucer contactees of the 1950s, was born March 22, 1926, in Los Angeles. She developed an interest in flying as a teenager and became one of the early airline stewardesses, a position she held until her marriage to William H. Byrd in 1952. About this same time she developed an interest in flying saucers, then being raised as an issue by George Adamski, who claimed contact with extraterrestrials.

In 1953 Lee began to receive messages from the saucer brothers through the process of automatic writing. The first messages were received while she was at work. The contacts led her into association with several occult interest groups. The regularity of the messages increased, and eventually the automatic writing gave way to telepathy. The extraterrestrial identified himself as J.W., a Venusian who came from a race of people who no longer used vocal communications and in their evolution had lost their vocal cords. They communicated by telepathy alone. As the communications continued, she attempted in various ways to prove J.W.'s existence, both to herself and others. In 1959 she founded the Cosmon Research Foundation and published her first book, Why We Are Here! The book shows some background in Theosophy. Theosophy pictures a hierarchy of spiritual beings that stand between humanity and the divine. In Lee's thinking, that hierarchy had been transformed into a space command hierarchy. A second book, The Changing Conditions of Your World! appeared in 1962.

By the early 1960s Lee was a well-known figure in the contactee subculture. In the fall of 1962, accompanied by her friend and colleague Hedy Hood, Lee went to Washington to attempt to interest political leaders in her ideas about the space brothers. She wanted financing and assistance to build a spaceship, the plans of which had been given her by J.W. She found no positive response, and on September 13, the pair took a hotel room and Lee began a fast to call attention to her ideas. No one listened. On November 2, she fell into a coma and died.

Immediately after her death, several contactees claimed to have talked to Gloria Lee in her new spiritual existence. Verity of the Heralds of the New Age (New Zealand) and Yolanda of Mark-Age both produced booklets of what they claimed were communications from Lee. Lee was considered a martyr by the contactees of the 1960s but was soon forgotten as new people who did not know her moved into leadership positions.

Sources:

Lee, Gloria. The Changing Conditions of Your World! Palos Verdes Estates, Calif.: Cosmon Research Foundation, 1962.

———. Why We Are Here! Palos Verdes Estates, Calif.: Cosmon Research Foundation, 1959.

Steiger, Brad. The Aquarian Revelations. New York: Dell, 1971.

Verity. The Going and the Glory. Auckland, New Zealand: Heralds of the New Age, 1966.

Lee, Seung-Heun

Seung-Heun Lee, a Korean qigong master, was raised in South Korea in the years after the Korean War. He attended Seoul Public Health College and later studied physical education at Danguk University. Following his graduation he went to work as a researcher in a clinical laboratory. His observation of patients who returned on multiple occasions for treatment served as a catalyst for his own quest to discover the underlying causes of health and disease. He began to meditate and practice disciplines that led to his personal experience of the universal energy, known in Korea as ki (also known as qi or chi). He also came to understand that illness was caused by the blockage of the natural flow of this vital energy.

Having experienced the ki, Lee later discovered that there was a millennia-old Korean discipline to possess health and well being through the cultivation of ki. It was called Dahn Hak, but was largely neglected in the contemporary context. He worked with the Dahn Hak system and modernized and perfected it. Then, in 1985, he opened the first Dahn Hak center in Seoul and began to train masters who could spread the teachings through the peninsula. Over the next decade he trained more than 500 masters and opened several hundred centers.

In 1994 Lee moved to the United States to bring Dahn Hak to the West. He opened the first center in Glendale, California, a Los Angeles suburb. Over the next five years he opened the first of the Canadian centers in Toronto, Ontario, and extended the work to Great Britain and South America. Soon after the opening of the first center in Seoul, he began to write about Dahn Hak, the various volumes becoming the textbooks for the movement. As the movement spreads, these are being translated into English, the first volume being the basic introduction to practice, Dahnhak: The Way to Perfect Health (1999). In 1997, he opened a retreat center in Sedona, Arizona, which currently serves as the international headquarters of the movement. Dahn Hak has an extensive Internet presence, including http://www.dahncenter.com/.

Sources:

Lee, Seung-Hwun. Brain Respiration. Seoul: Han Mun Hwa Publishers, 1998.

———. Dahnhak: The Way to Perfect Health. Seoul: Dahn Publications, 1999.

———. The Way to Light Up Your Divinity. Seoul: Dahn Publications, 1999.

Lee Penny

Famous Scottish amulet that belonged to Sir Simon Locard on Lockhart of Lee, ca. 1330. The story of this relic suggested the title of Sir Walter Scott's novel The Talisman, and in his introduction to the book, Scott related the incident that led to the acquisition of the Lee penny.

After the death of Robert the Bruce, king of Scotland in 1329, his friend Lord James of Douglas set out to take the dead king's heart to the Holy Land, making the pilgrimage that the king was not able to undertake in his lifetime. While making their way through Spain, Douglas and his band of knights battled with the Saracens. Douglas died on the battlefield, but the king's heart in its silver casket was rescued by Sir Simon Locard of Lee, who brought it back to Scotland for burial (Sir Walter Scott, however, believed it was taken on to the Holy Land).

Sir Simon Locard imprisoned a wealthy emir from a battle. His aged mother ransomed him, and in the course of counting out the money, a pebble inserted in a coin fell out of the lady's purse. She was in such a hurry to retrieve it that the Scottish knight realized it must be valuable to her and insisted on this amulet being added to the ransom. The lady reluctantly agreed and also explained to Sir Simon Locard what its virtues were.

Apparently it was a medical talisman believed to drive away fever and stop bleeding. The stone was a dull, heart-shaped pebble of a semitransparent dark red color, set in a piece of silver said to be an Edward IV groat (coin). The Lockhart family tradition credits the Lee penny with the ability to cure all diseases in cattle and the bite of a mad dog. The stone should be dipped in water three times and swirled around, then the water should be given to the man or beast to be cured.

The amulet was used frequently in the past, according to tradition. In 1629 the Lee penny was used to cure sick oxen, but as a result a young woman was burned at the stake for witchcraft. There are records of an accusation of witchcraft against Sir Thomas Lockhart during the Reformation, but the Church Synod at Glasgow merely reproved Sir Thomas and advised him to cease using the penny as a charm.

During the reign of Charles I, the citizens of Newcastle requested the use of the penny to cure a cattle plague. Sir James Lockhart required from the corporation a bond of 6,000 pounds. The penny was used, the plague abated, and the corporation offered to purchase the amulet with the money. The offer was refused, and the Lee penny was returned to Scotland. During the eighteenth century it was housed in a gold casket presented to the head of the family by the Empress Maria Theresa of Austria. Many cures are recorded through the middle of the nineteenth century. More recently the penny has passed into the possession of Simon Macdonald Lockhart of Lee, at Dolphinton, Scotland.

Leek, Sybil (1922–1982)

Astrologer, witch, author, and one of the more popular figures in the modern occult revival. She was born on February 22, 1922, in the Midlands, England, and claimed an ancestry in witchcraft through both sides of her family. Through her mother the lineage could be traced to southern Ireland in the twelfth century and through her father to Russia. She was tutored at home and attended school for only four years (ages 12–16).

She claimed that she had been initiated into the craft while near Nice, in southern France, and that her initiation was to fill an opening left by the death of her aunt, who had been high priestess of a coven. She then returned to England and settled near New Forest, where she reportedly joined the Horsa Coven, which she claimed predated the Norman Conquest. She soon became high priestess of the group. There is no substantiation of that story and some evidence that it is fabricated.

In the early 1950s she claimed to have had a mystical experience in which she realized that her calling in life would be as a spokesperson for witchcraft, the old religion. Her early efforts resulted in tourists flocking to her antique shop, not to buy but to get her autograph. She had a conflict with her landlord, who demanded she renounce her religion, and she eventually had to close her shop. Meanwhile, she had written several books, but none of them dealt with witchcraft.

In the early 1960s Leek moved to the United States. With the assistance of her publisher and a set of public relations people, she soon became famous as a public witch. She lectured widely, appeared on television, and built a large clientele as an astrologer. Quietly, she founded and for a period led several covens, two in Massachusetts, one in Cincinnati, and one in St. Louis.

Leek wrote over 60 books among which were an autobiography, Diary of a Witch (1968), and several on witchcraft, including The Complete Art of Witchcraft (1971). The material in these books conflicts. While claiming traditional witchcraft roots, prior to the neo-pagan revival of witchcraft by Gerald Gardner, her own presentation of witchcraft is completely Gardnerian. She talks of ritual items such as the athame (the ritual dagger) as if she had known about them before Gardner. However, we now know that they were invented by Gardner. She seems to have reproduced a variation on Gardner's ritual. It appears as if she, like many in the early decades of the Wiccan revival, created a magical lineage for herself, but in fact obtained her training and knowledge of the craft from Gardnerians.

She died in Melbourne, Florida, in 1982.

Sources:

Buckland, Raymond. Witchcraft: Ancient and Modern. New York: H. C. Publishers, 1970.

Leek, Sybil. Astrology and Love. New York: Berkley, 1977.

———. The Best of Sybil Leek. New York: Popular Library, 1974.

———. Cast Your Own Spell. New York: Pinnacle Books, 1970.

———. The Complete Art of Witchcraft. New York: World Publishing, 1971.

———. Diary of a Witch. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1968.

———. A Shop in the High Street. New York: David McKay, 1962.

———. Sybil Leek's Book of Curses. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1975.

———. Sybil Leek's Book of Fortune Telling. New York: Collier, 1969.

Lees, Robert James (ca. 1849–ca. 1931)

British clairvoyant and pensioner of the Privy Purse who was often received at Buckingham Palace by Queen Victoria. He was also the subject of a hoax concerning the infamous Jack the Ripper case. An article was published in the London Daily Express March 9, 1931, shortly after Lees' death, claiming that Lees rendered great service to the English police. Lees, it was claimed, had unaccountable premonitions of the crimes the Ripper was going to commit. In a vision Lees saw the victim and the place. He communicated his descriptions to the police, and later findings corroborated the details in the vision. When the visions continued to reoccur, the police asked Lees to track down the murderer. Much in the same way as a bloodhound pursues a criminal, Lees set out in a state of trance, followed by an inspector and detectives. While on the trail, at four o'clock in the morning Lees halted at the gates of a West End mansion where a prominent physician was living and, pointing to an upper chamber where a faint light gleamed, declared: "There is the murderer." It was reported that the physician later confessed that he was subject to fits of obsession in which he committed acts of fiendish cruelty. Evidence consistent with victims of the Ripper was found in his rooms, and on the recommendations of a medical committee, he was confined to an insane asylum.

Later it was learned that this story stemmed from a journalistic hoax reported in the Chicago Sunday-Times Herald April 28, 1895, which reported that Lees had a vision of one of the killings prior to its occurrence.

During his life, Lees was best known for his healing work, his controls often diagnosing disease and effecting remarkable, instantaneous cures. Lees also published several books that he claimed were inspired psychically. He wrote a posthumous manuscript that is supposedly the autobiography of a soul in paradise.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lees, Robert J. The Car of Phoebus: An Astral Bridegroom. N.p., 1909.

———. The Gate of Heaven. N.p., n.d.

———. The Heretic. N.p., 1901.

———. The Life Elysian. N.p., 1905.

———. "My Books: How They Were Written." Occult Review (December 1931).

———. Through the Mists. London: W. Rider & Sons Ltd., 1910.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Lefebure, Francis (1916–)

Physician, experimenter, and writer on parapsychological subjects. Born September 17, 1916, in Paris, France, he studied at the Paris Medical School at the University of Paris (M.D.). During World War II, he was a physician in the French Army (1939–44) and after the war worked as the school physician (1944-59). He subsequently was director of "cervoscopy" (his own technique of brain exploration) at Dynam Institut, Paris.

Lefebure joined the Association Francais d'Etudes Métapsychiques in Paris. He experimented successfully with projecting his "psychic double" at a distance to individuals who had no prior knowledge of the attempt. This conscious projection of a "double" is what is elsewhere termed out-of-the-body travel. He authored several books and contributed articles on clairvoyance and occultism to the magazine Initiation et Science.

Sources:

Lefebure, Francis. Expériences initiatiques. 3 vols. N.p., 1954, 1956, 1959.

———. Les Homologies; architecture cosmique ou, La Lumière secrète de l'Asie devant la science modern (Homologies; or, The Secret Light of Asia in Relation to Modern Science). Paris: Editions Aryana, 1950.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lehman, Alfred

Danish coauthor, with F. C. C. Hansen, of a pamphlet proposing a theory of "involuntary" whispering to account for apparent thought-transference, or telepathy.

Lehrstuhl für Psychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie, Psychologisches Institut der Universität, Freiburg See Abteilung für Psychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie des Psychologischen Instituts der Universität Freiburg i. Br.

Leippya

Burmese term for human soul.

Leland, Charles Godfrey (1824–1903)

Versatile American writer and folklorist who researched traditional witchcraft lore. He was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on August 15, 1824. He graduated from Princeton University and also studied at Heidelberg and Munich, after which he lived in Europe for a number of years. Leland became well known for his humorous dialect verse The Breitmann Ballads (1871) and for his research in gypsy lore and language. He first discovered and elucidated Shelta Thari, the secret language of the tinkers.

From 1886 onward, Leland was friendly with Maddalena, a Florentine fortune-teller and hereditary witch from Tuscany. She communicated to him the traditional witchcraft lore, which he published in Aradia; or, The Gospel of the Witches (1899; Weiser, 1974). The book played a prominent part as a source book in the modern revival of Wicca, or witchcraft, since the 1960s. Leland, a genial giant of a man, seemed fascinated by anything occult or mysterious. He died in Florence, Italy, March 20, 1903.

Sources:

Leland, Charles Godfrey. The Alternate Sex; or, The Female Intellect in Man, and the Masculine in Woman. London: P. Wellby, 1904.

———. Aradia; or, The Gospel of the Witches. 1899. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1974.

———. A Dictionary of Slang, Jargon, and Cant. London: Ballantyne Press, 1889. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1967.

———. The English Gipsies and their Language. New York: Hurd and Houghton, 1872. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1968.

———. The Gypsies. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1882.

Leland, Charles Godfrey, and Albert Barrére. Gypsy Sorcery and Fortune-Telling. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1891. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1971.

———. Memoirs. 1893. Reprint, Detroit: Gale Research, 1968.

———. The Mystic Will. New York: Hero Publishers, 1972.

Pennell, Elizabeth. Charles Godfrey Leland. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1906.

Le Loyer, Pierre (1550–1634)

Sieur de la Brosse, royal councilor and demonographer. He was born on November 24, 1550, at Huillé in Anjou, France, and later became a magistrate at Angers. Le Loyer authored Discours et histoires des spectres, visions, et apparitions des esprits, anges, demons, et âmes se montrant aux hommes (Discourse and Histories about Specters, Visions, and Apparitions of Spirits, Angels, Demons, and Souls that Appeared Visibly to Men), published at Paris in 1605 in one quatro volume. The work is divided into eight books dealing with the marvelous visions and prodigies of several centuries and the most celebrated authors, sacred as well as profane, who have dealt with occult subjects. It discusses the cause of apparitions; the nature of good and evil spirits; demons; ecstasy; the essence, nature, and origin of souls; magicians and sorcerers and the manner of their communication; evil spirits; and imposters.

The first book deals with specters, apparitions, and spirits; the second with the physics of Le Loyer's time, the illusions to which the senses are prone, wonders, and the elixirs and metamorphosis of sorceries and of philters; the third book establishes the degrees, grades, and honors of spirits, gives a résumé of the history of Philinnion and of Polycrites, and recounts diverse adventures with specters and demons; the fourth book gives many examples of spectral appearances, of the speech of persons possessed of demons, of the countries and dwelling-places of these specters and demons, and of marvelous portents; the fifth treats the science of the soul, of its origin, nature, its state after death, and of haunting ghosts; the sixth division is entirely taken up with the apparition of souls, and shows how the happy do not return to earth, but only those whose souls are burning in purgatory; in the seventh book the case of the Witch of Endor and the evocation of the soul of Samuel are dealt with, as is evocation in general and the methods practiced by wizards and sorcerers in this science; and the last book gives some account of exorcism, fumigations, prayers, and other methods of casting out devils, and the usual means employed by exorcists to destroy these.

The work, though disputatious, throws considerable light upon the occult science of the times. Although often credulous, Le Loyer was most skeptical about alchemy, of which he wrote: "As to transmutation, I wonder how it can be reasonably defended. Metals can be adulterated but not changed. . . . Blowing [the bellows], they may exhaust their purses, they multiply all into nothing. Yes, I do not believe, and may the philosophers excuse me if they wish, that the alchemists can change any metal into gold."

Le Loyer died on January 29, 1634.

Le Monde de L'Inconnu

Le Monde de L'Inconnu is the primary French-language newsstand magazine concerned with the paranormal. Subtitled "Le magazine de l'histories et de la recherche spirituelle," it was launched in Paris, France, at the beginning of the 1980s as Le Monde Inconnu. Known as simply L'Iconnu through the 1990s, it adopted its present name with issue 275 at the beginning of 1999.

Le Monde de L'Inconnu covers the full range of occult and New Age topics from magic and psychic phenomena to UFOs and ancient mysteries. It has paid special attention to myths of the Templars, France being the country in which the Neo-Templar Movement (the movement founded in the years following the French Revolution claiming historic continuity with the medieval Order of Templars) has its most expansive presence.

Each issue carries a set of feature articles, each of which is drawn from a different area of concern such as divination, the practice of theurgy, prophecy, cryptozoology, or mythology. In addition there is extensive coverage of late-breaking news in the field, and in recent years a column reviewing paranormal sites on the Internet has been added. Limited coverage is given to upcoming events of relevant interest.

Le Monde de L'Inconnu is currently published monthly from editorial offices at the Société de Presse Esotérique, PB 3312, 06206 Nice cedex 2, France, under the guidance of Alain Finzi, its publication director, and Alain Continmi, its editor-in-chief. It is distributed throughout the French-speaking world, primarily France, Belgium, Switzerland and Quebec.

Sources:

Le Monde L'Inconnu. Nice, France. N.p.

Lemuria

Lemuria, the lost continent of the Pacific, has been discussed in nineteenth- and twentieth-century occult literature as the Pacific equivalent of Atlantis. It is distinct, however, in that it is a completely modern invention, having originated in the middle of the nineteenth century as a means to solve some problems of biology. Biologists had noted the existence of very similar flora and fauna in southern India and Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) and southern Africa. The problem was that these species did not exist on the lands between. Before scientists had arrived at an understanding of continental drift, Philip L. Schattler proposed the idea of a land bridge between southern India and southern Africa. The lemur was a prominent animal whose habitat was being researched, and Schattler gave the name Lemuria to his hypothesized land bridge. The idea was quickly adopted by a number of biologists, including Ernst Haekel (1834–1891), who further hypothesized that Lemuria was the home of the missing original hominoids. (Many yet-to-be-discovered skeletons would point in different directions.) By the 1880s, the lost continent of Lemuria would be an honest (if soon-to-be-discarded) scientific theory.

In the 1880s, however, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, co-founder and major theorist of the Theosophical Society, integrated the idea of Lemuria into her understanding of human evolution. Humans evolved through a series of root races, she said. She claimed that the contemporary Anglo-Saxons were the fifth root race. The two previous root races had emerged on Atlantis and Lemuria, respectively. Blavatsky's account of Lemuria led to further discussion in the theosophical writings of Charles W. Leadbeater and to the major book, The Story of Atlantis and the Lost Lemuria, by W. Scott-Elliot. What had started as a hypothetical land bridge between Africa and India had become a sizable continent stretching from India to New Zealand. Australia was a remnant and the Aborigines were descendants of the continent's dwellers.

Lemuria was soon identified with the lost continent of Pan described in Oahspe: A New Age Bible, a channeled text from the hand of Spiritualist John B. Newbrough. Pan was said to be a large continent located in what is today the north Pacific. Pan's remnants theoretically included the western coast of California, whose unique flora and fauna were another problem for nineteenth-century biologists.

A third source of speculation on Lemuria derives from the work of Augustus Le Plongeon, an archaeologist working in the late nineteenth century in Central America. At the time, the Mayan hieroglyphs in the Yucatán had not been deciphered, but Le Plongeon claimed significant progress in that regard. He suggested that the writing at Chichen Itza told the story of a princess Moo and an ancient continent to the east (Atlantis) that he called Mu. He presented his findings in 1896 in a book, Queen Moo and the Eqyptian Sphinx, but after he was given a brief hearing before his archaeological colleagues, his ideas were dismissed.

Le Plongeon would be long forgotten if his papers had not passed to one James Churchward (1832–1936). Churchward claimed to have seen what he called the Naacal tablets, a set of materials written in the lost Naacal language. The tablets told the story of a lost continent in the Pacific as described by a few of the survivors of the continent's fiery destruction. Churchward claimed to have seen the tablets in India, but no one else to the present day has ever seen them. Combining the Le Plongeon material with stories of the Naacal tablets in his 1926 book The Lost Continent of Mu, Churchward proposed the idea of a huge continent in the Pacific south of Hawaii.

The notions about Lemuria, Pan, and Mu were melded in the 1931 Rosicrucian classic, Lemuria: The Lost Continent of the Pacific. According to H. Spencer Lewis (writing under the pen name Wishar S. Cerve), Lemuria was a mid-Pacific continent. When it was destroyed, a sliver of it was jammed against North America and became California. It is especially associated with Mt. Shasta, a prominent volcano in northern California that has become the focus of occult speculation in its own right. Five years after Lewis's book was published, the Lemurian Fellowship, a theosophical occult group, was founded in Chicago. Its leader, Robert Stelle, expanded on the now-entrenched occult myth in two books, An Earth Dweller Returns (1940) and The Sun Rises (1952).

In the last generation Lemuria has become a standard part of New Age mythology and is frequently mentioned in channeled literature. Among the interesting twists on the idea of Lemuria is that attributed to "Ramtha," the entity who speaks through J. Z. Knight. "Ramtha" says he was a Lemurian. Lemuria, according to "Ramtha," was not a separate continent but a section of the ancient continent of Atlatia (as he calls Atlantis). An initial cataclysm, some thirty-five thousand years ago, destroyed the northern half of the continent, including Lemuria. Survivors found shelter in Onai, the great port city of Atlatia. "Ramtha" says he was born of a Lemurian mother who had escaped to Onai.

Sources:

Blavatsky, Helena P. The Secret Doctrine. 2 vols. London: Theosophical Publishing, 1889.

Cerve, Wishar S. [H. Spencer Lewis]. Lemuria: The Lost Continent of the Pacific. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge, AMORC, 1931.

Churchward, James. The Lost Continent of Mu. New York: Ives Washburn, 1926.

Le Plongeon, Augustus. Queen Moo and the Egyptian Sphinx. New York: The Author, 1896.

Melton, J. Gordon. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Walton, Bruce, ed. Mount Shasta: Home of the Ancients. Mokelume Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1985.

Lemurian Fellowship

The Lemurian Fellowship was founded in Chicago in 1936 by Robert D. Stelle and Howard John Zitko and named for Lemuria, a continent first hypothesized in the nineteenth century as a Pacific counterpart of Atlantis. Shortly after the fellowship formed, it moved to Milwaukee and then in 1938 to Chula Vista, California, near San Diego. In 1941, the group purchased land in rural San Diego County near Ramona.

The teachings of the Lemurian philosophy were initially presented in two books, An Earth Dweller Returns and The Sun Rises. The former was written as a sequel to A Dweller on Two Planets (1899). Claiming to be channeled through Frederick William Oliver by an entity known as "Phylos the Tibetan," The Earth Dweller Returns was one of the early books to discuss Lemuria. The Sun Rises, written by Stelle, goes into great detail concerning the ancient Lemurian civilization. Its philosophy is summarized in several basic laws, notably the laws of precipitation, cause and effect, compensation, correspondence, and transmutation. Zitko's early presentation of the philosophy in The Lemurian Theochristic Conception became the basis of the fellowship's correspondence lessons.

According to the fellowship, Christ visited Lemuria and there enunciated the Lemurian philosophy. The following also teaches that Christ reigned for 1,000 years as Melchizedek, the emperor of Atlantis. When Atlantis was destroyed, all that Christ had taught was stored away in archives of the secret brotherhoods such as the Essenes and Rosicrucians. The oldest of these brotherhoods was the Lemurians. The Lemurian Fellowship is a mundane organization designed to release the information contained in the Lemurian Brotherhood archives.

The Lemurian Fellowship, which sees the New Age as the kingdom of God, believes that the kingdom will have a communal social structure in which the individual's and society's prosperity mutually support each other. New members in the fellowship are expected eventually to become complete participants in it.

The fellowship is located on 260 acres on two tracts of land eight miles apart. Groups of members live communally, and facilities for their welfare and fellowship administration worldwide have been constructed. Besides Gateway, the headquarters building, there is a chapel, school, dining hall, laundry, member residences, and Lemurian Crafts, a business that helps support the community. Most students to the group begin with a set of correspondence lessons. Leadership comes from the higher plane through the Council of Elder Brothers and the Advanced Ego (Stelle). Stelle led the group until his death in 1952 and was succeeded by a board of governors. Zitko left the group to found the World University. The fellowship may be contacted at Box 397, Ramona, CA 92065. Website: http://www.lemurianfellowship.org.

Sources:

The Lemurian Scribe. Let It Be Resolved. Milwaukee: Lemurian Press, 1940.

Phylos the Tibetan. An Earth Dweller Returns. Milwaukee: Lemurian Press, 1940.

Stelle, Robert D. The Sun Rises. Ramona, Calif.: Lemurian Fellowship, 1952.

Zitko, Howard John. The Lemurian Theochristic Conception. N.p., n.d.

Le Normand, Marie-Anne Adélaide (1772–1843)

Famous French clairvoyant and fortune teller known as "The Sybil of the Faubourg Saint Germain." She was born at Alençon and became one of the most celebrated occultists and diviners of her day, though it might be said that her art was much more the product of sound judgment than of any supernatural gift.

She predicted their futures to Danton, Marat, Robespierre, and St. Just, but we hear no more of her under the years of the Directory (1795–99). When Josephine Beauharnais came into prominence as the intended wife of Napoleon, Le Normand was received at all those houses and salons where the future empress had any influence.

Josephine was extremely credulous and used to read her own fortunes to herself on the cards, but when she discovered that Le Normand was an adept at this art, she often had her in attendance to assist her in it. Even Napoleon himself, who was not without his own superstitions, had his horoscope read by her.

Le Normand soon set up her own salon in Paris, where she read people's fortunes by means of the cards. It is not certain whether these cards were of the nature of tarot cards, but it is more than likely that she used various methods. She occasionally divined the fortunes of others through playing games of piquet, sept, and other well-known card games of the day. There is anecdotal evidence that she told fortunes with ordinary playing cards, but there is also a tradition that she used a specially designed pack. She did not hide her methods from others, but the Parisian society of her day appears to have thought that her power of divination lay not only in the cards she manipulated but in her personality or occult insight.

After the fall of the emperor, Le Normand was in great demand among the Russian, German, and English officers in Paris, and even Emperor Alexander and other potentates consulted her. Shortly after this she went to Brussels, where she read the fortune of the Prince of Orange, but when she was discovered trying to cheat the customs officials, she was arrested and thrown into a Belgian prison.

By 1830 she had become quite forgotten, and when the newspapers announced her death on June 25, 1843, a great many people failed to remember her name. Le Normand had a great reputation for the accuracy of her predictions among all classes, from revolutionary heroes to emperors and royalty. What is said to be an authentic reproduction of the "Mademoiselle Le Normand Fortune Telling Cards" has long been reprinted in Europe and elsewhere and is currently marketed by U.S. Games Systems, Inc., New York, New York.

Leo, Alan (1860–1917)

Pseudonym of British astrologer William Frederick Allen, born in London August 7, 1860. His mother was a member of the conservative Plymouth Brethren, and when Allen was a child, his father abandoned him and his mother. Young Allen was apprenticed as a draper, chemist, and grocer in turn, but in each instance failed to serve out his time. At the age of 16 he was destitute in Liverpool. A few years later he was a prosperous employer, then just as suddenly was ruined by a dishonest manager. He then became a salesman for a manufacturer of sewing machines.

Eventually Allen learned about astrology from an old herbalist, who treated him for an illness. He also became friendly with the astrologer "Sepharial" (Walter Gorn Old), a Theosophist. Allen joined the Theosophical Society in 1890 and became a successful mail-order astrologer. In 1895 he married Bessie Phillips, a professional palmist and phrenologist.

Allen became the proprietor of the periodical Modern Astrology, and under his professional name, Alan Leo, compiled a number of popular books on astrology. His Modern Astrology Publishing Co. was the first large-scale venture of its kind, and he established branches in Paris and New York.

In 1914 and 1917 Allen was prosecuted for fortune-telling. He was acquitted in the first case, but convicted and fined in the second. At that date, prosecution of Spiritualist mediums and other seers was not infrequent (see Fortune Telling Act). He died August 30, 1917, at Cornwall, England. His wife, who published several books under the name "Bessie Leo," edited his biography, The Life and Works of Alan Leo (1919).

Sources:

Leo, Alan. Astrology for All. 2 vols. London: Modern Astrology Office, 1921.

———. Casting the Horoscope. London: Modern Astrology Office, 1912.

———. The Horoscope and How to Read It. N.p., 1902.

———. How to Judge a Nativity. 2 vols. 1904. Reprint, London: Modern Astrology Office, 1928.

———. Practical Astrology. Philadelphia: David McCay, n.d.

Leo, Bessie. The Life and Works of Alan Leo. N.p., 1919.

Leonard, Gladys Osborne (1882–1968)

Celebrated trance medium born May 28, 1882. Hereward Carrington designated her as "the British Mrs. Piper," and she had a reputation during her lifetime as one the greatest trance mediums.

In her autobiographical My Life in Two Worlds (1931) she recalled her life as a child:

"In whatever direction I happened to be looking, the physical view of the wall, door, ceiling, or whatever it was, would disappear, and in its place would gradually come valleys, gentle slopes, lovely trees and banks covered with flowers, of every shape and hue. The scene seemed to extend for many miles, and I was conscious that I could see much farther than was possible with the ordinary physical scenery around me."

Leonard became a professional singer early in her adult life and during this period acquired experimental acquaintance with the phenomena of Spiritualism through table-turning experiences. She sat with two girlfriends in her dressing room. After 26 futile attempts, a communicator appeared who called herself "Feda" and said that in life she had been the wife of one of Leonard's ancestors. According to her account, she was quite young at the time and lived only a brief time after the marriage; she died at the age of thirteen about 1800. Leonard abandoned her singing career and henceforth devoted much of her time to her mediumship.

From her first appearance, "Feda" remained a faithful attendant of Leonard and was always the first to come through when Leonard passed into trance. During her first manifestations, according to reports, through the table communications, her form and that of other spirit friends were quite distinctly seen in the subdued light on the white walls "like clearly-cut shadows, which showed up perfectly against the light background." However, significant physical phenomena such as ectoplasm or materialization did not develop. Leonard sometimes heard voices objectively, slight touches, and little manifestations when alone, being always aware of "suspended" or blank feeling whenever this happened. Her acquaintance with physical phenomena came about only after her sittings with other mediums who performed materializations and other phenomena. The first time she herself heard the voice of "Feda" was in a direct voice sitting in the house of H. Dennis Bradley. It appears that even part of her own power, necessary for the trance control, was contributed by her husband, as "Feda" was very clamorous whenever a separation came about through her husband's professional engagements. "Feda" said that she could not use the power well enough during his absence.

Occasionally, for medical purposes, "Feda" gave way to "North Star," another Indian, who did not speak through Leonard but used her "hands and arms in an extraordinary way, making passes over the patient, and certainly he cured several people of different maladies."

In March 1914, "Feda" gave instructions that Leonard must begin work as a professional medium as soon as possible. At the same time the medium was deluged with messages ending with the words: "Something big and terrible is going to happen to the world. Feda must help many people through you."

During the winter of 1914, Hewat McKenzie, the founder of the British College of Psychic Science, had some satisfactory sittings with Leonard. On his recommendation, Lady and Sir Oliver Lodge came, after their son Raymond was killed in World War I in autumn 1915. Their first evidence of Raymond's survival was obtained through Leonard, and the resulting publicity made Leonard a celebrity.

In 1916 two sitters, Radcliffe Hall and (Una) Lady Troubridge, approached Leonard after the death of their friend "A.V.B." Although the sitters and subject were unknown to her, "Feda" gave remarkably detailed information on the subject and the house where the ladies had lived. The sitters not only approached Leonard anonymously, but also employed a private detective to make sure Leonard had not obtained the information in a mundane way. No deception was discovered.

In 1918, for a period of three months, Leonard was exclusively engaged by the Society for Psychical Research. Out of 73 sittings, all but three were anonymous. The report of Mrs. W. H. Salter stated that the sitters generally agreed that good evidence of surviving personality had been obtained and the complete trustworthiness of the medium could not be questioned.

Rev. C. Drayton Thomas carried on experiments with Leonard for years. Important book and newspaper tests were evolved. Thomas's deceased father acquired the ability to come through without "Feda," who usually acted as interpreter for others, and he spoke directly from Leonard's mouth. Thomas reported several occasions in which he received evidential messages. For example, on one occasion he was told, "In tomorrow's Times, on page 8, column 5, about six inches from the bottom, you will find a name which will recall intimate associations of your youth between the ages of 16–18." The Times appears to have been "invaded" systematically for information by this communicator who also disclosed personal traits in referring to his favorite books, indicating passages on certain pages in answer to questions put by his son.

In her autobiography, Leonard narrated many interesting out-of-the-body travel experiences. She stated that she often met people in the spirit world and brought back memories of such meetings into the waking state. These spiritual excursions often received striking confirmation through other means. Leonard also cooperated with parapsychologist W. W. Carington in tests to establish whether "Feda" was a secondary personality or a genuine communicator. After nearly 50 years of mediumship, Leonard died March 10, 1968.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

"Books and Reports on Leonard Mediumship." Psychic Science 16, no. 4 (January 1938).

Broad, C. D. Lectures on Psychical Research. New York: Humanities Press, 1962.

Carington, W. W. Telepathy. London: 1945.

Hall, Radcliffe, and (Una) Lady Troubridge. "On a series of Sittings with Mrs. Osborne Leonard." Proceedings of the Society for Psychic Research 30.

Heywood, Rosallind. "Mrs. Gladys Osborne Leonard: A Biographical Tribute." Journal of the Society for Psychic Research 45 (1969).

Leonard, Gladys Osborne. My Life In Two Worlds. London: Cassell, 1931.

Lodge, Sir Oliver J. Raymond or Life and Death. London: Metheun; New York: George H. Doran, 1916.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Salter, W. H. Trance Mediumship: An Introductory Study of Mrs. Piper and Mrs. Leonard. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1962.

Smith, Susy. The Mediumship of Mrs. Leonard. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Thomas, C. Drayton. Life beyond Death with Evidence. N.p., 1928.

———. Some New Evidence for Human Survival. London: Collins, 1922.

Thomas, John F. Beyond Normal Cognition: An Evaluative and Methodological Study of the Mental Content of Certain Trance Phenomena. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1937. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, n.d.

Leroy, Olivier-Gilbert (1884– ?)

Author of books on the lives of the saints and on parapsychology. He was born October 9, 1884, at Tours, France, and studied at the Law School, University of Paris (LL.D., 1925) and the Sorbonne, University of Paris (docteur ès lettres, 1931). From 1941 to 1950 he was a director of education in Madagascar. As a student of hagiography, he wrote books on saints and mysticism and also contributed various articles to Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique.

Sources:

Leroy, Olivier-Gilbert. "Apparitions de Sainte Thérèse de Jésus" (Apparitions of Saint Theresa of Jesus). Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique 134 (1958).

———. Le Chevalier Thomas Browne. Paris: J. Gamber, 1931.

———. "Examen des témoignages sur la lévitation extatique chez Sainte Thérèse de Jésus" (Study of the Testimony on Ecstatic Levitation of Saint Theresa). Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique 131 (1937).

———. Les Hommes-Salamandres (The Salamander Men). N.p., 1931.

———. La Lévitation. N.p., 1928.

———. "La Pénètration des consciences chez Sainte Thérèse de Jésus" (The Penetration of Consciousness in Saint Theresa of Jesus). Revue d'Ascétique et de Mystique 136 (1958).

———. La Raison primitive (Primitive Reason). N.p., 1926.

———. Sainte Jeanne d'Arc, Les Voix (The Voices of St. Joan of Arc). N.p., 1956.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lescoriere, Marie (fl. sixteenth century)

A witch of the sixteenth century arrested at the age of 90. On being examined she declared that she was no longer a witch, that she prayed daily, and that she had not visited the sabbat for 40 years. Questioned on the subject of the sabbat, she confessed that she had seen the devil and that he had visited her in the shape of a dog or a cat. On one occasion, she said, she had killed a neighbor by praying to the devil.

LeShan, Lawrence (L.) (1920–)

Psychologist and parapsychologist. He was born September 8, 1920, in New York City and was educated at the College of William and Mary (B.A., 1942), the University of Nebraska (M.S., 1943), and the University of Chicago (Ph.D., 1954). His education was interrupted on two occasions by periods of service in the U.S. Army (1943–46, 1950–52). Following his graduation he became the chief of the department of psychology at the Institute of Applied Biography in New York (1954–64) and simultaneously a research associate at the Ayer Foundation, Inc., New York (1954–70). He also taught in the Union Theological Seminary's program in psychiatry and religion.

Originally a skeptic in his attitude to paranormal phenomena, he devoted some 500 hours to testing the famous psychic Eileen Garrett and was particularly impressed by her powers in the field of psychometry. He also made a special study of psychic healing and since 1970 has held training seminars in New York for psychologists and students. He is a member of the American Psychical Research Society and the author of a number of books and articles.

In his book The Medium, the Mystic, and the Physicist (1974), he proposed a theory of different types of reality: sensory reality (that of everyday experience), clairvoyant reality (in which the time structure is modified and the identities of "you" and "I" become a part of a total "One" in the cosmos), and a transpsychic reality (in which there is total identification with the "All").

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

LeShan, Lawrence. Alternative Realities. New York: M. Evans, 1976.

———. Einstein's Space and Van Gogh's Sky: Physical Reality and Beyond. New York: Macmillan, 1982.

———. From Newton to EAP: Parapsychology and the Challenge of Modern Science. Wellingborough, England: Turnstone Press, 1984.

———. How to Meditate: A Guide to Self-Discovery. New York: Bantam Books, 1975.

———. The Medium, the Mystic, and the Physicist. 1974. Reprinted as Clairvoyant Reality: Toward a General Theory of the Paranormal. Wellingborough, England: Turnstone Press, 1980.

———. The Psychology of War: Comprehending Its Mystique and Its Madness. Chicago: Noble Press, 1992.

Leslie, Desmond (Peter Arthur) (1921–)

Irish novelist, film scriptwriter, musician, and coauthor of a key book on flying saucers. Born on June 21, 1921, in London, the youngest son of novelist Sir Shane Leslie and nephew of Lionel Leslie, explorer and author involved in investigations of lake monsters in Scotland. He was educated at Ampleforth, England, and Trinity College, Dublin. During World War II he served in the Royal Air Force (1940–44). Over the years he wrote a number of books, but his most famous was written with George Adamski. Flying Saucers Have Landed (1953) created a sensation and launched a trend. It passed through many editions and was translated into 16 different languages. Adamski claimed that he had met a voluptuous golden-haired Venusian, and the book contains photographs of this creature and of flying saucers. In addition to his novels and scripts, Leslie has composed electronic music for films and television.

Sources:

Hogan, Robert, ed. Dictionary of Irish Literature. 2 vols. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Leslie, Desmond. The Amazing Mr. Lutterworth: A Novel. London: Allan Wingate, 1958.

———. "Leslie Strikes Back." Nexus 1, nos. 2–5 (May 1955): 7–8; Saucer News 2, nos. 2–6 (June/July 1955): 7–8.

———. "Obituary: George Adamski." Flying Saucer Review 11, no. 4 (July/August 1965): 18–19.

Leslie, Desmond, and George Adamski. Flying Saucers Have Landed. New York: British Book, 1953.

Leventhal, Herbert (1941–)

Author of scholarly studies on occultism. He was born October 9, 1941, in Brooklyn, New York, and was educated at Brooklyn College of the City University of New York (B.A., 1962; Ph.D., 1973). His doctoral dissertation, In the Shadow of the Enlightenment: Occultism and Renaissance Science in Eighteenth-Century America, was published by the State University of New York Press in 1976. It grew out of his research on political thought in eighteenth-century American culture, in which he identified relics of occultism and Renaissance science that played an important part in the outlook of their time.

Sources:

Leventhal, Herbert. In the Shadow of the Enlightenment: Occultism and Renaissance Science in Eighteenth Century America. New York: State University of New York Press, 1976.

Lévi, Éliphas (1810–1875)

Pseudonym of Alphonse-Louis Constant, a French occultist of the nineteenth century, whose work stands as the fountainhead of the contemporary magical revival. He was born 1875 in Paris, the son of a shoemaker, and through the good offices of the parish priest was educated for the church at St. Sulpice. In due course he became a deacon and took the required vow of celibacy, but shortly thereafter he was expelled from St. Sulpice for teaching doctrines contrary to those of the church.

Obscure for a time, he emerged about 1839 under the influence of a political and socialistic prophet named Ganneau. Lévi's pamphlet entitled The Gospel of Liberty earned him six-months' imprisonment. In Paris he married a 16-year-old woman who later had the marriage annulled. It was probably not until after she left him that he launched his study of the occult sciences; his writings previous to this time show little trace of occult influence.

In 1850 he contributed a Dictionary of Christian Literature to a series of theological encyclopedias published by Abbé Migne. Within a year, however, Lévi was known to be giving lessons on occultism to pupils. According to a paragraph by M. Chauliac: "The Abbé Constant, for a second time repudiating his name, assumed the title of the Magus Éliphas Lévi, giving consultations in great number to credulous clients, who paid as much as twenty-five francs a time for a prediction from Lucifer." There is no evidence that Lévi was actually ordained as a priest, but the title "Abbé" was normally given to those wearing a clerical style of costume, and Lévi wore a quasi-clerical garb in his capacity of a Magus or master of magic.

In 1853 he traveled to London and met Lord Bulwer Lytton, whom he assisted in various magical evocations and theories. These were later fictionalized in Lytton's occult stories Zanoni: A Strange Story (1842) and The Haunted and the Haunters (1857). Lévi's own works on occultism, which had their shortcomings, nevertheless played a prominent part in the occult revival. (The word occult is reported to have been coined by Lévi.) However, Lévi may best be remembered for his discovery of the connection between the 22 cards of the tarot's major arcana and the Kabbalah's Tree of Life, a connection that is still accepted today.

Lévi died in April 1875. There is an interesting firsthand account of Lévi during his lifetime by Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie, who visited the magus in Paris in 1861. (See Occult Review, December 1921.)

Sources:

Lévi, Éliphas. La Clef des grands mystères. Translated as The Key of the Mysteries. 1861. Translated by Aleister Crowley. London: Rider, 1959. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

———. Dogme de la haute magie. N.p., 1854.

———. Histoire de la magie. Translated as The History of Magic. 1860. Trans. Arthur Edward Waite. London: W. Rider, 1913. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1971.

———. The Magical Ritual of the Regnum Sanctum. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

———. The Mysteries of Magic: A Digest of the Writings of Éliphas Lévi. Trans. Arthur Edward Waite. 1886. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

———. The Paradox of the Highest Science. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House. Reprint, Mokelumne Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1969.

———. Rituel de la haute magie. N.p., 1856.

———. Transcendental Magic. Translation of Dogme de la haute magie and Rituel de la haute magie. Translated by Arthur Edward Waite. London: George Redway, 1896. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Shaw, Eva. Divining the Future: Prognostication from Astrology to Zoomancy. New York: Facts on File, 1995.

Williams, Thomas A. Eliphas Levi: Master of Occultism. University, Ala.: University of Alabama Press, 1975.

Levitation

The rising of physical objects, tables, pianos, etc., or of human beings into the air, contrary to the known laws of gravitation and without any visible agency. More often the term is used in a restricted sense and refers to the levitation of the human body. As such, the phenomenon was reported from ancient times. Instances of transportation, or teleportation, which is levitation in its highest form, are recorded both in the Jewish Bible and the Christian New Testament, illustrated, for example, by Jesus' walking on the water, a feat reportedly accomplished by many of the saints.

The power was claimed by wizards of many primitive tribes, by mystics in the East, and it has been repeatedly claimed, in less sensational degrees, by several modern Spiritualist mediums. The mediums offered themselves as evidence to science that the miracles of rising in the air recorded in the life of saints, ecstatics, witches, and victims of demoniac possession might rest on a solid basis of fact.

Levitating Saints

In Die Christliche Mystik (5 vols., 1836–42), J. J. von Görres spoke of 72 levitated saints, while Olivier Leroy (in Levitation, 1928) noted that out of 14,000, at least 200 had experienced the phenomenon. Among them were St. Dunstan (918–988), St. Dominic (1170–1221), St. Francis of Assisi (1186–1226), Thomas Aquinas (1226–1274), St. Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1242), Blessed James of Illyria (d. 1485), Savonarola (1452–1498), St. Ignatius Loyola (1491–1556), St. Philip Neri (1515–1595), St. Peter of Alcantara (1499–1562), St. Joseph of Copertino (1603–1663) and St. Alphonsius Liguori (1696–1787). They were variously reported as having been raised a short distance in the air. Leroy found the average elevation 20 inches, but in some cases, exceptional height was recorded.

St. Joseph of Copertino who, in the Acta Sanctorum, is credited with 70 separate flights, once flew up into a tree and perched on a branch which quivered no more than if he had been a bird. According to von Görres, St. Peter of Alcantara was, on one occasion, carried up in the air to a great height, far above the trees, when with his arms crossed on his chest he continued to soar while hundreds of little birds gathered around him, making a most agreeable concert with their songs.

St. Dunstan, archbishop of Canterbury, was observed to rise from the ground shortly before his death in 988. St. Bernard Ptolomei, St. Philip Benitas, St. Albert of Sicily, and St. Dominic, founder of the Dominican order, were all seen to be levitated while engaged in their devotions. An ecstatic nun "rose from the ground with so much impetuosity, that five or six of the sisters could hardly hold her down." It is related by his biographers that Savonarola, shortly before he perished at the stake, remained suspended at a considerable height above the floor of his dungeon, absorbed in prayer.

Levitation before the Altar

The scene of the elevation of saints and ecstatics was most often the altar in the church, and the state which seemed to condition it was the deep trance-like state known as "rapture." St. Joseph of Copertino experienced 15 levitations in front of images of the Holy Virgin; his raptures in saying Mass were of frequent occurrence, and "his ecstasies and ascensions were witnessed not only by the people and the members of his order, but Pope Urban VIII saw him one day in this state and was intensely astonished. Joseph, bethinking himself that he was in the presence of the Vicar of Christ, fell into an ecstasy and was raised above the ground."

According to an official report, the original of which is in the Bibliotheque National of Paris, Françoise Fontaine, a young servant of Louviers, exorcized in 1591, was three times raised before the altar and the third time was carried through the air head downwards.

Fr. K. A. Schmöger recounted the statement of stigmatist Anne Catherine Emmerich (1774–1824):

"When I was doing my work as vestry-nun, I was often lifted up suddenly into the air, and I climbed up and stood on the higher parts of the church, such as windows, sculptured ornaments, jutting stones; I would clean and arrange everything in places where it was humanly impossible. I felt myself lifted and supported in the air, and I was not afraid in the least, for I had been accustomed from a child to being assisted by my guardian angel."

Of Abbé Claude Dhière (1757–1820), director of the Grand Séminaire of Grenoble, his biographer de Franclieu noted that: "When he experienced ecstasies during his Mass, it was usually at the Memento of the living and the dead, and the students who used to serve his Mass declare that, when enraptured, his feet did not touch the floor."

Lesser-known people also were reported to levitate on occasion, as was noted in the Frankfurter Zeitung of September 8, 1861:

"We read in the Gegenwart of Vienna that a Catholic Priest was preaching before his congregation last Sunday in the Church of St. Mary, at Vienna, on the subject of the constant protection of angels over the faithful committed to their charge, and this in words of great exaltation, and with an unction and eloquence which touched profoundly the hearts of numbers of the congregation. Soon after the commencement of the sermon, a girl of about 20 years of age, showed all signs of ecstasy, and soon, her arms crossed upon her bosom, and with her eyes fixed on the preacher, she was seen by the whole congregation to be raised gradually from the floor into the air, and there to rest at an elevation of more than a foot until the end of the sermon. We are assured that the same phenomenon had happened several days previously at the moment of her receiving the communion."

The French psychic investigator Col. Rochas received a personal testimony from Abbé Petit that once, to his great terror, he was levitated in the church.

In religious chronicles, one also meets with the antithesis of the phenomenon of levitation—excessive gravitation. G. Neubrigensis recorded the case of Raynerus, the wicked minister, who so overweighed a ship with his iniquity that in the midst of the stream it was unable to stir. As soon as he was put out of the ship they could easily sail away.

There is a seeming analogy to these questionable accounts from the past in the cases of hysterics who often claim such an increase of weight that they are unable to stir. That the feeling may not be purely imaginary is suggested by the case of the medium Alberto Fontana who, after a levitation, remained as if nailed to the floor, and nobody was able to move him.

Levitation in Witchcraft

In the tenth century, it was popularly charged that women who followed the pagan goddess Diana flew in the air to their rituals, but the church considered this a heretical delusion. However, during the witchcraft mania of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, confessions or accusations of transvection (flying through the air) were accepted as describing a reality. It was believed that witches smeared themselves with a special ointment which gave them the power of flight, usually mounted on a broomstick, a shovel, a distaff, or even an animal.

The inquisitors suggested that the transvection of witches was a fact and existed as a diabolical parody of the transports of saints. It now seems possible that behind some of the claimed transvection of witches may have been either vivid dreams or occasional out-of-the-body travel experiences, while some may have been hallucinations. Such experiences may have been induced by the special ointment, though other accounts claim that no such ointment was necessary to produce the experience. Some have argued that in light of well-attested accounts of the transvection of saints, it should be logical to consider that there may have been some genuine cases of levitation of witches.

From Witchcraft to Spiritualism

In ancient rituals, levitation was mentioned as a sign of possession. Charges of witchcraft or bewitchment usually followed the manifestation. Henry Jones, a 12-year-old English boy of Shepton-Mallet, England, was believed to be bewitched in 1657, as he was carried by invisible means from one room to another, and sometimes was wholly lifted up, so that his body hung in the air, with only the flat of his hands placed against the ceiling. One afternoon in the garden of Richard Isles, he was raised up and transported over the garden wall for about 30 yards.

Patrick Sandilands, a younger son of Lord Torpichen, was similarly believed to be the victim of witchcraft in 1720 at Caldor in Scotland. His tendency to rise entranced into the air was so great that his sisters had to watch him and sometimes could only keep him down by hanging to his skirts.

Mary London, a hysterical servant girl who was tried for witchcraft in 1661 at Cork, Ireland, was frequently transported by an invisible power to the top of the house.

The phenomenon was frequently witnessed in poltergeist cases. The Drummer of Tedworth would lift all the children up in their beds. During the disturbances at the Epworth Vicarage in 1716, Nancy Wesley was several times successfully lifted up with the bed on which she was sitting to a considerable height. Four of her sisters were present, among them Hetty, whom the disturbances chiefly followed (see Epworth phenomena). Harry Phelps, the 12-year-old son of the Rev. Eliakim Phelps around whom the Stratford, Connecticut, disturbances centered in 1850, was often lifted from the floor, was once put into a water cistern, and at another time was suspended from a tree.

During the age of animal magnetism, Dr. G. Billot reported that his somnambules sometimes rose into the air. If put into a bath during her trance, Frederica Hauffe, the Seeress of Prevorst, Germany, floated on the top of the water like a cork. If Dr. Justinus Kerner placed his fingers against her own, he could act like a magnet and lift her from the ground. In his book Physiologie, médecine, et métaphysique du magnétisme (1848), Louis J. J. Charpignon stated that Bourguignon, a mesmerist of Rouen, could lift several of his subjects from the ground by placing his hand over the epigastrium. Other experimenters have recorded with the same experience.

The levitation of Spiritualist mediums represents a simple continuity of an age-old phenomenon. When modern Spiritualism was introduced with the Rochester rappings, levitation soon appeared. It was recorded for the first time with Henry C. Gordon in February 1851. A year later, in Dr. Gray's house in New York, he was carried through the air to a distance of 60 feet.

If we accept Dr. R. T. Hallock's account before the New York Conference of June 18, 1852, there was an instance of Gordon's levitation in daylight in a crowded assembly room. According to Hallock, while he was delivering a lecture, Gordon, who sat at some distance from but in front of him, rose into the air, swayed from side to side, his feet grazing the top seats, and sank to the ground when the attention of the entire congregation became riveted on him. It was afterwards declared by the spirits that they intended to carry him over the heads of the sitters to the rostrum but that the audience had broken the necessary conditions of passivity.

The Levitations of D. D. Home

The next medium to exhibit the phenomenon was D. D. Home. His first levitation occurred August 8, 1852, in Ward Cheney's house at Manchester, Connecticut. The Hartford Times recorded the event:

"Suddenly and without any expectation on the part of the company, Mr. Home was taken up in the air. I had hold of his hand at the time, and I felt his feet—they were lifted a foot from the floor. He palpitated from head to foot with the contending emotions of joy and fear which choked his utterance. Again and again he was taken from the floor, and the third time he was carried to the ceiling of the apartment with which his hands and feet came in gentle contact. I felt the distance from the soles of his boots to the floor, and it was nearly three feet. Others touched his feet to satisfy themselves."

With no other medium was levitation so often and so reliably attested as with Home. In Britain, Sir William Crookes narrated his own experiences:

"On one occasion I witnessed a chair, with a lady sitting on it, rise several inches from the ground. On another occasion, to avoid the suspicion of this being in some way performed by herself, the lady knelt on the chair in such a manner that its four feet were visible to us. It then rose about three inches, remained suspended for about ten seconds and then slowly descended.

"At another time two children, on separate occasions rose from the floor with their chairs, in full daylight under (to me) most satisfactory conditions; for I was kneeling and keeping close watch upon the feet of the chair, observing distinctly that no one might touch them.

"The most striking instances of levitation which I have witnessed have been with Mr. Home. On three separate occasions have I seen him raised completely from the floor of the room. Once sitting in an easy chair and once standing up. On each occasion I had full opportunity of watching the occurrence as it was taking place.

"There are at least a hundred instances of Mr. Home's rising from the ground, in the presence of as many separate persons, and I have heard from the lips of the three witnesses to the most striking occurrence of this kind—the Earl of Dunraven, Lord Lindsay and Captain C. Wynne—their own most minute accounts of what took place. To reject the recorded evidence on this subject is to reject all human testimony whatever; for no fact in sacred or profane history is supported by a stronger array of proofs."

In the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (Vol. 6, no. 15, [1889]), Crookes further stated:

"On several occasions Home and the chair on which he was sitting at the table rose off the ground. This was generally done very deliberately, and Home sometimes tucked up his feet on the seat of the chair and held up his hands in full view of all of us. On such an occasion I have got down and seen and felt that all four legs were off the ground at the same time, Home's feet being on the chair. Less frequently the levitating power was extended to those sitting next to him. Once my wife was thus raised off the ground in her chair."

The striking occurrence to which Crookes referred in the first quotation was the most famous case in history of levitation. It was witnessed on December 13 (not December 16, as first printed in Lord Adare's book), 1868, at Ashley House, Victoria Street, London, in the presence of Adare, the Master of Lindsay and Charles Wynne, Adare's cousin. Home floated out of a third story window and came in through the window of another room.

Lord Adare noted: "He [Home] then said to us, 'Do not be afraid, and on no account leave your places' and he went out into the passage. Lindsay suddenly said 'Oh, good heavens! I know what he is going to do; it is too fearful.' " Adare: "What is it?"

Lindsay: "I cannot tell you, it is too horrible! Adah [the spirit of a deceased American actress] says that I must tell you; he is going out of the window in the other room, and coming in at this window.' We heard Home go into the next room, heard the window thrown up, and presently Home appeared standing upright outside our window; he opened the window and walked in quite coolly. 'Ah,' he said, 'you were good this time'—referring to our having sat still and not wished to prevent him. He sat down and laughed." Charlie: "What are you laughing at?"

Home: "We [the spirits; Home always was spoken of in third person when in trance] are thinking that if a policeman had been passing and had looked up and had seen a man turning round and round along the wall in the air he would have been much astonished. Adare, shut the window in the next room.' I got up, shut the window, and in coming back remarked that the window was not raised a foot, and that I could not think how he managed to squeeze through. He arose and said, 'Come and see.' I went with him; he told me to open the window as it was before. I did so; he told me to stand a little distance off; he then went through the open space, head first, quite rapidly, his body being nearly horizontal and apparently rigid. He came in again, feet foremost, and we returned to the other room. It was so dark I could not see clearly how he was supported outside. He did not appear to grasp, or rest upon, the balustrade, but rather to be swung out and in. Outside each window is a small balcony or ledge, 19 inches deep, bounded by stone balustrades, 18 inches high; the balustrades of the two windows are 7 feet 4 inches apart, measuring from the nearest points. A string-course, 4 inches wide, runs between the windows at the level of the bottom of the balus trade; and another 3 inches wide at the level of the top. Between the window at which Home went out, and that at which he came in, the wall recedes 6 inches. The rooms are on the third floor. . . . I asked Lindsay how Adah had spoken to him on the three occasions. He could scarcely explain; but said it did not sound like an audible human voice; but rather as if the tones were whispered or impressed inside his ear. When Home awoke he was much agitated; he said he felt as if he had gone through some fearful peril, and that he had a horrible desire to throw himself out of the window; he remained in a very nervous condition for a short time, then gradually became quiet." (Viscount Adare. Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home. London: privately printed, 1870).

The Master of Lindsay gave an account of the incident before the Committee of the Dialectical Society in London in 1869 and wrote out an account in 1871. Before the society he stated:

"I saw the levitations in Victoria Street, when Home floated out of the window; he first went into a trance and walked about uneasily; then he went into the hall; while he was away, I heard a voice whisper in my ear 'He will go out of one window and in at another.' I was alarmed and shocked at the idea of so dangerous an experiment. I told the company what I had heard, and we then waited for Home's return. Shortly after he entered the room, I heard the window go up, but I could not see it, for I sat with my back to it. I, however, saw his shadow on the opposite wall; he went out of the window in a horizontal position, and I saw him outside the other window [that in the next room] floating in the air. It was eighty-five feet from the ground. There was no balcony along the windows, merely a string course an inch and a half wide; each window had a small plant stand, but there was no connection between them."

In his letter dated July 14, 1871, published in the Spiritualist newspaper, there was a further addition to the story: "The moon was shining full into the room; my back was to the light, and I saw the shadow on the wall of the window sill, and Home's feet about six inches above it. He remained in this position for a few seconds, then raised the window and glided into the room feet foremost, and sat down."

Frank Podmore, the author of Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1906) who discredited the phenomenon of levitation, stated that he looked up a Nautical Almanack of 1868 and found that the moon was new and could not have lit the room, not even faintly. But in Lord Adare's almost contemporary account there is no mention of the moon. He only stated that "the light from the window was sufficient to enable us to distinguish each other." As the moon is not mentioned in the Master of Lindsay's account before the Dialectical Committee either, Podmore's criticism is probably based on a misstatement of facts.

Another line of attack was chosen by Dr. W. B. Carpenter, vice president of the Royal Society. In the Contemporary Review of January 1876, he wrote:

"A whole party of believers will affirm that they saw Mr. Home float out of the window and in at another, whilst a single honest sceptic declares that Mr. Home was sitting in his chair all the time. The 'single honest sceptic' could be no other than Captain Wynne, the third witness of the occurrence. However, when he narrated to Sir William Crookes, S. C. Hall and others what he saw, he was actually in accord with Lord Adare and the Master of Lindsay. When Carpenter's assertion found echo in an American book, W. A. Hammond's Spiritualism and Allied Causes and Conditions of Nervous Derangement (1876), Capt. Wynne being explicitly mentioned as the honest skeptic, D. D. Home challenged his testimony. Wynne, answering him explicitly declared: 'The fact of your having gone out of the window and in at the other I can swear to.' "

A different basis of suspicion was raised by Podmore in a letter that H. D. Jencken sent to Human Nature. According to this letter, a few days before the much-discussed miracle of levitation, Home had opened the same window in the presence of two of his later witnesses, stepped on the ledge outside, and to the great alarm of the Master of Lindsay, remained standing there, looking down at the street some 80 feet below. Podmore believed that this was a rehearsal and "What, no doubt, happened was that Home, having noisily opened the window in the next room, slipped back under cover of darkness into the séance room, got behind the curtains, opened the curtains, opened the window, and stepped on the window ledge."

In his Spiritualism: A Popular History from 1847 (1920), Joseph McCabe also attacked the case on the grounds of visibility and held it likely that it was only the shadow of Home which was seen. Andrew Lang took the stand that people in a room can see even in a fog a man coming in by the window, and going out again, head first, with body rigid.

The famous escapologist Harry Houdini (May 6, 1920) recorded in his diary: "I offered to do the D. D. Home levitation stunt at the same place that Home did it in 1868, and G. shirked and messed it up." According to the authors of Houdini and Conan Doyle, "He had evidently made a careful examination of the premises, with his customary thoroughness, and had decided that it would be possible to duplicate the performance, with suitable assistance. The assistant was apparently to have been G.; but the latter for some reason or other became frightened at the prospect, and backed out of the bargain." It is hardly necessary to stress that the possibility of Home having an accomplice is a most unreasonable one in the light of the circumstances of this celebrated levitation.

Subjective Sensations of Levitation

As Home was not always in trance when levitation occurred, he could give an account of his sensations. He wrote in his autobiography Incidents in My Life (1863):

"During these elevations, or levitations I usually experience in my body no particular sensation, than what I could only describe as an electrical fullness about the feet. I feel no hands supporting me, and since the first time, above described, have never felt fear, though if I had fallen from the ceiling of some rooms in which I have been raised, I could not have escaped serious injury. . . . At times, when I reach the ceiling, my feet are brought on a level with my face, and I am, as it were, in a reclining position. I have frequently been kept so suspended four or five minutes."

Home's account compares with that of the Rev. Stainton Moses of August 1872:

"I was carried up. I made a mark on the wall opposite my chest. I was lowered very gently until I found myself in my chair again. My sensation was that of being lighter than air. No pressure on any part of my body, no unconsciousness or entrancement. From the position of the mark on the wall it is clear that my head must have been close to the ceiling. The ascent of which I was perfectly conscious, was very gradual and steady, not unlike that of being in a lift, but without any perceptible sensation of motion other than that of feeling lighter than the atmosphere."

His only discomfort was a slight difficulty in breathing accompanied by a sensation of fullness in the chest. A longer account of subjective sensations appeared in the writings of St. Teresa of Avila, the famous reformer of the Carmelite Order. Explaining the difference between union and rapture, the saint wrote:

"Rapture, for the most part, is irresistible. It comes, in general, as a shock, quick and sharp, before you can collect your thoughts or help yourself in any way, and you see and feel it as a cloud or a strong eagle rising upwards and carrying you away on its wings. . . . Occasionally I was able, by great efforts, to make a slight resistance; but afterwards I was worn out, like a person who had been contending with a strong giant; at other times it was impossible to resist at all: my soul was carried away, and almost always my head with it—and now and then the whole body as well, so that it was lifted up from the ground. . . . It seemed to me, when I tried to make some resistance, as if a great force beneath my feet lifted me up, I know of nothing with which to compare it; . . . for it is a great struggle, and of little use, whenever our Lord so wills it. There is no power against this power. . . . When the rapture was over, my body seemed frequently to be buoyant, as if all the weight had departed from it; so much so that now and then I scarcely knew that my feet touched the ground."

Home stated: "I am generally lifted up perpendicularly, my arms frequently become rigid, and are drawn above my head, as if I were grasping the unseen power which slowly raises me from the floor."

Crookes saw him, in one instance, levitate in a sitting posture. On April 21, 1872, he recorded: "He was sitting almost horizontally, his shoulders resting on his chair. He asked Mrs. Walter Crookes to remove the chair from under him, as it was not supporting him. He was then seen to be sitting in the air, supported by nothing visible."

This account compares in an interesting manner with the deposition of the surgeon Francesco Pierpaoli about the last illness of St. Joseph of Copertino. The saint was sitting on a chair with his leg laid on the surgeon's knee. The surgeon began to cauterize it when he realized that Father Joseph was "rapt out of his senses." He said he:

"noticed that he was raised about a palm over the said chair, in the same position as before the rapture. I tried to lower his leg down, but I could not; it remained stretched out. . . . He had been a quarter of an hour in this situation when Father Silvestro Evangelista of the monastery of Osimo came up. He observed the phenomenon for some time, and commanded Joseph under obedience to come to himself, and called him by name. Joseph then smiled and recovered his senses."

A similar levitation in sitting posture was put on record by Eugerne Rochas in Recueil de documents relatifs à la lévitation du corps humain (1897), of the stigmatist from Ardeche, Victoire Claire of Coux, who died in 1883. Mrs. D., an eyewitness, testified:

"I saw her with great amazement remain with her eyes fixed but lively, and gradually raised above the chair whereon she was sitting. She stretched forth her arms, leaned her body forward, and remained thus suspended, her right leg bent up, the other touching the earth but by a toe. I saw Victoire in this position, impossible for anyone to keep up normally, every time she was in an ecstatic trance . . . more than a thousand times."

D. D. Home was often levitated in good light. Lord Lindsay categorically stated before the Dialectical Society that: "I once saw Home in full light standing in the air seventeen inches from the ground."

Strength of Levitating Power

Such contemporary testimony makes Home's levitations vie in importance with the stories of levitating saints. Olivier Leroy, manifesting his ecclesiastic bias, attributed mediumistic levitations to diabolic agency, but apart from his theological evaluation, there is no objective difference between levitating saints, demoniacs, and/or mediums. All are equally interesting to the parapsychologist.

Also noteworthy, according to von Görres, is the impossibility of causing the levitants to descend. Thus the Blessed Gilles, while one day reading a passage relative to ecstasy, was lifted up above the table. When found in this state by some of his brethren, he was seized and pulled at with all their strength, but they could not get him down. When Curé Peller wanted to give the Sacrament to Francoise Fontaine, the girl:

"kneeling down had been almost alarmingly carried away, without being able to take the Sacrament, opening her mouth, rolling her eyes in her head in such a horrible way that it had been necessary, with the help of five or six persons, to pull her down by her dress as she was raised into the air, and they had thrown her down on the floor."

According to Dom La Taste, Miss Thevenet, the Jansenist convulsionaire, "was sometimes raised seven or eight feet high up to the ceiling, and then could carry two persons pulling down with all their might, three feet above the ground."

Joseph Glanvill quoted the testimony of Valentine Greatrakes, the famous healer, as given at Lady Conway's castle in 1665 in the case of a butler who rose from the ground. Notwithstanding that Greatrakes and another man caught hold of him and held him with all their strength, he was forcibly taken up, and for a considerable time floated about in the air just over their heads.

Domic de Jesus-Marie was raised up to the ceiling of his cell and remained there without earthly support for a day and night. A skeptic who seized the floating body by the feet was on another occasion borne on high. Frightened, he let go and fell to the earth.

In the days of the Salem witchcraft persecutions (see America), the tormentors of Margaret Rule once "pulled her up to the ceiling of the chamber, and held her there before a numerous company of spectators who found it as much as they could do to pull her down again."

In séance and table-tipping experiences, the power that effects levitation is often short-circuited as soon as the chain of hands is broken, the gaze of the sitters is too intense, the light is switched on, or the levitated body is touched.

While in the house of Agnes Guppy-Volckman and in the presence of Mary Hardy, the American medium Florence Marryat observed:

"Mrs. Guppy did not wish to take part in the séance, so she retired to the back drawing-room with the Baroness Adelma Vay and other visitors, and left Mrs. Hardy with the circle in the front [drawing room]. Suddenly, however, she was levitated and carried in sight of us all into the midst of our circle. As she felt herself rising in the air she called out: 'Don't let go hands, for Heaven's sake.' We were just standing in a ring, and I had hold of the hand of Prince Albert of Solms. As Mrs. Guppy came sailing over our heads, her feet caught his neck and mine, and in our anxiety to do as she told us, we gripped tight hold of each other and were thrown forward on our knees by the force with which she was carried past us into the centre. . . . The influence that levitated her, moreover, placed her on a chair with such a bump that it broke the two front legs off" (There is No Death, 1891).

The levitations of the medium A. Zuccarini were photographed. The flash of magnesium light caused the medium to fall back into the cabinet, but he was not hurt. One of the photographs showed the medium with his feet about 20–24 inches above the table. According to Prof. Murani, the duration of the levitation was about 12–14 seconds.

M. Macnab, an engineer, wrote in 1888 in Gaborieau's Lotus Rouge of the levitation of M. C., a sculptor: "Another time, having accidentally lighted up, while he was levitated on the music-stool, he fell heavily from a height of from fifty to sixty centimetres, so heavily that the foot of the stool was broken."

Macnab devised an ingenious means of control. He spread on the ground a square of very thin material, placed a chair in the middle and had M. C. sit on it. The sitters then held a corner of the material and, when the medium was levitated, could lift it up and test the height of the chair on which the medium was sitting in the air.

Home often asked the sitters not to look at him at the moment he was being carried up. Robert Bell touched his foot when he passed over him in the air. It "was withdrawn quickly and with a palpable shudder," he wrote; "it was floating and sprang from the touch as a bird would." In another instance, however, James Wason, a Liverpool solicitor, testified: "Laying hold and keeping hold of his hand, I moved along with him five or six paces as he floated above me in the air, and I only let go his hand when I stumbled against a stool." Apparently the conditions greatly depend upon the available power. Crookes observed instances in which it was ample to impart levitation to others.

Psychic investigator Gambier Bolton reported a similar experience in a séance with the medium Cecil Husk in his book Psychic Force (1904):

"At one of our experimental meetings, one of the observers (a man weighing quite 12 stones) was suddenly raised from the floor, with the chair in which he was sitting; and releasing the hands of those who were holding his hands, he was levitated in his chair, greatly to his surprise, until his feet were just above the heads of the other experimenters present. He remained stationary in the air for a few seconds and then slowly descended to the floor again. Fourteen observers were present."

Lord Lindsay witnessed Home floating with an armchair in his hand: "I then felt something like velvet touch my cheek, and on looking up, was surprised to find that he had carried with him an armchair, which he held out in his hand and then floated round the room, pushing the pictures out of their places as he passed along the walls. They were far beyond the reach of a person on the ground" (Report on Spiritualism . . . of the London Dialectical Society, 1871).

The medium William Eglinton, noted for his fradulent phenomena, was levitated in the presence of the emperor and empress of Russia, the grand duke of Oldenburg, and the grand duke Vladimir. "My neighbours," he wrote, "had to stand on their chairs to follow me. I continued to rise till my feet touched two shoulders on which I leaned. They were those of the Czar."

Simultaneous Levitations

At one of Eglinton's levitations in Calcutta, India, in 1882, the stage magician Harry Kellar, while holding firmly the left hand of the medium, was pulled after him: "his own body appeared for the time being to have been rendered non-susceptible to gravity."

In his book What Am I? (2 vols., 1873), E. W. Cox described a violent outburst of power:

"Mr. Williams, although held firmly by myself on one side and an F.R.S. on the other, was instantaneously lifted from his chair and placed in a sitting posture on the table. Mr. Herne was in like manner thrown flat upon his back upon the table, while his hands were held by two others of the party. While thus lying he was suddenly raised from the table, as if he had been flung by a giant, and thrown over the heads of the sitters to the corner of the room. The height to which he was actually thrown may be judged by this, that he knocked down a picture that was hung upon the wall, at a height of eight feet."

Dr. Nicholas Santangelo of Venosa wrote in a letter to psychic researcher Dr. Paul Joire:

"When the medium Ruggieri commenced to rise I held him firmly by the hand, but seeing myself drawn with such force as almost to lose my footing I held on to his arms, and thus I was raised in the air with my companion, who was on the other side of the medium. We were all three raised in the air to a height of at least three yards above the floor, since I distinctly touched with my feet the hanging lamp which was suspended from the centre of the ceiling. . . . The three mediums, Cecrehini, Ruggieri and Boella were also raised into space until they almost touched the ceiling."

On another occasion, Santangelo and M. Gorli, holding the hands of the medium Alberto Fontana, were suddenly lifted on the table, Gorli standing, Santangelo kneeling. Later the medium, who was seated in his chair, was suddenly thrown full length under the table with such force that Gorli was dragged with him and Santangelo was thrown down.

Accounts of such cases of simultaneous levitation are quite rare. One very early account was cited in Col. Henry Yule's The Book of Ser Marco Polo (1871). The story was told by Ibn Batuta, the Moor who lived in the fourteenth century, and concerned seven Indian jugglers who rose in the air in a sitting posture. However, Ibn Batuta confessed to a loss of consciousness, so it is possible that the experience was the result of hypnotic suggestion. Another yet earlier account from the second century B.C.E. is found in Philostratus' Life of Apollonius of Tyana and has even less evidential value. Damis, a disciple of Apollonius, stated that he had seen Brahmins suspended in the air at the height of two cubits, and that they could walk there without visible support.

The evidential value of records improves as time progresses. St. Joseph of Copertino was seen to rise in the air with a lamb on his shoulder. Once he grasped the confessor of the convent by the hand, snatched him off the floor, and began whirling round with him in midair. Another time he seized by the hair an insane nobleman who was brought to him to be healed, uttered his usual shout, and soared up with the patient who finally came down cured. St. Teresa of Avila and St. John of the Cross, while engaged in a conversation about the Trinity, were seen lifted up simultaneously.

In the mediumistic age, the first record is of the Davenport Brothers. The three children, Ira, William, and Elizabeth, were seen at an early age floating high up in the air at the same time. A joint levitation of Frank Herne and Guppy-Volckman was described in an attested record in Catherine Berry's Experiences in Spiritualism (1876):

"After this, Mr. Herne was floated in the air, his voice being heard near the ceiling, while his feet were felt by several persons in the room, Mrs. Guppy who sat next to him being struck on the head by his boots as he sank into the chair. In a few minutes he recommenced ascending, and as Mrs. Guppy on this occasion determined, if possible, to prevent it, she held his arm, but the only result was that she ascended with him, and both floated together with the chairs on which they sat. Rather unfortunately, at this moment the door was unexpectedly opened, and Mr. Herne fell to the ground, injuring his shoulder, Mrs. Guppy alighting with considerable noise on the table where, on the production of light, she was found comfortably seated though considerably alarmed.''

On occasions, the American medium Charles Foster also registered great anxiety. According to Dr. John Ashburner, author of Notes and Studies on the Philosophy of Animal Magnetism and Spiritualism (1867): ''He grasped my right hand, and beseeched me not to quit my hold of him; for he said there was no knowing where the spirits might convey him. I held his hand, and he was floated in the air towards the ceiling. At one time Mrs. W. C. felt a substance at her head, and putting up her hands, discovered a pair of boots above her head.''

The following case is an interesting contrast. About 1858, strong physical phenomena were recorded in the Poston Circle in America. The seven-year-old son of Charles Cathcart, an ex-congressman of Indiana, was often levitated and tossed about in the air. The spirit control, ''John King'' was credited with the manifestation. The little boy shouted with delight and cried: ''Go it, old King. I am not a bit afraid; take me again.'' For details of the Poston Circle, see Modern American Spiritualism by Emma Hardinge (1869; 1970).

Another ''baby story'' was told by Florence Marryat about ''Dewdrop,'' the child control of Bessie Williams, who grew very impatient when the medium's 15-month-old baby interrupted her chants with crying. She usually went up to quiet him, relinquishing the control of the medium for a few minutes, and reassuming it after. One day her attempt at pacifying the baby failed, for she returned saying: ''It is no good, I have had to bring him down. He is on the mat outside the door.'' The baby, who was on the top story and could not yet walk, was found there, wailing, in his night shirt.

Cases in which the mediums have been levitated to the top of the table while sitting in a chair and holding the hands of the sitters are very numerous. Charles Richet classified them as semi-levitations, including as such the loss of weight of the medium also. Many physical mediums have at one time or other performed this feat. A curious testimony of the medium Henry Slade was given by Dr. Kettredge, a schoolmate, in Light (1909), according to which Slade was once levitated when sound asleep and was carried from one bed to another in a recumbent position.

The Levitations of Eusapia Palladino and Other Mediums

The levitations of Eusapia Palladino were among the best observed cases. Cesare Lombroso, Dr. Ercole Chiaia, Dr. Julien Ochorowitz, Col. Rochas, Prof. Porro, Prof. Enrico Morselli, and Dr. de Albertis testified to the facts. Chiaia reported a case in which he:

''found the medium stretched out, her head and a small portion of her back supported on the top of the table, and the remainder of the body extended horizontally, straight as a bar, and without any support to the lower part, whilst her dress was adhering to her legs as if her clothing was fastened or stitched around her. One evening I saw the medium stretched out rigid in the most complete cataleptic state, holding herself in a horizontal position, with only her head resting on the edge of the table for five minutes with the gas lighted in the presence of Prof. de Cinties, Dr. Capuano, the well-known writer, and Mr. Frederic Verdinois and other persons.''

In Lombroso's After Death—What? (1909) there is an account of Palladino's levitation by a semi-materialized phantom:

''On the evening of the 28th September, while her hands were being held back by MM. Richet and Lombroso, she complained of hands which were grasping her under the arms; then, while in trance, with the changed voice characteristic of this state, she said: 'Now I lift my medium up on the table.' After two or three seconds the chair, with Eusapia in it, was not violently dashed, but lifted without hitting anything, on the top of the table and MM. Richet and I are sure that we did not even assist the levitation by our force. After some talk in the trance state the medium announced her descent and (M. Finzi having been substituted for me) was deposited on the floor with the same security and precision, while MM. Richet and Finzi followed the movements of her hands and body without at all assisting them, and kept asking each other questions about the position of the hands. Moreover during the descent, both gentlemen repeatedly felt a hand touch them on the head.''

At a later date, there are records by Dr. Schwab on the levitation of Maria Vollhardt and by Baron Schrenck-Notzing on Willy Schneider. Willy, to quote from René Sudre's Introduction à la metapsychique humaine (1926), ''horizontally . . . seemed to rest on an invisible cloud. He ascended to the ceiling and remained five minutes suspended there, moving his legs about rhythmically. The descent was as sudden as the up-lighting. The supervision had been perfect. Geley in his last journey to Vienna also witnessed a levitation of Willy at Dr. Holub's and he told me he felt absolutely sure of the genuineness of the phenomenon.''

Carlo Mirabelli, the South American medium, was fastened to an armchair in the presence of several members of the Academia de Estudo Psychicos ''Cesare Lombroso.'' After that he rose from the ground and remained two minutes suspended twelve feet over the floor. The witnesses passed under the levitated body. At Santos, in the street, he was lifted up from a motor car for about three minutes.

Length of Time, Height, Luminosity

The period of mediumistic levitation seldom exceeds a few minutes. The fakir Covindassamy, of whom Louis Jacolliot wrote in Occult Science in India (1884), established a fairly good duration.

''As the Fakir was about to leave me, to go to his breakfast. . . . He stopped in the embrasure of the door leading from the terrace to the outside stairs, and, crossing his arms upon his chest, lifted himself up gradually, without any apparent support or assistance, to the height of about ten to twelve inches. I was able to determine the distance exactly by means of a point of comparison which I had fixed upon during the continuance of the phenomenon. Behind the Fakir's back there was a silken hanging, which was used as a portière, striped in gold and white bands of equal width. I noticed that the Fakir's feet were on a level with the sixth band. At the commencement of his ascension I had seized my chronometer; the entire time from the moment when the Fakir commenced to rise until he touched the ground again, was more than eight minutes. He remained perfectly still, at the highest point of elevation for nearly five minutes.''

In this case, however, we have only Jacolliot's unsupported statements. Ten minutes is far behind the achievements of the saints. St. Joseph of Copertino was testified to have once remained suspended in the air at the height of the trees in the garden for more than two hours. And accounts of his levitations were confirmed by reliable witnesses.

The record of height attained belongs to a fakir who, according to Count Perovsky-Petrovo Solovovo in Proceedings of the Society for Psychic Research (Vol. 38, p. 276) was levitated in the presence of a crowd, about twice the height of a five-story building.

The levitation of saints is often accompanied by luminous phenomena, like the aura. The light that surrounds their body is said to be dazzling, sometimes lighting up the room. In mediumistic cases, the luminous phenomena are of a separate order. But they may also accompany levitation. Home wrote in Incidents in My Life (2nd series, 1872), ''Just before this took place [levitation] we saw his whole face and chest covered with the same silvery light which we had observed on our host's [Mr. S. C. Hall's] face."

With some of the saints, intense corporeal heat was also noticed during their elevation. The difference between the ecstatic and ordinary trance state may eventually shed light on such epiphenomena.

More Recent Accounts of Levitation

During the 1930s, various mediums apparently demonstrated levitations. In 1938 the British newspaper Daily Mirror (June 13) published an impressive photograph of the medium Colin Evans apparently levitating. However, such photographic evidence is far from conclusive.

In his book The Haunted Mind (1959), Dr. Nandor Fodor devoted a chapter to "Phenomena of Levitation" and described his own investigation of the claimed levitation of the medium Harry Brown. A photograph of the medium apparently levitated in trance showing his coat-line dead straight and the buttons without blurring. Had the medium jumped from his chair, one would have expected the coat to have flapped and the buttons to blur.

Recent accounts of mediumistic levitation are rare. In the Enfield Poltergeist case in 1977, one of the children involved claimed to have floated about a room, and there is a photograph of her apparently levitated during an investigation.

A case of levitation associated with demonic possession was reported in Rome. The British newspaper Sunday People (May 15, 1977) described how the nun "Sister Rosa" in a Rome convent was the center of poltergeist type disturbances in which objects around her in a room would rise up and fly around, and the nun herself was levitated on several occasions. The Sisters of the convent stated to a reporter that Sister Rosa had once floated through the ceiling and was found standing on the floor above. The Mother Superior of the convent consulted Padre Candido, a leading exorcist in Rome, but the phenomena persisted. Sister Rosa was sent to no less than five different exorcists in other parts of Italy, but after returning was again surrounded by diabolic disturbances. These included persecution of the nun by inanimate objects, such as cactus thorns that became embedded in her head and could not be removed until washed with holy water. An iron bar is said to have broken loose from a door and moved through the walls to materialize in the nun's cell and commenced beating her while she slept. Kitchen knives were reported as flying from a table and trying to stab the nun in the chest. On other occasions, the nun is said to have spoken obscenities, using a gutteral "animal-like" voice, and had to be restrained by five nuns from attacking the cross and the altar.

A recent documentary film "Journey into the Beyond" (Burbank International Pictures) featured a spectacular scene of the apparent levitation of an African witch doctor. It was filmed in a small village somewhere between Dahomey and Togo. Witch doctor Togo Owaku is shown meditating on the shores of a lake, then at dusk walking in front of a large palm tree and drawing a circle in the sand with his staff. A fire is built, and as darkness falls, drummers build up an impressive rhythm. Inside the circle, Owaku spreads out his arms and begins to float upwards to a height of about three feet. The scene is shown by two cameras, one in front and the other in the rear, and the ascent occupies about ten seconds. The film was directed by Frank Martin Lang, later known as "Rolf Olsen." When he was interviewed by Alan Vaughan, one of the editors of New Realities magazine, it seemed that the film team believed this to be a genuine case of levitation. However, some doubts remain, since the witch doctor himself picked the site, and the incident took place in darkness illuminated by the light of the fires.

In the 1970s a teaching course in levitation was offered by an academy organized by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi in Lucerne, Switzerland. This novel development of Transcendental Meditation was reported by various newspapers between May and July 1977. The London Evening News (May 16) stated that 12 individuals had just graduated from the first six-month course in levitation. One of them, Mrs. Albertine Haupt, stated: "I suddenly found myself six feet above the floor and thought, 'Heavens, I've done it.' " Although the floor was covered with foam rubber, she landed precipitately, and other students, equally successful in levitating, sustained bruises. Haupt stated: "It is just a matter of learning to control the power."

The Daily Mirror (July 14, 1977) stated that reporter Michael Hellicar interviewed the maharishi but was refused a demonstration of levitation. His followers refused to permit photographs being taken and stated, "We will not turn this into a circus." However, they produced their own picture taken two days earlier showing disciples apparently levitating, and this was reproduced in the Daily Mirror report.

In the London Evening News (May 18, 1977), professional magician David Berglas offered to pay £2,000 to any levitator who could hover six inches or more above the ground in a public demonstration, and up to £10,000 if as many as five of the Maharishi disciples demonstrated the ability together. The challenge was not accepted. In India, if certain yoga practices result in the ability to levitate, as well as other siddhis, or psychic powers, yogis are enjoined to avoid pride in such feats, which might hinder spiritual emancipation. As of the mid-1990s, no general satisfactory evidence exists that levitation is occurring among the maharishi's students, and several former siddha students have successfully sued the Maharishi's organization, claiming that it had failed to teach them to levitate.

Theories of Levitation

How can levitation be possible? What power or agent accomplishes it? The most obvious explanation—the possession of a word of mystical power—is little more than legendary. This appears in an ancient Jewish anti-gospel Toledoth Jeshu: Life of Jesus, composed about the sixth century B.C.E. which G. R. S. Mead quoted in his book Did Jesus Live 100 Years B.C.?:

"And there was in the sanctuary a foundation stone—and this is its interpretation: God founded it and this is the stone on which Jacob poured oil—and on it were written the letters of the Shem [Shem Hamephoresch, the ineffable name, of which only the consonants Y.H.V.H. are given to indicate the pronunciation as known to the initiated] and whosoever learned it, could do whatsoever he would. But as the wise feared that the disciples of Israel might learn them and therewith destroy the world, they took measures that no one should do so.

"Brazen dogs were bound to two iron pillars at the entrance of the place of burnt offerings, and whosoever entered in and learned these letters—as soon as he went forth again, the dogs bayed at him; if he then looked at them the letters vanished from his memory.

"This Jeschu came, learned them, wrote them on parchment, cut into his hip and laid the parchment with the letters therein—so that the cutting of his flesh did not hurt him—then he restored the skin to its place. When he went forth the brazen dogs bayed at him, and the letters vanished from his memory. He went home, cut open his flesh with his knife, took out the writing, learned the letters."

Queen Helene, being greatly troubled by the miracles of Jesus, sent for the wise men of Israel. They decided to use against Jesus his own medicine and taught Juda Ischariota the secret of learning the letters of the Shem. In the presence of Queen Helene and the wise men, Jesus (says the chronicle) "raised his hands like unto the wings of an eagle and flew, and the people were amazed because of him: How is he able to fly twixt heaven and earth?"

"Then spake the wise men of Israel to Juda Ischariota: 'Do thou also utter the letters and ascend after him. Forthwith he did so, flew in the air, and the people marvelled: How can they fly like eagles?' Ischariota acted cleverly, flew in the air, but neither could overpower the other, so as to make him fall by means of the Shem, because the Shem was equally with both of them."

The belief expressed in Robert Kirk's Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns and Fairies (written 1691, published 1815 etc.), that levitation is accomplished by fairies, explains as little as crediting spirits with the feat or ascribing it to Taoist charms which, when swallowed, have the effect of carrying people to any place they think of. Nevertheless, the legend of the world of power persists alongside with the fairy agency. Writing of the teleportation of Lord Duffus, John Aubrey stated in his Miscellanies (1696 etc.) that the fairies cry "Horse and Hattock," and whenever a man is moved to repeat the cry he will be caught up.

At the dawn of the scientific age, early observers of psychic phenomena speculated on "electric," "magnetic," "mesmeric," and "odic" forces. They are all now antiquated notions.

From a theological viewpoint, J. J. von Görres explained nothing when he stated that the source of levitation is in the human organism and is produced by a pathological process or a mystic disposition of the soul. He described the pathological process of somnambules as a "kind of interior tempest aroused by the mechanical forces of the organism being suddenly upset." He described the mystical disposition as a condition for the reception of the Holy Ghost, with levitation due to this special gift setting the natural mechanism of the body in motion. Von Görres' idea may be a halfway house between naturalistic and supernatural theories, but it is more satisfactory than the Catholic view, which ascribed the levitation of the saints to a divine marvel and that of "demoniacs" and mediums to diabolic trickery. While the first claim is unacceptable to science, the second is too much in agreement with the extreme Spiritualistic idea that spirits have the power to act on matter directly.

Anti-Gravity Phenomena

Scientific interest in anti-gravity phenomena goes back many years. Documentation about variations of the gravitational field of the Earth were noted as early as 1672 by Jean Richer, and the first practical gravity meter was invented in 1833 by Sir John Herschel.

The repulsion effect of aluminum to electromagnetism is well known, and in 1914 the French inventor M. Bachelet demonstrated a working model of his Levitated Railway system. A Bachelet Levitated Railway Syndicate was formed to promote a full-scale layout, but the development was abandoned at the outbreak of World War I.

Scientists in various countries have conducted secret researches in "electro-gravities," the science of anti-gravity effects, and some devices have been constructed in which levitation of disk-like forms has been achieved in laboratory tests. Little has so far been published on such work, and conjecture exists that some UFO reports may concern such levitated devices. The Gravity Research Foundation of New Boston, New Hampshire, which was founded by Roger W. Babson, investigated various aspects of scientific inquiry into gravity and its anomalies. Recently the principle of magnetic levitation has been revived in novelty advertising displays. In Germany and Japan, researchers have investigated the feasibility of creating high-speed magnetic levitation railroads, while in Britain, a section of magnetic levitation railroad is operating at Birmingham International Airport.

The Cantilever Theory of Levitation

Some investigators have attempted to explain human levitation on the same basis as movement of objects by psychic force (telekinesis or psychokinesis). Between 1917 and 1920, Dr. W. J. Crawford of Belfast, Ireland, investigated the phenomena of the Goligher Circle. He studied alteration in weight of the medium Kathleen Goligher during levitation of a table, and claimed that the levitation was effected by "psychic rods" of ectoplasm emanating from the medium, which found leverage in the medium's body, acting as cantilevers. He obtained flashlight photographs of these psychic structures.

The parapsychologist René Sudre believed that Crawford's cantilever theory accounted for the movement of distant objects by the extrusion of elastic and resisting pseudopods from the body of the medium and thus sufficiently explained levitation:

"From a theoretical point of view, the levitation of a person is as easy to understand as that of an object. The teleplastic levers have naturally their fulcrum on the floor. Their shape is not definite; it may be that of a simple stay, of a cloudy cushion, or even a complete human materialization. The force of gravity is not eluded, but simply opposed by a contrary upward power. The spent amount of energy is not above that required for the production of the phenomenon of telekinesis."

According to Crawford, however, the sphere of action of pseudopods was limited to about 7 feet, the extreme mobility of the levitated body had to be accounted for, and the cantilever structure was very sensitive to light. Therefore such ectoplasm hardly lent itself as a mechanism for daylight levitation as in the case of Home or saints and stigmatics. (Later Crawford's observations were called into question due to fraud in the Goligher Circle.)

The Effect of Willpower

The possibility of the effect of willpower on levitation was suggested by Capt. J. Alleyne Bartlett in a lecture before the London Spiritualist Alliance on May 3, 1931. He often had the feeling that he could lighten his weight at will. He stepped on a scale and willed that his weight should be reduced, and the scale indicated, in fact, a loss of several pounds. To make such observations unobjectionable, the possible pressure of cantilever structures on the floor around the weighing machine ought to be made a matter of control.

The loss of weight in the levitated body may be an appearance due to the effect of a force which lifts or, if internally applied, makes the body buoyant. The best evidence as to the alleged extraordinary lightness of the bodies of saints and ecstatics is furnished in a case quoted by Col. Rochas of an ecstatic who lived in a convent near Grenoble. Three eyewitnesses, a parish priest, a university professor, and a student of the polytechnic school, stated that "her body would sometimes become stiff and so light that it was possible to lift her up like a feather by holding her by the elbow." According to some hypnotists, the phenomenon could be accomplished by simple hypnotic suggestion. During the early 1980s the question of possible paranormal changes of weight was the subject of experiments by parapsychologists John B. Hasted, David Robertson, and Ernesto Spinelli.

Special Breathing Techniques

Breathing exercises that form an important part in Eastern psychic development are believed by some practitioners to have a curious effect on the weight of the human body. According to Hindu yoga teachings, they generate a force that partially counteracts gravitation. They say that he who awakens the Anahata Chakra (a psychic and spiritual center situated in the region of the heart) "can walk in the air."

The psychic researcher Camille Flammarion believed that by breathing, even the ordinary sitters of a circle release a motor energy comparable to that which they release when repeatedly moving their arms. Hereward Carrington's experiments with the "lifting game" seemed to show that, for some mysterious reason, rhythmical breathing may considerably reduce the weight of the human body. At the third International Psychical Congress in Paris in 1927, Baron Schrenck-Notzing described the case of a young man who claimed that by breathing exercises he had levitated his own body 27 times.

In Alexandra David-Neel's With Mystics and Magicians in Tibet (1931 etc.), there is a description of a practice that especially enabled its adepts to take extraordinary long hikes with amazing rapidity. It is called lung-gom and it combines mental concentration with various breathing gymnastics. Meeting a lung-gom-pa in Northern Tibet, she noticed: "The man did not run. He seemed to lift himself from the ground, proceeding by leaps. It looked as if he had been endowed with the elasticity of a ball and rebounded each time his feet touched the ground. His steps had the regularity of a pendulum."

The breathing exercises of the lung-gom-pa had to be practiced for three years and three months during strict seclusion in complete darkness. It was claimed that the body of those who trained themselves for years became exceedingly light, nearly without weight: "These men, they say, are able to sit on an ear of barley without bending its stalk or to stand on the top of a heap of grain without displacing any of it. In fact the aim is levitation." One of these exercises was described as follows: "The student sits cross-legged on a large and thick cushion. He inhales slowly and for a long time, just as if he wanted to fill his body with air. Then, holding his breath he jumps up with legs crossed, without using his hands and falls back on his cushion, still remaining in the same position. He repeats that exercise a number of times during each period of practice. Some lamas succeed in jumping very high in that way."

Some initiates asserted that "as a result of long years of practice, after he has traveled over a certain distance the feet of the lung-gom-pa no longer touch the ground and that he glides on the air with an extreme celerity." Some lung-gom-pas wore iron chains around their body for "they are always in danger of floating in the air."

David-Neel discovered that during their walk the lung-gom-pas were in a state of trance. They concentrated on the cadenced mental recitation of a mystic formula with which, during the walk, the in and out breathing must be in rhythm, the steps keeping time with the breath and the syllables of the formula. The walker must neither speak, nor look from side to side. He must keep his eyes fixed on a single distant object and never allow his attention to be attracted by anything else. The use of a mystical formula, or mantra, as an adjunct to levitation recalls the legends of sacred words in the Judeo-Christian tradition.

The Elevation of Famous Dancers

The observation that the lung-gom-pas are able to sit on an ear of barley without bending its stalk finds a suggestive parallel in the history of famous dancers. It was said of Maria Taglioni that "she seemed to be able to walk on a cornfield without bending the ears." While such unusual lightness may be purely metaphorical hyperbole, there is evidence that the élévation of some famous dancers demonstrated the rudiments of levitation.

Vestris père, the "Dioux de la Dance," said of his famous son, Augustus Vestris: "Il resterait toujours en l'air, s'il ne craignait d'humilier ces camarades" (He would always remain in the air but feared to humiliate his comrades). Cyril W. Beaumont wrote of Vaslav Nijinski that "in execution of leaps he displayed a rare quality which contemporaries observed in the dancing of both Vestris and Taglioni—the ability to remain in the air at the highest point of élévation before descending."

There is a specific technique for dancers who try remaining in the air. Before taking a leap, the dancer breathes deeply and keeps on drawing in during the leap. He holds his breath while up and tightens his thigh muscles so that his trunk should rest on his thighs.

However, the capacity of the lungs appears to have less to do with the feat than the development of thigh muscles. Diaghilev noticed of Nijinski: "His élévation is nearly three feet. . . . Nature has endowed him with tendons of steel and tensile muscles so strong that they resemble those of the great cats. A real lion of the dance, he could cross the diagonal of the stage in two bounds."

Nikolai Legat, who was the leader of the class of perfection at the Imperial Theatre School of Warsaw, disclosed in Der Tanz (Berlin, February 1933) the following observations:

"As an example of phenomenally high, beautiful and elastic élévation I hold the memory of N. P. Damaschoff, the dancer of the great Imperial Theatre of Moscow. . . . I have never seen such an élévation in my life. The impression was that Damaschoff, after the high jump, remained for a longer time in the air. Rather smaller than of middle stature he possessed extraordinary leg muscles with respectable thighs and impressive calves. Tightening his leg muscles, especially those of the thighs in the air, he made all his moderate jumps fairly high. During the leap he held his breath, i.e., he breathed in shortly before the spring and breathed out as soon as he was down again." It is for future research to elucidate the relationship between muscular tension in the thighs, deep breathing, and suspension in the air.

The question of levitation remains a fascinating one. The evidence for levitation of Christian saints is strong, even if anecdotal. Particular interest is attached to the subjective aspect, as expressed in the writings of St. Teresa of Avila and other saints.

There seems good ground for believing that levitation has sometimes been characteristic of possession and poltergeist cases, but the evidence is less reliable. Abnormal morbid mental states may involve uncontrolled muscular feats such as leaps in the air that could be mistaken for levitation. Moreover the spectator moods of horror or loathing could impede clear observation. It is not clear whether movement of objects without contact (psychokinesis) is related to the same mechanisms as levitation of human beings. On the face of things, it seems unlikely since the subjective human aspects of levitation are distinct from the objective application of some kind of psychic force to inanimate objects.

The Hindu yoga teachings on pranayama breathing techniques offer one line of inquiry. The concept of prana as the dynamic force in the human body, connected with the latent power of kundalini, offer a repeatable, observable situation. In this connection, the expensive special TM-Siddhi courses of the Transcendental Meditation movement (siddhi is a yoga term for special accomplishment) are clearly a packaging of the standard Hindu yoga teachings of Patanjali and others. The cross-legged position sounds like a copy of the lung-gom-pa exercise described by David-Neel. There is no supporting evidence, but some of the TM meditators may have achieved degrees of levitation because they were accelerated by the suggestible aura of success.

Indeed, suggestion may be a secondary factor in achieving levitation, in much the same way that Jules Romains claimed that it assisted the development of the special faculty of "eyeless sight."

In some cases, out-of-the-body phenomena may have been confused with levitation, particularly from the point of view of the subjective sensations of floating in the air. The evidence for the reality of the claimed levitations of some psychic mediums, in particular D. D. Home, is impressive. It is possible that special aspects of breathing may play some part, as with the elevation of some dancers, but combined with states of exaltation.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Crawford, W. J. Experiments in Psychic Science. London: John M. Watkins, 1919. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1919.

———. The Psychic Structures in the Goligher Circle. London: John M. Watkins, 1921. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1921.

———. The Reality of Psychic Phenomena. London: John M. Watkins, 1916. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1916.

Dingwall, E. J. Some Human Oddities. London: Home & Van Thal, 1947. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Dunraven, Earl of. Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home. 1869. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Feilding, Everard. Sittings with Eusapia Palladino and Other Studies. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Fodor, Handor. The Haunted Mind: A Psychoanalyst Looks at the Supernatural. New York: Helix Press, 1959.

Forwald, Haakon. Mind, Matter, and Gravitation: a Theoretical and Experimental Study. New York: Parapsychological Foundation, 1969.

Goldney, Mrs. A. P., Mrs. H. Richard, and others. "Photographs of Jumping Model Imitating Levitation." Proceedings of the Society for Psychic Research 45, no. 158.

Hasted, John B., David Robertson, and Ernesto Spinelli. "Recording of Sudden Paranormal Changes of Body Weight." In Research in Parapsychology 1982. Eds. W. G. Roll, John Beloff, and Rhea A. White. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1983.

Kuvalayananda, Swami. Pranayama. Bombay, India: 1931. Frequently reprinted.

Leroy, Olivier. Levitation. London: Burns, Oates, 1928.

Patanjali. The Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali. Translated by M. N. Dvivedi. Adyar, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1890.

Plinth, August. Principles of Levitation. New York: White Sun Prees, 1970.

Prasad, Rama. The Science of Breath and the Philosophy of the Tattvas . . . Nature's Finer Forces. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1897.

Richards, Steve. Levitation: What It Is, How It Works, How to Do It. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1980.

Rogo, D. Scott. Miracles: A Parascientific Inquiry into Wondrous Phenomena. New York: Dial Press, 1982.

Underhill, Evelyn. Mysticism: A Study in the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1911.

Von Görres, J. J. Die Christliche Mystik. 5 vols. Regensburg & Landshut, 1836–42.

"Leviticon"

A gospel adopted by revivalist French Templars of the nineteenth century and alleged by them to have been discovered in the Temple at Paris, along with other objects. It was supposed to have been composed in the fifteenth century by the Greek monk Nicephorus, who sought to combine Moslem tenets with Christianity. It was translated into French, with modifications, by Fabré Palaprat (a Freemason) in 1822.

Sources:

Heckethorn, Charles. The Secret Societies of all Ages and Countries. 2 vols. 1897. Revised ed., N.p., 1965.

Levy, Walter J., Jr. (ca. 1948–)

Former director of the Institute for Parapsychology in Durham, North Carolina, who was accused of fraudulently manipulating data in one of his experiments. In the summer 1974 J. B. Rhine disclosed that Levy had been discovered deliberately falsifying experimental results. This exposure threw doubt on Levy's other studies, and research was undertaken by other parapsychologists attempting independent replication of the Levy researches. The results, on the whole, were ambiguous, but as far back as 1972, parapsychologist Helmut Schmidt had done an independent replication of the Levy research with a lack of positive results.

While the prompt exposure of the alleged manipulation reflects credit on Levy's fellow parapsychologists who were anxious to maintain the integrity of their scientific researches, the scandal has had long-term consequences harmful to the field as a whole.

Sources:

Davis, James. "Comments on the Levy Affair." In Research in Parapsychology 1974. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1975.

Levy, Walter J., Jr. "Possible PK by Rats to Receive Pleasurable Brain Stimulation." In Research in Parapsychology 1973. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

———, Brian Artley, Al Mayor, and Carol Williams. "The Use of an Activity Wheel Based Testing Cage in Small Rodent Precognition Work." In Research in Parapsychology 1973. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

———, and James Davis. "A Potential Animal Model for Parapsychological Interaction between Organisms." Research in Parapsychology 1973. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

Lewi, William Grant II (1902–1951)

Writer and astrologer who authored two of the most popular books in twentieth-century astrology. Grant Lewi was born in Albany, New York, on March 24, 1902. He graduated from Hamilton College, Clinton, New York, and did graduate work at Columbia University. He then became an instructor of English at the University of North Dakota, the University of Delaware, and Dartmouth College (successively).

In 1926 he married Carolyn Wallace. Wallace's mother was an astrologer and gave Lewi his first lessons in the field. Although he had written several fairly successful novels, Lewi turned to astrology in the early 1930s to supplement his income. He wrote the eminently successful Heaven Knows What in 1935. In the late 1930s he became editor of Horoscope Magazine, for which he also wrote articles through the 1940s. In 1940 he issued his first astrological text, Astrology for the Millions (1940), an early attempt to make astrology available to the average person who had never studied the details of horoscope construction. Like Heaven Knows What, it has gone into many editions and remains in print today.

Lewi eventually developed his own system of chart interpretation based on an integration of sign and house influences with some psychological insights.

In 1950 he moved to Arizona, where he began his own magazine, The Astrologer. He died the following year, on July 14, 1951, in Tucson.

Sources:

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Lewi, Grant. Astrology for the Millions. Garden City, N.Y.: N.p., 1940.

———. Heaven Knows What. New York: Doubleday, 1935.

———. Your Greatest Strength. New York: N.p., 1946.

Lewis, H(arvey) Spencer (1883–1939)

Founder of the Ancient and Mystic Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), a modern revival Rosicrucian order headquartered at San Jose, California. Lewis was born in Frenchtown, New Jersey, November 25, 1883, of Welsh ancestry. He was educated in New York state and raised as a Methodist. He became a journalist and sat on a committee investigating Spiritualism in New York. He was closely associated with Elbert Hubbard and Ella Wheeler Wilcox. In 1903 he was president of the Publishers' Syndicate in New York and edited several scientific and research magazines.

In 1904 Lewis founded and served as president of the New York Institute for Psychical Research. The institute specialized in occult studies with emphasis on Rosicrucian teachings. A meeting with a British Rosicrucian resulted in Lewis traveling to Europe, and in 1909 he was initiated into the Rosicrucian order in France and given authority to organize in the United States. The AMORC was organized in several stages over the next years, and by 1917 held its first national convention in Pittsburgh, at which Lewis established his plan to develop correspondence courses.

In 1918 Lewis moved his headquarters to San Francisco, and in 1921 the order received an additional charter from the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO) in Germany. In 1925 the AMORC relocated to Florida, but soon afterward the organization moved to its present location in San Jose, California. Lewis applied his special talents in advertising to form a worldwide fraternal organization. AMORC taught philosophical and mystical practices in order to develop the latent faculties of man, and it sold literature by mail order. Lewis himself authored the basic set of correspondence lessons and a number of the books published by AMORC.

The large headquarters includes an Egyptological museum, a temple, an auditorium and modern computerized offices. Lewis, whose immediate family controlled the board of the organization, held the title imperator, or chief executive. After Lewis died August 2, 1939, his son Ralph Maxwell Lewis succeeded him as imperator.

Sources:

Lewis, H. Spencer. Mansions of the Soul. San Jose, Calif.: Rosicrucian Press, 1930.

———. Rosicrucian Principles for the Home and Business. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1929.

———. Rosicrucian Questions and Answers with Complete History. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1929.

———. Self Mastery and Fate with the Cycles of Life. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1929.

The Rosicrucian Manual. San Jose, Calif.: Rosicrucian Press, 1952.

Lewis, Matthew Gregory (1775–1818)

English author commonly known as "Monk" Lewis. He was born in London July 9, 1775. His father, Matthew Lewis, was deputy secretary of war and proprietor of several valuable estates in Jamaica; his mother, Anna Maria Sewell, was devoted to music and various other arts. The future author showed precocity during childhood, and he attended Westminster School. During this period his parents separated, although Lewis remained friendly with both his parents. In 1791 he visited Paris and attempted a novel and a farce.

In 1792 he went to Weimar in Germany where he met Johann Goethe and also learned German thoroughly. Two years later he was appointed attaché to the British Embassy at the Hague, where he wrote his famous sensational story, Ambrosio; or, The Monk. Completed in ten weeks and published in 1795, it earned him his nickname of "Monk" Lewis.

In 1796 Lewis became a member of Parliament for Hindon in Wiltshire. Residing chiefly in or near London, he met most of the notable people of the day. Meanwhile his interest in the occult had been developing, and in 1798 his play Castle Spectre was staged at Drury Lane. Ghosts and the like played a prominent part in this popular production, for the public greatly enjoyed Gothic romances. In 1788 Lewis published Tales of Terror and in 1801 the volume Tales of Wonder, which anthologized popular occult verses, including some by novelist Sir Walter Scott.

When Lewis' father died in 1812, the author found himself a very rich man. His conscience was troubled, nevertheless, because the wealth derived from slave labor. Lewis sailed to Jamaica in 1815 to arrange for generous treatment of the workers on his estates. Returning to England in 1816, he went soon afterward to Geneva, where he met Lord Byron and Percy Shelley. Lewis made another visit to the West Indies in 1818 and died at sea May 14, 1818, while returning home.

The books of Lewis are memorable chiefly for the sensational way in which he exploited the rapidly developing public taste for gothic romance inaugurated by Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto (1764). Ann Radcliffe's The Mysteries of Udolpho appeared in April 1794, and Lewis was greatly impressed by it before publishing his own Ambrosio; or, The Monk only a few months later.

Sources:

Sullivan, Jack. The Penguin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural. New York: Viking, 1986.

Summers, Montague. The Gothic Quest. 1938. Reprint, London: Fortune Press, 1950.

Lewis, Ralph M. (1904–1987)

Ralph M. Lewis, for 48 years the imperator of the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC), was born in February 14, 1904, in New York City, the son of H. Spencer Lewis, the founder of the order. He formally joined the order in 1921 during his teen years and quickly progressed through the degrees. In 1924 he was appointed supreme secretary and in the 1930s emerged as a public lecturer for the order. He was credited with spreading the membership through North America and Europe.

In 1939 H. Spencer Lewis died and Ralph became the new imperator and took administrative control of the order. He also became a teacher in his own right and beginning in 1944 wrote a number of books, including Behold the Sign (1944), The Sanctuary of the Self (1948), The Conscious Interlude (1957), and Yesterday Has Much to Tell (1973). Lewis led the order until his death January 12, 1987, in San Jose, California.

Sources:

Lewis, Ralph M. Behold the Sign. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of the AMORC, 1944.

———. The Conscious Interlude. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of the AMORC, 1957.

———. The Sanctuary of the Self. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of the AMORC, 1948.

———. Yesterday Has Much to Tell. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of the AMORC, 1973.

The Ley Hunter (Journal)

Publication concerned with the study of leys, ancient wisdom, sacred sites, cosmic energy, UFOs, and related subjects. Issued bimonthly from P.O. Box 180, Stroud, GL5 1YH UK. Website: http://www.leyhunter.com/.

Sources:

The Ley Hunter Journal. http://www.leyhunter.com/. March 8, 2000.

Leys

(Pronounced "lays.") A term now used to indicate ancient straight tracks formed by the alignment of burial mounds, beacon hills, earthworks, moats, and church sites in Britain. The term had long been thought by philologists to indicate a pasture or enclosed field, but this meaning was challenged by Alfred Watkins (born 1855) in his book The Old Straight Track, first published in London in 1925. Watkins pointed out that the word "ley" in its various place-name forms "lay," "lee," "lea," or "leigh" must have predated the enclosure of fields or pastures.

Watkins was an original thinker, an early photographer, and inventor of a pinhole camera and the Watkins exposure meter. In 1922 he published his book Early British Trackways, based on a lecture to the Woolhope Club of Hereford, England. Three years later he published The Old Straight Track, in which he detailed his investigations, which tended to show a vast network of straight tracks in Britain, aligned with either the sun or a star path. He also claimed evidence that such sighted straight tracks existed in other parts of the world.

The purpose of such tracks remains a mystery, but more recently they have been connected with occult beliefs and ancient lines of earth power. Such lines of force have been reported in primitive magical systems such as the mana of the Polynesian Islands. It has also been suggested that certain line marks of ground sites indicate gigantic zodiacs (see Glastonbury Zodiac).

Sources:

Michell, John. The View over Atlantis. Rev. ed. London: Abacus, 1976.

Underwood, Guy. Patterns of the Past. London: Museum Press, 1969.

Watkins, Allen. Alfred Watkins of Hereford: His Life and Pioneer Work in the Three Worlds of Archaeology, Photography, and Flour Milling, 1855–1935. England: Privately printed, 1961.

———. The Ley Hunter's Manual: A Guide to Early Tracks. 1927. Reprint, Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

———. The Old Straight Track. London: Methuen, 1925. Reprint, London: Sphere Books, 1974.

Wilcock, John. A Guide to Occult Britain: The Quest for Magic in Pagan Britain. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1976.

Williamson, Tom, and Liz Bellamy. Ley Lines in Question. Kingwood, England: World's Work, 1983.

Lhermitte, Jacques Jean (1877–1959)

French physician and writer who also published works on parapsychology. He was born on January 20, 1877, at Mont Saint Pere, Aisne, France. He served as a staff physician at L'Hospice Paul Brouse (1919–45) and professor of medicine at the Paris Medical School (1923–47). Following his retirement he was named an honorary professor. In addition to his many books on medical subjects, he also produced a number of texts in psychic research. He died January 24, 1959.

Sources:

Lhermitte, Jacques Jean. Le Cerveau et la pensée (The Brain and Thought). N.p., 1951.

———. Les Hallucinations. N.p., 1951.

———. Mystiques et faux mystiques (Mystics and False Mystics). N.p., 1952.

———. Le Probléme des miracles. N.p., 1956.

———. Psychopathologie de la vision. N.p., 1942.

———. Les Reves (Dreams). N.p., 1942.

———. Vrais et faux possédés (True and False Possession). New York: Hawthorn Books, 1956.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lia Fail

The Stone of Destiny in medieval Irish romance. It was said that when the feet of rightful kings rested upon it, the stone would roar for joy. According to tradition, this became the famous Stone of Scone, on which Scottish kings were formerly crowned at Scone, near Perth, removed from Scotland by Edward I in 1296 and brought to Westminster Abbey, London, where it was housed under the Chair of St. Edward. It was stolen by Scottish Nationalists on Christmas Eve 1950 as a protest, then recovered and restored to Westminster Abbey in February 1952. It is also known as the Tanist Stone, or Jacob's Stone. (See also Danaans)

Lia Light

Lia Light is an organization that facilitates the work and disseminates the teachings of Lia Shapiro, a UFO contactee who claims communications from the Pleiades. She was born the daughter of an atheist Jewish father and Southern Baptist mother. As a child, in the 1950s, she had had a vision of an intense light which visited her son. Then in 1982, she had a born again experience and became an Evangelical Christian.

Finally, in 1994, while in Japan teaching English classes, Shapiro met a Japanese woman who told her that she had a great mission in her life. The woman turned out to be part of a Japanese New Age group with which she began to associate. They encouraged her to listen to her inner voice and to write down what she received. Then one day in 1995, while sitting at her computer, the words began to flow freely. The messages that she typed turned out to be communications from beings that claimed to be Pleiadians. She passed copies of the channeled messages to her Japanese friends, who encouraged her to continue. She also began to see herself as a Starseed, an extraterrestrial incarnated in a human body. She related this idea to a myth reported among the Cherokee people that they originated from the Pleiades.

The experience of channeling from the Pleiadians put Shapiro's life in perspective, from her childhood experience with the Light. She believes that the Pleiadians are here to enlighten humankind and lead people toward their destiny in the Light. Humans will come to know who they really are as Light beings.

Lia Light can be contacted at P.O. Box 1063, Fallbrook, CA 92088. It has an Internet page at http://www.lialight.com/. Sections of her first book, Comes the Awakening, to be published in 2000, have appeared in the Sedona Journal of Emergence.

Sources:

Lia Light. http://www.lialight.com/. June 10, 2000.

Libanomancy

A system of divination by means of incense and prayers. The incense was thrown on a fire and the smoke said to carry the prayers to heaven. If the incense was consumed, the prayers would be answered.

"Libellus Merlini" (Little Book of Merlin)

A Latin tract on the subject of the prophecies of Merlin written by Geoffrey of Monmouth about 1135. Geoffrey prefaced his account of the prophecies with one concerning the deeds of a supernatural youth named Ambrosius whom he deliberately confounded with Merlin.

Vortigern, king of the Britons, asked Ambrose Merlin the meaning of a vision in which two dragons, one red and one white, engaged in combat. Merlin replied that the Red Dragon signified the British race, which would be conquered by the Saxon, represented by the White Dragon.

A long prophetic rhapsody follows, relating chiefly to the Saxon wars, which concludes in the Seventh Book of Geoffrey's Historia Regum Britanniae. The story was known in Iceland before 1218 in a form independent of the Historia. This tract must not be confused with the Vita Merlini (1145 or 1148) generally attributed to Geoffrey.

Liberal Catholic Church

Liturgical church that has attempted to blend Roman Catholic and Anglical ritual forms with a theosophical theology. The church was founded by former members of the Old Roman Catholic Church in England. The Old Roman Catholic Church was founded in 1908 following the consecration of Arnold Harris Mathew as a bishop by the bishops of the Old Catholic Church in the Netherlands. The Old Catholics were orthodox Catholics who rejected the promulgations of the Vatican Council of 1870–71, especially the declaration of the infallibility of the pope.

In England, however, there was little support for the Old Catholic movement and the church tended to be filled by a number of priests who for one reason or another did not fit in either the Church of England or the Roman Catholic Church. Among them were some who had developed a belief in Theosophy and were preaching a theosophical interpretation of Christianity.

Mathew was somewhat tolerant of Theosophy at first, and in 1914 consecrated a person known to be a Theosophist, Frederick Samuel Willoughby, as a bishop to assist him. He became more aware of theosophical teachings and the influence they were beginning to have in his church, however, and in 1915 he condemned it as a heresy and ordered all of his priests to sever their ties with it. The result was that the majority of the priests withdrew and largely gutted the Old Catholic Church.

The clergy who had withdrawn reorganized, and on February 13, 1916, Willoughby consecrated James Ingall Wedgwood (1883–1951) as the regionary bishop for England. At this time the group was operating as the Old Roman Catholic Church, and Wedgwood set out on a world tour to build support among ritually-oriented Theosophists around the world. In Australia he consecrated Charles W. Leadbeater as regionary bishop and in the United States named four new bishops, including Irving S. Cooper, as regionary. At a synod in London in 1918, the name Liberal Catholic was adopted as the official name of the church and Wedgwood was named as presiding bishop. The church subsequently spread to many countries.

The Liberal Catholic Church affirms a number of Christian beliefs but injects a Gnostic or theosophical meaning into them. The church believes that humans are sparks of divinity (rather than creatures of God) and believes in reincarnation (rather than resurrection). The church also accepts the idea of the spiritual hierarchy of masters, or highly evolved beings who guide the spiritual development of the race. In this regard, it accepts the idea that Jesus is one of the masters, but separates the human Jesus (known in the hierarchy as "the Lord Matreya") from the master Jesus (a position in the hierarchy held by the person known in his early life as Appolonius of Tyanna).

The church is headquartered in London. It is organized into a number of regionary provinces usually made up of one or two countries. In the United States the church is headquartered at Ojai, California, where the cathedral of Our Lady of the Angels has been built. Ubique, the church's periodical, is published by Presiding Bishop Joseph Tisch, who also serves as pastor of the congregation in Melbourne, Florida.

Sources:

The Liturgy of the Liberal Catholic Church. London: St. Alban Press, 1983.

Norton, Robert. The Willow in the Tempest: A Brief History of the Liberal Catholic Church in the United States, 1817–1942. Ojai, Calif.: St. Alban Press, 1990.

Ward, Gary L. Independent Bishops: An Independent Directory. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Wedgwood, James Ingall. The Beginning of the Liberal Catholic Church. Lakewood, N.J.: Ubique, 1967.

Licking a Charm

To lick the child's forehead first upward, then across, and lastly up again, and then to spit behind its back was believed to be a remedy for enchantment. It was said that if on licking a child's forehead with the tongue a salt taste was perceived, this was infallible proof of fascination.

Le Lien Hypnotique (Journal)

French-language publication about hypnotism and related subjects. Last known address: L'Union Magnetique de Tersac, C.P. 482, Quebec 8 P.Q., Canada G1K 6W8.

Life Waves

According to Theosophy, the three creative life waves flow from the Deity (the Logos). The theosophical deity is pictured in three aspects, somewhat analogous to the Christian Trinity: Will, Wisdom, and Activity. Each has its definite role in the creation of a universe.

When the Logos sets about the great work of creation it sends the first life wave through the aspect of Activity into the multitude of bubbles in the ether, and thereby forms the various kinds of matter. The universe having been thus far prepared, the second life wave is sent through the aspect of Wisdom, which, bringing with it life as we usually understand that term and penetrating matter from above, gradually descends to the grosser forms and again ascends to the finer forms. In its descent, this life wave makes for an ever-increasing heterogeneity, but in its ascent the process is reversed and it makes for an ever-increasing homogeneity.

The work of creation is now far enough advanced to permit the creation of humanity, for matter has now been infused with the capacity of form and provided with life, and the Logos, therefore, through the aspect of Will, bears forth the Divine Spark, the Monad, and, along with the form and the life, ensouls man.

Light

Spiritualists believed that light had a destructive effect upon the physical phenomena of Spiritualism, which psychic research attempted to document. Quite apart from the fact that darkness hid much fraud, Spiritualists developed arguments to suggest that light had an inherent inhibiting effect on psychic phenomena. For example, it is known that light waves have very rapid vibrations (the visible light waves are from 3900 angstroms to 7700 angstroms; that is, the wave lengths range from 0.00000077 to 0.00000039 meters). Broadcasting practice demonstrates that the fast vibrations tend to nullify the slower vibrations on which radio is based. When the days are long and the sunlight intense, radio reception drops down. With the oncoming of night it improves again. With short waves which vibrate faster, reception is better.

It is claimed that psychic vibrations are in the same position. The slowest light vibration is red, and its destructive effect is correspondingly less. Filtering of daylight by glasses of various colors makes little difference. Cold light, devoid of actinic rays, is the least injurious. "I have had many opportunities," wrote Sir William Crookes, "of testing the action of light of different sources and colours, such as sunlight, diffused daylight, moonlight, gas, lamp and candle light, electric light from a vacuum tube, homogeneous yellow light, etc. The interfering rays appear to be those at the extreme end of the spectrum." He found moonlight ideal.

Sulphide of zinc or calcium screens have also been tried. They have the disadvantage that their illumination is poor unless they are extremely large, and the intensity of their phosphorescence rapidly diminishes. Gustav Geley experimented with biological light. It did not appear to affect the phenomena. However, the cultures of photogenic microbes are very unstable. In Brazil, luminous insects were tried with some apparent success.

Meanwhile, some of the more notable mediums worked primarily in lighted rooms and were able to produce extraordinary phenomena. D. D. Home seldom sat in darkness. Eusapia Palladino once levitated a table in blazing sunshine. French psychic researcher Dr. Joseph Maxwell was probably right in stating that the action of light is not such as to constitute an insurmountable obstacle to the production of telekinetic movements.

The supposed problem of light was highlighted in an incident reported in the issue of Psychic Research (January 1930). According to a communication by Irving Gaertner of St. Louis, Missouri, in a sitting with Eveling Burnside and Myrtle Larsen in Camp Chesterfield, Indiana, a ray of light, owing to the turning of a switch outside, penetrated through a crack between the lower edge of the door and the floor into the séance room.

"Agonized groans were heard (presumably from the entranced medium, Mrs. Larsen) and one of the two trumpets which had been levitated for the voice immediately fell at the feet of Mr. Nelson. At the same moment, Mrs. Nelson received an electric shock which formed a blister on one of her fingers, resembling one which would be produced by a burning of the skin. All the sitters testified to having felt the electric shock both in the region of the solar plexus, the back and the forehead."

Larsen was reportedly discovered prostrate on the floor, minus any heartbeat and her body rigid. It took considerable effort to restore her to consciousness. Burnside, the other medium, suffered from the shock for several days after the sitting. Frederick Bligh Bond, editor of Psychic Research, speculated about the nature of the electric shock: "Is it the light, qua light, which in this case causes the violent disturbance of conditions, or is it light as an avenue of conductivity, linking the psychic circuit to the current on the wires of the lamp in the hall?"

The dangers of the shock from unexpected light were considered an interesting matter in J. Hewat McKenzie's report on the mediumship of Ada Besinnet in the April 1922 issue of Psychic Science. The smallest red spark burning was sufficient to prevent the medium from going into trance.

"Upon another occasion, when drawing the electric plug from the wall socket, behind a piece of furniture, and about 8 feet from the medium, the small spark, about 1/16 inch long, which usually accompanies the withdrawal of a plug of this kind when the power is on, was sufficient to create such a psychic shock that the medium immediately fell forward on the table in a cataleptic state."

That psychic structures may objectively exist beyond the range of our optical capacity was demonstrated by quartz lens photography. The quartz lens transmits ultra-violet rays to make visible on the photographic plate things not visible to the eyes. Mrs. J. H. McKenzie and Major Mowbray experimented in this field with the mediums J. Lynn and Lewis. The quartz lens not only disclosed fluorescing lights; vibrating, spinning substances; and psychic rods, but also the dematerialization of the medium's hand when added force had to be borrowed.

Similar results were achieved by Daniel Frost Comstock in séances with "Margery the Medium" (Mina Stinson Crandon) in Boston. Several of his exposed plates showed curious, indefinable white patches, one of which was fairly recognizable as a human face, although it could not be identified. The most important advance in this field of research was registered at the Institut Métapsychique International in Paris with the mediumship of Rudi Schneider in 1931.

Over the first half of the twentieth century, critics claimed that the alleged destructive effect of light on psychic phenomena and the health of the medium were a subterfuge to cover fraud in the darkness of the séance room. In no case was any true physical harm done to mediums by the shining of light, and over the long run, physical mediumship of the type popular in the early twentieth century disappeared under the scrutiny of psychic researchers and the continued improvement of observational techniques.

Light (Journal)

The oldest British Spiritualist weekly, official organ of the London Spiritualist Alliance, founded in 1881 by Dawson Rogers and the Rev. Stainton Moses. Successive editors were E. W. Wallis and David Gow. It is now published quarterly as the journal of the College of Psychic Studies, London, 16 Queensberry Place, South Kensington, London SW7 2EB, England.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

The Light Messenger

The Light Messenger is a periodical devoted to the channeled messages from the ascended masters and beings from the Angelic Kingdom. It was begun in 1997 by Bev (Dranda) Dombrowski, then a resident of Citrus Heights, California. Dombrowski had been a school teacher in Stockton, California, for 20 years. In 1980 she had a spiritual awakening that led to an initial channeling from the Ascended Master Kuthumi (prominent master in the theosophical hierarchy). Soon afterwards, she opened a metaphysical bookstore in Stockton called the New Age Center. In 1996, she made an extensive trip to Egypt and shortly after her return, in January of 1997, she felt led to begin The Light Messenger as a metaphysical newsletter. In March of 1997, as had many channels of the ascended masters during the 1990s, she also came into contact with an entity who identified himself as an extraterrestrial, Janus, who resided on the Mothership Pegasus, one of a fleet of lightships. In the fall of 1997, she added contacts from extraterrestrials to The Light Messenger. In November of 1997, she moved to Mt. Shasta, California.

The major content of The Light Messenger are channeled messages through Dombrowski and other channels who have emerged in the post-New Age Movement centered upon ascension and the changes coming in the new millennium. It also includes articles that summarize these channeled messages. The Light Messenger is published from 218 E. Hinckley St., Mt. Shasta, CA 96067. Sample articles may be found posted on its website at http://www.lightmessenger.com/.

Sources:

The Light Messenger. http://www.lightmessenger.com/. February 20, 2000.

Light of Divine Truth Foundation

A Spiritualist association of churches and mediums founded in 1936 as the International General Assembly of Spiritualists. It took its present name in 1979. The foundation issued charters to Spiritualist churches and certified various clerical leaders—ministers, associate ministers, healers, and mediums. It nurtured the practice of spiritual healing and conducted classes and training sessions in the art of spiritual healing and psychic unfoldment.

The foundation operated a speakers bureau and published an occasional newsletter. Last known address: c/o Rev. Betty Latham, 304 Boulevard, Florence, NJ 08518.

Light of the Universe (LOTU)

The Light of the Universe is a New Age channeling group founded in the early 1960s by Helen Spitler, better known by her public name Maryona. In 1965 she published The Light of the Universe, a compilation of channeled materials from the "higher source" who spoke through her. In 1966 she launched the Lotus, a quarterly periodical. As membership increased and groups developed, Maryona developed a set of correspondence lessons.

LOTU placed great emphasis upon the nature and the development of the human soul. It taught that souls progress upward through a series of incarnations. The rate of progress can be increased by turning oneself away from the imperfection and impurities of this world, and this is accomplished through meditation and various cleansing exercises. LOTU teachings discouraged outmoded and false traditions.

Last known address: 161 N. Sandusky Rd., Tiffin, OH 44883.

Sources:

Maryona [Helen Spitler]. Light of the Universe. 2 vols. Tiffin, Ohio: The Light of the Universe, 1965, 1976.

———. Mini-Manual for Light Bearers. Tiffin, Ohio: Light of the Universe, 1987.

Lignites

A beautiful glass-like stone. According to ancient belief, if the stone were hung about a child, it preserved him or her from witchcraft, and if it were bound on the forehead, it stopped bleeding of the nose, restored the loss of senses, and helped to foretell future events. It is not clear what stone is indicated, and it seems unlikely to have been the lignite, which is a brown or black variety of coal.

Lilith

Demonic figure in Jewish folklore. She seems to have originally been a storm demon and was later associated with the night. At a very early period, she was seen as one of several vampire demons in ancient Sumer. In the Gilgamesh Epic (approximately 2000 B.C.E.), she is pictured as a vampire harlot; though a beautiful young woman, she is unable to bear children, her breasts are dry, and she has the feet of the nocturnal owl.

In the Talmud, Lilith is given a new mythological life as the supposed first wife of Adam. Following an argument over who should have the dominant position during sexual intercourse, Lilith left and became a promiscuous wanderer. She mothered many children, called the lilim. She also encountered three angels sent by God, with whom she negotiated an agreement. She became a vampiric demon attacking children but would stay away from any child wearing an amulet with the name of three angels—Senoy, Sensenoy, and Semangelof.

Over the centuries Lilith was gradually transformed into a whole legion of beings who functioned as incubi and succubi, attacking men and women who were engaged in normal sexual activity. They gathered the men's sperm to father more demonic offspring. They inflicted women with barrenness and miscarriages and sucked the blood of children. A special anti-Lilith ritual was developed to banish them from homes and force them to go naked into the night.

The myth was active in the Jewish community through the centuries and flourished during the Middle Ages. It survived into the nineteenth century among conservative Jewish communities. A remnant of the story remains in the amulets with the name of the three angels, sometimes used by people who know little of the Lilith story.

In the early 1990s the Lilith myth was adopted as part of the Midnight Sons, the supernatural stories of the Marvel Comics universe.

Sources:

Graves, Robert, and Raphael Patai. Hebrew Myths: The Book of Genesis. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1964.

Patai, Raphael. The Hebrew Goddess. New York: Ktav Publishing House, n.d.

Lilly, William (1602–1681)

One of the most famous early English astrologers. Born April 30, 1602, at Diseworth, Leicestershire, he was the son of a yeoman farmer, although a rival astrologer John Heydon later insisted that his father was "a laborer or ditcher." In 1613 Lilly began his education at the grammar school of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, studying Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

In 1620 he traveled to London and worked as a servant, helping with his master's accounts. He also nursed his master's first wife, who died of cancer in 1624. The following year, his master remarried but died in 1627. Lilly accepted an offer of marriage from the widow, who was able to provide for him comfortably for the rest of his life. He was made a freeman of the Salter's Company and spent his time in angling or listening to Puritan sermons.

Lilly became interested in astrology in 1632 and pursued his study by reading many books on the subject and contacting the leading astrologers of the day. Soon after the death of his wife in 1633, Lilly studied the famous Ars Notoria grimoire, and he took part in an occult ceremony with hazel rods to locate treasure said to be buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey (see divining-rod). In this case, however, only a coffin was found.

In 1634 Lilly married a second time. He now began to teach astrology to pupils and to write astrological texts. His first almanac, Merlinus Anglicus Junior: The English Merlin Revived; or, A Mathematical Prediction upon the Affairs of the English Commonwealth, and of All or Most Kingdoms of Christendom, this present year 1644, was published June 12, 1644. This was followed by other books of predictions. Although ostensibly a parliamentarian, Lilly was several times in trouble with the authorities for apparently helping the royalist cause.

Some of his prophecies also got him into difficulties, notably the engravings in his Monarchy and No Monarchy, (1651) which illustrated the Great Plague and the Fire of London. In 1666 Lilly was called before the committee set up to investigate the cause of the great fire, predicted in the hieroglyphics of his book five years earlier. In the trial of conspirators charged with having set the fire, it was stated that the date of September 3, 1666, was selected because Lilly had designated it a "lucky day" (the fire actually started September 2).

A few years later Lilly studied medicine, and through his friend the antiquary Elias Ashmole was granted a license to practice. From 1670 onward he became celebrated as a physician as well as an astrologer. He published 15 major works on astrology as well as 36 almanacs and was consulted by famous individuals of the time. He died June 9, 1681. His posthumous autobiography was published in 1715.

Sources:

Lilly, William. The History of Lilly's Life and Times. N.p., 1715.

Lily Dale (Spiritualist Assembly)

One of the oldest camp organizations of American Spiritualism. It was established in 1880 as the Cassadaga Free Lake Association situated in beautiful countryside in the Chautauqua hills, scarcely two hours drive from the city of Buffalo. In 1906 the site was renamed Lily Dale. It comprised 80 acres with hundreds of cottages, gathering places, and a hotel for the many summer guests, as well as a post office and a library. For many years it became a focal point for world famous lecturers and mediums, including its share of fradulent mediums, demonstrating every variety of phenomena.

The old Hydesville house, which was the center of the Fox family knockings that resulted in the founding of American Spiritualism, was removed to Lily Dale in 1916 but burned to the ground in 1955. It was recreated in 1968 as a tourist attraction on the Hydesville site. Lily Dale still conducts a program through the summer. It may be contacted at 5 Melrose Park, Lily Dale, NY 14752.

Sources:

Whiting, Lilian. "The Spiritualistic Camp-Meetings in the United States." Annals of Psychical Science (January 1907).

Limachie

According to ancient belief, this resembled a chip of a man's nail and was squeezed out of the head of a slug, which had to be done the instant it was seen. It was said to be a good amulet to preserve from fever.

Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865)

Sixteenth president of the United States, who, it has been claimed, was influenced in his decision to free the slaves by Spiritualist experiences. Immediately after his election to the presidency, an article was published in the Cleveland Plaindealer based on statements of medium J. B. Conklin, who identified Lincoln as a sympathizer with Spiritualism. Conklin said Lincoln was the unknown individual who frequently attended his séances in New York, asked mental questions, and departed as unnoticed as he had arrived. When the article was shown to Lincoln, he reportedly did not contradict it but said: "The only falsehood in the statement is that the half of it has been told. This article does not begin to tell the wonderful things I have witnessed."

In a letter to Horace Greeley in August 1862, Lincoln stated: "My paramount object is to save the union, and not either to save or destroy slavery." The antislavery proclamation was dated a month later, September 1862, and was issued in January 1863. The change in Lincoln's attitude was at least in part brought about by the influences of Senator Thomas Richmond, by his experiences through the mediums J. B. Conklin, Mrs. Cranston Laurie, Mrs. Miller, Nettie Colburn (later known under her married name Henrietta Maynard), and by Dr. Farnsworth's predictions. Senator Richmond, one of the leading businessmen of Chicago, had a controlling interest in the grain and shipping industries. While chairman of the committee on banks and corporations, he became a personal friend of Lincoln. In his book, God Dealing with Slavery (1870), Richmond reproduced the letters which, under psychic influence, he sent to the president.

Col. S. P. Kase claimed in the Spiritual Scientist that "for four succeeding Sundays Mr. Conklin, the test medium, was a guest at the presidential mansion. The result of these interviews was the President's proposition to his cabinet to issue the proclamation." Col. Kase also narrated President Lincoln's visit, in the company of his wife, in Mrs. Laurie's house. Laurie was a well-known medium. The colonel's daughter, Mrs. Miller, produced strong physical phenomena.

Colburn was another guest. She later became famous as an inspirational speaker, but then she was scarcely out of her teens. She passed into trance, approached the president with closed eyes, and addressed him for a full hour and a half. The sum total of her address was: "This civil war will never cease. The shout of victory will never ring through the North, till you issue a proclamation that shall set free the enslaved millions of your unhappy country."

In the same séance President Lincoln witnessed powerful physical manifestations. The piano on which the medium was playing rose four inches from the floor in spite of the efforts of Col. Kase, Judge Wattles, and the two soldiers who accompanied the president to weigh it down.

In 1891 Colburn (then Mrs. Maynard) published the book Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? in which she described her very first meeting with President Lincoln. In 1862 in Washington, Mrs. Lincoln had a sitting with her and was so much impressed that she asked her to come and see the president. According to Maynard's account in her book, she delivered a trance address in which the President:

"was charged with the utmost solemnity and force of manner not to abate the terms of its [Emancipation Proclamation] issue and not to delay its enforcement as a law beyond the opening of the year; and he was assured that it was to be the crowning event of his administration and his life; and that while he was being counselled by strong parties to defer the enforcement of it, hoping to supplant it by other measures and to delay action, he must in no wise heed such counsel, but stand firm to his convictions and fearlessly perform the work and fulfill the mission for which he had been raised by an overruling Providence. Those present declared that they lost sight of the timid girl in the majesty of the utterance, the strength and force of the language, and the importance of that which was conveyed, and seemed to realise that some strong masculine spirit force was giving speech to almost divine commands. I shall never forget the scene around me when I regained consciousness. I was standing in front of Mr. Lincoln, and he was sitting back in his chair, with his arms folded upon his breast, looking intently at me. I stepped back, naturally confused at the situation—not remembering at once where I was; and glancing around the group where perfect silence reigned. It took me a moment to remember my whereabouts. A gentleman present then said in a low tone: 'Mr. President, did you notice anything peculiar in the method of address?' Mr. Lincoln raised himself, as if shaking off his spell. He glanced quickly at the full-length portrait of Daniel Webster that hung above the piano, and replied: 'Yes, and it is very singular, very!' with a marked emphasis."

On Mr. Some's inquiry whether there had been any pressure brought to bear upon the president to defer the enforcement of the proclamation, Lincoln admitted, "It is taking all my nerve and strength to withstand such a pressure."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Nineteenth-Century Miracles. London & Manchester, 1883.

Fleckles, Elliott V. Willie Speaks Out: The Psychic World of Abraham Lincoln. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1974.

Maynard, Nettie Colburn. Was Abraham Lincoln A Spiritualist? Philadelphia: R. C. Hartrampft, 1891. Reprint, London: Psychic Book Club, 1956.

Shirley, Ralph. Short Life of Abraham Lincoln. London: 1919.

Lindisfarne

New Age educational community in Southampton, New York, founded in 1973 by William Irwin Thompson, author of Passages about Earth: An Exploration of the New Planetary Culture (1974). Lindisfarne takes its name from the English monastery founded by St. Aidan on Holy Island in Northumberland in 635 C.E.

The island is now owned by Robin Henderson who keeps racing pigeons, and the monastery is a ruin, but Thompson was impressed by the symbolic associations of the place, which he described in Passages about Earth. He regarded Lindisfarne as typifying a historic clash between esoteric Christianity and ecclesiastical Christianity, between religious experience and religious authority.

A visit to the Findhorn Foundation in Scotland helped to develop Thompson's concept of a new "planetary culture" involving a synthesis of science, art, and spiritual awareness. He founded the Lindisfarne Association as an educational community "in which people of all ages could work and study together in new forms of growth and transformation." Spiritual self-discipline is regarded as a basis for artistic and cultural learning, and Lindisfarne offers seminars in science and the humanities for students rooted in daily meditational practice. All this has much in common with contemporary outlooks loosely labeled New Age.

Sources:

Thompson, William Irwin. The American Replacement of Nature: The Everyday Acts and Outrageous Evolution of Economic Life. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1991.

———. Passages about Earth: An Exploration of the New Planetary Culture. New York: Harper & Row, 1974.

———. Reimagination of the World: A Critique of the New Age, Science, and Popular Culture. Santa Fe, N.Mex.: Bear, 1991.

Lindsay, The Master of (1847–1913)

Also later known as the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres. A famous figure in the early history of English Spiritualism owing to his association with Lord Adare in testimony to the phenomena of the medium D. D. Home. He appeared before the committee of the London Dialectical Society in 1869 and testified to Home's powers. His account of Home's most famous levitation and floating out of the third-story window of Lord Adare's house led to sharp controversy in later literature.

The Link

An international association of Spiritualist home circles, founded by N. Zerdin in 1931 for the interchange of psychic information obtained in the home circles. I. S. Beverley, president of the Link Association and treasurer of the Great Metropolitan Spiritualist Association for many years, died January 9, 1947. He had also edited the association's monthly journal, the Link.

Linton, Charles (ca. 1855– ?)

An early American writing medium of first generation Spiritualism. Originally a blacksmith with limited education, he became a clerk in a store in Philadelphia at the age of 22 and a bookkeeper afterward. Soon after he developed automatic writing, under the alleged control of Daniel Webster. Governor Nathaniel P. Talmadge and the actor Fenno claimed to have received, through his hand, communications from Shakespeare.

In 1853 Linton began his great work. In the space of only four months, he produced a book of religious rhapsody, published in 1855 under the title The Healing of the Nations, with a preface by Talmadge, who often witnessed the writing. The book consists of more than 100,000 words; it came very fluently and in a different handwriting from the medium's, who was quite conscious during its production. It was one of the most unique inspirational books of the period, although its aphorisms would now seem rather trite.

Lipa

Lipa, Batangas, Philippines, was the site in 1948 of a series of apparitions of the Virgin Mary to Teresita Castillo, a Carmelite nun, that were for a few years among the most celebrated in Roman Catholicism. Castillo was the daughter of the former governor of the region who had run away from home to join the convent. In July of 1948, while discussions were going on between the convent's leadership and the family, who wanted their daughter to return home and go through with a marriage they had arranged for her, she began to experience some unusual and disturbing manifestations. She sought the advice of the prioress, Mother Mary Cecilia of Jesus, who in turn sought the counsel of the community's spiritual director, Msgr. Alfredo Obviar, who was also the auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Lipa.

The diabolical manifestation proved short-lived, and on August 18, Castillo experienced the smell of roses fill her room. Two days later, rose petals fell from the ceiling of her room and formed a cross on the floor. Finally, on September 12, as she was praying in the garden, she heard a voice, interpreted as the Virgin, asking her to return to the spot daily for the next 15 consecutive days. She consulted with the prioress and was granted permission to do as bidden. On the next day, Mary made her initial appearance. She was dressed in white with a golden rosary in her left hand. She indicated that her messages would be primarily for the priests and nuns, and called for the community to gather at the spot, which should be blessed. Bishop Obviar did the blessing on September 15. In the midst of the ceremony, Castillo entered a state of ecstasy (trance), and all experienced the fall of the rose petals.

In the meantime, Mother Cecilia also began receiving messages purporting to be from Mary by a process commonly called clairvoyance, but in Catholic circles is known as interior locution. She began keeping a record of them in her diary.

On September 16, Mary requested a statue of her be created showing her form in the apparitions as was later revealed as Our Lady the Mediatrix of All Grace. During the remaining apparition, Castillo received numerous messages, and as she had with the children at Fatima, Mary also shared some secrets. The secrets of Fatima were one of the most well-known aspects of the event which had become the most heralded of the claimed apparitions of Mary sanctioned by the church. On September 26, Mary made her last apparition of the announced series. She would return one more time, on November 12, to warn of persecutions and hard times for the sisters at the monastery and the country in general. In making her final plea for prayer, she mentioned her presence at Fatima. Her last visit had been preceded by a final falling of rose petals. In the meantime a statue of the Virgin had been placed at the spot of the apparitions as requested.

As word spread of the apparitions, the bishop of the diocese became upset. He ordered the statue removed from its place in the garden. He also went to the convent prepared to reprimand Bishop Obviar and end any further activity relative to the apparitions. However, as the story is told, he was greeted at the convent door by a shower of rose petals. He reversed his opposition, ordered the statue returned to the garden, and on December 6 announced his approval of the apparitions. The convent became a focus of pilgrimages from across the country, and tours began to arrive from around the world. The petals that had fallen, and even water into which the petals had been dipped, were distributed and reports of cures grew steadily.

While the bishop of Lipa supported the account of the apparitions, other Philippine bishops were not so accepting. On January 23, 1950, the bishop was involuntarily retired. An official committee was established to investigate the apparitions and a Carmelite official arrived from Rome to investigate the convent. The distribution of the petals and all literature on the apparitions stopped. A short time later both the prioress and her assistant were also released from their leadership posts and sent to another convent. Bishop Obviar was then relieved of his post and reassigned.

The final report of the official investigation was released in April of 1951. It concluded that no supernatural events had occurred. The statue was ordered destroyed. The sisters at the convent removed it from its spot, but then hid it away. The prioress' diary was destroyed. The sisters were also ordered to stop speaking of the apparition.

In the face of the report, many concluded that the apparitions had been a money-making hoax perpetuated by the members of the convent.

After news of the event died out, Mother Cecelia was allowed to return to Lipa. She prophesied that after her death, the truth of the apparitions would be rediscovered. Then in 1991, Archbishop Mariano Gaviola ordered the statue be made available to people by having it placed in the chapel at the convent. He also called together a new commission to reinvestigate the apparitions.

He allowed the production of a documentary for Philippine television and the publication of a book about the apparitions. The cultus of the Virgin at Lipa has revived, though the commission has yet to report.

At the height of the initial reaction to the reports of the apparitions, another set of apparitions was initiated in Necedah,

Wisconsin. On November 12, 1949, Mary Ann Van Hoof, a housewife, had a brief vision of the Virgin outside her home. The following year she reportedly had a set of apparitions throughout the year that also drew large crowds and became every much as controversial as those at Lipa, which were mentioned in the messages received by Van Hoof.

Sources:

Keithley-Castro, June. "Shower of Petals." Parts 1–3. Philippine Daily Inquirer. September 8–10, 1999.

Lippares (or Liparia)

According to ancient belief, he who has this stone "needs no other invention to catch wild beasts." On the other hand, no animal can be attacked by dogs or huntsman if it looks upon it. It is not clear whether this was a known or a fabled precious stone.

Liquefaction of Blood

A famous miracle claimed for the blood of St. Januarius, executed September 19, 309 C.E. In Lives of the Saints (1623), E. Kinesman stated: "The most stupendous miracle is that seen to this day in the church of St. Gennaro, in Naples, viz. the blood of St. Januarius, kept in two glass vials. When either vial, held in the right hand, is presented to the head of the saint, the congealed blood first melts, and then goes on apparently to boil." Scientists have pointed out that such a miracle may be accomplished scientifically by the use of ether or other chemicals.

However, the miracle has continued into modern times. On May 6, 1989, the blood liquified on schedule in Naples, and Cardinal Michele Giordano revealed that he had allowed scientists to study the relic secretly. The liquefaction traditionally occurs twice a year, on September 19, the day of the saint's death, and on the Saturday before the first Sunday in May. Cardinal Giordano, archbishop of Naples, stated that the "May Miracle" of 1989 occurred during the religious procession that precedes the usual ceremony for the liquefaction.

Sources:

Rogo, D. Scott. Miracles: A Parascientific Inquiry into Wondrous Phenomena. New York: Dial Press, 1982.

Thurston, Herbert. The Physical Phenomena of Mysticism. London: Burns Oates, 1952.

List, Guido von (1848–1919)

Austrian occultist, author, journalist, and playwright whose racist theories preceded National Socialism in Germany. He grew up obsessed by pagan folklore of gods and demons, and after publication of his first books, a small group of admirers founded a Guido von List Society, which issued further books of a pseudo-mystical nature.

List developed a theory of a mysterious ancient race called the "Armanen," whose symbol was the swastika, and founded a secret occult lodge of the Armanen. After a press scandal, in which it was revealed that he practiced medieval black magic with blood rituals and sexual perversion, he fled from Vienna. Many of his associates, like Jorg Lanz von Liebenfels, were rabid anti-Semites, part of the occult underground that nourished perverted Nazi beliefs. List died in Berlin in May 1919.

Sources:

Sklar, Dusty. Gods and Beasts: The Nazis and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1977.

Litanies of the Sabbat

According to one account, on Wednesdays and Saturdays it was the custom to sing at the witches' sabbat the following litanies:

"Lucifer, Beelzebub, Leviathan, have pity on us. Baal, prince of the seraphim; Baalberith, prince of the cherubim; Astaroth, prince of the thrones; Rosier, prince of denominations; Carreau, prince of the powers; Belial, prince of the vertues; Perrier, prince of the principalities; Oliver, prince of the arch angels; Junier, prince of the angels; Sarcueil, Fume-bouche, Pierre-le-Feu, Carniveau, Terrier, Contellier, Candelier, Behemoth, Oilette, Belphegor, Sabathan, Garandier, Dolers, Pierre-Fort, Axaphat, Prisier, Kakos, Lucesme, pray for us."

Satan was evoked in these litanies only in company with a crowd of other demons. Accounts of different sabbats vary and many litanies appear to have been merely anti-Christian parodies. This particular litany sounds more like an evocation of demons for a magical ritual than a celebration of a witchcraft sabbat.

Lithomancy

A species of divination performed by stones, but in what manner it is difficult to ascertain. Thomas Gale, in a "Note upon Iamblichus," confessed that he did not clearly understand the nature of it; whether it referred to certain motions observable in idols, or to an insight into futurity obtained by demons [familiars] enclosed in particular stones. That these supernatural beings might be so commanded is clear from a passage of Nicephorus.

The old rabbis attributed Leviticus 25:1 to lithomancy, but the prohibition of stones given there is most probably directed against idolatry in general. J. C. Boulenger showed from Tzetzes that Helenus ascertained the fall of Troy by the employment of a magnet, and claimed that if a magnet be washed in spring water and interrogated, a voice like that of a sucking child will reply.

The pseudo-Orpheus related at length this legend of Helenus:

"To him, Apollo gave the true and vocal sideritis, which others call the animated ophites, a stone possessing fatal qualities, rough, hard, black, and heavy, graven everywhere with veins like wrinkles. For one and twenty days Helenus abstained from the nuptial couch, from the bath, and from animal food. Then, washing this intelligent stone in a living fountain, he cherished it as a babe in soft clothing; and having propitiated it as a god, he at length gave it breath by his hymn of mighty virtue. Having lighted lamps in his own purified house, he fondled the divine stone in his hands, bearing it about as a mother bears her infant; and you, if ye wish to hear the voice of the gods, in like manner provoke a similar miracle, for when ye have sedulously wiped and dandled the stone in your arms, on a sudden it will utter the cry of a new-born child seeking milk from the breast of its nurse. Beware, however, of fear, for if you drop the stone upon the ground, you will rouse the anger of the immortals. Ask boldly of things future, and it will reply. Place it near your eyes when it has been washed, look steadily at it, and you will perceive it divinely breathing. Thus it was that Helenus, confiding in this fearful stone, learned that his country would be overthrown by the Atridae."

Photius, in his abstract of the life of Isodorus by Damascius, a credulous physician in the age of Justinian, wrote of an oracular stone, the boetulum, to which lithomancy was attributed. A physician named Eusebius used to carry one of these wonder-working stones about with him.

The story is told that one night he had an unexplained impulse to wander out from the city Emesa to the summit of a mountain dignified by a temple of Minerva. There, as he sat down fatigued by his walk, he saw a globe of fire falling from the sky and a lion standing by it. The lion disappeared, the fire was extinguished, and Eusebius ran and picked up a boetulum. He asked it to what god it appertained, and it readily answered, to Gennaeus, a deity worshiped by the Heliopolitae, under the form of a lion in the temple of Jupiter. During this night, Eusebius said he traveled not less than 210 stadia (more than 26 miles).

He never became the perfect master of the boetulum but was obliged very humbly to solicit its responses. It was of a handsome, globular shape, white, a palm in diameter, though sometimes it appeared more, sometimes less; occasionally, also, it was of purple color. Characters were to be read on it, impressed in the color called "tingaribinus." Its answer seemed as if proceeding from a shrill pipe, and Eusebius himself interpreted the sounds.

Damascius believed its animating spirit to be divine; Isodorus, on the other hand, thought it demoniacal, that is, not belonging to evil or material demons, nor yet to those which are quite pure and immaterial.

It was with one of these stones, according to Hesychius, that Rhea fed Saturnus, when he fancied that he was devouring Jupiter, its name being derived from the skin in which it was wrapped, and such the commentator supposed to have been the Lapides divi, or vivi, which the insane monster Heliogabalus wished to carry off from the temple of Diana, built by Orestes at Laodicea (AEL. Lampid, Heliogab, 7'). In Geographia Sacroe (ii, z, 1646), Samuel Bochart traced the name and the reverence paid to the boetylia, to the stone which Jacob anointed at Bethel. Many of these boetylia, Photius assured us from Damascius, were to be found on Mount Libanus.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. The Occult Sciences. 1891. Reprint, Secaucus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.

Little World (Society)

The name given to a secret society which was said to have conspired in England, during the eighteenth century to reestablish the Stuart dynasty. Various strange stories are told of this society, for instance, that the devil presided over their assemblies in person. The members were believed to be Freemasons.

Lively Stones World Healing Fellowship, Inc.

Organization to support the healing mission of Willard Fuller, famous for his psychic dentistry. Apparently now inactive.

Livingston, Marjorie (ca. 1935)

British inspirational writer, psychic lecturer, and author of several books received by clairaudience. Her first work, The New Nuctrmeron, (1930) was claimed to have been inspired by Apollonius of Tyana and to have expounded some remnants of his teachings, the originals having been lost during the famous burning of the Alexandrian Library. It was followed by The Harmony of the Spheres (1931), The Elements of Heaven (1932), and The Outline of Existence (1933), all containing new speculations, after-death conditions, and the scheme of life in the universe.

Llewellyn Publications

Founded as Llewellyn Publishing Co. in Portland, Oregon, by astrologer Llewellyn George (1876–1954). The company existed for many years in Los Angeles, becoming the leading publishing house of astrological literature in America. In the years after George's death, it was acquired by Minnesota businessman Carl Lllewellyn Weschcke (a relative of George) and is now located in St. Paul, Minnesota, under the name Llewellyn Publications. It has emerged as one of the largest publishing and wholesaling organizations of occult, witchcraft, and magical literature in the United States.

During the early days of the Wicca revival, Llewellyn was one of the first to publish a version of the witchcraft manual, the Book of Shadows, and Weschske emerged as a champion of disclosing all the secrets of coven life. Llewellyn also published the periodicals Gnostica, Astrology Now, and Aquarian Age Preview, as well as the annual Moon Sign Book, a standard astrological text first edited by George in 1905.

The large retail bookstore Gnostica was opened in Minneapolis on January 15, 1970, but was closed after a few years. The company, however, maintains a large mail-order operation. For a few years in the 1970s it sponsored an annual Aquarian Age Festival, which included lectures, readings, and consultations.

Llewellyn's New Times (Magazine)

The periodical of Llewellyn Publications succeeding Gnostica, which was published in the 1970s. It is released at eight-week intervals and covers New Age, occult, and magic activities and publications. Each issue includes special articles on such topics as magic, witchcraft, astrology, and paganism, in the context of a detailed catalog and reviews of Llewellyn Publications products. Llewellyn, which began by publishing books on astrology, has emerged as one of the most prominent publishers of occult materials. It is currently headed by astrologer-occultist Carl Llewellyn Weschcke. Address: P.O. Box 64383, St. Paul, MN 55164-0383.

L/L Research

L/L Research was founded in 1970 to disseminate the findings of paranormal researcher Donald T. Elkins (1930–1984). The events that led up to the founding of L/L Research (the L/L standing for light/lines) began in 1962 when Elkins, a professor in Engineering at the University of Louisville, Kentucky, organized a group to gather for meditation and attempted contact with extraterrestrials. He had been given the idea through his contact with a UFO contactee group in Detroit. Different contacts were developed over the next year that became the basis of an early volume, Telepathy Data Collected by Extraterrestrial Communication (1963).

Over the years the working group went in and out of existence and changed personnel. In the meantime, Elkins developed a friendship with one of the original members of the group, Carla Rueckert (1943–), and in 1968 began to work with her in developing her channeling skills. Among their first joint projects was a novel, The Crucifixion of Esmerelda Sweetwater. In 1970 Rueckert left her job as a librarian to work full time for L/L Research. The first product of their work appeared in 1977 as a book, Secrets of the UFO.

In 1978, Elkins incorporated Rock Creek Research and Development Labs, a nonprofit corporation under which the work done by L/L Research was subsumed. In 1980, Elkins and Rueckert invited a third person, James McCarty (1947–), to join the L/L Research team. The three sat for the work for which L/L Research is most remembered, Rueckert's channeling of an entity named Ra.

Over the next few years, segments of the material were edited and published in four volumes collectively known as The Law of the One (1982–84). Ra is identified as a member of a group of extraterrestrials who came to Earth in ancient times. He worked with Ikhnoton, the Egyptian pharaoh who introduced monotheism. He also claimed to have built the pyramids as a place for channels to be purified and for people to learn to work with crystals. Ra also described the Confederation of Planets, the interstellar government consisting of 500 "planetary consciousness complexes." Jesus came to Earth as a member of the Confederation.

The Law of the One circulated through New Age and contactee groups and was reprinted commercially as a single volume in 1984, shortly before Elkins' death. Rueckert and McCarty continued Rock Creek Research and L/L Research, held weekly meditation sessions, and did further channeling, the content of which is published in a newsletter LIGHT/LINES. They also finally published the previously written novel, The Crucifixion of Esmerelda Sweetwater, in 1986. They were married in 1987. L/L Research can be contacted at P.O. Box 5195, Louisville, KY 40255-0195. It has an Internet site at http://www.llresearch.org/.

Sources:

Elkins, Don T. Telepathy Data Collected by Extraterrestrial Communication. Clarksburg, W.Va.: Saucerian Press, 1963.

———, and Carla Rueckert. The Crucifixion of Esmerelda Sweetwater. Louisville, Ky.: L/L Research, 1984.

———. Secrets of the UFO. Louisville, Ky.: L/L Research, 1977.

———, Carla Rueckert, and James Allen McCarty. The Law of One. 4 vols. Louisville, Ky.: L/L Research, 1981–83. Reprint, Norfolk, Va.: Donning, 1984.

The Loathly Damsel

Kundrie (or Kundry), the "Grail Messenger," a character who first appears in the eleventh-century romance by Chrétien de Troyes that developed the legend of the Holy Grail, Le Conte del Graal, also known as Perceval. One would imagine that the holder of the Grail would be saint-like, but Chrétien de Troyes describes her as "a damsel more hideous than could be pictured outside hell." Wolfram von Eschenbach, who elaborated on de Troyes' work, refers to her in his work as "Kundrie la Sorcière." Kundry, in Richard Wagner's music-drama "Parsifal," represents sin.

Lobb, John (1840–1921)

Prominent British businessman and public figure who became active in the cause of Spiritualism. Lobb was born on August 7, 1840, in Middlesex, England, and became a lay preacher in the Methodist ministry as well as editor of successful journals. He emerged into public life in 1876 after he raised a fund for the Rev. Josiah Henson, an African-American minister who inspired Hariette Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin. Lobb lectured and preached on Henson and edited Henson's life story, which sold over 30,000 copies in the first six weeks and was later translated into 12 languages. Lobb and Henson were honored with a command to meet the queen at Windsor Castle on March 5, 1877.

Through the rest of the century Lobb maintained an active public life. He belonged to the London School Board, was guardian of the City of London Union, and served on the Metropolitan Asylums Board, the Central Markets committee, and the London city council. He succeeded in exposing many scandals and abuses in the educational system, the police force, and other areas of social and public life.

After 1903 Lobb campaigned vigorously on behalf of Spiritualism by lecturing and publishing. He traveled all over Britain and claimed to have addressed some 40,000 individuals on such subjects as survival of personality after death, spirit photography, and materialization.

Sources:

Lobb, John. Talks with the Dead. N.p., 1906.

———. Uncle Tom's Story of His Life. N.p., 1877.

Loch Ness Investigation Bureau

Founded in 1962 to obtain scientific evidence of the existence of the Loch Ness Monster, a marine animal or animals believed by some to inhabit Loch Ness and other lakes in Scotland, Ireland, Canada, Siberia, and the Scandinavian countries. Formerly titled Loch Ness Phenomena Investigation Bureau. After a decade of operation, the project concluded in 1972.

Sources:

Binns, Ronald. The Loch Ness Mystery Solved. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1984.

Loch Ness Monster

A persistently reported monster or colony of monsters in the vast area of Loch Ness in northern Scotland. The loch is some 24 miles long and about a mile wide, with a depth from 433 to 754 feet. A monster was reported here in ancient Gaelic legends as well as in a biography of St. Columba circa 565 C.E. The modern history dates from 1933, when the monster began to receive a significant amount of media attention. Research efforts to produce conclusive proof of the monster's existence were initiated by different researchers in the 1970s.

In 1972 Robert Rines, an MIT physics graduate who went to Loch Ness to search for "Nessie," obtained some now famous computer-enhanced "flipper" photographs. The photographs were taken by an underwater camera after a sonar device detected what appeared to be two large moving objects. The pictures clearly showed a rhomboid shape that appeared to resemble the flippers on seals and similar aquatic mammals.

Other films and photographs of an unidentified object in the loch have been obtained in the last few decades. An impressive picture of a large unknown creature in Loch Ness made the front page of the New York Times (April 8, 1976); the photograph was captured in 1975 with an underwater camera using a sonar echo technique. A scientific report by Martin Klein and Harold E. Edgerton appeared in Technology Review (March–April 1976).

Two widely known photographs of the head and neck of the monster were taken by monster-hunter and conjurer Tony "Doc" Shiels on May 21, 1977, near Castle Urquhart at Loch Ness, Scotland. One of these photographs was reproduced in both Cornish Life and the London Daily Mirror for June 9, 1977, and both photographs were reproduced and discussed in Fortean Times (No. 22, summer 1977). Interest in the Loch Ness and similar monsters was stimulated by reports and photographs of the decomposing body of a sea creature caught by Japanese fishermen April 25, 1977, off the coast of New Zealand.

In 1983, Rikkie Razdan and Alan Kielar, two young electrical engineers, visited Loch Ness and spent six weeks trying to spot the monster with 144 sonar devices, covering an area of 6,400 square feet. After failing to find any significant traces of the monster that could not be explained as gas bubbles, floating debris, etc., they decided to study the sonar tracings obtained by Robert Rines.

They contacted Alan Gillespie of the Jet Propulsion Laboratory, who had handled the computer enhancement of the Rines pictures, and asked for copies of the shots. To their surprise, the images were vague and indistinct, quite unlike the distinctive "flipper" shape that had been given such prominence in press accounts. It seems that the pictures were retouched after being returned to Rines. An unretouched picture was reproduced in the journal Discover (September 1984) alongside the retouched "flipper" images of Rines. However, the basic shape remains, although somewhat hazy.

After centuries of sightings, it seems reasonable to suppose that there might be a continuing colony of creatures rather than a single monster. Biologist Roy Mackal made the case for the "possibility" of the existence of the monster, though definitive evidence remains elusive. Known in Great Britain affectionately as "Nessie," the creature was recently named Nessiteras rhombopteryx by Sir Peter Scott and Robert Rines (see "Naming the Loch Ness Monster," Nature, December 11, 1976) in an attempt to secure official protection as a rare species qualifying for conservation. In the late 1970s the existence of a "nessie" religious cult was revealed by European New Religions scholars, who made contact with the priestess who led the group.

The Loch Ness Phenomena Investigation Bureau was founded at 23 Ashley Place, London S.W.1, England, in 1961, though it became inactive after 1972. It was succeeded by the Loch Ness & Morar Project, concerned with claims of the Loch Ness Monster as well as "Mhorag." On October 9–11, 1987, the project instituted "Operation Deepscan." Twenty small boats equipped with sonar apparatus were deployed abreast, sweeping up and down Loch Ness in line, forming a "sonar curtain." At a press conference on September 17, organizer Adrian J. Shine stated that the project had scientific objectives—a study of fish distribution, water temperatures, and the contents of the loch. The results of this scan were inconclusive, although there were three unexplained sonar contacts, indicating something that might be large fishes or perhaps debris. No colony of monsters was located.

The Loch Ness and Loch Morar monsters are not unique, since similar creatures have been reported in lakes in a number of different countries. Their study is one of the main objects of cryptozoology.

Sources:

Binns, Ronald. The Loch Ness Mystery Solved. London: Star (W. H. Allen), 1984.

Campbell, Steuart Campbell. The Loch Ness Monster: The Evidence. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1986.

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Costello, Peter. In Search of Lake Monsters. London, 1974.

Dinsdale, Tim. The Story of the Loch Ness Monster. London, 1973.

Gould, Rupert T. The Loch Ness Monster. London, 1934. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Heuvelmans, Bernard. In the Wake of the Sea Serpents. London, 1968.

Holiday, F. W. The Dragon and the Disc. London, 1973.

Oudemans, A. C. The Loch Ness Animal. Leyden, 1934.

Witchell, Nicholas. The Loch Ness Story. London, 1974.

Loch Ness Monster Centre & Exhibition

Tourist attraction concerned with the traditions and investigations relating to reports of a Loch Ness Monster in Scotland. The facility includes a monster exhibit, animated "lair," video games, refreshment facilities, souvenirs, and books. It is situated some two miles from Urquhart Castle on Main Road A82. Address: Drumnacrochit, Inverness-shire, Scotland.

Loch Ness & Morar Project

Project that grew out of the Loch Morar Expedition to investigate reports of a monster named "Mhorag," similar to the Loch Ness Monster. Originating in 1970–72, the Loch Morar Survey investigated with manned observation equipment, then used underwater television in 1975. Later, sonar monitoring was the favored procedure. In spite of largely negative findings, the project continued to survey both Loch Morar and Loch Ness. In 1974 the project used divers and dredging in search of organic matter, on the supposition that if there had been large animals in the loch over a longer period, there should be organic remains. This search was inconclusive.

In the 1980s the project intensified its use of sonar equipment and underwater photography. An ambitious project, "Operation Deepscan," engaged more than 20 small boats to sweep the whole area of Loch Ness using sonar and video scanning. Although the results were largely ambiguous, there were three unexplained sonar contacts, indicating something that might be large fishes.

Address: The Original Loch Ness Exhibition Centre, Drumnadrochit, Inverness-shire, Scotland.

Sources:

Campbell, Steuart Campbell. The Loch Ness Monster: The Evidence. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1986.

Lodestone (or Loadstone)

A magnetic stone of magnetite (oxide of iron) showing polarity when suspended. It was once believed to possess magical properties of various kinds. If one was ill, the stone should be held in the hands and shaken well. It was said to cure wounds, snakebites, weak eyes, headaches, and defective hearing. The possessor of the lodestone was supposed to be able to walk through reptiles in safety even when they were accompanied by "black death." Orpheus stated that "with this stone you can hear the voices of the gods and learn many wonderful things," that it had the property of unfolding the future, and if held close to the eyes, it would inspire with a divine spirit.

Lodge, Sir Oliver (Joseph) (1851–1940)

World famous British physicist and a fearless champion of after-death survival. He missed no opportunity to declare his belief that death is not the end, that there are higher beings in the scale of existence, and that intercommunication between this world and the next is possible. Lodge was born June 12, 1851, at Penkhull, Staffordshire, England, and studied at University of London (B.S., 1875; D.Sc. 1877). He was professor of physics at University of London (1877) and at University of Liverpool (1881–90) and served as principal of Birmingham University (1900–19). Lodge was elected fellow of the Royal Society in 1887, awarded the Albert Medal of the Royal Society of Arts for his pioneer work in wireless telegraphy, and was knighted in 1902. He was president of the British Association in 1913. His great reputation as a physicist was established by his research in electricity, thermoelectricity, and in wireless (radio) and theories of matter and ether. Lodge developed the spark plug that bears his name.

His first experiences in psychic research occurred in 1883–84, when he joined Malcolm Guthrie on his investigations of thought-transference in Liverpool. Lodge undertook similar experiments himself in 1892 in Carinthia at Portschach am See and reported them in Proceedings of the SPR (Vol. 7, part 20, 1892).

His most notable observations in physical research were made with the medium Eusapia Palladino. In Charles Richet's house on the Ile Roubaud, he attended four séances and reported on them in the Journal of the SPR (November 1894), affirming the reality of Palladino's phenomena:

"However the facts are to be explained, the possibility of the facts I am constrained to admit; there is no further room in my mind for doubt. Any person without invincible prejudice who had the same experience would come to the same broad conclusion, viz., that things hitherto held impossible do actually occur. If one such fact is clearly established, the conceivability of others may be more readily granted, and I concentrated my attention mainly on what seemed to me the most simple and definite thing, viz., the movement of an untouched object in sufficient light for no doubt of its motion to exist. This I have now witnessed several times; the fact of movement being vouched for by both sight and hearing, sometimes also by touch, and the objectivity of the movement being demonstrated by the sounds heard by an outside observer, and by permanent alteration in the position of the objects. The result of my experience is to convince me that certain phenomena usually considered abnormal do belong to the order of nature, and as a corollary from this, that these phenomena ought to be investigated and recorded by persons and societies interested in natural knowledge."

When Palladino was exposed in fraud in the following year at Cambridge, Lodge, who attended two of the sittings there, defended his earlier observations. He declared that there was no resemblance between the Cambridge phenomena and those observed on the Ile Roubaud. In the field of mental phenomena, Lenora Piper was his chief source of enlightenment. His first investigations with Piper took place in 1889, when the medium was tested in England by the Society for Psychical Research. Lodge received many evidential messages, which soon convinced him that the dead were still alive.

His first report was published in 1890. Nineteen years later, in discussing the evidence for the return through the mediumship of Piper of F. W. H. Myers, Edmund Gurney, and many others, he referred to his experiences:

"The old series of sittings with Mrs. Piper convinced me of survival for reasons which I should find it hard to formulate in any strict fashion, but that was their distinct effect. They also made me suspect—or more than suspect—that surviving intelligences were in some cases consciously communicating—yes, in some few cases consciously; though more usually the messages came, in all probability, from an unconscious stratum, being received by the medium in an inspirational manner analogous to psychometry. The hypothesis of surviving intelligence and personality—not only surviving but anxious and able with difficulty to communicate—is the simplest and most straightforward and the only one that fits all the facts" (from The Survival of Man, 1909).

Lodge openly stated for the first time, in 1908, that he believed he had genuinely conversed with late friends and that the boundary between the two worlds was wearing thin in places. Five years later, speaking from the presidential chair to the British Association in September 1913, he boldly declared that his own investigations convinced him that "memory and affection are not limited to that association with matter by which alone they can manifest themselves here and now, and that personality persists beyond bodily death."

The widest publicity to Lodge's belief in survival appeared in his famous book, Raymond: or, Life and Death (1916). The story of the return of his son, who died in action in World War I, is one of the best-attested cases of spirit identity. It begins with the celebrated "Faunus" message, delivered through Piper on August 8, 1915. It purported to come from the spirit of psychic researcher Richard Hodgson and began abruptly: "Now, Lodge, while we are not here as of old, i.e., not quite, we are here enough to give and take messages. Myers says you take the part of the poet, and he will act as Faunus. FAUNUS. Myers. Protect: he will U.D. (understand). What have you to say Lodge? Good work ask Verrall, she will also U.D. Arthur says so."

The message reached Sir Oliver Lodge in early September 1915. On September 17, the War Office notified him that Raymond was killed in action on September 14. Before this blow fell, Lodge wrote to Margaret Verrall, a well-known classical scholar and asked her, "Does the poet and Faunus mean anything to you? Did one protect the other?" She replied at once that "the reference is to Horace's account of his narrow escape from death, from a falling tree, which he ascribes to the intervention of Faunus."

The Rev. M. A. Bayfield attached to the incident the following interpretation: "Horace does not, in any reference to his escape, say clearly whether the tree struck him, but I have always thought it did. He says Faunus lightened the blow; he does not say 'turned it aside.' As bearing on your terrible loss, the meaning seems to be that the blow would fall, but would not crush; it would be 'lightened' by the assurance, conveyed afresh to you by a special message from the still living Myers, that your boy still lives."

On September 25, Lady Lodge had a sitting with Gladys Osborne Leonard. Raymond sent this message: "Tell Father I have met some friends of his." On asking for names, Myers was mentioned. Two days later, medium Alfred Vout Peters spoke about a photograph of a group of officers with Raymond among them. Various other messages came from different mediums, as did the cross-correspondence on the Faunus message.

On November 25, Mrs. Cheves, a complete stranger, wrote a letter saying that she had a photograph of the officers of the South Lancashire Regiment of which Raymond Lodge was a second lieutenant and offered to send it. In a séance on December 3, Gladys Leonard described the photograph, featuring Raymond sitting on the ground and an officer placing his hand on Raymond's shoulder. The photograph arrived on December 7 and corresponded with the description in every detail.

Many other messages, bearing the authentic stamp of Raymond's identity, came through. The most curious was one about "Mr. Jackson." "Feda," Leonard's control, said that Raymond mixed it up with a bird and a pedestal. The truth of the matter was that Jackson was a peacock which, after its death, was stuffed and put on a pedestal.

Lodge displayed the whole mass of evidential communications in his book Raymond, including the reference to cigars and whiskey and soda in the afterlife. Owing to this, many ridiculed the book, although many others accept the idea that dead spirits can furnish the afterlife with familiar associations of everyday physical life. Some critics suggested that Lodge's bereavement led him into Spiritualism, but his book repudiates this notion. "My conclusion," Lodge wrote, "has been gradually forming itself for years, though, undoubtedly, it is based on experience of the same sort of thing. But this event has strengthened and liberated my testimony. It can now be associated with a private experience of my own, instead of with the private experience of others."

The book Raymond was followed by other important publications on psychic research in which Lodge elaborated his previous conclusions. Before the Modern Churchmen's Conference in September 1931 in Oxford, Lodge declared:

"If I find myself an opportunity of communicating I shall try to establish my identity by detailing a perfectly preposterous and absurdly childish peculiarity which I have already taken the trouble to record with some care in a sealed document deposited in the custody of the English S.P.R. I hope to remember the details of this document and relate them in no unmistakable fashion. The value of the communication will not consist in the substance of what is communicated, but in the fact that I have never mentioned it to a living soul, and no one has any idea what it contains. People of sense will not take its absurd triviality as anything but helpful in contributing to the proof of the survival of personal identity."

He reiterated this viewpoint two years later in his book My Philosophy: "Basing my conclusions on experience I am absolutely convinced not only of survival but of demonstrated survival, demonstrated by occasional interaction with matter in such a way as to produce physical results."

Lodge died August 22, 1940, at Amersham, Wiltshire, England. His correspondence is preserved in the Lodge Collection of the Society for Psychical Research in London.

The post-mortal identity test of Lodge's survival involved the depositing of a set of envelopes with the Society for Psychical Research and the London Spiritualist Alliance, with instructions for consecutive opening of the envelopes. The packet in the possession of the Society for Psychical Research contained seven envelopes, one inside another, containing clues when opened consecutively. The instructions were somewhat complex and, owing to the war years following his death, could not be applied. The final envelope with the test message was opened February 10, 1947. No psychic had identified it. The test did not lead to the evidence of survival hoped for (see Journal of the SPR Vol. 38, pp. 121–134).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hill, J. Arthur, ed. Letters from Sir Oliver Lodge. London: Cassell, 1932.

Jolly, W. P. Sir Oliver Lodge. New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1975.

Lodge, Sir Oliver. Christopher: A Study in Human Personality. New York: George H. Doran, 1919.

———. Conviction of Survival. N.p., 1930.

———. Past Years. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1931.

———. Raymond; or, Life and Death. London: Methuen, 1916.

———. Raymond Revised. N.p., 1922.

———. The Reality of a Spiritual World. N.p., 1930.

———. The Substance of Faith Allied with Sciences. London: Methuen, 1915.

———. Survival of Man. London: Methuen, 1909.

———. Why I Believe in Personal Immortality. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1929.

Loehr, Franklin (Davison) (1912–1988)

Clergyman and parapsychologist. He was born November 19, 1912, at Oskaloosa, Iowa. He studied at Monmouth College, Illinois (B.A., 1933) and McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, Illinois (B.D., 1936). He was ordained as a Congregational minister, pastored various churches, and served a period as a chaplain in the U.S. Army Air Force. While serving a church in Los Angeles, in 1952 he founded and became director of research of the Religious Research Foundation.

While pastoring in Los Angeles, Loehr conducted some informal research on the power of prayer to stimulate plant growth originally as a demonstration of the power of prayer for his church members. His book The Power of Prayer on Plants (1959) described the development of his initial interest into what became a three-year laboratory study. His work was later duplicated under rigorous laboratory conditions by Bernard Grad at McGill University in Montreal.

In 1958 he married Grace Wittenberger, a medium. He began research on her mediumship, in particular her past-life readings. These readings are concerned with claimed former incarnations of individuals, throwing light on their present-day personality. In this regard, Loehr coined the term "psychography" to describe the mapping of the past life influences upon the personality in the present. Grace Loehr's work was documented in Roy C. Smith's book, Incarnation and Reincarnation (1975).

Loehr's work at the Religious Research Foundation focused primarily on survival of death, about which he wrote widely. He himself became a medium and communicated with his colleague Henry Clements for four months after Clements' death in which the spirit entity minutely described the transition of death and the new awareness he received once established on the other side.

The work of the Religious Research foundation, Box 208, Grand Island, FL 32735, has led to the production of a number of books. Loehr died on July 10, 1988 shortly after his address to the first International Conference on Paranormal Research meeting in Colorado.

Sources:

Loehr, Franklin. Death with Understanding. Grand Island, Fla.: Religious Research Press, 1987.

———. Power of Prayer on Plants. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1959.

———. Psychography: A Method of Self Discovery. Grand Island, Fla.: Religious Research Press, 1990.

———. Science, Religion, and the Development of Religion as a Science. Grand Island, Fla.: Gnosticours, 1983.

Smith, Roy O. Incarnation and Reincarnation. Los Angeles: Religious Research Press, 1975.

Logan, Daniel (1936–)

Modern American psychic. Born Daniel Olaschinez on April 24, 1936, in Flushing, New York, he later changed his name after deciding upon an acting career. Then he discovered his psychic ability and gave up acting for a career as a professional psychic; he also wrote and lectured on psychic subjects. Logan successfully forecast the prolonging of the Vietnam war into the 1970s, the race riots of 1967, and, weeks in advance, named the Academy Award winners for 1966, 1967, and 1968. His first public appearance as a psychic was on David Susskind's television show, and he later appeared in an hour-long television special. He is unusual in that his insights have often been verbal rather than visual; he sometimes makes predictions before he is aware of what he is saying.

Sources:

Logan, Daniel. America Bewitched: The Rise of Black Magic and Spiritism. New York: William Morrow, 1973.

———. Do You Have ESP? N.p., 1970.

———. The Reluctant Prophet. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1968.

———. Vibrations. N.p., 1976.

———. Your Eastern Star. N.p., 1972.

Logos

A Greek term generally translated in the Christian New Testament as "Word" but meaning essential thought or concept. In its theological sense, it refers to the creative power (word) of God; in logic, grammar, and rhetoric it indicates meaningful and significant statement. The concept of the ontological creative sound is common to both Hellenic and Jewish theology, which may have influenced each other. Logos is also analogous to the word "AUM" in Hindu mysticism.

The term has been utilized in Theosophy. "Fohat" is the term very commonly used in Theosophy to designate the Deity. Along with the great religions, Theosophy has, as the beginning of its scheme, a Deity who is altogether beyond human knowledge or conception, whether in the ordinary or the clairvoyant states. But when the Deity manifests to man through his works of creation, He is known as the Logos.

Essentially God is infinite, but when He encloses a "ring-pass-not" within which to build a cosmos, He has set limits to Himself, and what we can know of Him is contained in these limits.

He appears in a triple aspect, but this is, of course, merely an appearance, for in reality He is a unity. This triple aspect shows Him as Will, Wisdom, and Activity, and from each of these came forth one of the creative life waves that formed the universe. The third wave created matter, the second wave aggregated diffuse matter into form, and the first wave brought with it the Monad, that scintillation of Himself which took possession of formed matter and thereby started the process of evolution.

Logos (Newsletter)

The newsletter of the Swedenborg Foundation which is headquartered at 320 N. Church St., West Chester, PA 19380. The newsletter is also available on the Internet at http://swedenborg.com/logos.html.

Sources:

Swedenborg Newsletter (Logos). http://swedenborg.com/logos.html. March 8, 2000.

Loka

In Hindu religion, a term for a world or division of the universe. For general purposes, there are three lokas: heaven, earth, and hell, but different philosophical schools have enumerated seven or even eight lokas. The seven lokas are: Bhur-loka (earth), Bhwar-loka (space between earth and the sun, inhabited by semi-divine beings), Swar-loka (region between the sun and polar star, the heaven of the god Indra), Mahar-loka (the abode of great sages and saints), Jana-loka (abode of the sons of the god Brahma), Tapar-loka (abode of other deities), and Satya-loka or Brahma-loka (abode of Brahma, where souls are released from the necessity of rebirth).

In Buddhism, there are three worlds—or world systems—named lokas: the kamaloka (world of desire), the rupaloka (world of matter or form), and the arupaloka (world without form). These terms have been adopted by the Theosophical Society. (See also Lokaloka)

Loka (Journal)

Former publication of the Naropa Institute whose two issues were concerned with Buddhism and its meditation techniques. Copies of these issues are available through The Naropa University's library at 2130 Arapahoe Ave., Boulder, CO 80302.

Lokaloka

A fabulous region of Hindu mythology—"world and no world." It was said to be a chain of mountains at the edge of the seven seas, dividing the visible world from the regions of darkness. (See also Loka)

Lombroso, Cesare (1836–1909)

Italian psychiatrist, criminal anthropologist, and psychic investigator. He was born on November 18, 1836, at Verona, and studied at Padua, Vienna, and Paris. In 1862 he began his professional career as a professor of psychiatry at Pavia, then served successively as director of the lunatic asylum at Pesaro, professor of forensic medicine and psychiatry at Turin, and finally professor of criminal anthropology.

In 1872 he investigated the disease known as pellagra and concluded that in Italy it was caused by a poison in diseased maize eaten by the peasants. He also researched madness and genius, about which he authored several books, then turned his attention to psychic research. His later studies in criminal behavior were conducted concurrently with his psychic investigations.

His involvement in the paranormal resulted from an article he wrote for the July 1888 Fanfulla della Domenica on the "Influence of Civilization and Opportunity of Genius." In it he concluded:

"Who knows whether I and my friends who laugh at spiritism are not in error, since, just like hypnotised persons, thanks to the dislike of novelties which lurks in all of us, we are unable to perceive that we are in error, and just like many lunatics, being in the dark as regards the truth, we laugh at those who are not in the same condition."

After reading this article, Cavaliere Ercole Chiaia of Naples addressed an open letter to Lombroso and invited him to sittings with the medium Eusapia Palladino in Naples. In March 1891 Lombroso accepted the invitation. With Professors Tamburini, Bianchi, and Violi and Drs. Ascenzi, Prenta, Limoncelli, Gigli, and Ciolfi, Lombroso witnessed the extraordinary medium. In a subsequent letter to Ciolfi, the reporter of the sittings, Lombroso openly declared: "I am ashamed and grieved at having opposed with so much tenacity the possibility of the so-called spiritistic facts; I say the facts because I am still opposed to the theory. But the facts exist, and I boast of being a slave to facts."

Lombroso's admission caused a great sensation in Italy. As a direct consequence, a memorable series of sittings was held with the same medium in October 1892 at Dr. Finzi's house in Milan. The facts were completely confirmed for Lombroso, who pursued his research assiduoulsy. He conducted experiments in thought-transmission and contributed many articles on the phenomena of mediumship to the 1896 Archivio di Psichiatria. His investigation of a haunted house in Turin is of special interest (see poltergeist).

In 1900 Lombroso wrote to M. T. Falcomer: "I am like a little pebble on the beach. As yet I am uncovered; but I feel that each tide draws me a little closer to the sea."

In 1901 and 1902 Lombroso participated at further sittings with Palladino in Genoa and in 1907 in Turin. He came progressively to accept the spirit hypothesis, and, against the protests of friends who believed he would ruin an honorable reputation, he published his findings After Death—What? (1909).

The book is richly illustrated and presents a very lucid and sincere account of the phenomena of mediumship. Lombroso's chief credit was his fearless confession to the truth of his strange observations at a period when, despite the courage of William Crookes, Alfred Russel Wallace and J. C. F. Zöllner, the physical phenomena of Spiritualism were held in utter disdain. Following Lombroso's open declaration, a group of scientists resolved to put aside prejudice and investigate in a serious frame of mind.

Lombroso died suddenly at Turin on October 19, 1909.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lombroso, Cesare. After Death—What? Boston: Small, Maynard, 1909.

———. The Man of Genius. London: Scott, 1891.

London Dialectical Society

A British professional association that in the late 1800s investigated the phenomena of Spiritualism. Established in 1867, the London Dialectical Society was a highly regarded association of professional individuals. With the appearance and popularity of Spiritualism in England, the society resolved on January 26, 1869, "to investigate the phenomena alleged to be Spiritual Manifestations, and to report thereon." A committee was convened on which 33 members were appointed: H. G. Atkinson, G. Wheatley Bennett, J. S. Bergheim, Charles Bradlaugh (later a famous atheist leader), G. Fenton Cameron, George Cary, E. W. Cox, Rev. C. Maurice Davies, D. H. Dyte, Mrs. D. H. Dyte, James Edmunds, Mrs. James Edmunds, James Gannon, Grattan Geary, William B. Gower, Robert Hannah, Jenner Gale Hillier, Mrs. J. G. Hillier, Henry Jeffery, H. D. Jencken, Albert Kisch, J. H. Levy, Joseph Maurice, Isaac L. Meyers, B. M. Moss, Robert Quelch, Thomas Reed, G. Russel Roberts, W. H. Sweepstone, William Volckman, Alfred Russel Wallace (later a famous psychic researcher), Josiah Webber, and Horace S. Yeomans. Thomas H. Huxley and George Henry Lewes were both invited but refused, Huxley stating that even "supposing the phenomena to be genuine, they do not interest me."

The report with evidence was presented to the council of the London Dialectical Society on July 20, 1870. It was accepted, but since it appeared to favor Spiritualist phenomena, the society did not publish it. However, the committee felt that it was in the public interest to be published, so it privately printed the report in 1871.

The principal work was done in six subcommittees. The general committee conducted 15 meetings to receive oral evidence of personal spiritual (i.e., psychic) experience from 33 written statements from 31 persons. The general committee stated that the report of the subcommittees:

"substantially corroborate each other, and would appear to establish the following propositions:

"1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and wall of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sound are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance.

"2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind or adequate exertion of muscular force by the persons present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person.

"3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the times and in the manner asked for by persons present, and by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications.

"4. That the answers and communications thus obtained are, for the most part, of a commonplace character; but the facts are sometimes correctly given which are only known to one of the persons present.

"5. That the circumstances under which the phenomena occur are variable, the most prominent fact being that the presence of certain persons seems necessary to their occurrence and that of others generally adverse; but this difference does not appear to depend upon any belief or disbelief concerning the phenomena.

"6. That, nevertheless, the occurrence of the phenomena is not insured by the presence or absence of such persons respectively."

The evidence was summarized in the report as follows:

"1. Thirteen witnesses state that they have seen heavy bodies–in some instances men—rise slowly in the air and remain there for some time without visible or tangible support.

"2. Fourteen witnesses testify to having seen hands or figures, not appertaining to any human being, but life-like in appearance and mobility, which they have sometimes touched or even grasped, and which they are therefore convinced were not the result of imposture or illusion.

"3. Five witnesses state that they have been touched, by some invisible agency, on various parts of the body, and often where requested, when the hands of all present were visible.

"4. Thirteen witnesses declare that they have heard musical pieces well played upon instruments not manipulated by an ascertainable agency.

"5. Five witnesses state that they have seen red-hot coals applied to the hands or heads of several persons without producing pain or scorching; and three witnesses state that they have had the same experiment made upon themselves with the like immunity.

"6. Eight witnesses state that they have received precise information through rappings, writings, and in other ways, the accuracy of which was unknown at the time to themselves or to any persons present, and which, on subsequent inquiry was found to be correct.

"7. One witness declares that he has received a precise and detailed statement which, nevertheless, proved to be entirely erroneous.

"8. Three witnesses state that they have been present when drawings, both in pencil and colours, were produced in so short a time, and under such conditions as to render human agency impossible.

"9. Six witnesses declare that they have received information of future events and that in some cases the hour and minute of their occurrence have been accurately foretold, days and even weeks before."

"In addition to the above[,] evidence has been given of trance speaking, of healing, of automatic writing, of the introduction of flowers and fruits into closed rooms, of voices in the air, of visions in crystals and glasses, and of the elongation of the human body.

"In presenting their report your Committee, taking into consideration the high character and great intelligence of many of the witnesses to the more extraordinary facts, the extent to which their testimony is supported by the reports of the sub-committees, and the absence of any proof of imposture or delusion as regards a large portion of the phenomena; and further, having regard to the exceptional character of the phenomena, the large number of persons in every grade of society and over the whole civilised world who are more or less influenced by a belief in their super-natural origin, and to the fact that no philosophical explanation of them has yet been arrived at, deem it incumbent upon them to state their conviction that the subject is worthy of more serious attention and careful investigation than it has hitherto received."

Two of the subcommittees reported failure to obtain phenomena, one investigated the medium D. D. Home with very feeble results, and three witnessed strong physical manifestations without contact and intelligence behind the operations. Dissenting opinion to the report was registered by general committee chair Dr. James Edmunds and by three other members: Henry Jeffrey, Grattan Geary, and H. G. Atkinson.

Alfred Russel Wallace stated in On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism (1875) that, of the 33 acting members of the committee, only 8 believed in the phenomena from the outset, while not more than 4 accepted the spiritual theory. During the inquiry, at least 12 of the complete skeptics became convinced of the reality of many of the physical phenomena through attending the experimental subcommittees, almost entirely by means of the mediumship of members of the committee. At least 3 of the previous skeptics later became thorough Spiritualists. The degree of conviction was approximately proportionate to the amount of time and care given the investigation.

Among those who gave evidence or read papers before the committee were: Wallace, Emma Hardinge Britte, H. D. Jencken, Benjamin Coleman (later a member of the British National Association of Spiritualists), Cromwell F. Varley, D. D. Home, and the Master of Lindsay. Correspondence was received from Bulwar Lytton, Dr. Robert Chambers, Dr. Garth Wilkinson, William Howitt, and Camille Flammarion.

Very little opposing evidence was brought in. Lord Lytton believed in material influences of whose nature we are ignorant, Dr. Carpenter in unconscious cerebration, and Dr. Kidd in the devil. Coverage of the report in the press, however, was largely hostile. The London Times pronounced it as "nothing more than a farrago of impotent conclusions, garnished by a mass of the most monstrous rubbish it has ever been our misfortune to sit in judgment upon." The Morning Post considered it entirely worthless. The Saturday Review was disappointed that it did not discredit a little further "one of the most unequivocally degrading superstitions that has ever found currency among reasonable beings." The Standard took a more open-minded view. The Daily News stated that "it may be regarded as an important contribution to a subject which someday or other, by the very number of its followers will demand more extended investigation." The Spectator agreed with the report's conclusion that the phenomena justified further cautious investigation.

Although the report considered only the phenomenal aspect of Spiritualism and not the question of survival, it highly influenced qualified investigators to look into the subject. Even arch skeptic Frank Podmore admitted so much in his book Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1902):

"The work done by the Dialectical Society was, no doubt, of value, since it has brought together and preserved for us a large number of records of personal experiences by representative Spiritualists. For those who wish to ascertain what Spiritualists believed at this time, and what phenomena were alleged to occur, the book may be of service. But, except in the Minority Report by Dr. Edmunds, there is no trace of any critical handling of the materials, and the conclusions of the committee can carry little weight."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

London Dialectical Society. Report. London: Longmans, Green, Reader & Dyer, 1871. Reprint, London: J. Burns, 1873. Reprint, London: Arno Press, 1976.

London Group

The London Group is a British initiatory magical organization founded in 1975 by former members of the Fraternity of the Inner Light, the group originally founded by Dion Fortune (1890–1946). Fortune, a member of the Stella Matutina, one of the splinter groups into which the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn had divided, claimed direct contact with the inner planes of wisdom. Mixing Golden Dawn material with her own teaching, she developed a strong organization which has continued until the present. During the last half of the twentieth century, however, changes began to be introduced into the fraternity's program. It became more open and dropped some of the initiatory overlay.

The London Group, based in the city, but by no means limited to it, offers a program designed to be more suitable to the present generation. Innovation is invited, and contemporary psychological insights integrated into the group's material. Prospective members are invited to take two courses, one in basic occult perspectives and the Cabala (or Kabbalah), followed by one introducing the mysteries (i.e., magic) and the use of ritual and symbol. Those who complete these courses may then be invited to take the Threshold course that actually prepares them to join the group as working members.

The group emphasizes practical work and action and has little toleration for mere occult philosophy. It aims at the personal regeneration of each member through high magic. Members are also expected to have an impact upon the larger society as it is believed that regenerated persons will assist in the continued evolution of humanity.

The London Group may be contacted at BM LP7, London WC1N 3XX. There are also offices in the United States and the Netherlands.

Sources:

Barrett, David V. Sects, 'Cults,' and Alternative Religions: A World Survey and Source Book. London: Blandford, 1996.

London Spiritualist Alliance See College of Psychic Studies

Long, James A. (1898–1971)

James Long, for two decades the leader of the American Theosophical Society, was born on August 27, 1898, in York, Pennsylvania. He became a successful businessman and during World War II (1939–45) served in Washington, D.C., as a management consultant for the office of the Quartermaster General, which had the task of gathering the supplies necessary to outfit the army. Following the war he worked at the State Department to assist in the transition back to a peacetime economy. He attended the Second Session of the United Nations as an advisor to the U.S. delegation in 1946.

Long had joined the Theosophical Society in 1935 and four years later put his business acumen to service for the society by becoming its national business manager in 1939. He became an associate of Arthur L. Conger, who became president of the society's American section that same year, and worked closely with him through the 1940s. Conger became the leader of the society in 1945. In 1950 he asked Long to locate suitable buildings in Pasadena, California, for the relocation of the headquarters, then in Covina. At the end of the year, Long toured the society's lodges around the world.

Conger passed away in 1951, and Long was chosen to succeed him. He completed the move of the group's headquarters to its present location in Altadena (immediately north of Pasadena). He also placed great emphasis on the role of Theosophy in daily living and its dialogue with culture. He founded Sunrise, the society's present magazine, and set its policy of including articles in every issue on the theosophical perspective on modern trends in science, philosophy, and religion.

Long died on July 19, 1971.

Sources:

Donant, Alan E. "Colonel Arthur L. Conger." Theosophical History 7, no.1 (January 1998): 35–56.

The Theosophical Movement, 1875–1950. Los Angeles: Cunningham Press, 1951.

Long, Max Freedom (1890–1971)

Pioneer researcher into the mystery of Huna magic, the secret techniques of Kahunas, or Polynesian priest-sorcerers. Long first went to Hawaii in 1917 as a schoolteacher following his graduation from Los Angeles Normal School (now the University of California at Los Angeles). Over a three-year period he was introduced to the stories of the native Hawaiians, though they refused to talk to him about the interesting occult aspects of the narratives.

In 1921, as he was planning to return to California, he stopped at the Bishop Museum in Honolulu and met William Tufts Brigham, then curator of the museum. Brigham had studied the seemingly miraculous feats of the Kahunas, including paranormal healing, weather control, and fire ordeals that involved walking over red-hot lava. Long stayed in Honolulu and studied with Brigham until the curator died in 1926. They were unable to discover the Kahunas' secret. Long returned to the mainland and opened a photography business. He had all but given up finding an answer to the Kahuna mystery when in 1935 it suddenly occurred to him that the secret might be indicated by the terms used for various aspects of Huna in the Polynesian language.

He published the first report on his discoveries, Recovering the Ancient Magic, in 1936, though most of the copies were destroyed in the German bombing of London during World War II. In 1945 he founded the Huna Fellowship, began issuing printed letters to what had become a long list of correspondents, and published a small pamphlet on the basic Huna concepts. Three years later the letters became a regular bulletin, and his most important book, The Secret Science Behind the Miracles, was published. A second book, The Secret Science at Work (1953), integrated what he had come to know of the Huna work and what he had learned in its practical modern application.

He developed the Huna concepts in various books over the rest of his life. In 1968 he met E. Otha Wingo, an instructor at Southeast Missouri State College, and for the last three years of his life groomed Wingo to succeed him. Also during the 1960s, a memorial library was established in his honor in Fort Worth, Texas, and now houses many of his mementos. Wingo continues as head of Huna Research.

Sources:

Hoffman, Enid. Huna, A Beginner's Guide. Rockport, Mass.: ParaResearch, 1976.

Long, Max Freedom. Growing Into Light. Vista, Calif.: Huna Research Publications, 1955.

———. Recovering the Ancient Magic. London, 1936. Reprint, Cape Girardeau, Mo.: Huna Press, 1978.

———. The Secret Science behind Miracles. Kosmon Press, 1948. Reprint, Vista, Calif.: Huna Research Publications, 1954.
———. The Secret Science at Work. Vista, Calif.: Huna Research Publications, 1953.
Wingo, E. Otha. The Story of the Huna Work. Cape Girardeau, Mo.: Huna Research, 1981.

Lopato, David (1911–)

South African accountant, medium, and spiritual healer. He was born October 13, 1911, and studied at the University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa. He began his practice as a chartered accountant and auditor in 1934. He chaired (1945–60) and was president (beginning in 1961) of the Society for Psychic Advancement, Johannesburg. Lopato lectured on parapsychology and worked as a healing medium in conjunction with physicians, treating patients who had failed to respond to orthodox treatment.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lopukhin, I. V. (1756–1816)

Russian lawyer and politician with special interests in mysticism and Freemasonry who anonymously published the work Characteristics of the Interior Church. This tract was first published in Russian in 1798. It was translated into English in 1912 from a French edition by D. H. S. Nicholson and occultist Arthur E. Waite. Lopukhin's teaching was similar to that of Karl von Eckhartshausen. It is a kind of Christian transcendentalism and resembles the higher literature of the Grail.

Loquifer, Battle of

A tale incorporated in the Charlemagne saga, supposed to have been written around the twelfth century. Its hero is Renouart, the reputed giant brother-in-law of William of Orange (died 812 C.E.) and the events take place on the sea. Renouart and his barons are on the shore at Porpaillart when a Saracen fleet is seen. He is persuaded to enter one of the ships, which immediately sets sail, and he is told by Isembert, a hideous monster, that the Saracens mean to flay him alive.

Armed only with a huge bar of wood, Renouart kills this creature and makes the Saracens let him go, while they return to their own country. It is arranged that Renouart will fight Loquifer, a fairy giant and leader of the Saracens, and the outcome of this combat will determine the war.

They meet on an island near Porpaillart. Loquifer possesses a magical balm, which heals all his wounds immediately and is concealed in his club. But Renouart is assisted by angels, and he eventually deprives Loquifer of his club, so that his strength departs. Then Renouart slays him, and the devil carries off his soul.

The romance goes on to tell of a duel between William of Orange and Desrame, Renouart's father, in which the latter is slain. Renouart is comforted by fairies, who bear him to Avalon where he has many adventures. He is shipwrecked but is rescued by mermaids and awakes to find himself on the sands at Porpaillart, from which spot he had been taken to Avalon.

Lörber Society

The Lörber Society (in German, the Lörber Gesellschaft) is the organization of the students of Austrian seer and channel Jakob Lörber (1800–1864). Lörber was 40 years old when he claimed a voice commanded him to take up a pencil and write. He obeyed, and the voice eventually claimed to be Jesus Christ. Jesus dictated some 25 substantive books and a variety of shorter works. Supposedly, after Lörber's death, these revelations were given to Gottfried Meyerhofer (1807–1877), a retired army officer living in Trieste, Italy. After Meyerhofer died, the voice continued to speak through other individuals, including Leopold Engel, Johanne Ladner, Bertha Dudde, Johannes Widmann, Max Seltmann, Johanna Henzsel, George Riehle, and Johannes Friede. The revelations now fill over 40 volumes.

The works of Lörber were published by the Neutheosophischer Verlag, (after 1907 the Newsalems Verlag or New Jerusalem Publishing House) of Bietigheim, Germany, whose owner, Christoph Friedrich Landbeck, was a student of the materials. In 1924 Lörber's students founded the New Jerusalem Society. After the rise of Adolph Hitler and the annexation of Austria, the society was suppressed, but after the war it resurfaced as the Lörber Gesellschaft (or Lörber Society).

In 1921, Hans Nordewin von Koerber (1896–1979), professor of Asiatic studies at the University of Southern California, discovered the Lörber material and began to translate it into English. In 1962 he founded the Divine Word Society to publish and disseminate English editions of Lörber's writings. This society was very active through the 1970s but seems to have disbanded in more recent years.

Lörber's revelations amount to a revised gnostic interpretation of Christianity. According to Lörber, the universe was created by God as the environment for a society of living love. Many individuals, thought of as divine sparks, were to grow into the divine likeness. That plan was thwarted by Lucifer, who revolted and was entrapped in matter. God is now using matter as a filter through which the impure spirits can be purified. On Earth, spirits are given the opportunity to return to God. Jesus came to earth to speed the redemptive process.

Through the imitation of Christ, the individual can learn to love God and his neighbor. Reborn, the soul drops the body and ascends to the New Jerusalem. Meanwhile, on Earth, Christ will return in the near future to recreate the Earth and establish the millennium. The current social turmoil is a sign of his near return. When he appears, Lucifer and the earthbound souls will have to make an ultimate choice. Those who refuse God and continue in rebellion will be destroyed.

Support for Lörber's revelations is strongest in German-speaking Europe, but followers can now be found around the world. Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Bunger, Fred S., and Hans N. Von Koerber. A New Light Shines Out of the Present Darkness. Philadelphia: Dorrance, 1971.
Lörber, Jakob. The Three-Days-Scene at the Temple of Jerusalem. Bietigheim, Germany: Neu-Salems-Society, 1932.

Lord, Jenny (ca. 1854)

Nineteenth-century American physical medium of Maine. Later married to J. L. Webb, she is said to have produced remarkable musical phenomena, either by herself or with her sister Annie, who was also mediumistic.

In her book Modern American Spiritualism (1870), Emma Hardinge (Britten) stated:

"These young ladies, both very slight, fragile persons, suffering under the most pitiable conditions of ill-health, and in their normal state unable to play upon any instrument, became mediums for various phases of "the power" requiring the most astounding physical force in execution, in addition to which, spirits, in their presence and in darkened rooms, would play upon a double bass violin cello, guitar, drums, accordion, tambourine, bells, and various small instruments, with the most astonishing skill and power. Sometimes the instruments would be played on singly, at others all together, and not infrequently the strange concert would conclude by placing the young medium, seated in her invalid chair, silently and in a single instant in the center of the table, piling up all the instruments around her, and then calling for a light to exhibit their ponderous feats of strength and noiseless agility to the eyes of the astonished circle. The sisters rarely sat together, and though it would be impossible to conceive of any persons more incapable of giving off physical power than these two fragile and afflicted girls, yet their manifestations with one alone acting as medium, have surpassed, in feats of vast strength and musical achievements, any that are recorded in the annals of Spiritualism.''

In his book The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism (1882), Epes Sargent described similar amazing séances with Lord, and introduced the Scottish writer Robert Chambers to her phenomena on a visit to America. Sargent expressed absolute conviction of the genuineness of the phenomena of Jenny Lord.

Lord, Maud E. (1852–1924)

American direct voice medium who worked under her married name, Mrs. Maud Lord-Drake. She was born March 15, 1852, in Marion County, West Virginia, with a double veil, or caul, over her face. Her father was a Baptist deacon, her mother a Methodist.

She appeared before the Seybert Commission in 1885. Nothing more than hoarse whispers were heard and these were never simultaneous with the speech of the medium. Touches were also felt here and there, but the committee did not find the phenomena convincing. However, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle concluded that the members of the commission were prejudiced against Spiritualist phenomena.

Usually Lord sat in the middle of her circle and clapped her hands in the darkness to prove that she did not change position while the voices spoke from different parts of the room. Her favorite control was the Indian child ''Snowdrop.'' She continued to work for 65 years, and she was reported to produce full-form materializations in daylight, independent music from a levitated guitar, independent voices and singing, clairvoyance, clairaudience and psychometry. At one point she was invited to Buckingham Palace, England, where she gave two readings to Queen Victoria.

Sources:

Lord-Drake, Maud. Psychic Light: The Continuity of Law and Life. Kansas City, Mo.: Frank T. Riley, 1904.

l'Ordre de la Rose Croix Catholicque, du Temple et du Graal

French Rosicrucian order founded in 1890 by Joséphin Péledan (1858–1918). Péladan had been one of the founders of l'Ordre Kabbalistique de la Rosecroix, but left because he found himself in unresolvable conflict with the other leaders over his religious faith. Péladan was a strict Roman Catholic and possessed a hope of bringing occultism back under the guidance of the church. Through his new order he hoped to carry out works of mercy that would lead members to prepare for the reign of the Holy Spirit.

Like previous groups, Péladan's order had three grades that he termed equerries, knights, and commanders. Commanders were assigned one of the sephiroth of the Kabbalistic Tree.

The order enjoyed some success during Péladan's life and he led it in assuming a role in cultural nurturance. Beginning in 1892 it sponsored a series of art exhibitions in Paris aimed at restoring the cult of the ideal, with an emphasis on beauty and tradition. The art displayed had a mystical or occult theme. Péladan also did much to promote Richard Wagner's music in France. Unfortunately, for the art world, the order died with Péladan's death immediately after the end of World War I.

Sources:

Aubrun, R. G. Péladan. Paris: Sansot, 1904.

McIntosh, Christopher. Éliphas Lévi and the French Occult Revival. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

———. The Rose Cross Unveiled: The History, Mythology and Rituals of an Occult Order. Wellingborough, Northamptionshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1980.

Péladan, Joséphin. Comment on devient mage. Paris, 1892.

———. La decadence esrhétique. Paris: Dalou, 1888.

———. Le Vice supreme. Paris: Labrairie de la Presse, Laurens, 1886.

l'Ordre Kabbalistique de la Rosecroix

An important French Rosicrucian order created in 1888, the same year of the founding of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn in England. It was founded by the Marquis Stanislas de Guaita and Joséphin Péladan (1858–1918). De Guaita, a poet living in Paris in the 1880s, had been introduced to the magical writings of Éliphas Lévi. Pélatan, a staunch Catholic, had developed an interest in mysticism and the kabala. He authored a series of novels under the collected title of La Décadence latine, one of which, Le Vice supréme, fell into de Guaita's hands. The two struck up a correspondence which led to a friendship and the establishment of the order.

The Ordre was headed by a council of twelve, six secret chiefs and six known persons. The original six besides the two founders included Papus (Gérard Encausse), Marc Haven, the Abbé Alta, Paul Adam, and astrologer Francois-Charles Barlet. It was structured on three levels, and new members received in succession a baccalaureate, licentiate, and doctorate in the Qabalah (one of the alternate spellings of kabala).

The order suffered its first problem when Péladan withdrew over the other leaders' disagreement with his adherence to Roman Catholicism. He founded a rival order, l'Ordre de la Rose Croix Catholicque, du Temple et du Graal. He and de Guaita were never reconciled.

De Guaita died in 1887. He was succeeded by Johnny Bricaud, author of a number of books on the history of the occult, and then in 1932 by Constant Martin Chevillon. Chevillon was killed in 1944 by the Gestapo.

Sources:

Guaita, Stanislas de. Essais des sciences maudites. Paris: Carré, 1885.

———. La Serpent de la genese. 2 Vols. Paris: Chamuel, 1891, 1897.

McIntosh, Christopher. Eliphas Levi and the French Occult Revival. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

———. The Rose Cross Unveiled: The History, Mythology and Rituals of an Occult Order. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1980.

Wirth, Oswald. Stanislas de Guaita, souvenirs de son secrétare. Paris: Editions du Symbolisme, 1935.

Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosolyma

The Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosolyma was founded in 1937 by former members of the General Church of the New Jerusalem under the leadership of Rev. Theodore Pitcairn. The ideas leading to its formation can be traced to writings of a Dutch layman, H. D. G. Groeneveld, who began the periodical De Hemelsche Leer (The Celestial Doctrine) in 1929. Emanuel Swedenborg, whose writings form the distinctive body of material used by the General Church of the New Jerusalem, proposed the idea that the Bible had, in addition to its planned material meaning, a spiritual meaning that had been revealed through the communications between Swedenborg and the angelic realm. The General Church placed great authority on the writings of Swedenborg, but Groeneveld went further and proposed that Swedenborg's writings, like the Bible, also had an inner spiritual meaning. The Lord's New Church was founded after the General Church rejected Groeneveld's perspective.

In the United States, former General Church minister Theodore Pitcairn emerged as an early champion of the new perspective, about which he wrote The Book Sealed with Seven Seals in 1927 to present the idea to the American church. In 1937 he led in the formation of two congregations, one in Bryn Athyn, adjacent to the General Church headquarters, and one in Yonkers, New York. As of 1997, there were three North American congregations, one in Charleston, South Carolina, Asheville, North Carolina, and and Byrn Athyn, Pennsylvania. Eventually, support was found among Swedenborgians in Holland, Sweden, South Africa, Japan, and the United Kingdom. The Lord's New Church can be reached at 1725 Huntingdon Rd., P.O. Box 465, Bryn Athyn, PA 19009-0465. Website: http://www.novahierosolyma.org/.

Sources:

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. 6th Edition. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

Handbook of the Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosolyma. Bryn Athyn, Penn.: Lord's New Church Which Is Nova Hierosolyma, 1985.

Lord's New Church Which is Nova Hierosolyma. http://www.novahierosolyma.org/. March 8, 2000.

Pitcairn, Theodore. The Book Sealed with Seven Seals. Bryn Athyn, Penn.: Cathedral Book Room, 1927.

———. My Lord and My God. New York: Exposition Press, 1967.

Lords of the Flame (or Children of the Fire Mist)

Adepts, or manasaputras (sons of mind), sent from the planet Venus to aid terrestrial evolution. According to Theosophy, Venus was considered in advance of the Earth in the evolution of the Solar System. The efforts of these adepts directed towards intellectual development enable the inhabitants of the Earth to become further advanced than could be expected in the ordinary course of events. These adepts are not permanent inhabitants of the Earth, and, while a few remain, most of them have already returned to Venus, the time of crisis during which they assisted having now passed.

Lorelei

Name of the tall rock on the right bank of the river Rhine, near St. Goar, Germany, that is noted for its remarkable echo. It has given rise to the legend of the lorelei water nymph, whose siren song lures sailors to their doom. In turn, this story has affinity with the legend of Holda, queen of the elves, who fascinates men, who become doomed to wander with her forever. The lorelei legend is of comparatively recent origin, a creation of the writer Klemens Brentano in his ballad story Lore Lay (1800) and retold in Heine's famous poem "Die Lorelei."

Lorian Association

New Age organization. The Lorian Association was founded in 1973 by David Spangler soon after his return to the United States after a three-year stay at the Findhorn community, a pioneering New Age community in northern Scotland. Among the 15 individuals who founded the Lorian Association was Dorothy McLean, one of the co-founders of Findhorn, who also moved to the United States that year. The purpose of Lorian was to explore and celebrate the emergence of new spiritual energies that could bring about human transformation, both personal and social. In 1982 Spangler and the founders issued a statement of interdependence affirming a commitment to such New Age values as cooperative decision making, harmlessness in interacting with the environment, the wise use of energy, a diversity of cultural expressions, and communion with superhuman intelligences.

Channeling was a vital part of the association in the early years. Just as Eileen Caddy had received messages that guided the developing Findhorn community, Spangler and McLean channeled and the messages were published by the association. The association was located in Wisconsin through the 1970s but moved to Issaquah, Washington, around 1980. There it survived into the 1990s, but the community has recently disbanded. Spangler radically revised his opinions concerning the New Age in the late 1980s and abandoned the basic New Age hope of social transformation.

Sources:

McLean, Dorothy. To Hear the Angels Sing. Middleton, Wis.: Lorian Press, 1980.

Spangler, David. Channeling and the New Age. Issaquah, Wash.: Morningtown Press, 1988.

———. Conversations with John. Elgin, Ill.: Lorian Press, 1980.

Lost Word of Kabalism (in Freemasonry)

Also known as the Lost Word in Masonry. A word relating to some mystic plan, which, although it is held to have disappeared, will at some time be restored, and will then make the whole system plain. It is not really lost, only withheld for a season. In the same way the Grail was not lost, but withdrawn to its own place, the search for it occupying the noblest figures in chivalry. It represented the Key to the enigma of Creation, or, in terms of Christianity, the Kingdom of Heaven.

Occultist and mystic Arthur E. Waite associated the Lost Word with the virtues of faith, hope, and charity, stating: "The quest of the Lost Word is followed in one of the High Degrees within a spiritual area which is delineated by these Pillars [Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty], and that which is hidden within them, leading to the term of quest, is symbolical of these virtues, connoting their inward and sacramental sense."

Sources:

Waite, Arthur E. New Encyclopedia of Freemasonry. N.p., 1921.

LOTU See Light of the Universe

Lotus Ashram

The Lotus Ashram was a Spiritualist fellowship tied together by the mediumship of Noel Street and his wife, Coleen Street. It was established in Miami, Florida, in 1917. Street was born and raised in New Zealand but moved to the United States and was ordained originally by the Universal Church of the Master. For a number of years he toured the United States annually. He and his wife lectured, and he did psychic readings and healings. He was known for drawing upon the teaching of the Maori people of his native New Zealand. Coleen, not a medium, taught yoga, physical fitness through vegetarianism, and proper food preparation.

Street wrote a number of booklets on various topics related to mediumship and reincarnation. In 1975 he opened a center in Chillicothe, Ohio, which later relocated to Texas in 1977. Last known address: 264 Mainsail, Port Lucie, FL 33452.

Sources:

The Story of the Lotus Ashram. Miami, Fla.: Lotus Ashram, n.d.

Street, Noel. Karma: Your Whispering Wisdom. Fabens, Tex.: Lotus Ashram, 1978.

———. Reincarnation: One Life—Many Births. Fabens, Tex.: Lotus Ashram, 1978.

Lou (1898–1968)

Name assumed by the Dutch fisherman Louwrens van Voorthuizen (or Voorthuyzen), who claimed to have experienced the annihilation of his human self and the taking over by a divine self, as a kind of Christian avatar. Lou was born in 1898 at Anna Paulowna, in the Netherlands. He began preaching in 1950 with the words: "I preach Jesus Christ bodily, his resuscitated body, with his new name, which is Lou. Those who accept this shall experience it and those who have experienced, shall be as Jesus Christ was on earth. Brothers and sisters of Jesus, sons and daughters of God."

A small group gathered around Lou and in 1963 produced a mimeographed magazine in English from Amsterdam, Holland. In his later years, Lou declared himself to be the immortal God and Creator of the universe. However, he died in 1968. His death created a crisis among his followers, and the group soon dispersed.

Loudun, Nuns of

The second of three cases of demonic possession reported in seventeenth-century France. The first involved Father Louis Gaufridi and Sister Madeleine de la Palud de Demandolx at Aix-en-Provence in 1611. The third was the case of the Nuns of the Franciscan Tertiaries at Louviers concerned with Sister Madeleine Bavent and Father Thomas Boullé.

In 1633 the convent of Ursulines in Loudun, France, became the scene of an outbreak of what was described as diabolical possession. The numerous nuns who inhabited the convent showed all of the signs of possession, including speaking in tongues and acting in a most extraordinary and hysterical manner. The affair grew in volume until practically all the nuns belonging to the institution were in the same condition.

The Mother Superior of the convent, Jeanne des Anges (Madame de Béclier), appears to have been of an unstable temperament, and she was not long in infecting the other sisters. She, a sister named Claire, and five other nuns were the first to be obsessed by the so-called evil spirits. The outbreak spread to the neighboring town and caused such scandal that Cardinal Richelieu appointed a commission to examine the affair. The "devils" resisted the process of exorcism, but seemed to succumb to a more imposing ceremony, then returned with greater violence than ever. Suspicion then fell upon Fr. Urbain Grandier, the confessor of the convent, as the instigator. He was arrested and accused of giving the nuns over into the possession of the devil by means of the practice of sorcery.

However, it came to light that the neighboring clergy were jealous of Grandier because he had obtained two benefices in their diocese, of which he was not a native, and they made up their minds to destroy him at the first possible moment. Despite his protests of innocence, the priest was hauled before a council of judges of the neighboring presidencies. They found on his body various marks said to be the undoubted signs of a sorcerer, and the inquest also brought out weaknesses in Grandier's reputation.

However, religious prejudice undoubtedly tainted this case. Papers seized from him were said to contain much material subversive to Roman Catholic religious practice. The prosecution produced a pact with Satan, promising Grandier the love of women, wealth, and worldly honor, endorsed with diabolical signatures. Some doubt as to the authenticity of this document is inevitable in view of the prosecution's claim that it was stolen by the demon Asmodeus from Lucifer's private files. This document, and a further claimed pact with the devil, apparently signed by Grandier in his own blood, survives in The Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. Versions of it were published by credulous persons and sold as broadsheets.

Grandier was condemned to be burnt at the stake. The sentence was carried out in 1634, though only after he had been so severely tortured that the marrow of his bones oozed through his broken limbs. Through it all he persistently maintained his innocence.

However, his death did not end the symptoms among the sisters. In fact, the demons became more obstreperous than ever and flippantly answered to their names of such leading demons as Asmodeus, Leviathan, and Behemoth. A very holy brother called Surin was delegated to put an end to the affair. Frail and unhealthy, he possessed, however, an indomitable spirit, and after much wrestling in prayer succeeded in finally exorcising the demons.

A somewhat sensational movie based loosely on this incident was produced in 1971 under the title The Devils.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Carmona, Michel. Les Diables de Loudun: Sorcellerie et politique sous Richelieu. Paris: Fayard, 1988.

Historie des diables de Loudun. N.p., 1839.

Huxley, Aldous. The Devils of Loudun. London: Chatto & Windus, 1952.

Lourdes

French watering resort famous for miracle cures. In 1858 the Virgin Mary reportedly appeared in a grotto to the peasant girl Bernadette Soubirous (1844–1879), later canonized as St. Bernadette in 1933. A marble tablet at Lourdes records the apparition:

Dates of the Eighteen apparitions and words of the Blessed Virgin in the year of grace 1858. In the hollow of the rock where her statue is now seen the Blessed Virgin appeared to Bernadette Soubirous Eighteen times: the 11th and the 14th of February; Each day, with two exceptions, from February 18th till March 25th, April 7th, July 16th. The Blessed Virgin said to the child on February 18th, "Will you do me the favour of coming here daily for a fortnight? I do not promise to make you happy In this world, but in the next; I want many people to come. The Virgin said to her during the fortnight: "You will pray for sinners; you will kiss the earth for sinners. Penitence! penitence! penitence! Go, and tell the priests to cause a chapel to be built; I want people to come thither in procession. Go and drink of the fountain and wash yourself in it. Go and eat of the grass which is there." On March 25th The Virgin said: "I Am the Immaculate Conception."

Bernadette alone saw the apparition, and there was no coinciding objective event that would make it veridical. There was, however, a later incident of a supernormal character in the life of Bernadette, for which evidence is available in the testimony of Dr. Dozous. His advocacy is largely responsible for the credence bestowed on Bernadette and the fame of Lourdes. His testimony was quoted in Dr. Boissarie's book Lourdes, which gives a summary of the miraculous cures, published in the Annales des Lourdes from 1868 until 1891. While praying in ecstasy, the girl held her interlaced fingers over the flame of a lighted taper. The point of the flame came out between the fingers without causing her any harm.

In the story of the apparition, there was no promise of miraculous cures. Bernadette was an invalid child subject to fits, and nobody would have paid attention to her visions but for the grotto in the rocks to which she was conducted by the white angel, and the water of which made her feel lighter and stronger. The quarryman Bourriette was the first to conceive the idea that the water of the spring in the grotto uncovered by Bernadette's bare hands might benefit his eyes, which had been injured by an explosion. He was healed, and the rumor soon spread that the Virgin Mary was effecting miraculous cures.

Due to the newly acquired and unwanted fame, Bernadette moved in with the Sisters of Charity in order to keep away from the growing crowds that came to the site and in 1866, she joined the order. She received only relative peace; many people came to interview her and the nuns envied her. Their attitude only changed at the end of her life when it was discovered that tuberculosis, from which she would die, entered her bone and caused intense pain. Bernadette believed the pain was to be her suffering.

Following her death on April 16, 1879, Bernadette's body did not decompose. It has remained on display at the convent at Nevers. In 1933, the Roman Catholic Church canonized her.

A. T. Myers and F. W. H. Myers wrote an analysis of Lourdes from a psychic research perspective, which appeared in the Proceedings of the SPR in 1893. They concluded:

"Many forms of psycho-therapeutics produce, by obscure but natural agencies, for which at present we have no better terms than suggestion and self-suggestion, effects to which no definite limit can yet be assigned. Thus far Lourdes offers the best list of cures; but this superiority is not more than can be explained by the greater number of patients treated there than elsewhere, and their greater confidence in the treatment. There is no real evidence, either that the apparition of the Virgin was itself more than a subjective hallucination, or that it has any more than a merely subjective connection with the cures."

The Roman Catholic Church was also cautious in assessing claimed cures at Lourdes, and a Medical Bureau was established and reorganized after World War II in 1947. It claimed cures must meet strict criteria.

In the first place, the sick are expected to bring with them a diagnosis from their own doctors and are given an examination upon arrival in Lourdes. If a cure is claimed, the patient must return to Lourdes a year later for examination, and if the cure appears permanent and inexplicable by normal explanations, the case is then put to a higher medical tribunal in Paris. Even then, it is submitted to members of an ecclesiastical tribunal before being pronounced miraculous, or, in some cases, a genuine cure but still non-miraculous.

In the past decades since the Roman Catholic Church granted its favorable opinion of Lourdes, the shrine has been a source of political contention. The Church was disestablished in France in 1905 and the following year the shrine property was nationalized by the government. Pilgrimages to the shrine continued, but only in 1940 was it returned fully to church control. In the meantime, the reported healings have been the subject of constant debate. In the twentieth century, the shrine has been the subject of many books, most recounting the story of Bernadette and the miraculous occurrences that began with the apparitions and the first healings. Others focus more on the healings and have attempted to place the shrine into the larger context of spiritual and paranormal healings worldwide.

Lourdes is now one of the most famous pilgrim sites, and the whole area is well organized for great annual pilgrimages. In 1876 a huge basilica was constructed above the rock, and in the cave where Bernadette had her vision a marble statue of the Virgin was placed. The grotto is festooned with crutches from disabled pilgrims who did not need assistance after their visits.

Of course not all pilgrims who visit the shrine come in expectation of a cure. Thousands come as an act of piety. (See also Fatima; Garabandal; Guadalupe Apparitions; healing, psychic; healing by faith; and Medjugorje)

Sources:

Delaney, John J. A Woman Clothed with the Sun: Eight Great Appearances of Our Lady in Modern Times. Garden City, N.Y.: Hanover House, 1959.

Estrade, J. B. The Appearances of the Blessed Virgin Mary at the Grotto of Lourdes: Personal Souvenirs of an Eyewitness. London: Art & Book Co., 1912.

Keselman, Thomas A. Miracles and Prophecies in Nineteenth-Century France. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1983.

Marchand, A. The Facts of Lourdes and the Medical Bureau. London: Burns Oates & Wasbourne, 1924.

Markham, Patrick. Lourdes: A Modern Pilgrimage. Garden City, N.Y.: Image Books, 1982.

Myer, A. T., and F. W. H. Myers. "Mind-Cure, Faith-Cure, and the Miracles of Lourdes." Proceedings of the Society for Psychic Research 9, no. 24 (1893).

Neame, Alan. The Happening at Lourdes. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1968.

Trochu, Francis. Saint Bernadette Soubirous, 1844–1879. London: Longmans, 1957.

West, Donald J. Eleven Lourdes Miracles. New York: Helix Press, 1957.

Louviers, Nuns of

The third case of demonic possession reported in seventeenth-century France. The first involved Father Louis Gaufridi and Sister Madeleine de la Palud de Demandolx at Aix-en-Provence in 1611; the second was the great scandal of Father Urbain Grandier and the nuns of Loudun in 1633.

The case of the Nuns of the Franciscan Tertiaries at Louviers concerned Sister Madeleine Bavent and Father Thomas Boullé and was documented by Madeleine Bavent's own written confession, which included her earlier life story. Born in Rouen in 1607, she was apprenticed to a dressmaker. At the age of 18 she was seduced by a Franciscan priest who had also been intimate with other girls.

Madeleine then decided to enter the convent at Louviers. Here she found that the first chaplain, Father Pierre David, had strange, heretical ideas, believing that an illuminated individual (such as he himself) could not sin and that he should worship God naked like Adam. During three years as a novice under Father David, Madeleine was obliged to be received by him naked, although he did not have intercourse with her.

Father David was succeeded as chaplain by Father Mathurin Picard in 1628 and his assistant Father Thomas Boullé. According to Madeleine, she became pregnant by Father Picard, who also made revolting love charms from altar wafers to secure favors from other nuns. Both priests were said to have conducted a black mass at midnight sabbats with Madeleine and other nuns, involving disgusting practices, and as a result, Madeleine was visited by the devil in the shape of a huge black cat. Between 1628 and 1642, such orgies involved other nuns, who exhibited frenzied symptoms of hysterical possession by specific devils. When the scandal became public, the nuns confessed but blamed Madeleine Bavent.

Attempts at exorcism were made, and the Bishop of Evreux investigated the convent for witchcraft. Madeleine was charged with sorcery, witchcraft, and making a pact with the devil. She confessed and was expelled from the order, being punished with perpetual imprisonment in an underground dungeon with only bread and water three days of the week.

She died soon afterward in 1647. Father Picard had died in 1642, but his corpse was exhumed and excommunicated. Father Thomas Boullé was imprisoned for three years, tortured, then burned alive in 1647. The remaining nuns of Louviers were sent away to other convents.

Lovecraft, H(oward) P(hillips) (1890–1937)

Celebrated American writer of macabre supernatural fiction. He was born August 20, 1890, in Providence, Rhode Island. His father died of syphilis in 1898 and his grandfather, who was the dominant intellectual influence in his life, died in 1904. Lovecraft himself grew up as a lonely neurasthenic with a love of eighteenth-century English literature. He was also strongly influenced by the fantasy fiction of Edgar Allan Poe. He began writing stories at the age of five, and as a young man became something of an eccentric recluse. At the age of sixteen, he contributed a series of articles on astronomy to the Providence Tribune.

A shy, imaginative, and delicate individual, he was much influenced in his own stories by such fantasy authors as Algernon Blackwood, Lord Dunsany, Arthur Machen, and Walter de la Mare. His own somewhat Augustan prose style and highly individual preoccupation with fantasy and horror themes remained too specialized for conventional literary outlets, and much of his work was for small press magazines like Vagrant and Home Brew or the new generation of pulps like Weird Tales, Amazing Stories and Astounding Stories. In 1924 he married Sonia Greene of New York City, also a writer, but the marriage only lasted a couple of years and he was later divorced, returning to Providence where he wrote late into the night at his stories.

His most impressive creation was the Cthulhu Mythos, involving a group of stories about entities from another time and space. Part of the myth was a fictitious grimoire, or magical instruction and ritual book, called the Necronomicon, also referred to as the Book of Dead Names compiled by the "mad Arab Abdul Alhazred."

In spite of his considerable literary output, Lovecraft made very little money out of his fiction, which he supplemented by editing and ghost-writing. He died from cancer March 15, 1937. After his death, his friend and biographer August Derleth revived and reissued his stories through Arkham House Press, "Arkham" being a fictional city in Lovecraft's stories.

It has been suggested that some of the fantasy inventions of Lovecraft may have had some real existence in some other plane of reality, contacted through his subconscious mind. A small group of magicians have explored the possibility of the Cthulu Mythos for the working of magic. No less than three Necronomicons have been written and published.

Sources:

Burleson, Donald R. Lovecraft: Disturbing the Universe. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990.

de Camp, L. Sprague. Lovecraft: A Biography. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

Derleth, August. H.P.L.: A Memoir. Ben Abramson, 1945.

Joshi, S. T. H. P. Lovecraft: A Life. West Warwick, R.I.: Necronomicon Press, 1996.

Long, Frank Belknap. Howard Phillips Lovecraft: Dreamer on the Nightside. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 1975.

Lovecraft, Howard Phillips. At the Mountains and Other Novels. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 1964.

———. Collected Poems. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 1963.

———. The Dunwich Horror and Others. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 1963.

———. Haunter of the Dark, and Other Tales of Horror. London: Gollancz, 1950.

———. Supernatural Horror in Literature. New York: B. Abramson, 1945.

Simon, ed. The Necronomicon. New York: Schjangekraft, 1977.

Lubin

The fish whose gall was used by Tobias to restore his father's sight. It was said to be very powerful against ophthalmia, and the fish's heart potent in driving away demons. The account of Tobias can be found in the extra-biblical book of Tobit in the Apocrypha.

Luce e Ombra (Light and Shade) (Journal)

The principal Italian Spiritualist monthly, founded in 1900. It was edited by Angelo Marzorati until his death in autumn 1931. The title was changed in January 1932 to La Ricerca Psichica (Psychic Review), with a transfer of editorial offices from Rome to Milan. Up until 1999 Luce e Ombra was published quarterly by dell'Associazione Archivio di Documentazione Storica della Ricerca Psichica. However, in 1999 it became the official organ of the Foundazione Bibloteca Bozzano-De Boni after the fusion between the Archivio and the Foundation. Address: Piazza Azzarita, 5-40122, Bologna, Italia.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lucid Dreaming

Preferred modern term for "dreaming true," indicating the experience of dreaming with consciousness that one is dreaming, i.e., experiencing a dream with waking consciousness. The condition is often associated with out-of-the-body travel, as it often happens that some incongruity in a dream stimulates the dreamer to conclude "Why, I must be dreaming!" and this awareness sometimes precedes an out-of-the-body event.

The term "lucid dreaming" was introduced by Frederick van Eeden in 1913 and was subsequently used by Celia E. Green in her study Lucid Dreams (1968). Early classic studies on out-of-the-body experience, such as S. J. Muldoon's and Hereward Carrington's The Projection of the Astral Body (1929), relied upon anecdotal evidence by dreamers of the lucid state, after awakening. In modern times, parapsychologists have endeavored to clarify the lucid state and its relationship to extrasensory perception by controlled experiments.

In his work on lucid dreams, Keith M. T. Hearne of the Department of Psychology of the University of Liverpool described a technique of identifying the lucid dream in a polygraphic record by instructing the subject to signal information by predetermined ocular movements. This avoided the massive bodily paralysis of Stage REM sleep, which affects the rest of the musculature. The ocular signaling technique provided a channel of communication from the sleeping and dreaming subject to the outer world, by means of which physiological and psychological information on the dreams was obtained. The general investigation included simple testing of the subject, in a lucid dream state, for any ESP ability.

Another promising method of investigating lucid dreams that has been tried by other experimenters is the artificial inducing of lucidity and control of the dream through guided instruction on the part of the experimenter. This involves verbal communication with the dreamer to ascertain the nature of the dream imagery and the making of suggestions to guide the course of the dream.

Sleep researcher Stephen LaBerge had lucid dreams from an early age, and in 1977 started a dream journal, continued over a number of years, covering over 900 lucid dreams. In his own research at Stanford University, he concluded that the ability to dream lucidly could be important to humanity and a tool in solving problems of waking life.

The Lucidity Association, concerned with education and research into lucid dreaming and related phenomena, may be contacted c/o Department of Psychology, University of Northern Iowa, Cedar Falls, IA 50614.

Sources:

Green, Celia E. Lucid Dreams. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1968.

Hearne, Keith M. T. "'Lucid' Dreams and ESP: An Initial Experiment Using One Subject." Journal of the Society for Psychic Research 51, no. 787 (1981).

Kelzer, Kenneth. The Sun and the Shadow: My Experiment with Lucid Dreaming. Virginia Beach, Va.: A.R.E. Press, 1987.

LaBerge, Steven. Lucid Dreaming: The Power of Being Awake and Aware in Your Dreams. Los Angeles: Jeremy P. Tarcher, 1987.

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1967.

Ullman, Montague, Stanley Krippner, and Alan Vaughan. Dream Telepathy. London: Turnstone Books, 1973. New York: Macmillan, 1973.

van Eeden, Frederick. "A Study of Dreams." Proceedings of the Society for Psychic Research 26 (1913).

Lucidity

A faculty by which paranormal knowledge may be obtained. It is a collective term for the phenomena of clairvoyance, clairaudience, psychometry, and premonitions. It was first used by experimenters describing the condition of senses in relation to the phenomena of animal magnetism and mesmerism but was later used by French psychical researchers. It has generally been replaced in recent decades by ESP, or extrasensory perception.

Lucidity Association

Now-defunct organization devoted to education and research into lucid dreaming and related phenomena. It published a biannual Lucidity Letter and then Lucidity, dealing with research findings on lucid dreaming from researchers all over the world. Back issues of both publications can be obtained from the website: http://www.sawka.com/spiritwatch.

Lucidity Institute

The Lucidity Institute was founded in 1987 by Stephen La Berge, author of Lucid Dreaming (1986), the pioneering work on the topic. La Berge received his Ph.D. in psychophysiology from Stanford University, where he began his study of lucid dreaming while a graduate student working on his dissertation. Although psychotherapist Frederik von Eeden had used the term early in the twentieth century, it was only in the 1980s that lucid dreams received any focused study leading to their use as a therapeutic tool or a means for gaining self-awareness.

Lucid dreaming refers to the act of dreaming while being aware that one is dreaming. A lucid dream usually begins as a normal dream during which the dreamer suddenly realizes that he/she is dreaming. On occasion the dreamer may encounter an absurd or irrational phenomenon such as meeting a person known to be deceased, but as often as not the lucid dream begins with no noticeable trigger. In the most clear of lucid dreams, when lucidity is high, the dreamer realizes that what is being seen and heard is a dream, that he/she is in no danger from anything in the dream and soon will awaken from it. In a dream of low lucidity, one may realize that he/she is in a dream, but believe that some of the elements of the experience are real. During lucid dreams, one may or may not have control over the content of the dreams.

At the Lucidity Institute, La Berge and his research associates have explored a wide range of issues relative to lucid dreaming from which they have constructed a program to teach people lucid dreaming and how to use it to overcome problems or for the sheer entertainment of the resultant dreams. They have also developed a variety of dream aids that may enhance the lucidity factor. Lucid dreams have proved useful in overcoming nightmares, problem solving, and healing.

Learning lucid dreaming has proved to be a matter of motivation (wanting to have them) and effort. Being able to recall normal dreams is an additional useful skill. The institute staff has also developed several machines that function during a person's dream cycle. During REM sleep, when dreaming occurs, they intrude upon the consciousness with a signal that reminds the person that he/she is experiencing a dream, but does not awaken them.

La Berge followed his initial work on lucid dreaming with three additional texts, Conscious Mind, Sleeping Brain (1988) with Jayne Gackenbach, Exploring the World of Lucid Dreaming (1990) with Howard Rheingold, and A Course in Lucid Dreaming (1995) with Lynne Levitan. These texts have inspired a number of additional books, all of which are used at the institute.

The institute, a small business founded by La Berge, provides information and education concerning lucid dreaming and its benefits. It sponsors a membership society through which people many participate in various programs, support lucid dreaming research, and receive a newsletter. The institute is located at 2555 Park Blvd., Palo Alto, CA 94306-1919. It supports an Internet site at http://www.lucidity.com/.

Sources:

Gackenbach, Jayne, and Stephen La Berge. Conscious Mind, Sleeping Brain. Weisbaden, Germany: Plenum Publishing, 1988.

La Berge, Stephen. Lucid Dreaming. N.p., 1986. Reprint, New York: Ballantine, 1998.

La Berge, Stephen, and Howard Rheingold. Exploring the World of Lucid Dreaming. N.p., 1990. Reprint, New York: Ballantine Books, 1991.

Lucidity Institute. http://www.lucidity.com/. May 20, 2000.

Lucifer

A term meaning "light bringer," from the Latin "lux" and "ferre," which appears in the Latin Vulgate Bible as a translation of the Hebrew word helel. The name appears in Isa. 14:12, where the king of Babylon is compared to Lucifer (or the planet Venus, the morning star) as one fallen from heaven. In the third century C.E., Lucifer was identified with Satan, and Luke 10:18, which speaks of Satan falling from heaven, was seen as a reference to the verse in Isaiah. In the West, Lucifer also survived as an independent spirit being.

According to the old magicians, Lucifer was said to preside over the East (possibly an identification with the morning star). He was invoked on Mondays in a circle in the center of which was written his name. As the price for appearing to the magician, he asked only a mouse.

Other traditions state that Lucifer rules Europeans and Asiatics. He sometimes appears in the shape of a beautiful child. When he is angry his face is flushed, but there is nothing monstrous about him.

He is, according to some students of demonology, the grand justice of Hades, and as such is the first to be invoked by witches in the Litanies of the Sabbat.

In his poetry John Milton pictured a most human Lucifer, who existed as a potent force for good or evil, one who might have done great good, intensely proud and exceedingly powerful.

The attempt to revive Lucifer in his pre-Christian positive nature occurred in Theosophy. Early in the twentieth century, the Theosophical Society named one of their prominent periodicals Lucifer, and the Arcane School called its publishing concern Lucis Publishing.

Lugh

In medieval Irish romance, son of Kian and father of Cuchulain. He was brought up by his uncle Goban, the Smith, and by Duach, King of Fairyland. It was prophesied that Lugh should eventually overcome his father's old enemy Balor, his own grandfather. So instead of killing the three murderers of his father, Kian, he put them on oath to obtain certain wonders, including the magical spear of the king of Persia and the pigskin of the king of Greece, which, if laid on a patient, would heal him of his wound or cure him of his sickness. Thus equipped, Lugh entered the Battle of Moytura against the Fomorians, and by hurling a stone that pierced through the eye to the brain of Balor, Lugh fulfilled the Druidic prophecy.

Lugh was the Irish sun god; his final conquest of the Fomorians and their leader symbolizes the victory of light and intellect over darkness. Balor was god of darkness and brute force as embodied in the Fomorians. By his title of Ildanach, or "All Craftsman," Lugh is comparable to the Greek Apollo. He was widely worshiped by Continental Celts.

Luk, Charles (Lu K'uan Yü) (1898– ?)

Chinese-born teacher and writer on Chinese Zen Buddhism and the yoga of Taoism. He was born on January 17, 1898, in Canton, China, and his first master was the Hutuktu of Sikang, who was the guru of two Tibetan Buddhists sects—the Kargyupas (White Sect) and the Nyingmapas (Red Caps)—and also an enlightened Great Lama. His second master was the Venerable Ch'an Master Hsu Yun, Dharma-successor of all the Five Ch'an (Zen) Sects of China and 119 years old when he died in October 1959 in a monastery in Kiangsi province.

Charles Luk was one of the leading authorities on Chinese yoga and Buddhism. He lived in Hong Kong and spent many years studying and interpreting traditional texts of Chinese Buddhism and meditational practices, so that this teaching would be preserved and made available in the West. His works on Taoist yoga and meditation indicated that the basic principles of kundalini, a teaching of Hindu tantric groups, were also known and practiced in Chinese tradition.

Sources:

Luk, Charles. Ch'an and Zen Teachings. Series 1, 2 & 3. London: Rider, 1960–62.

———. Practical Buddhism. London: Rider, 1971.

———. The Secrets of Chinese Meditation. London: Rider, 1964.

———. Taoist Yoga, Alchemy, and Immortality. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

———. The Vimalakirti Nirdesa Sutra. Berkeley, Calif.: Shambhala, 1972.

Lully, Raymond (or Ramon Lull) (ca. 1232–1315)

An alchemist believed to possess titanic physical and mental energy, who threw himself heart and soul into everything he did. Lully's father was a Spanish knight, who won the approval of John I, king of Arragon, and was granted an estate on the island of Majorca, where Lully was born about the year 1232. His father's royal privilege earned the very young Lully the appointment of Seneschal of the Isles, but he embarrassed his parents soon thereafter by living a life of debauchery. He consorted with women of all sorts, especially the married woman Eleonora de Castello, whom he followed wherever she went, making no attempt to conceal his illicit passion. On one occasion he actually sought the lady while she was attending Mass. And so loud was the outcry against this bold, if not sacrilegious act, that Eleonora found it essential to write in peremptory style to her cavaliere servente, and bid him desist from his present course.

The letter failed to cool the youth's ardor, but when he learned that the lady was smitten with a deadly cancer, Lully's frame of mind began to alter speedily. Sobered by the frustration of his hopes, he vowed henceforth to live differently, consecrating his days to the service of God.

Lully took his holy orders, but his active and impetuous temperament left him little inclined for monastic life. Aiming to carry the Gospel far afield to convert the followers of Mahomet, he began to study Arabic. In 1276 Lully founded Trinity College of Majorca and trained other men in Arabic and prepared missionaries for service in Islamic lands. Soon Lilly proceeded to Rome to enlist the pope's sympathy in his project. Lully failed to get the pope's support, yet, undaunted, he embarked on his own from Genoa in about 1291, and when he reached Tunis, he commenced his crusade. His ardor resulted in fierce persecution and ultimate banishment, so he returned for a while to Europe, visiting Paris, Naples, and Pisa, and exhorting all good Christians to aid his beloved enterprise.

In 1308 he went to Africa, and at Algiers he made a host of converts, yet was once more forced to flee for his life before the angry Moslems. He traveled to Tunis, thinking to escape from there to Italy, but his former activities in the town were remembered, and consequently he was seized and thrown into prison. Here he languished for a long time, preaching the gospel at every opportunity that presented itself. At last some Genoese merchants procured his release, and so Lully sailed back to Italy. In Rome he worked strenuously to get the pope's support for a well-equipped foreign mission, but after he failed, he rested briefly in his native Majorca, then returned to Tunis.

Proclaiming his presence publicly, he had scarcely begun preaching when he was savagely attacked, left lying on the seashore, his assailants imagining him dead. He was still breathing, however, when some Genoese found him, and they carried him to a ship and set sail for Majorca. But the zealot did not rally, and he died in sight of his home June 30, 1315.

Lully's proselytizing ardor made his name familiar throughout Europe, and while many people regarded him as a heretic for undertaking a mission without the pope's sanction, others admired him so much that they sought to make him a saint. He was eventually canonized as a martyr, and a mausoleum was erected to him. Meanwhile he also attained some notoriety as an alchemist and was reported to have made a large sum of gold for the English king. There is really no proof that he ever visited Britain, but the remaining part of the story holds a certain significance. It is said that Lully made the money on the strict understanding that it should be utilized for equipping a large and powerful band of missionaries. There is some reason to believe that he thought to employ his alchemical skill on behalf of his missionary object. Possibly he approached some European sovereign with this goal in view, thus giving rise to the tradition about his dealings with the English monarch.

Lully's writings include a number of works on alchemy, most notably Alchimia Magic Naturalis, De Aquis Super Accurtationes, De Secretis Medicina Magna and De Conservatione Vitoe. It is interesting to find that several of these won considerable popularity and were repeatedly reprinted, while as late as 1673, two volumes of Opera Alchima purporting to be written by him were issued at London. Five years before this, a biography by De Vernon had been published at Paris, while at a later date a German historian of chemistry named Gruelin referred to Lully as a scientist of exceptional skill and mentioned him as the first man to distill rosemary oil.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur E. Raymond Lully, Illuminated Doctor, Alchemist, and Christian Mystic. London, 1922. Reprint, London, 1939. Reprint, New York: David McKay, 1940.

Lumieres dan la Nuit

French-language publication concerned with unidentified flying objects, published annually. Last known address: R. Veillith, ed., "Les Pins," 43400 Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, France.

Luminous Bodies

Dead bodies were frequently supposed to glow in the dark with a sort of phosphorescent light. Possibly the belief arose from the idea that the soul was like a fire dwelling in the body.

Luminous Phenomena

A frequent occurrence in physical mediumship. On rare occasions such phenomena have been witnessed in apparent independence of mediumistic conditions.

The chronicles of religious revivals are full of instances of transcendental lights. For example, during both the great Irish revival in 1859 and the Welsh revival in 1904 there were multiple accounts. A Mr. Jones of Peckham, editor of the Spiritual Magazine (1877, vol. 18), quotes a leading official belonging to the Corporation of London:

"Having heard that fire had descended on several of the great Irish assemblies during the Revivals, I, when in Ireland, made inquiry and conversed with those who had witnessed it. During the open-air meetings, when some 600–1,000 people were present, a kind of cloud of fire approached in the air, hovered and dipped over the people, rose and floated on some distance, again hovered on that which was found afterwards to be another revival meeting, and so it continued. The light was very bright and was seen by all, producing awe."

Of the Welsh Revival an interesting account was published by Beriah G. Evans in the Daily News (February 9, 1905). The lights he saw appeared for the first time on the night when Mary Jones began her public mission at Egryn. The first light, Evans writes, "resembled a brilliant star emitting sparklets. All saw this. The next two were as clearly subjective, being seen only by Mrs. Jones and me, though the five of us walked abreast. Three bars of clear white light crossed the road in front, from right to left, climbing up the stone wall to the left. A blood-red light, about a foot from the ground in the middle of the roadway at the head of the village street was the next manifestation."

A Daily Mirror correspondent confirmed Evans' account. He said he saw both sets of lights. A third confirmation was published in the July 1905 Review of Reviews by the Reverend Llewellyn Morgan.

These lights seem to have been the result of an outpouring of the combined psychic forces that religious ecstasy supposedly generates. Religious enthusiasm and ecstasy in general have often been reported to be accompanied by luminous phenomena. The Bible says that Jesus was transfigured before his disciples and that his face shown as the sun and his garments were white as light (Matt. 17:2). As Paul walked to Damascus, he encountered a light from heaven that shone around him (Acts 9:3). The saints and martyrs spoke of an interior illumination. St. Ignatius Loyola was seen surrounded by a brilliant light while he prayed and his body shone with light when he was levitated; St. Columba was said to have been continually enveloped in a dazzling, golden light, reminiscent of what is today termed an aura.

William James quotes many interesting instances in Varieties of Religious Experience (1902). In Cosmic Consciousness (1901), R. Maurice Bucke speaks of his heightened state being heralded by an influx of dazzling light. The body of the medium Leonora Piper was described by the communicators as an empty shell filled with light.

"A medium," said "Phinuit," the spirit control of W. Stainton Moses, "is for us a lighthouse, while you, non-mediums are as though you did not exist. But every little while we see you as if you were in dark apartments lighted by a kind of little windows which are the mediums."

This light or flame, according to communications obtained by Hester Dowden, appears to be pale, "a clear white fire" that seems to grow more vivid as the medium gets into better touch with the spirit world.

It has been suggested that spectral lights may have a psychic origin. The fire of St. Bernardo was studied in 1895 in Quargnento by a Professor Garzino. It was a mass of light that wandered every night from the church to the cemetery and returned after midnight. A similar light was observed at Berbenno di Valtellina. The light passed through trees without burning them.

The phenomenon has not been explained by reference to known chemical laws. The main difficulty that such lights present is the absence of a human organism to which their origin could be traced. But such an absence is also noted in uninhabited haunted houses where the human link is strongly emphasized.

As luminous phenomena emerged in a Spiritualist context, many of the accounts were tied to the rather questionable phenomena of materialization. Not a major concern of psychical research, the strange—even extraordinary—luminous phenomena reported by sitters could simply have been additional phenomena produced as part of a total fraudulent event.

The Psychic Lights of D. D. Home and Stainton Moses

Sir William Crookes, in Researches in the Phenomena of Spiritualism (1874), relates the following:

"Under the strictest test conditions I have seen a solid luminous body, the size and nearly the shape of a turkey's egg, float noiselessly about the room, at one time higher than anyone present could reach standing on tiptoe, and then gently descend to the floor. It was visible for more than ten minutes, and before it faded away it struck the table three times with a sound like that of a hard solid body. During this time the medium was lying back, apparently insensible, in an easy chair.

"I have seen luminous points of light darting about and settling on the heads of different persons; I have had questions answered by the flashing of a bright light a desired number of times in front of my face. . . . I have had an alphabetic communication given me by luminous flashes occurring before me in the air, whilst my hand was moving about amongst them. . . . In the light, I have seen a luminous cloud hover over a heliotrope on a side table, break a sprig off and carry the sprig to a lady."

Viscount Adare writes in his Experiments in Spiritualism with D. D. Home (1870): "We all then observed a light, resembling a little star, near the chimney piece, moving to and fro; it then disappeared. Mr. Home said: Ask them in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, if this is the work of God. I repeated the words very earnestly; the light shone out, making three little flashes, each one about a foot higher above the floor than the preceding."

The color of the lights was sometimes blue, yellow, or rose. They did not light up their surroundings. Special effort was necessary to produce an effect of illumination. When Ada Menken's spirit tried to make her form visible, writes Adare, "the surface of the wall to Home's right became illuminated three or four times; the light apparently radiating from a bright spot in the centre. Across the portion of the wall thus illuminated we repeatedly saw a dark shadow pass."

Adare saw the extended hand of Home become quite luminous. On another occasion his clothes began to shine. Once the top of his head glowed with light as if a halo surrounded it. The tongues or jets of flame described by the Master of Lindsay and Capt. Charles Wynne as issuing from Home's head probably refer to this experience. Lindsay and many other witnesses often saw luminous crosses in Home's presence. They were variously globular, columnar, or star-shaped.

Reading a paper before the London Dialectical Society, Lindsay said:

"I saw on my knee a flame of fire about nine inches high; I passed my hand through it, but it burnt on, above and below it. Home turned in his bed and I looked at him, and saw that his eyes were glowing with light. It had a most disagreeable appearance. . . . The flame which had been flitting about me now left me, and crossed the room about four feet from the ground, and reached the curtains of Home's bed; these proved no obstruction; for the light went right through them, settled on his head and then went out."

In a letter to the London Dialectical Society, Lindsay narrated a further experience:

"At Mr. Jencken's house I saw a crystal ball, placed on Mr. Home's head, emit flashes of coloured light, following the order of the spectrum. The crystal was spherical, so that it could not have given prismatic colours. After this it changed and we all saw a view of the sea, as if we were looking down at it from the top of a high cliff. It seemed to be the evening as the sun was setting like a globe of fire, lighting up a broad path over the little waves. The moon was faintly visible in the south, and as the sun set, her power increased. We saw also a few stars; and suddenly the whole thing vanished, like shutting the slide of a magic lantern; and the crystal was dead. This whole appearance lasted about ten minutes."

Many similar observations were recorded in the mediumship of Stainton Moses. Stanhope Templeman Speer observed that the light could be renewed when it grew dim by making passes over it with the hand. The light had a nucleus and an envelope of drapery. It seemed to be more easily developed if Moses rubbed his hands together or on his coat. The drapery passed over the back of his hand several times. It was perfectly tangible. These large globes of light could knock distinct blows on the table. A hand was distinctly generated in their nucleus.

These globular lights ceased after a time because the drain on Moses' strength was too great. They were supplanted by a round disk of light that had a dark side, generally turned toward the medium; the light side gave answers to questions by flashes. On rarer occasions the light was a tall column, about half an inch in width and six or seven feet high. The light was of bright golden hue and did not illuminate objects in the neighborhood. For a minute a cross developed at its top and rays seemed to dart from it.

Around Moses' head was a halo, and another cluster of light, oblong in shape, was at the foot of the tall column. It moved up and the big, luminous cross gradually traveled toward the wall until it had passed over an arc of 90 degrees. Solid objects afforded no obstacles to one's view of the lights. If they appeared under a mahogany table they could be seen from above just as well as if the tabletop were glass. Sometimes as many as 30 lights were seen flashing about like comets in the room. The big lights were usually more stationary than the smaller ones, which darted swiftly about the room.

Accidents in Light Production

The chemistry for the production of these lights misfired on April 14, 1874. Speer writes:

"Suddenly there arose from below me, apparently under the table, or near the floor, right under my nose, a cloud of luminous smoke, just like phosphorus. It fumed up in great clouds, until I seemed to be on fire, and rushed from the room in a panic. I was very frightened and could not tell what was happening. I rushed to the door and opened it, and so to the front door. My hands seemed to be ablaze and I left their impress on the door and handles. It blazed for a while after I had touched it, but soon went out, and no smell or trace remained. I have seen my own hands covered with a lambent flame; but nothing like this I ever saw. There seemed to be no end of the smoke. It smelt phosphoric, but the smell evaporated as soon as I got out of the room into the air. I was fairly frightened, and was reminded of what I had read about a manifestation given to Mr. Peebles similar to the burning bush. I have omitted to say that the lights were preceded by very sharp detonations on my chair, so that we could watch for their coming by hearing the noises. They shot up very rapidly from the floor."

The next day, "Imperator" (Moses' spirit control) explained that the phosphoric smoke was caused by an aborted attempt on the part of "Chom" (another spirit) to make a light. There were, he said, ducts leading from the sitters' bodies to the dark space beneath the table, and into this space these ducts conveyed the substance extracted for the purpose of making the light. The phosphoric substance was enclosed in an envelope that was materialized. It was the collapse of this envelope that caused the escape of the phosphoric smoke and the smell. This substance was the vital principle, he said, and was drawn mainly from the spine and nerve centers of all the sitters—except those who were of no use or would be deterrents to the process.

Another miscarriage of psychic light was described by W. H. Harrison. It occurred at a séance with the mediums Frank Herne and Charles Williams. Harrison said, "The name of the spirit was then written rapidly in large phosphorescent letters in the air near Mr. Williams. In the same rapid manner the spirits next began writing 'God Bless—' when there was a snap, like an electrical discharge, and a flash of light which lit up the whole room." At the end of the sitting a slight smell of phosphorus was perceptible. However, a more likely explanation of this phenomenon is that it was caused by the sudden striking of a match, since suspicion of fraud is attached to the séances of Herne and Williams.

The following description is from the Livermore records of séances with Kate Fox (of the Fox sisters): "A spherical ovoid of light rises from the floor as high as our foreheads and places itself on the table in front of us. At my request the light immediately became so bright as to light up that part of the room. We saw perfectly the form of a woman holding the light in her outstretched hand."

A Dr. Nichols, in whose house William Eglinton gave a series of sittings, wrote of "masses of light of a globular form, flattened globes, shining all through the mass, which was enveloped in folds of gauzy drapery."

"'Joey' "[a spirit control], wrote Nichols, "brushed the folds aside with his finger to show us the shining substance. It was as if a gem—a turquoise or a pearl—three inches across, had become incandescent, full of light, so as to illuminate about a yard round. This light also we saw come and go. 'Joey' allowed his larger light to go almost dark, and then revived it to its former brilliancy. I need hardly say that all the chemists of Europe could not, under these conditions, produce such phenomena, if indeed they could under any." [Nichols' account indicates that he was duped by Eglinton's trick.]

The spirit entity "John King" often brought a spirit lamp when he materialized. Once, in a séance with Williams, the lamp was placed in the hands of Alfred Smedley, who states in his book Some Reminiscences (1900), "To my great surprise it was like a lump of solid, warm flesh, exactly similar to my own." Others observed that the lamp was often covered with lacelike drapery. This is not surprising, since the appearance of psychic lights often heralded materializations. A disk of light could transform itself into a face, a star into a human eye. To the touch, the light was sometimes hard, sometimes sticky, sitters reported.

Later Observations

In a séance with Franek Kluski on May 15, 1921, Gustav Geley recorded: "A moment later, magnificent luminous phenomena; a hand moved slowly about before the sitters. It held in the palm, by a partial bending of the fingers, a body resembling a piece of luminous ice. The whole hand appeared luminous and transparent. One could see the flesh colour. It was admirable."

After another séance on April 12, 1922, Geley wrote:

"A large luminous trail like a nebulous comet, and about half a metre long, formed behind Kluski about a metre above his head and seemingly about the same distance behind him. This nebula was constituted of tiny bright grains broadcast, among which there were some specially bright points. This nebula oscillated quickly from right to left and left to right, and rose and fell. It lasted about a minute, disappeared and reappeared several times. After the sitting I found that the medium, who had been naked for an hour, was very warm. He was perspiring on the back and armpits; he was much exhausted."

With the same medium, a Professor Pawlowski recorded the appearance of a completely luminous figure of an old man that looked like a column of light. It illuminated all of the sitters and even the more distant objects in the room. The hands and the region of the heart were much brighter than the rest of the body.

Admiral Usborne Moore stated that he had seen tongues of spirit light issue from the body of the medium Ada Besinnet. They were about one-third of an inch broad at one end and tapered away, for a length of about one and a half inches, to nothing.

In a séance with the medium Indridi Indridason, Harald Nielsson counted one evening more than 60 tongues of light of different colors. "I could not help thinking of the manifestations described in the second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles," he writes in Light (October 25, 1919), "especially as a very strong wind arose before the lights appeared. Later on the whole wall behind the medium became a glow of light."

An unusual type of "psychic" light was shown by the medium Pasquale Erto ("the human rainbow") in séances at the Metapsychical Institute of Paris, the genuineness of which was later doubted. Flashes like electric sparks proceeded from the lower part of Erto's body, lighting up the floor and sometimes the walls of the room. He also produced luminous white rays up to eight meters in length; luminous spheres from the size of a walnut to an orange in white, reddish, or bluish color; zig-zag flashes; and rocketlike lights. They were cold lights, devoid of actinic rays.

Before each séance Erto was completely stripped and medically examined in all cavities—mouth, ears, rectum, and even urethra. Erto demanded absolute darkness and did not permit hand control. Geley found out that the phenomena could be produced by the use of ferro-cerium, and believed the medium used this trick.

Erto's phenomena were not unique. Maria Silbert occasionally produced somewhat similar psychic flashes, but her mediumistic reputation was far above that of Erto.

In the Boston séances of the medium "Margery" (Mina S. Crandon) a glowing light was seen on Margery's left shoulder. On touch, no luminous material was rubbed off, and the light continued to be seen through a black sock, though with decreased frequency and brilliance. On examination the medium's left shoulder strap was found to be luminous. There was a less distinct brightness on her chest and luminous patches on her right shoulder that soon faded and went out. When the luminous shoulder strap was brought into the séance room, a sudden increase in its intensity was noticed. During a close examination a whisper in the voice of "Walter" (the spirit control) said "goodnight." At approximately the same time, the light of the shoulder strap faded except for one tiny luminous point that seemed more persistent than the rest. At another time Hereward Carrington, holding Margery's left hand, noticed at the end of the sitting that his hand was faintly luminous.

Charles Richet attempted to imitate psychic lights with a neon tube six feet long and one inch in diameter. By rubbing the tube he induced a frictional electric charge that made a brilliant glow in the neon at the point of the tube where the hand had made contact. It looked like a realistic psychic phenomenon in the dark.

A Professor Dubois collected a number of examples to prove that under exceptional, but not paranormal, conditions, the human organism is capable of creating light. A woman suffering from breast cancer, under treatment at an English hospital, showed luminosity of the cancerous area strong enough to be recognized from several paces away and bright enough to read watch hands by at night from a few inches away. The discharge from the tumor was also very luminous. Bilious, nervous, redhaired, and, more often, alcoholic subjects have sometimes shown phosphorescent wounds.

Geley, working with the now-obsolete idea of ectoplasm, concluded that organic light and ectoplasmic light were rigorously analogous. They had the same properties. They were cold light, giving off neither calorific nor chemical radiations. Both were nearly inactinic and had considerable powers of penetration into opaque bodies. They impressed photographic plates through cardboard, wood, and even metal. Geley believed it likely that analysis of ectoplasmic secretion would reveal the two constituents—luciferin and luciferase—in the luminous secretions of Dubois' cancer patient.

Julien Ochorowicz, in his research into the radiography of etheric hands, found it significant that when an etheric hand radiated light it did not, and apparently could not, materialize at the same time. Upon materializing, it lost its luminosity.

Recorded experiences caution against generalization about luminous phenomena. Many lights were found to be created through fraud, and the ease with which the phenomena can be produced chemically encourages caution in assessing the genuineness of any claimed phenomena.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lusus Naturae

A general term for freaks or sports of nature, sometimes applied to the area of collecting stones and minerals that appear to contain pictures on their surfaces when cut and polished. Such pictures may appear as landscapes or even portraits, arising from the principle of duplication of shapes in nature, rather as if nature draws doodles and tests out forms. The resemblance of certain roots, notably mandrake (see mandragoras), to human shape is a well-known example of this strange principle.

The Lutin

The Lutin of Normandy in many respects resembled Robin Goodfellow, the mischievous sprite also identified with Puck. Like Robin, he had many names and also the power of assuming many forms, but the Lutin's pranks were usually of a more serious nature than those of the tricky spirit of Merrie England. Many a man ascribed his ruin to the malice of the Lutin, although some neighbors were uncharitable enough to say that the Lutin had less to do with it than habits of want-of-thrift and self-indulgence.

Thus, on market days, when a farmer lingered late over his ale, whether in driving a close bargain or in enjoying the society of a boon companion, he declared the Lutin was sure to play him some spiteful trick on his way home: his horse would stumble and he would be thrown, or he would lose his purse or else his way. If the farmer persisted in these habits, the tricks of the Lutin would become more serious: the sheep pens would be unfastened, the cowhouse and stable doors left open, and the flocks and cattle found moving among the standing corn and unmown hay, while every servant on the farm would swear to his own innocence, and unhesitatingly lay the blame on the Lutin.

Similar tricks were played on the fishermen by the Nain Rouge—another name of the Lutin. He opened the meshes of the nets and set the fish free. He removed the floats and let the nets sink to the bottom, or let the nets float away on the retiring tide. True, if closely questioned, the fishermen would confess that on these occasions, the night was dark and stormy, the cottage warm, and the grog plentiful, and that instead of drawing their nets at the proper time, they had delayed until morning.

Again, the Lutin might appear like a black nag, already bridled and saddled, quietly feeding by the wayside. Unless the nag was mounted for some charitable or holy purpose, he was borne with the speed of the wind to his destination. In this form the Lutin played his wildest pranks and was called Le Cheval Bayard. (See also fairies; Kaboutermannekens)

Lutoslawski, Wincenty (1863–1954)

Polish occultist and mystic. He was born in 1863 in Warsaw and studied chemistry and philosophy before developing his own synthesis of psychic phenomena, sex, and mysticism. He corresponded with psychologist William James and with psychical researcher Charles Richet.

In 1902 he proposed the term "metapsychic" for studies in psychic science, independently adopted by Richet for his own investigations. Lutoslawski also founded a short-lived political party named the Philaretes. He died on December 28, 1954, in Krakow.

Sources:

Lutoslawski, Wincenty. The Knowledge of Reality. N.p., 1930.
———. Pre-Existence and Reincarnation. N.p., 1928.
———. The World of Souls. N.p., 1924.

Lycanthropy

The transformation of a human being into an animal. The belief is an ancient one. The term derives from the Greek words lukos, a wolf, and anthropos, a man, but it is employed regarding a transformation into any animal shape. It is chiefly in those countries where wolves are numerous that we find such tales concerning them. But in India and some parts of Asia, the tiger takes the place of the wolf. In Russia and elsewhere it is the bear, and in Africa the leopard.

Such beliefs generally adhere to savage animals, but even harmless ones sometimes figure in them. There is considerable confusion as to whether such transformations were voluntary or involuntary, temporary or permanent. The human being transformed into the animal may be the physical individual or, on the other hand, may be only a double, that is, the human spirit may enter the animal but the human body remain unchanged.

Magicians and witches were credited with the power of transforming themselves into wolves and other animal shapes, and it was asserted that if the animal were wounded, then the marks of the wound would be discovered upon the wizard's body. The belief was current in many tribal cultures that every individual possessed an animal form, which could be entered at death or at will. This transformation was effected either by magic or natural agency.

As mentioned, the wolf was a common form of animal transformation in Europe. In ancient Greece, the belief was associated with the dog, which took the place of the wolf. Other similar beliefs have been found in India and Java. In the former country we find the werewolf in a kind of vampire form.

Magical Transformation

The seventeenth-century writer Louis Guyon related the history of an enchanter who used to change himself into different beasts:

"Certain people persuaded Ferdinand, first Emperor of that name, to command the presence of a Polish enchanter and magician in the town of Nuremberg to learn the result of a difference he had with the Turks, concerning the kingdom of Hungary; and not only did the magician make use of divination, but performed various other marvels, so that the king did not wish to see him, but the courtiers introduced him into his chamber. There he did many wonderful things, among others, he transformed himself into a horse, anointing himself with some grease, then he took the shape of an ox, and thirdly that of a lion, all in less than an hour. The emperor was so terrified by these transformations that he commanded that the magician should be immediately dismissed, and declined to hear the future from the lips of such a rascal.

"It need no longer be doubted [that Lucius Apuleius Plato was a sorcerer, and that he] was transformed into an ass, forasmuch as he was charged with it before the proconsul of Africa, in the time of the Emperor Antonine I, in the year 150 A.D., as Apollonius of Tyana, long before, in the year 60, was charged before Domitian with the same crime. And more than three years after, the rumour persisted to the time of St. Augustine, who was an African, who has written and confirmed it; as also in his time the father of one Prestantius was transformed into a horse, as the said Prestantius declared. Augustine's father having died, in a short time the son had wasted the greater part of his inheritance in the pursuit of the magic arts, and in order to flee poverty he sought to marry a rich widow named Pudentille, for such a long time that at length she consented. Soon after her only son and heir, the child of her former marriage, died. These things came about in a manner which led people to think that he had by means of magic entrapped Pudentille, who had been wooed in vain by several illustrious people, in order to obtain the wealth of her son. It was also said that the profound knowledge he possessed—for he was able to solve difficult questions which left other men bewildered—was obtained from a demon or familiar spirit he possessed. Further, certain people said they had seen him do many marvellous things, such as making himself invisible, transforming himself into a horse or into a bird, piercing his body with a sword without wounding himself, and similar performances. He was at last accused by one Sicilius Œmilianus, the censor, before Claudius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, who was said to be a Christian; but nothing was found against him.

"Now, that he had been transformed into an ass, St. Augustine regards as indubitable, he having read it in certain true and trustworthy authors, and being besides of the same country; and this transformation happened to him in Thessaly before he was versed in magic, through the spell of a sorceress, who sold him, and who recovered him to his former shape after he had served in the capacity of an ass for some years, having the same powers and habits of eating and braying as other asses, but with a mind still sane and reasonable as he himself attested. And at last to show forth his case, and to lend probability to the rumour, he wrote a book entitled The Golden Ass, a mélange of fables and dialogues, to expose the vices of the men of his time, which he had heard of, or seen, during his transformation, with many of the labours and troubles he had suffered while in the shape of an ass.

"However that may be, St. Augustine in the book of the City of God, book XVIII, chapters XVII and XVIII, relates that in his time there were in the Alps certain sorceresses who gave a particular kind of cheese to the passers by, who, on partaking of it, were immediately changed into asses or other beasts of burden, and were made to carry heavy weights to certain places. When their task was over, they were permitted to regain their human shape.

"The bishop of Tyre, historian, writes that in his time, probably about 1220, some Englishmen were sent by their king to the aid of the Christians who were fighting in the Holy Land, and that on their arrival in a haven of the island of Cyprus a sorceress transformed a young English soldier into an ass. He, wishing to return to his companions in the ship, was chased away with blows from a stick, whereupon he returned to the sorceress who made use of him, until someone noticed that the ass kneeled in a church and did various other things which only a reasoning being could do. The sorceress who followed him was taken on suspicion before the authorities, was obliged to give him his human form three years after his transformation, and was forthwith executed.

"We read that Ammonius, a peripatetic philosopher, about the time of Lucius Septimius Severus, in the year 196 A.D., had present at his lessons an ass whom he taught. I should think that this ass had been at one time a man, and that he quite understood what Ammonius taught, for these transformed persons retain their reason unimpaired, as St. Augustine and other writers have assured us.

"Fulgose writes, book VIII, chapter II, that in the time of Pope Leon, who lived about the year 930, there were in Germany two sorceresses who used thus to change their guests into beasts, and on one occasion she changed a young mountebank into an ass, who, preserving his human understanding, gave a great deal of amusement to the passers-by. A neighbour of the sorceresses bought the ass at a good price, but was warned by them that he must not take the beast to a river, or he would lose it. Now the ass escaped one day and running to a near-by lake plunged into the water, when he returned to his own shape. Apuleius says that he regained his human form by eating roses.

"There are still to be seen in Egypt asses which are led into the market-place to perform various feats of agility and tricks, understanding all the commands they receive, and executing them: such as to point out the most beautiful woman of the company, and many other things that one would hardly believe; and Belon, a physician, relates in his observations that he has seen them, and others also, who have been there, and who have affirmed the same to me."

Augustin Calmet, author of The Phantom World (2 vols., 1850), stated:

"One day there was brought to St. Macarius, the Egyptian, an honest woman who had been transformed into a mare by the wicked art of a magician. Her husband and all who beheld her believed that she had really been changed into a mare. This woman remained for three days without taking any food, whether suitable for a horse or for a human being. She was brought to the priests of the place, who could suggest no remedy. So they led her to the cell of St. Macarius, to whom God had revealed that she was about to come. His disciples wished to send her away, thinking her a mare, and they warned the saint of her approach, and the reason for her journey. He said to them: 'It is you who are the animals, who think you see that which is not; this woman is not changed, but your eyes are bewitched.' As he spoke he scattered holy water on the head of the woman, and all those present saw her in her true shape. He had something given her to eat and sent her away safe and sound with her husband."

Modern Beliefs in Transformation

Belief in transformation of human beings into predatory animals persisted into relatively modern times in Africa, India, Java, Malaya, and other countries. In Africa there were tiger men and even a leopard society of wizards. It seems very likely, however, that many apparent cases of transformation were effected by wearing the skin of an animal when hunting victims. In some cases there may have been a perverse desire for blood-drinking or cannibalism, as in the celebrated sixteenth-century case of the French lycanthrope Gilles Garnier.

In July 1919 the Journal of the SPR published a summary of Richard Bagot's article, "The Hyaenas of Pirra" (Cornhill Magazine, October 1918), in which some experiences were reported by a Lieutenant F. personally and an experience of the late Capt. Shott, D.S.O. dealt with the killing of Nigerians when in the form of supposed hyenas. The main facts, which deeply impressed the officers were as follows:

"Raiding hyenas were wounded by gun-traps, and tracked in each case to a point where the hyena traces ceased and were succeeded by human footprints, which made for the native town. At each shooting a man mysteriously dies in the town, all access being refused to the body. In Lieut. F.'s experiences the death wail was raised in the town almost immediately after the shot; but Capt. Shott does not mention this. In Capt. Shott's experience the beast was an enormous brute, readily trackable, which after being hard hit made off through the guinea-corn. It was promptly tracked, and a spot was come upon where 'they found the jaw of the beast lying near a large pool of blood.' Soon after the tracks reached a path leading to the native town. The natives next day came to Capt. Shott—and this is the curious part of the affair—and told him, without any regrets, that he had shot the Nefada—a lesser head-man—who was then lying dead with his jaw shot away. The natives gave their reasons as having seen and spoken to the Nefada, as he was, by his own admission, going into the bush. They heard the gun and saw him return with his head all muffled up and walking like a very sick man. On going next morning to see what was the matter . . . they found him as stated."

Mr. Bagot, a member of the SPR, added in response to further questions:

"In the article in question I merely reproduced verbatim the reports and letters sent to the said official . . . by British officers well known to him, and said that the authenticity and good faith of the writers can be vouched for entirely. I have evidence of precisely similar occurrences that have come under the notice of Italian officers in Eritrea and Somaliland; and in all cases it would seem that a gravel patch thrown up by the small black ants is necessary to the process of metamorphosis. I drew the attention of Sir James G. Frazer (author of The Golden Bough) to this coincidence and asked him if he had come across in his researches anything which might explain the connection between gravel thrown up by the ants and the power of projection into animal forms; but he informed me that, so far as he could recollect, he had not done so. Italian officials and big game hunters assure me that it is considered most dangerous (by natives in Somaliland, Abyssinia, etc.) to sleep on ground thrown up by ants; the belief being that anyone who does so is liable to be possessed or obsessed by some wild animal, and that this obsession once having taken place, the victim is never afterwards able entirely to free himself from it and is compelled periodically to assume the form and habits of some beast or reptile."

Psychic Aspects

Psychic research does not normally admit such phenomena as lycanthropy within its scope, but there are two possible points of contact. The first is the projection of the double (or astral body), provided it could be proved that the double may assume any desired shape. Eugen Rochas asserted that the double of his hypnotic subject, on being so suggested, assumed the shape of her mother. If it were proved that the shape of animals could be assumed, we would have to consider lycanthropy as a psychic possibility. But the animal, in that case, would not be more than a phantom, and we would have to prove that this phantom can be hurt and transfer, by repercussion, the wound to the projector.

The second possibility brings us nearer to this aspect of the problem. Paul Joire succeeded in transferring the exteriorized sensitivity of his subject to a figure made of putty. If the hand of the putty figure was scratched by a needle, a corresponding red mark appeared on the somnambule's hand.

The question arises: would it not be possible to transfer sensitivity to a living being, to an animal? In that case it would be natural to expect a repercussion from the animal to the human body.

Sources:

Baring-Gould, Sabine. The Book of Were-Wolves. London, 1865. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Hamel, Frank. Human Animals. London, 1915. University Books, 1969.

Kaigh, Frederick. Witchcraft and Magic of Africa. London: Richard Lesley, 1947.

Maclean, Charles. The Wolf Children. Hill & Wang, 1977.

Summers, Montague. The Werewolf. London, 1933. University Books, 1966.

Woodward, Ian. The Werewolf Delusion. London & New York: Paddington Press, 1979.

The Lyceum Banner

Spiritualist publication founded in 1890 as the official monthly organ of the British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union. It was published by J. J. Morse in Liverpool until 1902, when the paper was passed to the Lyceum Union under the editorship of Frank Kitson. Publication continued through the 1930s.

Sources:

Kuhlig, Kathryn. Spiritualist Lyceum Manual. Milwaukee: National Spiritualist Association of Churches, 1962.

Lychnomancy

A branch of pyromancy (divination by fire), concerned with interpreting the flames of three candles arranged in a triangle. Success was indicated by one flame burning brighter than the other two; a wavering flame indicated travel; a spiral flame signified plots by enemies; and uneven flame, danger; sparks signified caution; and a sudden extinction of flame indicated bad luck. Obviously such a system of divination was largely affected by currents of air in the room or by the breathing of the diviner. (See also lampadomancy)

Lynn, Thomas (ca. 1928)

A coal miner medium in northern England and the subject of remarkable experiments by James Hewat McKenzie and Major C. Mowbray in photographing the arrival and ectoplasmic mechanism of apports. Lynn's mediumship developed around 1913 in his home circle, but he did not exercise physical mediumship before 1926. Extrusions of ectoplasm, small coils or rods of varying shapes, were seen to issue from the pit of his stomach, to perform minor physical feats, and leave—after their disappearance—red marks like punctures behind on the medium's skin.

Apports of small, insignificant objects were the most impressive phenomena. In earlier séances, held in the dark, it was said that small bottles arrived containing wax in various shapes and molded images. In the experimental séances held in light by the investigators of the British College of Psychic Science, no such bottles were apported.

The first series of these experimental sittings took place in July 1928. Two cameras were used, one whole-plate with ordinary lens, and a half-plate with quartz lens. The medium was put in a bag and his hands were tied to his knees with tapes.

The flashlight photographs showed luminous connections between the medium's body and the apports. The sittings were continued in September 1928 and were repeated at the college in March 1929. By then, Lynn abandoned his former occupation and became a professional medium. At the time, the curious photographs secured in these séances were believed by many to throw new light on the problem of apports, though at present most believe that such apports were simply the sign of the medium's engagement in fraud. For a detailed report on the Lynn phenomena, including photographs, see Psychic Science (Vol. 8, no. 2, July 1929: 129–37).

Lynn Andrews Center for Sacred Arts & Training

In the late 1980s, popular New Age teacher Lynn Andrews responded to her many readers' desire for more in-depth teachings by holding an annual four-day retreat at Joshua Tree, California. The author of more than a dozen books, Andrews has presented herself as a contemporary shaman and the spokesperson of a secret Native American organization, the Sisterhood of the Shields. Her public presentations offered some of the broad perspectives and invited initiation. The retreats offered the opportunity for involvement in the basic occult practices associated with the shamanistic path.

The retreats also served as a base from which an even more structured program emerged in 1994 as the Lynn Andrews Center for Sacred Arts & Training. The center, described as a school without walls, offers a two-year and a four-year curriculum for those who wish to learn the practical and experiential aspects of the shamanism which Andrews has discussed in her many books. The work teaches awareness and use of personal magical energies, though the exact contents, as with most occult teachings, have not been publicized.

Sources:

Lynn Andrews Center for Sacred Arts & Training. http://www.lynnandrews.com/pages/framelacsat.html. February 20, 2000.

Lyttelton, Edith (ca. 1865–1948)

Author, playwright, psychic, and past president of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London. A daughter of Arthur Balfour, she was educated privately and married in 1892. In a well-to-do position, she served in a number of social and charitable roles. She was a member of the Joint Council of the Vic-Wells and National Theatre and a governor of Stratford Memorial Theatre. During World War I she served on the War Refugees Committee and was deputy director of the Women's Branch of the Ministry of Agriculture (1917–19). She was British Substitute Delegate to the League of Nations Assembly at Geneva (1923–31) and appointed Dame Commander of the Order of the British Empire (1917). She received the Dame Grand Cross (1929).

In 1902 she joined the Society for Psychical Research, and from 1928 onward was a member of the council. In 1913, soon after her husband's death, she experimented with automatic writing and received predictions of the outbreak of World War I. Her scripts predicted the sinking of the liner Lusitania in 1915, and offered additional predictions that seemed to refer to World War II. Her presidential address to the SPR was published in the society's Proceedings (Vol. 41, part 132, 1933) and she wrote several books including Some Cases of Prediction (1937). She died September 2, 1948.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lyttelton, Edith. The Faculty of Communion. N.p., 1925.

———. Our Superconscious Mind. London, 1931.

———. Some Cases of Prediction. London: Bell, 1938.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Lytton, Bulwer (1803–1873)

According to his baptismal certificate, the full name of this once famous author was Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer-Lytton. He was born in London, May 23, 1803. His father was a Norfolk squire, Bulwer of Heydon Hall, and colonel of the 106th regiment (Norfolk Rangers); his mother was Elizabeth Barbara Lytton, a lady who claimed kinship with Cadwaladr Vendigaid, the semi-mythical hero who led the Strathclyde Welsh against the Angles in the seventh century. As a child the future novelist was delicate, but he learned to read at a surprisingly early age and began to write verses before he was ten years old. Going first to a small private school at Fulham, he soon passed on to another one at Rottingdean, and here he continued to manifest literary tastes, Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott being his chief idols at this time.

He was so talented that his relations decided it would be a mistake to send him to a public school. Accordingly he was placed with a tutor at Ealing, under whose care he progressed rapidly with his studies. Thereafter he proceeded to Cambridge, where he took his degree easily and won many academic laurels. Afterward he traveled for a while in Scotland and France, then bought a commission in the army. He sold it soon afterward, however, and began to devote himself seriously to writing.

Although busy and winning great fame, Lytton's life was not really a happy one. Long before meeting his wife, he fell in love with a young girl who died prematurely, and this loss seems to have left an indelible sorrow. His marriage was anything but a successful one, the pair being divorced comparatively soon after their union.

His first publications of note were the novels Falkland (1827), Pelham (1828), and Eugene Aram (1832). These won an instant success and placed considerable wealth in the author's hands, the result being that in 1831 he entered Parliament as the liberal member for St. Ives, Huntingdonshire. During the next ten years he was an active politician yet still found time to produce a host of stories, such as The Last Days of Pompei (1834), Ernest Maltravers (1837), Zanoni (1842), and The Last of the Barons (1843). These were followed shortly by The Caxtons (1849). Simultaneously Lytton achieved some fame as a dramatist, perhaps his best play being The Lady of Lyons (1838). Besides further novels, he issued several volumes of verses, notably Ismael (1820) and The New Timon (1846) while he did translations from German, Spanish, and Italian. He produced a history of Athens, contributed to endless periodicals, and was at one time editor of the New Monthly Magazine.

In 1851 he was instrumental in founding a scheme for pensioning authors and also began to pursue an active political career. In 1852 he was elected conservative Member of Parliament for Hertfordshire and held the post until his elevation to the peerage in 1866. He became Secretary for the Colonies in Lord Derby's ministry (1858–59) and played a large part in the organization of the new colony of British Columbia. He became Baron Lytton of Knebworth in July 1866 and thereafter took his place in the House of Peers.

In 1862 he increased his reputation greatly by his occult novel entitled A Strange Story. Toward the end of the decade he began to work at yet another story, Kenelm Chillingly (1873) but his health was beginning to fail, and he died May 23, 1873, at Torquay.

Even as a child, Lytton had evinced a predilection for mysticism, while he had surprised his mother once by asking her whether she was "not sometimes overcome by the sense of her own identity" (almost exactly the same question was put to his nurse in boyhood by another mystic, William Bell Scott). Lytton sedulously developed his leaning towards the occult, and it is frequently manifest in his literary output, including his poem The Tale of a Dreamer, and in Kenelm Chillingly. In A Strange Story he tried to give a scientific coloring to old-fashioned magic.

He was a keen student of psychic phenomena. The great medium D. D. Home was his guest at Knebworth in 1855. Home's phenomena greatly aroused Lytton's curiosity. He never spoke about his experiences in public, but his identity was at once detected in an account in Home's autobiography (Incidents in My Life, 1863) which reads:

"Whilst I was at Ealing, a distinguished novelist, accompanied by his son, attended a séance, at which some very remarkable manifestations occurred that were chiefly directed to him. The rappings on the table suddenly became unusually firm and loud. He asked: 'What spirit is present?' The alphabet was called over, and the response was: 'I am the spirit who influenced you to write Z (Zanoni).' 'Indeed,' said he, 'I wish you would give me some tangible proof of your presence.' 'What proof? Will you take my hand.' 'Yes.' And putting his hand beneath the surface of the table it was immediately seized by a powerful grasp, which made him start to his feet in evident trepidation, exhibiting a momentary suspicion that a trick had been played upon him. Seeing, however, that all the persons around him were sitting with their hands quietly reposing on the table, he recovered his composure, and offering an apology for the uncontrollable excitement caused by such an unexpected demonstration, he resumed his seat.

"Immediately after this another message was spelt out: 'We wish you to believe in the . . . ' On inquiring after the finishing word a small cardboard cross which was lying on a table at the end of the room was given into his hand."

When the press asked Lord Lytton for a statement, he refused to give any. His wariness to commit himself before the public was well demonstrated by his letter to the secretary of the London Dialectical Society, February 1869:

"So far as my experience goes, the phenomena, when freed from inpostures with which their exhibition abounds, and examined rationally, are traceable to material influences of the nature of which we are ignorant.

"They require certain physical organisations or temperaments to produce them, and vary according to these organisations and temperaments."

Lord Lytton sought out many mediums after his experiences with Home and often detected imposture. His friendship with Home extended over a period of ten years, and when he commenced the wildest of his romances, A Strange Story, he intended first to portray Home in its pages, but abandoned this intention for the fantastic conception of Margrave. The joyousness of Home's character, however, is still reflected in the mental make-up of Margrave. Lytton also became acquainted with the French occultist Éliphas Lévi, whom he assisted in magical evocations, and Lévi was clearly a model for the character of the magus in The Haunted and The Haunters (1857).

Sources:

Howe, Ellic. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

Lytton, Bulwar. The Coming Race. London: George Routledge & Sons, 1877.

———. Complete Works. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, n.d.

———. A Strange Story. Mobile, Ala.: S. H. Goetzel, 1863. Frequently reprinted.

———. Zanoni. London: Saunders & Otley, 1842.